I definitely want to avoid shame and guilt, as there is no fear in love

Read the 400 series I'm finally starting to post, and keep up with when the next installments come out, as this is meant to address how to conquer things like shame and guilt.

How does one avoid this shame and guilt that the church has jaded us with in regards to sex and waiting until marriage? Does this have something to do with "mission"?

Being on mission is a large part of it, but there are spiritual foundations that have to be established first before the mission-orientation of your life can do its work. Again, the 400-level content will be addressing this.

To give a tad bit more information, Matthew 12 talks about an evil spirit being cast out and returning with 7 more if it finds the house still empty. Being "on mission," or more accurately: living by the Spirit and His call for your life, is filling your house appropriately so that it is not empty. But getting rid of the evil spirit in the first place must precede this. The answer is the Gospel and will be the focal point of the next 400-series post (Part 3 of the Lens).

I have actually seen the opposite... it seems girls would love to jump in bed with guys in the day and age. I hope I interpreted this correctly.

Most girls, yes. But that's because most girls in the church are not genuine Christians (same for most guys). There are several, though, who do have this completely jaded attitude toward sex because of their overbearing upbringing, which causes them to be sex-avoidant and to be very relieved at the knowledge that they don't have to worry about sex for the near future. My wife was one of them, and still has some semblance of these tendencies.

Thoughts on my family vs. my wife

5 upvotes · 29 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

As u/steelsharpenssteel said, this is your issue, not any of theirs.

Why do you give a crap about what your family thinks of your wife? DNGAF. "But it's affecting me and my kids because they won't come over." From the story you gave, if you were a rock about all of this, they'd be able to put up with her. The fact that they didn't feel like they could be honest with you for so long is very telling.

Why have you been putting up with your wife's crap for so long? Because you were blind and now you see. Fix it. Lead her or leave her. But take the opportunity to test your leading skills now, otherwise you're going to screw up the next relationship and have to dig yourself out of that hole instead of this one. Figure it out now, then when you're in a good place make the decision.

But for the love of all that is good, don't make major life choices because your mommy thinks you picked the wrong girl. Figure that out for yourself. If it happens by chance to be the same as what appease your parents, fine.

But don't let that be what controls your decision. You control your decisions.

FR: The Spousal Support Scam

5 upvotes · 28 January 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Well, my boss convinces people to go to trial all the time when they really should have settled. That's how he stays rich. So people will do what their lawyer says, for the most part, even when those clients end up spending 6 figures on their case by the end (true story on more than one occasion).

FR: The Spousal Support Scam

5 upvotes · 28 January 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Well, I can only speak to my state here, but we certainly don't have any such official calculator. There is a program available in all states called FinPlan that functions similarly (which is how I determine my % splits), but there is nothing obligating a judge to use it, and many openly reject it.

I had one judge brag about how she was a few months away from term expiration (i.e. been a judge for the maximum time allowable at law) and had never once used a calculator - she always just went with her gut, and had never been reversed on appeal in her career.

So yes, the whims of the judge matter greatly.

Having my mother NOT come out for the birth of our child due to the way my wife treats my mother?

5 upvotes · 24 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

Why do you think she feels like your mom must be the one to bail her out instead of you?

"I work and don't get much/any paternity leave."

Boo hoo. She has the option of saying, "Husband, what's the plan?" Instead, she says, "Husband, go get your mom to figure it out." Why is that?

I have no desire for my wife. I cheated. What is the end-game?

5 upvotes · 22 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

You're right, I have no actual experience in infidelity. But I dare you to find anyone on this sub who would argue otherwise - that one can have better sex under the constraints of marriage.

Advice - Taking the Path to Change/Passion

5 upvotes · 16 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

It sounds like you already know your problems and what you need to do to take the next steps toward resolving the problem: "Me being in her frame, no dread, if I was smacking my career out of the park." I'm sure you could list more if you thought about it.

The thing here is that you've screwed this all up for 20 years. That's a heck of a lot of conditioning and habit-forming to undo.

What's worse is that everything in this post looks at her sexuality and not at your masculinity. So, let me add a few things to your list: DNGAF attitude, abundance mentality, outcome independence, and stoicism.

The more you wander in the realm of, "OMG, my wife won't have sex with me. What should I do?!?" the further you're dragging yourself from your goals. That's an awful place to be. It makes you less attractive to her, so you get less sex; and it makes you all up-tight and frustrated over her sexless audacity, which is just a horrible mental state to live in.

Learn to transcend sex - to live as if you never cared to have sex again in your life. Start there. When you can live there and mean it, then her sexuality will have lost its power over you and you can engage with her however you feel like and if she keeps denying you, you won't care. Which, ironically, is what's going to increase her attraction to you. And if she doesn't respond, you'll already be in the "Whatever, I don't need you; I've got better stuff to do than pine over you" mentality anyway, which is what's going to help you move on with your life.

Holy crap, life is good ! What are some of you thinking ?

5 upvotes · 8 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

Why aren't you working on yourself ? When your car breaks down, what do you do ? You fix it !

That would be great if there was a uniformly agreed upon standard of what a "fixed man" looks like. We all know what a fixed car is like and how it's supposed to operate. That doesn't exist with masculinity. That's why the TRP sidebar identifies the sub with the phrase: "in a culture increasingly lacking a positive identity for men."

So why are some of you so friggin hesitant to read and lift ?

Most guys aren't willing to put in effort toward something without knowing they'll get a return for their effort. They're so used to everything failing that they don't believe "sidebar and lift" actually helps. It sounds like another snake oil salesman promising some get rich quick result with nominal effort.

Also, most of the guys you're referencing aren't even here yet in the first place.

Why do you care what she says ? If your partner disrespects, ignores you, you cheats on you, calls you names and doesn't follow your lead, why do you care ?

Because culture has raised them to believe that they must care.

/u/BluepillProfessor wrote this up quite nicely on r/RPChristians: "Men are trained from birth to commit idolatry by pedestalizing women. Then at puberty and as teenagers with the horny hormones raging (when every other society in human history worked hard to marry them off) 90% are denied any type of relief and even denied most types of positive interactions with their female peers because they are interested in the "older boys" (aka riding the CC). It doesn't take a genius to figure out how early training combined with unique physical desperation at a uniquely vulnerable time in their life causes men to turn flawed creatures into Goddesses."

Act like you are single.

That's the meal ticket right there.

AWALT, but not all women are going to respond positively to your growth and development.

I'd be cautious here. This comes off as "red pill only works on women who are receptive to red pill." When a man changes women respond. That's pretty much a fact of life. Over time those changes are virtually always positive (subject to initial negative reactions). But they might not be to the degree necessary to meet the man's standards and expectations. To that end ...

The relationship might or might not be salvageable

This isn't an objective reality; it's a subjective conclusion. Either the wife decides this for the man by leaving him or the man decides it for himself by setting a standard and following through. When a guy starts improving, as your post is all about, it's virtually always the latter. As BPP notes in his podcast, a woman can't stand the thought of leaving a guy who is improving without her commanding him to do so. The "what might he have turned out to be?" question will haunt them forever, so they'll always wait and see. So, once a man starts improving, regardless of how far he is, the decision over whether or not the relationship is salvageable is his to make - and that's a highly subjective decision.

Holy crap my life is good now. I lived in a bad relationship for 10 years.

I'm confused ... is your life good because you escaped your ex? That sounds like some r/deadbedrooms nonsense. You list the answer, but then you make it sound in your conclusion like leaving your ex was really what saved you. "Get out of bad relationships" is often good advice, but nothing in your post comments on how any of your suggestions have improved your life ... except maybe that it's what gave you the balls to leave?

Becoming a High Value Woman

5 upvotes · 5 January 2018 · /r/RedPillWomen

Agreed. Contrary to popular opinion, men don't marry for sex. It's true that without sex you're just roommates, so sex is what makes it a marriage. But pretty much everyone agrees that (at least for non Christians) a guy can have a way more exciting sex life by remaining single and hopping from girl to girl.

So, if sex is better when single, the reason for marrying must be elsewhere.

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

5 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Tag: /u/redpillwonder

It is widely accepted that phenotypical changes occur between couples who share protracted sexual activity. Dr. Robert Zajonc had some pretty influential studies back in the 80s that we talked about in my psychology class in college. He had people match a few dozen photos. Half of them were couples as newlyweds all with similar demographics (age, race/ethnicity, etc.) and the other half were the same couples near their 25 year anniversary. The newlywed photo pairings were predominantly random. The 25-year anniversary photos resulted in a major increase to successfully pairing the married partners.

Now, the theory at the time was that this was simply due to lifestyle habits. If one spouse laughs a lot, the other likely will as well, developing similar mouth creases. Or if they have similar diets, they're going to have similar skin tonality and their features will develop in similar ways according to those diets.

Is it possible that there's a genotypical effect in addition to the phenotypical one? Sure. But the evidence is spotty, at best, and it would require a lot more than a one night stand to have any appreciable impact on the DNA of the woman's eggs to be noticeable - particularly when you compare that to the DNA of the actual father present in the child.

To that end, I work with DNA tests on children all the time. It usually involves women who are in new relationships. For example, if I'm doing a divorce for a woman who was with the same sexual partner (her STBEx husband) for over 20 years and suddenly becomes pregnant with her lover's child (oops!), the DNA test is highly conclusive as to who the father is and the % match between the STBEx husband and the child is not appreciably different from cases where I have done DNA tests involving pregnancy from a one night stand.

In short, although phenotypical adjustments can cause a microevolutionary change within an individual woman, affecting her genetics, I'm simply not persuaded that even 20 years of being with the same sexual partner will have a genotypical impact on the child.

To that end, I will decline to sidebar this without further evidence - but more because it hasn't even passed muster on TRP, which would be the first place you'd expect to find research like this. If TRP approves it and it does end up having more validity to it than what I can find AND that there is a fairly conclusive link to our faith in some way, which I simply don't see yet. I guess I need the explanation spelled out better for how this affects our understanding of Scripture, if true.

Be the Judge

5 upvotes · 19 December 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This makes sense in some contexts, particularly in a TRP model, but it also makes me wonder from an MRP perspective how AFBB would be such a big concept. Specifically, if the woman can make the rules with her beta (BB) and yet screw Chad on the side (AF), why does Chad having a "high value dick" change anything for her? Women can get sex - even good sex - pretty much whenever they want. The only real question is whether or not screwing Chad is worth whatever else she would be risking (i.e. her beta husband leaving her).

It's not Chad's "high value dick" that's in short supply and high demand - it's unwavering commitment from that high value man that is the unicorn for women. There are plenty of men who can be Chad for a one night stand. But sprinkle commitment into the relationship and either Chad's gone to someone else or Chad becomes a beta.

Be the Judge

5 upvotes · 19 December 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This works if you have a cudgel. PROTIP, modern man doesn't.

Fair point. In Christianity this works differently, but from a secular perspective you're probably right.

That said, I do know that my wife would be far more devastated from divorce than I would be. The practical aspects are identified in my "Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape" post, which is on the sidebar, and the less mentioned aspect is that it would cause her a great deal of emotional distress and shame and I'd be over it fairly quickly with a "This sucks, but life goes on" attitude - and she knows this (though I refrain from ever explicitly saying it). It's her who won't leave me, not the other way around. I simply won't leave because I don't have to, but there are several grounds in which I would.

argument, consequence, and authority. Explain where in your life you haven't ceded this already?

This probably relates to the distinctions between secular RP and having a Christian faith. There are more eternal consequences and spiritual factors at play that simply don't work or make sense in a secular context, so I'll decline to address them here.

She knows 100% that so long as she can handle your arguments, you will always acquiesce, because you'll never leave her, and never cheat. explain which fancy lawyer words will overcome that ultimate bluff on your part.

To be clear, I don't bluff. More to the point, this caricature about me is based on stereotypes from the Christian label and things I've said out of context. Suffice it to say that I view cheating, for me, as a break of frame and that I have a more flexible standard for divorce (including in the case of a sexually denying spouse) than most people assume when they see the Christian label, although I get there on different grounds than BPP lays out. My flair is simply misleading.

How long into a relationship do you wait to have sex?

5 upvotes · 19 December 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Personally, I'm a "never before marriage" guy, and my wife and I waited. But for everyone else, ask yourself: If he breaks up with me a week or two after, would I regret having slept with him?

Is This A Good Idea?

5 upvotes · 15 December 2017 · /r/askTRP

How is this even remotely on point here?

Non-covert contracts... just contracts... how to handle?

5 upvotes · 30 November 2017 · /r/askMRP

Assuming by "we are both very religious" you're referring to Christianity, this would be good to post on r/RPChristians. My wife and I are also both very invested in our faith and she has serious hangups from all the anti-sex rhetoric youth and teenagers are given in the church for the first two decades of life. That said, when it comes to dirty talk, an easy way to challenge this is to pressure-flip or employ negative inquiry (I noticed WISNIFG isn't one of the books on your "read" list, yet somehow you skipped over this "prerequisite" and went straight into the 100-level stuff - go back and read it).

Specifically, just ask her, "What's so bad about pillow talk? ... What's so bad about that? ... Why do you believe that's sinful or wrong?" Finish it off with a challenge for her to find you a verse that proves it's sinful. Most people don't understand the freedom Christ is meant to bring, and a rules-oriented life is a lot easier. There's comfort that comes with clear boundaries - and girls are doubly subject to this, given that their only role in a relationship is to follow (whereas Christian men have the dual role of leader in the physical marriage, but follower as part of the bride of Christ, the church). So, even when she's free from rules and boundaries, she naturally wants to place them back on herself. It's easier to live within those confines and accept the guilt and stress that comes with following the rules rather than accepting the reality that no one is trying to control them and they're free to do what they please.

To be clear, this is a lot of what RP is all about. A side-effect of the man becoming OI and developing abundance is that the covert expectations the man once had on his wife are gone. He's setting her free, saying, "You do whatever you want. I'm just going to be awesome. If you want to be awesome with me, climb aboard ... but we're doing it my way." You're not forcing her to do anything any more than Jesus forces us to follow his rules. He simply says, "I'm Jesus. I'm awesome. If you want to follow me, great. If not, go do your own thing - no one's stopping you." Just as the consequence of rejecting Jesus to do your own thing is an eternity separated from Jesus ... so also is the consequence of your wife rejecting you to do her own thing - she can live forever separate from you, and you just go keep being awesome.

I know you're nowhere near there and probably not even moving in that direction, but if you're coming from a religious background, it's vital to realize that your job is not to control or manipulate her into doing what you want her to do; it's for you to do what you want to do and she can do whatever she wants ... and in the process, somewhere along the way, you doing you will make you more attractive so she's more likely to want to do you too. Because spiritual marriage and physical marriage are paralleled in Scripture, the best way to get her to experience the spiritual freedom (i.e. internally from feelings of guilt, shame, etc.) to open up in the bedroom is to emphasize the freedom she has in your marriage. As /u/justpickanyusername noted, I'm guessing she's not likely to leave you if you stop trying to control her and release your expectations on her. So, getting rid of your covert contracts is going to be key - because that's how she'll learn that God doesn't put any covert contracts on her either, despite the fact that many, many, many church women do assume there are implicit expectations put on them by God that aren't outlined in Scripture - things that bloopers have been teaching them all their lives that simply aren't biblical, they're just things that sounded good to put in a sermon at the time.

As for your contracts: they actually are covert. Sure, you had one isolated example of her overtly telling you, "If you do this, then I'll do that." But you have the covert expectation that she will follow through on what she says.

You covertly expect her not to change her mind. You covertly expect her mood to remain reasonably consistent over a span of five minutes. You covertly expect her to think and talk rationally. Now, she might follow through on those things. But she also might not. And you assume that if you act a right, certain way, then all of these expectations you have on her will be met ... and therefore her overt statement will be made into an actuality. In her mind, she's really thinking, "You had me revved up 15 minutes ago, but as I started eating I'm just not feeling it anymore ... maybe I can get something out of it so it's not all a waste ... oh, he just did the dishes, but now I'm really tired, having just laid in bed and zoned out to my phone for a while, so I'm really not feeling it at all ... maybe I can just ignore him and he'll give up."

You stopped escalating and started letting her de-escalate. Women are like gravity - their arousal always trends downward and it takes an active influence to prop it back up again.

But here's the biggest mistake you made: she said "Do the dishes and I'll do you" - but for some reason you assumed by nature that you have to be the first one to fulfill your end of the bargain. Screw that. I'm a lawyer. You know how often I advise my clients to fulfill their end of a deal first and just take the other side's word that they're good for it? Never. That's idiotic.

Now, from her perspective, if you get her to fulfill her end of the deal first, even if it is based on some overt contract that you'll do the dishes afterward (which means you're in her frame, by the way, so you're better off just abandoning deals like this in the first place unless you're the one offering them to her). If nothing else, at least you've given her something to look forward to. She realizes she's getting something out of it and is at least a little invested in that outcome. But once you actually do the dishes, she's no longer getting anything out of having sex with you (noting that women don't tend to crave orgasms until after they're already revved up, so when she's cold she doesn't care that she might get off too). This is one of the many reasons why choreplay is an awful, awful, awful sexual strategy. If she already got what she wants, why should she care about making the sex good for you - or even having sex at all in the first place? If she wants nothing from you, she'll give nothing to you to get it. She might not be stopping you from taking from her (i.e. starfish, non-responsiveness, etc.), but she's not going to make the effort herself.

Dark Triad - Narcissism

5 upvotes · 18 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

If it helps, the DSM-V defines a narcissist as someone who meets 5 of the following 9 traits:

A grandiose logic of self-importance: This isn't simply thinking you're more valuable than everyone else around you. It means you literally think everyone in your sphere of influence would fall apart if you left them to themselves. You believe people depend on you more than they actually do.

A fixation with fantasies of infinite success, control, brilliance, beauty, or idyllic love: This is the guy who thinks he's going to make millions from the novel he's conceptualized in his head but has never actually started writing; or the homeless man who thinks he has the idea that could revolutionize politics and bring world peace if only he could get into office; or even the blue-pill guy who thinks he's the most romantic guy in the world and every girl would be lucky to have him as a husband because he's so nice and affectionate and different from all the other guys.

A credence that he or she is extraordinary and exceptional and can only be understood by, or should connect with, other extraordinary or important people or institutions: These are the celebrities who only marry other celebrities; the CEOs who don't make eye contact with poor people ... it's also (and more accurately) the common people who think they're so hot/smart/funny/etc. that they should be hanging out with celebrities because in their mind they're on that level and no one else gets it, they just can't seem to break through the system that's rigged against them.

A desire for unwarranted admiration: Nuff said.

A sense of entitlement: Not in the typical, "I earned it" manner - but the notion that the world should revolve around you just because you exist. It's literally the attitude of my 5 year old son.

Interpersonally oppressive behavior: A compulsion to ridicule other people, usually in harsh or crass ways; it's often directed toward the weak as easy targets, but the deeper narcissists take this attitude toward their superiors in self-destructive fashion as a means of affirming their own sense of superiority against common sense.

No form of empathy: simply put, you don't give a crap what other people think. My boss recently cited an academic journal that concluded that the narcissist's brain responses and an analysis of behaviors, responses, and comparison testing shows an emotional maturity level consistent with that of an 11-year-old boy.

Resentment of others or a conviction that others are resentful of him or her: This goes beyond the typical, "I don't like that guy" attitude. It's more global, applying to virtually everyone the narcissist comes in contact with (many psychologists hypothesize that a narcissist is incapable of genuine love because of this, but none can agree on how to define love in the first place, so that aspect of the conversation rarely goes much further). No matter who the narcissist is around, the mental focus is on how that person is failing to meet the narcissist's needs, or otherwise how the other person is screwed up for harboring a (non-existent) grudge (because the narcissist thinks other peoples moods and attitudes are always about him)

A display of egotistical and conceited behaviors or attitudes: we've all seen this.

The American Psychiatric Association also notes that narcissists are defined as having substantial impairment in two of the following four qualities:

- Individuality - the narcissist's sense of self is defined by what he assumes everyone else is thinking about him, thus lacks a core identity of his own
- Self-direction - narcissists usually have no substance behind their delusional perceptions (if they did, they would be thinking rightly, thus wouldn't be narcissists); so, their grandiose ideas about who they are or what they have to offer society never actually amount to anything
- Empathy - no concern for the needs or feelings of others
- Closeness - inability to pair-bond, develop deep, personal relationships, or foster intimacy with a spouse/SO on an emotional level

With all of that in mind, actually having a narcissistic personality disorder is incredibly destructive. It does make great sexual strategy (they usually have the hottest spouses with insanely crazy sex lives), but it will cripple a man's MAP and prevent him from being able to make any appreciable progress in his mission, as his self-import will consider realistic goals and progress too small and unworthy of his time and effort. He will only pursue that which is generally unattainable - and then blame everyone else when he can't meet his own expectations.

Narcissists have the worst hamsters of all the personality disorders.

That said, as noted in your post, in order for a person to be truly successful in life they must adopt lesser degrees of several narcissistic features - not enough to tick the checkbox on the psychologist's scorecard, but certainly enough to push a person in the right direction. All successful people in life have narcissistic undertones embedded in their personalities.

Narcissistic tendencies don't have value for their own sake. Rather, their success comes from three primary factors: (1) when these traits are appropriately internalized at healthy (or at least "not dangerous") levels weak people recognize they can't compete and back out of the way, reducing competition from people who legitimately might have stood a chance if they kept playing the game (when at unhealthy levels, the persona is so extreme that even the weak see through it and aren't afraid most of the time); (2) narcissism fosters dominance, which triggers a person's ability to manage and overcome the competition that does stay in the game; and (3) in order to maintain the "marginal narcissist's" sense of self, he becomes a master at charm, which garners incredible levels of popularity and makes people want to be around him.

Preempting the DV charge.

5 upvotes · 14 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

As they say, MRP can't fix a marriage

Well, it can fix a marriage, but that's an ancillary benefit if by chance it happens, not the focus.

Wife complains that she feels like I am "leaving her behind".

5 upvotes · 13 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

And she outright refuses to tell me what she's thinking in the moment because she "might regret it".

Check out the 206 post. It addresses why it's important to insist on nipping these things in the bud. First, by letting her refuse to address the issue right then and there, you're operating in her frame by giving her the power to decide when you talk about important issues. Second, by letting her hamster out for even longer, she becomes more and more convinced of the sincerity of her issues, even when they're entirely misguided in the first place. By addressing this up-front you're not only cutting off the problem before it escalates in her mind, but you're also getting to the truth of the matter, rather than having to NI [negative inquiry] your way through several layers of hamstering after she's done and ready. Start the conversation on your terms, not hers.

the problem I'm having, from what I understand, is keeping her in my frame

Because you're still letting her dictate the terms of the relationship, like when it's okay to talk to her about certain things and not.

She is genuinely hurt that I am making positive changes in my life "without her"

This is the golden goose right here:

- "Sure thing, I'll include you in everything. I'm heading to the gym tonight, why don't you come along"
- "I'm going to fix those boards on the deck, want to help me?"
- "I'd like to invite the Smiths over for dinner next week, you mind helping with the cooking?"

Now, she really means she wants to be involved in the decision-making process. But that's only because she's used to taking the lead on all of these things and she's fighting for a return to normalcy. Her push-back is actually a good thing.

But if you can reframe her objection into something where she can feel included as your helper, and she's actually willing to join in on your improvement by improving herself alongside you ... well, why not?

I seriously found a gem with her guys ... we are VERY different in many ways

She's not a gem or else you wouldn't be here. This type of ONEitis is what's keeping you in her frame. ONEitis is probably the single most important issue that kills a man's frame. If you believe she's unique among women, then the rules do not apply to her. You're always going to come up with some excuse for why she's not falling into your frame and you'll never internalize your own frame. This turns into a series of victim pukes about how a perfect little angel is somehow a vicious monster, "But's just this one area - everything else is perfect." Don't believe the lie. Even if you have someone in the top 1%, she has the same base operating system working beneath the flashy exterior and outward displays.

As for being "VERY different in many ways" - if you were referencing how you and she are very different, welcome to the club. My wife and I are about as complete opposites as possible. But if you mean your situation is different from what other married couples go through, think again. 1 Cor. 10:13 says otherwise.

I have "changed" for the better about 50 times since we've been together (9 years), and it lasts days to weeks at most

This is why I had ruiz post his blurb on addiction as 202. You're stuck in the perpetual inspiration/motivation cycle without ever escaping into transformation. You're not letting the Gospel change you internally, so your external behaviors keep relapsing.

This will be addressed in 400-level content. Sorry to all who I keep saying this to: I really do plan to get there, I've just been busier than planned, which keeps me from putting up as much content as I'd like.

I really went through some dark stuff and have done things to her I'd rather not say

We can't do much to help without knowing what's going on, but suffice it to say that the answer is usually OYS and move on. Confess your faults, put it out in the open rather than dancing around the issue. Let her choose how to respond to it. If she chooses to forgive you and move on, don't let her take that back. God doesn't look kindly on those who only pretend to be gracious and forgiving; it's got to be genuine and you can hold her to that.

If she eventually admits that she lied and she never really forgave you, then you've got a bigger problem on your hands that might mean escalating to a main event.

She is already well aware of alot of RP principles ... I have always felt a need to explain things or clarify to her Dang ... that sucks. Huge, yet irreversible mistake. This is why RP often says: Women don't want to have you explain the rules of the game to them; they just want you to play the game and to show them that you understand how to win.

i'd welcome any advice that comes my way.

I get the impression you haven't adopted a mission outside the marriage yet - one that you can both venture toward together. Go read (or re-read) 108 on the lifepath of a relationship. You're showing clear signs of swinging back and forth between the upper-left and lower-right quadrants with a lot of regression happening to deal with the negative implications of your forward progress. Get your mission and plow forward to get the relationship working again.

Hypergamy for the Married Man

5 upvotes · 9 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This conversation shows a severe ignorance of Christianity based on modern day stereotypes. I think you're listening to what blue pill pastors say rather than what the Bible actually says. In the same way you reject much of what blue pill scientists say about intergender relational dynamics on the grounds that they're not looking at the actual facts and they're getting their information from bad sources (i.e. asking women rather than observing their behaviors), so also do RP aware Christians reject what pastors say about intergender relational dynamics when they're not looking at the actual facts and preaching their own subjective ideologies rather than what the Bible actually says.

/u/_degenerate_: Doctrine that denounces evolution

That's not part of biblical doctrine. I can't find a state based on Christianity as a whole, but 78% of white mainline protestants believe in evolution as either a natural process or a process guided by God (44% of black protestants). Looking at white Catholics even, that number is 68% (as /u/BluepillProfessor alluded to). Among the unaffiliated Christians, it's 76%. Personally, I do believe God utilized evolutionary processes as a means of creating the world, and the Bible doesn't say anything that contradicts "a praxeology focused on the effects of evolutionary biology." Even to the degree that I may at some point end up differing as to the source of a particular impulse among humans, I don't deny those impulses and their existence.

You can't "not care" and "care with a religious fervor" simultaneously.

A primary theme throughout the Bible is to reject any care for what other humans think of you or what happens to your relationships. "If I were still trying to please man, I would not be a servant of Christ" (Galatians 1:10). "Man," there, is in the general and includes my wife. "From now on, let those who have wives live as though they had none" (1 Cor. 7:29) - meaning our lives should be centered around our mission without regard for our spouses as some emotional center.

One also can't have abundance mentality when the choice is always limited to "the one" by virtue of faith.

The Bible doesn't preach anything about "the one" or having a soulmate. That's a myth created by Calvinists who like to circle jerk about God having one predetermined path for everyone. But because that path is unknowable, even if there was such thing as a soulmate, you'd never know if you found her, making the whole concept moot in the first place.

As noted in this comment on this thread, "I've even told my wife to her face (not that I recommend this) that if she died or left me I would not be crushed, as it would make it easier to pursue my mission without dragging her along."

a permanent union of "one man, one woman."

The Bible never preached "one man, one woman." In truth, most cultures through Bible times specifically permitted polygamy, including Israel, and the only time the Bible references a man only having one wife is for a deacon in the church (1 timothy 3:12). Given that this command is not extended elsewhere, the presumption (as many Christians agree) is that if a man can afford to support multiple wives and lives in a society where polygamy is not illegal, then he's free to go for it.

Now, here's the thing - TRP hates it when the media looks at all the noob haters, singles them out and says, "Look how awful everyone associated with that group is!" And every month or two TRP has to put up a post saying, "If you are here because of our CNN coverage, we're not really like that; don't just us all by the few bad eggs we have here."

I'm going to say the same thing about Christianity. Sure, there are a lot of bad eggs. But unlike most secular forums, our faith is not defined by what pastors preach on Sunday mornings. It's defined by what the Bible says. So, if you find something in Scripture that's contrary to RP praxeology, let me know - I'd love to see it and discuss that on RPC (and I'm not denying that there may be some conflicts). But don't express ignorance by speaking from stereotypes as if they define our faith.

Wife addicted to weaponized sex; impending divorce

5 upvotes · 6 November 2017 · /r/askMRP

6 weeks was the longest I think

Hah! Try 18 months ... then after that reading up on RP and realizing I had to set all of my resentment, frustration and anger aside if I wanted to become attractive again. That was not an easy pill to swallow - probably the hardest of all the RP lessons I had to accept. But it works.

Wife addicted to weaponized sex; impending divorce

5 upvotes · 6 November 2017 · /r/askMRP

she went ice queen over sth, shut down the sex, I withdrew and got busy

When I read this from most guys, I get the image that he tries to initiate, she says no, and he says something fairly innocuous (or nothing at all) and just leaves. Maybe this is you, maybe it's not, but it falls under the other kind of butthurt.

- Butthurt 1: Aggressive - Guy gets emotionally aggravated at the rejection and picks a fight.
- Butthurt 2: Passive-Aggressive - Guy represses his emotional aggravation at the rejection and withdraws.

In both cases her actions have sparked an emotional response, which proves to her that she has the ability to control you. She can't control which type of butthurt you'll express, but she knows she can get to you all the same - and that's all that matters for her to keep her power.

The solution is that you literally have to stop caring. It cannot be just an act. At first it will be an act, but fake it til you make it. If you express any emotional response to her rejection she's going to see it as a sign of weakness and keep pushing that button whenever it advantages her to do so.

At the same time, when you punish your wife (whether by being emotionally aggressive or emotionally repressive) when either one of you initiates sex, you're conditioning her to see sexual initiation as a danger zone where she is likely to feel emotional pain of one form or another. So, she'll do what she can to avoid that initiation in the first place in order to stay safe. That's why you probably get the "I'm tired" or "I have a headache" line approximately 5-10 minutes before she heads off to bed - just in time to cut you off from trying something before she walks into the room where sex happens (and shame on you if you let her go on thinking that the bedroom is the only room where sex happens).

The only real way to avoid being butthurt is literally to act like nothing happened and continue offering to let her live alongside your awesome life. She says no? "Cool, another night. Want to drink some wine and do a puzzle then?" I used to be super emotionally repressive against my wife (i.e. passive-aggressive butthurt) when she would deny me or show "duty sex" signs. Result? Even after discovering RP and trying to initiate, at first she would shrivel up into a ball and cry about how I must be so mad at her for saying no. Is that how I want her reacting when I try to have sex with her? No, so I'd respond, "If I were mad at you, would I do this ...?" and then I'd make out with her for 30 seconds, feel her up a bit, then walk away.

Eventually every denial was met with that kind of attitude. I showed her that her denial had no impact on my emotional state. Guess what happened? She stopped trying to manipulate me with denials. When she realized I was happy and fine without getting sex from her and that she couldn't get to me - even with her balled-up feelz

(i.e. guilt-tripping me into compliance), she started trying different approaches to getting her way ... but sexual denial reduced significantly as one of those methods.

My Revelation of Manhood

5 upvotes · 3 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Great to hear your story and see some serious progress! For many of us, "a few times a week" is a world of difference from where we once were.

I have committed myself to changing, for myself, but also primarily for God

This is a beautiful line - one that we would all do well to remember. Any time it's for her or for sex, that's what makes our world fall apart.

going to pick up woodworking

This is totally awesome. One of the guys I disciplined years ago took up woodworking as his primary hobby a few years ago. It's amazing how much he enjoys it, while also it being something where he can make some useful things for around the house or cash from selling his projects. Props to you for having a productive hobby!

My hobby is (no surprise) writing. I've just never made much of an effort to submit my books to literary agents, so I've never really gotten anything published yet, thus no personal return. I either need to find something more productive to enjoy as a hobby or actually buckle down, finish some hard revisions, and start querying agents!

Having a hard time with this reality.

5 upvotes · 24 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

I don't think this situation can be fully understood without delving into the spiritual aspect of things (i.e. more on your mother's religious views), but that would inherently require some talk of "right/wrong" and I'll avoid that here.

Suffice it to say that humans have a base impulse to do certain things. Sometimes it's to eat. Other times it's to drink water. Other times it's to have sex with a random stranger. Other times it's to have sex with your own spouse. One of the things that makes humans unique among virtually all other animals is that we have the ability to deny these base instincts/impulses.

Similar to what /u/ReddJive said, "AWALT" means that the base impulse is there. But again, humans can choose to act against those impulses. Some women are highly self-controlled and will be faithful until death. Others will not be. That self-control can come from religious influences, it can come from fear of consequences, it can come from psychological barriers, or from societal conditioning. Whatever the source, it's there.

The thing is, you never know which woman is the high-self-controlled woman from the one who only pretends to have a lot of self-control. On TRP, most men are trying to get in a girl's pants on the first date or two. As a result, they're finding women with low self-control. It makes sense, then, that they just assume all women will actually cheat because their primary interactions are with women who don't have the self-control to resist cheating.

On MRP you're probably going to find a different narrative. We're around women (our wives) who have probably demonstrated significant self-control over long periods of time. So, although we acknowledge that they have the impulse to cheat, for many of us we have additional security that our wives will exercise self-control against that impulse. That security comes from personal experience and observation with her.

That said, I can also recite example after example after example of women who had the outward experience to the rest of the world of being upright, faithful, self-controlled women - even those who had high positions of status in the church and were faithfully teaching people about the Bible every week ... and some of these women cheat. The point here is that there will always be some doubt about whether a particular woman actually has the requisite self-control to withhold cheating or not, and if so whether or not she will exercise it. Within that gray area, you're going to have to make an assumption.

To that end, it comes down to a matter of utility. Which one is more useful: (a) assuming she might cheat? or (b) assuming she will never cheat on you? If you assume she won't cheat, you're setting yourself up for failure. There are pretty much no benefits to this assumption (or very few/nominal ones), but great risk. In the alternative, assuming that she might be the cheating type encourages you to be a better man, to take caution in the relationship, etc., while it has virtually no negative repercussions. Between the two, it makes more sense to follow the useful assumption over the useless one - even if the assumption ends up being wrong at the end of the day. After all, if you become a better man in order to keep your wife attracted to you to help her exercise that type of self-control to keep her from cheating, even if she wasn't going to cheat in the first place do you really think she's going to be ticked at you for this?

How does this advice change for dating?

5 upvotes · 18 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I see that this sub is aimed at marriage. Im very, very single.

No fret at all. Here's the thing: RP is sexual strategy. The Bible says we shouldn't be having sex outside of marriage. So, there are only two circumstances where a Christian should be applying RP as a sexual strategy:

- When already married
- When looking to build a foundation for an eventual marriage

In your case, the latter function applies to you. So, RP will apply more toward who you should be now in order to prepare yourself and your eventual spouse for a long, satisfying, sex-filled marriage.

With that in mind, RPC delves beyond rote sexual strategy into addressing biblical masculinity as a whole, which applies even to singles who do not intend to marry.

skeletons in my closet. I have no idea how to be a good enough person or have the dedication to not succumb to sin.

You can't just will-power your way into sinlessness. Period. Only Jesus saves from sin. Only once you're actually "saved" can Jesus begin chipping away at your life problems. It doesn't matter what your skeletons are. "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just and will forgive us our sins and purify us from ALL unrighteousness" (1 John 1:9). Sure, you're still going to fail. But are you sinning intentionally or because you lack the self-control necessary to stay on the straight and narrow?

Good news: RPC is probably the only place in the Christian universe (at least as far as I know) where you're actually going to learn effective strategies for biblical self-control. More on that in the 400-series, but for now things like "STFU" and stoicism and just generally becoming a man will seriously help with this. Also, see the 202 post on conquering addiction.

i have no problem being honest about my faults

That's good. You're not going to get very far here if you're faking.

I have validation issues that obviously have to be addressed as well.

Validation usually comes from caring too much about what other people think about you. /u/macmeeler just put up a great post yesterday on the topic of helping to sift through whose opinions matter and whose you can chuck out the window. The most important verse reference on point is Galatians 1:10 - if you live to get the approval of people, you'll never be capable of walking with Christ.

How do i "date well" without being steam rolled by some good girl church girl who expects a BP beta bucks?

I'll make a post on this in the next couple days. Long story short, physical marriage between men and women parallels spiritual marriage with Christ. The same parallel applies to pre-marriage relationships. The Bible doesn't say much about this from a physical perspective, but it does have a lot to say about the pre-salvation process: Evangelism. Go learn how Jesus draws his bride to himself and do likewise. More on that to come.

Also, i am hoping some of have been in my shoes in terms of my position with religion.

I know countless people who have lived where you're at. Your presence is welcome and you are not alone!

Any wisdom at all would be great. I struggle with myself on a daily basis now and its only getting darker.

Not to parrot the obvious, but start by lifting. It sounds like you're not overweight or anything, which is good - but are you actually built or just "not out of shape"? What's your bench, squat, deadlift, etc.? Read 101 and 203 on the sidebar.

Do you have a mission in life - preferably one from God, where you can invite a woman to live alongside you as your helper? Read 108.

Do you have the proper frame of mind to understand how the feminist imperative has permeated the church and the strength to stand against it and the wisdom to cultivate desire through your strength rather than supplication? Read 102, 103, 107.

Are you a skilled leader who people follow, or are you desperately clinging onto the few people who are okay with associating with you? Read 204, 205.

Are you living like Jesus lived and learning to grow in your faith from that of a spiritual child to one who eats meat and labors for the Kingdom? Read the 300 series.

I'm writing these things for a reason ;)

Another threat is coming

5 upvotes · 11 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

Since /u/matrixtospartanatLV summoned me ...

Is this pattern of her wanting out of the marriage during or close to ovulation normal?

Yes, it means that she wants to screw someone but can't bear the thought of screwing you, so she wants out.

Thoughts on best approach?

Start recording one normal, peaceful conversation every 1-2 days. If she ever files for divorce and alleges acts of violence to get a protection order, you play those recordings and say, "Does this sound like the voice of someone who's terrified of me?" If you have the diligence for it, more recordings is always better.

More to your pattern, despite what you say your pattern of action shows that you've made her your emotional center. You need to find a mission in life outside the marriage. Women were designed to be helpers and arm candy. That's what they want more than anything. They don't want to be the precious stone Indiana Jones is searching for - they want to be the girl adventuring alongside him, helping him find it. Make her your stone and you've just lost your marriage. Find another stone and invite her on the adventure and you're giving her an opportunity to fulfill her internal imperative, which is the only way she can be satisfied in the marriage.

Once you have a mission, start getting in shape to fulfill that mission. That starts with physical shape (also: doing physical things a la OYS). Then it's emotional shape (master stoicism and frame), and finally: mental shape (keep up the reading).

After a month or two of making headway with the physical, mental, and emotional trifecta, you should start to demonstrate leadership toward fulfilling your mission. That mission can't be marriage-centered. That never works. If your mission is "make a lot of money, have a great house, raise good kids, etc." then you're not going to make much headway. Those are the things all women want inherently anyway (i.e. provision, beta comforts). That just comes off as being a beta-appeaser. Sure, you can have those things too, but you have to show her that you have higher interests than hers, and that you're capable of pursuing them.

Then invite her to help. Once you've mastered the trifecta and have made progress on the mission, she should (ideally) be hooked on your mission and want to join you in it. This is where true relational intimacy will happen for her - not from getting her needs and comforts satisfied, but by living your life on a mission alongside you. That's what she craves. Would Indiana Jones' girl have been happier if immediately after they met he quit his journey to buy a house and settle down as a professor? No, the adventure is what caused her to go crazy over him. That's what solidified the bonding.

I want to keep the marriage intact.

Above is how.

Sleeping Naked

5 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

If human...harsh man

Haha, yeah. The rule used to be that they had to stay in their own beds all night. My wife started caving and letting them sleep in our room if they came in before I went to bed, but she knew I didn't approve of them being in the bed. So, it turned into: "If you want a bed, go to your own. Otherwise, you get the floor."

Sleeping Naked

5 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Haha, that'd be too much like work.

The Challenge of A Hot Wife

5 upvotes · 2 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

hot Christian woman marry guys for their "potential" only to find herself disappointed his lack of ambition in realizing it

So, so true. That, or they marry him for alleged spiritual maturity because of positional leadership titles (pastor, elder, etc.) thinking that'll make him a great husband, only to find the opposite.

"somehow I convinced her to marry a scrub like me!" as if it were something to brag about

They're bragging about how humble they are. I hate it when guys do this. Also, when I was dating my wife (granted, a decade ago), I once made a comment like this and she immediately shut that up, saying it would be embarrassing to her if other people perceived her as dating beneath her. Girls don't like it when their guys say things like it, and guys look like wusses when they do it.

Having a top tier SMV wife means that not only Chad, but Chadzilla, is your competition.

So true. It rings true for being a top-tier guy too, though ;)

mate guarding ... you legitimize the threat as credible in her eyes

This is wise.

cucked

That's the word that got your post removed initially, fyi.

Overall, great post. Thanks for sharing this! I'm married to what I'd call an 8.5. I've definitely seen a lot of this happen at different times in our marriage. When you say, "error if we assume that just by virtue of her faith such a Christian wife is immune" - I completely agree. I've seen this happen too many times in my job (one even went lesbian for a time, after her husband cheated on her with a little boy - church drama at its worst!). But couple that with a borderline sexually repressive psychosis from the anti-sexuality agenda some Christians are raised in ... and that's pretty much a guarantee she's not gonna cheat ;p Fortunately, I've made some solid progress over the years. Still working at that one, though.

Bitchy mood

5 upvotes · 30 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

The withdrawal of attention is better applied in a grand-scheme sort of way. You withdraw by scheduling other activities. On a particular day, you don't go into silence mode and just ignore her. That comes off as being butt-hurt. You're better off holding fame and having a good time in the midst of her bad mood. That's actually the best way to pull someone out of their funk anyway.

To be clear, you have to figure out your goal: (1) do you want to have fun tonight? Or (2) do you want to make it obvious you're trying to teach her a lesson?

Why are they so defensive?

5 upvotes · 12 September 2017 · /r/askTRP

Women are highly sensitive to "fakers." They like the illusion that their man is "the real deal." The notion that a man could practice some techniques from a book to get into a woman's pants is offensive to her (therefore making her defensive, per your question) because it threatens her ability to find "Mr. Perfect." She'll never know if she's dating a true Chad or a chump who knows how to look like Chad until she's emotionally invested in the relationship.

/u/BluepillProfessor just made a post about this here, specifically describing how men are made, not born - and that women instinctively reject this and want to find "naturals," while simultaneously faking it themselves. Your answer is described there in more detail.

Picking the right attorney

5 upvotes · 8 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

a client doesn't actually know their own case's weaknesses

Very true. When I'm interviewing the client, I never ask it directly that way. Instead, I ask: "What are the things you think your spouse is going to say about you to get ahead?" 99% of the time the guy can rattle off a million things his wife is going to say about him - but he never would have identified those things as weaknesses directly because in his mind they're not true, so they're not actual weaknesses. But everyone knows what their wife will complain about and what she's likely to lie about.

It depends

Indeed - and I always play out each scenario for them. "If this, then that ... but if this instead, then that instead ..." etc. That way they know what all the options are and we can start figuring out how to frame the case in a way that best suits his goals. For custody stuff, though, 90% of the time the discovery is worthless. As you note, that's more for financials, which is really where I shine.

flat fee

It is doable in divorce law as long as you do it by stages of the process. I tested it out once and it went something like this:

- To do all the initial filings, open the case, set up a case plan, and get through the first pretrial, it will be $w.
- To conduct discovery, possibly do a deposition, handle all the other hearings up to trial, set up a balance sheet, run support calcs, etc. it will be $x.
- To engage in settlement conversations at any phase of the process, it will cost $y.
- To go through trial, it will cost $z.

I don't quote appeals costs until just before trial because I need to know where the current is rolling to figure out what arguments we'd likely have to make. But, the one case where I did do this flat fee scenario it worked out quite well. I ended up charging a total of $30,000-ish for the entire case, my client got what he wanted. For one phase I went over budget (i.e. I spent more time than I was paid for) and for the other two I was under budget, altogether getting paid about $1,500 more than if I were to have charged hourly. The client was happy because he didn't have to bear the risk of it being more and he knows I'm motivated to work efficiently rather than just chatting him up during client meetings to get a few extra dollars.

50/50 v. OYS/Value

5 upvotes · 8 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Yeah, beds are a sensitive subject for most women. The marriage bed is a sacred symbol to them. In my BP days, when I was just starting to make changes, I had a lot of resentment against her for the sexlessness of our marriage, so I would sleep in the basement instead. This infuriated her. Now, biblically, sex is the actual defining factor of a marriage. So, it didn't make sense to me that sleeping in the same bed was more important to her a symbol of the marriage than having sex was. Instead, I took the attitude (without ever verbalizing it), "I'm not recognizing your symbol until you recognize mine." It certainly didn't work (I didn't have the frame for it at the time).

Nowadays I just tell her I'll sleep wherever I want. If I'm in the basement, it might be because I want to withdraw my presence in response to something she's done. Or maybe I just like clonking out to Netflix once in a while. If she wants to feel warm and fuzzy when I do sleep in our bedroom, great - I'm happy she can feel that way. If she wants to get all butthurt because I felt like sleeping in the basement, that's her business. I no longer give decision-making weight to her ideology of the marriage bed as some sacred thing, which means I'm also not tying my sexuality with her to it either, covert contracts be broken. The trick was getting her to realize this shift, as I had for far too long ingrained a clear pattern that sleeping in the basement = "He's mad at me."

Can RPChristians use real dread?

5 upvotes · 5 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Sorry for the auto-mod there.

just as we are instructed to take the admonition to cut off your hand and pluck out your eye

I actually do think he meant this passage literally, but he's saying it to prove a point. It's always said, "It's better to do this than to burn" - a point you well make about 1 Cor. 7:9. In short, he's saying, "If you could save yourself by cutting off your hand, you should do it." I think he means that literally - but then he concludes with the requirement to be perfect, thus saying, "But you can't save yourself by doing that" and in the following chapters concludes that he is actually the only way to salvation.

As to that 1 Cor. 7:9 point, though - absolutely brilliant. I've noticed that the Greek was missing the "with passion" part, but hadn't thought about it being double entendre.

Dread levels

Agreed on all counts. That said, in some of my past comments on spinning plates for Christians, I do believe 7 and 8 can be hit safely without causing serious spiritual problems - but only if the guy is spiritually mature enough that he's not controlled by temptation. I start conversations with hot girls all the time. But this falls within a few boundaries:

- I know I'm not going to succumb to temptation.
- I have a clear cut-off point (usually it's before getting a number, though that didn't stop the girl at the Greek drive through from offering it)
- Because the guy I want to be is friendly and likable and not afraid to talk to strangers or high-value people (after all, that's how I get ahead in my career), so by extension that means I have to be approaching other high value people, and for men women are usually higher value than other men, with regard to our own perception
- Because minor conversations help maintain an abundance mentality when done in moderation

Dread Level 22

Haha

Hi Gals, Here are some really cute ~60's Vintage videos. Here are a couple.

5 upvotes · 31 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Death note is great (slightly disappointed with the new netflix movie, though) ... but I think she was talking to the other commenter.

Fiance is away for 3 years, need advice

5 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

The break up talks have been because I hate the distance, no mention of the other larger issues

Does she know you're not happy with the sex? If the answer is yes, then she's associating that with every single other thing you complain about as well, whether you bring up sex at the time or not. In her mind, if she improved the sex you wouldn't be complaining about the distance - it'd be worth it to you. So, in her mind it's still an ultimatum even if you're not self-aware enough to realize that's what you're doing. I put it that way because that's really your agenda too. If you were getting amazing hot sex out of her, my guess is you'd be having a lot less breakup talks about "the distance."

Maybe we have grown apart

This is cultural conditioning on how the world wants you to view relationships. I'd love to hear a solid explanation of the "grow closer" or "grow apart" model of understanding relationships that makes sense. Relationships are a lot simpler than this emotional voodoo would have you believe. There are inputs and outputs, on switches and off switches. Unless she has a mental health problem, there are no complicated relationships - there are only complicated people who defy logic within a relationship.

idea of the man she wants me to be to present to her family and social media, and I don't fit the mold

That's a good thought. Run with it. 99.9% of single women are less interested in who they're marrying than they are in the concept of being married. They love the idea of being a wife more than they love the guy who, by relational definition, makes them a wife. This is why so many people end up divorced.

She looks at what other couples have, and they have completely different lives that don't apply to our situation

Some light reading on the comparison game/trap.

I don't get why she doesn't want to break up when I feel so unimportant to her

You're free support. Imagine you owned a shoe store. You get a crush on one of the regulars, so you start giving her shoes for free. She has so many of your shoes that you see her just tossing them on the street after wearing them only once or twice. Then you one day say, "I don't get why she won't just quit shopping here. She would obviously like the shoes at another store better, as my shoes are clearly unimportant to her."

When you give away your attention and affection for free, she doesn't value it - but why not keep getting it? After all, it's better to get mediocre attention for free than better attention and have to pay for it when you're not living in abundance. When she improves her life circumstance and has some abundance to live off of, then she'll leave your cheap crappy shoes and go somewhere else and start paying - and she might even try to keep you on the hook to get the occasional crummy pair again, when she's in a bind or in need of a quick fix.

Your solution? You can change the rules and start demanding payment before giving her more shoes. But if this is done all at once she'll say, "Screw that" and leave.

You can start thinning your shelves. Keep some of the better shoes to yourself and only give her the ones you know probably wouldn't sell anyway (i.e. only give her affection when it's easy and convenient and low-cost for you to do so). Withdraw your attention/affection gradually so you're not rewarding her for bad behavior and you have more time to invest on improving yourself.

A third option, and my preferred method is to custom tailor a whole new line of shoes that's far superior to what the other shoe stores are selling. Display them prominently in the windows so other women walking by take notice and begin window shopping. When she tries to take those shoes for free, you say, "No, that's a special line.

I don't just give those away. You can take some of these old scraps like you've been doing, but since I'm not making those anymore they won't be around much longer [i.e. ease into it]." She'll probably take a few more freebies and ignore the high-quality line you're now producing for a while. But in time she's going to want it. She's going to butter up to you to try to get it for free and you're going to stand firm. Eventually she's going to realize, "Crap, I can't get free shoes anywhere anymore. So, do I pay a fair price for shoes elsewhere or do I pay a fair price with the guy who's been good to me and now has better shoes than the other stores are offering?" Her answer doesn't matter because if she's out the door, you've already got back orders and your product is sold out for months.

To be clear, I'm not suggesting attraction can be negotiated. No matter how hard you try, you can't convince her that the crummy shoes you've been giving away are really high-quality ones she should be pining over. I'm also not suggesting you should barter for sex - even overtly. Trying to barter for sex will only cause it to feel like a duty and not genuine desire. In that scenario, she's manipulating you with sex to get what she wants. What I am suggesting is that there is a relational dynamic where women will do just about anything to get what they want - and if you become what they want or have what they want, then she'll do anything for you. But if you give away what she wants from you for free, you make it cheap and worthless and she won't want it because it (you) have no value to her.

Fiance is away for 3 years, need advice

5 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

she has had oneitis for me ... I was happy leaving her for the last girl, and she sucked me back in.

I'm pretty sure you've got oneitis for her. Otherwise no amount of "sucking" could get you back in if you were really ready to move on.

~~She is loyal~~ I'm the highest value man she can get right now.

FTFY

Are there some obvious questions I can ask myself / her to help me get more clarity on the situation?

Asking her questions is pointless. She doesn't understand the situation. All you'll get is her perception of what she wants, which will be a regurgitation of what her social conditioning has told her she should want, then she'll butter you up long enough to placate you once more and repeat the cycle.

There's only one question that matters here and it's one you need to ask yourself: What do you want to do? It's literally that easy.

She is currently too busy to give me much attention, and I understand

What is it you think you understand here? That's a serious question that needs to be answered.

I don't think she would cheat or leave me

... because she hasn't found a higher value man who she can "suck" in (yet).

Her libido doesn't exist.

If that's an important issue to you and you're not married yet, why are you still with her? I'm guessing the answer is because she "sucks" you back in - putting on the high-libido facade for just long enough to placate you. Don't be an idiot. Either that or her emotions are simply too powerful for you. "But guys, she was crying!" My kids cry all the time too. "I don't care, go to your room."

I've been reading and studying a lot.

Not enough. If you'd read NMMNG (literally the first book on sidebar) you'd have the answers to all of these things.

since I bought the ring last year

The ring doesn't mean you're married. It means that at one point you wanted to marry her. If that's not still the case, the ring means nothing - it is no longer a symbol of commitment and she must legally return it (it's a conditional gift where she has not fulfilled the condition).

I love her, but ...

No, you experience what social conditioning has told you is love. Stop that.

I don't know if I will find one as loyal

If the jester sat on the king's throne and kicked the king off to his bedroom everyday and the jester proceeded to rule the country - who is loyal to who here? She's certainly not loyal to you. She just hasn't cheated on you (yet). Maybe she never will cheat on you - but that's not loyalty. Loyalty is about more than just sex. Finding that one in a million girl who won't cheat on you (yet) isn't some major gold-mine. You're sacrificing a lot for a false ideology.

I'm dating two MGTOW.

5 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

/u/pinkipadcase - this is key. RP guys tend to ream girls for the "It just happened" or "It just so happens" rationalization. It has become cliché. It doesn't "just so happen" that you get along with both of them - you responded to their invitation, you engaged with them, you made an effort to get along with them, and now that effort has given you options. This isn't an accident that "just happened." Don't be one of those women. You seem to have a good head on you :) Try to erase "just happens/ed" from your vocabulary.

Filed today.

5 upvotes · 29 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

That's nice propaganda, but try telling that to her lawyer and you'll get a good laugh. The divorce is on EDIT: her the law's [that was an idiotic typo] terms and you owe her what the judge says you owe her. That doesn't mean you're powerless in the process, but you're going to lose big if you go in with the mentality you're proposing.

Your wife is a whore and you should divorce her

5 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Expect? No. Hope? Yes. I usually take the mantra: Hope for the best, expect the worst. The question at hand, though, is not one of desire, hope or expectation. It is one of appropriate response in the wake of any unmet vow. But we're also probably really off topic at this point anyway :p

Your wife is a whore and you should divorce her

5 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'd refer someone to the book of Hosea. God told Hosea to marry a prostitute. She cheated on him constantly. Her pimp starts sending her back to all her old clients even after the wedding, so Hosea has to buy her off the pimp. Then she keeps going back of her own accord and he has to rope her back in.

The book exists to show ancient Israel how God felt when his people were constantly leaving him for false gods and worldly pleasures. Other passages clarify the nature of how God deals with these people. In some circumstances he drops them like a rock. Other times he remains faithful to them and draws them back to himself.

with a "whore wife" its not about sex. thats the part you are not seeing.

What's it about then?

Your wife is a whore and you should divorce her

5 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

What do they say about assumptions?

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

5 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Too many questions for a full answer, which is why these things usually go through a 2-3 hour long initial consult (we charge $200 for this).

But here are the following assumptions I'm making:

- No health care cost [I know, an idiotic assumption, but roll with it]
- No child care costs
- Marriage duration of over 15 years
- Kids are under 14
- Your K1 income is subject to self-employment tax (combined income for you is $460k)
- Court imputes her to 40hrs/wk = $80k
- Income disparity negates the parenting time offset, so no child support deviation (this doesn't actually hurt you; it just shifts money from spousal support to child support, which actually advantages you)
- Your ownership interest in the company is entirely marital and from active appreciation
- She files head of household, you file single

With all of that in mind:

- Running a quick tax calculation, $10k/mo in spousal support and $621.62/mo in child support creates a 58/42 split. Depending on your county, this could go up or down to a 60/40 or 55/45, so this is somewhere in the middle.
 - If I run the same numbers with no child support, the $10k/mo spousal support would create a 60/40 split, which most judges would accept (this is closer to a state-wide norm; it's my county that uniquely pushes for a 55/45 or 50/50).
- All assets would be split 50/50, including your interest in the company.

The Courts in my state will take the following justifications for this type of conclusion:

- The statutes specifically state that there shall be a presumption of equal contribution to the marriage, even if that equal contribution is not financial in nature. As a result, contribution to the care of the home, raising kids, etc. is deemed to be equal for so long as you remain together, even if you don't believe it's equal.
- If you ever believe she is not contributing equally, it is your responsibility to file for divorce or legal separation in order to prevent getting taken advantage of. If you fail to do this, the presumption of equal contribution stands, as your continuation in the marriage is an implicit communication to your wife that she may rely on the equal contribution law.

This type of rationale would make more sense to me if my state permitted post-nuptial agreements. Then, if an income disparity started to creep up or was on the horizon, the parties could agree after marriage how to address it rather than forcing a husband to get divorced to protect his prospect of finances. Unfortunately, that's not the law yet. So, the legal separation, but continue living together route is the next best thing.

Thank you from a SF Bay Area Christian

5 upvotes · 12 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

"that was descriptive of the apostolic times, but not prescriptive for church today"

I never understood that argument. Paul references Adam and Eve for his reasoning for why he gives the prescription he does. In doing so, he's saying two things: (1) This is how God designed it, and (2) Even as culture has changed over the last 4,000 years (from Adam to Paul), this truth has remained consistent and should still be applied today. Somehow we have the gall to say, "Yeah, but we're 2,000 years later now ... Paul agreed to a 4,000 year structure, but if it was 6,000+ he would have changed his mind."

the cognitive dissonance is hard to reconcile.

It shouldn't be hard at all. He is personally a Christian. His church is an institution. As a result, in his personal life he follows what the Bible says. When he steps into an institutionalized role, cultural concerns take over because institutions must function within culture.

Stop treating the church like an institution and treat it like a fellowship of individuals with a common purpose and you'll see more consistency. But this means giving up control over success. Institutions function very well in western society. After all, it's western society's model for success. Interestingly, if you look at the Christian Church in other countries that don't follow a capitalistic model of government, you'll find that churches are more fellowship-driven and not as institutionalized - especially where the government persecutes the church, because there's no incentive for the church to appease culture if it is guaranteed to fail.

many women that are in their 30s that are having a difficult time finding a good spouse for themselves

That's because alpha is what gets you in the door, but the church preaches beta.

Therefore, given the dating marketplace, there is a lot more demand than there is supply. I don't see it getting any better in the near future.

The good news for men is that we don't need to find a pre-made mature, godly woman. We really just need to find a Christian woman and lead her into godliness. We become responsible for her growth (1 Cor. 11:3). In reverse, a woman doesn't have the God-given role/authority to find any man and lead him into Christ-likeness. This option exists, but it's working against the grain of God's intended design. So, a truly godly Christian woman is in a tough spot because finding someone who is more spiritually mature than her who can lead her will be very difficult. This is true anywhere, not just the SF Bay area.

the women not feminine enough or the men are too weak to clearly communicate attraction because of the social stigma around sexual desire

Bingo.

reprimanded Jack for his "un-Christian-like" behavior

And where is her reprimand for reciprocating?

Should he have kissed her? No, probably not on a first date. Is it sin? No, it's not. Is it unwise? Probably. The church wrongly assumes that all "unwise" decisions are sinful. It's not wise to eat a bag of doritos (unless you're literally starving to death). Other than personal gratification, there's no "pro" to put on the list of pros and cons. But are we to go around shaming every Christian who eats a bag of doritos?

Likewise, kissing is not sin. If they weren't lusting in the kiss, there's nothing wrong with it - and even then the lust is only inappropriate if they never marry. It's unwise because it might lead to lusting or other things if there's no self-control. But being unwise isn't being in sin.

From the discussion that I've read so far on this subreddit, I've been able to gain a frame work and vocabulary to properly process and organize my thoughts around the experiences.

Glad we can help :)

CMV: Can anyone break my fall? I feel like on my current trajectory I'm gonna end up redpill.

5 upvotes · 12 August 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

I feel like I've been lied to on a massive level, about how interests and personality are more important than looks. And I believed it, until I started going on dates about four years ago.

Here's the deal: you're dealing with two different scales and trying to treat them as one. There is a physical/sexual attraction scale, then there is an entirely separate romance/comfort scale. When people say "interests and personality are more important than looks" they mean that they're more important when trying to foster romance and comfort, which are staples in developing long term relationships.

MARKETING AGENDA

One thing that TRP has successfully figured out (among its many failures) is that the media, hollywood, and politics have an agenda on this point - and that agenda is to convince people that romance and comfort are the most important thing ... bonus points if they can get you to believe that romance and comfort will foster physical attraction too (it does not). Why do they promote this idea? Because it makes them money and gives them power. It's how Disney made it big - the overly-romantic themes it has to all of its movies is idealized everywhere. Of course, it's for kids, so they don't highlight the implications that this romanticization has a person's sex life. The wedding itself is when "happily ever after" starts, not the wedding night. The goal isn't to have a healthy, happy long-term marriage - it's just to get married in the first place and to retain those romantic feelings.

But, for most men, sex is what keeps those feelings alive. This isn't RP make-believe - it's biologically and psychologically proven fact that having sex with someone releases chemicals in your brain that cause you to feel close and connected to your partner. There's actually a separate natural drug in our bodies (can't remember the name off-hand) that gives a similar connectivity-high when experiencing romance and comfort in a relationship. Although both genders experience each of these, for most men the first is their primary form of feeling connected; for most women, the second is how they primarily feel connected.

So, for men romance is often a secondary means of fostering connection with another person - we enjoy it, but it's not as vital to our bio-chemical makeup as the natural drugs released in our body after sex. For women, sex has an important connectivity component, but their bio-chemical makeup prefers connectivity through romance and comfort. As RP praxeology would note, the feminist agenda doesn't like these biological distinctions between men and women, preferring to make us all equal in all ways, and therefore tries to over-sexualize women (the "empowered" or "dominant" woman in the bedroom) while simultaneously desexualizing men to become sappy romantics who think that personality is everything.

TV IS NOT REALITY

The problem is that people who focus on interests, personality, etc. usually can't get the physical relationships they want. Even if you can find a wife who has extremely fuzzy romantic feelings for you and her heart jumps every time you walk in the room - she may never actually want to have sex with you. The TV trope of some guy doing a really sappy romantic thing, then his girl jumping her body all over him is simply a fantasy. I'm a divorce attorney, so I see the ins-and-outs of relationships all the time.

The only circumstance where this ever works is when the physically attractive traits are present, but the romance/comfort traits are lacking - at which point the sappy gesture frees the woman to stop thinking of how uncomfortable she is in the relationship to start focusing on her already-existent physical desire. And with most actors/actresses - of course that physical desire is going to be there!

But what happens when that physical attraction isn't already there and you make a grand, romantic gesture? This is the case in at least 75% of marriages (I'm being conservative; it's probably closer to 90%). If the wife's romance meter has been running low, she's going to perk up and be a lot happier for the next few days ... but her mind won't jump immediately to: "I want to have sex with him." That's the lie culture tells you through TV, movies, marriage counseling, etc. Why? As I first said: they don't realize that physical desire and romance/comfort are two entirely separate, independent scales. Oh, and for the record, if you're really good at keeping her romance meter high - that grand gesture will get a smile and that's about it.

FINDING BALANCE

Interests, personality, etc. are good at building relationships. Looks and alpha traits are good at cultivating physical desire. To get a relationship started, you're probably going to need some more of those alpha traits. To keep the relationship going, you need some more of those beta traits.

The real problem is that people instinctively understand this, so once guys have the relationship locked down in marriage, they shift to predominantly beta traits to keep the relationship going ... which works for longevity, but ends up giving them a dead bedroom.

RP people saw this and over-glorified the sexual aspect of the relationship because they'd been missing it for so long that it's all they ever thought about. Result? Everything is about alpha, alpha, alpha. They stopped caring about longevity because they weren't happy in their longevity. Sexlessness made them wish they weren't stuck in longevity. As a result, rather than fixing the sex issue and maintaining the longevity, they started to see longevity as a risk not worth taking. This further polarizes their views on stifling beta traits and going pure alpha (until you get to MRP, of course).

I think RP has been around since the early 2000s, so maybe 15 years. Mark my words: in another 15 years, when the generation that started it all realizes they've just wasted their lives without any longevity in their relationships, they will be regretting it and TRP will die in favor of places like MRP (r/marriedredpill), which promotes an incorporation of more beta traits. They still over-glorify the sexual aspect of marriage, but they do set boundaries on how hard to push to get it, if a person intends to keep their marriage intact. Then there's places like r/RPChristians, which doesn't over-glorify either aspect. It simply accepts the truths about how the world functions (which are mostly found in the Bible because God created the things RP is discovering) and utilizes those truths for our own personal betterment - not as a manipulation tactic to find fulfillment in an aspect of our lives we've been idolizing (Christianity condemns idolizing anything other than God - including things like sex and romance, which are healthy, yet peripheral desires to our overall purpose in life).

If all you want is a companion in life and sex isn't important to you, then the advice you're getting from the world is great advice. That said, you still probably need some nominal traits that cultivate a baseline physical desire to get in the door in the first place - whether it's looks, leadership skills, etc. doesn't really matter ... unless you're searching online, in which case people judge you by your picture because it's the fastest assessment tool they have and with 1,000s of profiles to sort through, they don't have time to read everything on your page. They only read the profiles of people whose pic makes them interested in knowing more.

If all you want is sex and you don't care about marriage or hanging on to any one girl, then RP will get your goals accomplished (albeit in a crude, immoral way - whereas r/RPChristians allows for those moralizing conversations). Of course, they probably need to have some semblance of beta traits if they want a girl to be interested long enough to actually get back to his place. A guy who's a total jerk all the time is just going to come off as a jerk. At that point, he's not playing game, he's playing numbers. If all-beta guys had the gall to play the numbers game too, they'd probably be just as successful as the all-alpha guys.

The healthier option is to find a balance :)

How to get my wife into RPW?

5 upvotes · 11 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Where did you get that she's happy?

I guess I made that assumption when you said:

- "happier!" Implying she is already happy, you just want to increase it.
- "to the claim I'm 'trying to fix her' - I'm not" Implying that she doesn't need fixing.
- "make her happier and more satisfied" Implying she's already happy and satisfied, but your eager for her to have more abundance in these things (I would be too!)

As to the "fixing her" thing - your original post did explain a lot of problems that you perceive she has (RP says they're really your problems - she is a reflection of you; as the man, you're responsible for the way she acts around you), making it seem like you were asking about the book to utilize it as a tool to "fix" these problems in her. If it's really just about her happiness and satisfaction and has nothing to do with helping her to conform to your expectations, then that whole paragraph should be removed ;)

Would you be happy if you were controlling and nagging? Isn't it the point of RPW that these behaviors lead to unhappiness?

Those behaviors mitigate happiness, but don't destroy it. A woman can be perfectly happy as a bossy nag. Some women actually find a lot of satisfaction in this. But when they do that, they're trading one type of happiness for another. She's giving up her interest in sexual happiness, relational fulfillment, etc. in exchange for happiness through power. This is something RPW would probably do well to discuss more often. Might as well tag a mod on this: /u/LuckyLittleStar.

That happiness through power has limits, just as all forms of happiness do. Different types of happiness have different types of limits. I can find happiness by watching a really good movie. But there's a really, really low limit on how much happiness I can derive from that. My wife can find happiness from getting me to buy her something, but there's a low limit on that one event. She can derive greater happiness from controlling and nagging me into becoming the kind of guy who buys her stuff all the time - but that's going to have a negative impact on my ability to feed into her other drives for happiness through relational intimacy, sexual attraction, etc.

and it may even cause many men to end up cheating on their wives, thereby stealing away their happiness in a peripheral area (rather than it simply going unfulfilled).

In my experience, most women (probably men too) tend to ignore aspects of their lives where: (1) they haven't experienced happiness in a while, if ever; (2) achieving happiness requires too much effort; or (3) there is no compelling need and it's not a natural priority. A few examples:

- (1) My wife has never really experienced happiness playing video games. So, she won't play video games, even with our children who love them and want to engage with her on that level.
- (2) For a long time, achieving happiness through sex took a lot of effort during periods when she wasn't attracted to me, so she just ignored her sexuality.
- (3) My wife has no compelling need to go rock climbing. She's done it before and has had lots of fun, and it's worth the effort to her. But it's not a compelling need, so other things take higher priority.

There are probably more things that could be added to this list, but those 3 are a good start.

If someone you love is sick, you try and find them a cure.

This is a valid point. But in this case you're both sick. The MRP cure is to fix the man, which (if done right) will most likely cure her too - it will lead her to become all the things talked about in The Surrendered Wife without her actually reading the book. The book is just a shortcut you want her to take. I get it - I wish I could have a shortcut too. But if she reads something like that and stops testing me (when tests are rare enough as is), how am I going to earn her respect? She's going to give it because a book told her to, not because I have earned it in her eyes. So, her behavior will conform, but her desire will not.

Behavior modification does not fix marriages. Attraction modification does. Interestingly, the behaviors that MRP expects a man to modify are things that not only increase the wife's attraction to the man, but also things that will naturally increase a man's attraction to her. Increased testosterone and removing porn as an outlet = higher attraction to wanting sex with your wife. Having a mission outside the home and not making your wife your emotional center = you're not inoculated with constant doses of her, so you appreciate the time you have with her better. Passing tests and setting boundaries = she starts developing the qualities you like to see in a woman.

Here's perfect timing for you. A few weeks ago I read a post/comment that /u/RedPillWonder wrote on this sub to my wife (didn't mention anything RP, just said it was an article I found online that I thought she'd appreciate while thinking about how to raise our daughters) and it covered a lot of stuff about submissiveness, beauty, respect, making wise choices, etc. Basically, the same thing as you finding an innocuous way to have your wife read The Surrendered Wife.

Cue present: I sent my wife a flirty text message. She gets all self-conscious and while writing this comment to you my wife texts, "I keep thinking about that article you read me though and am second guessing myself." Instead of taking it as an action plan to improve herself, or my actual intent of using it as a framework for parenting our daughters, she took it as a measure against her - that she's not up to par. What I meant for one thing, she took another way and it didn't work out. I'm now wishing I had never read her that article and just simply led her into how I want her to parent our kids - and into developing those traits herself ... and I should do this directly, not getting a book or article/comment/post to do it for me.

Custody theories that could ruin you ... and the merits of shared parental rights

5 upvotes · 3 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Yeah, that's not what that means at all. Obviously weeknights are massively important, including the overnight (even though they're sleeping), which I included directly in my post.

My point was: why bother fighting for time that you know you're not going to be with them anyway? For example, I had a case where the kids were involved in 3 basketball teams in high school. With all expectation, they would not be quitting any of these teams and they'd be 18 by the time they were out. The practice schedule to make all teams work involved evenings being booked for MWF from after school until 8:30pm.

Dad enrolled the kids in these teams as an effort to keep the kids away from mom because she had MW parenting time per temporary orders at the time. The kids decided they liked the teams and would stick with them. I persuaded the GAL to recommend, in response, that mom get TR instead, since dad was the one who enrolled the kids in the activities in the first place, so the schedule should be on his time. Result? My client got to see the kids every MWF from after school until 8:30 at practices and games, and also got TR all evening and overnight. So, basically, she had the kids every day, even on her husband's days, even though she was only actually allocated an equal time schedule.

Similarly, I've had many cases where I've represented fathers and they got one weekday overnight as their only parenting time. So, we pop in the order that no activities shall be scheduled on Father's overnight. We also got an order that said Dad could pick extracurricular activities for the kids every spring and fall (Mom got summer and winter). As a result of the extracurricular activity schedule, Dad picks things that had practices on three of Mom's nights. Result? Dad sees the kid 4 weeknights and gets the kids every other weekend, and this applies for most of the school year, even though he was only ordered 1 weeknight. Of course, summer parenting time is different, so Mom didn't have the ability to manipulate the schedule this way, and (for the most part) schools don't have winter extracurriculars (fall and spring activities overlap through winter), so she had a double-loss without realizing it. This was a better result for him than fighting endlessly for 50/50 time, where he actually would have ended up with less time with the kids despite the technical first-look impression of the plan as it stands ... and he saved tens of thousands of dollars in the process by settling on these grounds. He was elated.

Divorce Incorporated

5 upvotes · 2 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Things are definitely different in my state/city than what /u/wescowell described, but I can echo about 90% of what he said.

Or is it that the laws are designed to be more fair, but the judges executing the law are still biased?

Here's the thing: custody laws in almost every state involve an immense amount of judicial discretion. So, while the laws themselves might be more fair than before, "judicial discretion" overrides almost everything. I do a lot of appellate work too, and the general rule of thumb is that the person trying to overrule the trial court always loses in the absence of clear, unmistakable abuse of discretion.

For example, I once had a magistrate say (on the record) to my client: "Did you just roll your eyes at me? Do you really think I'm going to do anything to help you when you give me that kind of attitude?" Sure enough, that case was reversed on appeal. But most judges/magistrates are smart enough to know how to word their opinions to pass an appeal, even though the real foundation of an opinion might be their own personal biases.

Those biases can sometimes work in a father's favor if the mother is putting her in a tough spot, but it's a bias nonetheless. In fact, I just got a decision in yesterday where the judge said (exact quote): "Mother is the better parent. Her parenting style is far superior to Father's. For all practical purposes, [name] is, essentially, an absent Father and has been relatively uninvolved in the child's life since birth ... Father has shown no signs of being able to handle the stresses of parenting and has shown no history of success in parenting because he hasn't even tried until now ... Father's attitude toward the child is, essentially, to let him do whatever he wants in the hopes that just keeping him happy will somehow fix his behavioral problems. Father is fooling himself." Despite all of this, the court still gave custody to the dad. Why? Because Mom was moving out of state and the judge has a predisposition toward the view that "children should never be forced to relocate out of state." So, despite all of the evidence that the judge acknowledged in his decision, he exercised his discretion to go against the weight of that evidence in order to keep the child local. Here's the real kicker, though - the fact that he said all of that essentially defeats our ability to appeal because we no longer have the ability to argue: "The judge failed to consider ___ and ___ and ___." He addressed it point blank, gave us every benefit of the doubt, and still went the other way - and that looks really good to an appellate court when they're reviewing the decision, making it a very difficult case to try to appeal.

That is the power of judicial discretion. Now imagine if you get an older judge (i.e. age 55+, as most of them are) who grew up with the old-school thinking and worships women. As noted in my previous comment, this is much rarer in large cities, like where I practice, or places like Chicago. But as soon as you go out of the larger cities (I also practice in 10 surrounding counties), it's a whole different ball game. So, I think /u/wescowell's experience is based on the fact that he's practicing in a large metropolitan area, as he even acknowledged.

a well-crafted prenup gives you the best of both worlds. I suppose I would invite u/red-curious to participate.

I will echo /u/wescowell in that every prenup I've ever seen drafted by another attorney has been garbage and has not helped the person trying to claim it. Most often, one party wasn't represented by an attorney in its negotiation, in which case my home court system will throw those out 100% of the time. If each party isn't represented when it's signed, you just bought some very expensive toilet paper.

The other big mistake I see going around invalidating prenups is the inclusion of unconscionable provisions without adequate disclosure.

- Disclosure: Most attorneys are smart enough to put a general disclosure page as to current assets and income valuation, but fail to add something that says, "The parties anticipate that Husband will also accrue ___ and will attain raises and may earn as much as ___ in the future, and intend this agreement to remain binding under all such circumstances." Without this type of thing in there, the court will often say that any substantial increases in the value of property (especially from active contribution, which most attorneys also fail to address - this is very different from passive contribution and must be spelled out in detail) was not anticipated to the degree actually accrued, and therefore the parties didn't know what rights they were signing away when they executed the document, therefore it's not binding as to those assets that had increased in value (except to the value that existed at the time of signing).
- Unconscionable: I laugh every time I see a prenup that says, "Under no circumstances shall husband ever pay spousal support to wife." This is sooooo common, and yet it's instant malpractice. No judge will enforce that. Instead, it's better to write something like, "The parties understand that husband may receive substantial increases to his income. In light of such anticipation, the parties agree that husband shall retain the first $500,000 annually, pre-tax, free from any support calculations, and that any computation, accounting, or income/expense calculation shall only apply to income in excess of such amount." At the time the pre-nup is signed, if husband is earning $150,000/yr he's never going to hit that mark, so you're essentially putting in a "no spousal support" clause (my state did away with the term "alimony"), but you're doing it in a way that prescribes a calculation and makes it clear that the wife knows what she's signing away, as she should rationally be able to anticipate whether or not her husband is likely ever to earn in excess of $500,000 and know that it won't happen.

Things a prenup won't account for are child support (cannot be permanently waived under any circumstances), custody/parental rights matters, and financial misconduct.

the manosphere has been railing against Marriage 2.0 for a while now. Have men stood up enough so that the laws, and therefore society, changing to a Marriage 3.0 framework now? Or is it more like 2.1?

The way I look at it is, to be blunt ... before the 1920s men had it as good as white plantation owners being taken to court by one of their slaves in the 1820s (okay, maybe not that extreme, but you get the imagery). Marriage 1.0 was DEFINITELY not fair to women. I don't care how hard-core you are into men's-rights activism ... no one can justify what those laws were in light of a shifting cultural framework. It made sense at the time because there was a cultural incentive toward things like sexual fidelity, leader-helper roles in the home, provision for spouses, and simply presenting one's marriage as a happy marriage.

When TV was invented, relationship drama became all the rage. It was funny because it took all the things that people actually experienced behind closed doors that they tried to hide and made it public - made a joke out of it. People started talking about those things and it became normalized - "marriages have problems" was the go-to understanding, whereas there was more of a drive before then to present one's marriage as happy and better than everyone else's. Now we have shows like Jerry Springer, where relational dysfunction is actually encouraged for profiteering.

When relational problems started being normalized and people accepted that not every marriage was as happy as it seemed on the surface, laws started changing to let people out of what they were not bold enough to admit publicly was a bad situation. But this went too far to the point of, in maintaining the previous parallel, reverse-discrimination. Racial minorities for a long time were getting major college scholarships, job preference treatment, etc. Despite media coverage, there were serious advantages to being a racial minority, if you had your act together even remotely. The same thing happened with divorce laws toward women - they went too far the other way.

As /u/wescowell noted, many of those laws have since been adjusted to find a safer balance, but by giving the massive degree of judicial discretion to trial courts that they do, the laws themselves are hollow. In smaller counties, most judges know that the parties can't afford to appeal, so they just ignore the law entirely. In larger counties, the judges are more fair because they've seen it all and just don't give a crap anymore. That said, they will still take the view: "I can do whatever I want. The statute only tells me how I have to word my decision to avoid getting reversed on appeal - it doesn't tell me what my decision has to be." As a result, I've seen two different judges take the exact same set of facts and make two entirely opposite rulings - yet both of them could rationalize their conclusions with the statute.

The thing is, the statutes don't prescribe what the decision should be under different factual patterns. They simply say, "When deciding custody, the court must consider these things ..." It doesn't say what weight they should give to each item, how that item should factor into a conclusion, and there's often a catch-all for "any other relevant factor not on the list" where the judge can just start making up stuff, and as long as he can point to a place in the record where someone mentioned it, he can use that as a key factor in doing whatever he wants and get away with it.

Does this happen all the time? No. But it's certainly not uncommon. I'd give it a Marriage 2.4 title.

Divorce Incorporated

5 upvotes · 2 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Sure. Here are some stats for you:

- 85% of all children with behavioral disorders come from fatherless homes (per CDC)
- 90% of all homeless/runaway children are from fatherless homes (Census Bureau)
- 71% of all high school dropouts are children from fatherless homes (National Principals Association)

- 75% of all adolescents in chemical abuse centers come from fatherless homes (Rainbows for all God's Children)
- 63% of youth suicides are from fatherless homes (Census Bureau)
- 80% of rapists diagnosed with displaced anger come from fatherless homes (Criminal Justice & Behavior, Vo. 14, p. 403-26)
- 85% of all youths in prisons grew up in fatherless homes (GA and TX Dept. of Corrections stats)

Children from fatherless homes are:

- 5x more likely to commit suicide
- 32x more likely to run away
- 20x more likely to have behavioral disorders
- 14x more likely to commit rape
- 9x more likely to drop out of high school
- 10x more likely to abuse chemical substances
- 20x more likely to end up in prison

... than children where they have an active, present father-figure in their lives.

Now, I get that "fatherless" means no father at all, as opposed to "mom gets custody, dad's still present as a non-custodial parent." So, when it comes to custody-based stats, here are a few from the Pew Research Center:

- Median household income - F: $40,000, M: $26,000
- Average Age - F: ~40, M: ~34
- Education - Interestingly, F/M are almost equally likely to have a college degree (17/18), women are more likely to have started, but not finished college (32/40), but men are more likely to have graduated high school (32/26) - remembering that these are stats only for single fathers v. single mothers
- At or Below Poverty - F: 24%, M: 43%

Courts seem to favour women because they don't want to deal with the complaining and fallout.

Nah, judges don't care about that crap. The Court favors women because most judges are older people who have been around since before equal-rights laws for fathers were passed, so they're used to an older system of doing things where custody was presumed to mothers. Also, the fact that dads have to prove fatherhood and mothers don't leaves a distinct impression in many judges. Perhaps the biggest factor, though, is that most judges are beta SJWs, so they're used to pandering to women and they think women will respect them more for it - and this plays true for female judges as well.

My county actually has 5 domestic judges, 4 of whom are women. Interestingly, if you go into smaller counties, the judges are almost exclusively men. Those smaller counties are FAR FAR FAR more likely to hand custody over to a mom than my big-county female judges. Why? Because women judges don't have anything to prove - they are already the epitome of female power. They can do whatever the heck they want and the feminists will support them for it because they're powerful women. The men, however, are so used to sucking up to women that they can't get it out of their systems.

More fun stats: In a neighboring county, a statistical analysis was done on a male judge's most recent 60 custody cases:

- Shared parenting was requested by one or both parties in 45 of the cases (75%), but was only granted twice.
- Custody was granted to the woman in 51/60 cases (85%).
- Of the 15% of cases where dad got custody, 8/9 were because the mother had severe substance abuse or violence problems, the remaining 1 was due to extreme mental health issues and medical disability.
- Although it wasn't part of the study, that same judge also rejected an AGREEMENT BY ALL PARTIES that Father get custody. The Father, Mother, and the children's Guardian ad Litem all testified under oath on a fully-signed agreement at a final hearing that Mother was incapable of parenting the children and Father had to be the custodial parent, and that Father was stable and capable ... and the judge ripped up the agreement and gave custody to the mother anyway.

What percent of men are Alpha?

5 upvotes · 27 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

I love statistics, so it's intriguing. But I'd be very curious how they're defining alpha and beta and what sample populations they're using. I get the impression that this survey was probably done in some place like LA or NYC, whereas if you took the same survey in TX, OH, or GA you'd get insanely different results. I can say quite definitively that most alpha men in my home area (using an RP definition, not a generic one) are politically and philosophically conservative, and this perception seems to hold up well with implications I see from TRP/MRP all over the place. So, I'm very shocked that these results would come back so skewed the other way, when this is not typical of RP-alpha thinking.

Use red pill to get out of a dead bedroom

5 upvotes · 25 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I know too many marriages where this is the story, including mine for the longest time. As I've told other people before, my wife's extremely conservative parents, who kept her in a legalistic Christian bubble, would only ever tell her two things about sex: "It's bad until you're married, and it hurts a lot all the time" (her mom must have had physical problems). Because she wasn't married for 23 years, her brain filtered out the "until you're married" part and just focused on "it's bad." For 23 years all she knew was, "Sex is bad and it hurts." That took a lot to overcome.

My DB started turning around when I gave up on trying to have a healthy sex life. I stopped initiating and just started doing whatever I wanted, including running/lifting. I lost about 40lbs, stopped the choreplay, and just did what I thought needed to be done, and if I thought things were in good shape, even if she didn't, I relaxed anyway.

Becoming my own man that wasn't dependent on her to tell me what to do gave her a base attraction to me that she hadn't had since we were dating. She still struggles with the "dirtiness" of sex every now and then. She intellectually knows it's permissible, but there's a remnant of what her parents instilled that makes it hard for her to go beyond certain boundaries, though we're slowly pushing them.

The biggest factor in overcoming that mental block for my wife was teaching her the process of disciple-making. When she finally realized that physical reproduction is meant to parallel spiritual reproduction, and she sees in the Bible how desperately God wants us to be spiritually reproducing with him, and with all different techniques ...

somehow something started to click where she realized, [to be crass] "If God wants us to be 'slutty' with spiritual reproduction, maybe it's okay to be a little slutty with physical reproduction too."

What was it for your wife that overcame the "mental block"? I've heard very few success stories in the Christian realm. I started r/RPChristians and I'm sure the people there, as well as others I know IRL would love to hear new ideas on what has worked for others.

4 Rules for a good conversation

5 upvotes · 24 July 2017 · /r/TheRedPill

Early on, when I was first learning networking, I found the conversation stack immensely helpful. It goes something like this ...

Imagine a nameplate

"Hi, I'm ruizbujc. What's your name?"

That name plate is on a house

"What part of town do you live in?"

Through the window you see some papers and bills on a desk.

"What do you do for a living? How do you like doing that?"

Some kids run out the front door

"Do you have close family nearby or are you here just for work? What's your family like?"

One of the kids is holding a tennis racquet

"So, what do you do for fun? I like doing this. You ever try that?"

The kid throws the racquet at a car in the driveway

"Do you like to travel? What places have you been?"

Someone in the car turns the lights on.

"Hey, you mentioned _____. What are your thoughts on that?" [light = ideas, concepts, beliefs, etc.]

Although I don't need to use the stack anymore, the imagery gives incredibly easy cues to new conversationalists about how to move from one subject to the next in appropriately ascending order. That ascending order, of course, is overridden by context. If she tells you her name and it reminds you of a place you've been, be like, "Oh, Savannah, like the city in Georgia. Great place, you ever go there?"

The basic stack (there are expanded versions) helped me dominate networking events in my career. I owe most of my early success in building an initial law practice to the stack.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

5 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I fully agree with everything you said, except I do believe there is merit to the medical model - especially when divorce and custody decisions are based predominantly on this model.

From what I've read, "ditch and replace" is a commonplace suggestion. Being that this sub is predominantly for "married red pill" people, and the fact that they're constantly coached: "you have to keep 'ditch and replace' as a viable option," there has to be an understanding of the legal implications of what that might mean.

To that end, if a guy is stuck in a 20-year marriage with someone who has a legitimate "medical model" personality disorder, he has two options: (1) ditch and replace, risking the fury of the courts; or (2) understand their spouse's situation so they can make informed rather than ignorant decisions about things like frame, game, etc. that will improve their circumstances without the risks associated with divorce. To be clear, mental health issues in divorce don't only impact custody determinations (usually in favor of the non-disabled spouse); they have a reverse effect on finances: if a spouse is deemed to be mentally ill, the mentally healthy spouse will usually have increased obligations for the support of that spouse and the children. Because that determination is made by a medical model (usually by forensic psychologists who spend half or less of their practice actually treating), it seems incredibly valuable to me to look at things from a medical model standpoint, particularly insofar as the actual diagnosis itself matters.

That said, when it comes to developing stable relationships, you're spot on: context is key. But I don't want people to use context as the same type of escape you mistakenly think I'm endorsing: "Oh, that explains why she's that way. I guess I can empathize with her now." His frustrations may alleviate as they gradually turn to pity or guilt (if he is the contributing context), but when I have had clients make this realization throughout the course of their own therapy process, their usual response is not to adjust their frame to account for the additional information; it is to make concessions, usually to mitigate their own contribution (i.e. paying the guilt debt) or to throw a bone (i.e. advance moral self-righteousness by compensating pity where pity is due).

Your duck example is a good one to explain context as to an isolated incident, but you have to remember that most of the people I see aren't being diagnosed because of a one-off event. They have built a patterned lifestyle of this. Oftentimes they have caused an SO to feel trapped because they know how to hide their mental health baggage while in the marketplace, then as the marriage settles in and long-term security is developed (usually through divorce law protections increasing with the duration of the marriage) they relax and the craziness becomes more evident, impacting numerous areas of the marriage (to be fair, men do this too, but in very different ways). When people build a lifetime of pattern, understanding the context that helped develop that can be useful, but (and I acknowledge that this is my out-of-profession opinion) it is more valuable to know how to function within those patterns without losing frame to develop a new pattern of productive interactions rather than failed ones. Yes, the context can assist in this, but understanding the patterns themselves has been more vital in my personal interactions with trying to negotiate with these people.

Lastly, as to your 4-step pattern of "diagnose - contextualize - blame - destroy," I may have given this sub too much credit if you think RP guys are likely to take that route. I assume it as a given that most people here are moving away from that flawed way of thinking, not still trapped in it.

Either way, good post and thanks for presenting the other side of the issue!

Red Pill Advice for a 17 year-old?

5 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Well, under ideal circumstances her first relationship should be her last one. My wife was only my second girlfriend, and I was her first boyfriend. As /u/RedPillWonder mentioned, vetting is pretty much the single most important thing you can do.

In our situation, we avoided dating altogether until we had a secure understanding of what we were looking for in another person. Some people assume you have to date around to figure this out, but I simply don't see that as a necessity. It's a valid option, but wise people can figure out who they are and what they want without living through mistake after mistake to get there.

Sorry to hear about your psychotic relationship. I think that's another testament to vetting properly :p

Red Pill Advice for a 17 year-old?

5 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

This is absolutely wonderful advice. /u/blue lumi would do well to seriously consider everything you've said. Every new item you mentioned made me think, "Man, I'm glad I have an awesome wife who was like that when she was 17!"

Assuming from your flair, it might be great to post something like this as a general thread on a new sub I've started: r/RPChristians - not only for any female subscribers, but for men to see that there actually are godly women out there who are wise and internally radiant (whereas most of the RP world is overall degrading).

Dealing with the stressed wife.

5 upvotes · 7 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Yes, as /u/Chinchilla_the_Hun noted, I mentioned this as a 3-day exercise, not a permanent structure for the marriage. When a captain hires a new first officer, he needs to show the first officer how he wants things done. Only after that does he withdraw and let the first officer work unsupervised - because the trust is developed. If the first officer just plows in and starts doing things his own way, it can cause problems in other areas of the ship that depend on the systems the first officer would be responsible for.

The biological step-mother.

5 upvotes · 7 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

That's the illusion. You're really not doing a ton of extra stuff ... maybe a few extra things in the beginning because you don't yet know how to own your own life (i.e. you forget what needs to be done and everything you forget is on you).

All you're really doing is shifting responsibility for which of you comes up with the list of things that need to be done each day. Even when you delegate back to her the exact things she was doing everyday already she will end up doing them without stress even though her daily activities have not changed.

Why? Because thinking about what needed to be done is what gave her stress. It trapped her in the comparison game against an impossible standard. Women love checking boxes off lists (it gives them a sense of accomplishment) ... they just can't handle making the list.

The biological step-mother.

5 upvotes · 7 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Being a divorce/custody attorney really doesn't give me any super-power of discerning RP/BP guys from each other. To be perfectly honest, until a couple months ago because of how I interact in my professional life I assumed I was an alpha guy. After reading NMMNG I realized just a few weeks ago that in my marriage I was waaaaay more BP than I thought.

Interestingly, my wife asked me what I was reading the other day (WISNIFG) and I answered, "Just a book on how to be more assertive and a family leader." Her response was, "You of all people don't need to be more assertive, and you're a great leader." So, I opened up the first chapter of NMMNG for her, read the list of 11 traits of the "Nice Guy Syndrome" and she acknowledged, "I guess you do do a lot of that."

So, as of a few months ago I was a BP guy trying to become RP for a wife who already thought I was alpha. Interestingly, we had a DB marriage for the last 6 or 7 years (an entire year and a half with no sex at all, mostly because I was too bitter to initiate). This proves to me that a wife is attracted to actual alpha, not her perception of alpha. So, even though I had my wife convinced I was RP, she subconsciously was not attracted because I was actually BP in disguise. Now that I'm actually growing in my RP-ness, she's getting tingles again.

Sorry, that's a long answer to your question: I didn't even know I myself was BP, so no, I didn't see RP/BP distinctions in my clients until I discovered TRP/MRP a couple weeks ago (before that I took a Bible-based approach, distinguishing authoritative v. passive men, which is very similar, but not quite the same).

What do you do if you hold a door for a woman and she don't say "thank you"?

5 upvotes · 3 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

In her eyes, it's like if I wipe my butt after taking a dump. I show off the toilet paper to my wife and rather than saying, "Thank you for making sure your butt was clean," she's disgusted with me that I'd wave that around. If you try to say anything, you're waving your internal/emotional pile of crap for that girl to see. If it helps, I'm 99.999% sure my wife would not want to have sex with me after that; I'm guessing the girl at the door wouldn't want to have sex with you after that either.

To be clearer: people don't say "thank you" for what they believe should be the standard. They thank you for going above and beyond. Our feminist culture has made it the standard that men must serve women in certain culturally mandated ways, including holding the door open. If you want her appreciation, you have to hand her a mint with your subservience. While you're at it, you can go ahead and bow down a few times and kiss her feet too. I'm pretty sure she'd thank you somewhere in there.

Seriously, though: if you're going to hold the door open for people, do it because that's the kind of guy you want to be, not because you crave appreciation. OI OI OI OI. If you haven't yet, read NMMNG - he talks about this mentality all the time, and you're on the wrong end of a few of his lessons. For example:

- You've made a covert contract: "I do this for you, you're supposed to thank me."
- You "give to get"
- You're looking to women for validation of your self-image as a "nice guy" who holds the door for them (notice how quickly you dismiss any appreciation for men saying 'thank you,' as if it's unimportant compared to the 'thank you' of women)
- You're caretaking (just on a mass level rather than an individual one)

Those are concepts off the top of my head that are addressed in NMMNG that you've violated. Go read that book and focus on how to become OI/DNGAF. Do things because you want to do it, not because you need something in return.

5 Love Langues v./and (?) NMMNG

5 upvotes · 29 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Makes sense. I lived the 5LL life for a while too and never got anywhere with it.

I concluded that 5LL cultivates contentment, but not attraction or desire.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (08/25/25)

4 upvotes · 27 August 2025 · /r/RPChristians

Info: I'm now 40 years old, been married for 17 of those years. 4 kids ages 8-13.

Read: All the sidebar stuff recommended by MRP and obviously what I wrote.

Lifts: Had some injuries, but picked it back up again this summer. 5 rep sets (lbs): 275 squat / 300 deadlift / 165 overhead / 205 bent over row / 255 bench press

Mission: Make disciples of all nations / Vision: 60 disciple making ministries in 60 countries by age 60

Physical: I pigged out with my kids this summer. Super fun, great bonding. Not good for my gut. Adding lifting back in a few months ago really helped, but it's going to take some heavy cutting to get back to where I want to be.

Mental/Emotional: Job's been insanely lucrative, but also means insanely stressful. Way more work this past year than I'm used to. I'd still rather less pay to get some of my time/energy back. Aging into my 40s is noticeable. I also find myself getting angrier and more passive-aggressive than I remember being in the past. Need to get that under control.

Spiritual: Doing great here. I'm in the Word. Prayer isn't consistent, but more than I used to. My mind is focused on enough productive things that temptation toward active sins is pretty much non-existent, although passive sins are probably fair-game for self-assessing. I'm connecting well with my current congregation (been here for 2 years) and feeling a lot of respect from the leadership, unlike my last congregation, so that's a huge plus. Overall, things are going well.

Professional: Crushing it - just need more of a break, which I think I have about 2 weeks "chill" for now before my next surge.

Marriage: I've been a bit of a passive-aggressive pussy about stupid stuff. It gets to my wife. I've let myself fall into a "victim mentality" at times of ignoring her when she says/does things I don't like, and then when she tries to "fix it," I'm intentionally avoidant because I'd rather be upset at her than let her "make it up to me." I'm just being an idiot in these moments, but it gets to her and is overall just dumb on my part. Need to fix that. Otherwise, things are going pretty well. Had some really good times lately.

Praise God for this community

4 upvotes · 10 September 2022 · /r/RPChristians

I'll second Deep's book. While TRM definitely has a lot of interesting and useful things to ponder in it, there's a lot of secular/unbiblical information too, so you have to approach it with great caution, as you would any non-Christian book.

That said, when you read those books, the goal isn't to "reconcile" them through a "biblical lens," nor do you want to put a "red pill lens" over the Bible. It's just the Bible. We've emphasized that on this sub a number of times. The fact that God's way happens to align with what the secular world observes when they investigate God's created reality is just common-sense logic: people are happier and have better marriages/relationships when they live according to biblical (or in secular terminology: "traditional") principles that stand in opposition to modern progressive norms on marriage, gender, sexuality, etc.

Reading Rollo Tomassi is like reading a college textbook book. It's well-researched and contains lots of very accurate and correct information, while still also containing lots of conclusions and theories that are contrary to what the Bible teaches. Yeah, you may find value in reading that textbook ... but you're going to find much greater value out of reading the Bible.

If there's any "lens" issue you want to address, it's not that you want to wear a certain lens when you approach TRM or the Bible ... it's that you want to become conscious of the lenses you're already wearing and remove them so you can read the Bible with a clear mind without preconceived notions that have been ingrained in your mind by our culture since you were an infant.

No, it's not okay.

4 upvotes · 26 July 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed!

Plan, Act, and Wait on the Lord (PAW)

4 upvotes · 22 June 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I just responded to someone on the discord who private messaged me about the exact topic of "waiting on the Lord." Didn't realize you had a post on it. Here was my reply:

Yeah, it's certainly in the Bible. But it's not emphasized the way it gets emphasized today.

Most of that emphasis stems from a recently popularized book: The Ruthless Elimination of Hurry, by John Mark Comer. I've known lots of people to read it and it's created something of a fad among pastors.

Comer gets his popularity from being discipled by a guy named Dallas Willard, who I'll acknowledge as one of the greats of our time. His book The Divine Conspiracy was restoratively revolutionary, and I've heard great things about his other works. Comer has some good stuff too, but this was one area where he seems to have gone awry - at least in how people have interpreted him (I'll give room for the fact that he didn't mean things the way people are taking it).

Comer's Ruthless Elimination of Hurry essentially tells pastors to stop filling their calendars and to accept that God will work in his own timing, and by being busy we may miss what God's trying to tell us because we do things by our own power instead. I've heard of (and personally attended at least 4 different congregation services) countless congregations whose pastors have adopted this theology philosophy. It's an excuse for pastors to start telling people "no" (and teaching their congregants to do the same), which isn't a bad thing, but it's applied in a way that still emphasizes sluggish pursuits over missional priority. That is, instead of saying, "Sorry Bob, but I can't talk about predestination with you over lunch because I'm discipling Davy," they say, "Sorry Bob, but I can't meet with you because I don't want to add anything else to my schedule right now" ... except that these pastors are still lazy and refuse to admit "because I don't want to," so they still come up with other lame excuses rather than owning the fact that they're taking control over their schedule, then tell themselves, "Thanks John Mark Comer!"

The concept of "waiting on the Lord," to my knowledge, is only mentioned rarely in Scripture in as many words, but does have significant roots through a number of stories. (a) Abraham had to wait on God to give him Isaac way into old age and even decades after God first prophesied Isaac's birth; (b) Israel had to wait on God in the desert, wandering around for 40 years for what should have been a couple weeks of a journey; (c) Jesus waited on the Lord before beginning his public ministry, telling people his time hadn't come yet ... and so on.

These examples throughout Scripture don't paint a portrait of people who are without a mission just twiddling their thumbs. They're usually highly active people who are going, going, going without break - and even in God's refusal to act in culmination on what they were awaiting, they continue in diligent faithfulness.

"Waiting on the Lord" isn't a call to "do nothing until God acts." It's like asking your boss for a promotion and he says, "I'm not ready yet." Do you twiddle your thumbs and stop all work until he's ready to promote you? Or if you have a conflict with your co-worker and your boss says, "I'll deal with it," but you don't see him dealing with it in your timing. Do you just screw around on your phone until the situation is handled? No. You keep working. You keep fulfilling your job duties diligently while you're waiting.

The key question I'd ask anyone who is waiting on the Lord: What are you waiting for? If it's something God already gave them or told them through Scripture, then the waiting was over 2,000 years ago - the answer is already given. I hear time and time again, "I'm waiting on the Lord to tell me what his will is for my life." That's about the dumbest line I hear with any frequency. God already said in Scripture what he wants you doing with your life: "Love God, Love Others, Make Disciples." Done. So, don't wait on things that have already been answered, and always be dutiful while waiting.

Tag: /u/TheChristianAlpha - even though you weren't the one I wrote this to, given our conversation today it might be helpful.

Announcement: Red Pill Christians will now exclusively be a male only space

4 upvotes · 25 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Yes. At least, for now we have no plans on changing this.

Why Lifting is Not a Suggestion

4 upvotes · 19 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

It's more important to be attractive than it is to be lifting.

Are you suggesting guys aren't allowed to set their own goals? In general, I agree with you. But there is merit to both lifting and staying lean - preferably in balance.

The reality is that power lifters tend to have too much fat on them and generic "just be attractive" guys aren't as attractive without the muscle as they think they are.

Why God Doesn't Love You.

4 upvotes · 17 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Glad to hear it, brother. You were one of four people I had in mind while writing this.

Getting your wife back after a separation

4 upvotes · 12 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

A better idea is to seek the Lord, and get His thoughts and ways on how to proceed.

This is where I think his confusion is. I think he mistakenly believes that because God hates divorce, prioritizing the reconciliation of his marriage IS prioritizing God's will in his life. Maybe I'm giving him too much credit here, because that argument (however wrong it is at its core) at least has the appearance of cogency, and therefore I can empathize with OP being misguided in this direction. But if he can recognize, as /u/Deep_Strength said, that his marriage being fixed is a byproduct of living for Christ and not the pathway, then he'd be in a much better position.

do you have that same attitude and actions toward the Lord and His Kingdom?

And there's the rub. Most people will never have that "breakdown" moment in their relationship with God because they are overly-secure. They read "I will never leave you nor forsake you" and say, "Well, I never have to worry about that with God because of this passage." But then they read things like, "The one who didn't produce more minas was thrown out where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth" and think, I must just be misunderstanding the passage because Jesus couldn't possibly have meant that. Or, "The tree that fails to produce good fruit will be cut down and thrown into the fire" evokes the response, "Yeah, I'm misunderstanding that one too. I bet Jesus really meant that trees with bad fruit get cut down - not ones that fail to produce good fruit. Heh. Heh. You misspoke, Jesus, right?" And "any branch that does not produce good fruit will be cut off from the vine, but the one that does produce fruit he will prune so that it becomes more fruitful" - "Yeah, that was a joke too, Jesus. Right?"

Oh, and let's not forget: "If anyone does not hate his mother and father, brothers and sisters, WIFE AND CHILDREN - yes, even his own life, he cannot be my disciple." Yeah, Jesus definitely didn't mean that one because we were totally meant to do everything we can to shower our wife and children with love and affection at all times to keep them from leaving us.

I'm reading a book right now titled: "When to Walk Away," in which the author (a pastor) acknowledges early on something to the effect: "I didn't realize how black and white it is in Scripture and how abundant the examples are of godly men allowing people to walk away for the sake of remaining steadfast in their mission - Jesus being the one to do this the most." He comments that the reason for this confusion he had is: "For so long I'd focused on Jesus' teachings, but when I began to look not only at what he said, but also at what he did - how he lived and behaved toward people - a whole new world opened up to me about what it meant to be like Christ." I'm tempted to declare it mandatory reading for anyone who wants to do online ministry ;) ... even though there are still some blue moments.

I understand the "buy some time" principle, but this post has a "follow this format" vibe to it, and although you mention everybody and every situation is different, it still is portrayed as general advice to follow, and it's not good.

This is critical - it's why I bothered to take the time I did to respond. That and the fact that OP has been around long enough that others might think his advice here is somehow valuable or representative of the community - which seemed to be the case, given the comments that were up when I saw this.

It doesn't have to be the roughest version of "It's my way or the highway" vs "I'll do anything to get you back, baby"

Right - that was his autistic response to me. "RC doesn't like my way, so he must want me to do the exact opposite extreme, which is absurd." What's absurd is thinking in extremes like this in the first place.

Getting your wife back after a separation

4 upvotes · 12 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I might do that. Since RP, I've had at least 11 couples I've counseled reconcile after coming to my office to file for divorce - and that's out of 13 who attempted it (note: I'm not counting those with whom I had no guidance/influence who just retained me for a time). Pretty good rates there. A heck of a lot better than marriage counseling rates, anyway.

The best summary advice I can give in a situation like this is what /u/bluepillprofessor has noted: "When a woman wants a divorce, the best thing you can do is keep improving yourself and ramp up your dread game. Women can't bear the thought of wondering what could have been if she'd stayed with a man who's on the path to improvement - especially when she sees after he's back on the market how desirable he is to so many younger, hotter, and more submissive women than her."

I have observed this phenomenon countless times. Wife divorces Husband. Husband starts dating multiple women who are drastic improvements, eventually marrying one. Even in the cases where Wife also remarries, I've never seen her get over the fact that Husband has a new woman, unless the new woman is less attractive than her. Instead, her new marriage is wrought with strife against the new guy because she wishes he'd live up to what her ex became after they separated. Subtext (and in a few cases: overt-communication) shows that these women wish they'd never left the guy and want him back.

In the 11+ cases where the parties reconciled (I'll add the qualifier: permanently; I've had some where they reconciled briefly but still divorced a year later), this is what happened every time. The wife eventually realized that she wasn't going to get better than him on the sexual marketplace, so she relents.

The two where the reconciliation failed were:

- 1 - lots of blue pill "I'll change for you" promises, but the man ultimately was not willing to improve.
- 2 - the other one involved a wife who was an alcoholic and promised to give it up, but failed, so husband ended up leaving her anyway.

FR: DiscipleHaus, My Vision and My Mission

4 upvotes · 11 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I ironically just posted this video in the discord. The context is Andrew whining about "What if we fail Jesus? We don't know what we're doing." Peter answers:

We'll probably both do it wrong. It's like fishing. Remember what Dad taught us?

Andrew: Dad didn't teach us anything. We just sat there.

Peter: And watched. And then it was our turn and we made our own mistakes.

So, challenge point: was /u/redirecteds showing this guy first: "Hey, watch me do it, then I'm going to ask you to do it"? Or was he taking the ~~pastor~~ congregation leader approach of: "I'll tell you what to do, then expect you to figure out how to go do it all by yourself?"

Granted, what I'm reading here is still a step above that because he's at least there to observe it. He's making sure the guy follows through, then debriefing him afterward. So in the process Jesus gives:

1. Tell them what
2. Show them how
3. Let them try
4. Send them out
5. Pass it on

... ~~pastors~~ congregation leaders skip from 1 to 4 then stop, but Rfs added 3 in the mix (and if I know him, with the expectation that 5 will come down the road). The only thing missing in the story is 2 - but it's a beautiful thing to watch all the same, because so few people even get that opportunity to try something in front of a more experienced member of the body. And I expect that while this one example may catch some men's attention, this isn't just in the realm of cat calling, but would also be applied to showing him how to read the Word, pray, share his faith, etc. - and then observing as he tries each of these things. And then it will move on into equipping him with tools that Rfs has found useful in his growth, obedience, and mission that go beyond just these basic, foundational components.

Solid post, brother. I'm looking forward to seeing this continue to play out and being a part of it in the coming months.

Matchmaker, matchmaker, make me a match

4 upvotes · 18 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

is it possible to have someone else successfully do preliminary vetting for us?

Ish, sure. Nobody here denies that there are benefits to online dating services. But for all the benefits, you'll never overcome the primary flaw: the people who use them are mainly people who need to. Put more clearly: higher quality people who have no problem finding matches without the help of online dating won't be found in online dating.

There are some exceptions, of course. But they're rare. I spent a chunk of time on Tinder and various other (mostly Christian) dating sites about 8-9 months ago in research for a post I eventually canned (I found it too hard to gather the type of information I was looking for and didn't want to write a post on half-valid research). The bird's eye view was to get a picture of the current online dating market and to see if things like /r/WhereAreAllTheGoodMen applied to the Christian sphere also. Suffice it to say: there's a reason online dating has the stigma among sexually successful people that it does.

A match-making service seems like a cheat code

If by "cheat code" you mean, "Here - I gathered all the people that nobody else wanted. Take your pick, they're desperate because they can't find someone else," then sure. There's a reason it looks like all the good girls are taken. There's a reason we suggest: find them young, train them right.

I encourage the use of dating networks - but not for the expectation of finding a wife. It's useful in the sense that if you had a magic button that with extremely low-effort would drastically open up your social circle and degree of female attention ... why wouldn't you use it? All that extra social connectivity, even if it doesn't end in marriage, can be leveraged to expand your social network for the dual purpose of both advancing your discipler-making mission and possibly exposing you to someone you would find marriageable material someday.

So, go meet someone you "match" with online and let it not work out, but still hang with her and her friends every now and then, and maybe her roommate's best friend ends up being a catch - someone you wouldn't have met if you hadn't used the cheap and easy resources at your fingertips. Yeah, there's value in doing things the hard way (much greater value, at that!) but that doesn't mean you should be a fool and reject the low hanging fruit just because it's easy.

The Basics of Female Frame

4 upvotes · 12 November 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I actually started to type that out and realized it was 3:30am and the post was already really long. So, I deleted what I started and figured I'd save that for a subsequent post. If this one was "Basics of Frame" the next post will be something akin to "Building Frame" and should address those issues.

The First Among

4 upvotes · 22 September 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I love this. It's very mature to take this perspective. I love Dawson Trotman's quote in Born to Reproduce when he's talking about interviewing prospective missionaries: "I found that most people were willing to cross an ocean, adapt to a new culture, and learn a new language - but they hadn't even won their first at home."

Start local. In his talk The Need of the Hour (same site) he talks about how you can't reach the world until you reach your country; and you can't reach your country until you reach your city - and that until you're street, and that until your neighbor.

Don't Be Autistic

4 upvotes · 22 September 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

If it helps, re-reading is key. I remember in the first week after I discovered RP reading the top 50 posts at the time, NMMNG, WISNIFG, and most of MMSLP. That was way too much information for 1 week, so I went back and re-read many of these in a better pace. Much, much more useful doing it that way.

A picture of a relationally solid church community

4 upvotes · 11 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

BOTTOM-LINE

Now, as you can tell, I'm being exceptionally hard on you. Your congregation actually seems like a fantastic place. As long as it's not run by some psycho like Steven Anderson (obviously I don't know all the theological beliefs and if they're biblically sound), it's a place I'm sure I'd prefer to attend over other options.

My point here is not to prove you wrong about your congregation. It's not to denigrate your congregation. It's simply to get you to take off the rosy-colored glasses you're wearing when you look at your congregation so that you can work to improve it. /u/rocknrollchuck has shared the old joke before: "If you ever find a perfect congregation, don't join it because it won't be perfect anymore." You may think right now that you're a realist with some limited expression of the flaws, the same way a guy with serious ONEitis will pretend he's a realist because he can admit that the object of his ONEitis has certain habits that he can get past. But the fact is he still has ONEitis and that, in itself, is dangerous and prevents him from being able to have a healthy relationship with her.

In the same way, I am suggesting you may have a ONEitis for your congregation that may prevent you from having a healthy relationship with it. This congregational ONEitis is typical of churchianity culture - where people love their congregations even more than Christ himself, idolizing all sorts of aspects about them.

The reality is that the way you have glorified your congregation - I could glorify mine the same way. And honestly too! I could talk about the relational satisfaction. The way it preaches headship. The fact that nobody in the entire congregation has gotten divorced since it started (also a true statement). The amount of new converts who say "the prayer" every week. The people being discipled by the leadership - and especially the ones I know concretely who are being discipled by myself and who are out making more disciples as well. I could hear countless challenges like the ones you've heard from this community and defend them eloquently with actual, hard facts that would perfectly address every concern anyone might possibly raise about my congregation.

I could do all of that. But I don't. Because I know it's not perfect. I see numerous areas of unbiblical expression that require improvement. Refinement. Sharpening. Training. I am not a drone who goes with the program because I'm so impressed by it. I am the one who goes with what I see is biblical and work alongside the leaders of my congregation as co-partners in the Gospel to see disciples made of all nations, allowing them to correct me where I am wrong, and they allowing me to speak into their weaknesses where they are struggling or even failing.

I'm excited about what your congregation has going for it! But they're not here. YOU are here. I'm less interested in what they do and more interested in what YOU are going to do moving forward - and whether or not your ONEitis for your congregation is going to be a hindrance to getting it done. Loving your congregation is a great thing, but never stop trying to improve it either. Because Jesus is on the move. As /u/deep_strength often says, and I have been saying for years as well: our faith is not a destination that can be achieved; it's a direction we're following as Christ goes.

What's the next step your congregation needs to take to become more Christ-like in how it approaches the mission to make disciples of all nations? That's a step you should be discerning and helping them accomplish. And it's a step you must be living first in order to get them on board.

Speaking of which: who are the guys you're discipling today? How are they doing? What do their lives look like? Are they discipling anyone else yet? If your congregation is so impressive at making disciples - why aren't you doing it? Or maybe you are - and if that's the case, what are you learning about how to make disciples that your congregation could benefit from? It should be a synergistic relationship - one body, many parts - rather than a centralized hierarchy (except to the degree that Christ is the head, not any particular "lead pastor" or "elder board").

Decoding towards a better world?

4 upvotes · 7 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Can you point out some of the books that you have in mind?

Given my constant opposition to scientific apologetics, I'd prefer not. That's like asking a Satanist if he knows any good books on how to love God.

If this knowledge could be made accesible to everybody

It is. It's called the internet. There are dozens of websites dedicated to this exact purpose. I'll cave and give you three of them: Answers in Genesis, The Gospel Coalition, and CARM.

I want to make it accesible to those who are currently e.g. tempted by finding truth only in what "we" call the hard sciences and where there is currently no place for the word without discrediting people and this shies many away from even touching it.

This is why God values faith over knowledge. Recognize this and a lot of what you're driving toward starts to fall apart.

bring scientists into the frame of the bible, based on a purely rational approach

The purely rational approach that ignores faith and focuses exclusively on what can be scientifically knowable IS LITERALLY entering their frame. It's not a different approach. It's like me saying, "My wife won't have sex with me, so let me think of things from her perspective and give her everything she says she wants and maybe that will make her start seeing things my way." That's the blue pill approach that never works. You can't make a scientist acknowledge faith by feeding his demands for knowledge.

To be clear, it's all a hoax anyway. Science itself doesn't require the absolute proof for most of what it teaches that it does of Christianity or any religious system. There are TONS of scientific theories that have only circumstantial inferences that imply certain conclusions. And the standards applied to virtually every historical text are 10x more satisfied in the biblical account - yet when it comes to religion, the MO is to require a much, much higher standard than they require of their other non-Christian peers. This is why you'll never convince themselves - because they don't intend to play ball in the first place, even if you try. Avoid persuasion and focus more on demonstrating the value of faith.

Saw a post asking about porn addiction the other day. Here is a really great video that's helped me a lot already.

4 upvotes · 27 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right. If you found value out of it, explain what value you found out of it.

The reality is that we can't vet every video link that comes through here. Some people have tried to post really nasty and heretical content. Others post videos that are 3+ hours long. We're not watching all that to figure out which ones are legit and which ones aren't. So, if you want the video up, you have to do the vetting for us by explaining the content of the video in your post so that we can see if there are any red flags.

As I often tell people, there are two requirements for posting links (and I bump posts regularly for violating this):

1. You have to have an explanation of the content that will be found if someone clicks on the link, and it must be thorough enough that someone can engage in the conversation completely without actually clicking on the link.
2. The link has to be an afterthought to the post, not the centerpiece. If it seems that the whole point of the post is to get someone to click on the link, it'll be removed.

The idea is that we want content on this sub to be within this sub. There is SOOOO much bad content out in the world that we simply don't trust much of it. This sub is not meant to become a hub to reference other outside content. It's meant to be a community of men who sharpen each other. Links to outside content steal that away and encourage a mass-production model of the faith, which is much of what I preach against. I'm less interested in what some rando on YouTube thinks about a subject and more interested in what YOU think about it and what YOU are going to do about it. That's what matters on this sub - because we're a sub not merely of learning, but of doing. If you say content on a link has changed your life in some way, then write a post on how your life was changed by it and include, as an afterthought, "By the way, here's the link that started this for me."

Tag: /u/rocknrollchuck /u/Deep_Strength

Anyone familiar with Tony Dungy's stuff?

4 upvotes · 24 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This.

Make it easy for your spouse

4 upvotes · 14 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I remember an excellent post you wrote that went into great detail about this. You gave the 30,000 feet and the street view that explained how the process usually unfolds, and it's not always how many men expect it to go.

Hmm ... I'm not sure I remember that one.

I'll note one of the main thoughts in my head when writing the post was how many men will think or say "My wife is supposed to do or be "abc" and it's true, but their own actions are making it that much more difficult for her.

I remember a conversation where a couple in my previous congregation were sharing about their marriage. The wife said that they were fighting and she just wanted her husband to hug her and tell her everything would be alright. The husband responded, "Nobody wants to hug a porcupine." She said that was a big eye-opener moment for her.

The funny thing is: it "opened her eyes" to the fact that Jesus hugged us as porcupines, so what an awful thing for her husband to say to her because he wasn't being like Christ. She should be able to act like a snotty, spiteful harpy and he should somehow be falling over himself to give her that hug ... rather than the more obvious conclusion: If you stopped acting like a porcupine and made it easy for him to want to hug you, maybe you'd actually get that hug.

Staying humble and RPC

4 upvotes · 9 July 2020 · /r/askRPC

The key is realizing that being humble is not thinking less of yourself. Rather, it's thinking more of others.

I don't even think it's that, though there is certainly value in appreciating others' needs and potential above our own, as I do with every man I disciple. I always ask God that when I invest in a man, they go on to do greater things than I do - and some have done exactly that! I'm encouraged by this, and not upset that they have surpassed me.

More to /u/NoFaithInThisSub, in this conversation, I love in Numbers 12:3, which was written by Moses and says, "Now Moses was a very humble man, more humble than anyone else on the face of the earth."

This is the same man who threw stone tablets in anger at Israel's idolatry, whose face literally shone with the glory of God, who was the only man at that point in known history to see God and live, and who led an entire nation - and who also cared about his public image enough to disobey God by tapping on a rock because he was too embarrassed to talk to it. Yet in all of this he's still the most humble man in the whole world.

None of this implied he was thinking of others more. What it does tell us is that he had strong convictions, but did not overstate them. He knew exactly who he was before God and man - and this is evident in his conversation with God at the burning bush.

In this, I can say in all due humility: "I am probably the best racquetball player you've ever met." This is not a boast, as if I'm trying to overstate my skills. It's accurate. And for me to, instead, pretend that my neighbor is better would be probabilistically dishonest. Yet for me to play racquetball with my wife in a way that makes the game fun for her rather than completely creaming her ... that's part of humility. It embraces who I am, while still recognizing who she is in context, and giving deference to her in the situation rather than show-boating in a way that would aggravate her.

Phil's Victorious Humility

Yet at the same time, one of the guys I used to play with was Phil. He was the best I'd ever seen. A guy joined our tournament and was trash-talking everyone all the way up. The trash-talker had a nasty attitude, but he literally shut out every single competitor all the way to the finals. 15-0 every game. Nobody scored a single point against him.

Phil makes it to the championship too, though most of his games were 15-12 or 15-11.

Then the two are pitted against each other in the championship game. Phil just smiles and reaches to shake his hand before starting. The guy refused and made some comment about how "I'm going to destroy you. You're pathetic and I don't shake hands with trash. Everyone at this YMCA is pathetic and I'm here to prove it."

That guy served first. Phil returned it with a kill shot to the corner. He never served again. Phil shut him out 15-0 both games. He smiled at the man, offered him his hand again and simply said, "I appreciate that you played a fair game." The guy simply walked off and didn't even bother to take his 2nd place trophy/reward.

In this, Phil never lost his humility the entire time. It was a big lesson for me at the time - that someone could be GREAT, and yet simultaneously humble without undervaluing his own status. He didn't say, "You're right, you'll probably beat me," which Phil knew would be a lie. He didn't give the other guy a chance either. He literally gave it his all, even knowing that the guy couldn't actually play at Phil's level, despite being better than all the other competitors. So, even without reservation or consideration for the other guy's feelings, Phil was able to live accurately in light of who he was relative to that man, while still remaining meek, gentle, humble, kind, etc.

My point is: humility is embracing who you are before God and man and living in light of that toward the "greater good" - and if you are in Christ, that greater good is your own desire, even over the self-serving good that your flesh may initially prefer. Elevating yourself beyond reality is boastful and arrogant, but deflating your self-perception beyond reality is also unhelpful and prohibitive of the confidence necessary to make a difference in God's Kingdom. Devaluing others has the same effect, whereas elevating your perception of others causes you to see the world through false lenses, again hindering your ability to minister. Instead, I must know exactly who I am and who my neighbor is in order to decide how to act appropriately.

- In my wife's case, the greater good is served by having a fun game together (though it has been far too long since we've had that chance).
- In Phil's case, the greater good was served by displaying his dominance in the court in order to be a vehicle for God's judgment against the proud. There would have been no good served by validating his opponent's arrogance.

Reformed? Or Arminian?

4 upvotes · 3 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Nah. From what I recall, reformed says that some things are predestined and others are on free will. That's not the same as saying both are always on simultaneously.

Feeling discouraged with many churches' support of the Black Lives Matter movement, including my own.. Are there any truly alt-right/conservative churches left that don't buy into this?

4 upvotes · 2 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

That's not a viable long-term solution, though. What you're suggesting is either:

- (1) that the entire police force be disbanded and we devolve into anarchy because "you can quit being an officer" if the hostility against the police grows far enough and private security is a better-paying gig anyway. That's the natural end-conclusion without some protection for officers; or
- (2) that because we HAVE to have a police force, SOME people should be forced into a low-paying, thankless job that is hated by countless people in the nation and just deal with it.

Imagine (a) the types of people who are going to sign up willingly for that second camp, and (b) who those people will become after they've lived in those conditions for some time.

But more to the point: there's no actual evidence that "systemic racism" by the police is actually occurring. What we do see is that the incidents of violence by police officers against unarmed African Americans is drastically under-proportionate to the number of violence by black people committed against police officers. One study showed that in 2015 a police officer was 18.5 times more likely to be killed by a black male than an unarmed black male was to be killed by a police officer. The incidents of unarmed black people being killed by police officers has also dropped every year since then, down to only 10 cases in 2019, whereas 48 police officers were murdered in 2019. In 2015, black people made up only 6% of the population, yet were responsible for 52% of murders.

Yes, we can make up excuses for why it's justifiable for black people to have a disproportionately higher quantity of murders due to their "history of oppression" (which no doubt does exist) - but that doesn't change the fact that police are acting relative to the crime rates. To that end, I read one statistic that actually showed the reverse: that if we look at unarmed white deaths by police officers relative to crimes committed by white people and compare that to unarmed black deaths by police officers relative to crimes committed by black people, you will see that black people are actually killed less often than white people relative to the amount of crime each of them are committing. Now, I have no idea if that study was assessing all crimes or only violent crimes where the officers were at greater risk - but the fact that black people commit more than half of the murders in the country yet make up (at current) only 13% of the population tells me that the targeting isn't based on the color of one's skin, but based on the crime rates and the risks posed to the police officers by different cultural groups.

Feeling discouraged with many churches' support of the Black Lives Matter movement, including my own.. Are there any truly alt-right/conservative churches left that don't buy into this?

4 upvotes · 1 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is my view. Simply put: we're part of a heavenly Kingdom, not an earthly one. We are here as part of a spiritual military force, rather than a physical one. With physical military forces, it's often a running joke in movies that some people get stuck stationed in a research base in the arctic, right? There are crappy assignments. But they're usually also important assignments, whether we want to admit it or not.

Can you imagine the researchers stationed in the arctic revolting and insisting that all stations should be equal, and therefore those stationed in Hawaii should be recalled because they have it too good, and those stationed in the arctic should be recalled because they have it too bad, and we should all have equal positions in some mediocrity, like Kansas? That's lunacy and would completely undermine the point of the mission each party is stationed at.

God is the potter, we're the clay. Some are designed for noble and others humble purposes, and others to be destroyed altogether, right?

In this, I don't believe there is any room for a biblically oriented black person to be complaining about his lot in life. Does God not promise that those who are given little and are faithful with little will be given much in the age to come? Doesn't he promise that the lowly will be glorified?

Jesus could have come in the height of Israel's glory, if he wanted. There was a time when they were a super-power throughout the world. Instead, he comes in a time when Israel was in exile, subject to Rome, and broadly persecuted. The hate against Israel by Rome isn't as clear from Scripture because the apostles weren't prone to whining about their earthly situation, but most secular history around the time documents this well - and it escalated to the point that within the lifetime of the apostles there was a war between the Jews and Rome that resulted in mass slaughter and the destruction of the temple in 70AD. That's the people and time-frame that Jesus decided to come in.

If black people want to make a claim of oppression, that's fine - but Jesus himself came as one who lived within oppression and did not demand equality, but instead demanded that his people pursue a spiritual Kingdom that would be better than the physical ones that were oppressing them.

Biblically oriented black Christians should understand this and realize: Yeah, I'm the unlucky one who got stationed in the arctic. It sucks, especially when I know the guy who was stationed in Hawaii. But this is a temporary placement, so I'm going to carry out my mission in the place I've been given, and look forward to the reward I was promised for my diligent service.

Does that mean you can't vote the way you want, or that you can't voice your concerns? Of course not. If we have certain political freedoms, we have every right to use them - and we should. But using our freedom to promote concepts of guilt, shame, condemnation, hate, violence, anger, and overall political unrest ... that just seems completely contrary to the model Jesus gave us.

Anyone else frustrated with their church leadership re: COVID?

4 upvotes · 1 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, you're changing the framework with this comment. My framework: Don't do anything that will cause someone else to sin by violating their own conscience/convictions. Your framework: Don't do anything that could be potentially harmful to someone else. Switch back to my framework and you'll see the conversation is much simpler and doesn't leave nearly as much room for that slippery slope. Of course, we do have to leave room for those who are mature to educate those who are immature on what their conscience and convictions are. So, if someone says it's sin to get a boner when you're not married, it would be sin for us to do something to cause him to get a boner, but it would not be sin if we taught him that it's actually okay to get a boner, and then he got one because of something we said/did.

How to know if I'm (F) dealing with a narcissist or with someone who has narcissistic traits (who is a bit arrogant & entitled)?

4 upvotes · 24 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I deal with psychological diagnoses of NPD in my career ALL. THE. TIME. It's the number 1 source of business for me. Most people find us by googling, "Divorcing a narcissist."

narcissist ... or narcissistic traits

According to the DSM-V

1a - Identity: Excessive reference to others for self-definition and self-esteem regulation [i.e. "Do you see how much better I am than they are?"]; exaggerated self-appraisal may be inflated or deflated, or vacillate between extremes [i.e. "I'm the most respected/hated person in my entire office"]; emotional regulation mirrors fluctuations in self-esteem

OR

1b - Self-direction: Goal-setting is based on gaining approval from others; personal standards are unreasonably high in order to see oneself as exceptional, or too low based on a sense of entitlement; often unaware of own motivations

AND

2a - Empathy: Impaired ability to recognize or identify with the feelings and needs of others; excessively attuned to reactions of others, but only if perceived as relevant to self; over- or underestimate of own effect on others. [This is generally interpreted to mean that they are INCAPABLE of discerning these things, not that they do discern it, but just don't care, which is more an antisocial trait.]

OR

2b - Intimacy: Relationships largely superficial and exist to serve self-esteem regulation; mutuality constrained by little genuine interest in others' experiences and predominance of a need for personal gain

3 Antagonism: Specifically as characterized by:

- Grandiosity: Feelings of entitlement, either overt or covert; self-centeredness; firmly holding to the belief that one is better than others; condescending toward others, and
- Attention seeking: Excessive attempts to attract and be the focus of attention of others; admiration seeking.

4 The impairments in 1a/1b and the individual's personality trait expression are relatively stable across time and consistent across situations [meaning they're that way all the time, not just in certain contexts].

5 The impairments in 2a/2b and the individual's personality trait expression are not better understood as normative for the individual's developmental stage or socio-cultural environment.

6 The impairments in 2a/2b and the individual's personality trait expression are not solely due to the direct physiological effects of a substance (e.g., a drug of abuse, medication) or a general medical condition (e.g., severe head trauma).

Now, realistically, I could take any person off the street, get to know them, and come up with examples of how they have met each one of these standards. Everyone will meet these standards at some point in time. That's why item 4 is so important - it's that they do these things constantly without ever dropping the attitude no matter what context or situation they're in. For example, if they show up to church and know how to adjust their behavior to fit in better than they do at home alone with you, it shows they're conscious enough of their own expression that it's not a personality disorder - it's general machiavellianism (which is not a disorder diagnosed in the DSM). The true narcissist doesn't realize there is anything wrong with any of these behaviors in the first place; they think it's perfectly appropriate for them to act this way, so they will not adjust their expression for different contexts or at different stages of life.

Funny story, my wife accused me of having NPD just a few months ago. She cited some of the same criteria you did. So, we both took an MMPI-2 (the primary test used by forensic psychologists to assess and diagnose personality disorders). Turns out I'm free of personality disorders or any real anomalies at all (I did have a few scales that were out of the ordinary, but nothing exciting).

What you're describing to me is someone who has an inflated ego and is somewhat high-maintenance. But it doesn't strike me as narcissism - not even the traits. Of course, I don't see their actual expression, so it's hard to say for sure. For example:

A sense of superiority: meaning objectively thinking they are superior to a lot of their peers

Is he:

- Boasting 5-7 times a day about how he's better than someone at something? Or is he trash-talking people 5-7 times a day for being idiots and incompetent? If so, it might be one of the narcissistic traits.
- When situations come up that he's better than someone else, he presses the point harder than is warranted, or if someone else fails, he's harder on their failure than he should be. Then it's probably not a narcissistic expression, as these are contextual and he's merely exaggerating an otherwise appropriate response.

If you really want to, I can e-mail you a copy of the MMPI-2 and you can have him and you take it. I'll tell you what your scores mean and if his scores actually trigger the narcissistic criteria. It's about a 45-60 minute test.

RPC Chat - Episode 4: Christian Dead Bedrooms

4 upvotes · 18 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

So dread is really just a consequence of the wife not following her calling where the husband is

Not really. It's a man's response to his wife being sexually defiant/rebellious. In some sense, we can say her "calling" by God or by her husband includes not to deprive one another (1 Cor. 7), so technically the verse fits. But the language wouldn't resonate with most people.

A wife could easily say, "I'm following my calling. I'm evangelizing, making disciples, and taking care of the kids and house and supporting my husband. I just don't want to have sex with him." In this sense, she believes her calling is complete, but their sexuality is still at issue.

As such, it's more accurate (at least in terms of modern linguistics) to say that dread is what a man employs to restore his wife's sexual interest in him.

Where I had got concerned is if a man revels in her dread, recognizing that she is in distress, and taking joy in it.

That's not dread. That's sadism. Dread is the process of increasing one's own attractiveness to your spouse. The difference from general self-improvement is that it employs additional concepts of preselection that general self-improvement does not consider.

Specifically, preselection says that if you put two identical twin men in a room together, one has women hanging all over him and the other is all by himself, which will the woman find more attractive? Obviously the one with other women hanging all over him. This study has been repeated not only by the red pill community, but by other psychologists ad nauseam, usually with pictures of the same man photoshopped in two different scenarios with the woman asked to identify which man is more attractive. The conclusion is always the same: women are attracted to men who other women find attractive.

This derives from the hive mentality of women. But more specifically, it relates to the fact of the logical subconscious conclusion: "If women find that man attractive, but not the other guy, there must be a reason, and I will trust the conclusions made by these other women rather than my own eyes."

From a marriage perspective, it's a little different. Your wife already knows you, so she's not approaching her perception of you based on what strangers think because she trusts her own experience first. This is why the first 7-ish levels of dread are about changing the man into something better. Initially, those changes are often overcome by the historical-impression problem - that people tend to view you the way they've always known you, giving little credit to any changes you're actually making. Yet when you get to the mid-late stages of dread where other women are actively showing interest in you, the wife starts to think: "I see that he's been changing, but didn't think much of it. Now that other people are starting to take notice, maybe there's more to these changes than I realized." Notice that this isn't about making her jealous - it's about opening her eyes to the fact that you've changed and are suddenly more attractive. She only notices this when other women notice it because women trust other women when it comes to finding a man attractive.

In this, I'm reminded of the reverse scenario where Dave Chapelle once commented: "Too many guys get mad when another dude stares at his wife's breasts. Why would you get mad at that? That's the greatest compliment I can receive. I don't want to be married to a woman who isn't turning heads. But when another guy stares at my wife's chest, it makes me feel good to know that I have what he wants." (Obviously not an exact quote; concepts from memory.)

Original red pill says to create dread by making her jealous if I'm remembering that right and that is not Jesus like at all.

This is wrong. You are either remembering this incorrectly or you were getting your information from a non-endorsed contributor.

Sanctification is the job of the Holy Spirit, not the husband

By this logic, no one would ever be allowed to rebuke anyone because that would be considered "unloving" and it's not our responsibility to work toward their sanctification, right? /u/Deep_Strength is spot on with this. The Spirit does the heart-changing work; the husband is the vehicle through whom it happens.

Regarding your podcast I have a few concerns ...

Yeah, there are always going to be complainers. At some point someone's going to complain that we're not baptizing people. Then someone else will complain that we're not having communion. Someone else will complain that we're not sharing the Gospel in every single episode.

The things you're referencing are all personal preference issues. They're not bad ideas. I may even take some of these comments to heart in how we approach future episodes. But unless you can show me a verse that says, "Thou shalt quote at least 2 Bible verses within the first 10 minutes of every group gathering," I have to assume that this is just preference.

Curious: do you hold your pastor to that same standard? Because I have yet to meet a pastor who consistently makes Scripture the foundation of what they're preaching these days, much less actually quoting it. Most often, we get an ear full of their personal opinions on how people should live, followed by a passage they found which they think supports their position. They're usually using the verse right more often than not ... but the "not" is often enough that it's clear they're preaching from an eisegetical standpoint rather than actual exegetical interpretation. In our situation, most of the Scriptural foundation is on the sub here, whereas the conversations are auxiliary - they're not meant to be repetitive of the Scripturally grounded content here on the sub, but conversation inspired by that content.

Also, notice that when Paul was writing his letters, he often went very long stretches without quoting any Scripture at all. And yet we saw fit to deem his writings Scripture, despite his lack of biblical references in certain sections. What he was doing was speaking to issues rather than exegeting from a passage.

Issue speaking is, admittedly, significantly more difficult than direct exegesis. It requires having done the exegesis ahead of time so that one can speak competently without having to waste the time of doing the entire study in front of everyone before actually speaking on the subject.

That said, when we get to live pod-cast episodes (which will be forthcoming), I'd be happy for people to ask questions about where the Bible supports what we're saying - because it does.

Tag: /u/OsmiumZulu

OYS - Where Progress is Made (06/10/20)

4 upvotes · 10 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Contact u/r_horizon. He's helping with some of those things also, but his ambition for what he'd like to accomplish with all of this might require assistance on some stuff like that, which I'm otherwise incompetent to handle. I know /u/annaerials has also been assisting with some of this stuff and just last night added a lot to the YouTube stuff, which was fantastic. The team of people helping with this kind of stuff is small right now, but could easily have room for growth as we keep putting out more content.

Need some dating advice...

4 upvotes · 10 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

/u/redwall92 is saying that you're DEERing to us about your scrawny physique before we even brought it up as an issue. Pre-emptive DEERing is worse than regular DEERing. If you know this is a problem, at least own it and accept the criticism when it comes. It's not a big deal, just remember for the future ;)

How to create sexual tension/make conversations man-to-woman as a Christian?

4 upvotes · 3 June 2020 · /r/askRPC

How to create sexual tension ...?

and ...

Reading : first 5-6 posts on RPC sidebar

You're asking the question too early here, brother. I appreciate wanting to skip ahead to what you think are the fun parts, but you have to lay the foundation first.

[60DOD] Week 8, Social Life

4 upvotes · 3 June 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

It's gotta be a priority.

Exactly. The "when you move someplace new" is me right now.

Introduction and OYS #1

4 upvotes · 20 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

At first I thought you wrote it, haha.

Who should you listen to on RPChristians?

4 upvotes · 20 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Imminently. I just have to write the announcement post. I will not be a huge content creator there, myself, but I'll participate from time to time.

Does Man Really Findeth A Wife?

4 upvotes · 20 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

You should check the whole sidebar. It's all recommended reading, not just the ones that get specifically named.

Is marriage worth it?

4 upvotes · 19 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Don't have kids, use a prenup. Do both of those and you'll be fine.

Alternatively, only marry a woman who earns as much as you or more. That's the other easy way to avoid divorce rape.

How do I approach my husband about this issue?

4 upvotes · 18 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Don't be afraid to tell him how you feel

Followed by quoting:

they may be won over WITHOUT words by the behavior of their wives

Huh?

Why an Adulterous Nation Seeks After a Sign

4 upvotes · 13 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Well said, friend. I'm surprised you didn't delve into the adultery angle a bit more, which would have connected the dots a bit more clearly. As /u/DeChef2 noted, looking for a sign doesn't make you an adulterer; but people who already are adulterers are the ones who will ask for one.

In this case, the Pharisees had abandoned God - their first spouse - for legalistic practices and "rules taught by men," along with their lust for the power that came with their position. They were looking for the Messiah, but didn't want to give up their lovers any more than the adulterous Gomer did for Hosea. So, they demanded more and more proof that would never satisfy them as yet another excuse for not having to give up their love-affair with legalism, which gave them power and control in the Jewish culture at the time.

Now look in modern times. CHRISTianity has been replaced with CHURCHianity. The structures that give pastors power and a voice among the people are now replacing the significance of the role of Christ among his own bride. Instead of looking to the way Jesus made disciples, and following our groom as he instructed, churchianity is hung up on Sunday services, programs, service projects, outreach events, etc. We have abandoned the way of Christ for these other idols.

Lots more to say ... too low on time. Good conversation, either way.

Why an Adulterous Nation Seeks After a Sign

4 upvotes · 13 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This guy gets it!

Starting, Developing, and Evolving Hobbies

4 upvotes · 6 May 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I love this post, brother. Very well done. In no particular order, some of my hobbies include ...

(1) Reading/Writing (including reddit)

- I chat with other writers
- I use it to advance my mission
- It's a fun, creative outlet (especially when I write fiction)

(2) Lifting/Running

- I usually do it with other people, making it socially engaging
- It's a fantastic time to parent my children and have deeper, more stimulating conversations
- It provides internal confidence and physical stimulation, as well as just makes you feel good about yourself

(3) Recreational Swimming (seasonally)

- I love just taking my kids to the pool. Lots of fun screwing around.
- It's another great way to meet people.
- It also has some value in staying in shape, depending on how hard we play.

(4) Logic Puzzles + Movie/TV/Audio Book

- Whenever possible, I enjoy multi-tasking to logic puzzles. My current favorites are Griddlers (aka Nonograms), for which I'm currently ranked 175th in the world by points (i.e. difficulty of puzzles solved, not quantity).
- When I was in college, I was infatuated with minesweeper and was, at the time 3rd in the world for fastest time on expert setting.
- These are simple tasks that, while intellectually stimulating, can easily be done without losing focus on other visual/audible things, making it a great multi-tasking form of enjoyment.

(5) Distance Biking (seasonally)

- It's fantastic physical exercise.
- It's peaceful and relaxing, providing lots of time to either think or converse with my children (I always have two of them in the trailer with me).

I have a number of other small things I engage in with less frequency - back-burner hobbies, if you will. These are things that I could take up again and readily enjoy if I find myself lacking in things to do.

- Racquetball. I used to play on a professional level and with professionals (though not actually as a professional). I've never been beaten by anyone under the age of 40, including among the professionals. It's been a great tool for connecting with other people - especially new people, expanding my social circle. That said, since moving last year, I'm now 30+ minutes from the closest courts, so this one got put on the sideline for now.

- My wife and I are pseudo-competitive with jigsaw puzzles. We've talked about joining official competitions (rather than amateur ones we do with family/friends) to test how we'd rank against other competitive puzzlers. We are collectively undefeatable among those we know personally. My wife and I tested against each other once, using the same puzzle on a computer (i.e. not actual puzzle) and she managed to beat me by 14 seconds on a 30+ minute effort, so we're generally pretty evenly matched, which makes it more fun.
- I used to do a lot of singing/song-writing, leading worship for churches, and generally enjoy playing the guitar and recording music.
- I always note cooking as one of my hobbies, but I don't extend it beyond occasional experimentation yet. I do research, from time to time, different types of ingredients and how they work together or affect the palate (the "learning to cook without a book" idea).
- I love watching musicals (preferably live), but they're sparse enough it's hard to convert it into a dedicated hobby. At best, there are about 5 decent ones a year, which is less than one every other month - unless you go to NYC and watch them on Broadway (which I did last year and am doing again next year).

You get the idea.

Roosh V on Jessie Lee Peterson

4 upvotes · 4 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Remember how many scientists made fascinating discoveries in the 70s because they went on LSD and it caused them to set aside their preconceived notions and come to very real conclusions about how to proceed with their work?

No / Bad Sex - Always His Fault?

4 upvotes · 28 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Frame issue, much? This validates my comment in this thread about your lack of frame. Chill out. He's just pointing out the obvious. If you're not charting your progress on significant matters, why should we assume you're actually making good progress? There's a reason these things are REQUIRED by the sidebar for these types of posts. Lots of what you're discussing is addressed by the exact literature he referenced.

More to the point: putting words in his mouth that he didn't say, then calling him "beta" and an "internalized-white-knight" will not be tolerated here. I have no hesitation banning someone whose ego is so out of control that they have to go around calling anyone who challenges them "beta" or "white knights." Suck it up or get out.

BiblicalGenderRoles.com

4 upvotes · 28 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I've seen some of their stuff. I'm not a fan. I'd probably agree with /u/OsmiumZulu - there's probably some value in reading alternative viewpoints, even if they're wrong, because you're probably already reading a ton of wrong viewpoints on the other side anyway. Better to balance yourself out if the truth is somewhere in the middle.

It's like saying you're a political moderate, but refusing to watch any news source other than CNN. You claim you can see how liberal it is, and therefore think you're fine. But then you start watching Fox News, which is equally biased and full of holes to the same degree as CNN. Do you reject it because you know some of the content is bad? No. Because realizing WHERE the disagreements actually are gives you a better ability to figure out for yourself what's actually true and not.

- The point of reading articles like these isn't to figure out what's true. It's to figure out which issues aren't settled so you can research it for yourself.

The same goes to what you read here too. If your faith is based on what other people tell you about God rather than your own independent ingestion of Scripture, you're a fool. Stop relying so much on articles and keep going back to Scripture.

Another way to think of this: if 0-5 is camp 1 and 5-10 is camp 2 and 5 is actually true, if you're only reading resources from camp 1 and they're all in the 0-1 range and you want to be a 5, you're going to object to some things they say and tell yourself, "I'm clever enough to see through their lies!" But because you only ever see information in the 0-1 range, you'll probably end up being a 2 or 3 and believing you're in camp 2 for being that way. Yes, you're better than the 0-1 sources, but you're still drinking some of the cool-aid. Even if you start reading some 5 resources, you, as a logical person, are going to assume that everyone gets something wrong, so you won't be persuaded 100% exactly to 5 - maybe you'll become a 3 or 4. But balance your 0-1 reading with some 9-10 reading and you'll see just how wrong both sides are, but by recognizing both extremes rather than trying to personally assess out of your own ignorance of what camp 2 says, you'll always end up leaning in favor of the majority of content you read and wind up in camp 1.

Now, on the actual social and spiritual climate we're in, I'd wager 5 isn't actually what's true ... it's probably closer to 6, 7, or even 8. We're just so used to seeing 0-1 from so many congregations that 5 can feel like we've gone far enough, and we assume the "middle" is actually true. But I don't see God being a "God of the middle." He takes strong stands on important issues. Just not always the same stance on the same issues that some people pretend.

Am I in the right place?

4 upvotes · 28 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

If mega churches didn't have a constant barrage of new faces each week, I'd agree with you, to some extent. But since when is the easier path the best path? I have had no problem turning around my image with others. I'm not sure why that would be so objectionable.

Is there anything that we can do to help him?

4 upvotes · 27 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

What's with all the "LTR, breaks up with her after two months" and "LTR for another few months." Do you not know what LTR stands for?

He insists ... so we have no choice

Well, apparently his frame is strong enough to drag you into it. So he might have something more figured out than you do.

Here's the deal. I've had incredible success with persuading guys of the things I write about here - discipleship, hypergamy, fitness tests. All of it. I can include at least 4 pastors in that list, 2 of whom I would call "fully red pillled" (not even purple). If you want to help this guy, here are a few pointers.

1. Figure yourself out first. I can persuade pastors to what I do because they see that I, as a lay person, do a better job at their job without a title or a soapbox than they're doing. You have to be what they want. Are you there yet? Because it doesn't sound like you're the kind of guy he wishes he were. Focus on yourself, not him. That's the first step toward persuading others.
2. Surpass ignorance rather than being enamored by it. You say he's "wise when it comes to pointing to scripture." This is the starting point of many men I work with. The reality is, he's not wise at all. You've explained how he's actually quite foolish. What you mean is that he knows what the Bible says, but is clueless on what it means or how to apply it. You need to understand the Bible better than him, which it sounds like isn't hard. But right now, you're persuaded by him that you think he knows more than he does. Have you read 302 yet? What's the last book of the Bible you followed this process with all the way to completion?

3. Ask questions. Let people figure things out for themselves whenever you have the chance to. I wish internet forums were conducive to this. If he's at least fluent with what the Bible says, ask him questions about how Jesus did things. Was he impulsive? Was he so excited about marrying the church that he jumped right into it after a couple months, or did he take years discipling her and modeling life for her first before becoming one with her? But don't be an idiot and ask these questions as a challenge. Hence ...
4. Pull a Nathan. Ask him to teach you something that you're dying to know. Make it a topic relevant to his situation that's going to force him to realize how dumb he's being (if he's actually being dumb - I really don't know enough about his situation). When Nathan wanted David to understand a flaw that he wouldn't admit to naturally, Nathan concocted a story to get David angry at the villain in the story, only to reveal that David himself did exactly what the villain did. Now, you go get him to teach you about how Jesus modeled relationships for us, and ask lots of questions that (1) if his teachings are wrong, bring suspicion on why they're wrong without directly challenging him; or (2) if they're right, show him how he's not living by the own standard he's teaching to you.

There's more, but this should get you started. Really, though, worry more about yourself. It's not your responsibility to save him from his own mistakes if you're not any better off yet. You have to have what he wants, and right now you don't.

Reposting as text: Advice on how to manage and potentially create a Red Pill women's subreddit for Christian women.

4 upvotes · 25 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I don't think johnmic07 is being fully honest with his representation of the deuterocanonical/apocryphal books.

most Catholics haven't read them

This can be said of the other 66 books too. My previous congregation was 68% ex-Catholic. Virtually all of them, after becoming Protestant, were shocked at the fact that those who weren't previously in a Catholic church actually read their Bibles. They said that they were never (or rarely) encouraged to do so, or that if they were, they were told to do it for "relational" quality and not to understand it because only the priests were allowed to interpret Scripture for them. This is also consistent with a lot of ex-Catholics have reported on places like r/TrueChristian, and it's also consistent with my time attending a Catholic congregation.

they don't really teach anything controversial

This is also incredibly false. Catholics do use these books to draw certain defining doctrines from. Purgatory is a great example. It's curiously absent from the primary 66 books. You can only find things that kind of seem like they reference purgatory if you're intentionally eisegesis it into the passage, but which have other more obvious meanings that don't require forcing an outside concept onto the passage. Instead, purgatory comes primarily from the Maccabees references to people praying for the purification of the dead.

The only reason they aren't included in the protestant/Jewish old testament is because they have not yet found complete original versions written in Hebrew. Only translations in Greek and fragments in Hebrew. Not because there's anything in them that contradicts something significant in the rest of the Bible.

Again, this is a completely false statement. The primary reason for Protestant rejection is BECAUSE of its inconsistency with the rest of the books. It would force playing theological gymnastics to create consistency.

While I'm not the biggest fan of CARM, they list at least a few of the things that I'd put on my list:

<https://carm.org/reasons-why-apocrypha-does-not-belong-bible>

All of that being said, while I 100% reject the notion that they are theologically inspired, they may still be useful for historical value. We use historical texts from other belief systems to figure out what happened in the past all the time. Even secular histories will use the Bible as a source of information for historical analysis, while rejecting the theological matters addressed in it.

I have no problem if someone reads the deuterocanonical books - and I've even done so myself. It's fascinating and worth the read. But it's not something I'd put theological stock into.

I say this not to upset any Catholics, who otherwise have reasonable defenses to some of the things I've said. Rather, I would simply prefer that if the Catholic argument for their inclusion is presented, that the opposing view is presented as well - especially when that opposing view is as grossly misrepresented as has been done here.

Genuinely curious about your philosophies. Not looking to debate just want to listen.

4 upvotes · 25 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

According to your comments on the r/TrueChristian sub, you're making countless false conclusory statements without any fair representation of anything said in this thread at all. This is hardly "trying to understand it." Goodbye.

Someday is a dangerous word

4 upvotes · 16 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I like this. It's a perfect call toward something I often advise guys: Set very clear goals and deadlines for yourself. If you leave it vague, it won't get done.

While I certainly don't endorse everything he says, Coach Red Pill (not to be confused with u/RedPillCoach) on YouTube does have a fantastic video on this point, which I encourage a lot of guys to watch and follow through with outlining their own life goals. I have a spreadsheet I keep on my desktop for this as well:

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=uMnmJIFxxZQ>

Godliness is sexy (companion post)

4 upvotes · 14 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, you missed the point.

Thoughts?

4 upvotes · 4 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

When I was in college I had the same prerequisite. There were girls who were hot and into me who offered to "convert" to Christianity for me. But I knew it would never be a genuine conversion if they were doing it for me. It sounds like you found the same thing: her conversion clearly wasn't genuine.

From a spiritual angle, it doesn't matter if "she will go back to being a hoe." Biblically, all non-Christians can do is sin. A "break from Christianity" means she's going back to being a non-Christian with the hope that Jesus will still take her back sometime before she dies, but only after she's had all her fun. That's playing games with Jesus, not authentic faith. If she really believed what the Bible says, she'd know that the lifestyle she wants to return to is like dipping her hand in acid. Nobody does that unless they're so mentally distorted (such as being on acid) that they literally cannot cognitively understand what they're doing. The simpler conclusion is that she doesn't actually believe her choices are anywhere as dangerous and destructive as they are. How can that be if she's been given a new heart and her eyes have been opened by the Spirit? Oh, it can't. So that must not have happened yet.

figure out an exit strategy

"Sorry, I don't date non-Christians." There, I figured it out for you.

how to dread an ENTP

Dread is best applied in marriage and LTRs. 6 months is hardly an LTR. You should still be in the NRE phase. No need for dread then. Not that it hurts to implement it anyway. It's just overkill. Better just being a high value man than worrying about her.

On Testosterone

4 upvotes · 3 April 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Right. My first reaction at the pic was to assume it was two current shots. Turns out it was supposed to be a before/after. Who knew?

I have no problem with those who want to use steroids. But I'll stick with my protein shakes.

You have any thoughts on creatine? I've toyed with the idea of using it once the gyms open up again. I've heard stellar reports from some. But I also know 2 guys with a masters in exercise science who say the gains go away as soon as you stop taking it, so it's artificial improvement. Worth it or no? I figure you'd be the one to know.

LTR no longer Christian. Next her?

4 upvotes · 3 April 2020 · /r/askTRP

Short answer: yeah, her numbers are higher than she admitted, and you're better off moving on. As /u/osmiumzulu often refrains: "If it's not a hell yes, it's a hell no!"

Lots more to say, given your core starting point, but I usually try to avoid religious talk on the secular forums. Post this on RPChristians and we can discuss further.

What Does the Future Hold for Us as Christians? Should We Be Considering House Churches at This Point?

4 upvotes · 3 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

These are fantastic things to think about, brother! Given my recent affirmation in my leanings toward preterism, I'm not as persuaded that anything is a sign of prophecy yet to be fulfilled. Rather, I would take all of these prophecies as having already been substantially fulfilled in the first century. But that doesn't mean we can't recognize the spiritual imperative that such difficult times creates and the possibility that things will get worse before they get better.

What would you do if all of a sudden you couldn't go to church anymore - permanently? Would you give up?

I'd praise Jesus that God saw fit to tear down one useful structure in order to remind us of the more foundational concepts of what it means to be the church, and let us rebuild who we are meant to be in a more authentic context to what the apostles would have experienced in many countries, such as Rome.

Obviously I wouldn't give up. I'd keep doing exactly what I'm doing now. I just wouldn't have the benefit of someone else finding all the Christians for me. I'd have to step up my own social networking game. This would also be beneficial in that I'd more likely be seeking out non-Christians because the pool of Christians needing discipleship would be scattered, making it harder to find Christians, making it easier to focus on the lost. That's a beautiful thing, not a bad thing!

How would you connect with other Christians?

The same way I do now. My connection with other believers was NEVER dependent on the congregational structure. And I hope nobody else's is too. When we become too dependent on structures, we lose our dependence on Jesus.

Would you still share your faith knowing you could be killed for doing so?

Of course. This question, though, is usually more targeted at proclamational evangelists because they're the only ones truly threatened by these types of mandates. Their entire strategy of evangelism goes down the tubes if they can't preach on street corners, hand out tracts, or knock on doors. The relational people will still be building relationships with non-Christians, and given that the Gospel is most likely to be received when trust is established, that trust will also most protect the believer. Nothing has to change about that particular strategy.

What if the authorities were to come into your house and search it, taking every Bible you own?

Can't remove them from online. There will always be access to underground Bibles. The better answer here, though, is that now is an even better time than ever to focus on Scripture memory.

What if digital versions of the Bible such as YouVersion and the BibleGateway website were no longer available on the web?

Unlikely. Pirated versions will always be available. But again, Scripture memory is my key.

All of that said, I don't think freedom of religion is under permanent risk right now. Freedom in how we express it is certainly at risk. But not the right to believe and share one's own views with others. 30 years from now my opinion might change, and perhaps it's good to have that conversation 30 years ahead. But it's not immediately on my mind :p

OYS - Where Progress is Made (04/01/20)

4 upvotes · 2 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Been there, done that, brother. Your position with your wife/kids is incredibly common. It's probably the most common dynamic in households with young kids. In fact, it's so common that I'm probably going to write up a full post on it instead of replying here. Look for that very soon - I wrote half of it while starting a reply to you anyway, so it shouldn't be much longer, but I do have to get some work done.

Most Christians Do Not Love Women

4 upvotes · 1 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I was just going to remove the troll's comment in the first place, but it's worth keeping it up just for this comment.

FR: Teaching a 16yo kid to Lift.

4 upvotes · 24 March 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Now you know what I'm talking about when I say my mission is to "make disciples." This is exactly what it looks like. Life modeling. Welcome to my world, brother! Linking this on r/RPChristians for others to see how simple it is compared to the way some people try to over-complicate it.

Whose game are you winning?

4 upvotes · 11 March 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Right, but to some degree there's truth in the old saying that "if you're not doing what you want, you're doing what someone else wants." The only alphas without a mission at all are pure anarchists who don't want anything at all - they just want to burn down what everyone else wants ... which in itself becomes a mission.

The Philosophy Side of The Bible

4 upvotes · 19 February 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I would certainly take issue with the characterization of the KJV here. But yes, it's better to read any generally accepted version than none at all.

How would a turnaround for the church look like? Making it more RP than Feminist.

4 upvotes · 22 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Because context matters. Jesus says: "If your eye causes you to sin, gouge it out." Would it be biblical or unbiblical for every man on earth who has ever watched porn to blind himself? Or for every woman who ever gossiped to cut her tongue off? Unbiblical, of course. That would be a wrong interpretation of that verse. The context must be considered before we make stupid choices based on uninformed interpretations.

Regarding OT law, we are never to follow it blindly at face value. That ignores its context and role in a pre-Gospel world. The new testament is abundantly clear that the gentiles (i.e. everyone who wasn't a jew) had no obligation under old testament law. In fact, even Paul who was certainly a jew - and so much so that he called himself a Hebrew of Hebrews - said that because of Christ he was no longer under the law.

So, when a pastor like Steven Anderson tries to quote old testament law as if we should be following it today, he's removing it from its context and promoting an unbiblical interpretation.

Now, many principles of old testament law are still valid. But it's like committing a crime in New York then arguing to the jury to acquit you because Japanese law would permit your actions, when you're neither Japanese nor living in Japan. Sure, Japan probably has a lot of similarities to the laws the New York courts apply. But you have to cite New York law, not a parallel point in Japanese law to make your case.

Non-believing spouse

4 upvotes · 12 November 2019 · /r/askRPC

What do I do with her?

"Let those with wives live as though they had none." ~1 Cor. 7:29

I know the Bible tells me to pray for her but in all these years she never was genuinely interested in meeting my needs. How long is long enough?

Long enough until she leaves.

She is escaping her motherly duties with work

You own 2/3 of the company. You're her boss. If you need to, "buy her out" (whatever that means when you're married) and replace her with an employee. Or just give her a workload that's consistent with her ability to work at home. If you think you're already doing that, then just deal with the fact that you've got a lazy wife who doesn't want to do the housework and either manage it yourself or get attractive enough that she feels the need to keep up. But at the end of the day - keep going back to 1 Cor. 7:29.

By the way: if you didn't have a wife right now, would you be getting in better shape in the hope of attracting hot girls? If so, why are you doing any different right now? Live a motivated life, not a placated one.

Confession & Repentance?

4 upvotes · 4 November 2019 · /r/askRPC

I spilled my guts and she just kinda looked at me blankly

Because she's thinking: "Why are you telling me this? Are you looking for my approval and validation? Do you want me to be your mommy?"

I've been thinking about writing a post on this exact topic. Perhaps now is the time.

Covert contract with God

4 upvotes · 27 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

Solving sin is a byproduct of faith in Christ, not a prerequisite to it. The whole point of the Gospel is that you don't have to worry about sin anymore because God gives you more important things to do. When you start doing them you stop caring about clinging to your sin the way you used to. Right now you're holding back because of your investment in your sin, but after Christ the luster of it all just fades and you don't really care anymore ... the same way a blue pill guy stops seeing the luster in marriage when he discovers the red pill. The truth sets you free from all that fraudulent garbage that seemed to be a dominant, extremely powerful and controlling force over your life before.

And of course you don't want to make that change right now - because you see it as a loss of your fun without a gain or exchange. It's like a drug addict who knows his life will be so much better if he goes to AA and cleans up, but while still addicted he thinks it's all just going to be one big buzz kill for some "greater good" that they really see as mediocrity. Then after they finally do clean up for good, they look back on those days and can't figure out how they were so dumb as to think that was somehow better.

How to communicate self-improvement to a potential partner?

4 upvotes · 23 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

I'm not fully religious yet

Good. Don't be. Religiosity is what ushered in the transition from Christianity to churchianity.

RedPilled 3 weeks, redpill aware 3 months

I probably need to do a post on this, but what you said makes no sense. The Red Pill is truth. Once you're aware of the truth and accept it as truth, you're red pill. The only way I can interpret this phrase to make sense is to say that you became aware of the existence of the red pill 3 months ago, but didn't start reading content and agreeing to the truth of it until 3 weeks ago.

What I'm really guessing you mean, though, is that you started applying behaviors that you think are "red pill behaviors" about 3 weeks ago, like lifting, developing frame, etc. This is a wrong framework for understanding things.

met interesting girls. One who likes me is religious ... she requires a man to be religious

As well she should. This isn't "her issue," as if this is a problem with her. Biblically, it's foolish and unscriptural to be with a non-believer (unless you became a believer post-marriage). Of course, that doesn't actually stop most girls, which is why she's showing interest in you in the first place, despite your spiritual ambiguity. This is another reason why I believe God has men in authority rather than women. While there have certainly been situations where men have abandoned their faith for women, it is significantly less often when you see the reverse. A quick look on any dating app and you'll see in droves the number of women who profess "Christian" or "God comes first" on their profiles, who also have countless children out of wedlock, boozing it up, using drugs, etc.

I want to make sure that I'm approaching this in a full redpill manner

Then why are you bringing it up at all? The "full red pill manner" is acta non verba. I swear, people today are so screwed up with this "communication is the life blood of relationships" nonsense. Get that out of your head. Take a vow of silence for 30 days, learning to communicate solely through action (and not sign language or charades) and I guarantee your attractiveness will be much better for it.

At this stage of my life journey

I don't care about the nuance of what you actually said and how it should be interpreted. She will hear: "Oh, so he intends to stop improving in these areas at other stages in his life."

I have some weaknesses that may be relevant to your selection of a partner

i.e. "I recognize that you're the one in the position of social dominance because you get to select who you marry, and I'm just lucky to have the chance to be selected by you."

I understand that it's not ideal manners, but it's important for me to focus my efforts on XYZ first because it impacts me more in ABC ways.

i.e. "It really matters that you agree with me because I'm hung up on what you think, so I'm going to defend my position and explain to you my rationalization for exactly why I'm doing things this way, after which you will agree with me and I will feel much better once I have your approval."

If it is more pleasing to your ears

"... because my life mission is to make you happy, my dear."

I will try my best not to use swear words around you

"... because I recognize how important it is to conform my behaviors to your liking."

I do not want to misrepresent myself here, so my usage of swear words will still maintain regularity outside of our conversations

"Don't worry, I'm still going to pretend to be alpha to everyone else - but for you, I'll be as beta as you want me to be."

If it is critically important for you

"... yes, FOR YOU - because doing things FOR YOU is everything I live for"

I may make these changes in the distant future

"... FOR YOU I will make permanent changes to my life. Not for God. Not for my own well-being. I'll do it FOR YOU."

because I do see merit in how it relates to exemplary manners and character

"See how great I can rationalize pussifying myself at your feet as really a choice for me instead? Don't worry, honey. Any time you want me to change something about myself, as long as you can give me a rationalization that my hamster can get behind, I'll make the change because I can convince myself I'm doing it for me."

but I would need the space and time to make these changes of my own accord without any undue pressure

"... because I'm a pussy who isn't disciplined enough to make significant life changes without substantial space and time, and especially not under pressure. And if you are trying to pressure me at all, my desire to do it FOR YOU will be so strong that I won't be able to do it for myself because I cannot see myself apart from my desire to do things FOR YOU. But if you can stop pressuring me, then it'll be a lot easier for me to convince myself that what I'm doing FOR YOU is really for myself."

I'd love to hear your thoughts on my priorities and terms on this.

"... because I'm happy to change my priorities and terms if you think I should."

Seriously, it's crap like this that makes me see why the MRP guys throw around words like "faggot" and "autist" so much. Are you trolling us? Or do you really think this way?

As /u/OsmiumZulu said: acta non verba. Let that be your mantra.

Is my marriage salvageable?

4 upvotes · 23 October 2019 · /r/askMRP

You've already gotten a lot of good advice here:

- Stay plan is the go plan
- Recognizing incongruency in your statements
- OYS

You get the idea. Here's why none of that is going to work for you, though: you're still so stinkin' blue pill'd that your goal is to save your marriage, or in the alternative: to find happiness in life through another woman instead. This goes beyond the advice to avoid validation-seeking. This is at the very core of who you are as a man.

What's your purpose in life? What's your mission? If you have nothing to live for outside the home, then the home becomes your mission. If the home is your mission - the thing you're pursuing in life - then nobody in the home can follow you because you're chasing after them all the time. You end up looking like a dog spinning in circles trying to catch its own tail.

I'm also confused about the whole "We are only together because of our kids and religious beliefs." You claim 'religious belief' as a reason you can't get a divorce, yet wouldn't those same 'religious beliefs' also preclude cheating on your spouse, which you clearly did - and with even noting: "I didn't feel guilty." I'm not moralizing here, but just showing some serious cognitive dissonance in your own head that you've got to work through. In my view, this is really the most screwed up part about your story - not that you cheated, but that you hamster your way through idiotic rationalizations like this that are totally inconsistent with your own behaviors. Either you're going to follow your spiritual beliefs or you're going to abandon them. Choose. But don't be a luke warm kind of guy. If you choose the former, /r/RPChristians might be able to help you get your head back on straight with all this, without losing your faith in the process.

How to handle Labor / birth

4 upvotes · 17 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

Yikes! Lots of "beta up" advice here. Seriously, the whole labor and delivery thing isn't as big a deal as your wife will make it out to be. Seriously, you'd be surprised at how many cases I get where the guy doesn't even go to the hospital at all with his wife, or will just visit her and his kid for a couple hours at a time.

u/osmiumzulu is right. Don't make a big production of it all. It's definitely not the time to be a jerk, but there's no point sublimating yourself either. It's just as much your baby as hers. Help her out as she needs, but you still do you.

In MMSLP, Athol Kay talks about the difference between a fitness test and an actual need for help. Labor and delivery doesn't change all that. It just significantly raises the probability that she needs actual help. Adjust your evaluation of the dynamic accordingly.

How to Hide Your Porn

4 upvotes · 6 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

The RPC way is to stop using porn. Why make excuses? You slip up, just repent and move on.

The advice here isn't to hide anything from your spouse. It's to avoid the internal pressure toward compulsory disclosure. Too many guys assume that there's some biblical command: "Thou shalt tell thine wife all secrets and sins of your life." That command doesn't exist.

If you can get past the internal compulsion toward disclosure, then you can decide logically if you want to tell her or not. When you're 100% in control over your own decisions and not feeling compelled or under pressure, then you can decide for yourself if you want to tell her and what your motive might be for doing so. If you feel like it, do it; if you don't, don't.

The key here is that you're making your own judgment calls and not letting cultural imperatives make you feel like you have to do it. As long as you're acting of your own volition and not external pressure, you're good to do as you please. But most guys will realize that once the pressure is gone, the wiser choice is usually not to say anything.

Help! Stunned by wife

4 upvotes · 20 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Comments like this (including part 2) are why you're endorsed. Incredible work here.

What it means to be humble.

4 upvotes · 17 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

(My definition) Humility is thinking of yourself less. Humility is not thinking of yourself as less.

I've often heard it worded: "Humility is not thinking less of yourself, but thinking of yourself less often." Either way, this is a nice catch-phrase, but it's not the conclusion I reached when doing a word study on the topic in Scripture.

My definition: Living in light of an accurate perception of who you are before God and man.

If I told someone, "I'm probably the best racquetball player you've ever met," I can say this with perfect humility. Why? Because it's almost certainly true. I'm not puffing myself up beyond reality. I was the racquetball champion at my university and I've never lost a game to anyone under the age of 40 (those old guys are good, though!). I've regularly beaten professional players. Does it make me less humble to acknowledge these facts about my life? No.

The "less often" definition is a matter of frequency. It doesn't fit on the spectrum of proud - - - humble. It's on the spectrum of self-absorbed - - - - selfless. Selfish people can be humble and proud people can be selfless. In this sense, I get the impression that your post is more about a selfless person rather than a humble person.

With that in mind, I agree with the rest of your post.

If we're too concerned with ourselves, and our interests, how can we be making disciples?

Right. By definition, we are meant not for our own purposes, but for Christ's purposes for us. Christ's purpose was to the nations through disciple-making, not for us to internalize our faith (at which point it is likely not saving faith at all). Also, this phrase is preceded by the compulsion to be "one in Spirit and in purpose." That purpose is, of course, the mission of the Church which is to make disciples. So spot on there!

Be like Christ

This is the fundamental concept of discipleship. And for those who don't know how to be like Christ, we emulate others who do - "Follow me, as I follow Christ" (1 Cor. 11:1). It also encompasses the "walk as Jesus walked" concept and not merely "don't do the things Jesus said not to do" that gets preached.

Jesus knew He was God, but He didn't cling to it, or hold it up as something He might lose, or put it on a pedestal

Right, and this gets back to the core of a biblical definition of humility when you take it in the context of the passage - that God sent Jesus in the form of a man. Knowing his humanity before God, he accepted and embraced his role without complaining or bragging about his divinity. He knew that he was a man to God and God to men and fully embraced this by the way he led people, yet submitted to God. This is true humility - knowing who you are before God and man and living in that knowledge.

we should not put ourselves on a pedestal, (like you see people doing in the secular RP) but rather be humble, and be willing to serve

I'm not sure how you connected this thought from that particular section of the passage you quoted, but your thinking goes back to the self-absorbed/selfless scale here rather than the pride/humility scale.

To give a different example, I can say with perfect humility: "I probably have more success with my disciple-making than anyone else on this sub." It doesn't have to be a boast about my skill - though even Scripture says there is room for boasting of those we disciple or of our understanding and knowledge of God. Rather, I can say this in humility because I believe it is accurate and it sets the stage for my authority to speak on the matter of discipleship. If, instead I picked a random guy who has never made a disciple in his life and I said, "He may be better at disciple-making than me," I would not be humble - I would be a liar and would undermine my ability to make progress in Christ's mission over all of us.

I mean, it's not like I'm claiming to be the most humble person in the entire world - as that would clearly be prideful, right? Oh wait ... that's right, Moses made that claim about himself in Numbers 12:3! Was Moses lying about his humility because he was boasting about it, and therefore could not have actually been humble? Or was he still humble when he said this because it was an accurate statement about himself?

Just some thoughts :) Props for the post! I love the book of Philippians.

[FR] Wife goes off the rails, did I 90% pass my fitness test?

4 upvotes · 17 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

When one thing doesn't go her way, the whole world is on fire and burning around her and she normally wants everyone to die in the flames with her to feel her "pain" or "frustration".

I addressed this in detail here:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/d3s1o7/fr_unstoppable_emotional_inertia/

/u/rocknrollchuck already addressed the relevant stuff here. You're rewarding a lot of bad behavior, thinking it's the "nice guy" thing to do. You're rationalizing it as the "RP" thing to do because you're maintaining positivity in the face of her negativity. But your words betray you because it's pretty obvious from the way you write that you're using these things to try to manipulate her through gift-giving, acts of service, or all those other 5 covert contract languages.

A trick that works wonders: she's slamming things on the table asking you to answer for what she perceives as your mistakes. You pick up your 11mo and start flapping his mouth open and closed with your fingers to make it look like he's talking. "Mommy, why are you so angry? I love you mommy. Don't be mad. Are you going to slam me down too? Come here so I can spit up on you."

The thing with positivity is that it has to be your own. You tried to give her your positivity. "Here's a latte for you." "Let me get the bottle ready for you." "Maybe I should go get the baby for her." For her. For her. For her. Stop that. Don't do things for her. That's weak and women see through it every time. You. Do. You.

- If you want to get the baby because you don't want him crying alone? Go get the baby. But don't do it because you're afraid she'll be mad if you don't.
- If you want to get a bottle ready for the baby because you're a responsible adult who takes care of his kids, then do it. But not because you're afraid of how she'll react if you don't help her out.
- If you want to buy her a latte because she's been good to you and deserves a reward, then do it. But not because you feel like you have to placate her anger and it might cheer her up a bit.

I went out to the mall the other day to buy my wife some "care package" stuff. I got her cookie-dough lip balm and some face cream from a local cosmetics store at our mall. I also bought her a "stress relief" and "bluberry maple pancakes" scented candles. I also got her a bag of taffy and chocolates. All of this was about $40. She's been working hard and deserved a treat.

On my way out of the mall she calls me up furious that I'm not home yet. Did I give her the care package to cheer her up and prove that I was really doing a good thing for her so she shouldn't be mad? You'd better believe I did NOT! I don't reward bad behavior. Instead, I played a practical joke on her and all the kids laughed. She pretended to be frustrated, but eventually caved and started laughing too, even though she was the butt of the joke. I didn't play a practical joke to cheer her up - if anything, I appropriately expected her to feel even more upset by being picked on. But I knew that whatever was going on in her, my positivity would override it - especially once I got the kids to be positive with me. She felt the fun in the room and joined in, despite nobody doing anything to her or for her to cheer her up or make her life better.

She then went back to work in our home office in a good mood. She was back in a context where I wanted to reward her hard work. But I still didn't give the treats to her right then - I set them up in the driver's seat of her car so she'd find them when she got up in the morning to take the kids to school/daycare; a time when she's in the midst of doing things helpful to me and likely mildly stressed out, so as to communicate: "You're doing good work right now," rather than rewarding past service, her past bad attitude, contemplating prospective service, etc. It was a fun surprise for her. It didn't come with a grin on my face demanding validation or praise in return. I wasn't even there when she got it - and that was intentional. It let her know that, yes, my time at the mall was for her benefit and therefore she should have felt dumb for getting mad at me over it - but also reminded her that I could have given these to her the night before, but didn't, further affirming that she won't be rewarded after bad behavior.

And I just got back from a client meeting that cut me off before I finished, so I can't remember where I was going with this. Enjoy as far as I got.

That Girl at Work

4 upvotes · 5 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

When you have sufficient abundance, this stuff won't matter. Right now you're probably thinking, "This is awesome! There's another girl in the world who would be all over me!" When you've had 25+ girls act that way toward you within a year (i.e. about one every other week) you stop caring. You don't need the validation. You know you're the prize and your thoughts become: "Geeze, another one? What are these girls so desperate for?"

You see, this is how attractive girls are all the time. They have so many guys eyeing them that it's no longer cool. It's creepy. Unless he's one of the top guys who's ever eye-banged her, and then it's fantastic.

I've lived there at different points in my RP journey. I've also had moments like right now where I'm falling behind and it stops. Gotta get those lifts up, bro. What are you doing putting an 11-rep max on your stats? 1 rep max (ORM) or 5 rep sets - that's what matters. Get your ORM up to 250, minimum. You taking protein shakes yet? Do it. I went 7 years without lifting (i.e. since college) and got my ORM up from 135 to 275 in 6 months with nothing but protein shakes and the SL5x5. You've been hanging around for at least a month. There's no excuses not to be at least 10lbs up on your bench a week for the next 2 months - and I find it hard to believe you started at 65lbs.

I've had enough conversations with you to know you know a good bit of theory. You're developing a frame and learning how to pass tests. Good for you. But your base stats are your lowest hanging fruit. Figure that out in the next 3 months and that's where your biggest improvements will come from. Take a before picture of yourself today, and take a video of yourself benching your ORM. 3 months from now I want you to show both of the before/after sets to someone at your gym (yeah, that means you gotta work on your social game to meet someone at your gym first) to hold you accountable. Go.

On Frame: Punishing Your Wife

4 upvotes · 27 August 2019 · /r/askRPC

Good word, brother. This is the type of content that belongs on the main sub. As is occasionally brought up on RPC and MRP, the concept of withdrawing attention is not in the moment as a punishment, but after the fact as an internal expression of how much time you want to spend with someone who treats you poorly. We don't let someone else's actions dictate our behaviors, even (especially?) if we think we're doing it to prove a point of our authority or individuality against them.

Ok, I'll bite: To confess my cheating or not?

4 upvotes · 27 August 2019 · /r/askRPC

She is under the impression she's married to a certain person, someone who is faithful and has kept their vows. If that's not true, you are lying to her every day you let her think that.

Does this not ignore the possibility of Christ's transforming work? Maybe a year ago he was that person. But today, if he is truly changed by Christ and is not that person anymore, is he really lying about who he is today? This position seems to undermine "the old has gone, the new has come."

[32F] "I'm a beautiful, successful single mother who's struggled BIG TIME to find a good man, and I'm losing hope."

4 upvotes · 20 August 2019 · /r/WhereAreAllTheGoodMen

You didn't underline the best part: "Everyone looks at me as a success story, a strong woman who's [sic] life is so together. I am painfully lonely and losing hope."

This is what feminism does to you so-called "strong women." God luck with that. I love women. Feminism doesn't love women; it loves power. Never confuse the two.

Looking for advice, Need help. +Apology.

4 upvotes · 15 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'll open the door if you want to explain your rationale. No threat of banning if it's in this thread, as long as you're explaining yourself and not trying to convince everyone else on this forum to hold the view. I'm interested in how you arrived at this conclusion.

The more I think about it, the more genius that God's creation of man and woman becomes

4 upvotes · 12 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right, exactly as it was with Adam and God in the garden before sin.

RP Christians for Women - Cultivating Gratitude / The Power of Fasting

4 upvotes · 6 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Solid advice. You've included good counsel for the women here on an issue that intersects both relational and spiritual development.

For those who haven't given up carbonated beverages already, do it. With limited exception, I stopped making any regular use of them back in college. The same goes for alcohol - which is about a once every couple weeks thing. I'm a little more flexible with things like gatorade, but even that is uncommon.

I will note: when I've done a study on fasting in the past, I found that it's less about us getting anything from God or growing or developing in our spiritual journey or any other self-building purpose. It's one of the few areas of our faith that is truly meant to be expressive toward God. It's about showing our Father how truly sincere we are, the same way a mob might go on a hunger strike and chain themselves to a tree. The goal here isn't necessarily to change God's mind, but to express our spirit. Ever see someone do something that makes no sense and seems kind of foolish, and you ask him why he's doing it and he simply answers, "Because I must"? That's kind of what fasting is like - and meant to be.

In this sense, it's one of the few places where emotionalism truly has a place. As much as I preach against it, my fight against emotionalism isn't to say that all emotions in our faith are wrong - rather, making those emotions a primary pursuit is what's dangerous. Fasting just to fast is worthless. Fasting for the peripheral benefits is also worthless on a spiritual level. Fasting to feel good about yourself is also worthless. But fasting because something is gravely important to us - so much so that we feel compelled to express that importance - can be a truly powerful way to demonstrate the sincerity of our faith. If that sincerity happens to have an impact, all the better.

To that end, fasting is a perfectly appropriate way for a woman to express to her husband how important the issue is. It's submissive. It doesn't lord her wants and wishes over him. It doesn't insist that he comply with her requests or even join her in the fast, as you say. It is something she does on her own without flaunting it that reminds her regularly that a matter is important. And if her husband takes notice, he will see through her submissiveness and fasting how truly important the issue is and be able to make an informed decision. That type of information does not come when a wife makes request after request to her husband and he has no way of knowing which ones are truly important to her from the ones that are passing thoughts. And just as our Father may still decide not to comply with the results of our fast (as was the case with David fasting for the life of his son), at least a wife will know that she has expressed herself fully and in a respectful manner that did not pressure her husband, but informed him through sincerity without withholding anything from her - only from herself. And the man should do this for Christ as well - even to the point of modeling this form of submissive expression for her to follow.

I've written more about this here:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/blrqw7/share_your_experiences_with_fasting/emr4wi7/

The "Closer to God" Myth

4 upvotes · 3 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right on. If it helps add clarity ...

Christ came to fulfill the law, not to replace it

This can only make sense in completion if we understand the old testament as the symbolic roadmap to understanding the new testament. The old testament laws are "gone" in the sense that the physical requirements of the law are fulfilled and no longer apply - but the spiritual truth behind them still applies. And this is true not only for the law, but all of God's doings of the old testament, from Adam to Malachi.

So, I'm not so inclined to tell another believer: "Thou shalt not steal, so get your filthy paws off that candy bar!" and more inclined to say, "God wants you to develop the type of character that knows how to earn a fair wage to provide for yourself so that you'll never be worried about stealing in the first place."

This is the difference between following the letter of the law and developing the character the law was designed to instill in us. The law tells us what that character looks like, but the Holy Spirit is the one who actually gives us the character. So while the law can emulate what good character should look like, only the Holy Spirit can actually give us good character. The emulation is the road map/tangible expression - the real thing is the spiritual work. This is true everywhere in Scripture and not just the law and commandments - the things of the Old Testament are, as Hebrews puts it, "copies" and "shadows" of the "heavenly things."

The "Closer to God" Myth

4 upvotes · 3 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Notice that I didn't say we should ignore the relational aspect. Only that it's not the over-glorified mega-priority #1 that churchianity makes it out to be.

In reality, I can't produce children without my wife and she can't produce children without me. There has to be an intimate sexual relationship to get there. We have to have an intimate relationship with Christ in order to produce spiritual offspring, and we have to be on the same page relationally in order to raise them effectively. They do go hand in hand.

But the point of the relationship is to produce disciples, just as Malachi 2:15 says the point of marriage is to produce offspring. Churchianity gets it backwards - they try to get a stronger relationship all the time and try to use obedience as a tool to get it. Look at the r/TrueChristian post and you'll see countless comments making this exact mistake.

That's a woman's way of thinking, not Christ's intent for us. Women use sex to get relationship and commitment. Churchianity uses spiritual reproduction as a way to feel closer to God. Yes, it can have that impact - and maybe that's okay. Maybe I'm the one who's wrong because we are the bride of Christ and not the groom, and therefore it's okay to want to use Jesus to get our feels. But something tells me we're to aspire to more - that the ultimate goal is Christ's mission regardless of our feels, and if the feels come along the way and inspire us, all the better. A wife should be with her husband whether she feels it or not, but it's better when she does. Right?

Household Finances

4 upvotes · 29 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

"Are you asking me?" I replied that I was telling her what I intended to do

Yes, because every woman loves hearing, "I don't ask you for permission woman, I tell you!" Your frame presents like a splintered board. It's flimsy, but you're hoping no one will try to break it because it'll cut them if they try to punch through.

Better response: "Yes, mommy. May I please have permission to spend our dollars on a new toy?" Then laugh it off.

I said grace and then fed the 10mo so my wife could down her food. The disrespect kept escalating.

So you decide to serve her needs like a good beta and somehow she ends up disrespecting you?!? Who knew!

I can't have sex with a man I can't trust

Well, at least one guy on MRP would agree with her.

The reality is that she trusts men who she's attracted to. Women are emotional and make decisions based on gut impulses rather than intellectual wisdom. If her emotions feel right toward a man, she trusts him because she trusts her own emotions. If she finds a man attractive, her emotions feel right toward him. But her brain rationalizes this through other hurdles because her gut knows that no one will give her any credit if she explained the truth. Instead, she rationalizes her non-attraction to you through ways that normal people would call "untrustworthy behavior," like not telling her where you're going or how long you'll be gone. For an attractive man, she wouldn't care. You think she would. She wouldn't. Why? Because she'd trust him. She doesn't need to know where a trustworthy man has been for the last 6 hours. See how that works? The trust issue has nothing to do with how long you're gone without telling her.

scheduled for a call that evening with a buddy of mine who's also a financial counselor

Good, so you're on the ball with that move. Cancel the call.

To hear my wife saying out loud that she desired to be ... it turns out, she honestly wants to be them

Uh huh. Women were created for these things, but they're also tainted by sin to have urges against them.

Here's the real problem: you're letting her words mean too much to you. Yes, it was a nice little shot of validation in the moment, but the fact is that she's not going to suddenly start becoming any of those things - at least not for longer than a week or two.

No, we did not have sex after that phone call, but there was a sense of unity and focus on fixing our marriage

Uh huh ... because apparently "fixing our marriage" doesn't involve having sex after a phone call. It involves the incredible emotional intimacy that you both felt in that moment, just as long as sex doesn't have to be part of it. You're caving into the feminist notion that good marriages are built on emotional connectivity to the other person, and I'm guessing that you still believe that if you can resolve all the emotional problems that the sex will be worked out as a byproduct, right?

"If we can keep connecting on this intimate of a level like that, then eventually she'll feel comfortable enough around me to want to have sex again." It's a lie. Don't believe it.

Good marriages are not built on emotional connectivity. They're not founded on trust or communication or any of those things. A good marriage has attraction as its most fundamental quality.

Would you marry an uggo? Would she marry a fat slob? No. But what about the 400lb ugly girl who you would trust with your life and who is really good at conversation? Would you marry her? If you were married to her, would you be excited to stay married or would you be eyeing other women?

Likewise, look at every 300lb video game geek who works at a grocery store with a hot cashier. They talk like they're besties. But is she going to marry him? No. Why not? She trusts him. They have great conversation. She feels emotionally validated by the things he says to her. But she's not attracted to him. And if she did find herself married to him, you'd better believe she's looking at other men.

Attraction is the most important quality that binds together a good marriage. Don't buy into the lie that emotional intimacy and open communication are a substitute. It's easy to believe that right now because those two things just happened in your marriage and your emotions tell you things are getting better, but you've already said that none of these things made her vagina any wetter. Focus on what she does, not what she says. She did not have sex. Even if she SAYS she will want to have sex if she feels more emotionally connected, you now have proof that great emotional connectivity did not result in great sex.

quick tag

If you tag more than 3 people reddit doesn't send any notifications at all.

How do I prevent myself from acquiescing to the girl I'm dating

4 upvotes · 22 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'll lead when I believe it's important, but picking out a flavor of ice cream is not something I want to be aggressive about Right, this makes logical sense. But women follow the mindset: "If he's not a good leader over small things, he won't be a good leader over big things." It follows Jesus' advice: "Whoever can be trusted with very little can also be trusted with much" (Luke 16:10). While you think you'll "step up to the plate" when bigger things come around, the reality is that you're communicating you aren't a good leader on the details.

I just moved houses on Saturday. We spent yesterday unpacking. My wife wanted to take over and start deciding where things go on the walls, where to put furniture, etc. It was stressing her out, but as a woman she thinks that's her default job: to decorate the house. Frankly, I don't care whether the white painting gets hung on this wall or that. But I made clear decisions anyway because:

- It's my house and I'm ultimately responsible. I will not be relegated to a "man cave" in the basement.
- Giving her carte blanche over all that minute garbage makes her feel like it's her house and she's responsible.
- My making decisions takes the stress off her and puts it on me - but since I don't really care, there is no actual stress, so neither of us get stressed by that part.
- Being clear and decisive about small things matters to her when she's deciding if I can be trusted over bigger things.

she decided that she couldn't handle a dating relationship while her mom while her mom is likely going to die soon

I.e. "Normally I want a guy who can comfort me through stuff like this, but I really just want out, so I'm going to take the excuse while it's here."

However I can't help but feel like people, especially those I'm dating, would interpret my generally more targeted display of more "alpha" passion and mission as not being aggressive enough and trying to be a people pleaser.

Right, because you've already admitted that you're not generally a decisive person. You're only decisive on things you actually care about. Everyone has that - even women. You have to learn to be decisive about the things that she cares about. And women care about everything. My wife ordered the wrong sub for me on moving day for lunch. She felt so bad started to get really upset about it. It's a sub. I don't care. But for her that small little thing was a huge deal. Which ice cream you like might be a massive ordeal in her mind. It doesn't make logical sense. It makes emotional sense. Figure that out and accept it as the reality of how women work.

it makes me think these women have had less than an ideal level of respect for me

Right, because women respect a man who is decisive and wise. Just being blindly decisive won't help much, though blind decisiveness is still better than indecisiveness.

emotionally tough nuts to crack, I'm a very open person

So you vomit your feels on them, using them as your personal therapist, and then they're disgusted by you. And you're surprised?

Or perhaps your openness is more positive of all the things you're hopeful about - your life dreams and all that. And she hears about everything you intend down the road, then looks at where you are and isn't impressed by the progress.

I really can't say without knowing what type of "open book" you are, but generally speaking, being an open book decreases respect. You're trying to fabricate an emotional connection because sharing is how you feel an emotional connection, but women don't get their feels by receiving what you share; they get it by sharing what they're feeling with you. You need to do less telling and more asking. Learn the art of drawing emotions out of women through engaging questions and not interesting conversation pieces about yourself or anything else.

How do I maintain my more selectively opinionated and passionate personality which is where I connect with how God made me personally, while also being "alpha" and maintaining a sense that I'm very much in control

Let me rephrase: "How do I be selectively alpha only over a few things, but have everyone still think I'm alpha?" Hopefully that rewording makes the answer more obvious.

both of these women were the kind to be less open, more introverted and slower paced

I seriously doubt that.

Their lack of emotional and physical intimacy is troublesome. I don't want my type to be women who take a long time to open up

That's not your "type." It's your output from the input you're giving. Women are generally very easy to understand. They just lie to you about themselves so they seem complicated. That's why you can't trust all those "research studies" that base their information on questionnaires. Or many of them simply don't understand how their own "selves" work, which makes it seem confusing because she doesn't know what she wants.

Learn what makes women tick and you'll be able to predict with incredible accuracy how they will respond when you act a certain way. This is all on the sidebar both here and on the other RP subs. Get to reading.

Their lack of emotional and physical intimacy is troublesome

They don't lack these things. You lack the ability to draw it out of them. Many women do not just throw these things at the first guy they meet. They test you. If you prove yourself, then you get these things from them in return.

They only dated one or two people and married them

That's not easy mode. That's insecurity causing them to settle for the first thing rather than strive for the best thing.

very happy and fulfilling relationships by their own account

Yes, "by their own account." Very few people are willing to share their marriage struggles - especially blue pill guys. They wrap their entire self-worth into the success of their marriage. They then must persuade themselves that they are happily married because an unhappy marriage would make them feel worthless and a fool. But because they're so wrapped up in what other people think of them over their own frame/views/opinions, the only way for them to be happy about their own marriage is to get other people to validate them in their marriage. How do they do that? By telling you how great and happy they are in their marriage. Many of these people feel an incredible cognitive dissonance between their surface-level belief that they're happy and the repressed resentment they feel toward their spouse, which comes out in a variety of ways. The most common are pornography, food, and video games. They don't realize it, but these vices are the tangible evidence of their marital dissatisfaction, functioning as a coping mechanism so their conscious brain doesn't have to accept the reality that they're truly unhappy. As a result, they try to target their unhappiness to specific things. Instead of being generally unhappy, they say, "We'd have a perfect marriage if it wasn't for this one thing that we're dealing with." That one thing is almost always tied to sex or respect lacking in some way.

How do I flip the script I've been playing out and have girls going crazy over me (but not needy and insane)?

Lift, sidebar.

[30F] "My fiancé wants to call off the wedding because he found out I slept around when I was younger."

4 upvotes · 17 July 2019 · /r/WhereAreAllTheGoodMen

There's a mod button called "ignore reports" that prevents the reports from showing up anymore. Enjoy.

Question regarding men being the ruler of the family

4 upvotes · 15 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

So we're not reinventing the wheel, /u/Deep_Strength did a full post on this very question almost exactly 1 year ago today (3 days over):

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/8ye7p1/biblical_textual_analysis_of_why_adam_had/

While his conclusion is based on textual evidence from Genesis, the same conclusion can also be reached from a modeling perspective as well. Genesis 1 says we're made in God's image. Jesus says he lives in the model God gives him. The entire new testament says we are to model the example Christ set for us, reflecting his image to the world. Ephesians says that the relationship between Christ and the church is a model for human marriages as well.

The model we see is that Christ is head over his church. This is not a product of the fall. This is not a broken system that will be restored in heaven when the church is considered equal with Christ (it isn't!) or even that the church gets to be head over Christ (it won't!). It was always true that Christ would be head over the church. As such, it's always true that a groom is head over his bride - and this structure transcends the fall.

The part of Genesis 3 that you quoted as the curse isn't the headship orientation, but the desire orientation. This is most obvious from Genesis 4 when it says the exact same thing in regard to sin:

- 3:16 - "Your desire will be for your husband, and he will rule over you"
- 4:7 - "it [sin] desires to have you, but you must rule over it"

The phrasing in the Hebrew is almost identical between those two verses with only the subject and object being changed (you/sin and your husband/you). Adam had already been given dominion over all things. But sin's desire to have us is a product of the fall, just as a woman's desire to control her husband is the curse of the fall.

It's also my personal belief that the "curse" isn't so much an alteration of reality (except in the case of the serpent) as it is a statement of the natural consequences of sin - and the particular type of sin committed, at that. But that's a longer conversation.

As for submissiveness, a lot of this depends on your definition of "submissive." Paul preached that we should submit to our governing authorities (Romans 13), but wrote this during the reign of Nero who was ordering Christians to be killed. Was he saying that Christians should have been killing each other per Nero's decrees? Obviously not. In the same way, it's hard to interpret submissiveness as "obey every command," as many people take it.

Biblically, submissiveness seems to be not a behavior, but a character trait.

- Someone can give $1,000 to charity and not be generous. A woman can obey her husband and not be submissive.
- A guy can refuse a legitimate beggar's request and still be generous, just as a wife can refuse her husband's request and still be submissive.

I get frustrated when guys seem to take an attitude that submissive means "she must obey me always at all times, blindly and without question, whether she likes it or not." Many rulers over the ages have accomplished this from their subjects without submissiveness in the biblical sense. They submit, but are not themselves submissive.

Submissiveness is more about the softness of her heart toward you and a respect for your leadership and authority. As much as I'd love to say it's tied to her ability to follow a man's mission, it's not. Paul did not follow the mission of Caesar Nero when he suggested submitting to his authority. But when he was imprisoned (even wrongly!) and had the opportunity to leave, he didn't. He remained in jail and his submissiveness won over the jailor to Christ (affirming the 1 Peter 3 advice), thereby advancing PAUL'S MISSION (which is the mission of Christ). He respected the authority the jailor had over his freedom and did not fight against it in a head-to-head collision, just as a wife constantly butting heads with her husband is not submissive. In fact, the apostles and Jesus constantly attempted to evade capture from the authorities, yet even Jesus submitted to torture and execution once caught, just as Paul remained in jail when he had the chance to be freed.

- As an aside, let me be clear: this is part of why I believe Jesus had to be tortured and not merely crucified. Jesus could have submitted only to the crucifixion and still saved humanity, as the sacrifice was sufficient. His torture was not necessary to the Gospel. But it was necessary to set an example for us and show his submissiveness to the authorities. No one can say, "Jesus's submissiveness doesn't count because he had to be on the cross to fulfill God's purpose for him in salvation," because the lashes he received (which he could have spared himself with a word) doesn't fit into this model.

- Jesus's words to Pilate also reveal a lot about his view of submissiveness. He did not obey Pilate merely because Pilate had the force of power over him, as Jesus plainly says Pilate had no power of his own. Instead, Jesus says Pilate only held his position because God placed him there. As a result, Jesus respected Pilate's authority and willingly entered into great harm because of his trust in God's leadership and the purposes God had for the situation and the people God put in place to carry out those purposes. This softness toward the situation (rather than angry defiance) is what is extremely noteworthy about Jesus' entire torture and crucifixion scene and demonstrates the type of submissiveness of heart that women should maintain even toward abusive husbands.
 - Side note on that: I do not condone physical abuse in a marriage. However, physical abuse is not given as a reason for divorce in the Bible. The model of Jesus is that he submitted even to an abusive authority he hadn't chosen - how much more a woman to an authority over her who she did choose and agree to marry. 1 Peter 3's advice is that this submissiveness is the best strategy for winning over an unbelieving husband, just as Paul evidenced with the jailor that his submissiveness is what won that jailor over. That doesn't mean safeguards shouldn't be put in place; but Paul's attitude toward the jailor was one of compassion and love for his authority, just as Jesus spoke on the cross: "Lord, forgive them for they know not what they do" as he was literally in the process of being murdered by them.

In light of all of this, we see readily that Jesus and the apostles had an attitude of submissiveness toward their governing authorities, but didn't necessarily obey every single command and often even attempted to evade getting caught for their non-conforming behaviors. If you've got a crappy mission that doesn't involve making disciples and a wife is on board with the great commission, then I imagine this is the dichotomy you can expect in your marriage. If you've got the great mission of disciple-making, then I can't imagine a reason why both submissiveness and obedience couldn't go hand-in-hand.

In the same way, submissiveness for a wife is not a measure of her adherence to her husband's authority, but the degree of respect and trust she has for him personally and the extent to which she will do anything and everything for him, even if she believes he is wrong, just as I was willing to move across the country at the encouragement of the guy who disciplined me in college to whom I was submissive. I did it not because he had authority to order me to do so, but because I loved and respected him so much that I would have followed virtually any leadership decision he offered. And although I at times believed he may have been wrong, I knew him well enough to know that if there was a genuine dispute on a matter, he probably knew better than I did, so I trusted his word over my own understanding - and on most of those disputes I discovered years later that he was the right one after all.

I'm rambling and have written this in about 8 different waves as I keep getting distracted at work, so maybe it's not all that coherent and I'm too low on time to edit it. My main point is that submissiveness is a character trait just like humility, patience, anger, kindness, etc., and it cannot be measured by behavior, but by demeanor. So, when you say that men are to lead and women are to be submissive before the fall, this is not merely a "rule-maker/rule-obeyer" dynamic; rather, the leadership of men is a character trait that inspires others to behave differently than they otherwise would, and the submissiveness of women is a character trait that inspires them to respond to others differently than they otherwise would.

The "rule-maker/rule-obeyer" dynamic is certainly present in Scripture as well, and was also intended by God before the fall. But the character traits of leadership and submissiveness were present in Adam/Eve before the fall by virtue of their being sinless and the sin itself was the breaking of these qualities.

Jekyll and Hyde

4 upvotes · 2 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Unfortunately, that's all the questioner gave me, and there's no real mechanism for asking for clarification to the original question-asker.

I can only assume he's talking about how men in his church perceive their wives as having drastic mood swings without understanding why they're having those mood swings. Their allusion to hormones tells me they're blaming it on PMS or something like that rather than taking responsibility for being unattractive drunk captains. But that's just guess-work.

They have appropriately noticed a phenomenon happening consistently among several marriages, but blame it on something they can't control in order to avoid doing anything to fix it through the things they can control. But their question as to how Scripture handles female interactions with men is certainly a valid one - I just wouldn't go in with the presumption that Scripture agrees with them that women are designed by God to have a Jekyll/Hyde dynamic to their personalities.

Tips on denominations & finding men's groups?

4 upvotes · 29 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

More important than finding the right denomination is finding the right guy to disciple you. Is there anyone in your life who makes you think: "That guy's got his stuff together. He's strong, confident, godly, and making a difference for eternity. I want my life to be like his someday"?

If you do have that guy in your life right now, go ask him to disciple you. If he won't, follow him around anyway. Learn from him passively. When you're ready, start discipling other men and living a mission on your own. In the meantime, chill with the guys here and raise up some local guys to be on the same mission with you. It's a life-long journey and you're not going to find a permanent resting home from most of today's congregations - certainly not after only a few months of looking around.

Let me simply say that the Catholics, Orthodox, and Protestants (all denominations) are screwed up in some ways, but also have strengths that the others don't have. Rather than committing to one particular line of theology, learn what they all have to say. Pray diligently with godly counsel and discern from Scripture for yourself who's got what right. Don't take someone's word for it just because they're from your denomination of choice. Let the Bible dominate. Every denomination will say they're the most biblical, but ALL of them also compromise their credibility somewhere to make their core beliefs coherent with the rest of their theological framework.

Always be less interested in theological technicalities than you are in the character of the people you're living alongside. Unless the Gospel is compromised, I'd take a group of faithful, available, and teachable believers who have a lot of bad theology over the stagnant intellectuals any day. Any day.

Red Pill Church site?

4 upvotes · 20 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

There is no such thing as a non red pill church. There is Christ. Christ is truth. The red pill is about understanding truth and applying it in our lives and relationships. The singular Church is Christ's church - his kingdom.

There are a lot of babies in that kingdom who think they're mature and know the truth. They're wrong.

But I suspect you're really asking, "Is there a congregation in my area whose teachings are consistent with what is taught on RPC?" I have no clue. I don't live there ;)

A testimonial epiphany...

4 upvotes · 8 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm glad for you, brother.

It sounds like you've been studying for a while, but haven't been applying for long. "I am my own judge" (or the RPC/1 Cor. 4:3-4 twist) is found in NMMNG and WISNIFG, which should have been the first two books you read.

My guess is that the results you're seeing right now are actually a necessary step in the wrong direction.

For the first time, your wife is noticing a change. She likes it. She's rewarding you. "Good little boy. You're finally making the changes I've been telling you to make for years. Let me give you a treat."

This isn't a bad thing. It comes with some great sex - and good sex is still good sex. But many men see this initial improvement wane for a time before the long-term demonstration of frame brings it back with improvement.

Keep up the good work. I hope I'm wrong and that you're already on the final and long-term upswing. But enjoy it all the same either way.

How do I receive the fruits of the spirit? And dealing with resent towards women

4 upvotes · 31 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I would love to help in the spiritual mission of bringing others to Christ in the future, but the problem is I don't even fully believe all the stuff

I know it's going to sound weird, but ... so? Paul says this weird thing in Philippians 1:15-18 - "It is true that some preach Christ out of envy and rivalry ... out of selfish ambition, not sincerely, supposing that they can stir up trouble for me while I am in chains. But what does it matter? The important thing is that in every way, whether from false motives or true, Christ is preached. And because of this I rejoice."

I'd rather you believe and preach - but if preaching Christ is all we get, I can rejoice alongside you for that as well. That said, my guess is that as you preach Christ your faith will be more and more established as well.

I'd believe in the Christian God under a certain set of circumstances

Yes, because I will only believe that molecules exist if they'll dance in circles with party hats in such density that they spell out "molecules exist" in the sky. I don't get to set the terms on how truth presents itself. Either molecules exist or they don't. Either God exists or he doesn't. Molecules don't bend to my will to prove themselves. Neither does God.

then those circumstances came to pass

And then there's grace - so much undeserved favor here. It's truly beautiful.

I only believe that intellectually. I've come to the conclusion that I have no faith

In the parable of the sower, this is the seed that springs up on dry ground, but has no roots. There is no depth or substance to it, so it soon withers away, as evidenced by your following sentences.

any repentance is only intellectual and not from a feeling of true sorrow

What makes you think repentance has to come from an emotional place? Don't succumb to the emotionalism that has invaded mainstream churchianity. You don't need some weeping tears moment. You need a resolute conviction to do and be better. That's why they call it "conviction" of the Holy Spirit, not "pangs of emotional regret of the Spirit."

I lack faith, and faith is a fruit of the spirit

Interestingly, it's not. Faithfulness is part of the fruit of the Spirit (also note that it's one singular fruit of the Spirit, not many fruits of the Spirit). Faith doesn't make sense if it's not in the context of faithfulness.

Faithfulness is about what your beliefs prompt you to do. While it may lead to the same conclusion for you right now, it's a different framework for perceiving things that might help.

If someone threatened to kill you and your family, do you believe him? If you do, you're going to do something about it. If not, you're going to ignore his threat and end up dead.

How do I receive the gift of faith, to truly believe in Christianity, because I do not believe it is something I can intellectually convince myself to do.

First, find someone to disciple you. You're dry ground right now. Someone needs to till you to soften your heart so you can become good soil, able to receive God's Word.

Second, start living as if the Bible is true. "But that's legalism!" everyone screams. Yeah, and deal with it. God was legalistic through humanity's infancy - even to the point of establishing the very definition of legalism as his covenant with Moses and the generations that followed. Legalism is often a necessary starting point before people can mature enough to grasp the spiritual meat beyond the milk of legalism.

If it helps, my kids don't have a clue why I tell them to go to bed each night. They hate going to bed. I explain it countless different ways and they still don't get it. I remember being like that as a kid too. Then, after I matured, I started to understand the value of sleep and giving our bodies the ability to replenish themselves. I didn't go to bed simply because my parents told me to, but because I appreciated the value in it. Legalism leads to authenticity much the same way. That's also why there's really no good rejection of Pascal's wager.

Does it just come down to reading the Bible and praying more? Because admittedly, I hardly do any of those things.

No, it comes from faithfulness - living as if the Bible is true. Of course, you have to pray and read your Bible to know what truths to be living in the first place.

Imagine a guy coming onto a red pill forum and refusing to read any sidebar material or posts from veterans and then saying, "How can I be red pill?" You have to read the content to grasp the concepts. But this works on another level too: because men are not red pill who act a certain way, but who understand the truth and let that guide their actions. In the same way, one isn't a Christian simply because of how he behaves, but because he understands the truth and lets that guide his actions.

I have resentment towards women now

Sure, and I resent dogs. Their smell is disgusting and their pet dander makes my eyes itchy and nose runny/sneezy. They're wet and slobbery and always want to cuddle up to you when you want nothing to do with them, or they'll run away when you actually try to get their attention. Dogs are the worst. But they're still just dogs. A dog's gonna do what a dog's gonna do. And a lot of people love them anyway, so I'm over it. If someone keeps a dog in their house, oh well. That's their decision. It's not like I'm going to hate their dog. I'll just stay away, personally.

I saw that most girls saw me as a tool to use for their own social advancement, and not a real person

Yeah, just as you see most girls as an object for your own sexual gratification, and not a real person.

Don't lie. We all do it. That's not to say we try to objectify women intentionally, but it's inherent that when I see a hot girl on the street I'm more interested in how she looks to me and what I'd do with her body than in the types of conversations we might have if we were to start chatting.

Women use men. Men use women. This is the nature of the universe, my friend. Blue pill men are the only ones who allegedly care for women simply for who they are. But remember that the whole point of the blue pill is that they're lying to themselves and don't even realize it. A red pill man embraces the fact that he wants to use a woman for her body, just as she wants to use him for her social status - and we're okay with that.

That doesn't mean that's the only basis for any connection. Other ways of relating can be simultaneously true too. I do enjoy teasing my wife and having conversations about life, the Bible, etc. with her. The fact that I want to use her body for my sexual pleasure or that she wants to use me to improve her social stature doesn't somehow diminish the value of the other dynamics at play. It's a blue pill lie that says it must be all-or-nothing. To that end, maintaining this resentment toward women is still very much a blue pill reaction. It's like the red pill got lodged in your throat and you're angry because you can't actually swallow and digest it, but you can't spit it up either.

I swear, not lifting must be a sin

4 upvotes · 11 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Totally wrong, brother. Jesus didn't walk everywhere. He rode a donkey from outside Jerusalem to inside Jerusalem one time. That was like ... you know, at least 100 less calories he burned over his lifetime than if he were to have walked it.

Rachel Held Evans, Influential "Christian" Feminist Egalitarian, Dead at 37

4 upvotes · 6 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good on you - not sure why you got downvoted for ending a fruitless debate.

But let me add one more note: when Satan will be vanquished, it will be terrifying and tragic for all the fallen angels who supported him and his cause. Does this mean Christians should not rejoice in this?

That's not to say this woman was the devil - the point is simply that if there's an extreme example where rejoicing in the fall of an enemy of God, then there's a line somewhere over which it's okay to rejoice in these things. Where is that line?

From there, I don't buy the whole "she had kids, therefore this must be viewed as a tragedy and not a win for God's Kingdom" argument. Sure, from her kids' perspective, this is a grave loss. But her kids aren't the center of the universe. We're not meant to view all things in the world through their eyes. This is a highly liberal and emotionalist approach to the situation. In reality, we are to view things through God's eyes.

Didn't God know the day she would die? Did he not have the ability to spare her if it would have pleased him to do so? And yet he didn't. Does God not love her children every bit as much as he loved her and every one of us? Perhaps God rejoices because her children are less likely to be led astray - I don't know. All I'm saying is that we can't use her kids as pawns to guilt people into having a particular emotional reaction.

We must view the situation through God's eyes and no one else's.

Tag: /u/OsmiumZulu

How to take women's votes away to save them and society.

4 upvotes · 2 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I can't speak for every user here, but as the creator of this sub I can tell you that my personal view is this:

- we live in a fallen world, which means fallen governmental structures. Even old testament Israel was broken during the time of the prophets.
- when God sent Jesus, it wasn't to fix political structures, but to create a new spiritual kingdom altogether. Jesus acknowledged that the political structure that put Pilate in a position of governmental authority to kill the Son of God ... was still given its authority by God himself. Jesus consistently declined to give focus in his ministry to revamping politics.
- the apostles had significant influence throughout the world, but never recorded any urge to fix broken political structures. They did urge submission to governing authorities.

- historically, when the church did start pushing for political power, it became very corrupt and compromised the gospel.
- all of these things happened in a time when individual votes didn't exist or matter and there was no broad freedom of speech.
- I personally believe as a matter of philosophy and not theology that the US would have a more godly political outcome if female suffrage were repealed and that there is nothing wrong with exercising one's vote and freedom of speech to that end. But I'm not mad or angry about the female right to vote either - fallen men will make fallen decisions too. It's a fact of life that I doubt will change in my lifetime, unworthy of wasting time and effort when we could instead focus on sanctifying women through godly marriages and make use of the vote we know they're going to get anyway.
- I also believe that as believers we have an obligation to use the authority God has granted us to reconcile the world to his ways, not just people. This includes politics. But that doesn't mean all people must have the same political philosophies, as God has never endorsed a human led political structure in the first place.

At the end of the day, political decisions will never solve spiritual problems. I'm more interested in the spiritual problems and living out solutions. While politics can be important, it's more a hobby than a life mission.

God uses dread, and it works.

4 upvotes · 30 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

That's not how dread works. The concept of dread is about shifting the balance of power and attraction in a relationship. Most women know that they could find another guy to have sex with at the drop of a hat. This makes them feel empowered in the relationship because they don't need you for sexual fulfillment, but blue pill men do feel like they need their wives.

When a man employs the various levels of dread (not just creating space) he is demonstrating to his wife that he's the attractive one - that he could get another girl at the drop of a hat, if he wanted. It's not that he does; rather, it's that she knows her husband is a man other women want. This is what increases attraction - not the jealousy or the space a man creates when he walks away.

When a man gets to the level where he does start creating space as a consequence to her poor behavior, she isn't attracted because he's gone and "absence makes the heart grow fonder" (a useful, yet misguided trope) - she's attracted because she knows he could get another girl (which is why the first several levels precede this) and the distance (1) creates an opportunity for him to meet someone else, but more importantly, (2) expresses that he doesn't need his wife, further establishing him as the valuable one in the relationship. He is the prize, not her. This shift in power restores the biblical framework of the man as the leader, rather than the default structure that society gives, which in today's sexual marketplace assumes that the woman is the one who is more sexually desirable to the world.

Now to your main point, God does not employ dread. Dread is an attempt to understand what God does. God precedes the philosophy, not the other way around. To put it another way, if it weren't for God, we wouldn't know what dread was in the first place. Dread is a secular word used to describe one context in which women develop attraction for men, and that male-female dynamic is parallel in Scripture to the way a spiritual bride is attracted to her spiritual groom. So yes, in a sense, we could say that God uses dread; but it would be more accurate to say that God just is - that he's not intentionally employing any strategy or dread concepts - and that when we employ dread, (1) we are simply trying to make ourselves more like God in the way we are attractive, and (2) we should be seeking to incorporate these things into our very being so that it's not a "strategy," but just part of our inherent way of life, just as it is inherent for God to be attractive.

It's probably worth a post of its own - maybe even an addition to the 100-level content, but I'll try to put up something in the next week on this subject.

Women Feeling Threatened by Hyper-Sexualized Social Media

4 upvotes · 30 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

As chuck said, this sub is open for both men and women, but the imbalance you noticed exists as a matter of the balance of our user-base. I'd love for women to post more about godly femininity here, just as men post about biblical masculinity. While RPW can be a good general place, it is still ultimately a secular sub. Perhaps an RPCW sometime down the road, if the interest is there?

Dates and Drama

4 upvotes · 23 April 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I think /u/red-sfpplus once used the analogy of a steam engine - pressure keeps building. You can either release the emotional pressure in a way that works for you and powers the ship, or you can let it blow up all on its own and create a giant mess. I'll choose the first option.

Anybody else feel like this?

4 upvotes · 16 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good reply. You brought up the exact passages I intended to!

I've read almost all of the sidebar and there's still a couple things I have questions on

4 upvotes · 15 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

as long as ... he will ...

/u/Willow-girl is right - this is a covert contract. The point is that you're using your mission as the context to meet girls, not that you stop meeting girls and hope one just falls in your lap.

So does this mean we no longer go out and do things like approaching women in grocery stores and malls?

There's nothing that says you can or can't. If you want to, do it. If you don't, don't. The difference is that the people you find in the grocery store or mall are not likely going to be wife material. The people who are willing to follow your mission, if your mission is a godly one that involves disciple-making, have a much higher probability of being wife material.

Do we stick to only women in church since we aren't supposed to date unbelievers

Most women in the "church" (by the modern use of that word) aren't believers either. No, don't stick with "church" women. Whenever and wherever you meet women, bring Christ into the relationship, raise them up, get them making disciples, and see what happens. Don't limit yourself to congregational gatherings that often have nothing to do with the biblical church.

do we approach in places like Sunday morning service?

That's certainly a viable option. After all, someone else has done the hard work of gathering people together who are at least willing to say Jesus' name. You might as well take advantage of their efforts, if you can.

I guess I'm just confused as what it looks like when God puts a woman in your life.

This is spelled out pretty clearly in the "finding a girl you can't keep yourself from banging" posts on the sidebar. The process is simple:

- Meet a girl.
- Invite her to do something that helps you advance your mission.
- If she responds positively, keep inviting her along.
- If sexual chemistry develops, be clear and overt in communicating about it and setting boundaries.
- If you decide she's wife material and the chemistry is still there, propose.

In the midst of all of this, if you want to go on "dates," like taking her out to dinner, going to the movies, etc. then go for it - just remember to balance in mission-oriented activity so you're actively vetting for her following ability too.

how will this effect my future relationships with christian women

To the degree that you let it.

At worst, it precludes you as a marriage candidate from some of the most spiritually uptight (or possibly even mature) women, but even then they'll still often move past it if you're attractive enough.

It seems like something that would drive most high quality women away once they find out

That depends on what you mean by "quality." If you mean "quality" in the way the world tends to view that word, just the opposite. The "quality" women will often be more attracted to a guy who has a successful sexual history (granted, one girl doesn't necessarily prove much here). But regarding spiritual quality, yeah, some of them might be turned away. Oh well. You goofed. There are consequences. Don't try to undo them - try to redeem them.

Breaking the Nice-Guy: Take Ownership, Ask For Help

4 upvotes · 12 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The thing is: no woman even knows what it means to "have it all together." It's a nebulous phrase, making it an impossible standard to live up to.

Married Man Game Part 3: Sexting

4 upvotes · 5 March 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Nice.

Married Man Game Part 3: Sexting

4 upvotes · 5 March 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Haha, I'll assume that's a good thing.

Rushing to buy a House!?

4 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

Solid. My thoughts exactly. That commute is horrendous.

Impressing with food!

4 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

Stick with staples, but up your game with it. If you make a chicken, top it with a butter-parmasean sauce, for example. Or if you do spaghetti, make the sauce or garlic bread from scratch. A personal favorite of mine is home-made tacos, make the shells yourself, and garnish them with cilantro over the top. It looks fantastic, but really doesn't take much effort - and who doesn't like a taco?

RPC: a place to stay (or at least return to)

4 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This is a much needed word. A sterner environment is better suited to test men's frame here so they're ready for practicing in the real world.

Analysis- was this dread?

4 upvotes · 28 February 2019 · /r/askMRP

You were insecure about something. It upset you. You say you didn't give any signs of being off, but she noticed anyway. Nevertheless, she responded to your sexual advances.

Was that dread? No.

Was that a wife who happened to be DTF despite the fact that she thought you were being a covert baby? Yes.

I'm trying to analyze her psychology

Darn right you're way into her frame. Understanding female psychology on the whole has value. Trying to understand a particular person's psychology without training, testing, and clinical analysis is absurd. We can't tell you her personal psyche because we don't know her and we're only getting small snippets you tell us.

Maybe she watched some porn without telling you and was revved up when you got home. Maybe she was with another guy the night before and needed some sperm to convince you the child is yours if she happened to be pregnant. Maybe she happened to be attracted to you at that moment. Maybe she was afraid that turning you down would upset you even more.

Maybe, maybe, maybe. We just can't know. Stop worrying about it. You had some great sex. Enjoy it. Do it again tonight. Dread is not an intentional strategy you try to use to trick a wife into having sex with you. It's a state of being. As you found out, you can't fake it because she'll smell the phony all over you.

Should I Date An Unbeliever if I Can Lead That Person to Christ?

4 upvotes · 6 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I think I agree. I'll just caution that in addition to general abundance, another aspect of plate theory is preselection. However, hanging out with nonchristian girls all in a way that others perceive as romantic contexts, even if you're not intentionally escalating, will lower your SMV in a manner that scales with the spiritual maturity of the women onlookers.

Generally, preselection assumes that lots of female attention enhances a guy's SMV, right? What if he's only hanging out with ugly girls? Well, that actually drops his SMV. It shows that only low quality women are interested in him, so girls who perceive themselves as higher quality than the girls he's around will think of him as lesser in SMV and hypergamy will reject him.

Now for Christian girls, the degree of spiritual maturity still matters. The more mature she is, the more it matters to her - not necessarily for raw sexual attraction, but in contemplating a man's potential RMV, and mature Christian women will not date a guy less spiritually mature than them. They might want to have sex with him, but they won't date him toward marriage.

So, if a guy has a lot of even low effort nonchristian plates, he is cutting off his candidacy from the top tier of spirituality mature women, making the alleged unicorn run away from him. That's fine, but it means he is locked into my approach instead: raise up a godly woman rather than find one ready made. That is, he will have to seriously lower his standards on the spiritual maturity of the girls he's willing to date because the more mature ones won't date him in the first place.

Tag: u/rocknrollchuck

Stop apologizing so much

4 upvotes · 14 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This is similar to my boss's approach to apologies - that they're only valid if you:

1. Acknowledge what you did and that you understand you shouldn't have done it.
2. Acknowledge how it affected the other person.
3. Communicate what actions you intend to take to ensure it doesn't happen again.
4. Ask for forgiveness, putting the ball in the other person's court at that point.

I'm not saying this is the best way to approach things, but it's interesting that your random points that might "couple together" are 3 of the 4 in his series.

I disagree with your bereavement conclusion, but I'll leave it as a matter of personal preference and not get into it.

Validation and Interdependency

4 upvotes · 11 January 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

What else can we do?

My solution is always generational disciple-making. For the secular crowd, this would translate to mentoring. We could broadcast it before millions on a daily basis - even new millions every day and not the same ones - and maybe some would pay attention, others would think about it, a few of those would take it seriously, some in that group would apply it, and you'd get to a very small handful who would make it an intentional part of their life and mission. Mass-marketing is not an effective strategy for changing a culture. It's also not the strategy employed by liberals, whose dogma includes such things as taking over the educators, controlling the practice of psychology, etc. Why? Because teachers and psychologists in the secular world fulfill a very similar role in people's lives as ...

Discipleship, on the other hand, is effective. It's the method Jesus modeled that brought one man to being the largest religion on the planet for most of human history. It functions on multiplication rather than addition. If I can impart what I know in 2 other guys, and I send them out and we all impart what they know to 2 other guys, then we've got 9 guys, and then we all get 2 more, then we've got 27, and it just goes on from there. It's also more secure because you can lead the flow of vision and information rather than hoping someone is self-motivated enough to care, internalize, apply, etc. Also, it gives people who do internalize and want to apply the information an opportunity to have someone to ask questions, get advice, and seek counsel when they're trying to put into practice what other men might otherwise give up on if they hit a roadblock and they're all alone.

Instagram and Sex Robots - How Technology is Changing Male/Female Interactions...

4 upvotes · 9 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This is certainly an interesting write-up. I like it. Here are a few things that came to mind while reading:

females have always had to survive in history by interacting with the group

Rather than a psycho-historical perspective on the feminine social matrix, I prefer what the Bible says. Men were created with a mission. They look at what needs to be done. Women were created to be helpers. They look at other people who may need help. While God may have put the desire to be with a woman in man, biblically, it is always secondary to his mission. For women, their interaction with others IS the exact reason for their creation, which is why they're drawn to social interaction. "It is not good for man to be alone," but he can do it - he doesn't need women, especially in a post-Gospel world, Paul being the prime example. Women, on the other hand, were created expressly for interpersonal interaction, which is why even in the post-Gospel world Paul encourages the young widows to remarry, despite his general advice in 1 Cor. 7 to remain in whatever position you are.

they are competing with false versions of other women

A nice addition to my 107 post on the comparison game.

The state after marriage says, do whatever you want and you still get half of this man's resources for a decade or more. If you have kids? basically 2 decades.

This is an alarmist way of putting it. The only resources split are those acquired during the marriage. If a man is dumb enough not to maintain records of what he had going into the marriage, that's his own idiocy. Most states in the US will not impose indefinite spousal support until you've been married for 25+ years - and even then my dad divorced after 26 and only had to pay for 7 years. And child support is not half your assets or income. It's usually closer to 20%. For example, guy in my state who earns $100k, assuming the wife is at minimum wage, may have to pay around $20k/yr in child support, less if the wife makes more. And the reverse does apply if the woman is the heavier earner. At least in my state, the law used to be anti-male (divorce 2.0), and then they retracted some things and now it's anti-high-earners (divorce 1.5), which still has a disparate impact on men because most men are higher earners, but they argue that it's still gender neutral because if the woman earns more then she is subject to the same obligations - and I have seen this reverse scenario play out in court many times as well. So, the law is not against men ... it just happens to be that most higher-earners are men (and not because of the mythical wage gap), so men bear the brunt of that law more often.

It literally cost the cystic fibrosis guy 4 million and raising another man's children for decades.

Let's be clear on this: the 4m pounds came from his internet business and not child support. That's something he would have had to pay even if they never had kids. The kids had nothing to do with that bit.

As for the kids, I calculate his total post-divorce to be around $300,000 between child support and school tuition, plus whatever he voluntarily paid during his parenting time. As for pre-divorce, in those days the cost to raise a child was around $11k annually, which is $33k for 3 kids, over an average of 9 years per kid = another $300,000. So, altogether he's out $600k for these kids. Accounting for the $250k payback, he's out $350k. But even at that, he settled this case rather than taking it to trial. Could he have gotten the full $600k or more? Possibly. Who knows - certainly not him, because he settled. He agreed to take this instead of fighting for a better share.

Why would he do that? Well, because he still loves the kids and wants a relationship with them (even though 2 aren't speaking to him right now - but that will almost certainly die down). Also, there's a high probability that if he had known, he would have adopted children anyway, and thus ended up raising another man's kids anyway - just under less nefarious terms. Or there could be any other number of reasons that rationalize the dollars ... things that made sense in his situation to make him feel right and whole with that settlement that we don't get to consider when we see that "he only got $250,000!" as is the typical reaction to something like this.

My assumption is that we are talking about higher level men who are able to get women

That's the thing though: my personal experience in interacting with these high level men tells me quite the opposite. They're more likely to pay for prostitutes, sex toys, and high-end pornography than the lower or middle class people I represent. High-end men tend to monetize everything. So, if they want sex, they will pay money to get it rather than go through the relational hassles. Money makes sense to them. Trying to win in the SMP doesn't - because that takes effort, even for a man of high status, whereas money takes none. Sure, they are "able to get women," but even a multi-millionaire still has to work for her attention and attraction. Not so with porn or a prostitute ... or a sex doll.

what about the incels who are in the bottom 20% - something like this allows them to pay their way into a woman who looks like a 10 without all the problems reality brings

You've got this backwards. The incels would probably use these, but they would still be seeking relationships with real women rather than exchanging them for sex robots. The robots would be a mere way to placate sexual desire, but their blue pill fantasies would still compel them to look for validation from women. A sex robot cannot give that, and thus they will continually be unsatisfied and disappointed and still longing for female attention.

You appropriately give good references to u/Rollo-Tomassi's content on point, but another thing he talks about is validational sex, which is what most betas are really seeking. A true alpha could use a sex robot and be just fine - because he doesn't need that validation. He knows he can get it when he wants it, so sex is just about his own enjoyment at that point. If he feels like doing it with a doll, he'll do it with a doll. If he feels like bagging an actual woman, he'll go out and get her and take her home for the night or a quickie in a closet or whatever. The robot is satisfying to him because it gives him exactly what he wants: sexual gratification. The robot will never be satisfying to the beta because it cannot give them what they want: validation.

I do believe that technology has been able to provide women what they want most - loads of attention

But again: this is artificial attention. They don't know if the person behind the screen is really what his profile picture shows. The fantasizes - and women are just as good at living in fantasy worlds as men - but in the back of her head she knows it might not be real. Women are the true validation-seekers, and rightfully so in light of their biblical purpose for creation. Paul as much as says that men should look to God for their validation and women should look to men. That's why it's so off-base for me to see a beta mindset in a Christian man: because men should not be looking for validation from other men or women - only from God. But for the woman this is different. That validation is part of her created design. But artificial validation will only go so far because hypergamy will compel her toward the AF and the BB. She can't get either of those from a man online who clicks the like button. It inflates her self-esteem, but does nothing to satisfy her actual needs. That guy on the internet isn't going to pay her mortgage. He isn't going to screw her brains out while she's ovulating - and she might not want him to either, if she knew who he really was.

While attention may be something women strongly crave, I don't think it's accurate to say that's what they want most. What they want most is the attention of a high-value man. And they cannot assess a man's value if their interactions only remain online - which is actually an indicator of low value, if he is not willing to step out in the real world to meet her, or doesn't have the resources to make that a viable option. But the artificial validation does placate women until they can find that man in real life, just as the sex doll doesn't give the beta what he really needs, but it does placate his sexuality until he finds someone who he mistakenly believes will give him that validation.

Follow the Red Pill but Do Not Sin...

4 upvotes · 8 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The red pill is not something you follow. It is something you understand. It is not prescriptive; it's descriptive. The red pill doesn't tell you to sin because it doesn't tell you to do anything. Red pill people will tell you what to do, assuming you have the same goals they do ... but ultimately each man's goals are his own, ergo the sidebar posts u/rocknrollchuck linked to.

I will say that all Christians should share the same goal of disciple-making, so there is broad latitude with regard to advice because we do have a common purpose. The secular world doesn't have a dogmatic commonality of purpose, but biology and herd mentality gives a practical commonality toward maximizing sexuality.

is a sin to hook up?

4 upvotes · 26 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is the answer.

Responsibilities and Privileges

4 upvotes · 19 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

As I'm not married, would love a older married man's feedback here since I'm sure there are things I'm missing.

What's missing here is how this affects the privileges/responsibilities dynamic. You're adding more responsibilities - that a man must be strong spiritually, physically, mentally, emotionally, and socially. But where do the privileges come back in? You seem to assume passively that if the man is strong in all of these areas, people will just throw privileges at him, including his wife. Does that just magically happen? What privileges will she throw at him - respect for his decisions, great sex, a nice meal?

Problem - Why should the church prioritize this above other initiatives?

With respect for the philosophical foundation of your answer to the question, it's very weak and unpersuasive. You essentially say that healthy marriages are more important to God than people dying of starvation because "God cares about healthy and whole people." What about the health of the people dying of starvation?

I do agree that the problem of intergender relational dynamics in the church should be a high priority - one of the top even. But my rationale is much simpler: because God values the great commission. Marriages were designed to be a physical representation of what that commission is to look like on a spiritual level. You have a husband (God/Jesus) who indwells within his wife (us/church), which produces offspring (new believers). Malachi 2:15 says that the whole purpose for creating marriage was "to produce godly offspring." The Bible seems clear enough that the church's primary mission is to "make disciples of all nations." If marriage is the primary physical representation of that process, the best way the enemy can destroy the church's mission is to destroy marriages. If the church restores a healthy view of marriage and physical reproduction, then people will better understand their spiritual marriage to Christ and the spiritual reproduction he wants them to engage in. That's why the church should focus on reorienting the privileges/responsibilities dynamic in the home.

Opportunity - What is the opportunity here?

I'm not sure what you mean by this. I assume you're suggesting benefits of solving the previously identified problem. If that's the case, you're missing the biggest one: the fulfillment of God's plan for this earth, as expressed in the great commission.

All of the things you mentioned will already be the case in heaven anyway. In heaven, all people will be biblically grounded, all men will be strong, and all people will be happy in the community. Sure, it's feel-good for us to have a little taste of that on earth, but I care more about the big-picture. Focus on the game, not the play or the player. If you want to win the game, we have to go bigger.

What's the best way to apply this given the constraints of your church? Does it mean preaching a sermon from the pulpit, initiating a church-wide guided Bible study in your mid-week group, or starting a men's group?

Personally, I believe none of those will be effective. One-on-one discipleship is about the only way we can effectively do today what Jesus did back then.

Invite others to give feedback here and get them to buy in and evangelize your project for you.

Now that's good leader thinking :)

Recommendation - Provide a recommendation based off of the potential solutions.

I don't understand why this line is here or what it means.

Lead and Implement the plan - See what is possible to realistically do. Even if leadership doesn't sign off now, you've planted the seed. Continue the conversation with that seed in mind. Maybe start a men's group that's unaffiliated with your church.

I've tried all different ways of approaching this. Anymore, I don't care if my church doesn't agree with what I'm doing. I do it anyway. If they find anything unbiblical in my approach, they can confront me about it. It hasn't happened yet. While the lead pastor clearly doesn't care to back up what I'm doing, he can't find any reason to shut me down - and what I'm doing is growing. Our associate pastor is on board now too. We're moving in a good direction. So, I'd ignore the whole "unaffiliated" thing and just do whatever you want until they intentionally shut you down or ask you to disaffiliate yourself.

Love this sub (+ question about meeting an ex)

4 upvotes · 17 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I don't see any stats. Rule 2 applies here.

Of lesser importance: you've got dread all wrong. The goal isn't to make your wife jealous. It's to be attractive enough that jealousy would be warranted.

I once made the mistake of telling my wife when another girl hit on me. I assumed it would instill dread. Wrong. It just came off as tooting my own horn. Did it make her jealous? Probably. Did it make her want to have sex with me any more than before? No. Because tooting your own horn makes you less attractive.

Similarly, your intention isn't aimed at making you more attractive. It's aimed at jealousy for jealousy's own sake. You're trying to rub her nose in the fact that you're spending time with other women. That will depreciate her feelings toward you, not appreciate them.

Possibly the most troubling part of your whole post:

I asked my wife if she would be okay

Frame, brother. Frame. Do you ask her for permission to go potty too?

Look, if you do go meet with your exes, just go do it. You don't need her permission. You don't need to tell her what you're doing. Just go do it. It's still a pretty dumb idea on a number of other fronts already addressed elsewhere in the comments.

But let me emphasize: even if you do go off on this ridiculous scheme, absolutely DO NOT try bragging to her about it or use it as leverage to make her jealous.

As I've said many times before, dread is not about jealousy for its own sake. It's a way to leverage preselection in a marriage context. The reason the first several levels of dread are about self-improvement is because your wife believes she knows you fully and completely. You have to start changing. Without that change, her attraction won't change either. Once you do start changing, she will continue in this assumption - but the upper levels of dread, when you start to get organic attention from other women (not fabricating it, as you suggest), will open her eyes to the fact that maybe there's more to your changes than she was noticing at first. It gives her a new appreciation for the man you're becoming by the fact that other women appreciate it. That is, she's going to have one of two reactions when she sees another girl interested in you: (1) "Hah, that's because they don't know him like I do; if they did, they wouldn't be interested either," or (2) "Hmm ... why are they interested? Girls never used to be interested in him before? What am I missing?" and then she gets interested too, as she follows that trail.

Jealousy can certainly work against you. That's why dread is set up the way it is. I'm convinced the term "dread" was used solely as a way to take an otherwise obvious concept and make it sound edgy. Don't let the edginess of the word fool you into thinking it's something it's not.

What does RPChristians think about this marriage video from Larry J. Russell

4 upvotes · 6 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

To add to what /u/Deep_Strength said, there's a false dichotomy being set up here: God v. your spouse, followed by a "you can't serve two masters" mindset. In reality, your devotion is wholly and only to God. Your wife is to follow you in that devotion. Her needs are met by virtue of the fact that a man following God will be taking care of his home, relating with his family, putting food on the table, etc.

After all, if you're to disciple another believer on how to be a good husband and lead his family, how can you do that without modeling?

The problem I see here is that so many pastors confuse teaching with discipleship. From the 208 post, they skip straight from "Tell them what" to "Pass it on" without ever going through "Show them how, let them try, and send them out" first. If that's the case, then it's easy to neglect your family in favor of teaching - because that's an either/or.

But discipleship is impossible without modeling. You have to live your life the way you want other people to live theirs so that they can look to you. As Paul says in Philippians 3:17, "Join one another in following my example, brothers, and take note of those who live according to the pattern we gave you."

Funny enough, that verse is literally two after Paul says, "Anyone who is mature should take such a view of things. And if on some point you think differently, that too God will make clear to you."

In short, the problem is solved if someone is actually making disciples the way Jesus designed. If they're going off doing their own version of disciple-making instead of what Jesus showed us (i.e. 99% of the mainstream church), then yeah, abandoning your family in favor of ministry duties is a very real problem.

How common is this really?

4 upvotes · 14 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

pounded many of his friends, and then was marrying some soyboy pastor

Because the best these pastors can get is either the girl no one else wanted or someone else's leftovers. Because they aren't attracted to the first, they rationalize the second by coming up with biblical excuses for why men should want to invest their lives into these types of women - "Single mothers need your help. We're supposed to forgive and forget others' past mistakes." You get the idea.

is it just a matter of becoming a high SMV/RMV man, watching every red flag, and screening any woman i am vaguely interested in?

No. It's also about training up a girl to become what you want her to be - to become marriage material. What you're laying out is a recipe for finding a unicorn. You'll find quickly that statistics will work so far against you that you might as well give up. Somewhere along the way you have to shift gears to take responsibility for leading your woman and not just trying to find someone ready-made.

surely there are women who reject this way of thinking/doing things

Of course there are. Just like there are countless guys who reject pornography and acknowledge that it's sin and commit to not watching it ... then screw up periodically and do it anyway. Even the best-intentioned people screw up when temptation grows stronger.

Maybe the last of NAWALT needs shattering and sweeping out of my mind.

Correct. I view AWALT as a spectrum, not a switch. Some women are 100% AWALT in that they're literally riding the CC, branch swinging, and acting like the poster child for hypergamy every single day. Others might be 80% ... others 50%. No one will ever be 0%. That tendency will always be there. But some women are better at controlling and restraining their innate desires and coding than others.

And to be clear, it's a function of temptation too. A woman can easily be NAWALT if there is never any temptation to be like that. Put her in an all-girl school in the arctic and see if she starts riding the CC. It's not going to happen because the option just isn't there. Add an all-boy school right next door, but fill it only with omega boys who are totally undesirable and the temptation will be there, but so low that I doubt it will ever be a problem. But drop her in the middle of a bar full of 6-packs and biceps that are swarming her and all of a sudden she goes from 3% to 60% - she gets a little drunk and maybe 70% until enough additional temptations creep in - and then you know at some point, under the right circumstances, she'll be AWALT too.

1 area i still need to work on is not cave into emotional blackmail

I'm not sure what you mean. How would it be blackmail - like she's going to out you for some emotional reaction you had if you don't do what she says? I think you mean emotional manipulation in general.

An easy way to address this is simply to say it out loud in the middle of the moment: "I understand that you're emotionally worked up right now, but I will not allow your emotions to manipulate me." It's not the best way to maintain frame, but it's an easy way to get in the right mindset and clarify some boundaries for future conversations. I wouldn't do this more than 2-3 times, but it's certainly useful in the beginning.

BF hasn't said I love you...

4 upvotes · 2 November 2018 · /r/RedPillWomen

I never understood the "what if he/she doesn't say ILY back?" concept. Does love always have to strike at the exact simultaneous time in every relationship? Can't one person decide they love someone and then a few months later the other person decides too? Why is that such an evil or nerve-wrecking thing?

Also, saying "I love you" doesn't actually mean anything. I know countless men who use the phrase and mean nothing by it other than a reflection of their present emotional state. But if "love" is purely an emotional thing, then 15 minutes after he says he loves you he might not love you anymore ... and then an hour after that he might love you again. Emotions are flippant, so an emotional declaration means pretty much nothing. So, if you're concerned that "he hasn't said it because he doesn't FEEL it" - that's because I'm sure sometimes he feels it and sometimes he doesn't. At the very least, I can say with definitive certainty that in 100% of relationships that feeling will fade - usually 6-24 months after the wedding. So, at best, you're asking for just a temporary emotional boost in yourself from him.

Other men will use the phrase as a form of emotional manipulation to heighten your infatuation with them so that they have more power and control in the relationship. An extreme example is BWS - no matter how much he beats her, as long as he keeps refraining afterward, "I love you," she keeps going back for more. Certainly you're not asking for that kind of intention from him, even if to a lesser degree.

So, when you say you "love" him, what exactly do you mean? Love is not an emotion. If I feel giddy feelings toward my wife, but beat her, cheat on her, and yell at her for not vacuuming the house every day and she's in tears all the time - but I feel giddy toward her in the midst of doing all of this, do I really love her?

It's also not just a simple phrase to utter. I could tell someone I love them and totally not mean it. That doesn't do anyone any good.

Love is better understood as an orientation of a person's behaviors and priorities. How does he treat you? If he has options on how to spend his time, where do you rank on the list? Those are better indicators of whether or not a man loves you. If he says, "I love you," that doesn't prove anything. It is merely a statement of intent. His actual behaviors are what matter.

To that end, look at what he does, not what he says. This is a core tenet of any branch of red pill thinking. And if you see it in his behaviors, why does he need to say it? Especially when saying it is superficial and might come from a different intention than his behaviors might otherwise indicate. All you're doing is asking to be manipulated - either through intentional withholding or intentional misuse of the phrase, and even if he is sincere about his intentions it doesn't mean that his actions will line up or that he means anything more than his flippant emotions have been feeling lately.

EDIT: I mixed up says/does in the last paragraph and fixed it.

Can't get physically strong: Advise needed

4 upvotes · 24 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Not sure why you'd think that'd be unpopular. It's the correct response.

IVF medications

4 upvotes · 17 October 2018 · /r/askMRP

You have better things to do with your time than to boss her around. If and when she's ready to follow you in doing stuff besides sleeping, she will. If not, she won't and you do your own thing. If she's legit screwed up from pregnancy and meds, this attitude saves you a lot of trouble and butthurt. If it's not legit and she's just not interested, do you think forcing her out of bed to do your bidding is going to be more helpful?

On Biblical Justice and Rape

4 upvotes · 10 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

2/2

To summarize the above:

- All of the OT law and old covenant are now obsolete (Hebrews 8, notably 8:13).
- The commands are not about creating a dividing line between good and evil, but about pointing us to a positive, proactive character of godliness.

- God's method of revelation and communication with man is no longer predominantly external (as most people still treat it), but internal through the Holy Spirit within us.

This is where I get back to the part about Paul replacing the external legal standard of morality with an internal spiritual one. This is where your question really gets answered, using the context of all of the above. Paul gives a 2-part standard for moral issues in a Spirit-driven framework.

1. "I know and am persuaded in the Lord Jesus that nothing is unclean in itself, but it is unclean for anyone who thinks it unclean." Romans 14:14
2. "Whatever does not proceed from faith is sin." Romans 14:23

The first verse basically declares that nothing is inherently sinful. I usually use watching child pornography as an easy example. Everyone agrees this is sin, right? What if you're an FBI examiner watching it to find clues that lead to the arrest of the perpetrator. Still sin? Trick question. If he wasn't a Christian, yes it's still sin (Hebrews 11:6). What if he is a Christian? Still a trick question: we need to know his motives. Was he doing it to glorify God through working diligently as God desires of him? Probably not sin then. Was he doing it to advance his career without any mindfulness to glorify God in what he does? Probably still sin.

In this way, the second part deems everything we do that isn't prompted by our faith as sinful. As a result, I believe that "not sinning" is the exception to the rule, rather than the inverse, which most people innately assume: "I'm a good person, except the times that I sin." Sin is not something we do when we're not being good; in our flesh sin is our default state and good is what we do when we are not sinning.

In light of the above, the standard I apply for all moral issues: Does it proceed from faith? That is the "good, clear answer" you're looking for.

Conclusion

Now I want to be clear: I'm not saying we all make up our own standards. We don't decide what we want to do and rationalize our faith to support it. Rather, the Spirit compels us toward a mission and if our behaviors are not oriented toward the fulfillment of that mission (i.e. because of our faith), then all such things are sin - even something as innocent as helping an old lady cross the street or giving money to the poor. See 1 Cor. 13:1-3 or Isaiah 64:6.

Accordingly, the orientation of our hearts toward or away from God's purposes (i.e. our faith) is what draws the line between "sin" and "not sin."

Common Objections

So, when I present this most people say, "Cool, so as long as I don't feel guilty when I look at porn, it's perfectly fine to do it, right?" That would certainly be possible in framework that only contemplates Romans 14:14. But that's why Paul gave us Romans 14:23 as the reverse buffer. When you look at porn, are you doing it because something about your faith compels you to do it? If the answer is no, then it's still sin, even though it's not an inherently sinful activity.

"What if I just want to chill out to Netflix for an evening? Do I always have to be acting out of faith all the time, non-stop for it to be sin? Is TV always sin because I can't watch it from faith?" This question always comes up because Americans love their TV.

Yes, if you're watching TV just to kill time and to gratify your own desire to veg out, it's probably sin. Why?

Because it's not proceeding from faith. 1 Cor. 10:31 is a little more explicit and even lists eating and drinking - common life necessities - as things that we must always do to God's glory, and it would clearly be sin if we were doing it for any reason other than to glorify God because that verse commands that "whatever you do, do it all for the glory of God." So again, the primary question is: why are you doing it? Motive matters.

In the reverse, though, there are countless ways to redeem these activities - not in that we're trying to justify our actions by pretending our motives are different than they are, but by actually changing our motives. As Brother Lawrence said, "Our sanctification did not depend upon changing our works, but in doing that for God's sake, which we commonly do for our own."

So, I used to be addicted to TV. I'm glad that addiction is over. But I still watch TV. My purpose in doing so is now less about watching a show simply because I enjoy it. It's because I have a friend at the gym or a neighbor or a co-worker - all people I'm trying to share Christ with - who have mentioned these shows and I'm trying to build a commonality with them, and having familiarity with something they get excited about is immensely useful in developing that relationship.

The fact that I enjoy the TV shows I watch does not negate the fact that if I could not use that time to advance God's purposes in this way, I wouldn't be watching the show in the first place. In my mind, "I really like that show and want to watch it" is not enough of a reason for me to invest the time to watch that show. My focus is on my mission: make disciples. To do that, I have to find strategic ways of building relationships with others that will earn me a place of influence in their lives that can be leveraged for Christ.

To continue with the TV example, I love going to my wife's work parties. There are so many shallow and superficial people there. The topics of conversation always start with things like the weather, something going on in the office, a popular thing in the news, etc. - innocuous things that most people don't actually get passionate about.

Enter me: "So, what types of things do you do for fun?" They always list impressive things, like running or playing an instrument or researching the NASDAQ - and some even deny that they ever do anything fun at all, only working all the time. "Fun? Free time? What's that?" is a very common answer. I know better.

No matter what their answer is, I follow up with: "You watch any good shows lately?" About 95% of the time (there are rare times when people legitimately don't watch any TV) they'll give me a couple things they've seen recently. If I've seen it or heard enough about it to hold a conversation on the topic ("That's a great show. What do you think will happen to Jack after that last episode?") - invariably, a spark lights up in their eye. They get a more crooked and intense smile than their previous superficial expressions. They're invested in the conversation, which I can now steer whichever way I want.

That includes 4 times that I've been able to share the Gospel with people as a result of these conversations (out of about 6 or so of my wife's work parties I've attended), and 3 of these couples having visited our church afterward - and that's just with my wife's work parties, and it's far more common to have these conversations and results with people I'm already in-context to chat with. I promise you that couldn't have happened if we just talked about the weather. It happened because I'm intentional about how I use my free-time, orienting it toward engaging in things that I know will be useful for building relationships with non-believers.

1 Cor. 9:20-23 - "To the Jews I became like a Jew, to win the Jews. To those under the law I became like one under the law (though I myself am not under the law), so as to win those under the law. To those not having the law I became like one not having the law (though I am not free from God's law but am under Christ's law), so as to win those not having the law. [To those who love watching TV, I became like one who loves watching TV, to win those who love watching TV. To middle-class suburbians, I became like a middle-class suburban, to win middle-class suburbians.] To the weak I became weak, to win the weak. I have become all things to all people so that by all possible means I might save some. I do all this for the sake of the Gospel, that I may share in its blessings."

See how that works? That's the line between good and evil: Does it proceed from faith or not? The law doesn't dictate this. The Holy Spirit compelling me toward a mission and to act from faith to God's glory does.

Tag: /u/lololasaurus /u/neytax /u/BobbyMckee

On Biblical Justice and Rape

4 upvotes · 9 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Eek ... the Bible doesn't actually make that distinction. I've heard this argument more times than I can count, and it always falls flat in my mind. It's another one of those products of cultural Christianity that makes me shudder every time I hear someone mention it - which is a lot.

For the sake of argument, let's assume that Hebrews 8 went on to say: "There are 3 types of laws: moral, civil and ceremonial. When the old covenant was made obsolete, it only affected the civil and ceremonial laws, but the moral laws are still over you." I'm pretty sure that's not in there, but let's suppose it is. How do we, even with this assumption, go about categorizing which laws are moral, civil, and ceremonial? There would have to be yet another verse - or an entire book - making the categorization with each reference.

Consider: is the commandment not to bear false testimony against your neighbor a civil law about court proceedings or a moral issue about lying? One will argue that it's clearly talking about presenting a case to a judge (civil), while another might say that it's in the 10 commandments, so it must be moral. But who says the 10 commandments are all moral laws? There's no standard. Instead, when we do this we're making up a law for ourselves - deciding on our own which laws can be done away with and which can't. This is the exact same standard that is applied to justify homosexuality - "That wasn't a moral law, it was only a civil one, so that law went away" - and then when the new testament comes around, "Oh, Paul was still speaking to the Jewish people in that passage, who were under the law still."

Leviticus 19 is another great example:

- 3 Respect father/mother and honor Sabbath - moral or civil? Let's assume moral
- 4 Idols - Moral
- 5-8 Offering, "sacrifice it in such a way" - ceremonial
- 9-10 Don't glean fields, leave for the poor - civil welfare or moral generosity? I'll go with civil here
- 11 Steal, lie, deceive - moral
- 12 Swear falsely - moral
- 13 Defraud, rob, hold back wages - civil, I presume?
- 14 Mock the handicapped - moral or civil? Let's say moral
- 15 Judge fairly - civil
- 16 Slander - moral or civil? Let's say moral
- 17 Don't hate in your heart - moral
- 18 No revenge or grudge; love neighbor as self - moral
- 19 No cross-breeding, cross-seeding, cross-weaving - civil? I hardly see why. Moral? But most people disagree. We'll go with ceremonial?
- 20 Sex with a slave - civil

- 21-22 Forgiveness for sex with a slave - ceremonial
- 23-25 Wait before eating fruit of a new tree - civil?
- 26 Bloody meat, divination, omens - meant might be civil, but the other two moral? maybe civil?
- 27 Sideburns - let's assume that's civil, otherwise a lot of guys would have to get a new hair cut. Goodness, I can't even grow sideburns if I wanted to!
- 28 Tattoos - again, we'll assume this is civil
- 29 Don't let your daughter be a prostitute - sounds moral, but the justification is a civil "greater good" one; we'll go with moral
- 30 Sabbath - moral or civil? we'll call it moral
- 31 Mediums, spiritists - moral with a civil justification? we'll go with moral anyway
- 32 Stand up for and respect the elderly - moral
- 33-34 Treat foreigners well - civil, but maybe moral? let's say civil
- 35-36 No dishonest measurements - civil, presumably, but honesty can be called a moral issue too. I'll say civil

Phew ... that's a lot of laws and virtually no distinction or categorization. They're all spliced together. What are we to make of that? Not just the fact that some of them are highly debatable, of course.

What I make of this is that the tripartate-law advocates would suggest:

- "We are bound to follow Leviticus 19:3, 4, 11, 12, 14, 16, 17, 18, the first part of 26, 29, 30, 31, and 32 ... but because Jesus died, now we can ignore Leviticus 19:5-8, 9-10, 13, 15, 19, 20, 21-22, 23-25, the last two parts of 26, 27, 28, 33-34, and 35-36"

See how ridiculous that sounds? Do you think when Moses wrote Leviticus 19 he was distinguishing between these 3? Or do you think God just gave him a law and we all are the ones who decided to splice apart these laws and commands years later? And if the distinction mattered to God, why didn't he put it in the Bible so that we would better understand the Gospel?

Tag: /u/lololasaurus /u/neytax /u/BobbyMcKee

Looking for a Relationship Tip

4 upvotes · 8 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I think a common concept went in one ear and out the other: comfort v. fitness tests. Fitness tests are "you this" and "you that." They're accusatory, trying to see how alpha you are in your response. Comfort tests are "I feel this" and "I'm experiencing that." They're more directed at her own internal emotional state.

Notice the difference in how they could be worded in the examples you gave:

- "We don't talk enough" v. "You don't make enough time to talk with me."
- "I want to hear more about your day" v. "You never tell me anything about your day."
- "I want to spend more time with you" v. "You don't spend enough time with me."
- "Do you miss me?" v. "You don't miss me enough."

The responses you're giving are fitness test responses, not comfort test responses. Go read up on comfort tests. That reminds me - there really isn't much sidebar content here for comfort tests. u/rocknrollchuck, u/osmiumzulu, or /u/Deep_Strength - our married mods: you have any interest in writing up a post on differentiating comfort and fitness tests and how to respond to each differently?

In the meantime, there are several ways to increase your "comfort game":

- Start responding to comfort tests with comfort test tools, not fitness test tools.
- Focus on her feelings through an expression of yourself toward her - your strength and provision, rather than her shortcomings or your behaviors. Example:
 - YOU-BAD: "You shouldn't feel lonely." "You should know that I care about you." "Don't doubt me." (implied: "You shouldn't ...") "You're over-reacting." "You need to accept that this is who I am." "You could try doing x, y, or z, to solve how you're feeling." "Maybe if you would do x, y, or z, I would respond the way you want."
 - I-BAD: "I've got a lot going on right now." "That's just who I am." "I do make plenty of time for you." "I do x, y, and z - don't you see that?"
 - GOOD: "I don't want you to feel lonely." "I care about you." "You can trust me." "I understand how you're feeling." "I really enjoy spending time with you."
- Re-read 104 and amp up the personalization component of how you compliment her.
- Remember that she's less interested in having more of you and more interested in having more of the way you make her feel. You don't need to be more physically present to keep funneling those feelings toward her.

What does living out Matthew 6:33 look like?

4 upvotes · 5 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The first thing is to look at what the verse is actually saying: "Seek first his kingdom and his righteousness." It doesn't say, "Pray a lot, read your bible a lot, and hang out with other Christians a lot." Those are all great things. They're foundational to your ability to advance God's Kingdom. But most people stop there. They interpret this verse as: Try to love God a lot and all these things will be given to you as well.

Second, how does the verse end? "As well." That's significant. It means God gives you his Kingdom and his righteousness first, then you get these other things. But it's not the order that's significant - it's the the fact that "as well" implies that God also gives us his Kingdom and his righteousness. Are you taking ownership over the Kingdom? If God gave you a Kingdom are you going to say, "Cool, I'm just going to live in it and hope all works out well"? No, you have to manage it and help it grow. You have a responsibility with that, just as the workers in the parable of the minas/talents.

So how do you live out Matthew 6:33? The same answer I always give: make disciples. Advance God's Kingdom. Make God's Kingdom your top priority - as this is the path to righteousness anyway - and that will be the path on which God provides everything else.

Perceived Threats?

4 upvotes · 2 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not sure I agree about how you represent Jesus's response to aggression. The pharisees often mocked or challenged him and he responded by humiliating them - showing them that he was smarter and beyond all the little games they tried to play. That's why they'd occasionally storm off talking about how they could kill him.

Either we have to incorporate this behavior as a way of expressing love, or we have to admit that Jesus didn't always give a loving response to those who were antagonistic to him.

Cuddles are required

4 upvotes · 29 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

That's not a bad thing ;)

Better Beta Divorce Strategy

4 upvotes · 27 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This has traditionally been my view, though I once got berated by a few ECs for arguing that there are appropriate contexts for DEERing, like in the courtroom. They insisted that DEERing was always wrong no matter the context and that no real man ever does it. All I could do was laugh.

She liked me the whole time!

4 upvotes · 22 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm so sorry ...

Has she hit a wall or is she really saving herself?

4 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

how do I tell if shes sincere about her faith and that's her reason for waiting, or if it's a cover for having hit the wall like what I was referring to?

The ultimate answer is, as /u/RedPillWonder said, the evidence of her fruit (see Matthew 7). I differ with RPW in that I don't think Jesus was referencing the fruit of the Spirit (which Paul hadn't written yet) or general good works (which Jesus dispels in the immediate next few verses), but the disciples flowing from one's life - when the Gospel grows up in us, the fruit is that seed-bearing part of us that drops from our branches into new soil so that it can also grow up. That is: evangelism and discipleship is the fruit.

Apart from that, a secondary (yet less secure) way is simply to ask her when she became saved. If she identifies a date before college, don't trust her. Either (1) she isn't actually saved and she's confused about what it means to be saved, or (2) she was genuinely saved back then, but she's willing to engage in deep sin issues even with the Holy Spirit influencing her conscience. If it was 2, is it possible that she repented between college and now? Sure. But there are too many variables to know with any certainty, so you're in a high-risk zone. Also curious is whether or not she has had the opportunity to be with the same caliber of guy that she slept with back in college. You say she has a high SMV, and that may be, but has she really been putting herself out there enough for those types of guys to be hitting on her? Because it'll happen at some point. If being married to Christ didn't stop her, you'd better believe being married to you won't stop her either.

To that end, I'd prefer if option 1 was actually the case. Even though it means she isn't a genuine Christian (just a self-deceived faux/self-identifying one), at least there's room for God to change her down the line. Don't date her, but share the Gospel with her. Lead her to Christ - and move yourself further along that path at the same time :)

Do you fast?

4 upvotes · 19 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I don't think that's how it works.

"I spoke to a lawyer on Wednesday"

4 upvotes · 18 September 2018 · /r/askMRP

So, you've thought about divorce, you've talked to lawyers, you've started a plan for the divorce process ... and then you get ticked off and threaten her when she says she did the same thing. What the heck, dude?

Also, you whine about being 3 months without sex. But nothing in your post indicates you trying to initiate with her. Are you employing kino throughout the day? When you see her twirling her hair while oggling you, do you flirt back? Are you practicing overcoming ASD and LMR with her? It sounds to me like you just want excuses to get divorced, not to solve the actual problem. If that's the case, just do it already. Get divorced. Don't whine here about her talking to a lawyer if you're not even trying to solve the problem in the first place. Make a decision and execute, but stop living in limbo. Either screw her in bed or screw her in court. Just do something.

Also, yeah, you screwed up. You broke frame. She was oggling the new guy you were becoming, and then you convinced her it was all just a farce. It takes months or years to convince someone you've changed. It takes one mistake to convince them you really haven't. Back to work.

[FR] "Lost" Frame for the First Time in a Long Time.

4 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This is great ... if a man actually is the prize. By now I've seen enough losers recite, "I'm the prize" and have it blow up in their faces because they're not. They're still fat, lazy, and pathetic. Not to impute this to OP, but this sub needs to be more cautious about the people they give this advice to. I understand that the mentality alone, apart from actually, can have benefits, like developing confidence and frame ... but it's got to be accompanied with so much more. I see so many men with the "I'm the prize" attitude who end up divorced with no girls lining up for him while she's off with the hot doctor. You actually have to be the prize too. It's not enough just to say it or believe it.

Church has nominated a female Deacon

4 upvotes · 2 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm more curious: what is a deacon in your church.

Suppose I call my wife by the title "assistant to the regional manager" because of all the housework she does. She meets Dwight Schrute one day, and they discuss what it actually means to be "assistant to the regional manager." How do you think that conversation would play out? Is this woman's position more akin to my wife's in the story or to Dwight's?

Another example: I've known many people with the title of "pastor" who don't fulfill the biblical role of a pastor. I've also known many people without any title who fulfill the role of a pastor. Is it better for a woman to be one of these people over another? If a woman is serving in the church in the same capacity as a deacon but doesn't have the title, is that more scripturally acceptable than if she had the title of deacon but the role of deacon in your church wasn't necessarily what God meant by that position anyway?

There's a lot to iron out here before jumping the gun with any conclusions.

All that said, if your church during elections gives an opportunity to ask questions or express concerns about a pending issue, why would it be at all inappropriate to do just that?

I'm still single ... just married.

4 upvotes · 28 August 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Sure. My mission is discipleship. To further this, I invited my wife to co-lead a small group with me. She declined and listed a bunch of other things she wanted us to be doing instead.

Rather than forcing her, I got together with my pastor and we're now working toward developing a discipleship ministry through our church on a much larger scale. My wife was initially uninvolved.

I speak to my wife about this, giving her updates periodically - (1) because it's something that's important to me and I enjoy talking about it, and (2) because that type of exposure shows her where my heart's at: my mission.

Historically, whenever I've done this, at some point my wife starts to catch on that I'm more interested in this other stuff than I am in her. She gets jealous of my mission and initially competes with it for my attention, which leads to a flurry of fitness tests, which eventually turns into seduction when she sees I don't cave. After that, she realizes that what I'm doing outside the relationship is bigger than either of us, so she finally decides to join along and offers to help, and suddenly we're pursuing the same mission together again.

This improves all of our interactions. She respects the fact that I'm leading us into something that actually matters and not just improving our own lives for our own sake, and marvels at the competency I display at what I'm doing, giving her the tingles. She feels more "in step" with me, giving her fuzzy feelings. She sees the positive impact it has on our children when (1) we demonstrate to them that they're not the center of our world (which is crucial for successful parenting), and (2) that they see the value in pursuing a larger mission outside the home as well. All in all, there are no downsides and I get to do what I want to do - what matters most to me in life. As a result, the sex has never been better.

Potentially Getting Engaged. Asking for Guidance.

4 upvotes · 27 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I don't like the medical consequences/risks of breast enlargement.

I was just using that as an extreme example. I'm not saying you should do it. But her reaction to that type of request would be very telling about the extent of her submissiveness.

Interestingly, after years of being 100% anti-boob-jobs, my wife initiated sex yesterday and afterward brought up the idea that she might want to have one done. ... ?!?!?! I have no idea where that came from, as I've certainly never proposed it. But she apparently is displeased with the sag that happens after having 4 kids. I don't know what I think yet, but I'm confident she'll do whatever I tell her. If I tell her, "Yeah, you should do it," she'll do it, no questions asked, no bad attitude about it. If I say no, she won't. That's the type of submissiveness you need to be looking for.

That is absolutely true. Can anything be done about this?

Yes. Read, lift, STFU. Red pill yourself. Pair-bonding is a valid psychological phenomenon that only affects people with blue pill tendencies.

I know the "honeymoon phase" has to end at some point, but I'm not sure when or what that feels like.

When: usually 6-24 months after the wedding day (for most people).

What: buyer's remorse. It's that feeling you get when you just spent every last dime you own buying a house and incurring all kinds of baggage/debt to do so and now you're stuck with it and you're wondering whether or not you made the right call, then starting to see how wonderful all the other houses on the market are, which now that you've gotten a couple raises you could have actually afforded ... if you hadn't bought this house already. That's what it feels like.

I was really into her until recently. Could this be because of the sex too?

Possible, but unlikely. It sounds more like commitment anxiety.

Not being allowed to have sex sucks. I don't want to either be celibate or guilty for 10 more years. Also I would like to start having children in the next 3-5 years. Other than that? Cooking, cleaning, etc will be nice to not have to do all the time.

All excellent reasons. The fact that you're most sexually primed in your late-teens/early-20s and might not have sex during the peak of your life is ... frustrating. I got married at 23 and still felt that way. Of course, the horrid sexuality of the first 8 years of my marriage didn't help either. Having kids at a young age was also very important to me. I wanted to have all my kids be 18 by the time I turned 50. After 4 kids, I failed my goal by 6 months. Close enough.

But what I'm seeing in your responses, which is concerning, is that your reasons for marriage have nothing to do with the advancement of your mission and they're all frame-issues. You're being controlled by your sexuality, your ideologies on how many children you want and when you want them, and what you think her services around the home will be like. Be prepared for all of these expectations to fail you in marriage. Do you still want to marry her even if doing so wouldn't get you any of those things, or not the way you want them?

I don't even know how to begin changing this.

I know /u/Deep_Strength will have a chapter on social scripting in his upcoming book. I'm going to have a smaller section within the larger concept of frame in my book (though his will be released much sooner than mine). Be on the lookout for these and ways to combat social scripting. You can research it on your own too, of course.

"Three reasons why Christian parents are raising slutty girls and beta males"

4 upvotes · 14 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

More to u/matrixtospartanatLV ...

If we are going to change the way Christianity is taught then we need to be speaking to the guys that are actually teaching the congregation.

This is certainly helpful, but note that it's not what Jesus did. He didn't go to the pharisees and say, "You've already got the ears of the people, so I'm going to target my ministry toward you so you can start teaching them rightly." No, he started from the ground up and worked against the interests of the pre-established teachers. He became the teacher of the people.

In the same way, I believe the best model isn't to go to the pastors, who likely will never change their views. They believe that it would be disadvantageous for them to do so. Instead, those of us who recognize the advantage of teaching actual Truth must become the teachers to the people. This happens through personal discipleship that evolves into small groups, which in cumulation begins to change the culture of the people to a point where the leaders have no choice but to adapt to the new culture.

I think this is what you're getting at with your last paragraph, which is closest to the model of culture-change that Jesus established for us. The top-down approach falters every time a new leader is replaced because the people themselves are never being indoctrinated. That approach assumes that people are dummies who will eat up whatever the leadership feeds them. So, if you can successfully change a leader and he teaches his congregation rightly, what happens when his successes get him called away to lead another broken church and the new guy doesn't live up to par? Well, that dummy congregation is going to eat up whatever the new guy teaches and you can just never keep up. But if the culture of the people themselves changes, it doesn't matter if Bob and his wife move away, or the Jonses stop showing up ... a few personnel changes will not disrupt the environment as a whole once you've taught people to think for themselves and to look to the Bible for answers rather than a Sunday morning sermon. This is the ground-up approach and why it is stable and why Christianity has survived for centuries ... until seminaries (among other things) began perverting it into something that no longer resembles the house that Jesus built.

[FR] Duty Sex Doesn't Exist

4 upvotes · 13 August 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Didn't mean to dodge the question and I think I edited my response before you sent this. In short, there's no way for me to compare your sex with mine, but I'd say it's certainly possible they're on par. I just don't know for sure without being in your shoes.

:brohug: back

Anyone here feel bad for being too hard on themselves re: chastity?

4 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Props for staying chaste. Get involved in a church. Period. You have no excuse for that one. Don't pursue nonchristians. Seriously, don't screw with that mess.

Those things aside, there's no problem with casting a wide net to fish for IOIs. You'll catch some bad fish and have to throw them back to the sea for some other fisherman to pick them up. But you can't catch the good fish either if you're not throwing out your net at all.

How do you learn to truly let go of someone?

4 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is an interesting comment and I like it. That said, I'd still caution OP against pursuing his ONEitis, as it puts him squarely in someone else's frame. He's being manipulated by an intangible emotional draw and not in control of his own faculties as a man, and this is dangerous. To that end, I wouldn't support the notion of, "You really love this other girl, so go get her, Tiger!" Not to say that's what you're telling him, but I wanted to clarify that point anyway so that the line was more pronounced.

Sex Addicted v. Sex Starved [MRP Draft]

4 upvotes · 7 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Let me be clear: Rollo's statement here doesn't suggest a conclusion. It merely states a fact. That fact is accurate in itself.

I agree that the Christian marriage is not about control, but you have to remember the frame of reference: that most men here are coming from relationships where they have been controlled by their wives. This post is about releasing them from that control, not about encouraging them to become controlling.

I also didn't say that a man must downplay his wife's interests. In most situations our interests are aligned. But there are times when there is a stark contrast between the two, like my wife wanting me to spend half a million dollars on a new house, when this would be unwise stewardship of our finances. I don't downplay her request, but there are some requests that are objectively irrational in the first 10 seconds of being presented, so I don't have to sit there and contemplate her input for 3 days before giving the obvious conclusion: No. Are you really suggesting I should just succumb to my wife's desires because you/she would be "extremely hurt" if I didn't prioritize her happiness over my own?

And to be clear, I don't think you account for the fact that I have positive desires for my wife's well-being, just as I do for my kids. I act on those desires. I don't ever want to go to Chuck-E-Cheese. Ever. Period. I hate that place. But I know my kids love it and it makes me happy to see them running around, playing games, and eating pizza. So we go. Not because my kids demanded it of me or emotionally pressured me into it, but because I proactively - without them bringing it up - know that it would be fun for them. In the same way, it makes me happy to do things for my wife. But not when she tries to use emotional pressure games to coerce me. If I succumb to her will against my own interests due to manipulation, pressure, or control, I'm going to have a bad attitude about it and it ruins it for my wife. But if she trusts me to be good to her, then I am good to her and it makes me happy to do that, even if it's thing that I wouldn't naturally do of my own accord. The issue isn't downplaying a wife's interests - it's a wife submitting her interests to her husband rather than trying to take control of them herself, and then the husband being responsible with those interests in his own sound discretion.

Starting a RPC men's group

4 upvotes · 30 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'll update later, but I'm joining an established men's group and tonight will be my first night there. I'm told by the current host/leader of the group that he wants me to take over the leadership to discuss "biblical masculinity and marriage issues for men."

In short, I'm being given a group on a silver platter to start this process with. I'll let you know how the first night goes soon.

Relationship started Secular/RP and now I'm wanting to reset it in the way Christ designed. Is it possible?

4 upvotes · 30 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Why continue in a relationship with a woman you're not excited to be with? Some guys spend months or years in dead-end relationships trying to make it work. Contrary to popular opinion, relationships should not be hard to maintain. People do this out of a sense of loyalty and commitment, which are good, but they're applying it in a very blue-pill way in a pre-marriage context. Loyalty and commitment are reserved for your spouse - and even then in a different way than the rest of the world typically pushes those terms.

At the end of the day, if you're a high quality man, there's no reason to continue in a relationship you're not fully excited about. To do so is to allow ONEitis and pair bonding to control your otherwise wise discretion.

Advanced MRP Course by the Coach

4 upvotes · 19 July 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'm excited for this series. Make sure to post updates here too as you go along.

Wish I didn't say anything at all...

4 upvotes · 19 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

First off, OYS. You goofed. Oh well. Admit it. Own it. Move on.

Second, unless the Holy Spirit is the one convicting you to have said something (in which case James 4 applies), you didn't sin. So, nothing to worry about there. You did your job. Move on.

Third, there's a trichotomy at play here: the bad choice, the "not the bad choice" choice, and the choice God wanted you to make. When you say you wish you hadn't said anything at all, you're saying, "I made the bad choice, but I should have made the 'not the bad choice' choice." But as a technical matter, neither of those options are the choice God would have wanted you to make.

So, then: What did God want you to do in this situation? I have no idea. I don't think you do either.

Quite frankly, even a passive, "I'll pray for you," can be condescending and reaffirming of the passivity of men in Christianity. That line is no better than clicking the "like" button on Facebook. As a practical matter, we know that prayer has value and can be influential in a situation. But you don't need to tell him you're going to pray for him in order actually to do it. So, when the question is what you should have said to him or not, the implication is that we're concerned with how he would receive whatever you would have said. Receiving an "I'll pray for you" rarely means anything to anyone other than close friends who know you'll actually follow through and who believe it will actually help. Don't click the "Christian 'LIKE' button" on this guy just because he has an abnormal mass.

What is something of value that you could have communicated to him instead?

- Look, I'm just a common worker here. I'm not your doctor or anything, but I know this has got to feel like a pretty crappy day for you. Nobody likes being stuck here. I don't even like it - and I'm not even a patient! But I do feel like God has me here for a reason, and today you might be that reason. Would you mind if I prayed over you before we go any further?

And then pray over him right then and there. Sure, it's embarrassing as many nurses and doctors will walk by. You may even get some dirty looks or someone telling you you'll lose your job over it. Be tactful in where/when/how you do it to minimize some of the risks. But if you feel the Spirit tugging on your heart like that, don't wuss out. Just do it.

I've had this exact conversation a handful of times with the homeless guys outside the court. It always goes well and I get to know them, building a relationship with the people that everyone else walks past. One guy I even offered to buy Chipotle (he was sitting right outside one) and he said, "Nah, man. What you just gave me - that was all the food I need." I asked him what I gave him and he said, "Hope. A reason to believe that there is a God and he's got more in store for me than this."

Since then, one of the guys I disciplined at my church has co-planted a church downtown for this guy and a number of other homeless people in my city. It's a beautiful thing. But it starts with being confident and assertive, never backing down when the Spirit gives you direction.

How to deal with anger against feminism and the downfall of modern society?

4 upvotes · 17 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is key. As I often say: The way to stop sinning isn't to try to stop sinning; it's to do what God told us to do. Is the same concept as trying to stop thinking about a pink elephant. If you try to stop you will fail. If you think about something else you will succeed. The same concept applies to wasteful things we do with our time.

100 Series - Theory and Understanding [Compilation]

4 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You're free to use any of it. No need to provide credit. Feel free to treat it as your own content, if you like.

100 Series - Theory and Understanding [Compilation]

4 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Unfortunately, the church today is too feminized to be willing to teach any of this. They will give lip service to the technicalities of theology, but in practice will live out the exact opposite and condemn any man who wants to be a biblical man.

What parts of "Game" should a RP Christian utilize? Which ones should we not utilize?

4 upvotes · 20 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

There's nothing wrong with making "sex" the end goal of game ... if you're married. Many men here are married, at which point I'd say that most aspects of game are perfectly appropriate. Of course, per my "Defining 'the red pill' for Christians" post (on the sidebar), this shouldn't be one's highest goal.

If I had time, I'd go into the distinction between an immediate purpose and an underlying premise, where the underlying premise of all we do should be God's glory, despite the fact that the immediate purpose might be something else. So, when I feed my kids, my immediate goal is to make sure they don't starve to death, but I also have an underlying premise of glorifying God and reflecting his image in how he cares for us by virtue of how I care for my children. But that's enough on that for now. My point is simply that a man can have an immediate purpose of enhancing his sexuality while maintaining an appropriate underlying purpose of glorifying God.

That said, as you note, if you're not married there has to be a different focus. Gaming a woman to get her into bed isn't biblical until she's your wife (unless you're making her your wife through that act). But I'm not sure much else really differs from a biblical perspective. 1 Cor. 7 says the reason to get married is when two people "burn with passion" for one another. That obviously refers to an intense sexual attraction. How's that sexual attraction going to develop if your focus in the relationship is purely platonic until marriage?

Or to be clearer: by fostering sexual attraction between you and other women, you're creating a condition where you'll be mutually "burning with passion" with someone else, thereby creating the condition when Paul would say, "Fine, go ahead and get married - but don't say I didn't warn you." To that end, if your goal is to get married and have lots of great sex, then sexual game is your fastest ticket to getting your goal met. From there it's just a matter of making sure you're not sinning.

But from another angle, in my view that seems like you're cheating the system. "Paul says it's better to stay single, unless we're about to sexually sin with someone else ... so I'll cheat the system by putting myself in positions where I'm likely to have that burning desire so then I'm not going against Paul's recommendation when I get married." That attitude just doesn't make sense to me.

And for the record, as /u/Whitified as said a number of times - if you're truly red pill (Christian or non), you'll understand that marriage should not be a goal you're actively pursuing. It makes zero sense for either a biblical or a secular standpoint in today's culture. The fact that marriage seems to be an active pursuit for most men is very troubling. If you're a non-Christian, just have sex outside of marriage and you're good to go, there's no reason to bring legal entanglements into things (obviously I'm speaking from their perspective - not that I'm actually encouraging non-Christians to sin more). If you're a diligent believer, you would heed Paul's advice and devote yourself wholly to God, not being distracted by the cares and concerns of a wife.

So, it still makes more sense to me that the Christian should not employ any "game" or sexual strategy before marriage - that he should simply pursue God, full-out. This requires being the best man you can be, which includes all the self-improvement and awareness concepts that RP has to offer. Your goal in doing this is the underlying premise of God's glory, and your immediate aim is your mission - not making yourself attractive to women. Being attractive and having women fawn all over you is a passive side-effect of doing this which will (in my estimation 99.9% of the time) result in a situation where you're in a "burning passion" anyway, so you'll still end up getting married - but you'll have done it with the proper orientation of your life that will set a precedent of seeking God and not your wife. She will know she's coming alongside you on a mission, not getting a guy who's head over heels for her.

Is there anything we as young men we can do to slowly dispel a Jezebel spirit with RP principles?

4 upvotes · 29 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good reply.

You're apparently the type of guy that attracts "Strong, independent Womyn. TM " I would stop and consider why that is.

Well, he said the answer, you've just got to look for it. He uses phrases like "I withdrew" and "I avoid" and "I have always been calm and relaxed" and "I have self doubts" and "I don't really know how to guide myself."

OP sounds to me like an insecure introvert without a mission in life. I was there once too, so I get it. But when you're not actively engaging with others and following up on those relationships, it makes sense that you're only going to engage with those who are bold and active enough to engage with you. Those tend to be the strong-willed, caution-to-the-wind types of people. So, those are the kinds of girls who show interest. If OP wants to find a woman who isn't like this - who is more meek, mild-tempered, submissive, etc. - then he's probably going to have to be the one to take the initiative (not that I recommend actively finding a spouse anyway, per my other posts).

marriage prep: confront her with my past sexual sins?

4 upvotes · 28 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

There's a practical answer here and a biblical answer. The practical answer is what you're seeing a lot of so far: don't bring it up. This makes sense in worldly wisdom. If you were with a secular crowd, I'd agree 100%.

/u/rocknrollchuck seems to take more of a blended view: don't bring it up, but make sure to follow biblical principles about not lying if she asks you about it, at which point you should OYS and not hide it.

I'll present a third option: Romans 14. Some people eat meat, some don't. Some people "consider one day more sacred than another" and others don't. The penultimate verse is 14, "But if anyone regards something as unclean, then for that person it is unclean."

To that I ask: what's the Spirit telling you? For some men they might be able to withhold the information for the rest of their lives and it not violate their convictions from the Spirit. What is the Spirit convicting you about? If your heart tells you to disclose the information, you must disclose the information, whether it makes practical sense under worldly wisdom or not. Do not violate your conscience. Your conscience can either defend or condemn you (Romans 2:15). To that end, if your conscience is telling you one thing and any man here persuades you to do another, he is in violation of Romans 14.

Simply put, there is no hard-line biblical rule about this issue. Accordingly, per Romans 14:1, it falls into the class of "disputable matters." If anyone condemns you for doing what you believe the Spirit is leading you to do, 14:10 says, "You, then, why do you judge your brother? Or why do you treat them with contempt? For we will all stand before God's judgment seat." Do what is right before God, not what your brothers say.

To that end, I offer no opinion on which way you should go - only that you should pray about the answer and take whichever path maintains the integrity of your conscience and desire. If your conscience and desire are both aligned to withhold the information, then withhold it. But if your conscience tells you one thing and your desire another, go with your conscience.

Since men are the prize in a marriage, is a dowry a blue pill idea? I'm curious to know since dowry's are in the Bible, was that an example of the cultural shift towards hypergamy?

4 upvotes · 18 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You're thinking of a bride price/reverse dowry.

RP Biblical Compendium Favorites

4 upvotes · 22 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Summary of Biblical RP in 2 Verses

David to Michal: "It was before the LORD, who chose me rather than your father or anyone from his house when he appointed me ruler over the LORD's people Israel--I will celebrate before the LORD. I will become even more undignified than this, and I will be humiliated in my own eyes. But by these slave girls you spoke of, I will be held in honor" (2 Samuel 6:22).

1. He passes a compliance test.
2. He demonstrates raw alpha.
3. He implements hard dread.
4. We see his authority from God.

5. He agrees and amplifies.
6. He spits in the face of humiliation.
7. He maintains an amused mastery perspective.
8. His mission came first, which was the underlying reason for his indiscretionary jubilation in the first place.

I'm not sure of another passage that can be more RP than this.

God Punishes Beta Men

4 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a solid reminder. But it's more than "God punishes beta men." It's: God punished all people throughout all of time throughout the whole world because of one man's male betaness. That's how much God hates the beta attitude. He put a reminder throughout history that men should never forget to leave their homes. Why do you think it took 5,900+ years before the patriarchy desolved and feminism started taking root as the new foundation for society?

Also take a look at the role of faith over the last 2,000 throughout the world and compare its prominence with society with when the patriarchy fell. Over 2,000+ years since Jesus was born and somehow within a decade or so of each other, faith falls and feminism ascends.

I used to make the mistake of believing that it was easier to find a spiritually mature woman than a spiritually mature man because there were more women in the church, which I assumed meant that women were more drawn to Christ and Christian ideals than men, and more ready to submit their lives to it. Of course, the manosphere knows the truth: the church hasn't changed women toward increased spiritual maturity; women have changed the church toward decreased spiritual maturity.

Instead of fulfilling the mission God put us here for, we're having small groups to talk about our feelings. Virtually every small group I've been a part of (except the ones I lead, of course) ends up getting derailed en masse (i.e. virtually every week) from a conversation about how to grow in our ability to carry out a mission for Christ and turns into group therapy where people are encouraged to share some deep struggle that is affecting their feelings so that we can pray over each other and have our feelings fixed ... as if God put us here to boost our morale. He promised we'd suffer, be persecuted, and that some of us would die for His mission.

How can we reconcile that with the church's modern prioritization on feelings? Because one man decided to be a beta and let his wife take charge of a spiritual decision ... and men have ever since been following in his footsteps.

Edit: I may return later to comment on the linked article. Did you mean to link to a specific comment that seems unrelated or to the article proper?

FR: The Spousal Support Scam

4 upvotes · 1 February 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Incredibly rare. They do happen, but there has to be some fraud that took place. Two comparison cases:

- I had one where the wife was pro se (i.e. no attorney) and dad's attorney bullied her into taking a bad deal that abandoned all spousal support. She got a small bit extra in the way of property division that nowhere near made up for the loss in spousal support over time. The court denied her subsequent request for support because pro se litigants are held to the same legal standard as if they themselves are an attorney competent and proficient in the area of law at hand.

- I had another case where the wife agreed to forego spousal support on the grounds that her husband was earning approximately the same amount as her through his self-employment business. Just under a year later they were back in court over a child support contempt, his financial records were requested, and it was discovered that in the original divorce he did not provide a complete record of his income and that he was actually earning about double what he had reported to the court. We then filed a motion to amend the original judgment, which was granted, and he was ordered to pay spousal support at an appropriate rate under law, back payment for every month from the date of original judgment forward, and interest on the back payment at the federally applicable rate. The court also hammered him on the child support award, accepting my client's suggestion of his income (which was far higher than we could actually prove) on the grounds that neither party had hard evidence to prove an actual number and the court didn't trust him, so they went with her allegation instead.

Long story short: don't commit fraud and you'll probably be fine.

Facebook

4 upvotes · 1 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

My wife knows I have a somewhat prominent main reddit account. She also knows I have a "secret reddit account" (this one). Every now and then she whines and complains about me not giving her full access to all of my accounts.

Along the lines of what /u/GargantuaBlarg29 said, there are two ways to handle this. My gut reaction is to take the hard-nose approach and say, "You don't tell me what to do. I'll keep secrets if I want." But that's not going to get me anywhere.

Instead I replied, "But if I let you see my 'secret account' then you'd probably harass all the girls I'm hooking up with ... and how am I going to get laid if that happens?"

Her response was, of course, to defend our sexual relationship and how good she thinks it is. I think it's good too. But she doesn't need to know that, so it's a nice little double-whammy, while also lightening the mood.

How to use TRP to grow "rich"?

4 upvotes · 1 February 2018 · /r/askTRP

TRP is here to open your eyes. It is not here to give you a purpose or help you find meaning in life. For that, there are places like r/RPChristians.

What you're really struggling with is the difference between learning and applying. Consider ...

Adam and Bob are walking down the street having a friendly conversation. Adam tells Bob, I have something to show you, follow me. So, the two men round a corner and cross a few blocks before coming to a lot. Bob's jaw drops. Before him is the most impressive mountain of bricks he had ever seen. "I've never seen so many bricks," Bob tells Adam. Adam smirks and says, "I know, right?" The two marvel for a moment before Adam asks Bob, "So, do you have any bricks?" Bob motions for Adam to follow along.

The two men walk a few blocks down the street to another lot, where Bob lived. Adam runs a lap around the house but doesn't see Bob's pile. "Where is it?" Adam asks. "Where's your pile of bricks?" Bob shrugged, "Well, I don't have a pile of bricks. But my house is made out of bricks."

Are you accumulating a pile or are you building a house? What are you doing with all these bricks you're amassing for yourself from all this reading?

How should one phrase to a woman that they don't want to have premarital sex, however, you still want to pursue the relationship?

4 upvotes · 29 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Be direct, clear, and tactful. If you rely on innuendo, she might not get it, or even if she understands the innuendo she might think that because you're not talking straight it's not a serious issue to you.

If you want to lay a clear boundary to the relationship, set the context, set the parameter, allow room for feedback, don't budge into a realm you're not willing to budge.

Hey babe, I have something I want to talk about for the next several minutes. We haven't had sex yet, but I've certainly been tempted to try. I know everything in society tells us to give into that temptation and that there's nothing wrong with it. That said, remaining faithful to God is more important to me than a night of fun and intense pleasure. I want to have that night with you someday, but I have a very firm, unwavering boundary that I will not have sex with anyone until I'm married. Is that something you can be okay with?

If she says yes, great. Short conversation. If she says no, you need to cut her loose. The harder part is actually following through with the boundary.

FR: The Spousal Support Scam

4 upvotes · 28 January 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I typically get better results for male clients out of female judges. /shrug

Argument - critique requested

4 upvotes · 28 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

This is the answer right here.

she isn't the judge

I'm pretty sure I made a whole post on this.

either she admits she isn't a good wife to you (she won't) or she will shut up

Meh, in my experience, they actually end up hamstringing themselves out instead of either of these. They'll rattle off a long list of ways that they "contribute" and assume that you should be bowing at her feet for doing all of this. In the face of the facts, this list is usually objectively irrational, but no need to DEER.

The real issue is that when most men get this list they're too afraid to say what they're really thinking: "You left sex off your list. Until it's on, I don't give a crap whatever other contributions you think you're making." Tact in the exact wording can help, of course. But the paralyzing fear of being called sexist or accused of reducing her to "a piece of meat" is too much for some guys.

I remember the first time I went there. It was liberating. Wife responds, "You only want me for my body!" You could take the easy AA there, but I find it far more effective to NI that sucker all the way. It usually reveals that she's insecure about whether she has anything of substance to offer you. Once she's in that vulnerable place, THAT'S when you AA to the comfort test: "Of course you do. In fact, let's go prove it right now. We'll make it so good you'll never doubt yourself again."

Now, in reality she wants to know that she has worth to you beyond just sex. No falling for that trap, even if it is in the context of a legit comfort test, otherwise OP will hear those things pop up on that list every time and she'll refrain, "But you told me you did value these things about me!" as her excuse for being allowed to leave sex off the list. This is no different than last time ... AA or NI into an AA. Done.

I believe this is true "frame" rooted in the Fear of the Lord.

4 upvotes · 28 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a simpler summation of the conclusion of 404 in a narrower context. Well said. And yes, this level of abundance and amused mastery in the "legitimately full" circle can be maintained perpetually :)

How to Handle a Veiled Threat of Domestic Abuse?

4 upvotes · 25 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

r/RPChristians might be a good place for some of this. That said, BPP is directly on point: your overall negativity and anger is what's screwing things up here. None of this indicates even a remote hint of amused mastery, strong frame, OYS, abundance mentality, or any skillfulness with fogging, AA, NI, etc.

As soon as she starts nagging you, AA her. If that doesn't get her to back down, fog and NI for the next dozen or two exchanges, then AA when you finally get to the bottom of the issue.

"I told her ____" ... I don't even care what's in the blank, if you're saying this phrase thinking you're putting her in her place, you've already failed. You used this phrase 4 times in a relatively short post.

Now, how would you guys have handled that?

First time she tries to screw with me over petty stuff, pat her on the head and say, "Aw, that's cute that you think I'm your little pet." Next time I just respond, "Woof, woof." A few times after that, "Hey, you seem like you're pretty up tight. Maybe if I put something up where it's tight it can help you unwind a little." This is all your initial AA and C/F. This keeps the mood light-hearted, even if she does get a little flustered that you're not taking her seriously.

That's actually a good thing. Genuine tension is easily confused with sexual tension if you're setting a context of sexuality around the tension. This is a nice double-whammy because sexuality releases tension of all kinds. So you're increasing your sexuality, while simultaneously thwarting the other garbage she's throwing your way.

If you're not skilled at AA or she's too self-aware to be distracted by AA, just fog and NI all day. "You're right, I didn't do the dishes last night. Why is that a bad thing?" Then, "You're right, I could have worded myself better. But what's wrong with being blunt every now and then?" After enough NI, you'll only ever get 3 possible conclusions, and one of these will always result:

- She decides not to deal with it and just walks away, and you let her, then go about your day business as usual, including gaming her like nothing happened.
- She realizes that her frustrations with you aren't because you did anything "bad" or "wrong" - it's that you're simply not meeting her personal preferences, at which point you do your final NI: "Why is it wrong for me to pursue my personal preferences instead of your personal preferences?" Never answer your own NI, by the way, and don't deliver the questions as attacks, sarcastic remarks, or even ask them as if they're rhetorical. They are genuine questions that you want to force her hamster to spin on. 9 times out of 10 her hamster can't run that fast and ends up just fizzling out.
- A deeper issue is revealed that's at the core of her frustrations that converts the s-test into a comfort test, demonstrating that all of her nagging and nit-picking wasn't really about those things themselves, but about something deeper. Then, when she's pondering on that issue it's like time is suspended and the ball is just floating above home plate waiting for you to knock it out of the park. AA is your bat. "You're right, it's not what you're doing. I've been so upset about how mean my mom was to me the other day, and I've just been feeling like nobody loves me anymore." Hey, honey, it's okay. <hug, rub her back. Hand on cheek and look her in the eye>. You know I love you. [And if you're a chicken who just wants to pass the comfort test that you converted her s-test into, you can just stop there. Otherwise ...] Besides, being mean and loving someone aren't mutually exclusive <put your forehead on hers and look mischievous into her eyes> ... and I'm willing to go upstairs and prove it right now.

How could I have handled it better?

STFU. The easiest order of learning progression should look something like this:

- STFU first: Learn to let her rant with you saying nothing. Don't be an idiot about it, but you do have to remain silent even while it's uncomfortable. Pop Quiz: she says, "So, where were you last night? Were you with some girl? Are you cheating on me?" How do you respond? If your gut reaction is to give me an answer to the question, you haven't mastered the art of STFU yet. If instead you think to yourself: I don't have to respond if I don't want to, but I do have some ideas ... then you're ready to move on.
- FOGGING/STFU: When in these conversations are happening, start agreeing with her, but do no more. I can see how it looks like I'm cheating on you - then STOP. "Well, are you?" Option 1: no response at all, other than maybe a smirk and a shrug (why waste free dread?). Option 2: I understand why you feel the need to ask me that - then STOP. You don't answer to her. Are you cheating? Given your faith, probably not. But you have no obligation to tell her that, especially not when she's trying to force you to do so on her terms. When she's in your frame, give her whatever comforts you deem appropriate, but when she's trying to make her frame dominant over you, the best thing you can do is just let her hamster spin and refuse to engage on her terms.
- FOGGING/BR: Once you've mastered that, and you no longer care what she thinks about you, and you're fine if she thinks you're cheating on her or whatever - now you start asserting yourself with broken record. She nags you about the dishes: "Why aren't they done yet?" You already told her you'd do them after the game. What do you do? I understand that you're frustrated, but I stand by what I said. I'll get them done after the game. She responds, "But I have a friend coming over in 5 minutes and I don't want her seeing our dirty sink!" I understand your frustration. I'll get them done after the game. You might be tempted to explain something else, like: "You can blame it on me if she's offended at our dirty sink" or "You shouldn't care so much about what your friend thinks about our sink" ... but don't. Just agree and re-assert yourself.
- FOGGING/NI: As described above, when she's getting all sassy or flustered, just say, I understand that you feel that way, but why is ____ bad/wrong? Ask this repeatedly until you get to one of those three conclusions: (1) she gives up and leaves, (2) she faces the reality that her personal preferences aren't more important than yours, or (3) the core of the issue (if one exists) is revealed and you either pass it as a comfort test or hit an AA home run (which is AA on easy mode because there's lots of silence for you to pause and think of the perfect response).
- AA: Once you've done that enough times, you'll start to get a good feel for AA responses and this just becomes your go-to.

AMUSED MASTERY fits in with all of this as well. It's an overarching mentality you maintain throughout the process to keep you from getting butt-hurt. If you have kids, this will come incredibly naturally to you.

For example, my 2-year-old daughter is hyper-emotional. There are times she'll be screaming and yelling about not wanting to go to bed and my wife just can't deal with it. So, I step in and my daughter gets right in my face and start screaming even louder, just inches away. Do I engage? No, I blow in her face. It ticks her off even more, so I do it again and just laugh. It's funny to me to see how mad it makes her when I blow in her face while she's screaming. Then I do it a third time, following it up with a tickle. Now she's laughing with me. After the tickle she does a little "hmp!" and crinkles her nose, so I pick up her arm and bite it and pretend to eat it like I'm a monster. Suddenly she forget she's mad as we play a little game and I threaten to eat her leg right off, then I chase her into her bed, which she knows is "base."

Or my 4-year old daughter whines all the time. It's ridiculous. So, sometimes I just start fogging and start whining right alongside her, usually in a similar, yet exaggerated tone: Yeah, mommy. We're hungry. Get us food. We're thirsty. Get us something to drink. My daughter gets mad that I'm mocking her, but she also finds it kind of funny and is soon distracted and realizes that whining isn't going to get her what she wants.

In each of these examples, how many times did I say: "I told her ____" (ex. go to bed/stop whining)? Never. How many times did I verbally assert my authority over them? Never. How many times did they ultimately do exactly what I wanted them to do? Every time.

My wife is the same way. I kid you not, next time your wife is sitting next to you on the couch complaining about something you did or nagging you ... blow in her face. See what she does. Then bite her arm and see what happens. Then start mimicking her voice exaggeratedly and laugh. 100% without fail she winds up in my frame rather than fighting to get me in hers, and she's laughing right alongside me.

If there's a serious issue to address, I bring it up - but I do so on my terms and when I'm ready. It might be 10 minutes later or 3 days later, but at some point I say in my own timing: "Hey, I remember you saying something about _____. Here's what we're going to do on that issue." You preempt the comfort test by letting her know that you hear what she's saying, even if you don't acknowledge her at the time, but you also show that you're on the ball and can be trusted to lead. It's a win-win.

EDIT: To be clear, obviously there are other ways to ingest all this stuff and people figure it all out in different orders all the time. But if you're as new to all of this as I suspect you are, use this as a template to get you started. Keep reading the sidebar and lifting and all that as well, which is where the real progress will come from.

FR: Crawling back to RP after some struggles, wife kicks me while I am down.

4 upvotes · 25 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I think you're forgetting Hezekiah 3:17 - "Share with the wife of your youth all the secrets of your heart, that you may delight in her all the days of your life."

Seriously, though ... transparency and vulnerability are good things, but there is a limit. When our sins affect someone else negatively, I do believe we have an obligation to confess to them to the degree that such confession can rectify the problem. But we must also remember Psalm 51:4 - "Against you only have I sinned."

No matter the struggle, here's how I conceptualize this:

- If the sin doesn't affect her or your relationship with her in any way, you have no duty to confess. Only do so if you think she could help you, bearing in mind that "accountability partners" rarely ever actually solve sin issues and it's usually counter-productive to make your wife your accountability partner.
- If it negatively affects her directly or the relationship in anyway:
 - Confess the sin itself
 - If her behavior contributes to your sin (ex. as a trigger), let her know her role in the situation; if her behavior in this context is also sinful, call it out for what it is
 - Let her know the conditions in which your sinfulness is likely to recur
 - Take responsibility for the sin itself and how it affects her and the relationship; don't blame her behavior, just let her know that her behavior is a trigger
 - Because she is now aware of your situation and her influence and the impact it has on her and the relationship, and that this is an ongoing issue, your obligation in confession is done and does not need to be repeated with each recurrence of the sinful conduct.
- If your ongoing sinfulness changes in some way so that it has a new or different impact on her or the relationship, remind her of the issue, let her know of the new information you have on how it's affecting the relationship, and leave it at that

- If your ongoing sinfulness doesn't negatively impact her or the relationship, or if any negative impact has already been confessed to her, then at that point it's an issue between you and God

To give an example, here's how this played out during the days I struggled with pornography - especially during the first chunk of the 18 month period of pure denial. I'll keep the same bullet-point format for easy reference.

- I knew my pornography struggle was affecting our relationship.
- [Condition met]
 - "I've been struggling with watching porn and masturbating to it."
 - "It's no secret that we have a pretty awful sex life. You've sinned with how sexually denying you are. I've sinned with how I have responded to that."
 - "I cannot go without sex for more than a couple days before I'm tempted to find an alternative outlet. Any time we go 48 hours without sex, there's a good chance I'm going to be tempted and fall into sin."
 - "I'm not saying this to blame you for my sin. I'm just letting you know where I'm at spiritually. It's still my sin. It's my responsibility. But you do have the ability to help me with this, although I won't force you."
 - "I'm not going to keep bringing this up every time I fail. That would only be hurtful. But I do want you to know it's an ongoing issue so that you are not disillusioned by my silence." [The first time I had this conversation she insisted on me re-confessing ever time and I actually did agree (stupidly, I might add). After a few confessions it was obvious that wasn't helping, so I stopped, which led her into a disillusioned state that because I stopped confessing I had also stopped looking at porn. That's why the "I'm not going to keep bringing this up" part is so important. The second time I had this conversation is when I made clear to her that I would not be confessing any further, but that didn't mean the problem had gone away. I insisted that I had no spiritual obligation to confess to her every time and she was unable to find any passage that would compel such confession on a husband's part to his wife.]
- At one point I realized that my ongoing struggle with pornography was creating a greater bitterness and hatred for my wife than what I was previously aware and was also causing me to see other women in real life differently, so I re-confessed the sin this way: "As you should already know, I have been struggling with pornography for some time. Your behaviors haven't changed, neither have mine. Again, that's no excuse for my own sinfulness, and you're welcome to get mad at me, but remember the plank and the speck before you speak. Although I've already confessed all of this to you, it's starting to affect me in different ways and I thought you should be aware of those changes. Specifically, I find myself frequently resenting you and wanting to avoid you constantly. I also find myself fantasizing about other women and plotting in my mind how to cheat on you without getting caught. I have never acted on these thoughts, but the temptation is certainly escalating and because my attitude toward you affects our relationship, this needed to be said."
- After that iteration of the conversation, there was never anything new, so I never brought it up again. Her behavior didn't change either.

Once I reached that point, I finally came to the realization that, as David concluded, my sin was now between God and me alone. My obligation to my wife was satisfied. Once it was purely an issue between God and me, that's when I felt like I could finally work it out. If it was an issue between God and me and my wife, then her behavior would have been too big of a factor for me to ignore. I wouldn't have been able to focus on myself. So, between God and me, we resolved the issue and the sin is gone - and the ongoing 400-level content (specifically

The Lens Illustration) is the means by which I overcame this issue, along with many, many, many other issues I was struggling through.

So, those are my thoughts on confession of sin. If it's not a sin issue, that's just purely a matter of exercising wisdom and discretion: will telling her improve things or make them worse? That's it.

EDIT: To be clear, there is no book of "Hezekiah" - that was a joke.

Can someone explain this sub's view of "premarital sex" please?

4 upvotes · 23 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It sounds like you already understand the right conclusion, but just need to know how to get there. A proper understanding of porneia does reveal this, but I'll take it you're not satisfied there. The concept of two people becoming one flesh is the next easy model to look to - that this is something God reserves for marriage in Genesis, thus practicing it outside of marriage would defy the order of creation.

Personally, although those alone are sufficient, I find the most powerful explanation in the model Christ gives to the world. Specifically, the Church is his bride. Sex is a reproductive act where a man meets with his bride to create new life. Evangelism is the spiritual parallel.

Premarital sex, then, would be akin to God trying to generate spiritual life by uniting himself with a non-believer. It just doesn't make sense. 1 Cor. 6 and 2 Cor. 6 both make it clear that God is not to be united with an unbeliever - that light should not become one with darkness.

Going even beyond that passage, Jesus says in Matthew 7 that a bad tree cannot bear good fruit. So, if God is engaging in procreative acts with non-believers, no good fruit could come from it - only bad fruit. But because a good tree cannot bear bad fruit, that would imply that God is not "good." Accordingly, we can see that God does not engage in spiritually reproductive acts with non-believers.

Now, spiritual contraception does exist too, but these virtually always fall in the category of "sin," which we know God cannot do. So, that leaves the conclusion that by the model Christ sets premarital sex is sin without exception.

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

4 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

To be clear, as I said elsewhere, this is not a hard theological view I hold that I would endorse to anyone else. I was just listing a framework that accounts for the very basic facts and was asking for input. Don't act like I was trying to use this as a teaching for all to follow. My original post should make this clear.

Even so, I don't think you realize the degree of interpretive measure you're taking in all of this. Although I personally oppose polygamy on grounds of wisdom (Solomon being my prime example - but I still see no command in that story), I don't see the same clarity you do in God's opposition to it. Instead, I see in 2 Samuel 12 God telling David, "I gave you all of Saul's wives and concubine, and if you wanted more I would have given you more."

I'm trying to figure out how much of what we believe is actually scripturally mandated as compared with human views that we simply believe are what God would have said if he did decide to address the issue. The latter is a dangerous path to tread.

Be the Judge

4 upvotes · 19 December 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Some good things here ... and so so so much wrong too. I'll leave it at that.

Advice to get over a breakup ?

4 upvotes · 18 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm sorry to hear this, brother. I went through the exact same thing back in college, but didn't have the benefit of being RP aware at the time. I was misplaced in thinking I was some kind of super-Christian (I was actually a non-Christian) and she initially had all the outward signs of being a Christian, but after deciding I was the guy she wanted to marry, she got scared of losing her "crazy, fun college years," so she started cheating on my several times a week (mostly because I was too self-righteous to have sex with her before marriage - which was a good choice, but from a wrong motive). After about 9 months of being together I finally became a genuine Christian, realized that our relationship wasn't anything godly, and broke up with her.

That being said, I'll start by fully endorsing the response by /u/RedPillWonder and suggesting you read up on /u/OsmiumZulu's guide to finding a Christian wife.

Second, props for making the wise choice of committing your life to pursuing Christ! Don't let this be a phase. Let it be your identity. I've finally started the 400-level content, which will dive deeply into this.

So what now? ... what's the RP Christian way to handle this?

Ideally, just ignore girls for a while and start learning and growing in your faith. Go monk mode. If you want a quality girl, you have to be a quality man. It sounds like you're just taking your faith seriously for the first time, which means you've probably got a long way to go.

Find someone to disciple you! One year of being disciplined can catalyze the same degree of spiritual growth that would take most other people a couple decades or more to figure out on their own.

Get on a mission. Biblically, women are meant to be helpers. God said, "I will create a helper suitable for him." If you don't have a mission, what's your wife going to help you do? Finding a mission that's more important to you than finding a wife is going to be (1) what attracts a Christian woman to you, and (2) what makes her feel whole in her relationship with you. The divorce rate for couples that have an active lifestyle of evangelism and discipleship (the mission God prescribes to us) is under 2%. Why? Because if both people are doing what God designed them to do, they will be incredibly satisfied in life.

Develop a frame. This should go without saying here, but your frame is you. It's your identity. It's that core truth that shapes how you perceive everything in life - and it should be unshakable. Without a frame, when you do find another girl, you'll end up buckling to your affections. Decide who you want to be based on who God says you are, then start exploring what life looks like to be that.

Ghost her. I hate saying this, but my dad taught me this as his cardinal rule of dating and I can't help but agree: When you end it, end it and never look back or you will always get sucked back in. Seinfeld had a long-standing joke on the series over how often Elaine would get back together with Putty (one of the main guys she saw throughout a couple seasons of the show). There was even a whole episode devoted to the idea that a break-up doesn't stick in one-go ... it has to be eased into over time. Don't let that be you. When I left the girl I referenced above, I made the mistake of hanging out with her a couple other times. In my mind I was trying to prove that I could transcend the stigma about being friends after dating. I was obviously wrong, saw what direction things were moving, and ultimately had to put a hard stop to all contact. I chalk this up to fleeing from temptation, not letting it have any part of your life. If she was a source of temptation while you were dating, she'll continue to be a source of temptation afterward - and don't let that in.

I hope this helps.

It's hard to lead if you don't have preferences

4 upvotes · 29 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Leaders thrive in chaos

This right here ... such an underrated aspect of leadership. If there is no chaos, there's no need for a leader - things just naturally unfold as they should. More to this point, though ...

Going in and demanding to have every one suddenly revolve around you may in fact be a strategy to display your value, but it's also a good way to show how much of a prick you are.

Sometimes it's okay to be a prick, but on the whole, leading when there isn't chaos and things are naturally unfolding in an orderly manner comes off as weak. It makes you seem like a control freak, which most people associate with mental instability, not the solid oak-like qualities men should embody.

As John Maxwell notes, leadership is influence. Not position. Not power. Not a platform. Influence. So, trying to look like the man in charge just for the sake of it isn't a display of leadership; it's often a display of insecurity. It shows that a person doesn't understand leadership and doesn't know how to influence people without leveraging position, power, platforms, etc. as the backbone for how he gets things done.

To that end, with military experience in-hand, I'm sure you can attest to the difference between your COs who led purely out of position as compared to those who had earned influence in their subordinate's lives.

She's not your's it's just your turn

4 upvotes · 17 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I know MRP suggests not letting your first officer/mate in on what is going on ... But this is worldly advice. The Bible has given the Christian husband rights over his wife and it is his responsibility to find a Christian girl who wants the same and understands her role in a marriage.

To be clear, there is merit to the notion of leading with your actions, not your words. But more to the point, secular RP has no basis for authority over the woman. In fact, quite the opposite: it is an absolute IMPERATIVE for them to keep things quiet because women have all the power in most first world societies. So, if they tried to exercise verbal authority, it would be obvious as coming out their butts. Instead, they are forced to make her want to submit to his authority.

As Christians, we come from a slightly different place. If the wife is biblically grounded, she will understand the compelling authority of Scripture in her life. Although I typically advise against men using the old, "Submit! The Bible tells you to!" argument (which is a really bad one), there is actually some room for us to have the direct, verbal conversation with our wives about biblical submissiveness without ruining the plan - because it's a concept that she must ultimately embrace or otherwise reject aspects of her faith, which compromises her internal integrity.

All of that said, I defy you to find a verse that says, "A husband must be completely open with his wife and tell her everything." That's not in the Bible. I agree that there are some things where we have a moral obligation to disclose them, but I'm doubtful RP principles is one of them. I know a lot of things about philosophy, sociology, etc. that my wife wouldn't care to hear even if I tried to tell her. Awareness of theory of intergender relational dynamics isn't any different. If she asks and you lie - that, of course, is a different matter.

What is the value of femininity?

4 upvotes · 13 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

After a long day fighting the world most men go home to a masculine, controlling, judgemental, sex denying harpy. These men are worn down over the years.

Indeed - one of the values of femininity to the man is not only in femininity for its own sake, but in avoiding the negative repercussions of being with someone who is non-feminine.

What is the value of femininity?

4 upvotes · 13 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

This is a great question! Here are some things to chew on:

FIRST - The question assumes that God organized masculinity and femininity for our benefit. Although all things do work together for our good (Romans 8:28), God has higher purposes (Isaiah 55:8). In this particular situation, God's higher purpose is that through marriage he is trying to establish a parallel for how the Christ-church relationship would operate. So, he created men and women uniquely in order to demonstrate the role that we, as Christ's bride, are meant to fulfill in relationship with him, while also giving men the opportunity to display the type of masculinity that Christ employs with us. Establishing this parallel is God's first and primary purpose in creating the genders differently, so even if there is no value added to the man from his wife being feminine it still makes sense that she should be feminine all the same - in order that the parallel would be further established and understood and that our marriages would properly reflect Christ to the world, not only in our individual representation of his character, but in how we function together as a unit.

SECOND - From the very beginning God said, "It is not good for man to be alone" (Genesis 2:18). God has put an internal compulsion in the heart of most (read: 99.9%) men to want to have a wife - and this occurred in Eden before sin entered the world, so we know it is part of His original design for the sexes. God then created woman from Adam's rib for the purpose of completing him - that a part of him (literally his rib) was missing and he could not be whole without being one with her (through sex).

Now, again with my first point: this is all a parallel to demonstrate to us how God desires to be in relationship with us and how the unity between Christ and his bride is something that forms a more perfect whole. It explains why the church is meant to long for Christ as a wife longs for her husband - and also how God, although being self-content without us, chose to give us an irreplaceable role to play in his plans. Ecclesiastes 3:11 references this when it points out that "God has set eternity in the human heart; yet no one can fathom what God has done from beginning to end." That is, we were created with a longing that only an eternal God could fill, and nothing on earth is going to fill that.

More to the point here, though: God created men to need a feminine woman to help point us toward that eternal longing that we otherwise try to suppress (see Romans 1:18 et seq.). So, we want a feminine woman simply because God made us desire it and long for someone like that.

THIRD - If a woman is not feminine, it's extremely hard for the man to fulfill his role in the marriage. When the marriage roles are broken, attraction between the couple suffers (see 102-103 on the sidebar). So, if a man's wife is not feminine, either he will lose attraction to her, or even if he does not, because of her lack of femininity she takes a more masculine role in the relationship, scaling back her husband's masculinity, causing her to lose attraction to him, and this then hinders the relationship from the other side. Once again, broken marriage roles also impacts our ability to reflect God to the world, which is an essential function of the church and being a Christian in the first place.

FOURTH - It should come as no surprise, but children without a clear mother and father figure tend to suffer significantly. Despite what popular agenda tries to say, children that are raised without a feminine presence in the home (even male children) tend to be imbalanced. Because Malachi 2:15 says that the whole point of marriage in the first place is "to produce godly offspring," the impact of our lifestyle choices on our children should matter significantly to us. So, if the guy is determined to be masculine, then the wife should be determined to be feminine. When they choose to swap roles, see the first 3 points for why that doesn't tend to work.

FIFTH - When referring to traditionally feminine roles (i.e. housekeeping, cooking, laundry, nursing children, etc.), the captain/first-officer/ship example keeps coming to mind. If the captain is stuck swabbing the deck and cleaning the cabins all the time, he has no capacity left to chart a course and steer the ship where it needs to go; he can't look out for icebergs or storms coming up; he can't inspect for where maintenance and repairs need to occur; etc. In short, running a family is not a one-person job - especially when kids are involved. Just look up some stats on kids raised by single parents as compared with those who have both a mother and father figure present. So, if the man is to have the capacity to do what he needs to do in steering the ship, it is of great value to him to have someone else who can manage the day to day operations. That's why CEOs appoint managers and supervisors. That's not to say that the wife (or the "feminine woman" in general) must do all of these things by herself; rather, it means that there is value to him to delegate the responsibility for the care and attention of these things to her. She may want to hire the neighbor boy to mow the yard instead of doing it herself; or maybe she contracts out a bathroom remodel or hires a nanny or housekeeper or sends the kids to daycare so she can work. She should still run many of these directives past her husband, but it is helpful for him if she does the legwork he has delegated to her, develops a sound plan, and solicits his approval (or otherwise tweaks/adjustments to her proposal) before carrying it out. This is efficiency in the home.

SIXTH - Femininity is incredibly attractive. Guy or girl - it doesn't matter. Repeated psychological studies have shown that people have stronger positive emotional brain reactions to seeing a feminine woman than they do to seeing a man or a masculine woman. Because of this, the household is judged by the appearance and character of the wife before anyone cares to react to the husband. So, if the family is to make a good impression on outsiders (as the Bible compels us to do, per 1 peter 2:12, 2 cor. 8:21, 1 timothy 3:7, and Romans 15:1-2), the femininity of the wife is the most appealing place to start. It makes other women think, "I wish I could be just like her!" and it makes other men think, "I wish I had what they have!"

SEVENTH - There are some things that masculinity simply cannot do effectively. For a man to maintain his direction and mission in life, he must sacrifice certain qualities and traits about himself to get the job done. Inviting femininity into the home allows someone to fill in the gaps where he has forfeited his ability to do so - and this benefits the man by not having to try to work beyond his ordinary bounds.

EIGHTH - It's just pleasant to be around a feminine woman.

Edit: See also this comment on a tangentially related post over on r/TrueChristian about the benefits of femininity and biblical submissiveness. I think /u/redpillwonder linked to that thread on RPC a while ago, and it was an interesting read.

New to RP, Keep seeking approval?

4 upvotes · 8 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I still want someone to tell me I am doing a good thing

God designed us to seek approval and validation. Before the fall, we were understood to found our approval and validation from Him alone. After the fall, our relationship with God was severed and we only truly understood physical relationships on earth among people. Result? We now crave validation from other people instead of from God.

The problem is that only God's validation can truly satisfy us. Galatians 1:10 says, "Am I now trying to win the approval of human beings, or of God? Or am I trying to please people? If I were still trying to please people, I would not be a servant of Christ."

The Gospel is the answer. Because Jesus died and rose again, if you are in Christ you have a reconciled relationship with God (2 Cor. 5:19), and thus are able to receive his validation.

How do you get it? Read anything I've ever written on having a mission - specifically as to adopting the mission of disciple-making. In Matthew 25 Jesus tells a parable where the master validates his subjects: "Well done, good and faithful servant!" What did they do to receive this validation? They multiplied what they were given. You received your faith as a gift of grace from God - that is your talent/mina. If you fail to multiply it, you will be like the guy who hid his mina and was cast into darkness "where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth" (v30; a descriptor also used by Matthew in 13:42 to describe hell).

If you do multiply, you will receive the validation you so desperately seek - and this is a validation I experience daily as I continue to meet with and disciple men.

I keep wanting to ask her "do you like the new me?"

For the love of all that is good - DO NOT DO THIS. I wanted to do this really bad. I actually did at one point. It's such a huge display of low value that you actually get the opposite of the validation you're looking for. She might verbally praise you at first, but a flurry of fitness tests will soon follow in an effort to put you back in your place, proving that her words were hollow. It's the female crabs in a bucket mentality - if you start improving, she has to as well, so she'll verbally come off as supportive yet with her actions try to undermine your improvements so she can retain the power in the relationship, and also proving to you that she really doesn't care for your improvements the way you want her to.

If she already demonstrates this based on her actions, let that be enough. That's how women actually speak most of the time anyway - and so should you. Acta non verba.

Also, I fully endorse /u/OsmiumZulu's comments on rebranding - very well put. Meditate and pray on that.

[For Singles] Getting Laid Like a Christian (part 2)

4 upvotes · 3 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Wow. <Adds to the sidebar>

I got near the end and thought, "There's only one thing that I'd add to this," and then you said that too.

found this on facebook

4 upvotes · 31 October 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Well ... yeah, she needs the TV to give her those feels because he's obviously not giving it to her. Despite feeling relaxed and pampered, she's probably not feeling romantic compulsion or sexual tension.

fast results, little ones--but wow

4 upvotes · 22 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

That and new guys (myself included at one point) often misread early signs due to confirmation bias. They want to believe that what they're doing is working, so it's easy to interpret events in that light rather than realizing that she provably never would have cared much to help out a bit more in the first place. It's not that a new tactic is changing how she interacts with them - it's that they're just finally tapping into something that has been there all along that they've just been too chicken to test.

Get past those pre-existent inclinations into new territory and that's where the true difficulty begins.

Nice guy married to someone who feels love from random acts of service, help me out here.

4 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

5LL

I couldn't agree more. One of my first posts on here was about that book. Covert contracts galore. It does have value, but more in how to game. But even then, you have to figure that part out for yourself because he doesn't tell you how to use the 5 tools for that purpose.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepilled to answer)

4 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Disrespectful, rude, trolling, etc. comments will be removed. Genuine discussion is always permitted. I know this isn't a PPD sub, but I also don't shy away from healthy discourse that engages in why we believe what we believe. I don't like the notion of being a mindless drone that just believes what I'm told and am not willing to engage with someone who has a legitimate challenge to my way of thinking.

If it becomes overwhelming, I may adjust how things get moderated and be more strict, but right now there's virtually no discussion on the viability of RP views, so we haven't hit my threshold yet.

Either way, thanks for notifying me of this. I wouldn't have found out otherwise, given how far nested this conversation is - and on such an old thread.

What is going on in the head of Christians that give BP marriage advice?

4 upvotes · 18 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Women are more likely to develop an emotional connection to God that can be used for the church's advantage (for good or bad - it works both ways). As a result, the church has a vested interest in keeping women in the seats to maintain a position of power. This has been going on since just after the days of Theodosius I. Although the origin of this fem-centric preaching was a grab for power, because it went on for so long modern pastors simply follow suit and assume that pedestalizing women is a "noble" thing to do and consistent with how the church has always done things (nevermind the fact that we don't see this attitude anywhere in Scripture).

Now, Jesus is held as a shining beacon of self-sacrifice and we're all told to aspire to that same level of self-sacrifice. So, if a man leads his family, great - he does well. But if a man fails to lead his family and his wife steps up and does so, the church tells him that's even better because he's being a servant to his wife, self-sacrificing like Jesus did in order to maintain her happiness.

How do they hamster away the Scriptural incongruence? The church turns a blind eye and just assumes that all households are naturally run with men as the leaders. If women just happen to always get their way, it's not because the woman is leading the family; it's because the man is leading in a way that "loves and serves" his wife - by sacrificing the decisions he would have made in favor of the ones that serve her interests. This is then glorified as being "Christ-like" just like Jesus sacrificed himself for his bride.

What they miss is that Jesus never self-sacrificed just for the sake of it. He always had a greater purpose - and his self-sacrifice always led to his glorification. When a man self-sacrifices just for the sake of it or without enhancing his glory, he is breaking the pattern that Jesus laid out for us. Yes, men do need to engage in sacrificial love. But those sacrifices should always be there to further our own God-given agenda in life and enhance our glory as the head of the household. This is what the church misses.

Remember: God doesn't sacrifice his agenda to make the church as happy and comfortable as possible. That's not the kind of self-sacrifice Jesus engaged in. Jesus' sacrifice was specifically to further his own plan - one that he established as the leader of the relationship.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

4 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I will say, this entire post boils down to: "Gradually ease her into it in low-pressure environments until she's comfortable or even enjoys it." That's it.

The problem is if you say just that and nothing more people make all kinds of idiotic assumptions about what "ease her into it" means, so they end up screwing it up and saying, "Well, that didn't work." Then when they're complaining that 2 weeks of "easing into it" was worthless and you say, "No, this really takes months," they complain, "Well, why didn't you tell me that the first time? Why would it take that long? What would you do for all that time?"

But when you answer those questions up-front to avoid these failures and complaints, everyone who's already half way competent makes the opposite complaint: "Why would you say all that? Isn't this kind of obvious?"

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

4 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The fact that you blame yourself for her lack of attraction is to me wrong, tragic and a form of self torture

Isn't that the whole point of RP, though? How often do men come here asking for help and we refrain: "It's your fault. Take responsibility. OYS. Man up and be attractive"?

I'm not sure how it's torture for me to acknowledge that being physically obese, emotionally weak, and mentally passive were serious contributing factors to my wife's lack of attraction to me. What woman would be attracted to that? Very few, I'm sure. To suggest otherwise is to defy the very heart of RP and go back to the beta mentality that "you should just be yourself and find that special someone who likes you just the way you are - even if you are lazy, fat and boring."

It's not torture for me to acknowledge the facts about how I have contributed to the flawed relational dynamic I have with my wife. It's just being real. We call it out for what it is here on MRP all the time - drunk captains, beta men, "faggots," or whatever the situation of the day is. How often does any flaired individual (yourself included) suggest we should blame women for their lack of attraction to their fat, slob, beta husbands?

I personally think marriage should be entirely abandoned as a concept.

From a civil/governmental perspective I agree with you entirely - and I'm not sure why anyone outside of a religious institution would ever want to marry. That being said ... this is marriedredpill. To quote the "Guidelines and FAQ," which is literally the first link of sidebar material:

Isn't TRP against marriage?

Our goal is to help newly unplugging men trapped in loveless, unhappy, low-sex marriages. By becoming stronger and more assertive men, they can bring a lot of happiness to their marriage and LTRs. We encourage men to grow in those areas before reaching the point to "next that bitch".

I believe my posts and comments here are perfectly aligned with this goal.

Clever girl, I wasn't paying attention

4 upvotes · 6 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

Women mistakenly assume (1) that looks are the only thing that makes a man sexually attractive to them, and (2) that increasing beta comfort traits in a man won't impact his looks and won't affect her sexual feelings toward him. To them, adding beta to an attractive man is a means of fixing his weaknesses without negating his strengths. In reality, they don't understand what makes certain men sexually attractive to them, and culture tells them it's all looks and nothing else. They also don't realize how adding beta affects everything else.

Pre-marital sex, experience, and reality

4 upvotes · 6 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for sharing your story! One thing that stood out to me:

I want to sleep with her, and the holy spirit is telling me to look at marriage not like it's a technicality, but a union.

This is so often missed. Western church culture represses sexuality to such a degree that the "wait until you're married" part often goes unnoticed (i.e. people remain repressed even after marriage) or it causes marriage to be viewed, as you say, like it's a technicality - that marriage's only real purpose is to get sex. In reality, Malachi 2:15 tells us, "And why did the Lord God make them one, with a portion of His Spirit in their union? To produce godly offspring." In light of Romans 9 (the whole "not the children by blood, but by the promise" thing), it occurs to me that the purpose of marriage is to work together on the common mission to produce spiritual generations for God's Kingdom - and as with all parent-children relationships, to raise those future generations to have a healthy understanding of both spiritual and physical reproduction as well.

Thanks for sharing :)

Bitchy mood

4 upvotes · 30 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

That was an edit you made after I replied. Long story short, do you want to do things on her list? Do it. If you don't, don't. I feel like a lot of guys on MRP waltz around thinking the best way to be RP is to defy women whenever possible. Screw that. If what they want to do is what you want to do, why do you have to defy yourself just to prove a point? That's idiotic. As in my original comment: you shouldn't be out to prove a point or teach a lesson. Just do what you want to do. It's that simple. Don't make things more complicated than they need to be.

A few questions about overt and subvert communication, and when to use which...

4 upvotes · 15 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Here's what you're missing:

- "Women say they want the truth" is what they always legitimately want at a conscious level. No matter what the situation, they always want their questions answered and things explained to them. This is how they control their world - because knowledge is the cornerstone of power and manipulation (although she'll never admit that her thirst for knowledge is really a power play).
- "But they never want full disclosure" - this is a subconscious inclination that affects their attraction. They don't consciously realize that they want the mystery behind the man to remain just that: a mystery. The more mystery, the more she can rationalize and hamster out about the guy and fantasize, etc. This makes her excited and tingly. But she'll deny it to her dying day because the feminist imperative tells her she needs to be empowered - to have all the answers, even if it takes away the mystery and magic in the relationship.

So, if she asks you that question, you have several options on how to respond:

- OYS: Give the straight answer, own it, and move on.
- Self disclosure -> fogging/negative inquiry -> AA: Tell her the truth and if she tries to judge you negatively for it, get to the bottom of why she thinks it's such a big deal - then AA when she finally reveals the core issue: "You're a wasteful scumbag who can't manage money!" "Darn right I am, but I can manage you!"

- Mystify -> AA: "Oh, I put it to good use," and refuse to go further than that. She keeps asking and you say, "You're getting feisty ... makes me want to put you to good use too!"

And there are many others.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepillled to answer)

4 upvotes · 11 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I meant to reference that verse in my main response on this thread, but ran out of room and had to edit it out.

"Women will be saved through childbearing" is a reference to discipleship. Jesus says, "By their fruit you will recognize them," when figuring out how to discern who is in Christ and not. The fruit is the reproductive offspring of a tree (which originated as another tree's fruit at one point too). This view is consistent with every other passage where Jesus talks about plants/fruit.

So, there is a great weight on our ability to generate offspring - that's the very essence of how we can have assurance of our salvation. Although evangelism/discipleship are not necessary for salvation itself (which comes through faith), they are inherently present in every genuinely saved person in some capacity. After all, Jesus simultaneously says, "Any tree that does not bear good fruit will be cut down and thrown into the fire." Note that he does not say "bears bad fruit" - it's a failure to bear good fruit. So, no fruit at all = hell (with some need for clarification on semantics that I won't get into here).

If we understand the "fruit" to be the "child" that a tree bears, it now makes much more sense how "women will be saved through childbearing." They have the unique position of modeling for Christians everywhere - both men and women alike - what spiritual childbearing should look like by virtue of their own physical childbearing. This is an honor men do not share in a physical sense. Instead, we must look to the female aspects of childbearing and childrearing to understand how we, as the bride of Christ, are to function in the evangelism/discipleship processes.

Both you and OP (tag: /u/Whitified) might find this article very interesting. It notes that if a wife was barren, talmudic Jewish writings permitted (maybe even compelled) the man to divorce her, and also emphasizes that the ancient Jews understood the obligation of reproduction as an imperative only for the man, although the woman is the vehicle by which this would happen. This somewhat parallels with: "One man plants, another waters, but it is God who makes it grow." That is, we are the vehicle (soil/tree) God uses for spiritual reproduction, but the ultimate responsibility for our bearing fruit is with Christ, not his bride (us, the Church). That said, if I am a barren bride, particularly if I'm a harpy, denying bride to Christ, and that is why I am barren ... that leads to some rough implications that many pastors and theologians would rather ignore. It's easier to take a dishonest look at these passages and explain them away, as with easy-believism. Again, Matthew 7 is directly on point here with its "fail to bear good fruit" as opposed to "bear bad fruit."

50/50 v. OYS/Value

4 upvotes · 8 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Interesting. Usually I'm the one getting accused of and berated for valuing the marriage as an ideal over the man.

None of this is to imply "tyrannical ownership" and I'm not sure how you read tyranny in any of this. My wife is happier with this arrangement than treating our marriage like a business or joint venture (with few exceptions, of course). That puts too much pressure and investment on her.

Take it or leave it, my view is that Jesus models the perfect marriage for us. He doesn't model a 50/50 enterprise or joint venture or even a captain/first officer of a ship relationship. He models a benevolent dictatorship (as opposed to a tyrannical one). Better than a ship is the metaphor of a king over his kingdom with a queen at his side. But like Arthur, we aspire to use our ultimate authority to advance our kingdom, not abuse it lest we be overthrown (divorce rape).

Jesus' people understand that EVERYTHING is His and we are only stewards acting under his authority for the good of his glory. If I don't model this in my marriage I cannot reflect Christ to the world or help connect my wife to Christ. Instead, she would operate on covert contracts (in the Christian works we call this legalism), thinking God owes her something.

What is selfishness?

4 upvotes · 31 August 2017 · /r/askTRP

And the closest thing I have to an empire is my country

If you're married with kids, it's your family. If you're still single, you're in empire-building mode (i.e. establishing your career, social status, residence, etc.), so you're better off focusing on self-improvement until other people's lives depend on you. And even then, if you don't focus on keeping yourself strong and you're all about self-sacrificing for your family, you won't be strong enough to be someone they can depend on. Don't be weak. Marcus Aurelius had to be strong himself before his country could depend on him.

I'm dating two MGTOW.

4 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Nice guys can smell it out. They're also the most jaded/wounded guys on the market, but they're committed to their niceness. If you want a nice guy, great, but don't later complain that they're not willing to be a real man for you.

The way they sniff it out is your body language, posture, facial expression, hair style, clothing choice, voice inflection, etc. Men and women alike - our past baggage affects how we interact with people today. These subconscious cues are instrumental in the decisions we make. We rationalize it at a conscious level in different ways by saying things like, "I prefer women who act such and such a way or who wear these types of clothes, etc." (or in the reverse for men), but those attitudes, behaviors, clothing styles, etc. are all a product of our conditioning. So, they're really saying, "I like people who have been conditioned to express themselves this way." Chances are that people who express similar external features have similar internalized baggage about their past, oftentimes the nature of that baggage even being similar.

There are exceptions, of course. But on the whole guys (or at least moderately perceptive men) can subconsciously and immediately tell which girls come from a wealthy upbringing, which ones have been sexually abused in the past, which ones are artsy, etc. all from a first-glance impression.

What triggers women to do random shit tests in an LTR?

4 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/askTRP

We have been together for a few months now; should I even be worried about those tests? Will this continue for the rest of our life?

Tests are her way of remembering how attractive you are. The more you're tested, and the more you pass, the more tingly she gets. She likes knowing you're a strong man, so she (sometimes subconsciously) does things to evoke a reminder because she wants to feel hot for you.

This will continue your whole life, but will taper off when you're not attractive to her anymore. When she knows you're weak and worthless, she won't need to test your strength and resolve very often. She'll just walk all over you.

Seems I handle them OK, but still feels uneasy.

It feels uneasy because you have a weak frame. You're bluffing your way through it and afterward thinking, "Phew, I made it out alive." Yes, you handled it "OK" but still lots of room for improvement as your frame strengthens.

Dread-game may be the most important aspect of a Redpill LTR or marriage.

4 upvotes · 29 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Yes, I wear mine selectively, but have had it off for the better part of the last 4 years. Biblically there is a basis for women to wear a symbol of submissiveness to their husbands (see 1 Cor. 11 I think, on head coverings), but no like requirement for men to wear a symbol of commitment. At my wedding (before I lost my alpha) I instructed the officiator not to bring up the rings in his message and to talk about Malachi 2:15 instead, which says God's purpose for marriage is to have sex and make babies.

Filed today.

4 upvotes · 29 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

And make me rich in the process!

Seriously, though ... fighting for the sake of fighting doesn't help anyone but the attorneys. Go in with a clear strategy beforehand and you can usually get better than the courts would give you and cut your legal fees to 1/4 of what they would be if you played the jerk card, making her want to litigate against you. Save the jerk card for how you pick up the next girl.

How long should I wait to be "official"?

4 upvotes · 28 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

As /u/mauibaya said, you're probably already in a relationship - as long as the exclusivity is an overt agreement.

That said, if it wasn't an overt agreement and it was more of a passive statement that he's not currently with anyone else or looking, you need to remember that he hasn't agreed to stop looking. If that's the case, you're not in a relationship. Whether he'd word it this way or not, you may just be a plate that he's spinning to see what happens in the event you do move closer together ... but he might pick up another plate down the road and not feel any remorse because he hasn't committed overtly to you not to do so.

how long is a reasonable amount of time to wait before I can expect a relationship?

As long as it takes to get in the same city. I'm a firm believer that LDRs are not real relationships. I say this as someone who spent the first year of my "relationship" with my wife over 1,000 miles apart. We talked on the phone and by video chat all the time. We shared stories and had an emotional investment. We had overtly agreed to exclusivity. There were emotions both ways.

But it was a one-sided arrangement. Although I cared about the relational connection, I was gaining absolutely no insight on physicality, and seeing each other every 3 months during that year simply didn't reveal much (granted, as Christians we both agreed not to have sex until marriage, so I'm talking about physical responsiveness in different ways than just rote sex). In essence, she got to vet me for everything she wanted to see in the relationship and I gave all of that information while remaining blind to whether or not she met the criteria that I needed in the form of physical intimacy.

Result? After we married, we had a very, very long time of sexual frustration and disappointment. We had talked about sex and having a physical relationship in our long-distance conversations, but what she said was very, very different from how things played out in action. What made it worse was that she honestly believed what she said. On a theoretical level, as long as it remained an intellectual exercise, she was all about having a great, healthy sex life in marriage. But as soon as we were in the same city together, I started picking up signs that she was extremely low-libido and physically non-responsive, which was incredibly inconsistent with all of our conversations the previous year (again, conversations she genuinely meant and believed, even though her body didn't end up responding the same way her mind thought it would). I was dumb enough to buy into her excuse: "It's just because we're not married; I don't want to be tempted to go too far. I promise [yes, she made an overt promise] that as soon as we're married I'm going to be jumping all over you and I'll be so horny and insatiable you won't know what to do with me." That never happened. Marriage actually decreased what little physical interest she had beforehand.

My point is, it's not fair for you to be able to vet the man on the relational aspects and him not to be able to vet you on the physical aspects - and even if you think what you're saying with your mouth will line up with your words, and even if you have a few short-term in-person experiences to look at, none of that can really be relied on. If he's willing to do it, great - just make sure you're not unintentionally duping him to the point where your biochemistry doesn't respond the way you consciously think it will right now, while you're at a distance and getting a few short bursts of physical contact. I've seen this LDR stuff fail again and again and again well beyond my own experience.

The good news is that it can be redeemed. I totally love my wife and don't regret marrying her. I do, however, now realize that our LDR days were not an actual relationship. It was a time of emotional coddling and information gathering, to put it crudely. When I started seeing how we interacted when in person on a daily, consistent basis - that's when the relationship began.

For more reading, Rollo did a decent post on this:

<https://therationalmale.com/2011/09/20/letting-go-of-invisible-friend/>

FR Just filled for divorce

4 upvotes · 26 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

Beautifully said.

Let me add to OP that the single most important thing you can do up front to prepare for the battle ahead is to map out your negotiation high and low up front. Consider the following categories:

- bank accounts
- vehicles
- retirement
- real estate
- investments
- business interests
- credit cards
- medical bills
- student loans
- mortgages
- vehicle loans
- custody
- parenting time
- school placement
- child support

- spousal support
- medical needs/expenses for kids
- extracurricular activities for kids
- dependency deductions
- pets

First circle the ones most important to you or just reorganize the list in honest priority. If the kids aren't as important as your retirement don't lie to yourself because you think you're supposed to put them on to. If they are on top, out them there. But I'm constantly amazed at how child support is a higher priority for guys than time with the kids. Nevertheless, custody and parenting time are so important for girls that this type of attitude gives huge leverage. All I'm saying is to be honest with yourself.

Second, with that prioritization write out your realistic best case scenario. Don't give yourself 100% of the retirement unless it's all separate property or you're giving up something else in exchange - but don't sell yourself short either. That's for the next step.

Third, do the same thing again, except identifying your absolute bottom line - three minimum you would accept to settle the case.

Give that to your attorney up front, tweak it as you go, but maintain a strong sense of the legal cost you will incur to (1) get between these goal posts, and (2) to move your result up once in the goal posts.

Following this strategy is the difference between my $10,000 legal fee cases and my $100,000+ legal fee cases. I give it to all my clients and those who have a clear vision for their priorities always save buttloads on legal fees. The ones who have no clear goal or think they have to win on every issue end up spending a small fortune.

Your wife is a whore and you should divorce her

4 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

That makes more sense. To that I'd defer to 2 Timothy 2:12-13 - "If we deny him, he also will deny us; if we are faithless, he remains faithful."

So, if she is merely faithless to the marriage vow (i.e. by constant denying sex, for example) then we should follow in Jesus's example (Paul is actually quoting Jesus from Matthew 10:33). But if she actively disowns that vow (i.e. cheating or trying to divorce you, etc.) then we're free to disown her right back. I don't get the impression Jesus would be happy about this second option as many men would be at the freedom to start anew, but we're all still human.

RPW, please don't have this mindset when you get older

4 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

This would make sense if every 40+ woman was (1) wise, (2) has valuable experience, or (3) has a good heart. Those women do exist. But they are not the majority of society by any stretch.

Ok ASKMRP, riddle me THIS!!!

4 upvotes · 17 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

I still think monk mode can work in an LTR/marriage - and I know it was beneficial to me. The key is confidence and attitude, and to own it. There was one point where my wife questioned me on why I'm not even trying anymore, fairly early in the process, thinking I was mad at her. I said, "I'm taking some time to figure myself out." She seemed to be processing what that meant. I didn't explain. Instead, I just pulled her in and said, "Besides, if I was all upset right now, would I do this?" and then made out with her for about 30 seconds. "Now go get some sleep. I'll let you know when I'm ready." She didn't bother me about it again.

When I came out of monk mode after finding RP toward the end and implementing some things, it was a drastic improvement from the garbage sex life we had before. I am fully confident that if I had kept trying to "initiate, initiate, initiate" during this time, the improvements in me would have come off as so gradual in the bedroom that she wouldn't have enjoyed the full experience of the change - especially the lifting. Her mental process each time would have looked something like this:

"sex with a fat guy ... sex with a little less fat guy ... a little less ... a little less ... can't tell if he's still fat or not, but I only remember him being fat, so it still feels like he's fat ... better shape ... better shape ... he kinda looks good, but it's really not all that different from the last time ... more in shape ... more in shape ... he looks really good, but this isn't at all as exciting as I had hoped."

By withholding on the initiating, I went from 75lbs obese one time we had sex to the very next time having huge pecs and my abs were showing. That stark contrast was jarring to her in a very good way. She physically saw my body change gradually over time, but she experienced it all at once in the bedroom.

But I do agree that monk mode for a married man looks different. It's pretty much only an intentional celibacy thing and for a short time. You still lead, OYS, lift, engage with your wife, etc. You do not go off to your room to meditate, withdraw emotionally or physically, ignore responsibilities, etc. That'd be idiotic.

Why ask?

4 upvotes · 17 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

Amused mastery is not simply for your wife. Consider those people as practice for strengthening your frame. While keeping your ego in check, rise above those types of comments and laugh it off. After all, that's what they want you to do - that's the whole reason they're mocking you that way.

That said, if you want a place that will share hard truths, while giving a little more respect, feel free to post on r/RPChristians. Even if you're not a Christian, you can still get some good RP advice with a different atmosphere until your frame is strong enough to come back here.

Take my word for it - I've been ridiculed plenty enough, and could call out half a dozen people on that. But I'm thankful these people gave me an opportunity to practice rising above it with my attitude, while keeping the validity of my thought processes in check.

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

4 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You have to remember that child support is not you paying 100% of the expenses for the children; it's usually based on a % of income. So, the statutes in my state have a table that says if the joint marital income is $X/yr then $Y of that should be allocated for the children. If you make 80% of the combined marital income, you pay 80% of that number and she presumptively will pay the other 20%. The figures in the table in my state were based on research done in the 80s and have not been adjusted since (for inflation, for example), so they're actually very low numbers compared to the actual present-day cost of raising a child (but that doesn't stop dads from complaining).

When I get dads who are paying all the child related expenses and then get slapped with a child support award, I always remind them that when the court does this, they're expense-shifting. There is no shame in enforcing this. So, stop buying their clothes, back to school stuff, etc. Unless it's separately ordered as a division (i.e. medical expenses, and sometimes extracurricular expenses), she's now responsible for all of that. If she doesn't want to pay it, you say, "Then deviate child support and I'll start covering that stuff again." Put the pressure on her to accept the reality of what she wanted. Sure, most dad's object: "But that's not fair to the kids because she just won't get them new clothes, etc.; she'll keep the money for herself." Fine, then let that happen for a while and when the court sees that the kids haven't gotten new clothes in a year and the stuff they're wearing is falling apart or too small (yes, this happens), then they switch gears on who should be parenting the children primarily.

As for getting custody, I passively addressed it above, but in my jurisdiction she has to have at least 2 of those things I mentioned in the custody/PT sections working against her. If she has nothing wrong with her, you're not getting sole custody. That's just how it is. I'm actually going to step out to meet with a client right now where mom was making all kinds of allegations against dad that didn't pan out, she's ticked that it didn't pan out, and the court is saying, "If there's nothing wrong with dad, he gets equal parenting rights." That concept goes both ways. Custody is less about who the better parent is and more about whether or not one parent is a total flop. If neither parent fails, then it's shared parenting.

Why your wife should work at a real job

4 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

there is one particularly insidious christian ideal (not so much biblical, but christian nonetheless) that I think absolutely needs debunking, and that is that a woman's place is in the home

I don't think I know any legit Christians who would hold this as part of their faith. There are many who will acknowledge it as personal preference, but this is not a "Christian ideal" in any sense of that phrase.

That amounts to roughly $160/week, and $8,320 per year.

In my area, the standard rate is about $250/wk per child (less if they're in school). I have 4 kids ages 5 and under = ~$1,000/wk = $4,000/mo. Starting in two weeks one of them will be in Kindergarten, so I'll save $100/wk on him = $900/wk = $3,600/mo.

maid service ... we pay $80/week. Which is $4,000/year

We pay $100 every 2 weeks = $2,600/yr

I don't really ask my wife to cook

I do all the cooking. My wife maybe cooks dinner 2-3x per month and about 80% of our dinners are at home.

So if my wife chose to stay home and work rather than get a real job, she would be worth to me about $18,000 per year ($8,000 + $4,000 + $6,000).

Some people have additional peripheral considerations. My law firm, for example, doesn't have a decent health insurance policy (it's a 3-atty, 2-staff op). So, if we do health insurance through my job, that's $1,275 in monthly premiums + $6,000 deductible per person. Through my wife's job (large accounting firm) we pay $500/mo in premiums and have no deductible ($20 co-pay/visit). This is a massive savings to keep her at work.

But work also has parking costs for her, additional gas (in a 30-minute commute this adds up), etc. Also, you forgot to tax-effect her income. Assuming you're in a 30%-ish bracket, if her salary is $26,000, her take-home would be about the $18,000 you'd need.

The sting of divorce rape, if things do turn sour, is massively reduced.

In my case, it's completely gone. My wife earns about $110k and I'm a bit above that, but we're close enough to a standard 55/45 split that the court wouldn't grant a spousal support award from me to her. I've also set myself up to the point where I'd be guaranteed 50/50 custody/parenting time rights with the kids, which with equal income negates child support in my state. In short, I would suffer 0 consequences from a divorce. Of course, I'm also a divorce attorney and have made friends with all the judges, magistrates, clerks, bailiffs, etc., so I've got that working for me too.

Rather than being at home, she's in the presence of other men during the day. While this might sound like a recipe for cheating, I actually think it's just the opposite.

It does go both ways. My wife has had men at her work hit on her and it gave her bubbly feelings inside. She promptly tells me about it and we resolve the issue, but most men don't have that kind of honesty with their wives. If my wife wasn't Christian, she almost assuredly would have cheated on me a couple times. She still might surprise me someday, as the saying goes ("AWALT"), but it hasn't happened yet. But you're right, housewives (better term than SAHM, which I think is somewhat emasculating and affects the father-child relationship long-term) also have opportunity, so neither one is more advantageous than the other in this area, in my view.

Kids should be with their mom rather than with a sitter. I disagree with this.

Indeed. I disagree with your rationale, though. First off, this is, again, not a "pervasive christian ideal." This has nothing to do with Christianity - and Christianity would actually 100% deny the concept of women having the primary responsibility over the children. The father is the head of the household. That includes children too.

Second, this type of mentality promotes the notion that wives should get default custody because it inflates the role of the mother with children.

Third, the studies you referenced are non-repeatable. Other studies have been reported to show the exact opposite results - that children who start out at daycare have already adapted to the social aspects of school and the student-teacher environment, giving them an advantage over the other children.

Developmentally children benefit more from fresh breast milk than refrigerated breast milk. They do, but that benefit is minimal.

After a typical maternity leave, this is correct. For the first 3 months it really is significantly different, though. But again, most jobs will give this time off for maternity leave. My wife gets 6 months leave with 100% pay (she's on leave right now, actually).

In closing, your wife should have a job.

Depending on family goals and priorities, I completely agree and advise all couples to this end. Perhaps the most important factor that you left out: You never know when something will happen to you, and if your wife is not there as a backup plan, having no education or experience, then the family is in deep waters without a paddle. That said, I do acknowledge that some people have different priorities. As /u/BluePillProfessor would say, most women really just want to be a guy's arm candy and men would love them to be ready and available at all times for sex. So, her staying at home can be very conducive to this, as the stressors of having a job change her psychology a good bit ... not beyond control, but enough that it makes the man's job harder to keep her sexually interested. Plus, she's a higher value woman, so she knows she has more options, which makes it harder for the man to keep his value up to par until they're in their mid-upper 30s. As a rule of thumb, I consider it a 1::2 ratio of income. If a woman can earn $60,000k/yr a man has to earn about $120k/yr to match the income-impact of each of their overall value. To that end, my wife's income level increases her value on the marketplace more than my income increases my value on the marketplace, so I have to compensate in other areas, such as being more physically fit, OYS, DHV in other areas of life through leadership, fringe benefits, etc.

it motivates me at work to earn more money. Specifically, a lot more than her. As a man, I instinctively recognize the need to be the main breadwinner, and seeing my wife's income creep up is like a fire under my ass.

Per my last section, you're better off increasing your value in other ways. If your incomes are approximately equal, you'll negate pretty much any and all potential concerns for divorce. When you no longer fear divorce, dread increases, which actually raises your value to her in an effort to keep you. Of course, she simultaneously needs you less, which is why increasing your value in other areas is essential. In short, yes, you should want to earn more overall, but I wouldn't make it a high priority to have an imbalance in your incomes - this will actually hurt you.

Key point here: Stop hating on Christians because of your misconceptions! That's ignorant and childish.

Tag: /u/JDRoedell - because some of this is relevant to the comment where you summoned me.

108 - Life-Path of a Relationship

4 upvotes · 14 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Heh, this is the cliff notes. I normally take 4 weeks to cover this content, 2.5 hours per week. A marriage counselor friend of mine actually uses this as the baseline for all of her clients and has turned it into more of a 10 week process, because she filters some stuff from her degree into this framework.

Fasting and Hard Nosed Prayer

4 upvotes · 12 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

You should be willing to pray when you don't even feel like it.

This is well said. I often tell people: Love is about what you do, not how you feel. You say you love God? Show it, even if you don't feel it.

I fasted for 40 days even though I worked an active job.

Dang, dude - that's hard core. My max was 7, and that was while I was in XC in high school, running 10-20 miles/day. I about died for the first 3 days ... then by day 4 I didn't even notice it anymore.

I got myself to a point where I realized I don't need anything but God.

This is where I was. Then, around a year ago I got the clear command: "Now that you don't need your wife, I want you to go get her."

Homework assignment: do a 36-hour fast.

Heh, just came off of one yesterday (48hr).

Excellent post. I wish I could give this two upvotes :)

It is working..

4 upvotes · 27 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

my sex drive is up the roof

I think this is an under-appreciated aspect of RPing. Many men in DB marriages consciously repress their sexuality. They know they want sex, but they forget what it's like to have the hard urge - especially with the physical, emotional, an intellectual strength to act on that urge to gratification. They have changed the urge for sex to resentment about sex.

RPing takes that conscious repression and says, "Stop being an idiot - it's okay to feel that urge and let your strength take over sometimes" - just not in a rapey kind of way. As a result, regardless of whether the woman is actually responding to the changes in the man, he's going to get more sex and more satisfying sex simply because he's going for it, when in days past he would have sat in a corner and stewed about it instead. I don't know what % of RP success is attributable to this factor, but it's more than 0, thus worth being reminded every now and then.

Well here we go / victim puke I guess

4 upvotes · 26 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

I'll ditto this.

Princeton's new 'men's engagement manager' to combat aggressive masculinity on campus

4 upvotes · 26 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWives

Just ... wow ...

I cried in front of a potential plate. She fucked me everyday for the next week.

4 upvotes · 25 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

I follow /u/cholomite's law - Tingles without fuzzies won't last; fuzzies without tingles are worthless. You've got to present a beta side every now and then or the LTR will certainly fail. You just have to make sure you're in control over how this is expressed, not her making demands. Most TRP people won't bring this up because TRP isn't all that interested in fostering LTRs; MRP is more designed for that.

As for your particular situation, if you care to ignore the religious angle, I wrote a post about what you're describing. The gist is that each gender has a role and there are two ways in which these roles play into attraction: (1) seeing someone of the opposite gender who is likely to be really good at their role, and (2) seeing a quality in a potential mate that they will let you fulfill your role.

For women, one of their roles is caring and nurturing. She will not stay long with a guy who will never let her express her caring or nurturing side. But you gave her an opportunity to console you with a quick, "I'm sorry, it's okay." This is attractive as long as it stays on your terms and does not give any indication to her that the problem giving rise to the situation will interfere with your ability to fulfill your role as a man (i.e. mostly alpha stuff).

EDIT: Also, how does your title reconcile with: "I left ... I didn't message her till a week later"? It sounds to me like there was no sex for the entire week after you said that, whereas your title says, "everyday for the next week." What gives?

Half assed mrp?

4 upvotes · 24 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

I am +- a 7 SMV and she is a 4.5

I get the impression you're going just based off of looks and nothing more. You might be accurate about her SMV because women's SMV is based 90% or more on looks, for most men.

Let's be generous and say your looks are actually an 8. Factor in ...

- "Therapy" = baggage = lose a point

- "Relapsed for a month" = can't follow through with goals = lose a point
- "stress ... stress ... stress" = buckles to pressure = lose a point
- "chores are done by me or her mum" = mommy has to help ... and it's not even your mom? = lose a point
- "resentment ... lasts for a week" = butt-hurt/weak frame = lose a point
- "mostly starfishing when 'it' happens" = not commanding her in the bedroom and caving to bad sex instead of walking away/weak frame = lose 3 points

Okay, the math obviously isn't going to work if we subtract. Let's assume all matters are 0, but you get +2 or 3 points for being in pretty good shape (I'll take your word for that). In that case, it's her 4.5 against your 2 or 3. If you've got a decent job that's better than hers, maybe you're a 3 or 4, but still less.

Now, out on the marketplace you might actually look like a 7. You have to remember that SMV is not an objective number floating above your head. It's how people perceive you. You've given her a lot of reason to believe that you're a very low-value man. So, she perceives you as lower value than her ... approximately a 3. You perceive her as a 4.5, and she probably sees herself that way also.

If you were to go out and find someone new, they don't know all your failed fitness tests, inability to command the bedroom, emotional/mental health baggage, etc. They get your appearance and immediate interactions. So, you pass 2 or 3 quick tests on a first date and you're immediately back up to a 7 ...

... until you start an LTR with them and because you haven't grown out of your weak frame yet, you repeat all the other mistakes and they discover that what they thought was a 7 was really a 3 or 4. So, even if you can up your game to get a 6 or 7 into an LTR, if you don't fix yourself first, you're just wasting your time.

Solution? Use your current girl as practice. Sure, it'll take some time, but start overcoming these problems and get better at passing tests. Then, after you're legit RP and where you need to be, either she's going to see your increased value or you're positioned for your next relationship to be far more successful.

First impressions are hard to break. Long-term impressions from consistency and predictability are even harder to break. That's why "MRP is TRP on hard mode." If you can win on hard mode, you'll destroy the competition on easy mode, if you really do end up getting stuck back there.

SO is bitchy and disrespectful too often, should I leave?

4 upvotes · 24 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

Those are all things that give your frame strength. They aren't the shape of your frame. The shape of your frame is determined by your expectations. For example, a guy who has a massive paycheck has a strong frame; but if he doesn't spend that paycheck to improve his life circumstances, it's pretty uncomfortable inside that frame. Consider ...

Weak, Uninviting Frame - Overweight, addicted to video games and porn, no friends, socially jaded so he demands to get his way all the time, makes unreasonable requests, is extremely lewd, has a crap job and lives in a crap apartment.

Strong, Uninviting Frame - Physically fit, great job, strong confidence, large social circle, but lives with his parents, bosses people around all the time, and is consistently emotionally distant.

Weak, Inviting Frame - Most beta marriages ... Great listener, provides material comforts, even if it means living above his means, helps his SO whenever she needs it, will go out of his way to please her, in an argument he's usually the one to apologize and give in Strong, Inviting Frame - He doesn't need his SO, but he loves having her around. He has lots of friends, a great job, is physically fit, and knows how to say no to his SO. He commands respect wherever he goes. People like to be around him because he's just and fair, he's witty, he's generous, and people just like to be around him because his awesomeness radiates from within and makes them want to be a little more awesome too.

Wherever you are on the weak/strong - un/inviting matrix, there are also the particulars about your frame. For example, before discovering RP I had a moderate-strength frame. It wasn't weak, but it wasn't strong. That said, even where I was strong, I had accounted for my wife's wishes and desires in the decisions I had made more than I should have. As such, I wouldn't back down from things when I made a decision, no matter how much she whined ... but my decisions usually tended more toward her favor than I would have liked. This made us both upset because I wasn't experiencing life the way I wanted and she was still getting shut-down without seeing me experience the internally radiant alpha glory. So, passing tests meant squat when I still wasn't happy with the result I had chosen.

The thing is: I was the idiot who chose to set the line in a bad spot and then build a bunker there.

A good example: She would make suggestions on how to fix up the house. I disagreed, but came up with my own ideas that incorporated many of her ideas, even ones I didn't like. Why? Because I thought I was honoring her. We'd then set that plan in motion, despite her frustrations of not getting her way. Then, when it was done, we had a house that neither of us really wanted. It was a symbol of unholy compromise - that both sides were losers, not a balance between winners.

So, at some point I said, "Screw it. You're right, our oven handle is falling off and the dishwasher is leaking all the time. We do need to get new appliances." She goes through a couple stores and picks out these super expensive ones with all the bells and whistles. That would have been a colossal waste of money. I had a budget of $1,500 on the two appliances combined, she was looking at that much for each of them (i.e. $3,000 total). Old me would have tried to compromise: "Okay, I'll meet you in the middle at $2,250, but I'm going no further." I'd then hold that line and not budge no matter how much she whined and gave me dirty eyes. At the end of the day, I'd be upset for over-spending so we can have a couple extra knobs we never turn and buttons we never push.

Now, when this situation happened (literally just yesterday) I left her at home, took the kids with me, picked out a pair of appliances within my budget, texted her pictures, saying, "These are what I'm getting. take a quick look and let me know if there's anything glaring that I forgot about." She texted back saying the oven wasn't a convection oven - she was right, that was pretty darn important and I forgot to check if it had that feature. I picked out a new one and sent the pic, she said it seemed fine, but obviously wanted more bells and whistles. I bought the one I picked out anyway. Afterward, she's breathing easy because she has new appliances that actually work and are significant improvements from what we had before, and she didn't have to go through the stress of picking them out or trying to convince me into buying them. They're not exactly what she wanted, but she respects the fact that I made a decision, set a boundary, and didn't cave to her.

So, an example of re-doing your frame:

- My old frame was defined by compromise and had a $2,250 boundary.
- My new frame was defined by me and had a $1,500 boundary.

Despite the fact that the result was further away from the $3,000 boundary my wife was proposing, she was actually much happier with me setting a clear boundary and getting the job done. As my frame develops in strength and she learns to respect it, I will soon be able to delegate tasks to her on my terms. For example, I could send her to the store and say, "Go buy a new oven and dishwasher, but don't go over $1,500" and she'd do it. Six months ago, if I tried that she would have come home with $3,000 spent and lots of excuses why it was a great idea.

Now, you need to decide whether or not you're living the life you actually want to live and with the boundaries you actually want. Account for her desires less and less. As much as I hate to say it, one of the biggest parts of unplugging for me was accepting the fact that women don't know what they want and they have no clue what will make them happy. Even if you cater to them and give them everything they say, they will still not be happy. Period. So, if they don't know what makes them happy, and me catering to them makes me unhappy, then the only rational option is for me to do what I want to do and let her come along for the ride. If she's happy, great. If she's not, it's not like I have any better ideas in the first place.

The one caveat is that we do know what makes women unhappy. If you cheat on them, they will be unhappy. If you beat them, they will be unhappy. If you pick your nose and scratch your crotch next to them in public, that will make them unhappy. If you are consistently emotionally distant, they will be unhappy. So, if you want a woman to rest inside your frame, make sure you're not decorating your frame with things that will make them unhappy.

Is Red Pill truly congruent with Holiness?

4 upvotes · 15 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, great points and fully agreed, except to the extent that TRP promotes spinning plates, premarital sex, and a pump and dump mentality, which I do believe are firmly opposed by scripture, with a few exceptions.

Red Pill Advice for a 17 year-old?

4 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Is any of this really RP advice?

A lot of guys there are shy, smart, and just want a wife.

This sounds like you're saying, "Go find where all the blue pill guys hang out and I'm sure you'll find someone who will drool over you." If I had to guess, /u/blue lumi is asking for comparable RPW advice to what guys get on TRP because she wants an RP perspective, not to be told, "Ignore RP and go fund yourself a nice blue pill guy."

I appreciate the logic in your post if she just wants to find any boyfriend at all, but I don't suspect this is the case.

Welcome to Red Pill Christians

4 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

It is never explicitly taught like that; rather it is a social stigma. It begins when children's ministries, youth groups, and singles groups get blasted with "sex before marriage is a sin." Then they get blasted with all kinds of shame and guilt tactics to manipulate them away from sex. Although they didn't intend it that way, teenagers almost always interpret it that way regardless (especially the girls). They linger in this "sex is bad for me right now" mentality for so long that when "right now" switches to "I'm married" their brains can't rewire themselves without massive effort. A few good (yet extremely rare) sermons just doesn't cut it. My wife was one of these people and I have counseled numerous couples and discipled many, many men who had marital sex problems because of this.

Then there's the confusion between lust and healthy sexual desire that gets pounded on married men too ... Then the married women think they can't talk about sex openly because it might make a man lust. So they start being overly modest in their apparel, which then makes other people think all "good Christians" must set really high, over the top standards as well, and things just snowball into an unspoken cultural stigma.

Try asking someone at your church openly, "How's your sex life?" and see how they respond. 9 times out of ten the man will give a quick answer and brush it aside to hush the issue rather than engaging in the conversation, 10/10 for women ... they might even report you to the pastor or an elder. Hang out at a restaurant with those same guys, though, and the guys are just fine because they compartmentalize and don't associate the restaurant culture with the church stigma.

I can't speak to Catholicism though. Never been catholic. I just know that in the many small groups I've led, when I try to talk about biblical sex either everyone clams up or I get reported to someone, including in men-only groups.

Critique my wife's ultimate shit test

4 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

As NMMNG says, the beta's answer to everything is: "Try being even more beta! Maybe that will work."

Most people here idolize being alpha, so they make the same mistake: "Try being even more alpha! That's how to fix the problem!"

What I've learned most in the last 24 hours is that this sub is not about fixing/saving marriages; it is about putting a guy in a spot where he'll bounce back with a great sex life after a failed marriage ... and if you happen to save your marriage along the way instead, that's great. As a result, the fuzzies side of things gets extremely downplayed in favor of the "more alpha!" mantra.

The biological step-mother.

4 upvotes · 6 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Thanks :) It's my first non-question post here, so I'm glad I can finally contribute back with things I've learned.

WISNIFG for wife & kids?

4 upvotes · 3 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

I'm about half way through this book right now. I had the exact same thought. That said, there are two things that make me think it is a bad idea to share this book with your wife. I have no objection to sharing it with your son.

FIRST - There is a 99% chance that she will internalize every strategy, example, practice exercise, etc. in the context of her relationship with you. Even if you have a great relationship, she's going to think about ways that she can start practicing this stuff against you. The end result is that you're helping her build a stronger frame rather than letting her rest in the comfort and safety of your frame.

SECOND - MRP theory is based on the premise that LTRs/marriages are not equal - that the man is meant to be the head of the household and his wife is meant to support him as a Captain and a first mate combo functions. WISNIFG talks about marriages as co-equal relationships, which will give her the impression that she shouldn't be looking to you as the head of the house - that she has a right to step up her authority in the home. This could cause you some trouble and make it a lot harder to be the alpha.

SON - For your son, this is all a different story. You should actively be trying to teach him independence and this book is a great way to do just that. In addition, he's not likely to employ these methods against you because you are still a support system that he does not want to put in jeopardy. The book itself even cautions not to try certain things with your boss because you have to be wise when you exercise assertiveness and not, and getting yourself fired won't help much. Likewise, your son won't want you to cut him off if he's too rebellious with his assertiveness.

Dating questions while reconnecting with my faith

3 upvotes · 27 May 2026 · /r/askRPC

The red pill means embracing the understanding of how the world really is. It does not mean embracing a prescription of behaviors. While the world appropriately recognizes that certain behaviors are good at producing certain results, the reality is that those behaviors also have consequences which even the most "red pill'd of men" will tell you to respect. For example, if you're lusting after a minor child, we're all going to agree: "Yeah, don't act on that or you'll go to jail." Consequences matter.

As a Christian, we just add one more consequence to the list that non-Christian red pill men don't embrace: the impact of sin on this life and the one to come. When Jesus said in Matthew 10:28, "Do not fear those who kill the body but cannot kill the soul. Rather fear him who can destroy both soul and body in hell" - he's sharing consequences that secular-RP advice doesn't acknowledge but we do. Ecclesiastes is a book all about what is meaningless in life and he ends it by sharing what does have meaning (i.e. the "meaning of life") in 12:13-14 - "The end of the matter; all has been heard. Fear God and keep his commands, for this is the whole duty of man. For God will bring every deed into judgment, with every secret thing, whether good or evil."

Recognizing that the red pill is descriptive of the world, not prescriptions of how men must behave let's get back to your questions ...

1. The barrier is exactly that place in your physical contact where you slip into sin. That's going to be different for each person, but when you fall into lust or into tempting her to lust, you've crossed the line.
2. Everyone experiences sexual attraction. That's not sin. God designed us that way. It becomes sin when it shifts from "she's hot" to "I would if I could." If your thought is, "I want to bang her, and the only thing stopping me is the fact that I'm a loser she'd never say yes to, but otherwise I would," then you're probably over the line. If it's, "I want to bang her, but even if I could I wouldn't because we're not married, so I'll refrain and control my thoughts further," then you're probably fine.
3. I'm not sure why you think fun/vetting are exclusive. Do both. There are a host of fictional characters to look at as great examples of people who do this. If you're a sci-fi guy, Doctor Who is fantastic at being fun/energetic and making people want to follow him wherever he goes, but you find out that much of his adventurous spirit is grounded in the reality that he uses that excitement to disarm people and learn a lot about them when they don't know he's really analyzing them through it all. If you're an anime guy, Lelouch from Code Geass is another clumsy, dramatic character who is secretly using his soft-fun side to analyze everyone he comes in contact with. Or if you're into cop-dramas, Patrick Jane from The Mentalist does this really well, constantly poking fun jokes at people and having fun messing with their minds, only to find out that's just how he disarms people to learn more about them than they'd be honest with if he asked them directly. Point being: do both.

Asking 100 Women Out - Catholic Edition: Girl #1

3 upvotes · 27 August 2025 · /r/RPChristians

Super fun read. I always love field reports. I'm glad you're taking a level head between developing confidence through practicing your approach and developing your social skills, while also not doing it from a standpoint of leading people on or screwing with people's feelings just because you "can." Looking forward to more of these.

Submissive Christian wife

3 upvotes · 16 August 2025 · /r/RPChristians

This is a male-only sub, so you probably won't find many women's opinions. I'm not really present enough to care to enforce that rule right now, though, so you lucked out. There's another RPCWomen sub out there, if you want to check that out.

Regardless, for a legit answer, it's probably best to understand what the Bible means by submission in the first place.

- The word for "submit" is hypotasso - it is a military term referencing subjugating oneself under another's authority.

- A different word is used for "obey": hupakouo - it references an active behavioral conformity to instruction.

While submission should be a driving force behind our behavior and influence our decisions (and therefore does have a behavioral component) it's more about the attitude than it is the conduct itself. The example I typically give is Paul telling us to submit (hypotasso) to our governing authorities in Romans. Yet the same guy was constantly defying his government. Strict obedience would have obligated him to turn his brothers and sisters in Christ to be slaughtered by Nero, but he did not obey. Instead, when he was caught, he accepted the consequences - and in Acts 16 we see him and Silas in prison with the opportunity to escape and they choose to stay anyway. That's submission. They recognized their government was their authority and accepted it and chose to work within the system instead of trying to defy it.

With a man, your obligation isn't to "never talk" or "just obey everything he says" or anything like that. It's to respect him and accept the consequences of your actions. What that means is that if you behave in a way that causes him to get angry, accept that he's angry, let him be angry, don't fight back or accuse him of hurting you with his anger, but embrace: "I chose to behave in a way that gave you this reaction, and I will bear the consequence of that choice without trying to change your reaction."

The default effort is to try to explain away his anger. "You shouldn't be angry at me because x, y, z reasons, so I was in the right for saying what I did, and you shouldn't be upset with me" ... is super unhelpful. Remember: 1 Peter 3 says that even if your husband were an unbeliever or disobedient to God, you're still obligated to submit - this means that even if he's wrong and sinful, your attitude and behavior toward him is a biblical constant in what it expects of you.

But I also read you saying, "I can't help it. It just slips out of me. I can't control my emotions." Okay, fine. You're not a submissive person. It might ruin the relationship, and you'll have to accept that consequence if he ends up choosing not to marry you because of it.

Of course, the Bible doesn't expect you to automatically master any trait all at once. Self-control is a fruit of the spirit. So is patience. Does anyone ever say, "As soon as you become a Christian you automatically master the skill of being patient overnight because of the Holy Spirit in you"? Obviously not. Everyone agrees that patience is something God builds in us over time with practice. Self-control, being in the same list, is the same - along with love, joy, peace, etc. They're all things we work at.

It seems like you have the heart-desire to be submissive but your self-control sucks. So work on it. I'm not going to suggest ways to do that because they're a dime-a-dozen and you can just hop on AI and get a list of 100 ways in 2 seconds how you can practice growing in self-control. Have at it.

Question about dating as a single Christian man who's looking for a Christian Woman in 2022

3 upvotes · 13 October 2022 · /r/RPChristians

However, I'd like to mention that this is predominantly in the West. In East Asia, Africa and Eastern Europe, women don't prioritize a men's looks or rather, natural physical features as much as Western European and American women do.

I totally get that. It's not a genetic trait. It's a product of the culture.

If you move to East Asia, Africa, or Eastern Europe, let's revisit this conversation. Otherwise, it's irrelevant to you.

Your argument reads like the girl who has a dozen one night stands in a month and wants to get an abortion. When someone confronts her about the immorality of abortion she says, "What about women who have been raped? See, abortion should be allowed!" That has nothing to do with the conversation because she wasn't raped. It's a deflection tactic.

Question about dating as a single Christian man who's looking for a Christian Woman in 2022

3 upvotes · 9 October 2022 · /r/RPChristians

while women might not care about looks as much as guys do

You've actually got that backwards. Research shows that women actually have higher standards than men when it comes to physical appearance. Prime example is when OKCupid did a research study on how men rate women and vice versa. When they analyzed the data from the men, they saw a pretty typical bell curve with most women being "average" and lesser were below/above average and very few were far below/above average. For women, the data was extremely skewed. They reported that 80% of men were "below average." That means that the top 20% of men included both average and above-average guys. Which means if you want to be "above average" in a woman's eyes, you really have to be in the top 5-10% of men for looks.

attractive, Christian, and FAST that are single? Again, Idk if Christian = Godly Christian = saved (i.e. the S in FAST). Godly = spiritually mature. At least, that's how I'm using the terms in this conversation.

To what extent is a wife allowed to withhold sex and affection if she doesn't feel supported emotionally?

3 upvotes · 10 September 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Welcome to the club. Your story tracks with mine pretty closely (including the 4 kids and "I'll never want to have sex with you" stuff) ... up until the point of cheating. I found MRP and eventually started this sub shortly before I got to that point. Feel free to check out my testimony/RP-imony in my post history for more.

You definitely had some big mistakes there. But what are you doing NOW in the wake of all that? How are you living for Christ TODAY?

To what extent is a wife allowed to withhold sex and affection if she doesn't feel supported emotionally?

3 upvotes · 10 September 2022 · /r/RPChristians

I gather that you're reformed

Eh, I wouldn't say that. Curious where you got that from, though.

nearly all of the counselors I sought out either 1) acknowledged the problem but wouldn't rebuke her, 2) blamed me or told me to lower my expectations. Of course, when I went to them on my own and confessed my regrettable episode of sin to them, they didn't waste any time removing me from any formal ministry involvement, meeting with me to express their concern, and assigning me a weekly counselor

Funny how that works. Try to guess how many times I've heard that exact same story. While it's not a situation I have personally experienced, I have been privy to it with others so many times that I have a great empathy for those who have endured it.

acknowledge that I committed the worse sin (though I have seen how toxic that 'who was the worse sinner' mindset is when trying to restore a marriage)

By the way you're talking, I'm going to guess she was sexually denying and you delved into porn. If I'm anywhere in the ballpark, I wouldn't jump to the conclusion that you are the "worse sinner." I have a post on this: https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/drpl1x/the_truth_about_porn/. Before you read, let me emphasize that the post does NOT justify porn use. The key prefatory line is: "As long as churchianity keeps blaming porn for more than its actual role in marriages falling apart, there will be no motive or reason for its leaders to look for alternative, more biblical cures for broken marriages and sex lives."

Sane, healthy human beings can't live in such toxicity forever. She didn't want a husband, I've come to realize.

As a product of my career (divorce attorney focusing on cases involving psychological issues), I am uniquely aware of the default mental conflicts between husbands and wives, whether there's an actual disorder or not. These are aspects of our sinful nature that almost always tie back to the curse in Genesis, but have modern implications that, while stemming from Genesis, aren't things one would naturally predict from the Bible alone, unless you spend an incredible time meditating on all the ways the curses can play out in a marital dynamic, and most people haven't given it the years necessary to get there. Understanding psychology (specifically matrimonial psychology) and then introducing what we know from the Bible about our unique gendered-sinful-natures is a "shortcut." Most pastors and even counselors/social workers are not fluent enough in both (usually only one or the other) to put that together ... ergo your situation.

You're right that you can't live in such toxicity forever. Praise God "forever" will be in heaven and not the mess we deal with here.

I'm so sorry to hear about your situation, brother. If there's a way I can be an encouragement to you as you try to follow Christ in the wake of these struggles, let me know.

Smash The Overton Window

3 upvotes · 29 July 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Glad to see you back. Solid post. Lots of things to process.

- While generally a useful tool, the Overton Window image makes it look like the window is in the dead-center of the two opposing extremes, whereas modern political climate shows otherwise. If 0 are the "unthinkable republicans" and 10 is the "unthinkable democrats," the Overton Window would be between 6-8, not 4-6 ... EXCEPT FOR ...
- It's important to remember that the "Overton Window" is location-specific. The cultural centers are exactly as you described, but there are large swaths of the (decentralized) population outside the major cities where the Overton Window would lean far in the other direction. The main issue is that the major cities are the only ones with resources to justify substantial investment in media, which is then projected. While it has, for the most part, failed to persuade the majority of the decentralized populous, it is still the only message being projected because of a lack of competition from the underfunded rural towns. This leaves a blah mix of social niceties being adopted because of media norms (things like "happy wife, happy life" or "dads are deadbeats, kids need their moms more") while still being able to reject political policy changes (things like abortion, legalization of homosexual marriage, etc.).
- I've never understood people who complain about the consequences of democracy, but still embrace it. Sure, there have been some terrible dictators/monarchs, and I'd rather live under a liberal president than a murderous tyrant, but it's also important to realize that there have been some great monarchs/dictators throughout history as well AND that this is all a false dichotomy. It's not "American democracy v murderous tyrant - take your pick." As much as I hate to admit, over the last years I've been more and more persuaded toward a corporate anarchy (i.e. no "federal" structure) with localized organization (maybe state-level, definitely at least city-level).
- I'll call BS on your "1800's where literacy rates were up" line. I've done the research on this one a few times and the data always comes back the same: illiteracy has gone down consistently from the 1800s through the present. One example source: https://nces.ed.gov/naal/lit_history.asp. That said, the overall point is still agreed.

- Quite ironically, "radical thought" is what seemingly all-at-once transitioned us from the dark ages to the renaissance, then from that to the reformation, then into the "age of reason," then again to the scientific revolution, and again to the "enlightenment" era - and eventually the "modern era" and post-modernism. Even though "radical thought" has had the impact of liberalism over time, I assume you're suggesting it is the best weapon for undoing the harm of liberalism?

Overall, our disagreement on "disciple the nations" notwithstanding, solid post and I'm in full agreement with the conclusions. Great call to action.

Parenting

3 upvotes · 14 June 2022 · /r/RPChristians

I like this post and it's a worthy topic. Here are some thoughts:

Modeling Does Work

I think you dismiss this too quickly. Let's take a look at your excuses.

We are all doomed to be imperfect

If that's the case, then all techniques will be imperfect and are to be equally embraced or thrown out with modeling.

Even if we were, perfection doesn't necessarily inspire patterning behavior

I don't see how this connects. Your argument is why modeling won't work, not why being perfect won't work. There's a difference between BEING a great example and MODELING a great example. A dad who is a great example to his kids, but makes no effort to expose his children to his lifestyle or show them how to live it alongside him is not modeling. He may be a great guy, but it doesn't mean squat if he isn't actively modeling it in a way that his kids can receive and follow. This is the difference between being a passively-"good" parent and disciplining your children.

We are all wired differently

I agree that there will be different personality styles, ranges of interest, etc. that will deviate from person to person. But are you really going to try to argue that men can only have one or two Myers-Briggs personality types, and that if you're interested in Broadway musicals you can't be a real/godly man? (as I write this from a hotel on Broadway about to leave for a musical). One of the reasons I ham up my love of musicals with RP guys is to emphasize that one can have a great marriage, bear spiritual fruit, have a good sex life, and - yes - even raise wonderful children while having interests that deviate from typical "masculinity" things, like football and poker. Do my kids need to share these interests? Nope. If my son turns out to love watching football, I will cringe inside, but fully support that. If he has other interests he can still be "masculine" by all biblical contexts and have all the things in life God designed for him.

There is a natural inclination for a son to rebel against his father to a certain degree

There's also a natural inclination for children to become their parents. Rebellion against a father-figure usually happens when the father figure is total trash or absent, giving no respect. But the cliché that "the apple doesn't fall far from the tree" is more common in the long-term than a lifetime of rebellion. Short-term rebellion, we're on the same page. In those teenage years, sons will always go off the rails for a bit. But they'll circle back in the vast majority of cases.

In short, I'm not persuaded that actual, active modeling (i.e. discipling your children) is anything short of the absolute most effective approach to parenting. I challenge anyone who disagrees with me to come spend a week with me and my kids (ages 5, 7, 8, and 10). I believe what you're arguing against is passive-existing as a "good person," which is not modeling.

Discipling your children is and always will be the best way to go.

Responding to the Rest

Now, for the advice you're giving ...

Reject passivity

I agree 100%, but I think the verse you cite is off-base. While Romans 12:1-2 is solid in its own context, that has nothing to do with rejecting passivity, though I understand that you may be defining passivity as conformance with the world. But a guy could also (and in these parts often does) reject conformity to the world while still being quite ungodly. And there are many men who are "godly" in the sense of their rejection of worldly immoralities, but who are still passive in how they express or apply them.

I'd suggest passages like Ephesians 5:16 and Colossians 4:5, which compel us to make the most of every opportunity. Or Matthew 6:33 which says we should "seek first His Kingdom and His righteousness" rather than passively avoiding bad things in life. Or there's the great commission (Matthew 28:19-20), or Colossians 3's attributes of love (all action words are ascribed to "love is," whereas all the "love is not" words are emotions we passively experience), and so on.

The key here is that rejecting passivity isn't merely about avoiding conformity to the world. It also means adopting PROACTIVE things God intends for us to do. Most people go through life doing whatever is easiest or feels good, but when something "bad" comes up they think, "Ah ha! That's the thing God told me not to do, so I'm not gonna do it," then pat themselves on the back for being so "godly." In the meantime, they walked by countless people who need the Gospel and made zero effort to connect with them, and they haven't discipled a single person in the last decade ... but because they read their Bible in their own private home for a few minutes it's all good?

Accept responsibility

Again, I 100% agree, but 1 Cor. 16:13 doesn't seem to say anything about responsibility. Other good virtues, sure. But responsibility? Not in there. I'd look more at passages like:

- Galatians 6:5 - For each will have to bear his own load.
- 1 Timothy 5:8 - But if anyone does not provide for his relatives, and especially for the members of his household, he has denied the faith and is worse than an unbeliever.
- 1 Corinthians 3:8 - He who plants and he who waters are one, and each will receive his wages according to his labor.
- And if you really want to go parental: Proverbs 22:6 - Train up a child in the way he should go and when he is old he will not depart from it.

These are all passages on embracing and utilizing responsibility if we want to achieve a desired end. And that's just the thing: responsibility does not exist in a vacuum. Some people like to say that just by being a man means you have responsibility. No. You have responsibility parallel with the outcomes you want to receive in life and the lives of others who you rope into your framework and mission along the way.

Leads courageously

Again, solid premise, but the verse doesn't speak to courage. It speaks to being godly. But something like Joshua 1:9 or Deuteronomy 31:6 would make more sense, which speak more to courage itself - and specifically to leaders of God's people. Who of God's people are you leading? If you're ONLY leading your family, you're a coward and have no ability to life-model for your family how they ought to make disciples outside the home if you're not doing it in your own life. It's easy to say, "I'm courageous because I said 'no' to my wife, and that was scary!" Ooooooh. Good for you. Now go do something outside the home that actually takes balls.

Expects the greater reward

I'll embrace this one as-written.

What would you add to that?

There are, of course, other attributes of biblical masculinity that you're leaving off. I'll defer to other commenters for a longer list. I understand that's a bigger topic in itself, so I'm limiting my assessment here just to the things you actually wrote about - not the ones you didn't. /u/Deep_Strength usually has good thoughts on this subject already anyway.

A code of conduct

I'm not a fan of this approach. More rules seems to result in more rebellion. I get that it's cool to have a "code" - like Barney from How I Met Your Mother having the "Bro Code" that talks about ways men should act, or Dexter having his "code" of only killing evil people that his father instilled in him. There is some value to these in niche situations. But on the whole, adding more rules is contrary to the message of Christ. He came to bring freedom from the constraints of the law, not to add to it. Why should we parent differently from Christ? Instead of giving us a new "code" to replace the OT law, he gave us his Spirit. That Spirit is now what guides us. A father can also instill his spirit to his son, just the same way that Elijah gave a "double portion" of his spirit to Elisha when he knew Elijah was about to pass (2 Kings 2). This is a MUCH better approach than creating a "code" of additional rules you think men must follow. At some point your son will think (and rightfully so): "That's a silly rule to have as part of the 'code.' I don't want to do that one," and then he'll question the whole thing, and when he realizes how arbitrary you've been with how you raised him, that will be his grounds for rebelling against you. Don't give him a code. Give him your spirit.

Ceremonies

I've heard this concept before. John Eldridge was a big advocate for ceremonies and "rites of passage" in a boy's life. I haven't made up my mind on them yet. I don't know how useful "ceremony" has ever been in God's Kingdom (in fact: I know it has killed much of God's earthly kingdom, the Church), but I do see some value for them on an individual level. This concept more comes from the chivalrous "knighthood" days (so I'm not surprised your book on knight hood mentions it). I think if people want to have it, go for it. You won't do your son harm, unless you orient his life around the ceremony (achieving it, or something more ongoing), which would be destructive.

Instead, "rites of passage" are more useful. These are situations when a boy has to experience something new in order to usher into a new phase of life. For me, these always come with clear conversations: the sex talk before the schools started talking about it, for one. Another is when my son started staying home alone for short times, and the conversations revolving around that. Another was when his sister was getting bullied in school, and conversations we had about his role in helping to protect her, which was something he wasn't age-appropriate to do when he was, say, 5 and she was 3. These types of new life phases are things that require unique attention. If you want to use a ceremony, your call. I'm fine with a clear conversation and check-in process on how things go with the topic-at-hand as we go along.

I know it looks like I tore your post apart, but I really did enjoy the read and am glad you brought up the topic. Good work, brother.

Getting Out of Woods and On Mission

3 upvotes · 10 May 2022 · /r/RPChristians

John 15 says: "Every branch that does bear fruit he prunes, that it may bear more fruit" but "Every branch in me that does not bear fruit ... is thrown away like a branch and withers; and the branches are gathered, thrown into the fire, and burned."

If you want your baggage dealt with (i.e. pruned), including your porn and masturbation issues, mission IS your answer, not the thing you do after you're pruned. You cannot be pruned until after you start bearing fruit. He has to see fruit before he starts pruning. Anything before that is just Matthew 12's trading one evil for another. You can stop your old destructive patterns, but others will inevitably take their place. Adopting the mission to bear fruit for God's Kingdom (i.e. reproduce your faith the same way fruit reproduces more trees when planted in nearby soil) is your answer. Don't get that backwards.

Stop Pointing the Finger

3 upvotes · 28 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Right, this reminds me of /u/RedPillWonder's post:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/hd1v5a/worthy_of_love_earned_respect_and_other_biblical/

God's commands are not conditional

By virtue of being your husband, you are to respect and reverence him.

By you being his wife, he is to love you regardless of your actions.

You are to submit to your husband even if he's not a good leader or Captain.

Pointing the finger treats God's commands as conditional.

Abstinence till marriage (Advice/Discussion)

3 upvotes · 25 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

I'm also reminded of Titus 1:12-13 - "One of the Cretans, a prophet of their own, said, 'Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, lazy gluttons.' This testimony is true. Therefore rebuke them sharply, that they may be sound in the faith, not devoting themselves to Jewish myths and the commands of people who turn away from the truth."

The "Jewish myths" were from the ritualized culture the Jewish Christians, like Paul, were being called out of. Just as Judaism lost its way and abandoned Yahweh for their own rules and myths, so also has modern Christianity abandoned Jesus for its own myths.

This could be legit myths, like "Happy wife, happy life," or entire paradigms, like the import of building up the church their own congregational unit over advancing the actual name of Jesus. It could be ministry models, like the "Come, because ..." model in contrast with Jesus' "Go, therefore ..." model.

One way or another, when people get tied up in these unbiblical myths, we're called to "rebuke them sharply" to jar them out of that silliness.

You already know I think you go overboard on this - but for anyone else reading, there's another passage on-point.

Mission

3 upvotes · 23 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Solid post. The only tweak I'd make is:

Don't get hung up on the details ... AS LONG AS your method is based on how you see Jesus doing it in the Bible.

That's the one detail that matters. My method of discipler-making is going to differ from Francis Chan's, which is actually even different from the guy who disciplined me. The key in these differences is that we're all looking at how Jesus did things and using that as our model.

I knew another guy who decided he would look at secular mentoring models and base his discipleship strategy off of what has worked in the rest of the world. He failed miserably. He could teach people generic principles, but he never found spiritual generations flowing from his life, even when he attempted to teach mission and spiritual concepts. You can't take Jesus' content and package it in secular methods and expect it to work. Fascinatingly, though, you CAN take secular content and package it in Jesus' methods and it DOES still work. I actually know several massively-successful consultants who made a fortune selling Jesus-discipleship-methodology to secular company execs.

Solid post. Just remember that the one "detail" that matters is really more of a framework: It HAS to be based on how Jesus did it, not whatever cool ideas you come up with yourself.

Stop Blaming Your Kids

3 upvotes · 24 November 2021 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Better for avoiding losing custody down the road too. I can't count the number of cases I've seen where the allegation comes up, "So and so still sleeps in the same bed with the kids," and the court basically says, "That's gotta stop now or you lose all overnights."

Worst case I've seen is one I have right now: Dad (45-ish) still sleeps in the same bed with his billboard/magazine-model daughter (16). My client (Mom) insists it's not sexual, but she's still creeped out by it. I'm not so sure she's right.

what do you think

3 upvotes · 7 August 2021 · /r/RPChristians

This is exactly what I was going to say.

In defense of the top moderator of Christian Marriage (who wrote a long essay earlier today rebuking this subreddit)

3 upvotes · 7 August 2021 · /r/askRPC

Agreed entirely. Well said, brother. I miss chatting with you.

Why does RPC hate feminism?

3 upvotes · 13 April 2021 · /r/askRPC

There's a difference between hating something and believing it is unbiblical or morally corrupt. I can love people who are non-Christians and morally corrupt - and I have great relationships with many such people. So to be clear: we don't hate feminists; but we do disagree with their philosophies and believe they are unbiblical.

That doesn't mean we think that every single thing feminists say are false or that we disagree with every single point they're trying to make. Even the devil makes good points - but he does it in harmful and destructive ways. Likewise, feminists have some good points and identified some serious problems, but come to lots of wrong conclusions about how to fix them.

I believe the Bible has better answers, and the Bible is incompatible with most of their views:

- Feminists are pro-choice, believing a woman has the prerogative to choose whether or not to kill the baby inside her. The Bible says that we are created by God and he is the only one who should decide who lives and dies and that we should not take another's life in our own hands outside of his orders.
- Feminists believe that women should have the right to rule over men in marriages. The Bible acknowledges this desire even as early as Genesis 3, but also makes clear that God has established that men should be the leaders in the home.
- Feminists believe that women should be empowered to do everything that men do. The Bible tells us that God created men and women differently for unique purposes that are both valuable, and that while women may be capable of doing many things that God has assigned to men it was not his intent that they do so.
- Feminists believe that women do not need men in their lives and can be fulfilled and self-sufficient without a man. The Bible tells us that God created women to help men, not to be independent of them. Yes, women can be fruitful and independent, but that capability is not part of God's design, and even if a woman can bear fruit for the Kingdom independently, the Bible suggests that she do so in the context of the Church, not apart from the Church, and that the Church should be led by men, and therefore her efforts should be in help and support of the men within the Church.
- Feminists believe women should be able to be pastors and leaders and teachers, including over men. The Bible says that women are not to have authority over men or teach men.

The list goes on. Do we hate people who believe false things? No, although there are certainly some spiteful people in any red pill group that you should watch out for. But there's certainly value in calling out false teaching when we see it - and there's even room for zealous anger when those within the Church are perpetuating ungodliness, just as Jesus became zealous when he saw those in the temple courts doing so.

In this, I wouldn't condemn everyone for having righteous zeal against the false teachings of feminism - especially when it's being taught among those who identify as Christians. Rather, the vitriol against such things only becomes a problem when it extends beyond the scope of what Christ himself expressed in his life as a model to us.

Why Lifting is Not a Suggestion

3 upvotes · 19 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Are you suggesting credentials don't matter? A guy who's never lifted should be teaching on lifting? Someone who's never read the Bible should be okay to teach theology? Someone who's never prayed is somehow good to lead a community in prayer?

2 Timothy 2:2 - "And the things you have heard me say in the presence of many witnesses entrust to reliable people who will also be qualified to teach others."

People have to be reliable and qualified in their field to assume teaching positions.

Hebrews 5:12 - "In fact, though by this time you ought to be teachers, you need someone to teach you the elementary truths of God's word all over again. You need milk, not solid food!"

The reality is that not everyone is qualified to teach, even though all ought to be moving in that direction.

I.O.A. -- The Illusion Of Action

3 upvotes · 9 March 2021 · /r/TheRedPill

Mental masturbation fits in here too. Lots of guys think that reading about how to pick up women or studying game somehow is, in fact, action when it is not. Don't fall into that trap either. Learning something doesn't mean you know how to apply it.

Does anyone suffer from chronic pain due to lifting injuries?

3 upvotes · 8 March 2021 · /r/askRPC

I've had a consistent lower back pain for years - especially bad since late-August. It sucks. Somedays it's hardcore (like yesterday) and others it's just a dull ache. I find that when I'm cutting and my weight is down, and I'm also continuing to lift, it hurts less. When during COVID my weight went back up and I wasn't lifting, it hurt more.

I don't know all the details of what you're specifically dealing with, but my guess is that "no weights at all" is not a doctor's prescription, and that there are ways to strengthen your muscles without trying to max out all the time. Best method for lifting through it is to start with the largest weight you can do with manageable pain and just do high reps there. If your injuries/issues are not muscular, then I'm confident you'll find that increasing your muscular strength will go a long way in reducing the pain - especially in things like arthritis or joint injuries. It takes the burden off of the skeletal and fluid-based issues and shifts it to your increased muscle size and capacity.

Granted, I'm also not a doctor, so look to what others say who may be more qualified here.

Has anyone run a "Red Pill" type course for men at their church?

3 upvotes · 2 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Amen on that. Love the analogy. To OP: join the discord and it'll be easier to engage back and forth about what you're trying to do.

How I Overcame Porn Permanently

3 upvotes · 3 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Did Jesus call his disciples to follow him, or did he wait for them to ask to follow him? Always look to what Jesus did for your model for discipler-making.

Children before marriage

3 upvotes · 26 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I was a virgin at the time I married my wife lawfully before the state and God. My position changed after I married based on a study of scripture. There are several posts early in this subs history addressing the issue thoroughly, but I don't have time to hash it out again. I'd encourage you to do some digging.

Anything You Can Do I Can Do Better.

3 upvotes · 22 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I'll give you credit that looks are not everything. As I occasionally say: looks decide the difficulty of the mode you're playing on. But why play on hard-mode when you don't have to? Just because you're too lazy to hit the gym every now and then?

That kind of attitude actually shows that you're weaker in the other areas than you think you are. If you can't show drive and commitment to take care of your body, which is easy, why should any woman - especially a high-value attractive one - assume you'll do any better taking care of your mind and spirit?

And no, "mind" doesn't mean how smart you are. I know lots of crazy high IQ people in my circles who have lazy minds that aren't suitable for leading a woman or keeping her attracted, much less leading God's Kingdom. The fact that you understand quantum physics and can speak 7 languages and code in all the major programming styles isn't attractive. The "mental" component is more about your charm, charisma, confidence, social dominance, etc. Those are things that are 10x easier to generate when you're physically fit - and some people can't generate them at all when they're not physically fit.

More significantly: in our appearance-driven society, is there any question that people are more willing to listen to a physically attractive person than the average Joe? That includes sharing the Gospel with people and discipling them. If they have to get to know you before they can develop that respect from your intellect and spiritual maturity, you're stabbing yourself in the foot because most people won't give you the time of day to get to know you in the first place if you don't present as someone they want to be. While it's not true of every single person on the planet, this does hold true with countless people - well over 50%, I'd suggest. Why cut off over 50% of the population like that just because you're too lazy to hit the gym to earn their attention and respect?

There are so many more reasons I could give. Go read "Lifting is not a Suggestion" on the sidebar. In the meantime:

And to her surprise, even with her full body weight I won.

Meditate on why it's significant that she was "surprised" by this and how different things would be if people didn't assume you were weak and scrawny because of your physical appearance.

How to vet for virgin woman quickly without wasting time?

3 upvotes · 20 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Look at the number of down-votes you've gotten on this comment and let that mean something to you.

Getting your wife back after a separation

3 upvotes · 13 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Explain that difference.

Marriage is a disaster and I'm not sure where to go...

3 upvotes · 12 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I'm 90% sure he isn't blue pill

Is he fluent with concepts of fitness tests, hypergamy, etc.? Or are you using "red pill" and "blue pill" interchangeably with other concepts such as "alpha/beta" or "liberal/conservative"?

SERIOUSLY considering leaving Christianity help! [Short]

3 upvotes · 12 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

"The Sermon on The Mount" in which there are five times Jesus takes a teaching of the law and then amplifies it Except that he doesn't. He's just referencing concepts that already existed in the OT. He was emphasizing that the pharisees were picking and choosing from OT law what to follow and not, and that there were many concepts easy to ignore, yet when broken make you equally a law breaker.

As for the rest of the post, others have addressed the main points well enough. I'm more curious at the fact that this trite point is what makes you want to leave the faith. "I'd rather go to hell than teach my children to be willing to take up their cross and suffer like Christ" is a bizarre conclusion to reach.

Lactation and intimacy

3 upvotes · 4 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

If she's not producing enough, you're certainly welcome to try, but I don't think you'll get any out, so I'm not sure how much it will actually help to supplement what she's lacking.

Idolatry, The Marriage of the State

3 upvotes · 31 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with /u/husky-viper in that I like where your head is at, but you're trying so hard to write like you're a KJV translator or philosopher that it's hard to find anything actionable in this. I can get pretty academic at times myself, so in posts where I find myself doing this, I add a "Conclusions" or "Application" section that gives the bottom-line reason the post should matter - and that, then gives the interpretive metric to go back and understand the beauty and depth in everything else that was said beforehand.

That said, I don't know that I can agree with your views on marriage. I think from a OT perspective, you're spot on. But in a post-Gospel world where we now are citizens of a spiritual kingdom rather than a physical one, the impetus toward physical marriage is gone and replaced by our spiritual union with Christ - even as the compulsion toward physical child-rearing is over and replaced by the spiritual child-rearing imperative called discipleship. In this, I agree with Paul in 1 Cor. 7 or Jesus in Matthew 19 that it's better not to marry if you can avoid it.

To be clear: marriage is still great. But the benefits of marriage that you reference are now things we have direct access to by our union with the Spirit through the cross. We don't NEED marriage to get those benefits anymore. As such, marriage is now primarily a tool for getting help toward a man's spiritual mission and legitimizing sex.

In this sense, I don't hold that "marriage is good for me because it brings me closer to God" applies to a post-Gospel people. I believe from Scripture it is a distraction from God, not a compulsion toward him. But it is one that serves a valuable function all the same, and therefore is still redeemable, especially in recognition that most men would proceed in sexual sin without it.

Is the podcast in podcast form?

3 upvotes · 29 December 2020 · /r/askRPC

u/redirectedfs also mentioned recently that he may put things up on Apple music.

Merry Christmas - I've put together my "Tricks of the Trade for a Fun Frame" list as your present - good ideas for fun during the holidays

3 upvotes · 26 December 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Who rinses beer cans? And why is this thing I've never heard of even worth getting upset over in the first place? Funny. Agreed though. Tamales are great.

Merry Christmas - I've put together my "Tricks of the Trade for a Fun Frame" list as your present - good ideas for fun during the holidays

3 upvotes · 25 December 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

My guess is you stopped because after the wedding you gradually became unattractive and instead of tickling being a fun way to tease her, it was unwanted touching. Same behaviors will always be interpreted differently when done by an attractive man and an unattractive man. At least, that's part of why I remember pulling away from it :p

What is Dominance?

3 upvotes · 18 December 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Not bad. Another perspective to frame this is that women momentarily enjoy external behavior, but long-term thrive on what's internal to their man. That's why fitness tests exist, right? She wants to know if you're an outwardly showy phony or the real deal.

In this, a guy isn't actually dominant in the relationship until he shifts from "faking it" to actually "making it." Internalization.

But there are still "dominance moves" that don't make much sense to me - as if dominance doesn't exist until a guy proves it. I can do pretty much anything I want in the bedroom - and she won't stop me. She prefers it. But something like slapping her butt or choking her doesn't increase my pleasure and I don't have to do these things to know and experience the total power of being in control - so what motive do I have to do them?

I know some women like to be choked out or spanked - so maybe to them, as in my second sentence, outward expressions of dominance also has a unique momentary value even apart from the benefits of long-term internal manifestation of it? Thoughts?

(M22) Interested in a Muslim girl - Advice?

3 upvotes · 16 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is a ridiculous conversation.

23 year old woman desperately looking for help.

3 upvotes · 9 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not in a position to suss out the exact line right now - or even confident that an exact line is possible to create, though I'd wager the bar is lower in God's eyes than we'd prefer to make it. But when OP says this:

We made an oath between ourselves, with God, saying we would be together forever (and all the other pretty things)

I'd be pretty confident that's above the bar.

A Word to New Users

3 upvotes · 5 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

everyone sticks to the main sub, even for basic questions

It's probably worth mentioning that RPC proper has lots of passive lurkers. I think some people are deterred from r/askRPC because it has a smaller subscriber base, therefore they don't think they'll get the full gamut of answers. The reality is that anyone worth listening to is among the subscriber base there (among others who aren't worth hearing out too, of course).

So, I continue to encourage people to use askRPC rather than RPC proper for most questions, unless the question comes in the form of a field report or is on a topic that is broadly applicable and useful for everyone in the community. In the meantime, we'll continue to take down weak stuff.

The Basics of Female Frame

3 upvotes · 13 November 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Not ask questions completely unrelated to the topic of the thread. Start your own post and give details.

What to do about GF?

3 upvotes · 13 November 2020 · /r/askRPC

What's your actual question? I actually have one for you.

- My brother is dating a girl who isn't a Christian. She doesn't have the qualities he wants in a wife. She's materialistic and vain. He wants someone who will prioritize family over career and she isn't all that interested. They sound like a horrible match, but he does seem to have some degree of emotions for her.

I can't figure out what he should do. Do you have any advice for him?

The Basics of Female Frame

3 upvotes · 12 November 2020 · /r/RPChristians

The law doesn't prohibit people from being alcoholics. We do not owe a duty to the government to avoid alcohol. Does that mean I'm advising people, "Therefore, go get drunk as often as possible and become alcoholics because the law doesn't prohibit it"? That's a somewhat ridiculous interpretation of the facts.

But as /u/husky-viper already noted: I did address the issue in the post itself. Just gotta keep your eyes open ;)

Simple Question, How Do I Know If I am Truly Red Pilled?

3 upvotes · 23 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Looks like someone read my Are you Truly Red Pilled? post.

I endorse this. "The Red Pill" is ultimately "truth," as Rollo puts it. I'd narrow it to "truth about intergender sexual dynamics." $2+2=4$ is truth, but not a "red pill truth."

In theory, one is "red pill" if they know the truth. But many people live in a cognitive dissonance between what they know to be true and what they're actually willing to do, then act completely baffled when they're not getting the life they want. The reason is that they don't actually believe what they say is true - they just acknowledge it with their lips to fit in, and have persuaded themselves that because they talk about it a lot, somehow they actually believe the things they're saying.

But if you really believed the key to a great sex life involved STFU, sidebar, and lift and yet you're not getting the results you want, there are only three possible reasons:

1. The red pill is wrong.
2. You're just getting started.
3. Your belief is intellectual-only, but you harbor so many secret doubts that you won't commit.

Lifting is a great example of this. I know a LOT of guys who preach the importance of lifting. Yet their physical strength is mediocre, at best. How do we reconcile this? After all, they do lift regularly - and have been for a few YEARS now! Conclusion: They recognize that lifting is important, but don't fully understand why, so they compromise their routine rather than constantly pushing limits.

It took me 6 months to go from benching 135 to 275. I know some who have been at it for years and only up to 185 - can't even do two plates yet! Does that make me better than them? In some ways yes, in others no. But what it DOES mean is that I actually believe in the purpose of lifting, whereas some of these people treat it like a checkbox game. This is why tracking progress is so important.

Are you guys ok with premarital sex?

3 upvotes · 15 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

marry them all. Gonna love that child support bill

Unless you're legally separated, there's no basis at law for child support between married individuals.

it IS fornication, and the man should be married to the woman immediately after ... And if he chooses to bring them into my life, then I'm going to have faith that he is allowing me to have them.

Come on, dude. You know better than this. Everyone in Israel knew the law that if you deflowered a virgin, you were obligated to propose. Nobody has that understanding today. Are you legit proposing to all these women?

I ask God to remove any women from my life that he doesn't want me to sleep with. And if he chooses to bring them into my life

"I aSk GoD tO rEmOvE aLl PoRn FrOm My LiFe He DoEsN't WaNt Me To WaTcH." See how dumb that sounds? Replace porn with "people he doesn't want me to kill" or "faces I don't feel like punching," etc. This is idiocy.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (10/14/20)

3 upvotes · 15 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Still no progress here. It's hard to make time for reading when I'm not in a deerstand.

Everyone makes time for the things they love or that are important to them. This isn't a "no time" issue. It's a "not as high a priority to me as other things" issue.

MISSION:

You danced around associated concepts, but never actually used the phrase "make disciples." Back to Scripture to figure out why God created you.

PHYSICAL: 2

Sorry to hear about the injury. I have a recurring problem creeping up in my lower back repeatedly. Mind sharing your/OtA's PT for that?

I think the biggest thing that I'm wrestling with at the moment is the black pill, which we've had some pretty good conversations about in the discord

I'd entertain that conversation someday.

I am destined to remain single due to my lack of attractive qualities (genetics, poor frame, constant injuries)

Excuses. No DEERing, brother. You can't control your genetics, but you can certainly overcome them. A poor frame is 100% in your control. You can adjust your workout routine to minimize injuries.

the costs of a dating relationship/marriage do not justify the benefits. I'm not terribly upset or demoralized by this anymore

Glad to see you've figured this out.

According to her, nearly everyone I work with sings my praises, even people in projects where I have NO CLUE what is going on. I want to endeavor to be the person she believes me to be; I know I can do better!

Great job, bro. Accept the compliments rather than filtering them through a self-defeatist attitude. You definitely don't seem like you believe you're the prize. And maybe you're not. But this is the start of your frame development.

Bible: 7

Why are you merging quiet time and Bible study into one group? They're not the same. It sounds like your QT might be 7, but your actual study is 0. That's okay - just make sure to split these out. The reading plan has nothing to do with actual study, though.

Prayer: 6 I missed a couple of days this past weekend

So? I mean, it's great to pray everyday. But some days you'll study, others you'll memorize, and others you'll pray. Don't get hung up on the idea that all of these have to be 10 all the time, or even that missing a day drops you a point or two. It's not legalism. It's general health.

Fellowship: 10 This will be ranked lower next OYS. I am staying in my house until I get my COVID test results back

You still have discord. Fellowship is more effective in-person, but equally viable online. No excuses here.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (10/14/20)

3 upvotes · 15 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Holy cow, your mission is all over the place. That's the first thing to get on track: what do you actually want to do with your life? Despite listing something like a dozen different mini-missions (really: short-term goals), you never once mentioned making disciples, and the vague reference to the great commission seemed focused more on sharing the Gospel than discipleship.

Here's the thing: the sidebar has an entire pathway to get you off your butt and where you need to be. Let me summarize it for you:

1. Lift
2. Start mastering the 7 basics (300 series), taking a month or two to really become competent at each, and ...

... that's it for now. That right there is the next 6 months of progress for you. When you can walk in and realize that makes no sense at all because just reading the Bible isn't even remotely close to studying it - and when you can get your quiet time/devotional (i.e. "reading") number up to an 8-10, and then after that your Scripture memory up to 8-10, and then after that your Bible study number up to 8-10 (sequentially, not simultaneously, and some may fall down to a 4-6 after you move on, and that's okay too) ... when you've done all that, you'll really start to see some major changes in your life and the figure will skyrocket too, especially once you start working on your ...

Bible study: 1/10 Didn't read this week.

Assurance of salvation: 1/10

Mission: ~~Set my own life on track~~ Make disciples

Life is not hard. The Bible gives us a clear roadmap. I know, I know ...

knowing what you should do and actually being able to do it are different things altogether. I lack degrees of self-control needed to keep going the right way. It honestly feels like a vampire is sucking me dry everyday

If there were a medicine to cure your depression that was somewhat painful and you didn't want to take it, and it would take multiple doses a day 7 days a week for several weeks, would you do it anyway?

- If the answer is no, then you're really only here to complain and there's nothing we can do to help you.
- If the answer is yes, then take the cure.

It's called the sidebar. The 7 basics. Developing and living on your mission. Practicing these things and working toward internalizing them have a proven track record for dealing with this type of emotional dysphoria. I mean, if your issues are physical in nature because you literally lack the chemicals in your body to permit emotional regulation, then go get some meds. But if that's not the case, start taking the pill. The red one. You know, the one found in the Bible.

Priestly ministry to men

3 upvotes · 12 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

It was actually around 2%, but still much better than virtually all other averages. I believe the study also ignored divorces that occurred prior to salvation.

Don't Be Autistic

3 upvotes · 21 September 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Well said.

Looking for Wisdom from Men

3 upvotes · 17 September 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I know I want to be with her, I'm looking for ways to work through demons.

This sounds very much like you're preparing an "it's not you, it's me speech," but just don't want to deliver it.

The Art of Asking Questions

3 upvotes · 19 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Karen, I'm so sorry to hear about all you're dealing with. Thanks for sharing all that. Does anyone else have similar struggles? Maybe we can learn from each other.

Alternatively:

Karen, that really sucks. I'm kind of curious about what the Bible has to say about stuff like this. What were we supposed to be talking about today? I bet God had us talking about this subject for a reason, and it might end up giving you an indirect solution to your problem.

Or ...

Karen, it's too bad this situation is still going on. Last week we suggested doing blank. Have you done that yet? No? That's frustrating. How about you do that this week instead and give us an update next week. I don't think we can really help you much further until you start applying the things we talk about.

Which one (or others) you go with depends on the character of the relationship you have with her. I use "Karen" as an example because it's pretty rare I have this problem with a guy, and if I do find one, it's easiest just to tell him point blank: "Bob, thanks for sharing. Let's let some other guys weigh in."

"Spiritual Growth" - such an awkward phrase.

3 upvotes · 16 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Do you think that personal sanctification in the form of the fruit of the spirit or Christ-likeness in one's own life can also fall into the category of "producing fruit?"

- Fruit of the Spirit: No. To say as much would mean that when Jesus is preaching on "fruit" we would have to imply extra dialogue by Jesus: "Oh, and by 'fruit' I mean something this guy Paul will teach you a couple dozen years from now, so just remember these words because you'll be able to interpret them then, but right now just expect to be confused." I can't imagine Jesus would do that. If Jesus had preached on "fruit of the Spirit" I would be more persuaded by this argument. Also, many aspects of the "fruit of the Spirit" are things that can be faked. Matthew 7 (the primary "by their fruit you will recognize them" passage) makes clear that things which can be faked aren't a reliable metric for knowing who is genuine from those to whom Jesus will say, "I never knew you; away from me you evildoer."
- Christ-likeness: Yes, in the sense that Jesus' primary function in his earthly ministry before his death was to evangelize and disciple.

Note the parable of the sower, where Jesus explains that the seed planted in the soil is the Gospel and when it grows the plant/tree is produced. This growth/tree is not the fruit - it's the tree. The character issues we instill in people as foundations of the faith are, to continue the metaphor, akin to the roots of the tree (or if we use the family-structure parallel instead of plants, it's the 'spiritual milk' - the underlying nourishment everyone needs at start); and the "spiritual meat" that we consume after the foundational things are the tree itself. The fruit of a tree is when these roots and the shoot of the tree absorb nourishment from the soil, the light, the water/fertilizer, etc. and produce something seed-bearing which can generate life in others - either through consumption by the tree's owner (God) for his enjoyment, or by falling into nearby soil, which, if the soil is healthy, results in reproduction.

"Therefore, if anyone cleanses himself from what is dishonorable, he will be a vessel for honorable use, set apart as holy, useful to the master of the house, ready for every good work."

Beautiful reference!

Yes, this is the ultimate value of the "avoid sin" mantra churchianity pushes. They stop there. It is enough, in their eyes, if one ceases sinning as much as possible as this life can afford. Yet they fail to recognize James' saying: "Anyone who knows the good he ought to do and does not do it sins." That good includes the fulfillment of the Great Commission. If "not making disciples" is a sin, then "avoid sinning" also means "Avoid not making disciples."

But even without this "workaround" explanation to get there, the passage you reference is clear enough: the point of sin-avoidance isn't for its own sake, but because it improves our usefulness. This is the John 15 concept that Jesus cuts off the fruitless branch, but prunes the one who bears fruit so that it can become more fruitful.

we're more effective fruit-bearers externally when we're more Christ-like internally.

Amen to that!

Of course, we have to account for the balance of churchianity's teaching and how we counter-weight this. There was a recent post complaining about why we don't talk about how husbands ought to love their wives 95% of the time, like churchianity does. The reason is, of course, because churchianity already addresses that so thoroughly. There's no balance. We have to focus on the things churchianity won't teach in order for guys to find balance - not because we disagree with the obligation of a husband to love his wife, but because most guys hear that enough from their congregations already that it's not their more pressing need, which is all the things churchianity isn't telling them. Likewise, while it's valuable to "avoid sin" and "serve those in need" and all that other stuff, I don't write about it as much - not because I don't think we should, but because there's already enough of that content out there and it doesn't need to be refrained here as well ...

... unless there is some unique take on the matter that churchianity has missed, such as the sanctification-orientation of loving one's wife, or the missional purpose for why we avoid sin in the first place.

Thanks for the comment, brother. It's helped me to process some of my thoughts on this matter better.

"Spiritual Growth" - such an awkward phrase.

3 upvotes · 15 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Well said. I believe I agree with all of this. Definitely worth further thought and exploration. As noted elsewhere, I really don't have any problem with the term "spiritual growth." This is one of those situations where I'm posting more of a thought process with the expectation that people in the community, like you, give some push-back where it's due. Thanks for that.

"Spiritual Growth" - such an awkward phrase.

3 upvotes · 15 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This makes me smile just reading it :) Literally nothing gives me greater joy than to see people living out their faith - especially for those who I've had a hand in, as I hope the one(s) who brought you to Christ can experience the same.

What else should I call the growth I've experienced ... ?

So, on the podcast I've referenced that sometimes I post things that I know aren't quite fully developed thoughts, just to read the comments of people who challenge me and help refine my view. This is one of those examples. I know there's nothing technically wrong with the phrase "spiritually mature" - but the phrase also comes with a lot of unhealthy baggage. I'm exploring here whether or not there's a way to separate the negative baggage without losing the convenience.

the past year or so since accepting Christ as my savior

I love to see the fire you have while so young in your faith! I'd tell you to never let that die out, but everyone does, at least for a time. More significant is learning how to keep rekindling it.

But I'm not producing fruit yet and I'm not sure what that really looks like.

I have an upcoming post on this - or, rather: series of posts. Keep an eye out.

Do you have any concerns about how it seems like this view errs on the side of control of your wife over her personal growth and freedom?

3 upvotes · 15 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

And this brings us around to the fact that you haven't shared or referenced a single scripture to buttress your points here. You can go to the sidebar and see numerous scripture references for the things we encourage men to do.

You seem to be basing your argument on feelings and "fairness" (at least as you define or apply it, not God's standard), rather than scripture.

Nail, meet head.

So much good stuff in this comment.

No, your congregation does not preach "biblical headship"

3 upvotes · 13 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I see the remedy for this to be an equal if not greater emphasis on Men loving their wives, as Men being in authority over their wives.

What you're saying sounds great in theory, but fails in practice. This is EXACTLY how feminism crept into churchianity in the first place. Pastors read the Bible, but wanted to appease women, so instead of preaching on these matters equally, they address headship/submission maybe 2% "love your wife" 98%. In all that talk, they began to confuse Scriptural interpretation with their own personal application of doing whatever makes her happy.

Jesus models a different paradigm altogether. Happiness isn't even a present factor. "Loving his bride" includes provision, support, and encouragement - but there is 10x more about leading her in something that matters to him, and sanctifying her so she's qualified and equipped to do it. That's why we talk so much here about mission and leadership - because THAT IS how we love our wives like Christ loves the Church.

Catering to her emotional state accomplishes nothing for eternity and proves a futile waste of time if it becomes the focus. The man's mission in Christ is not merely for his or Christ's sake, but also has the passive benefit to his wife of giving her life some value to eternity as well.

she was repeatedly told (by church and christians) to respect and never question her husband, so she missed many red flags

Right. That's why the red pill communities use the phrase: "trust, but verify." Blind trust is idiocy and breeds cynicism. Trust that is verified is wise and breeds confidence. If she had followed this simple red pill concept rather than listening to churchianity, I bet she'd have seen these issues much sooner.

and endured abuse for a while ... I would say that abuse is prevalent in many forms still today in marriages, whether it be physical, mental, emotional or spiritual abuse

Check out my post on Actual Quotes From "Abuse" Victims and see why I'm skeptical of her actually being "abused" without more details. I haven't heard her story, but unless I see the pictures of her black eyes, I'm doubtful. What women report as abuse is often a ridiculous reinterpretation of the facts designed to make her sympathetic. Yes, there are real cases. But in my experiencing handling "abuse" cases (yes, that's literally my day job), you're not going to convince me that actual abuse situations are more common than false allegations. Of course, many of the false-accusers genuinely believe they were abused, which is part of the problem.

in my view it is easy for many redpill christian ideas, or really any system which places the husband in authority over the wife, to be twisted or abused by abusive husbands

Completely agreed. Which is why 99% of what we write on this forum is about making men better men, and why we also push the notion that a man should never verse-quote his way into authority over his wife. First, the secular laws won't back him up when push comes to shove. Second, it's not an effective strategy and is in stark contrast to how Jesus modeled headship for us.

In this, I challenge you to find one situation where any mod or endorsed contributor has encouraged a man to quote verses to his wife about her needing to submit to him, or where he has ever been encouraged to abuse his authority, or where we have proposed any strategy of influencing one's wife other than through the foundation of being the type of man she WANTS to follow. You won't find one because we don't endorse people who give such garbage advice.

and also contributes to a silencing of victims of marital abuse

In my experience, there does need to be a silencing of alleged victims - not in total, but just toning the volume down. The fact that victims of abuse are so vocal and that the issue is so popular to talk about today is what has contributed to the inflation and absurd expansion of things people call "abuse" that is hardly anything close.

All genuine abuse victims should have an appropriate forum for finding safety and relief. If it's physical abuse, that should come in the form of shelters and domestic violence charges and protection orders. If it's mental/verbal/emotional abuse, it should be through counseling/training on coping strategies, developing a stronger frame, and 1 Peter 3 concepts. But the way people over-emphasize and over-empathize with every alleged abuse victim today has absurdly increased the number of false allegations that either (1) land men in jail or with protective orders and affect their parenting rights because the courts want to play it safe, or (2) get dismissed, but still end up costing the guy thousands of dollars in legal fees to defend against a bogus allegation. Seriously, I'd be shocked if even 1 out of ever 4 claims of abuse had any factual basis to them at all - and I say this as an attorney who deals with this as my primary practice area at law.

For example, the wives submit to their husbands verse is used to encourage a wife to have sex with a husband, and maybe it is seen that the husband can have sex with his wife whenever he chooses even if the wife doesn't show consent.

But biblically that's true. Now, you won't find any mod or endorsed contributor encouraging a guy to commit marital rape. We're always very clear: if she denies you, go do something else. Don't force her. But that doesn't change the fact that her denial is sin and unbiblical.

More to the point: women are welcome here, but it's not for them. r/RPCWomen is for the women. So to say that anything we write is "to encourage a wife to" do anything at all is inaccurate. Instead, most men who come here are such pussies that they don't even know how to initiate sex with their wives in the first place. They've been denied so many times that they truly believe it's the wife's prerogative to set the standards for their sex life. Even if they pretend to be the leader in every other area, they're still deferring to their wife's leadership in the bedroom. Many men need to be empowered by knowing that this is sin on her part and that he needs to become the type of man who would make her want to repent of that sin. And when he realizes that he has a God-given right to have sex with his wife, maybe he'll be bold enough actually to initiate with her once in a while. And if she gives a hard no, the advice is always to back down and hit the gym.

I am just a young bloke, not in a relationship but got interested in exploring this topic

I get it. You sound like you're pretty new around here and are still pretty heavily influenced by feminist ideologies. I don't expect you to agree with everything you read here. But do know that we (or at least I) have a reason for everything that's said here.

u/weakandsensitive once explained that most guys are so beta that it's not enough to teach them how to live in a healthy balance. They have to become a jerk for a while, living on the other side of the line, before they can even understand what that balance looks like to be the oak.

Or as I re-word it for more sensitive folks: if on a scale of 1-10 a 5 is ideal, if you've spent the last decade living as a 1, preaching a 5 will only ever get the person to move to 2 or 3; but if you push a 10 for a while and he embraces it for a time, it's much easier afterward to tone him back to a 5.

This is how it was when I was being spiritually trained. My discipler saw lots of people who were 1s and decided to train them to be balanced Christians. He pushed and prodded, giving us ridiculously high expectations for Christian living, pressuring that we should be sharing the Gospel with non-believers every single day, alongside daily prayer, Scripture memory, Bible study, fellowship, quiet times, and much, much more. In my senior year he finally dropped the bomb on all of us: "You don't actually have to do all those things every day. Biblically, if you have a quiet time one day and memorize a verse another, that's perfectly acceptable too. You're not meant to be legalistic about all of these things. But when you started you were so immature that I had to train you to become actual freaks so that when you leave this place you live in balanced commitment to Christ rather than falling back into spiritual apathy, as so many do."

Admittedly, I'm still a bit of a freak - and I've embraced that. It's become part of my frame - my internal point of origin. But the same concept applies in how we train men here. They need to be taught how to be the insensitive jerk so that when they're ready for balance and to become the oak, they are actually able to do so. If you take a bloop and try to turn him into the oak from the get-go, he may hit it for a time, but he'll virtually always backpedal. So, we have to figure out actual effective strategies to get men where they need to be, otherwise we'll never be anything more than "churchianity-lite."

some of the movement towards a more egalitarian system of marriage is in fact inspired by the noble desire to prevent men from abusing women

Right - a perfectly noble goal that has been resolved ever so poorly through all the wrong methods that don't actually work.

our modern definition of abuse is wider and more accurate than in times past.

Yikes! Take that back, brother. Haha. Seriously? You've got to be trolling now. I'll give you that laws hundreds/thousands of years ago permitted more harm than would be biblical, but the laws have swung sooooo far the other way that you'll never persuade me "my wife hit me with a baseball bat, I raised up my hands to block her and broke my arms, then I called the cops on her, but they arrested me and took me to jail and I now have a DV conviction on my record" is a more accurate definition of abuse than what we see historically. Yes, that's a legit case. u/bluepillprofessor has shared many others like it too.

Tag: /u/rocknrollchuck

No, your congregation does not preach "biblical headship"

3 upvotes · 13 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I ultimately made my husband agree

That's not an agreement, haha.

In other words, are my actions loud enough for this topic to not be brought up again, or should I voice my changed views to my husband?

For men, I'm generally a fan of acta non verba. For women - especially if the husband is still blue pill (which yours is, if he is still living under this prior "agreement") - this changes and you'd probably be better off communicating it directly, because he won't figure it out on his own just through your actions.

You could try passive acknowledgment by asking his opinion a lot and concluding, "Sounds good. You're the boss" ... but even that likely wouldn't do it.

Where's the Victory?

3 upvotes · 12 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

(Cross-posted from r/TrueChristian)

Thanks for actually posting it here rather than redirecting to TC, otherwise I would have taken it down ;)

God doesn't immediately take away the full weight, he gives us just enough to handle with the help of the Holy Spirit.

So here's another lifting reality I've come to embrace: Being strong doesn't mean heavy weights are less heavy; it means your capacity for heaviness has gone up.

I remember when I was struggling to bench 225lbs. I'd push and push and push and barely get it up! Then I got stronger and stronger and stronger. By the time I finally hit my goal of 300lbs as a ORM, I assumed lower weights should feel a lot easier. But you know what? 225lbs still felt like 225lbs. But increasing my bench from 225 to 300 didn't make 225 feel like 150. It was still doggone heavy. I just managed to increase how much heaviness I could take.

Let's put it this way: on a scale of 1-10, benching 225 early on felt like an 8. Doable, but quite hard. As I got stronger, I expected 225 to feel more like a 5/10. It didn't. Instead, I realized that 10 changed to 11, then 12, and so on.

Heavy weights remained equally heavy. But my capacity to handle greater and greater weights is what increased. Lifting 225lbs is still lifting 225lbs. The only difference when you're stronger is that you go into the lift knowing you can do it, rather than seeing it as a challenge and wondering if you can actually put it up or not.

Too many people enter spiritual endeavors expecting that as they mature difficulties and temptation will decrease. The frequency may. But the difficulty when in the moment does not. Instead, as you grow stronger in your spirit, conviction, and discipline, you find that you have dealt with so much harder temptation that even though old temptations are still equally present and equally tempting as before, you know you've handled worse, so you know you can push through, not having that skepticism of "can I or can't I?"

I feel stuck

3 upvotes · 12 August 2020 · /r/askRPC

Solid.

Update: Looking for guidance

3 upvotes · 11 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

If a woman married someone she was not sexually attracted to it would make sense why she would not want to have sex with him no matter what he does.

This is the whole point of the red pill, though. Even these marriages are salvageable. While there's some split on the issue (I know /u/deep_strength has debated it with another blogger), I'm in the camp that even in the circumstance when there was ZERO sexual attraction going into the marriage, at least SOME can be developed through what the red pill teaches. You may never go from 0 to 10, but you can certainly get from 2 to 7 without much effort. I may even go so far as to say the 0 to 10 scenario is possible, depending on the reasons for the non-attraction in the first place.

What I was saying is that a man pedestalizing his wife and doing everything he can to please her and make her happy is the wrong answer and will cause more harm than good. It will solve some of the relational aspects of the marriage, but not the sexual ones.

To be clearer, in the red pill we recognize the different strategies necessary to maintain a healthy relationship from a healthy sex life. Most of churchianity and marriage counseling blends these together, assuming that they overlap. They don't. A woman can be sexually attracted to a man she despises (battered woman's syndrome being an obvious extreme example) or completely adore a man as marriage-material who she has zero sexual interest in. In this, the red pill notes that relationships are the woman's domain and sex is the man's domain. Or, to put it another way, there's a maxim:

- Women are the gatekeepers of sex; men are the gatekeepers of commitment (i.e. the "relationship" part).

Generally, most men want sex from women, most women want relational feels and commitment from a man. Marriage counseling, at its absolute finest, addresses the relational aspects by damaging the sexual aspects. It helps women get what they want from a man, and the man, not realizing its negative impact on their long-term sexuality, gets the immediate relief of the relational problems dying down, so both walk away happy. They may even have sex for a week or two afterward, most likely because she wants to reward him (i.e. putting herself in the dominant position) for working through the marriage counseling with her. But in the end, while he has been better trained to suit her relational needs, she almost never becomes better suited to meet his sexual needs.

In their effort to serve their husband and their family they don't have time to think about sex.

I think you missed what you were writing. Her husband wants sex. Yet you say she's exerting an "effort to serve [her] husband." Hmm ... By folding the laundry? By decorating the house? By doing the dishes? Most men don't care about these things.

Women justify their lifestyle as "service to my husband" because the husband gets to enjoy the benefit of it, but the reality is that they're serving themselves. Women have MUCH higher standards on housework than men do. The moment they surpass the man's standards and begin working toward their own, they are no longer serving him, but themselves. But in reality, if you ask any man even within his own standards: Would you prefer your wife to vacuum the floor or have hot sex with you? what do you think his answer is going to be? In this, women prioritize the things they want to do for their husbands over the things their husbands would actually prefer.

So, when you say that you've "known countless women who are exhausted. In their effort to serve their husband and their family they don't have time to think about sex" - the answer is a simple one: make sex with your husband your first priority in how you expend your energy and then work on the housework after that. If that means that after having sex with your husband, doing the dishes, folding the laundry, and caring for the kids these "countless women are still exhausted. In their effort to serve their husband and their family they don't have time to think about vacuuming the floor" ... well, heck ... I don't know what guy would pressure her over the floor in that circumstance.

They along with their husbands go to work, but their responsibilities include child care, cooking, and cleaning, while their husbands takes out the trash once in a while and occasionally does maintenance around the house.

Right, and that's the husband's failing for not leading his ship. He passively defaults to her. This is part of the red pill strategy: get the man back to leading. One of my first posts in the red pill subs was on dealing with the stressed out wife. I know more now than I did then, but the principle still applies. The issue isn't that the man isn't helping out enough. It's that she feels responsible instead of him. That responsibility is a drain on her, even if it is the exact same amount of work as when he's responsible and she's just checking off boxes on the to-do list he gives her.

if their husbands took a bit of initiative and helped out around the house once in a while

No. He doesn't help her. She helps him. He needs to take ownership of the home rather than deferring it to her. The perception dynamic of him running the house with her as his helper massively changes the stress-load from her being responsible for running the house and him "helping out" every now and then.

It doesn't matter how masculine he is or how much he works out, if he doesn't pick up after himself, he's ugly.

But if he doesn't, he's not "masculine." Masculinity inherently involves a man taking ownership over his domain - his entire sphere of influence. This isn't just his body, but his social life, his physical property, his relationships, etc.

Now this changes if the man is the sole breadwinner and the wife stays home. Obviously housework should then fall on the woman.

And here's the catch: that's not how it actually works. My parents are a great example. My mom never had a full-time job while they were married, and never even worked part-time since having kids. Yet she was CONSTANTLY on my dad's rear for "not helping more around the house." This is the default state of most marriages, even single-earner households. It doesn't matter if it's literally her job or not. The wife will always complain, wanting more help. The only solution that has any lasting impact is the biblical one: where the man is the head of the household - not just responsible for his career/financial provision, but all aspects of the family unit (including parenting!) - and in this she becomes his helper rather than her wanting his help.

But for a thriving relationship where neither party feels taken advantage of, there should be an equal division of labor.

That's not biblical. The goal of marriage isn't for "neither party to feel taken advantage of." The goal is to make disciples. I had to address this with my wife recently. 99% of women see the goal of marriage as their own happiness (or, if they're being dishonest with themselves, raising "successful" children, however that's defined). If we divide the work into different camps - financial provision, raising the kids, housework, and making disciples - if both parents are equally involved in raising the kids and working equal hours, but the man is the only one doing what God actually wants husbands and wives to be doing, that burden rests on his shoulders and not hers. If she has to take care of more housework so he can get the Gospel out to new people or raise up new laborers for the Kingdom, that matters too.

I have yet to see a marriage where the wife does more to disciple others than the man. Instead, I see women investing in dead-end congregational programs more than their husbands - like serving in children's ministry, singing on the worship team, becoming a door-greeter, joining a planning committee, etc. With the men I disciple, they're actively making disciples through sharing the Gospel and spiritually parenting the spiritually young. That takes time and work, and if she has to do some extra housework so he can do what God actually put husbands and wives here to do, so be it. If she's sharing the load by discipling other women, great! I just hardly ever see that.

But even in the absence of a disciple-making man, there's still nothing that biblically says, "Thou shalt divide the labor within your family unit equally." If a husband leads the family into an unequal division of labor, he can do that. That's his prerogative. He will just answer to God for how he led. It's not for the wife to make him answer to her for failure to live up to his expectations.

As a woman, I don't need to be treated as a princess

This is hamstering. You don't need it, but you want it. Yet when a man tries to give it to you, you will enjoy it, yet seemingly inexplicably find him less attractive. At the end of the day, every woman has the princess fantasy, yet most will pretend to be "realists" by saying they don't have that fantasy. Props to you if you can legitimately break it. But entitlement runs DEEP in modern culture on both sides. Eventually the "I just expect my partner to ... whatever" attitude IS ITSELF part of that entitlement. Once married, the wife doesn't have the right to enforce her expectations over her husband, nor can she biblically use it as grounds to deny sex. /u/redpillwonder did a fantastic write-up on this for r/PCWomen, which I recommend reading.

The entitlement is frankly just creepy

Agreed. Nice Guys truly are. And you're right: they're often more manipulative and nasty people than the alphas who are often labeled jerks. This is all covered in NMMNG.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (08/05/20)

3 upvotes · 7 August 2020 · /r/PCChristians

Guess I'll surrender, right? What does that even mean?

I've long held that this is horrible advice. Would you be surprised if I told you that phrase is never actually in Scripture? It's the same fallacy as "let go and let God." It leads people to passive inaction, assuming God will just take over. It's a cop-out. Don't buy into it.

We aren't meant to surrender to God. We're ON THE SAME TEAM!!! We are his soldiers. We fight for him, not surrender to him.

Are you TRULY Red Pill?

3 upvotes · 5 August 2020 · /r/PCChristians

I address much of what you're saying in this post. The short conclusion is that as long as you're living the spiritual reality, you don't have an obligation toward the tangible expression. For anyone already making disciples and evangelizing, you don't need to have the roadmap of physical relationships because you're already at the destination.

Should I continue to just wait?

Yes. It would be pretty blue pill to be pursuing relationships you don't care for simply because you feel compelled to be in a relationship.

Where would you categorize me? Would you call me blue pill?

If you're living out of your own frame and it's obvious that the world takes notice, and your lifestyle is prompted by what you know to be true about life, the spiritual world, intergender sexual dynamics, etc. - then you are in the "Christian" and red pill camps, even if you don't pursue long term relationships. For that matter, most secular TRPers push against LTRs in the first place.

If anything I am more like a celibate monk. Is there anything wrong with being a monk?

No. Monk mode is a normal phase for a red pilld man who is still growing and developing into his own frame and mission.

The Origins of the Ekklesia ("Church")

3 upvotes · 2 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

How do we know the teachings of Jesus and the Apostles ?

Through Scripture.

How do we know which of the multiple interpretations out there are correct ?

Through faith. What you're asking, which many others do as well, most likely stems from the atheist disposition toward us. They demand absolute proof. Christians are so used to flailing around trying to give it to them that we have that same mentality within our own framework: We must pretend that we have absolute proof of what a passage means, or else our whole faith is a sham!

But that's just the thing: faith doesn't require absolute proof. God judges each according to what we have been given. There is room for disputable issues. The room for disputable issues is far, far greater than most would care to admit because there is massive freedom in Christ. His yoke is easy and his burden is light, yet people expect that his yoke is perfection and his burden is the weight of our failure to live up to it. In reality, the yoke is what bound the oxen together and allowed the driver to steer it - tilling soil by the plow so the seed could be planted.

This is why Paul gave us Romans 14 to address disputable issues:

- 14:14 - Check your heart.
- 14:23 - See if it comes from faith.

I break "comes from faith" down into two components (though there may be more): (1) our faith is expressed through Scripture, thus we have to have a Scriptural basis for our framework of living; and (2) the underlying imperative of our faith is to build God's Kingdom, so if it doesn't contribute to that goal in some way, then it's not a product of faith.

Whatever interpretation you want to go with on any disputable issue, as long as the above is satisfied, it doesn't really matter who's right or wrong. Why do we care if someone pretends they can become sinless before heaven? Why does it matter if someone person insists the spiritual gifts are dead? What's the big deal if the cracker and juice literally transform into Christ's blood or not (or, if you're me: if the entire thing is a sham in the first place)?

Virtually all of these disputable issues are theological technicalities. Yes, they affect the Christian's life. But a cessationist has the same faith as the one who still believes in the gifts - they will just express it in different ways. The one who believes in gifts will say the cessationist is using them without knowing it, by excelling in things like teaching or pastoring or showing generosity, mercy, and hospitality. The one who rejects modern existence of the gifts will say the one who claims to use them is really just acting on his own skills or calling on God's power rather than utilizing their own authority. The result is practically the same, despite the theological framework we use to get there.

Pick any debated concept among the faith that separates the denominations and I'll show you the same result: IT DOESN'T MATTER. The practical expression of the one who is faithful on either side of the debate will still be substantially aligned with the image of Christ, despite one having more of an expression of a nose rather than an ear or a hand or a foot. And in this, why get upset that not everyone is mustache hair on the body of Christ? Mustache hair is about as useless to the body as the people who argue over these things without making disciples, so that's what they might as well be!

How do we sort out weed from wheat ?

The weeds are the non-believers and the wheat are the faithful. This is the only distinction that does substantially matter: those who preach the Gospel of Christ from those who don't. And even this has more room for flexibility than many would be willing to admit.

what proves that your church is right ?

Nothing. First off, don't even call it a church if you claim to agree with my post. It is a congregation. The Ekklesia is not divided into your church and his church. There is The Church and that's it.

From there, how do we know whether one teaching within Christ's Ekklesia is right or another? We don't. We pick a side consistent with our convictions (Romans 14:14) and live it out according to our faith and desire to be faithful (Romans 14:23), trusting that if our God is sovereign, it's up to him to decide how to judge the path we chose - and more likely than not, he had a hand in our choosing it. And yes, he may cause people to choose different sides on different issues because maybe a hand needs to understand one reality about God while a foot needs to understand another - and while they seem in conflict to us, maybe they're not to God, which is why he left room for both views in the first place.

The Origins of the Ekklesia ("Church")

3 upvotes · 2 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This requires hours of continuous study on our part and many long conversations with more mature believers.

I don't know that I agree. In this comment I referenced /u/1timothy47's post, which goes further in depth on the subject, but essentially runs the conclusion that based on (for his namesake) 1 Timothy 4:7, we have an obligation to train ourselves to be godly. I do believe much of the responsibility for our spiritual growth is on our own heads. We can't sit back and assume we must learn from someone "more godly" when we have direct access to the Scriptures the same as they do. Is it preferred? Of course. But as his post says: having someone more godly in our lives is a luxury, the lack of which is not an excuse for failure to grow into a discipler-maker of our own examination of Scripture with the Spirit.

But you're right - the classic Sunday service context is not the most likely place to find this luxury. It is, however, the best place to find those to whom you can be that luxury in their lives. Take responsibility for your own growth or someone else's, but don't make someone else responsible for you or those who God gave you. That's a reliable framework to operate in.

Episode 10 - No Frame, No Game Part 2

3 upvotes · 30 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

inappropriate and will undoubtedly lead to stumbling for men (and possibly women)

I don't agree - or even if I do, to no greater a degree than Amish boys beating off to pictures of a woman showing her ankles. Look, everyone can be triggered by something. It's not our obligation to remove every possible trigger that anyone could ever be tempted by. If that were the case, we might as well just leave the planet because some women might start masturbating just because they happened to oversee /u/OsmiumZulu smiling.

To add some clarity on the situation, we actually dealt with this behind the scenes and the original was much, much worse. The original video actually showed two nude people having sex (from an angle that no private parts were visible). I opposed the clip and was unanimously out-voted that there was no need to change it. I pulled rank and made them take it down anyway. I insisted they find an alternative that still alluded to romantic passion, but otherwise kept the woman clothed and did not involve actually having sex. The scene chosen fulfilled those requirements. If this 1-second clip is really that problematic for a guy, he should already know his tolerance is so low he has no business being in the internet in the first place.

I do like /u/annaerials comment on what you said, though:

I don't think it's any more intense than commercials on TV, and truly I think any perverse thought is probably quickly snuffed out by 4 burley guys chatting.

And from /u/thechristianalpha:

We shouldn't take it down. We can't placate to everybody. If we compare that tiny clip to song of Solomon then the clip seems tame in comparison. It sounds like those people just haven't read the whole Bible ... When a newbie Christian reads Song of Solomon for the first time... The Bible talks about boobs???

Fun story: I actually pseudo-discipled a guy who used to get paranoid that he could only wear sweat clothes every day, but his boss made him wear jeans, and he was afraid that wearing jeans would make women lust after him.

He also commented that he believed it was universally sinful for women to wear high heels or leggings or yoga pants or jeans or ... pretty much anything other than sweat pants/shirts because a guy could possibly lust after her if she wore anything else.

You remind me of this guy.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (07/29/20)

3 upvotes · 30 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

2/2

- 13 The angel sounding his trumpet likely occurred in heaven as a command from the angels to initiate the next phase of God's plan.
- 14 The "four angels who are bound at the great river Euphrates" were Antiochus, Agrippa II, Sohemus and Malchus, who were kings within the Roman empire who helped Titus during the siege by sending him supplies and additional soldiers.
- 14 The "bound at the Euphrates" notion is because two of the kings, Sohemus and Malchus, ruled kingdoms on opposite sides of the Euphrates.
- 15 Titus could have called on their aid sooner for other purposes, but knew he would need their help in this particular siege. They were called for aid in ultimately bringing about the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple with the intent of killing 1/3 of the people. Remember that the Roman army were characterized as locusts/beasts and the Jews in the city were the only humanized ones.
- 16 These 4 kings from v 14 contributed 20,000 men, according to Josephus, which is two myriads (i.e. 10,000 soldiers each myriad). The actual Greek reads clearly: "dismyriades myriadon," which translates literally: two ten thousands, ten thousands. Some like to interpret a multiplicative element into this, but it could have been restated for emphasis on the fact of the ten thousands. Alternatively, the concept of a myriad myriads could simply be hyperbolic of an uncountable amount, like when we say "a million bazillion." Jeremiah 46:23 notes the uncountable nature of an army of locusts.

- 17 The iron in the breastplates could have been manipulated to make these colors, or it could be reflective from the sun/sky. Alternatively, it could be symbolic of the red fire, blue smoke, and sulfur from the destruction within the abyss that would soon consume Jerusalem.
- 17 Just as some horse armor had human faces, others had lion faces.
- 17 Josephus reports that during the wars, including against the Jewish zealots, Rome often used firebrands, which would have accounted for the smoke and sulfur as well. While it's not specifically referenced in the siege with Jerusalem, during the 5 months it's highly improbable that they didn't use the same tactics they were using in other sieges during the war.
- 18 If Rome is referred to as locusts and the Jews as humanity/mankind, the third who died were those held up in Jerusalem at the end of the siege. The firebrands launched into the city likely caused this.
- 18 Josephus estimates that 3 million Jews were trapped in the city. He also estimates that 1.1 million were killed during the siege - which explains John's vision that 1/3 of the people he saw in his vision were killed.
- 19 As above, the mouths were the catapults shooting firebrands and the tails were the spears with a shaft like a serpent (akin to Moses' staff turning into a snake).
- 20 Despite popular beliefs among Christianity that like to glorify the Jews as faithfully devoted to their Scripture, they were actually full of lots of idol worship. The Midrashic Lamentations attribute the destruction of the temple both times (first by Babylon and second by Rome) to the Jews turning to idol worship, as reported in this verse. It could also be a reference to the Jews' idolatry of the old covenant and their Scriptures in the wake of Christ's death, refusing to acknowledge the Gospel of Jesus, and the gold, silver, bronze, stone, and wood that were used to construct various aspects of the temple - their ultimate idol.
- 21 Referring to similar corruption among the Jewish people, likely exacerbated in the wake of their entire culture and religious system being destroyed. It wasn't for several years before Rome permitted Jewish councils to meet and have any influence again, creating a very dark time for Judaism after the war.

Hopefully you enjoyed my summary preterist commentary on Revelation 9 ;) Someday I want to create a pseudo-concise summary of all eschatological passages like this, as the websites I see are books upon books of information to examine and it'd be easier to have a quick cheat-sheet like this to reference for simple questions.

Tag: /u/OsmiumZulu /u/thechristianalpha

Help. // Porn sucks

3 upvotes · 15 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm glad you found this helpful. The one thing I'll add:

I'm still convinced it is, just due to his past use

I don't take the "once an addict, always an addict" view. I believe Jesus can fully cure someone from addiction. That doesn't mean the person will never commit that sin ever again. It does mean that the addictive compulsion is completely gone.

For example, I have a friend who was an alcoholic. He'd had multiple DUIs and totaled at least 3 cars due to alcohol abuse. It lasted into his late 30s (so not just a college fad). He came to Christ and prayed over the issue repeatedly. Eventually God led him out of it.

Since then, he notes the compulsion is completely gone. It doesn't matter if he's with friends who are drinking, if he steps in a bar, walks up the alcohol aisle at the grocery store - the compulsion is just not there. He had one or two times since then that he did get drunk, but they were far from "relapses." Rather, they were conscious choices/mistakes and did not restore his compulsion afterward. The next day he was equally free from any addicted compulsion as he was before the incident.

The same thing is true for pornography. I haven't read all your comments here, but from what another user told me, if he's really only using porn once every several months, it gives the impression that the controlling compulsion is gone. Yes, he's still going to get horny every now and then, just like a food addict will experience legitimate hunger distinct from addictive gluttony. And that horniness can lead to sin without becoming addiction, just as it can with other guys who have fallen into the porn trap without addictive impulses.

So be cautious about the "once an addict, always an addict" mentality. This leaves no room for God's transforming power and, instead, attempts to maintain a controlling hold over him, always causing him to have to live against the standard of his past. Thanks God we're not judged by our past in this way by God! How much less should we judge each other on such terms.

Make it easy for your spouse

3 upvotes · 14 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Could you explain further how you arrived at the conclusion that sanctifying our wives is optional?

Simple: I can't control her. Working toward her sanctification is mandatory. The sanctification itself is not. Many women will reject their husbands and continue in sin and defiance regardless of how hard their husbands try. The result is what's optional, not the imperative toward it.

I see how husbands need to get their own relationship with God in order first before bringing up something our wives are struggling with

I brought this up in the two videos we recorded last night on frame, which will be posted in the coming weeks. Suffice it to say that the order of building your frame and utilizing it should go something like:

1. Strengthen your own frame. Learn how to take punishment without it affecting your mood - that you are genuinely happy even while people are trying to bring you down. This is not a "fake it" kind of "prove to them they're not getting to you" thing. It is actual, internal, authentic, heart-felt peace and joy within yourself no matter the circumstances. Think of Acts 16 when Paul and Silas are beaten and thrown into prison, yet the same day they're singing hymns to God in their cell. That's strength of frame. It is not offensive or attacking others' frame - it is just building your own.
2. After that, your next goal is to improve your frame. Make it a place that others want to live. Show how great life can be if people would only come alongside you rather than oppose you. This means having a positive attitude, a work-ethic that makes others envious, a household that others wish they could live in, a faith that others long to have for themselves, etc.
3. Invite others into your frame. The previous part should not include actual invitation - it involves natural, organic lure. Acta non verba. In this final phase, now you're actively telling other people to set their own frame aside and live with you. You're giving them the benefit of all you've done with your own life. When Jesus tells the parable of the shrewd manager, he concludes that we ought to use worldly wealth to win friends for the sake of the Gospel and that this is wise. The manager used his position of power and influence to build a relationship with someone that could help him down the road. Similarly, invite others to benefit from your awesome life so that you may win them over for Christ - and this first of all being your wife.

For example, I would like my wife to do personal devotions by herself again and this seems like something I need to encourage as a loving husband trying to follow Eph 5:25-27. For now, I am just concentrating on first making sure I do my own and have been reading a devotional book with my wife most nights.

I'd stay away from devotional books. For the most part, they're going to reinforce blue pill churchianity. This will do her and your marriage more harm than good. If you do want to do one, do your research. I have recommended one in the past, but admittedly never actually picked it up. Doing so now.

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/cqld69/warnings_for_a_people_not_listening_to_god/

RPC Podcast Episode 7: The Importance of OYS

3 upvotes · 10 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed. It took a while to record it because we wanted both chuck and dross to be in for that conversation. It's not always easy working with everyone's schedules. Any topics you'd like to see addressed?

What do I need to learn from here since I came from the og TRP?

3 upvotes · 21 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

the whataboutism of not choosing a bad pastor is a bit broad and a bit unnecessary

I wasn't addressing the topic of choosing a pastor. I was noting the reality that many people here are in congregations with weak pastors who enforce blue pill ideologies on the men in their congregations. This is the large majority of congregations today. For many people, finding a congregation with a "good pastor" is simply not even an option - either because the options are so limited or because they're in an urban area where everyone is so liberal and feminized that only bad options abound. My point wasn't about picking a good pastor; it was about the implication in your comment that people should be serving their congregation in its own context rather than sanctifying and transforming it for Christ by discipling others within the congregation (the only effective way to accomplish the task).

"sanctify the present moment" is a phrase used by my counselor

That's fair. Just make sure the advice you're taking to heart is primarily grounded in Scripture and not just something that sounds Christian-y. While it's certainly not unbiblical, if it's not a concept taught in Scripture, "not unbiblical" can often be a distraction from the "biblical."

Some of us are poor evangelizers. I always have been. Explaining and defending the Faith is not my strongest suit.

Making disciples is not about evangelizing (which precedes discipleship) or "explaining and defending the faith." It is about spiritually parenting those who are spiritually younger than us. Do you have kids or want kids? The processes of raising children and discipling someone are virtually identical.

Now, if you don't have kids, it's easy to say, "I'm not ready to have kids either." Many people say this. But the reality is that "you'll never be ready," as many often reply - and rightfully so. Yet when you do have kids, you figure it out. How? Because you had a parent to learn from - in both what they did right and what they did wrong, and also because you have peers to help you, and because you have a brain that learns as you experiment and try new things. When it comes to discipleship, Jesus gave us a perfect model so that no one can say, "I don't know how." All you have to do is look to how Jesus discipled his 12 - and especially Peter, James, and John - and you will have the perfect model ready to go so you have even less work figuring out how to parent a spiritual child than you would parenting a physical child.

Romans 12:4-11 explains that there are different types of service

Well, it really talks about different gifts, but I don't want to push that point. In passages like this, I stand by my comment above: these are all the different contexts in which we make disciples. I fully embrace that your context for discipling people will be different from mine. You're going to meet different types of people with different interests, different skill sets, and different things to contribute to God's Kingdom. That doesn't excuse the mission to make disciples. It only alters the pool of people you'll disciple and some of the topics that you'll address while discipling them.

I also get the impression that Catholic Christians aren't welcome here.

They're certainly welcome here. I've had plenty of conversations with Catholics. I will note, though, that there's a large number of Protestants who despise Catholicism and this place encourages men to be vocal about their passions, which leads to misplaced vocalism on things like Catholic-bashing. It's not super-common, but it does happen from time to time. Just note whether it's coming from a rando or a mod/EC and that will say a lot.

That said, what's not welcome is a "well, that's what my parish teaches, so I'm going to believe it regardless of whatever you say the Bible actually says" attitude. I'm not saying this is your attitude, but it is the attitude I have seen from a few of the Catholics who have come this way.

I hold to the totem pole of knowledge hierarchy:

- Philosophy is on the bottom, which seeks to solve problems and answer questions through the use of logic and reason. It tells us what should be true if the universe is logical.
- Science is in the middle, above philosophy, which seeks to solve problems and answer questions through the use of observation and experimentation. It tells us what is observably true.
- Theology is on the top, above both of these, which seeks to ascertain truth through the use and application of divine revelation, which is primarily from Scripture. It tells us what is actually true.

So, if a statement like "sanctify the present moment" comes up, I have to ask where on the totem pole it comes from and whether it's something we want to be teaching others. The phrase doesn't appear in Scripture, so one would have to make a Scriptural case for the concept - which might be doable, and if that's the case then do it. Otherwise, it seems to lack any observation and testing with regard to its usefulness, making it a personal philosophy, which is the lowest form of insight and often changes from person to person.

For example, one person's philosophy on finding a date may be: "Opposite attract," so he looks for a woman who is different from himself. Another says, "No, birds of a feather flock together," and then looks for someone the same as him. Another's philosophy is to reject both and ignore similarities/differences as a viable rubric. None are correct and forcing one method on another might actually lead someone to emphasize things that would make it less likely that he find a woman who meets his own standards and preferences. So, sharing your own philosophy may be fine in some cases, but distracting and unhelpful in others.

But where it becomes dangerous is when a personal philosophy is couched in words that make it look like a theological conclusion. Then people start falling for all kinds of cult-like teachings, as that's how most cults begin. A charismatic leader develops his own vision for life apart from Scripture, but words it in a way that makes everyone believe it's a godly, biblical, spiritually compelling thing to do. That's scary!

Anyway, I'm rambling at this point. I hold no ill-will against you. I'm just putting out an explanation for why the "sanctify the present moment" phrase struck me the wrong way. The real thrust of my original comment was because you encouraged him to develop his mission, but seemed to leave "make disciples" out of it, which is, at best, incomplete advice, and, at worst, harmful and destructive. That's the part I'd really want you to process further.

What do I need to learn from here since I came from the og TRP?

3 upvotes · 20 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm glad you honed in on this phrase, as it's crucial. But let me challenge things in a slightly different direction. Jesus is clear that all believers are to "make disciples of all nations." The ministry you serve in is not a fulfillment of your obligation to Christ; it's your fulfillment of your obligation to your congregation. And if you're committed to your congregation, then you should appreciate and value that obligation. But it shouldn't trump what Jesus has asked of you, me, OP, and everyone else: to make disciples.

If you'd like to think of it this way, Jesus is the groom and the people known as the Church are collectively Jesus's singular spouse. Our congregations are the temporary home Jesus has given us until our permanent place has been established. Serving your congregation has great value. But is the bride's obligation to take care of the house or to carry out what her husband asks of her? Often-times the two overlap. Jesus has asked us to build up the Church - and this is a good thing (though I'd wager he means more in terms of building up the people rather than making the programs run more cohesively). But even more important than any of the "extra" things we do to serve our congregations is the singular mission to make disciples, which is Jesus's top priority for us and the mission congregations are failing to carry out, making it all the more essential to take on the responsibility at a grass-roots level.

I love this quote by Dawson Trotman - my favorite preacher/speaker:

If I were the minister of a church and had deacons or elders to pass the plate and choir members to sing, I would say, 'thank God for your help. We need you. Praise the Lord for these extra things that you do,' but I would keep pressing home the big job—"Be fruitful and multiply." All these other things are incidental to the supreme task of winning a man or woman to Jesus Christ and then helping him or her to go on.

At times, I try to be a bit more generous. I try to give people an opportunity to use their preferred area of "ministry" as a context for making disciples. So, if your area of "ministry" is to handle the protection detail at your congregation, that's great. Disciple those who are protecting the congregation alongside you. Let that be your context. But don't let it be a replacement for the big job.

On the other hand, what if someone reads your comment and decides he's going to join or start up a protection team in his congregation, and he ends up protecting a pastor who's leading people astray with all kinds of blue pill nonsense or even prosperity preaching or other atrocities that are actually doing more harm than good? Do you get a free pass because you're "serving the church"? Of course not. That's no different than being a Nazi and claiming, "I was just trying to help my authorities and I thought they were doing right. I was ignorant of all the harm we were causing." That's not to say your congregation is such a place, but this advice could lead to some people taking a self-satisfied attitude toward activities that actually support what's harming God's Kingdom! Yikes!!

Anyway, I know you mean well, but I challenge you to stay biblical with your focus. "sanctify the present moment" sounds super spiritual, but I'm not aware of that phrase in Scripture anywhere, so where did it come from? Most likely a sermon or book where some guy wanted to sound holy by making up a phrase people could quote him over. I recommend sticking to Scripture. When we do that, the answer becomes clear that our mission/calling/whatever you want to call it is to make disciples. Everything else is just context.

I hope this helps, brother.

RPC Chat - Episode 4: Christian Dead Bedrooms

3 upvotes · 18 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Matthew 7:12

I assume you mean, "Would you want your wife to use dread on you?" To that, I would love nothing more than for my wife to become more attractive to me and others :D

For the rest, I'm not sure how you're trying to connect these concepts to dread. At best, you might be arguing that dread is somehow in conflict with loving your wife. I get the impression you don't understand dread.

- Level 1: "Learn to recognize and start passing fitness tests" (i.e. not be a pushover to your wife). You can't love her if you can't lead her because God designed husbands to lead their wives as their expression of love. If a guy is letting his wife boss him around, that's the opposite of loving her.
- Level 2: "Develop an action plan to improve the major areas of your life. Develop the physical, spiritual, psychological, financial and personal areas of your life." Are you suggesting that improving yourself is unloving to a wife?
- Level 3: "Begin to build a life apart from your wife. Join a club. Take up a cause, discipline, or calling. Get busy." Is it unloving to have friends and hobbies outside the home?
- Level 4: "Begin conditioning your availability to your wife with her treatment of you. You are busy now. You don't have time for a sexually disinterested, annoying, or angry wife." This is nothing more than God did to Israel or Jesus to his people. Isaiah 59:2 comes to mind - "But your iniquities have separated you from your God; your sins have hidden his face from you so that he will not hear." There are also numerous passages about God turning away from those who behave poorly toward him. Are we to suggest it's unloving to create and enforce boundaries when people cross them and that the only loving thing to do is be kind all the time no matter how bad someone treats you? Obviously not.
- Level 5: "Upgrade your clothes and start dressing 'up' more of the time." Nothing unloving about dressing nicer.
- Level 6: "Begin to study pickup artistry. Before you do anything stupid, use your newfound knowledge about the stages of seduction and pickup artistry on your wife." So now it's unloving to try to attract your wife?

Most men never need to employ dread beyond these levels. But I could add to this list even for higher levels. But it's worth emphasizing that the levels of dread are things you increase only until you get the results you want in regard to the improved relationship you have with your wife.

Dread Level 10, for example, is where you have the "have sex with me or I'm gone" conversation with your wife. One would have to be an idiot to assume that all men should aspire to have this conversation with their wives, or that it's a constant state of life to have this conversation daily. Obviously the proper interpretation is that once you get the result you want, you back down and hover where you need to in order to maintain the results you're looking for.

It also seems like you assume the point of "dread" is to make your wife jealous. This is total lunacy that most new guys simply don't understand. That attitude will backfire EVERY. SINGLE. TIME. The goal isn't to make her jealous; it's to show her that you're attractive - first by actually becoming attractive, and then, if necessary, by utilizing post-marital preselection to your advantage in the way she sees other people acknowledging your attractiveness to help her acknowledge it as well.

/u/Deep_Strength

Are women really "saved through child-bearing"? Yes.

3 upvotes · 18 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I have no clue where you got that from.

RPC Video Chat

3 upvotes · 17 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

u/r_horizon has taken point on this for now. I'd suggest contacting him to see if there are ways you can help out so he doesn't, in time, run the risk of burning out on it.

Are women really "saved through child-bearing"? Yes.

3 upvotes · 17 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right. I agree with everything except your last paragraph. It's true at times for some people, but not necessarily universally.

It's more accurate to say that perfect human marriage as God designed with completely parallel our relationship with Christ, even in the face of humanity's individual sinfulness.

Explaining the Double Standards around Sex

3 upvotes · 15 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

That's what lube is for. And I agree - men have some pretty awful attributes too. It's not just women. The difference is that men are held accountable for these openly and everyday.

Explaining the Double Standards around Sex

3 upvotes · 14 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I think you're missing the point of what I was saying. These normally annoying or disgusting chores can become actually enjoyable with the right attitude going in. It's not "close your eyes and think of England" or "putting up with it." I legit enjoy doing the dishes or changing diapers at times when I'm in the right frame. I don't enjoy it because I magically convince myself that dirty diapers or dishes somehow became anything other than disgusting, but because I know how to amuse myself while shopping things I wouldn't normally care to do.

But perhaps this is part of the solipsism of women that they'd be incapable of this.

Regardless, to your point, yes, a guy will certainly feel like that's a buzz kill, but it's still better than the alternatives. While it's an awful practice, the fact that date rape drugs exist in the first place is pretty clear evidence that some guys, at least, are cool with sex even with a completely disinterested woman.

Actual conversations with "abuse" victims.

3 upvotes · 12 June 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

In most cases I've referenced, there's no evidence the person felt coerced at the time. It was regret after the fact, once divorce proceedings started, that caused them to recharacterize everything. Stop trying to white knight by pretending these cases are more credible than they are. I'm not taking these from some random third party. These are from my own cases that have mostly been tested in court.

Actual conversations with "abuse" victims.

3 upvotes · 11 June 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This is true in most states. My mom did that to my dad. There's also an attorney I know who charges $1,000 just for an initial consult because he's so unethical that everyone wants to rule him out for the opposition while not hiring him themselves either. As a result, he earns $250,000 a year on initial consults alone, 90% of these people never hiring him.

The strategy does backfire occasionally because if you get caught doing that the judges will consider it a sign of bad faith and dishonest tactics and will hold that against you when assessing your credibility as a witness later on.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (06/10/20)

3 upvotes · 10 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

have you guys thought about doing a livestream on YT?

Absolutely. I read at one point that you have to have 1k+ subscribers to qualify to do those. So, until we have that, it's not an option. We do intend to start having guest speakers come on fairly soon. I have some other fun ideas in the works.

Need some dating advice...

3 upvotes · 10 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is a weird conversation. The answer should be quite obvious here: Decreasing abundance doesn't increase abundance mentality. Dumping a girl won't actually increase abundance or abundance mentality; it is a byproduct of what someone who already has an abundance mentality is willing to do if a woman turns out not to be a good candidate.

Abundance mentality comes from a variety of other factors:

- A shotgun, rather than sniper approach
- Becoming the prize and knowing it
- Receiving IOIs

Basically, anything that persuades you that more girls are into you will increase your abundance mentality and anything that actually causes more girls to be into you will increase your abundance. While the two are correlated, they are not identical.

Decreasing the number of girls interested in you might make you feel good about yourself, but it is only an expression of an abundance mentality. At best, it vindicates a man's feelings of abundance IF AND ONLY IF he already has someone else lined up to take the old girl's place. But I don't see a ground for it increasing abundance.

All that being said, I don't agree with DeChef in his view that the only reason to dump a girl is because you don't expect it to lead to marriage - especially if your views toward marriage aren't necessarily oriented properly.

I believe I've told one of my stories on here that addresses one such example. Extremely shortened version, limiting it just to the relevant parts:

- I was interested in a hot girl in college, got lots of IOIs back; we started informally dating
- Guy I was discipling became interested in same girl
- Even though I had every reason to believe I would marry this girl, I let her go anyway, placing my investment in him as a disciple over my prospect in her as a wife.
- They're now married and probably making as many or more disciples than I am, being full-time staff with a campus ministry and even heading up the national "sexual health" division of the Navigators.

In the end, he is singularly the most fruitful disciple I have ever made. Hands down. I have never regretted the choice for a minute. But it was a great example of turning down a girl who I did believe was marriage material - for the sake of my mission (allusion to /u/johnmic07's comment there).

RPCC Episode 3: The State of Marriage

3 upvotes · 9 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Fast talking isn't generally a problem. Most people's brains can process at 500 words per minute, whereas the average person talks at about 150 words per minute. I've read research studies that show people remember more from people who speak faster than slower, theorizing that they are filling the extra brain capacity, leaving less room for distraction and engaging the listener.

Actual conversations with "abuse" victims.

3 upvotes · 7 June 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

WISNIFG Bill of Assertive Rights #4 - "You have the right to change your mind."

Society thinks that once you make a statement, you're locked into that statement for the rest of your life. Changing your mind isn't an option. Do you know how many political leaders could have gotten out of a jam if they'd simply said, "Yeah, I did say that back then. I changed my mind because I'm smarter now." Done.

My wife used to pull this crap on me. "But you said ... !" "So? I changed my mind." Done. No need to try to rationalize a reconciliation between your past statements/conduct with your current decisions.

Actual Conversations With "Abuse" Victims

3 upvotes · 5 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I actually had 7.

[60DOD] Week 8, Social Life [MRP]

3 upvotes · 5 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Intentionally leading someone on, sure. Per Romans 14, you can't biblically and rationally do that in a place coming from faith. But as long as you're acting in faith, you can't take personal responsibility for how others decide to feel about you. Too many guys feel like they owe an obligation toward other people on stuff like this. I'd lump it in the category of things churchianity teaches that aren't actually in Scripture anywhere, except for indirect connections that are never applied consistently on other topics the same way.

RPC Video Chat

3 upvotes · 4 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Good idea. I'm really going to look into having someone else be responsible for video processing and uploading. Personally, I simply don't have the time and capacity to keep doing that every week. But I'll keep this in mind for whoever takes over. And if nobody takes over, I'm not sure exactly how long we'll keep this up! You'll notice very fast that video editing is not my strong suit.

But I'm definitely encouraged that a few more conversations in, Dross decided to turn his video on and OZ put up a picture of himself, so there's at least some better user recognition there.

What are your views on prenups with Christianity?

3 upvotes · 2 June 2020 · /r/askRPC

From a secular viewpoint that prioritizes feelings over godliness, what you're saying makes perfect sense.

How should Christian men seeking to marry respond to women guilty of fornication claiming that males using porn is the same thing?

3 upvotes · 1 June 2020 · /r/askRPC

Matthew 5:28 says a man is guilty of adultery in his heart if he lusts inappropriately. It DOESN'T say that all the other negative impacts of fornication are also imputed to him. So, watching porn and riding the CC are like apples and oranges. They're simply not the same and should not be placed on the same level.

Now, if a girl actually researches the effects of pornography and fornication and how they are distinct from one another, and concludes, "I've slept around, so I'll take a guy who sleeps around, but not one who watches porn," then go for it. But to equate porn with actual fornication is not appropriate.

Response to "Why Men Hate Going to Church"

3 upvotes · 26 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

You're seriously going to mince words on that? "He used a dog as a metaphor to represent a woman." That better?

Who should you listen to on RPChristians?

3 upvotes · 20 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Haha. I'll think on it, but I don't want to encourage too much fundamentalism. If liberal theology is one extreme, fundamentalism is the other. The truth is much closer to fundamentalism, but fundamentalists generally have very, very wrong interpretations about the way the OT is to be understood and applied, which is made clear by the NT quite directly.

Who should you listen to on RPChristians?

3 upvotes · 20 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I've thought about giving you a "hardcore fundamentalist" flair from time to time. Not sure if that would work for you or against you, so I've refrained.

Discovered an inappropriate relationship

3 upvotes · 12 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

You're missing the point. I didn't say it was a good idea. I'm simply challenging your contention that feeeeeeeeling a certain way toward someone is somehow sinful. That's the same logic that makes guys constantly beat their heads over a wall every time they get a hard-on.

How is one to navigate as a biblical masculine man in a female-dominated workspace

3 upvotes · 4 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

For discipleship specifically, The Lost Art of Discipleship, by LeRoy Eims (referenced on the sidebar) and my book (also referenced on the sidebar) are the two I point people toward up-front. There are many other good ones, but those are great primers. The others out there tend to be tangential and less on-topic, or they muddle their definition of discipleship to veer away from what Jesus actually did.

Roosh V on Jessie Lee Peterson

3 upvotes · 4 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Yes

Is working out THAT important to find a potential spouse.

3 upvotes · 1 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Lots of comments here - but no one has hit on this yet. Look at the arena you're working with.

- Adam is obese. He's a 1/10. Let's say his entire immediate social network of people he might brush shoulders with involves 10,000 women in a given year. Maybe he has 100 women who would give him the time of day ... out of ten thousand. He doesn't know which those 100 are. Good luck, Adam.
- Bob has a male-model body with chiseled abs. He's a 9.5/10 - not just physically, but on the whole in how women evaluate him. In his 10k network, 9,500 women would gladly give him the time of day, many of them begging for it. He doesn't have to figure out who they are because he can pick pretty much anyone and statistics are on his side ... even plenty of the married ones.
- Carl is no male-model, but he has visible abs and his shirts form-fit around his pecs and biceps. He's an 8/10. He maintains an average routine at the gym. In his 10k network, 6,000 women would gladly give him the time of day, many of them begging for it. He may face some rejection, but it won't be hard at all to figure out which women are interested and which aren't.
- Dave is identical to Carl in every way.

Now, all 3 men want a high-quality woman who would be a good helper. All three recognize that she doesn't have to be perfect, but does have to be willing to follow his lead, not have any serious psychological issues, and it would be better the more spiritually mature she is. Very basic criteria, right?

Which man do you think is going to have the easiest time finding such a woman? Which one is most likely to find a girl extremely well-suited to his goals and who checks all the boxes and is ultimately teachable and malleable enough to grow in the direction he guides her?

Now ... everyone agrees that'd be Bob, right? But then consider the 4+ hours a day, 7 days a week Bob has to spend at the gym compared to Carl, who only has time for 90 minutes 4 times a week. Is the probability increase between Bob and Carl worth the added effort?

Now ... go one step further: Bob and Carl are both married. They both have fantastic wives who are attractive. They both managed to marry a solid 9. In fact, they're identical twin sisters. Good for you, Bob and Carl. Adam is dating a 3, but she's not too sure about him.

Carl's SMV is lower than his wife's and she knows it. She sees Bob around the corner and thinks, "Why couldn't I have married him instead? I'm every bit as pretty and competent as my sister." So, she loses sexual attraction for Carl. They still have regular sex, but it's not great and he can sense the lack of enthusiasm in her. Why did you marry up, Carl? Didn't you know this is how hypergamy would play out? So, Carl discovers the red pill and realizes that the SMV dynamic in his marriage is out of balance. He has a choice to make: (a) put up with his mediocre sex life because his wife is great in other areas, (b) leave his wife to find a better unicorn, or (c) put in the extra hours improving himself that Bob did and get the sex life he wants with his wife and hope she actually responds as he expects (which is, admittedly, probable, but far from a guarantee).

Dave married a 7. His bedroom is thriving, and he's got all the other non-sexual perks in his wife that Bob and Carl have as well. Sure, his wife may not be as "hot," but he doesn't have to deal with the challenges of having a hot wife either. As he leads the way, she's inspired by his continued growth and improvement, and even though it doesn't necessarily change his overarching SMV, she feels some pressure to keep up and ultimately grows from a 7 to a 7.5 ... and possibly more. He's a pretty happy guy.

Tag: /u/OsmiumZulu - props for the way old post, but it's one I'd never forgotten.

Is working out THAT important to find a potential spouse.

3 upvotes · 1 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'll ditto all of this, but especially emphasize your first point, as it's pure gold - and a concept that I haven't iterated on here in a long while. You just need to change one word:

It may be possible for you to be fat and still ~~attract~~ persuade a good looking Christian woman with beta game.

She's not attracted. It's an intellectual game at that point. As others have said and is commonly known: women are told to marry for spiritual maturity, not looks. They aren't attracted to such guys, but beta game can intellectually convince a woman that a particular unattractive guy meets the qualifications the girl's pastor told her to seek.

About to file for divorce

3 upvotes · 29 April 2020 · /r/askMRP

Just seeing this. You're correct here - Jesus was internally validated, not externally. He did not pine over whether or not some guy would follow him. He had abundance, knowing if he kept doing his thing, people would join him. He even commented at one point that if nobody else would do it, "the rocks would cry out." Yeah, he did specifically call people to follow him, and that's fine too. But the imperative was not merely to "go spread the word." It was to "make disciples." In short, he's saying, "The way you just saw me live my life with you, go make that your way of life too."

It is churchianity that has screwed this up and re-interpreted the phrase "make disciples" out of its obvious meaning and replaced it with "tell everyone what you believe and make them believe it."

In practice, Jesus' model looks a lot more like what /u/HornsOfApathy did in the post I referenced here than the whole "stand on a street corner and shove the Bible down everyone's throats" garbage. Some principles I see in his post:

- He was just doing what he wanted to do and another guy wanted what he had.
- He enjoyed teaching the guy and it enhanced his own life and sense of fulfillment seeing his frame project into this kid.
- Watching the results of his efforts gave him an internal sense of satisfaction - enough to write a post about it - but with the obvious flip: if the kid hadn't followed, there's no indication he would have been butthurt about it.

I usually enjoy what Horns writes, but I haven't followed him closely enough to know if he has kids. Kids are literally a physical piece of yourself externalized into the world. I love the idea of projecting myself into the world - not because someone told me to, but because it's fun creating a kingdom for myself - even as I am part of my father's kingdom, as he was of his father's. That's how patriarchy works.

But the reality is that I don't want any more than the 4 physical little goblins running around my house that I already have. So, instead of projecting my physical self, I make spiritual children - and not in the "shout it from the mountaintops" method, but with the "I'm awesome, anyone who wants to come along is welcome" approach that Horns took. Wouldn't it be great if this approach led to so many people wanted to follow that we literally had to pick and choose which ones get to learn from us and which ones have to play second-fiddle? That's what Jesus had when he went on the mountainside and called his 12.

Tag: /u/coachdad8 - I appreciate your zeal, but in this case it seems to have been misplaced. There are good things being said on both sides. What happened to "take what works and leave the rest"? I'm not sure why anyone needs to start insulting and measuring dicks this way. It just comes off as a loss of frame ... unless it's funny. I'm always up for a good laugh.

Are there some worship songs you enjoy?

3 upvotes · 28 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

u/ChadDownUnder hooked me on Keith Green for a while. Yeah, he's old, but check some of these lyrics:

Well, you speak of grace and my love so sweet
How you thrive on milk, but reject my meat.
And I can't help weeping at how it will be
If you keep on ignoring my words.
Well, you pray to prosper and succeed
But your flesh is something I just can't feed ...
I want hearts of fire, not your prayers of ice.
And I'm coming quickly to give back to you
According to what you have done.
(To Obey is Better Than Sacrifice)

The world has gone crazy but soon maybe
A lot more are gonna know
For maybe they don't understand it
Or maybe they just haven't heard it
Or maybe we're not doin' all we can
Living up to His Holy Word
'Cause phonies have come and wrong's been done
Even killing in Jesus' name
And if you've been burned, here's what I've learned
The Lord's not the one to blame
(How Can They Live Without Jesus?)

His plan of battle, you know it
He fooled them all
They led him off to prison to die
But as He entered Hades Hall
He broke those hellish chains with a cry
Just listen to those demons screaming
See Him bruise the serpent's head
The prisoners of hell He's redeeming, oh!
All the power of death is dead
(The Victor)

Do you see? Do you see?
All the people sinking down?
Don't you care? Don't you care?
Are you gonna let them drown?
How can you be so numb?
Not to care if they come!
You close your eyes and pretend the job's done ...
Oh, can't you see it's such sin?
'Cause he brings people to your door
And you turn them away
As you smile and say:
"God bless you, be at peace!"
And all Heaven just weeps
'Cause Jesus came to your door
You've left Him out on the streets
(Asleep in the Light)

I've been out fighting the war today
The war inside of my head
I thought that I killed my enemy
Yes, I thought that my ego was dead
But it's still stubbornly living
In the kingdom of my thoughts
In the state - in the state of mind
I've been out struggling with everyone
In the arena all day
Views I defend, they don't matter much
Because they would debate either way
Where's the root of my problem?
Why does everyone oppose every side - every side that I take?
(War Games)

Jesus commands us to go

But we go the other way
So he carries the burden alone
While his children are busy at play
Feeling so called to stay ...
Jesus commands us to go
It should be the exception if we stay
It's no wonder we're moving so slow
When his church refuses to obey
Feeling so called to stay
(Jesus Commands Us to Go)

Oh Lord, there's just so much to be done
Oh Lord, so many souls to be won
Oh Lord, this world is falling apart
Dying for love from a broken heart
Here am I, send me
Though there's really not that much I can do
What I have seems so small
But I want to give it all to you
Oh Lord, you said the harvest was great
But Lord, looks like the workers are late
It's getting hard to understand
How they ignore your great command
Here am I, send me
(Here Am I, Send Me)

You're just not going to find Christian music like this in congregations anymore.

Teacher reflections on behaviour management

3 upvotes · 27 April 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

If I were writing to a group of trained psychologists, then yes, I would have worded this differently. The same behaviors can be classified as either punishment or negative reinforcement, depending on the context of how they're being used. I don't think that distinction is particularly relevant here, as parenting involves both getting kids to stop bad behaviors and start good behaviors.

The long-term study I referenced was focused primarily on looking at the overall success of children who were raised with different types of positive/negative treatment in the home. It did not specify any distinction in the adult subject as to whether they were averse to bad behaviors and/or prone to good. Nobody look at a person in those terms. We look at the whole of a person, recognizing that, to some degree, everyone is going to have some balance of unproductive and productive behaviors.

If you want to run a long-term test to determine whether "punishment without negative reinforcement" or "negative reinforcement without punishment" or neither/both changes the outcome, let me know when you're done. I'd be interested at the results. Until then, I'm working with what I know.

If it makes a difference, most academics actually split "punishment"/"reinforcement" frameworks into two separate categories: utilitarian and retributive.

Utilitarian

You're speaking from a utilitarian perspective, viewing the nature of the action purely in the context of manipulating an end result with an individual person. Utilitarian views are generally extremely flexible and do not require the maintenance of strong boundaries because the response to someone's actions should be tailored to what will produce the intended result with the individual. Often times this means ignoring one's own boundaries when enforcing them would serve no purpose, or offering different degrees of positive/negative response that may seem disproportionate to the established system of boundary enforcement because the unique situation implies that such exaggerated/diminished response is more likely to cause the other person to modify their behaviors the way you want them to.

- Example 1: I set a boundary that any kid who isn't in bed in 5 minutes will lose TV the next day. My 4, 6, and 8 year old are all in bed in 5 minutes. My 2 year old, while understanding me, was not in bed. A utilitarian will excuse the child because, while understanding the action/consequence dynamic, she doesn't have the capacity to connect it to her own behaviors or future consequence. So, taking away TV tomorrow would serve no purpose for her because she won't remember or understand why it was taken away. Therefore, the boundary should not be enforced. Instead, the utilitarian might employ some other measure that will have the impact of teaching the child to go to bed when she's supposed to, like a spanking in the moment.

Because the goal for the utilitarian is to conform an individual's behaviors, many people who operate within a utilitarian framework are less interested in actually punishing anyone and more interested in "talking it out" with the expectation that doing so will help them understand and make wiser decisions in the future.

Examples of utilitarianism in the modern legal context: (1) Giving women a pussy pass for prostitution, as Canada does, on the view that they're just trying to survive and therefore their violation of the law is forgivable and punishing them wouldn't actually help them become better people, while still incarcerating the men who pay them. (2) Sentencing violent aggressors to anger management rather than jail time, on the theory that they will become better citizens and incarceration won't be a motivator. (3) Letting juveniles have a clear record once they turn 18 (except for some types of offenses) in the hope that having a clean slate will assist them in becoming successful adults without their negative past to hold them back. (4) The sentencing gap between crack/powder cocaine, crack being punished over 10x more harshly, even though there is negligible difference between the substances; the rationale being that the crack cocaine community has massively higher statistical rates of gun violence, murder, money laundering, etc. that wants to be targeted through more severe sentencing, especially when they can't catch criminals in the crack cocaine industry on those other charges.

Retributive

Retributive models operate on a dual system of direct and indirect goals. The direct goal is to create and enforce an operative framework for its own sake. "This is how I want things, so this is how it will be." Anyone who violates the framework is punished not because you want them to be better or improve, but because you said you would, so you will. Another way to say it is that within your authoritative framework they DESERVE to be punished. It doesn't matter that the punishment won't actually help conform the person's behaviors because there are larger issues that can be compromised if we start adjusting the boundaries for each individual person or situation.

- Example: In the example above, the 2 year old would lose TV the following day instead of getting a spanking in the moment. Why? Because that's what you said the response would be, so you follow through with what you said. It doesn't matter that the child doesn't understand, and therefore can't learn from the punishment. It does matter that the other kids will see that you're consistent in holding your boundaries, and eventually the younger child will learn that too.

Where utilitarian models focus on conforming an individual to the authority's expectations, the retributive models focus on conforming the community by using the individual as an example to others and establishing such clear consistency in the authority's own operation that (1) there becomes no point testing the authority's boundaries because the result is always the same, (2) the authority doesn't have to spend so much time coming up with uniquely tailored responses to others' actions because anyone in the system already knows what the response will be.

Examples of retributivism in the modern legal context: (1) The establishment and mandated enforcement of sentencing guidelines in most states for virtually every type of offense. (2) Parking/traffic tickets, littering fines, and other "per se" violations of law. (3) No tolerance policies on issues of (proven/admitted) domestic violence or gun-related crimes or school bullying, which policies often mandate the way the sentencing guidelines are applied. (4) Certain types of judicial discretion, such as one judge ALWAYS giving the maximum possible sentence for certain types of crimes he finds particularly distasteful.

Balancing

Neither is perfect in itself. Most people balance these, though I certainly lean more retributive. On the whole, the retributive model is better for a family unit (rather than any one individual child) and establishes a clearer and stronger frame for the head of the household (me). Of course, the draw-back of the retributive model is that some people are willing to accept the consequences to get the benefit of the action. Celebrities don't care if they get a parking ticket because the clear and foreknown enforcement of a $25 fine means very little to them. My son has told me on occasion, "Okay, I'd rather lose TV tomorrow than do what you're telling me to do today." At that point, my boundary HAS to adjust to some degree in order to maintain its strength/integrity, so I'm going to up the consequence of violating it.

Similarly utilitarianism risks manipulation. Subjects ultimately believe that if they jump through enough hoops that the authority gives them, proving that they've been rehabilitated, then the authority will get off their back and they can go back to doing what they wanted to in the first place. It ultimately diminishes respect for the authority, who is seen as soft, and often does not produce lasting effects in the long-term.

The Point

Back to reinforcement/punishment - all of these models leave room for rewarding good behavior. Nobody is saying that's a bad thing. But it's also somewhat infuriating when criminals get government stimulus checks to help them get back on their feet, ultimately subsidizing many of them in their return to bad drug habits, or to live off the government as long as possible before even looking for a way to support themselves. This is rewarding bad behavior, hoping that the "positive reinforcement" toward a productive lifestyle will result in positive changes. It doesn't. Rather, more people are motivated by the mentality: "I just got out of prison. I'm not going back!" Yes, some people don't care because it's become a way of life for them. But again: it's not just about that person. It's about showing other people who DO care that the boundary will be enforced, so they'd better stay in line too.

To that end, one would have to be a fool to take a purely "positive reinforcement" approach, to the exclusion of negative reinforcement or even punishment. If you want to splice hairs over negative reinforcement/punishment with your own kids, go for it - but make sure that when you do so you're thinking of it from a broader framework of balancing utilitarian goals with retributive consistency.

From there, I don't care so much about the distinction between, "If you color on the wall, you get spanked" and "If you don't clean the wall when I told you to, you get spanked." But I'm not going to reward someone for not coloring on the wall - there's no room for positive reinforcement for people to do the minimum that's expected of them anyway. Yet if they clean the wall, even when I don't ask, then I'll certainly reward that good behavior. Or if they're consistently obeying me when I ask, without complaining, that deserves a reward.

Any Christian women who participate here that this idea appeals to, I would love to hear your advice!

3 upvotes · 26 April 2020 · /r/RedPillWomen

One would think. The majority of church culture in most first world countries shows a much wider chasm between biblical views on marriage and relationships and what is actually taught by the mainstream church, which has predominantly caved to cultural appeasement and political correctness.

Dalrock used to write on this a lot. We also address this on r/RPChristians, of course.

Can you SEE it?

3 upvotes · 22 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I was in the same spot, brother. I understand the frustration. My wife was 100% on board with making disciples when we married. After we married she admitted she lied and really didn't care about that - she was just saying it to get me to marry her. I spent 7-8 years in obese beta bux land, having relatively little hope before figuring myself out. She's turned the corner. You present a strong lead and the chances she'll follow go way up. And if not, you'll be more effective at carrying out your mission anyway - so win, win.

Find Something to Lift around the House

3 upvotes · 20 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

No one had a problem because not as many people here are as sensitive and judgmental as you seem to be. That's okay. I encourage you to stick with it and strengthen your emotional stability. This seems a better option than running away from views that rub you the wrong way. Try to understand how others think rather than hating on them for not thinking like you. Even if you still end up disagreeing with them, you'll be far more capable of loving them. No need to be so bitter over a silly internet conversation.

Find Something to Lift around the House

3 upvotes · 20 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Just noticed your user name. This conversation makes a lot more sense now.

Bottom line: you have this rainbows and butterflies view of Jesus that churchianity has shoved down your throat for as long as you've been attending services. I get it. We all came from there at one point. If you read the bible with a mind to challenge whether what you were taught was actually true (as the Bereans did in Acts 17) you're going to find a lot of inconsistencies and that most "pastors" don't know as much as they pretend. As much as you think OP's comment was sin, many of us would view your position as sinful as well.

Asking what Jesus WOULD do often creates conclusions based on our own ideologies of the Jesus that we want to believe in. Asking what he ACTUALLY DID do shows us the real Jesus. This, of course, requires intimate fluency with the bible which takes substantial time. I strongly encourage you to study more and condemn people less.

Can't stop disrespecting women.

3 upvotes · 17 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

You read NMMNG yet? It's a foundational book. He talks a good bit about how to build a backbone, but without being a ridiculous caricature who craps all over the world.

What are your thoughts on tattoos?

3 upvotes · 16 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Deep: do you want to do an official full write-up on your directional response to "is this/that sin?" questions and we can just put it on the sidebar so you don't need to keep copy/pasting over and over, and you can just direct people to the sidebar instead?

Also, if you agree to do this, I'd recommend going over ruiz's take on this too, as it's the response I subscribe to and seems to work hand-in-hand with a lot of what you write on the subject.

Alternatively, I can just put ruiz's post on our sidebar ... but I'd prefer to keep sidebar content in-house whenever possible.

Other input from /u/rocknrollchuck /u/OsmiumZulu /u/RedPillWonder?

Bible Study with Wife?

3 upvotes · 14 April 2020 · /r/askRPC

I strongly encourage you NOT to use a study, but to go straight into Scripture. Read the 300-series posts on quiet times and Bible study to get a picture for how to study Scripture on your own. Pick a book and go at it. I recommend Philippians to start with. It's short, but has a lot of depth to it. I memorized the book and haven't found a single aspect of daily life that isn't addressed by something in that book. I've done the same things with other more popular books, like James and Romans, but haven't found the same fruit as Philippians on a pragmatic level (though they certainly hold significant theological insight).

Godliness isn't sexy

3 upvotes · 14 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Solid post, brother. You need to cross-post more of your stuff here. The only thing I'll note, which has been alluded to in less clear terms by a couple people: what you really mean is "godliness" in the way churchianity defines the word. True godliness does, of course, inherently encompass a variety of attractive traits, including the significance of maintaining one's physical appearance (at least to a degree - one doesn't necessarily need to be a male model to be godly, but one does at least have to conquer basic obesity and have a modicum of pragmatically valuable strength).

Regardless, I'm glad to hear from you on this. I'm going to put up a companion post to address one thing from the comments: the assumption that feminists push that men are more visual than women (and therefore more shallow) when it comes to sexual arousal.

Living Out of Yourself

3 upvotes · 8 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed. We will still sin. But when you say this:

So saying 'Do what you want' can be a dangerous thing to say to many christians who are not constantly being transformed by the renewing of their minds, as that is a crucial first step

I agree in theory, but perhaps not in practice. First, I'd question if a person who refuses to allow God to change them is even a Christian in the first place. And if they are non-Christians, it's pointless telling them not to sin because everything they do is sin anyway - even the things that seem good.

More specifically, I think this view still inappropriately looks at sin as extrinsic behaviors rather than an internal state of the heart that prompts the behaviors. A buddy of mine wrote a post on r/TrueChristian not to long ago: https://www.reddit.com/r/TrueChristian/comments/f8vuke/is_this_a_sin_is_that_a_sin_not_the_right/. In it, he explains that no behavior is inherently sinful; rather, it's the orientation of our heart and the motive of our faith that determines if our behavior is "sin" or "not sin." He uses an example I've often copied before: "Is it sin to watch child porn?" Most people will say yes. But what if you're an FBI investigator who watches it to find clues to catch the perpetrator - and he does this because he knows God has called him to protect those children and he is acting in faith to God by taking all reasonable means to fulfill that goal? Obviously this is not sin anymore. So even something as "inherently wrong" as watching child porn isn't actually "inherently wrong" at all.

So, when I tell someone: "Do what you want," that might cause them to do things that others would view as sinful, but it doesn't necessarily mean it will be sinful. That said, I do also agree on a pragmatic level that we're all way more sinful than we realize and even a lot of the "good" things that people call "non-sinful" that we do are probably still sin anyway. Like watching TV. If someone asked on reddit, "Is watching TV a sin?" They'd get laughed at and everyone would say, "No." But the reality is that it CAN be sinful, and probably ACTUALLY IS sinful far more often than we might realize - perhaps even over 95% of the time it's sin. Why? Because the people watching TV are doing so as some form of procrastination of other things God would have them be doing, or perhaps they're doing it for some reason other than being prompted by their faith to do it. Yet ruiz, in that post, also uses this as one of the exact examples of how one CAN (and he does) watch TV from a place completely prompted by faith. It's a beautiful read, if you haven't gotten to it yet.

Back to the point: my real goal with saying this wasn't to guide people away from sin. It was to show them how sinful their hearts are so that instead of faking holiness they can seek actual holiness. Someone who behaves righteously by ignoring their heart's evil desires still has a heart that desires evil. I'd rather people focus on a lifestyle that fixes the heart so it doesn't desire evil anymore, over modifying behaviors. Although, I think to your point, this often happens as part of the maturity process and perhaps the spiritually young still need a little bit of legalism and behavior modification just to get started on the path, just like kids do, as /u/redwall92 referenced in his comment about the parallels between this mind-set and parenting.

On Testosterone

3 upvotes · 4 April 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Three years ago I wouldn't know what the heck any of those words meant. Thanks for the added info!

Have you swallowed the Red Chewable Tablet?

3 upvotes · 3 April 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Haha. I'm definitely wordy, but that's no excuse for someone else to be lazy. If a guy doesn't want to read a lot of words, just don't read them. Pretty simple.

LTR no longer Christian. Next her?

3 upvotes · 3 April 2020 · /r/askTRP

I don't see it yet. About to head to bed. askRPC might actually be the preferred place, as you'll need to put in all the Rule 2 information if you're posting on RPChristians proper. I'll check for it in the morning.

Most Christians Do Not Love Women

3 upvotes · 1 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with /u/RedPillWonder, but in light of your comment let me take things a step further.

Your interpretation that women are most in God's image when they are married is also the way I would take what

I think you're asking. A woman without a husband is like a man without Christ, or Christ without the Father. She is as incomplete as a person as Adam was without God.

But as RPW is saying, the reverse doesn't play out quite the same. Christ without mankind is still perfectly fine. There is no circumstance to imagine God without Christ, but this is the exact point of the parallel God is establishing: that we are fallen and trying to return to our ability to reflect God's image - triune as it may be. So, while God is triune, he gave men, women, and children to represent triune structures as well - and Jesus, in the way he interacts with humanity is a mediator, bridging the gap between God's triune being and our triune structures here on earth, linking the two through his own relationship with the Church.

But again, if the Christ-church relationship is our given model (as we don't see the same imperative for men and women to interact the way God and Jesus do), then a man's need for a woman is as essential as Jesus's need for the Church (i.e. based on desire, not need), whereas a woman's need for a man (i.e. husband) is as essential as the Church's need for Christ (i.e. based on need, and hopefully also desire).

But all of this is still glorious not only for the Father and men, but also for the woman. After all, while it is still evident throughout Scripture that the Holy Spirit is referenced in the masculine as a person (as God, as a whole, while presumably ungendered (Jesus' physical body excepted), chose to identify himself in the masculine) ... we also see many wife/mother-like traits ascribed to the Spirit. The way I see this triune structure of God is that:

- The Father is the head
- Jesus is the Son of God whose obligation was to obey his Father
- The Spirit is the functional will of God put into action in the world

In this sense, in as much as the Holy Spirit is God's primary means of influencing the world for his glory, so also is the significance and glory of the wife's role with her husband in marriage. And this is made even more obvious when we consider the third relational context of Christ and the Church - that Christ, while not needing the Church, has chosen to glorify the Church by sending it to be his primary vehicle through which his will would be accomplished.

This is a fantastically beautiful thing for women! And it's interesting to me that no one bats an eye when seeing the way the Spirit enacts the will of the Father on earth, or that everyone loves and adores the way the Church is meant to serve Christ on earth to carry on her will - yet because of feminism, as soon as we argue that wives should rejoice at being the primary vehicle through which a husband's will is effected in his world (i.e. sphere of influence), everyone groans instead, rolling their eyes while commenting, "Oh, so she's just supposed to be his work-mule while he sits back and does nothing." How bad does one's theology of the role of Jesus with the Church or the Father with Christ have to be to reach such a backwards conclusion!?

How ego-centric has the Church become (as /u/OsmiumZulu notes is characteristic of women - and the Church by extension) that we over-emphasize our own role in the work Jesus set out for us, ignoring the infinitely more drastic, yet often unseen ways that Jesus is at work in the world alongside and over the Church!

Like I say, all of this should be as beautiful to women as the Spirit is to the Father or as the Church is to Christ. It is not to their shame, but to display her splendor, even while the husband and Christ are glorified by it.

And since RPW couldn't tag him and I have one extra tag left: /u/Deep_Strength

If a man were able to change the bible would that prove they are the 2nd coming of Jesus?

3 upvotes · 29 March 2020 · /r/askRPC

I've been fascinated by this type of stuff for a while. But don't get too hung up on it either. For context, I do a lot of writing in my spare time, including a fantasy series where quantum entanglement is the underlying premise for the way a relic works that the main character finds, allowing him to see things from the other end of the universe.

I worked alongside a physicist to help me figure out how other relics in subsequent books (I'm part way through book 3) would function if realistically possible, given known concepts of physics and quantum mechanics.

All that to say, I track with everything you're saying and knew it before you wrote it. Props for the shared interest.

But the Bible is not the ink on the page. It is defined by the original writings of the original manuscripts as originally intended by the original authors. If I wanted, I could steal the earliest known manuscripts, use some high-tech lasers to shave off ink particles and replace them, then return the manuscript. We don't necessarily need quantum mechanics to do that (though, admittedly, there's always risk to the documents to do this). But the reality is that this would just be falsifying the manuscript, not actually changing Scripture. It's tampering with evidence.

I'm a lawyer. So let's imagine I'm representing a guy whose wife is accusing him of physical abuse. She CGI's a video from her phone to make it look like he hit her. Now, he had shown the video to dozens of witnesses before she does this, and even to the judge at a prior hearing before the final trial. The new video comes out and the judge sees the difference and the witnesses all testify, "Yeah, that video has been doctored. The original video was nothing like that." Further, the wife testifies on the stand, "Yes, I changed the video, and therefore it is now obvious under my changed video that he hit me." How's that going to play out in court?

Changing the ink on the page doesn't prove any more than adding CGI to a video. Moreover, if a person then admitted to changing the ink on the page to "prove" their divinity, that very admission acknowledges the non-divinity of the act. Why not just go back in time and actually change the historical events, if you're truly divine? Surely God has that kind of power.

So no. Changing ink on a page would not prove anything about one's divinity. It only proves one's ability to change ink on a page.

But what you're really asking is: how can we trust the translations we have? How do we know someone hasn't already modified Scripture to cause us to believe things the original authors never intended?

The answer is, of course: you can't know. But God has never valued knowledge highly. In fact, much of Scripture is written to de-emphasize the value of knowledge. This was very difficult for me as I used to take such great pride in the fact that I knew more than virtually everyone else around me. At some point I had to set that aside and recognize that God prizes faith over knowledge. I'm now okay with that.

Also, this whole setup doesn't do squat to address the Holy Spirit in all of this. It's not merely that "God wouldn't allow that to happen" - it's that the Holy Spirit is in us and proves through the fruit of existing Scripture its authenticity. But at the end of the day, it still comes down to a simple question: do you believe the Bible, as we know it (at least insofar as the earliest existing manuscripts represent it) is true and that you will allow that truth to radically change the way you live, or do you believe that the chance of its modification on substantive issues is high enough that the whole thing needs to be scrapped and there's no basis for faith at all? No one can decide that for you, nor can we logically persuade you, nor should we, if we are to approach ministry as Paul did in 1 Cor. 2. You've got to figure that out for yourself.

An MRP Mod makes a disciple

3 upvotes · 24 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Above and beyond, my friend. Well done.

I encourage my American friends to be fully stocked, supplied, and able to effectively work from home by Sunday, 3/22, though EOD tomorrow would be ideal.

3 upvotes · 20 March 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You forgot home gym equipment. Can't let yourself go just because the gyms are closed.

Coronavirus Mega Thread

3 upvotes · 17 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Wait for it to drop a bit more first. There are lower days yet to come.

Whose game are you winning?

3 upvotes · 17 March 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Right. Most people are also getting divorced, eh?

A mission that can be completed in a year is a short-term goal. It reinforces a "Next-Thing-itis" mentality because once that year is up, what's the next thing you're going to invest time in?

Missions that could take a lifetime other than pure money-making:

- Become a best selling author on the NYTimes list
- Write a show that gets produced on Broadway (one of my second-tier "missions")
- Start a non-profit that will cure world hunger
- Create a cure for cancer
- Own your own professional sports team
- Make it into the Guinness book of world records
- Another example I gave someone recently: become the best-selling yodeler of all time
- Mine: Making spiritual disciples of all nations (a long-term goal as a waypoint for this is to reach 60 countries by age 60)

You can see how some of these are legit, while others are somewhat goofy or laughable. Others are realistically unattainable. The actual destination, for women, is less significant than the journey - as long as the destination is something that will require a man to display his masculinity to accomplish it. You don't see Indiana Jones losing the girl because he didn't actually get to take the Ark home at the end of the movie.

All of these require consistent dedication, self-improvement, passion (so you don't fizzle out), leadership skills, social networking to get a team of people supporting you, etc. Most of them also require you to be generally attractive, as it's extremely hard to be successful if you're an unattractive person.

When you summarize all of this together, you realize that being mission-oriented, even toward a stupid mission, has the passive byproduct of causing you to become more attractive overall, so it's a double-hitter. 1. The mission itself is attractive because women love supporting something bigger than themselves. 2. Pursuing the mission diligently as your top priority causes you to develop skills that are inherently attractive to women. Win-win.

For more reading, I have a post titled "Mission Matters, Nothing Else,", which goes more into detail on how having a solid mission affects all of the other fundamental issues discussed on the various red pill forums.

is love between women and men real?

3 upvotes · 12 March 2020 · /r/askRPC

Men love idealistically. Women love opportunistically. As others here have noted, there are pros and cons to each.

- Idealistic love is virtually unconditional, optimistic, and develops deep loyalty. On the other hand, it's also blind, irrational, and fosters subservience and inequality, as the other is placed on a pedestal.
- Opportunistic love is pragmatic, predictable, and easy to foster. On the other hand, it also comes off as cold, selfish, and insincere, if misunderstood.

As /u/Rifleshoot said, our love toward God can often come off as opportunistic. If God said, "I don't care how much you serve me, I'm still sending you to hell. I am not lying. This is not a test. You will never change my mind." ... how would that affect how you live your life? Would you still follow him and be a Christian? For most people, the answer would be no. If they're going to be tortured for eternity, might as well have fun while you can, right?

Hebrews 11:6 acknowledges the foundational nature of the relationship between our faith and expectation of reward from God: "And without faith it is impossible to please God, because anyone who comes to him must believe that he exists and that he rewards those who earnestly seek him." How easy would it be for us to cut off those last 9 verses and pretend they don't exist?

The closest I've seen otherwise is Brother Lawrence, who wrote, "I have endeavoured to act only for Him; whatever becomes of me, whether I be lost or saved, I will always continue to act purely for the love of GOD." He transcended the traditional aspect of opportunistic love that one would expect of a bride (of Christ) into the more masculine notions of an idealistic love toward God. This is not the norm. Obviously it sounds like a nice ideology to say that we should all love God this way (which is the very definition of "idealistic"), but it's also not pragmatic because we know that nobody would ever be saved if that's the type of commitment we were drawn into. Perhaps as one becomes immensely mature, that transition can happen - but at least up front, even Jesus used the promise of heaven and the threat of hell as a motivator to inspire his followers.

Communication Doesn't Work....or Maybe...

3 upvotes · 4 March 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Excellent post, brother. This is truly good stuff. I find myself on the other end of the conversation when people tell me: "You've said what I've been thinking for some time, but didn't know how to put into words."

I started to type a longer reply, but it eventually evolved into a post of its own, as I continued to process some things (here - though I imagine the direction I take things might not be of particular interest to you).

One thing that I didn't address in that post is the similarity I see between "feel, think, do, communicate" and the Myers-Briggs typology, which I've researched quite a bit.

- I/E - The introvert/extrovert spectrum addresses how you receive information from the world - internalizing what you observe from the sideline, or interacting with it. This is just you experiencing it and how you prefer to do so.
- N/S - The intuitive/sensor dynamic is about how your brain processes the information you receive from the world. Do you see what you've experienced in terms of details or conceptual patterns, for example?
- T/F - The thinker/feeler dichotomy is about how you act on what you've processed. Some people will, upon processing the information they've received from the world, make decisions on what to do with that information based on what feels right to them, whereas others will do whatever is most logical.
- J/F - The judger/perceiver spectrum is perhaps the one point where the 4 start to differ. This is less to do with how you communicate your decisions and everything to do with the framework within which we implement them. Judgers, for example, will stick to rules, planning, and procedure, whereas perceivers will generally tweak the structures to their own preferences and operate on pragmatic reality over technicalities.

I'm not sure how relevant that is to you, but I thought it an interesting comparison worth sharing.

What about BDSM and Roleplay?

3 upvotes · 2 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Matthew 18:6 is the most common reference for that point. With passages like that available (not to mention 1 Cor. 8, Romans 14, and so on), it's pretty well undisputed and commonly known to all that a Christian shouldn't do something that will cause someone else to stumble. There's no value in trying to dispute such well-established issues simply because the particular verse chosen might not have been the best one (rather, we often use the first one to come to our minds when we write these posts).

Q&A on Sexual "Brainwashing"

3 upvotes · 20 February 2020 · /r/RPChristians

It would be nice if I could say stuff like that in a Q&A ministry and be done with it. But in this particular situation the guy is asking, "WHY can't I crap where I eat?" Answering, "Don't crap where you eat" does nothing to answer the question. Plus, his question was a bit more nuanced.

Q&A on Sexual "Brainwashing"

3 upvotes · 19 February 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed. I think I noted as much ;) I just used Jacob and Rachel as a fairly extreme example of presumably waiting 14 years just to have sex with one girl.

The Philosophy Side of The Bible

3 upvotes · 19 February 2020 · /r/RPChristians

A number of them - usually ESV for generic reading, Young's Literal or an interlineal Bible for study.

Many Christians believe that the Christian red pill ideas promote an anti-Christian perspective on marriage. What's your response? What would you say to someone who says that the Christian red pill ideas are too process/result oriented?

3 upvotes · 19 February 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Solid.

Q&A With an untrusting wife

3 upvotes · 11 February 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Most q&a on got questions is private conversation and not publicly published. This is one of those. Sometimes they notify me a year later that they're publishing one of my answers, but that'd be a while off for something like this.

Are all missions related to becoming a Pastor or Missionary? Or can it be anything?

3 upvotes · 27 January 2020 · /r/askRPC

I would argue that the exercise of one's spiritual gifts aren't the mission itself; rather, they are the context that creates the pathway for how the mission will be fulfilled.

That is, the mission is the same for us all: "Go and make disciples of all nations." Some will insert their life context into that mission: "I'm a plumber, so I'm going to make disciples of those who need plumbing work done, or fix the plumbing of those I disciple."

But if one is gifted at ...

- teaching, then he will say: "I will make disciples among those I teach."
- hospitality, then he will say: "I will disciple those who I invite into my home."
- mercy, then he will say: "I will disciple those whose aid I bring."
- evangelism, then he will say: "I will disciple those I bring to faith."

Alternatively, the gift may create not only the context, but the directive as well:

- The teacher will emphasize teaching in his discipler-making relationships.
- The hospitable will utilize their invitation to advance the relationship with those they disciple.
- The merciful will show those they disciple how to care for those in need.
- The evangelist will model for their disciples how to share the Gospel.

The spiritual gifts are in no way a limitation on one's obligations in the discipler-making relationships they maintain (as if one could argue: "I'm gifted at teaching, so I don't need to be hospitable to those I disciple"), but they do add a unique flavor to the relationship that builds up each part of the body of Christ rather than trying to force everyone to be a jack-of-all trades (what I could reasonably term stem-cell Christians).

Just some things to think about :)

Tag: /u/agoodcrayon

A Series of FRs

3 upvotes · 12 January 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Yes. Bob is their father. He's a solid believer, very present, active at the gym (even at 60+) ... but does struggle with some OCD issues.

The dichotomy you notice is extremely common. I see it in my cases all the time. Even in my own family, I have a man child brother who lives in my dad's upstairs staying up to 6am every night drinking and playing video games. It's usually the younger sibling who had these issues, as is the case with Debbie and Fiona. Many people guess it's because the older sibling gets more parental attention, being the first for everything, followed by the younger sibling wanting to set themselves apart from the older by being a very different person.

Empirical evidence to support RP in general?

3 upvotes · 12 January 2020 · /r/askRPC

Census Bureau has good stuff. The FBI public statistics also helps a lot when it comes to anything criminal as well. Domestic violence stats, for example, come to mind, demonstrating significant variances from public perceptions of men and women (ex. overall, women are more physically violent toward men than men are toward women).

/u/Deep_Strength also cites a lot of good material in his book, which is worth a look.

Tag: /u/SingularityOne198

David and Michal

3 upvotes · 12 January 2020 · /r/askRPC

Never try to look at Scripture "from a RP perspective." Don't eisegete your own ideas into the text - especially when trying, as this post intends to do, to force some reconciliation.

Michal saw David dancing in front of other women in his underwear. Why is it hard to understand why she would be upset by this? She's embarrassed at her husband's indiscretion. Are you married? How would your wife feel if you hired a housekeeper and danced around the house in your underwear while they were trying to clean your living room?

By getting into dread, you're over-thinking things. Dread is a tool, not a mechanism for interpreting every relational dynamic. To a hammer, everything looks like a nail. To a man holding a hammer, he can choose to put it down and pick up a screwdriver.

How to Live Life without Women (MGTOW until the Lord Provides)?

3 upvotes · 12 January 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I know that it is in my best interest to forget women and turn my heart towards God, but once I accept this frame of mind, what will life be like for me?

99.9% chance that once you accept this, life will be like ... everyone else's, but more fulfilling. You're still going to end up married, you're still going to struggle through the same life hurdles everyone else does. But instead of being controlled by your wife, you'll be driven toward more important things and able to enjoy your wife.

My personal goal in life is to have a multitude of children with a submissive woman I love.

You can't control whether or not your wife is submissive, so knock that out of your "goal" list. You can make that a dream or an ideal, but goals should be things that YOU can achieve.

Also, this isn't a mission. What's your mission? If that is your mission, it's a crappy one that is ultimately holding you back from both women and doing anything of value for the Kingdom.

I am bad with women

Most likely because you're worried about being good with women.

my biggest fear is that I will remain a virgin forever and live a life I am unhappy with in pursuit of His purpose.

Translation: "I don't believe God can or will satisfy me if I fully commit myself to him, so I get hung up on other things that I think are more capable of satisfying me than God."

I pray that God provides me what I desire

As the Psalm says: "Delight yourself in the Lord and he will give you the desires of your heart." People seem to think this means that God will give you whatever you want once you make him your top priority. In reality, the verse can be better interpreted as God saying to you: "Make me your highest desire and I'll give myself to you."

For those of you who have lived life as a Christian for some time and have shared the same fears as me, how have you overcome them and what are some things I can do now to live according to God's word?

Yes.

Read the 300 series and start practicing the 7 basics, including evangelism - and when you've brought someone to Christ, keep following up to help them grow (i.e. disciple them).

When will I know it's time to marry, lose my virginity, and raise children?

Per 1 Cor. 7 - When you're so inflamed with lust mutually with a woman that you'd otherwise end up sinning by having sex outside of marriage.

MGTOW until the Lord Provides

Get this "God will find me a wife" business out of your head.

How would a turnaround for the church look like? Making it more RP than Feminist.

3 upvotes · 22 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Acts 15

Romans 6:14

Romans 7:1-6

Galatians 2:19

Galatians 3:10-14

Galatians 3:23-24

Ephesians 2:14-15

Hebrews 7:18-19

Hebrews 8 (especially 13)

Those are the ones that come to mind off the top of my head. Jesus saying, "It is finished" (in conjunction with him saying that the law would not pass away "until all is accomplished") would be another example. Paul, as a Jew, saying he is not under the law is also telling (1 Cor. 9:20). In Galatians 5, Paul becomes so enraged at the Jewish believers trying to force Gentiles to follow the law that he says he wishes they would emasculate themselves (Galatians 5:12).

I'm sure I could come up with many more, but these examples should more than suffice and I don't have the time while away on holiday to too much more in-depth. Suffice it to say that the law

How would a turnaround for the church look like? Making it more RP than Feminist.

3 upvotes · 21 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Are you Jewish?

How would a turnaround for the church look like? Making it more RP than Feminist.

3 upvotes · 21 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

When was the last time you sacrificed an animal?

How would a turnaround for the church look like? Making it more RP than Feminist.

3 upvotes · 21 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Calling for the execution of homosexuals, or to put them in concentration camps. That's the main one that comes to mind.

So what can you negotiate?

3 upvotes · 17 December 2019 · /r/askRPC

You can negotiate compliance. That's about it. Anything internal has to be there on its own. Often-times, even if the desire is there, negotiating compliance doesn't make the desire come with it. For example: I've had situations where I wanted to perform a task at work. Then my boss would come and tell me I had to do that task. Instead of thinking, "That's great, I wanted to do that anyway!" the mandatory compliance took the fun out of it, so my desire to do the task suddenly felt like an obligation - even though I still had the desire for it too. It sucked.

The same thing is true in any other number of areas. Thinking small? Serving my neighbors when a pastor then starts pressuring the congregation on service. Thinking big? Giving to the homeless when the government starts raising taxes to fund social welfare.

The government can negotiate my compliance through executive force (military, police, etc.). My congregation leader can negotiate compliance through access to influence (i.e. if I want to have influence in the congregation, I have to play ball with him, lest he shut me out). My boss can negotiate compliance through economic pressure.

None of them can negotiate how I feel about something or what I think - and often times trying to negotiate any of this into me destroys any natural desire I might otherwise have, or at least precludes me from being able to experience and express my desire in the process.

GotQuestions.org says "God pursues us". What's is RPC's response?

3 upvotes · 17 December 2019 · /r/askRPC

I'm a writer for gotquestions and they've published many of my pieces among their articles. They get a lot of stuff right and a lot wrong. I've already written a lot about this quite a bit on the RPC sidebar regarding the "orientation of the pursuit." Look up that term and you should find it.

To summarize: I did a study twice (partly to make sure I wasn't mistaken; mostly because I lost my results from the first time) on the number of times the words pursue/pursues/come after/seek/etc. are used in Scripture. I found:

1. There are certainly examples where God pursues his people.
2. For every one example of God pursuing us, there are 22 examples of us being compelled to pursue God.

This is most obvious in the context of Jesus (our groom) and his "followers." He always invited people to follow him. Churchianity and gotquestions assumes that "invitation" is the same thing as "pursuit." It is not. After the invitation, Jesus went on doing his thing. He did not chase people down to convince them to follow. He gave them an offer then started walking. Many people turned away. He did not chase them down. Many people asked for some time to do other things. He denied them. Jesus drew clear lines on who could and could not follow him - he didn't chase down or pursue those who were on the "could not" side of the line. He kept on with his mission.

Don't ever confuse initiation and pursuit. Men initiate. Husbands initiate. Jesus, as groom to the church initiates. Women, wives, brides follow and pursue. As the church, we are in this position toward Christ. As husbands, we are in Christ's position toward our wives.

Own Your Shit Weekly - December 10, 2019

3 upvotes · 12 December 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You're an idiot. I've had cases where we subpoenaed video footage from gas stations, restaurants, grocery stores, etc. You going to avoid all those too?

I had one case where the other party got info from a friend of a friend of a friend. Another where it came through contacting the contractor working on a party's house. GAL wants to do a random screen you're not prepared for? You're done.

Can you get away with it? Sure. It's possible. But you're a fool if you're banking on that.

Three Strategies to Maintaining Good Nutrition Over Christmas and New Year's

3 upvotes · 10 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Solid advice. I usually fast the day before or limit my calorie intake to those binge-worthy events and eat nothing else that day.

Another thing that helps is simply to remind myself that I'm there to build Kingdom-advancing relationships (whether it's family, friends, co-workers, strangers, etc.) and, therefore, I focus primarily on the conversation rather than the festivities themselves. If alcohol is involved, rather than bingeing, keep one glass in your hand and sip it for hours. Can I handle more? Absolutely - I have yet to find a quantity that could get me drunk (yes, it's a medical condition). But that's not the point - most alcohol is packed with calories (ergo the term "beer belly").

So, like the man said: drink lots of water, try to avoid pop, juice, alcohol, etc. That alone will likely save several hundred calories.

Men are the prize

3 upvotes · 6 December 2019 · /r/askRPC

Is Jesus not our prize? Does God not say in Genesis 15:1 - "I am your very great reward"?

Like u/deep_strength said (though I take a slightly different spin), the secular concept is a shallow mockery of the deeper theological truth of the role between a husband and wife as modeled through God's relationship with his people and Christ's relationship with his bride, the Church. Their concept is true - but they're only seeing 10% of the whole picture.

In the reverse, Jesus says that if we won't praise God, the stones would cry out. So, are we really to argue that a bride is the prize a man earns?

In your view, when we all go to heaven, what's the prize that Paul speaks of when he says to run the race as one who aims to win the prize for which we were called heavenward? He already says in Philippians 1 that he's called heavenward to be with Jesus. Would that not, then, make him our prize that we're running to win?

Or do you believe your reward in heaven is not Jesus himself, but some great mansion and pearly gates?

And if this is the dynamic between Christ and the church, why should it be any different between a husband and his bride?

Should Christian men & women only accept Christian counsel

3 upvotes · 12 November 2019 · /r/askRPC

a book I got her to read

This is where you first went wrong, my friend.

thinking she finally is changing

Don't worry. You'll swallow the pill eventually. Right now you're letting the taste of it linger in your mouth, hoping it's not true.

Should Christian men & women only accept Christian counsel?

That depends on the topic. As /u/conk2000 says, there are countless things worth getting advice from non-Christians from. A non-Christian taught me how to practice law. He was darn good at it, and now I am too.

Similarly, there are lots of Christians who give very bad advice. Much of RPC harps on all the bad advice given by churchianity.

What I can say definitively, though, is that biblical advice will never fail you (which isn't the same as "Christian advice"). It's up to you and the Holy Spirit to discern which advice is biblical and which is man-made philosophy inspired by a verse here or there. There is no such guarantee from secular advice, though seculars often discover good advice (as is the case with secular RP) by observing the way God created the world in the first place.

Other than that, I agree with /u/Willow-girl and /u/Rifleshoot - if you're trying to go about some weird way to get your wife on board with your way of thinking, this is not going to work because you can't negotiate attraction or logic her way into being more interested in you.

I believe it was u/weakandsensitive who once commented: "If an attractive man gives a girl a teddy bear, it's sweet and endearing. If an unattractive man does it, it's creepy." I've seen this true over and over again in my own life and those I've observed. The exact same behaviors elicit two very different responses. You're not yet on the right side of that line. Keep working and you will be.

Service and Mission

3 upvotes · 12 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with you that many men are looking for ways to deflect responsibility. I also agree that this post could very well dissuade them from serving in opportunities when they should be serving.

However, I'm also persuaded that most forms of service performed by congregations are not at all what God intended in the first place. I have served on numerous service teams and engaged in ministries serving the homeless, victims of human trafficking, orphans, children with no money for lunches at school, etc. - some through congregations and others directly with faith-based non-profit entities. What I've found is that most people who claim to do these acts of "service" for the community:

- Don't actually care about the people they're serving.
- Don't care about the quality of the work put in.
- Do not intend to use the service as an opportunity to build a relationship with someone outside of their socioeconomic demographic.
- Have no intention (or even training) on how to translate the service opportunity for eternal Kingdom-building gain other than inviting the person to church (which I don't take as Kingdom-building; only congregation building).
- Are primarily doing it because their friends will be there or a pastor asked for help.
- And most importantly: Do it primarily to check off a box in their head of things they're "supposed to" do, or because it makes them feel good about themselves.

While a person's attitude toward service is not the sole criterion for salvation, I do believe the disposition of the hearts of the people I have co-labored alongside in the past is consistent with those to whom Christ says, "I never knew you." Now, he might "know" them on other grounds - but not because of their service, which is more indicative of a broken relationship.

If people are given opportunities to be placated in their spiritual development by believing they are more mature or better people than they actually are, they are hindered from becoming the type of people God actually intends them to be. This is where much of churchianity goes wrong. It substitutes placating behaviors that most pastors mean-well about, but which actually INCREASES the degree of excuse-making for why people don't need to go out sharing the Gospel, making disciples, etc.

In reality, service is a subset within disciple-making as a characteristic/trait that is to be modeled for those you disciple to learn after. When practiced in a vacuum, it gives people the mentality, "I don't need to share the Gospel or make disciples because I raked my neighbor's leaves/helped at a soup kitchen/gave a homeless guy a meal/etc. and that's the good thing God wanted me to do this week."

However, when you go in with the mindset: "My job is to share the Gospel and disciple those who believe," then the addendum is always inherent in the process: "And that means training these people how to be like Christ in every way, including the way he served those in need who asked."

But I do believe the "who ask" part is necessary. Even James says, "You do not have because you do not ask, and when you ask you ask with wrong motives." I believe this verse alone emphasizes and summarizes the point of my post and the example that Jesus gave - and still gives. Every instance we see of him serving was toward someone who asked and who, while perhaps may have had poor motives at first, were so in need that they genuinely required his help and were overflowing with drive for him as a result of the service he gave them.

The one exception is when Jesus washed the disciples feet - and that's a different story that serves a unique purpose, especially connected to the last supper, communion, being among his closest disciples, etc. But I don't have the time to get into that right now :p

I think the point you make is a good one and I'd be eager for you to post it (and I my reply) to the thread itself so that others can see the value in challenging views that are presented, especially when there's a Scriptural foundation (which is perhaps the one thing lacking from your reply). As with Paul in Acts 17, I do not want anyone taking my word for anything just because "Red-Curious said it, so it must be true" or "Paul said it, so it must be true." I want everyone searching the Scriptures and challenging what I say with reasonable and biblical questions as to the accuracy of what I derive from Scripture. This is how I learn and how our community is built stronger.

The Truth About Porn

3 upvotes · 6 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

use porn to satisfy his BDSM kink

So he had this kink already and porn was simply an outlet for it.

He really needed to find a wife who shared his preferences rather than marrying 'vanilla' chicks and using porn!

What I'm reading is that the mismatched sexual preferences are what caused the imbalance here, not necessarily the porn use in itself.

Eventually I went outside the relationship to get my needs met

So the porn is apparently what ruined the marriage, not this, right?

I'm teasing, and assume it's safe to do so because you seem over it. But in all of this, I'd go back to my original point in most of this post: is his use of porn what caused any of these problems or was it an outlet for him to curb desires that he already had and which were never reasonably going to be fulfilled in the relationship anyway? In most situations, it's the latter.

Perhaps a better way to word it: if he had gone off porn during the marriage, would the sexual chemistry issues that led to his dissatisfaction and your affairs have still been present? Would they have been exacerbated by the fact that he had no outlet at all for his BDSM fetish? Or do you think his sexual preferences would have changed if he'd gone off porn so that everything could have worked out?

The Truth About Porn

3 upvotes · 5 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Haha. That's about what I'd expect from the crowd these days.

On creeps and romantics and obedience to God

3 upvotes · 4 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I think you're missing the underlying point /u/Deep_Strength is making. You're only looking at the immediately proximate cause and not the interconnectivity of these issues.

A man does the dishes at his wife's request. She doesn't think, "How dare he! I'm leaving him." Instead she thinks (subconsciously): "Why does he succumb to everything I say all the time? It's so unattractive. I'm not attracted to him anymore. I'm leaving." Yes, this mentality does happen a lot.

The goal for Christian husbands whose wives deny them should not be sex but their wife's repentance

3 upvotes · 1 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Is God immune to our efforts to disappoint him (intentional or unintentional)?

Yes. Disappointment implies an expectation that wasn't met. God knows exactly who we are and we always live up to exactly what he expects of us.

Do you as a father want to be immune to your wife's or kid's efforts to disappoint you?

Yes. If I expect my wife to be AWALT, nothing disappoints me from her. If I expect my kids to be kids, I'm not disappointed when they make kid mistakes.

Does this immunity come at a cost? Specifically .. if I'm immune to the hurtful stuff, then am I immune to the pleasant stuff?

Not at all. You take the same pleasure in them you would either way. You're not "pleasantly surprised" when they do right - it's part of your enjoyment of them in the first place.

It's probably useful here to distinguish between enjoyment of a person and enjoyment of a situation. My disposition toward a person is static (pending actual character changes). If my wife burns dinner, I don't enjoy her any less. If she cooks my favorite meal, I don't enjoy her any more. She is still herself. I enjoy the whole of who she is. But if dinner is burned, I may not enjoy the situation - I like food that is edible and I don't like wasting money on food to go in the trash, etc.

When my kids won't listen, I don't think less of them - they're kids, and I know that's who they are and part of being a kid (within reason). But I am still disappointed in the situation because I like peace and quiet and when my instructions are carried out. The fact that they're expressing their child-likeness in this moment doesn't make them lesser; it's inevitable that they will disobey me from time to time, so the whole of who they are is unchanged, but their choice in the moment creates a disappointing situation.

The gap here between us and God is that God cannot get disappointed because he already knows the result of every situation. We, on the other hand, have the capacity for broken expectations because we have no guarantee that our expectations will always be accurate. As a result, we often set our expectations too high.

But in the case of our children, we are still able to adjust for this to some degree. If I want my kids in bed by 8, I don't send them to bed at 7:50, knowing I could get through their entire night-time routines in 10 minutes if they were perfect. I expect that as kids they will not listen immediately, so I start the bed-time process at 7:30, knowing that after 20 minutes worth of delays, they'll still get to bed when I want them to.

That is my expectation. If it turns out to be 8:15 before they're done and in bed, now my expectation has been broken - even with me already accounting for what I believe is a reasonable expectation of delayed obedience. That's disappointing when it happens.

What word do you use with your kids, wife, etc that communicates disappointment on a relational level?

That depends on what you're trying to communicate. My relationship with them is unaltered by their behavior. I'm still their father. I still love them. I don't think any less of them when they behave as a wife and kids do, even if their behavior goes outside my expectations. So, I don't use any word to communicate disappointment/displeasure/whatever "on a relational level" or toward them personally.

Instead, it's a matter of situational communication and boundaries. "You're supposed to be in bed. You're not listening. I'm going to spank you if you don't listen soon." I state my expectation, their behavior, then the resulting consequence for the gap.

If it's something more character-driven than a single behavior, which is usually evidenced by a pattern of behavior, the communication stays the same: "I expect you to <blank>. You have consistently shown poor judgment/behavior/character/etc. in this area. Until you get yourself back on track, I'm going to have to <blank>." It's not a condemnation of the person, but of the situation.

If it helps, imagine the situation like you're the hulk. "You punch Hulk. Hulk no like being punched. Hulk punch you." Hulk isn't disappointed in the person who punched him. It's the situation that causes him to be affected and respond.

Killing the Blue

3 upvotes · 29 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

zero scripture

This post was written for MRP. I cross-posted it here, as I do with most of my MRP posts.

"If she doesn't like it, she can leave."? Come on, that is not the attitude Jesus or Paul on the topic of marriage

This is precisely their attitude. Those who follow Christ are part of his bride. He often sets clear boundaries and says, "If you don't abide by this boundary, you cannot be my disciple." This is true for the rich young ruler, it was true for the man who wanted to bury his father, or the one who wanted to say goodbye to his family, etc.

Similarly, Paul notes in 1 Cor. 7 - "Let those with wives live as though they had none." That is, a guy is to pursue his mission for Christ to the same degree as if he were single (taking account for the context of the passage). If one's spouse refuses to follow along and chooses to leave instead, that same passage says to let them go (presumably after following the Matthew 18 process for calling them to repentance first, after which point they are deemed an unbeliever if they don't repent).

Moreover, depending on your particular theology, if you're of a branch that allows for salvation to be lost, this would be another example of Christ telling his bride: "Here are my boundaries. If you aren't okay with that, you're welcome to leave." Christ never leaves us or forsakes us, but 2 Timothy 2 (at least in this line of theology) does make it pretty clear that we may voluntarily walk away from him to the degree that "if we disown him, he will disown us."

"Attraction is the life-blood of marriage." That, I would argue, is rather unbiblical.

It's only unbiblical if the Bible actually does state something else as the life blood of marriage. In reality, we're using colloquial terms here, so it's a matter of personal conclusion. To that end, you're welcome to disagree. But I have found through my profession that marriages with constant attraction often last indefinitely, whereas those without attraction either end in divorce or perpetual unhappiness.

If I want to get more theological, while I wouldn't call it the life-giving force of marriage, I could say that making disciples is the technical function of marriage, without which it is pointless. But that's separate and apart from what I was trying to convey.

Obviously that platitude would mean something like "don't needlessly be a dick to her about that mole on her back" rather than "If she likes smoking, you should encourage her to smoke more."

This is not true. Many of the women on dating websites and social media platforms who ask for a guy who will "love me, including my flaws" will then identify character issues and not a weird mole. This tells me that the prevailing understanding of the phrase is character-driven, not a reference to minor physical defects. I'm extremely confident that if you investigate this you'll find the same conclusion.

I think people like you do this because you want a strong frame and not to look like a bitch.

You couldn't be farther from the truth, brother. It's all about audience. Admittedly, I usually write "[MRP Draft]" on posts to the MRP crowd, and I neglected to do that this time. Often-times I will write a separate draft for RPC that includes the Scriptural foundation for what I write, but I'm in the middle of taking over a law firm and changing office locations right now, so I'm too low on time to do that. Suffice it to say, I could back up most of what I say through a clear theological framework.

I also can't believe you defended choosing not to love your own wife at times.

I'd be curious what I said that caused you to reach this conclusion. The closest is my section on "unconditional" love. But the fact is that God/Jesus does place conditions on the expression of his love. If he didn't, the Gospel wouldn't be necessary because the condition of faith in Christ would be non-existent and everyone would be saved simply for existing due to the unconditional nature of God's love.

But if you research the Scriptures, you're going to find countless examples of conditions placed on the expression of God's love toward his people or Christ's love toward those who would come after him. When the condition is not met, the expression of love for those people is withheld.

In actuality, this in itself is also an expression of love. By setting clear boundaries and enforcing them, while this may seem "unloving" or as a "withholding of love" from any traditional colloquial use of those terms, Jesus is actually compelling us to be better. The unloving thing to do would be to enable us in our laziness and flaws by continuing to shower us with blessings and grace (i.e. "expressions of God's love toward us" in the colloquial sense). But nobody speaks about love in this way today. So, it's easier to suggest that people should make their love conditional, just as it's clear through Scripture that while God's general love for all of humanity is unconditional, the expression of God's love to us in the form of salvation and other grace given to believers is certainly conditional and that such grace is not given when God's people defy those conditions - hence most of Israel's subjugation to their enemies and eventual captivity in Babylon.

Killing the Blue

3 upvotes · 28 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The bible, brother. That's the best book for interpreting that and every other verse. Study Jesus's life inside and out so you can always answer what Jesus did in a particular situation.

Killing the Blue

3 upvotes · 28 October 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Well, I'm the founder of RPC, so I'd say that what I wrote in this post is pretty consistent with what RPC would say on the topic ;)

On a biblical level, I always tell people to look to the example of Jesus and when/why he sacrificed. He never once sacrificed simply for our happiness - it was always oriented toward his glory and to fulfill a larger purpose. While he certainly expressed his love for us through his death, the Bible is also clear beyond question that Jesus's primary purpose through the cross was God's glorification and the impact was, per Philippians 2, that he be exalted above all others as well. If Jesus's highest purpose in leading us was merely our happiness, we wouldn't see the countless passages of him turning people away, giving very harsh standards for following him, condemning those who professed a desire to follow him, etc. Modern notions of "servant leadership" are entirely inconsistent with the character of Jesus, being taught solely on what Jesus said without reference to what he did.

Killing the Blue

3 upvotes · 28 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Almost everything a wife does can be done by the husband, friends, family or even complete strangers who you influence to follow you and support your mission.

I liked the way /u/OsmiumZulu put it once: "Sex is the only thing you can't biblically outsource in your marriage." As such, it's critically important. Even child-bearing, as you referenced, can be outsourced through surrogate mothers who receive your DNA, and most Christians don't necessarily have a problem with this.

Good thoughts all around.

How to communicate self-improvement to a potential partner?

3 upvotes · 23 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

Is she actually strict about sexuality or is she that way with you?

It's a fitness test that he hasn't realized yet. It's like all those dating profiles that say, "I don't do hookups, so don't even bother." Yet the very next sentence says, "I'm pregnant and the dad's not in the picture anymore, and you'd better be okay with that."

/r/WhereAreAllTheGoodMen seemed somewhat exaggerated of the sexual marketplace until I actually created a tinder profile to research what it's really like and ... dang, if it all ain't true. In 15 minutes of swiping there are dozens of examples (yes, more than 1 a minute) that are exactly like this. I didn't realize how much the dating market had changed, as I was married before online dating blew up, but it's now more than ever that I realize how critical it is for guys to be red pill'd to know how to navigate the shark infested waters.

Is my marriage salvageable?

3 upvotes · 23 October 2019 · /r/askMRP

The books ARE the sidebar. How can you read the sidebar if you don't have the books? You mean you read the names of the books that you're supposed to read on the sidebar and then saying, "I've read the sidebar"? Are you kidding me?

44 year old single Barbie, mother of 4 kids and 2 MORE ON THE WAY. Not here for games or sending nudes. Looking for a real man who respects her life decisions and her kids.

3 upvotes · 23 October 2019 · /r/WhereAreAllTheGoodMen

I am an easygoing person until you piss me off

Isn't that the exact definition of someone who is NOT easy-going?

Catholic

Uh huh ... she apparently signed up for the "no contraception" bit, but decided she didn't like the "no sex outside of marriage" part? It's shocking how common this is.

I'm convinced this is an ASD mechanism. Girls don't want to believe they're as depraved as they are, so they tag a spiritual affiliation to their name to feel like a good person. "It's okay, I go to church, so I must be moral." Then when they screw up, they default to, "Hey, God is gracious and forgiving. I'm broken, but praise Jesus that he'll keep forgiving me!"

Too bad Jesus isn't a psychological coping mechanism, or else their plan would actually do more than oil that hamster wheel.

Boundaries and Boundary Enforcement

3 upvotes · 18 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

I had boundaries ... I of course did nothing ... she just brought her social binge drinking out in the open, and I began to occasionally join

Hmm ... you needed her more than she needed you and look what happens: you're following her around instead of her following you. See how that works. It's u/Rollo-Tomassi's cardinal rule of relationships. The one in power is the one who needs the other the less. Memorize and lean on that.

I told her if we were going to stay together, shut down all contact or I'm out Classic mate-guarding. Horrible idea. It's a display of low value.

How do I reset boundaries now?

By switching the power dynamic. This is done in one of two ways: (1) you become more valuable than her; or (2) she becomes less valuable than you.

For so long as she's in her own frame, her willingness to follow your boundaries is based entirely on her perception. She's unlikely to perceive her value as dropping - women get way too much affirmation today for that to be a realistic option. This is especially true when she already has orbiters. That option is also mostly out of a man's control, short of tactful negging.

The better option is to keep improving yourself to the point where you're the best guy she could get. The problem is that you've got your history working against you. Even if you do improve, when other girls start to notice you, her initial reaction will not be to salivate, but to scoff and think, "If only they knew what I know!" That's a necessary intermediary.

Once she's at this intermediary point, that's when you can start setting boundaries back. In doing so, it's not just to coerce her compliance (which is still predominantly in her frame, if you're hung up on whether or not she acts a certain way); rather, your goal is to cause her to make repeated decisions on whether to choose you or herself. If she believes she's more valuable, she'll probably choose herself the first numerous times, and you're going to do your own thing without her - not in a cold-shoulder kind of way, but in a missional, "I'm a busy man with important things to do and I will not let you sabotage me" kind of way.

She's going to start thinking about branch-swinging more, getting more and more validation from whatever orbiters she's got, and may even seek more. This is a byproduct of your past mistakes. If you hadn't screwed up for so long, she might skip this phase. But this is the point where she puts herself back out on the SMV (with plausible deniability, of course) and gets a reality check. Either she's hot-stuff and gets the validation she was looking for and is bolstered against your boundaries and her lack of need for you (maintaining her position in the power dynamic, possibly leading to a branch swing), or she's going to realize that she's older than she was when she was last in the dating market and will start asking /r/WhereAreAllTheGoodMen ? She probably won't drop her perception of her own self-worth in response (women almost never do), but it will at least let her know that you have more options than she does and therefore acknowledge that maybe you do have something to offer her that she isn't going to get from another guy - at least not anyone she could pin down for marriage.

This is what lays the groundwork for the main event, after which she may be more inclined to start following your boundaries - because life would suck for her if she left you or you left her. She'd be stuck being used by a bunch of Chads for one-night stands with no one actually willing to take care of her.

Yes, this means her affection for you and willingness to follow you is opportunistic. Accept it and move on.

Past this, once she's in your frame she understands reality the way you do. This means that if you imply you're hot stuff among women, then to her you'll be hot stuff among women. If you believe she's attractive, but couldn't do any better than you, she'll take that as fact too - and be grateful to have you. Domestic violence abusers are an interesting example of this - through physical force they get their wife in their frame and she becomes so hung up on how he thinks and views things all the time that she believes whatever lie he's peddling, even though he may objectively be a low value man. I'm not condoning this practice; I'm only showing this psychological phenomenon in an extreme context that shows just how powerful being in someone else's frame can be.

When she's in your frame, she'll follow your boundaries. Before she's in your frame, she'll only follow your boundaries if she believes she has no other choice, or if she has another self-interested reason for doing so.

6 years into a LTR, but now something is going on with me - Constructive criticism and discussion will be appreciated

3 upvotes · 18 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

She is submissive, caring, loving, taking care of me and having me as her priority in most of her choices in life

Except the choice of where to live/work, apparently. Also, it's easy to be "submissive, caring, loving," etc. when the other person isn't actually there 90% of the time. You only have to be these things 10% of the time. My wife was the EXACT same way you described when we were in our LTR for 1 year - and then we got together and suddenly everything started changing and she wasn't at all what I thought she was when we were in the LTR.

She a year and a half older than me

10 years into marriage when you can get hotter, younger girls who are more submissive and helpful to your mission, you're going to regret this.

We pretty much never have fights

Yeah, because you're not around each other enough to step on each other's toes.

I proposed to her while in a trip in Rome (I just wanted it to be memorable)

i.e. "I still buy into the Disney fantasy about all this."

she has also a boyfriend (2 years now) and knows about my LTR, but still it looks like she wouldn't mind if I would GO for it Pretty normal. This is hypergamy and branch swinging in the works.

For the last three days or so, I am trying to find the reason why I fell for this

Are you kidding? You started flirting with another girl, then you start becoming attracted to her more than your fiancé. And you're wondering why? That in itself is your answer. You will become attracted to attractive women who show interest in you. Heck, you'll become attracted to attractive women who DON'T show interest in you. It's part of life.

Any philosophical and in-depth psychological responses/ideas will be even more appreciated, cause those two realms are my personal favorite go-to for finding answers.

This is a problem for you. Don't fuel esoteric thinking. Focus on practical reality. Your situation is not unique and doesn't require a PhD in philosophy or psychology to understand. You like two girls. For one, you're an emotional tampon with a high commitment, but you're not really attracted to her anymore. For the other, you're highly attracted, but it would mean starting from scratch and not knowing if it'll work out. Don't philosophize over this. Pick. Take action. But don't sit on your thumbs hoping that plugging your butt-hole is somehow going to increase pressure to your brain to give you an ah-ha moment.

Which girl is going to be more helpful in making disciples? If you want some philosophy to think about - contemplate the purpose of marriage. "Why did the Lord God make them one, with a portion of His Spirit in their union? To produce godly offspring" (Malachi 2:15). Godly offspring = disciples (which can also be physical children). If a woman isn't helping you make disciples, the relationship is pointless.

Developing charm?

3 upvotes · 15 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

More to /u/mrpmonk - again, while not "red pill" (as virtually no comedian is), my favorite clean comics are Jim Gaffigan and Jerry Seinfeld. John Crist is a Christian comedian who I'd put in the b-tier category, but is good for a clean show. Jeff Dunham is also b-tier, but still relatively clean. I'd keep Dane Cook and Dimitri Martin on that clean list too.

Dave Chappell is definitely not clean. His latest Netflix special was hilarious ... but also possibly the most inappropriate routine I've seen yet.

Developing charm?

3 upvotes · 14 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I wrote a post on SMV and long hanging fruit. If my break-down is even remotely close, 1/10 of your SMV is dedicated not to charm alone, but "charm, personality, charisma, wit, etc." My guess is that you already have at least 1/2 a point there, as most guys do. It's one of the few things that guys are at least given the green-light by culture to utilize in the sexual marketplace. The other 1/2 point that you may not have is the seductive aspect of how you utilize your personality/charm/charisma/wit.

From your post history, though, I'm guessing the problem isn't charm, but frame. You clearly don't have an abundance mentality. Your posts also show that you over-think things. You also don't seem to have hobbies of your own. Personally, I don't take "watching sports" as a hobby unless you are actually going to the games frequently. Watching the Sixers on your couch is no different to a girl than watching the latest Netflix release on your couch. No-abundance and over-thinking leads to a lack of confidence, which leads to a poor frame.

I made a comment recently to /u/skimthedross about how Rambo gets used a lot as a "what not to do with your frame" kind of thing, but there isn't as much proposed on what TO DO with your frame. I suggested Jim Carey - especially from The Mask when he's got the mask on.

- Highly sexual (constant kino, flirting, etc.)
- People can be shooting bullets at him and he just laughs (amused mastery)
- He overcomes hostility by exaggerating what the other person says/does (A&A)
- Has no problem noticing other girls, even in front of the one he's interested in (dread)
- He initiates with anyone and everyone, but on his terms (leadership, frame)

I could keep going, but you get the idea. It's not a perfect example, as there are certainly some blue parts to the mask too, but it at least shows enough good examples of what these concepts look like in practice to be worth the attention.

Whatever the case, you need to find someone with real life examples to look at and model. As /u/redwall92 said, you can't get this from Reddit, so a movie reference is the best I can give you. Jeremy Jordan's role in The Last Five Years is another good example of a guy who, while holding blue pill ideologies and being a validation-seeker, expresses many red pill qualities throughout the movie that are worth a watch. I believe I referenced "The Schmueel Song" as the best example I've seen on film of pulling a woman into your frame and amused mastery.

Long story short, your problem isn't lack of charm. It's lack of frame. To get there ...

- Start with getting a decent mission going and create a plan for what you want to have accomplished in the next 1, 3, and 5 years. Make sure it involves disciple-making.
- Then begin initiating with women often, using your mission as the context for an invitation. "I'm trying to build a ministry for God's Kingdom. Here's something I'm doing. You mind helping me out?"
- You will face a lot of rejection - but this rejection should INCREASE your confidence, not decrease it. If you develop confidence through successes, your confidence only lasts while you are successful. If you develop it by immunizing yourself against failure, the confidence can never be broken.
- Once you have confidence in the face of rejection, you can start having fun with rejection. It becomes amusing (yes, this is part of amused mastery). There was an episode of Brooklyn 99 a season or two ago where this hot girl shows up at a crime scene. They all note that she's so far out of their league that it was certain to result in rejection. So, instead of taking it seriously, they made a joke of asking her out. Sure enough, the dorky guy who initiated got accepted. Yeah, this is fiction, but there's some truth there. Having fun in the face of rejection is attractive.
- When you learn to have fun in life, and bad things happening to you (like rejection) can't break your fun attitude, you will have frame.

- When you have a fun frame (and not merely a strong one), you will inherently be witty and charming.

But you have to start with step 1 to get there. You can't skip straight to having a fun frame. It won't work. And you must ACTUALLY become immunized to rejection, not just faking it. So, go get rejected a lot.

Going to the same church as your ex

3 upvotes · 14 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm just not able to get the same spiritual connection on my own doing my own devotions

You're focused too much on spiritual feelings here. Note: there are no such thing as spiritual feelings. There are only feelings. This is part of the emotionalist agenda that churchianity pushes nowadays. If you're attending a congregation to get an emotional boost, you're doing it for the wrong reasons.

Congregations are a tool. You use a tool. You don't go to your tool box to get gushy feelings. Figure out what that tool is designed to do and use it for that purpose rather than for the purpose of boosting your feelings.

I feel like going to her church and seeing her would give off the vibe ...

Gonna cut you off right there. That's 100% living in her frame. Who cares what she thinks? She's not your girl. And even if she was: who cares what she thinks?

if I do run into her would simply acknowledging her then walking away be the best option?

Heck no. Make preselection work for you here.

How to overcome awkward self consciousness?

3 upvotes · 11 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

Haha, this is great.

Seriously, though: eye contact is the source of so much awkwardness for beta men. There's some truth when you say: "Weaklings will cower in fear, look away, and quickly move." Eye contact alone is the first way to demonstrate frame to a woman - and it can be done without even asking them out or showing any actual sign of interest.

99% of the time, when a girl notices a guy looking at her, he turns his eyes away immediately to diffuse the awkward eye contact ... because it's weird when you both look at each other, as it presumes some connectivity and an invitation. It shifts from two separate people to two connected people and now the silence goes from expected to awkward, as if one of you should say something. It's a frame issue because the guy feeling pressured to look away does so out of fear of what she might think of him if he kept looking.

So, I've stopped looking away when I see someone I'd prefer to keep looking at. What if she looks right back at me? I keep looking - right at her eyes. It's seriously not as awkward or creepy as society makes this out to be (unless you're unattractive, of course, in which case it's always going to feel creepy even if it's just a glance). If she's at a distance, I wave or smile, and she always does so right back, even if she has no clue who I am. If she's nearby, I'll say hi and introduce myself. No, I'm not cheating on my wife. I'm not banging them in my head. I'm not already plotting to find a hotel room. I'm just being friendly while appreciating beauty when I see it.

This is more to /u/Rifleshoot

I'm torn between two women

3 upvotes · 11 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

Solid.

I'm torn between two women

3 upvotes · 11 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

Best reply here. Well said, and so succinctly.

[FR] Comfort Test About Finances and More

3 upvotes · 8 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Don't do it. Too many problems arise.

[FR] Comfort Test About Finances and More

3 upvotes · 8 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

My wife's an accountant and is horrible with finances. She even overtly says: "If I see money in the account, I'm going to spend it." I wouldn't trust it just because of the job.

Difference between congruence-test and genuine need for help or a task

3 upvotes · 7 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

I agree with /u/OsmiumZulu whole-heartedly. Have you read MMSLP yet? It's on our sidebar and he has a section specifically dedicated to this topic.

Main sub being banned soon.

3 upvotes · 2 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Very well, actually. You just gotta know how to do it.

How to win a girl back after rejection?

3 upvotes · 1 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right on - and most significantly to /u/NoKoala4: if you want to enjoy your sex-life after marriage, you're going to have to lose the weight eventually. If you get married while overweight and then lose the weight, you'll realize you could have done MUCH better than her and most likely regret having married her. If you lose the weight first, you'll have a broader base of women to choose from and likely won't even be interested in this girl in the first place.

Either way, the best girl you can get while you're obese is likely less of a catch than the girls at the bottom of your standards when you're fit. This always spells disaster because one or the other of you will regret the marriage down the road. I've seen the whole, "I don't know what I was thinking. I wish we'd never married" conversation way too many times.

Forbearance and Meekness vs Standing up for Oneself

3 upvotes · 24 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

meekness and standing up for myself

/u/OsmiumZulu addressed this better in this post, but let me finally weigh in on the topic, as I'm not sure I have officially done yet.

The beattitudes are not commands. It does not say, "Thou shalt be poor in spirit, and when you obey this command yours is the kingdom of heaven." No, they are statements of temporal existence. Are we expected to be poor in spirit at all times? What about the spirit of power 2 Timothy 1:7 talks about? But sometimes we will be poor in spirit - and when we are, our influence in the kingdom of heaven (i.e. God's Church on earth) grows.

Same thing with mourning. If the beattitudes are commands to maintain these dispositions at all times, should we just mourn all the time? That interpretation makes no sense. But when we do mourn, we know we have a Comforter.

(I've used A.M. here with pretty negative results from her family.)

First, this displays a misunderstanding of AM, which is not merely a behavioral tactic like AA, but a mental state of being.

Second, you're not trying to seduce her family, so AM isn't going to work the same way. AM is meant to maintain your internal peace without losing your fun-loving frame. If you try to force a certain behavioral motif out of an AM mentality, it comes off as contrived, at worst, or cocky-funny, at best.

"She usually hits me with an open hand."

This sounds like an effort to be cocky-funny.

I probably err on the side of tactlessness in my general life

Which would be the opposite of the point of the 48 laws of power. You read those yet? The entire thing is about how to be socially tactful.

I struggle with venomous words. (Never towards her family or in front of them.)

You probably don't realize how easily parents can sniff out a fake. They give women a run for their money on this - and even worse is when one of those parents is a mother-in-law. Not only can they sniff out a fake, but they are intentionally looking for it at all times.

At this point I don't really care what they say

This is the right approach.

but it will have fallout on my relationship and my fiance will get really weird

Yeah, my wife did that too. I have the mother of in-law stories. AI-LALT?

This all stopped after my wife started following my lead. When she realized that I was of greater value to her than her parents (which is a difficult threshold to cross before marriage), and this took a long time, she finally saw her mother for the crazy she is and started seeing me more clearly for the better kind of crazy I am.

Can you give examples or advice on how to broach this?

Around your in-laws, maintain a fun, humorous frame without the cocky part. The 48 laws of power seem incredibly valuable here. Especially 12, 14, 17, 21, 38, 41 (re: your fiance's likely view of her father - be your own man, not his replacement), and 46.

Regarding 17 - my dad used to say that the best thing he ever did was to get his in-laws to fear him. I thought that was grossly inappropriate and "unchristian." Then when I had even worse in-laws than he had, I realized again that a healthy fear is good for a relationship. My MIL now has a healthy fear of me and it keeps her antics at bay when I'm around. Instead of her putting me down, she now tries to butter me up when we're around each other.

When you're around your wife, don't accuse them. Laugh at their antics. Ask ridiculous questions like, "Was your mom joking when she made that violence comment? Haha, I couldn't tell if she was being serious or not, but it reminded me of ..." and tell a story that fits.

I know Jesus says turn the other cheek

Here's the thing, though. Jesus "turned the other cheek" to the Pharisees, but only because he knew that in doing so he was winning influence with the people against them. His humility and servitude was not blind - it was strategic and advanced a greater purpose.

So yes, let your in-laws berate you, but also let your wife see what's going on and the way you willingly take their abuse - while still recognizing it's abuse. Jesus didn't say, "Turn the other cheek and act like they kissed you," he says, "And let them strike the other also." This makes them look cruel and you a hero for taking it willingly.

Indonesia to outlaw sex outside marriage

3 upvotes · 20 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

A perfect chance to note that people can have disagreements on things like theonomy ... yet I lose no respect for you at all. The way some Christians war with each other ... if they just understood the concept of living in their own frame, all the madness would die down. The war among denominations is a direct byproduct of the blue pill.

Help! Stunned by wife

3 upvotes · 20 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

So you figured out that your special little snowflake and your incredibly unique situation is ... well, let's just say welcome to the club. AWALT. She's not special. You're angry about it.

Of course, you say "after taking the red pill," yet you clearly hadn't taken the red pill - because if you had, you'd have already known all of this intuitively without needing to snoop to figure out the truth about her. AWALT. You thought you had a unicorn. You don't. You thought she was the unique girl who legitimately had no libido. You were wrong. You thought she was loyal to you. She wasn't. Again, welcome to the club.

Look, like many men here, I've been exactly where you've been. I went huge gaps without sex too. I thought my wife legitimately was asexual also. You at least see she has a sexual side, which gives you hope to get on the right side of that line. I didn't have that hope when I started my journey and guys on MRP were actually telling me my wife was an "outlier" and a "lost cause" and that "even the red pill can't save a situation like yours" - that's how asexual my wife seemed. Of course, they all had too little faith in their own teachings, because within a few short months my wife was already back on with the program in ways I hadn't contemplated possible given our incredibly dead bedroom leading up to that.

What I see here is a blue guy who thinks he can sprinkle some red behaviors in his life to get his wife sexually interested in him. This is the very definition of a covert contract - and I'd hardly call it even purple. You obviously don't believe the true nature of women or understand hypergamy. Back to reading the sidebar.

Apart from this, you've got some outstanding advice here - /u/lololasaurus and /u/macmeeler are spot on point. Read and reread their comments.

[FR] Wife goes off the rails, did I 90% pass my fitness test?

3 upvotes · 18 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I think /u/rocknrollchuck would agree that the line you quoted is really meant for new guys who don't know how to handle themselves in conflict yet. Stepping out in the midst of active conflict is generally frowned upon among the RP vets, though considered acceptable as a form of STFU if you need some time to gather your own thoughts and psych up your frame game.

Better strategies would be AA, AM, or overall just coming at the conversation with your own unwavering happiness.

In addition to my last post on this, I did it again with my wife today. She comes into the kitchen stomping her feet, "Are you kidding me?" she asks in anger at the mess the kids had made. She starts throwing things into the sink, making loud noises, etc., expecting me to come clean it all for her. I didn't feel like it, so I kept going about my business (in this case: folding laundry while watching a show). After she was pretty much done cleaning up the mess and I finished my stuff, I walk over for a drink. She's still huffy and obviously trying to show it to get my sympathy. Instead, I told her a story of what was going on at my office. She quickly forgot that she was mad and went back to her usual self, smiling and talking as if nothing had happened.

Now, if I'd told her: "I know you're upset, but the way you're acting is unacceptable. I'm going to fold laundry for a bit, and if you want to talk after I'm done, you need to approach me with respect," how do you think she's going to respond to that? It comes on very, very strong and sets harsher boundaries than most situations warrant. I don't want her to be off-put by my boundaries; I want her to enjoy living inside of them.

The positivity approach is more likely to draw her in, whereas the step-away approach has value if you are incapable of maintaining a positive, fun frame in the face of her negativity. For the reasons stated herein, it's clear that OP approached the situation with a relatively weak frame - and that's okay, so it means that he needs to step aside from time to time to figure out how to keep his frame in order. But as he develops himself, that tactic should be used less and less in favor of maintaining frame, rather than being a stiff board.

Where and how to meet religious women?

3 upvotes · 17 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Locked - this question belongs on askRPC. You also didn't give us any of the Rule 2 stats. What's your mission? Also, there's a LOT of content on this exact question on the sidebar - what makes your question unique that isn't already answered there?

Repost on askRPC with all of this information provided.

Self-conscious about things I cannot change immediately.

3 upvotes · 9 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

Women will generally self select themselves out of your life if they don't like something about you Right. Polarization, per Models. Rejection in this fashion is not a bad thing; it's a time-saver.

You wouldn't want to be with someone who changes their opinions on a whim like that.

Eh ... AWALT. Most girls are going to change their opinions pretty readily for an attractive guy. It's not surprising that they'll change them to go against the grain of a guy they're not attracted to. The issue is more of finding out if you're in the majority with regard to how women assess attractive qualities. Most women aren't going to care about a few stretch marks if they're tied to a 6-pack today. So, if she's in the minority, then so be it - he just shouldn't let it get to him. But if he's in the majority for what women find unattractive, then it's not just her taste that's the problem there.

Personal Finance and Peace

3 upvotes · 5 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I love your attitude toward your husband. Well done. A few thoughts:

Tithing

I'm all for generosity and charity. My wife and I probably allocate well over 10% of our budget toward Kingdom-advancing purposes. But that doesn't mean 10% goes to a local congregation, as many people suggest. The concept of a local congregation didn't even exist in Scripture, yet these congregations have taken claim to the tithe. In the early church, giving went to the missionaries like Peter and Paul who were traveling around for the sake of the Gospel, as well as to local needs - the widows and orphans, the brothers who were impoverished or disabled, etc. It was a sharing with one another, not a 10% straight to the pastor. Yes, there are examples of people doing this, but nothing close to a mandate, and it was mostly in the initial explosion of new converts when nobody really knew what was going on and they were just trusting the apostles to figure it all out.

A few years back I was at a congregation where the preacher talked on this subject and he said: "You know, financially speaking, our body is doing fine. We really don't need your tithe. How about instead of 10% you give us 5%. Take your other 5% and donate it to your own ministry. You don't have the money to buy pizza for your neighbor? Now you do. Share Christ with him. Your apartment is too small to invite people over? There's an extra $200 a month to get a bigger place to host people you can share the Gospel with."

Another useful tidbit on tithing - the guy who discipled me once commented: "Generosity is great, but strategic generosity is better." He then shared his own personal conviction (not a biblical mandate) that he only gives: (1) where there is an actual need, and (2) where non-Christians are not already going to meet that need. The local city homeless shelter is a great place to serve and volunteer. We even planted a congregation there. But our financial support goes not to the shelter itself; rather, it goes to the ministry planted there, and to the needs of the people within that ministry. Secular sources will keep the shelter alive. Spiritual sources will keep the people alive.

Paycheck to Paycheck

I'm iffy on Dave Ramsey stuff. A lot of it isn't updated for changes in the market and investing strategies in recent years - and by the time he publishes one book after another, the publishing process itself takes long enough that some of the advice becomes moot. Ramsey is for the financially illiterate, but the financially savvy can do much, much better ignoring him.

I also agree on the credit card thing. Most credit cards will net you better points than paying cash or with debit cards. That's free money you're losing out on. I just cashed in $1,500 worth of points accumulated over the last year. That's a huge bonus to have for having used a credit card instead of cash. Know how much interest I paid on that credit card over that same year? $0. Because I pay it off every single month.

Only one income

This is wise. That's essentially what we do.

Rich Budgets

I'm literally working a case right now where the guy earns $500,000/yr and is living paycheck to paycheck. He assumes he's so rich that he doesn't need to pay attention. As I'm combing his bank statements he's got $600 at a rooftop steakhouse in NYC, another $350 at a bar in NJ. It's crazy.

I like the comparison to financial fasting. Well said.

That Girl at Work

3 upvotes · 5 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

Yeah, but not the Andy Stanley rule. Someone sent a limo to pick him up from the airport once for a conference he was supposed to speak at. It was a woman driver. He sent the driver back to get a new driver, missed his speaking spot and screwed everyone at the conference. He then lauded this story as the "right choice" to make. I look at it as him applying a ridiculous legalistic standard that he created ("rules taught by men") to the detriment of hundreds of others who had gone significantly out of their way and taken time off work to attend this conference to hear him speak. Total disrespect.

The Pence rule is nice as long as it's reasonably applied.

That Girl at Work

3 upvotes · 5 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

Right, no need to invite temptation. Flee from it instead. That said, if OP had not admitted to his susceptibility to temptation here, entertaining a conversation here or there could build abundance by confirming the IOIs. After all, what some guys perceive as IOIs are really nothing and they're just mentally masturbating over a situation. But this only goes for guys who aren't actually tempted to act on anything in the first place.

That Girl at Work

3 upvotes · 5 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

"That's not what I mean, and you know it." Changed topic.

As /u/OsmiumZulu said ... "provide unlimited sense of security for your wife at all costs." Why would you respond like that?

My wife and I were chatting once. She made a similar comment. I reply: "Let's just say I'll keep my eye out for someone on board for a threesome." Years ago, she'd have been down my throat for making such a lewd, "sinful" comment. Now she laughs at it and says, "Wait ... you're not serious, right?" I tell her, We'll figure out if I'm serious when I find the right girl.

Instead of reassuring her through all this, I'm making it clear that I am a highly sexual person, and I deliver the lines with such a confident frame that she assumes I'm joking because our faith would imply so, but she really can't tell for sure.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/04/19)

3 upvotes · 4 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Pascal's Wager

So many people knock the wager as some heresy, claiming it doesn't lead to "true salvation" because it creates a fear-based acceptance rather than the love we're meant to have for Christ.

The fact is, Jesus defined love by our obedience toward him, not our emotions toward him. And Jesus himself preached hellfire and brimstone as a motivator to get people to repent. Who am I to argue with his tactics? But liberals think they're better than Jesus and that their way is more "pure." Sigh

What do you think about courtship?

3 upvotes · 3 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

The problem with "courtship" is that it's not often clearly defined. I have heard the following used to describe "courtship" at different youth groups in my time:

- "Courtship is when you get to know someone by spending time with them only in group settings until you're sure you want to marry them, at which point you propose."
- "It's basically just being friends until you're ready to propose."
- "Courtship is pretty much the same thing as dating, but where you set the goals and boundaries very clearly up-front."

- "It's when you make your romantic interests for a woman known to her family and they arrange for you to spend time together and get to know the family until they can decide whether or not the two of you are a good match."

These are just ones I've heard - and I'm not even listing them all. Sure, there's some overlap here. But they're clearly giving different versions of events. So, it would be very relevant to know what you mean when you ask about this subject, as that very heavily affects how we answer.

Whatever your definition, the goal of courtship is to keep couples from becoming sexually active by placing extremely high boundaries on their ability to be alone with one another. This, in essence, presumes that every couple engaging in courtship is spiritually immature to a degree that they lack any appreciable self-control over their passion. While it's a fair assumption to make, it's also a self-fulfilling prophecy about the state of teenagers, because courtship in itself is one of those things which stunts a person's spiritual maturity in a number of ways.

But even without going down that road, it's important to note that "courtship" as a concept is found nowhere in Scripture. It's a human philosophy made to address the problem of youths getting sexually active before marriage. The Bible DOES have a lot to say about pre-marriage relationships, and what I see the Bible saying doesn't overlap well with a courtship model.

To be clear: the Bible doesn't talk so much about pre-marriage relationships between humans; rather, it talks a great deal about the pre-marriage relationship Christ had with his bride and how he brought his bride to his bedchamber. If you want to know what your pre-marriage relationship should look like (note that you can call it dating, courtship, or whatever other title you want to make up), the best way to approach it is to follow the model Jesus gave. How did he draw people to himself? How does he continue to bring more people into the Church, his bride? The same process used to cause someone to become Jesus' bride (i.e. evangelism) should outline the same process you should use to cause someone else to become your bride.

From there, it's just a matter of making sure you actually understand biblical evangelism and not philosophical evangelism, which is what churchianity preaches nowadays.

I believe I have found my mission

3 upvotes · 2 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with /u/NoFaithInThisSub - this is only tangentially related to disciple-making (i.e. God's mission for you), and doesn't seem big enough. It's also so vague that you could do virtually anything over the next 40 years of your life, look back, and rationalize that you accomplished this mission.

Your mission must always incorporate the great commission. I used to make exception for this. Not anymore. Biblically, I don't see a way around this.

From there, you need a clearer vision for how you're going to accomplish the goal of making disciples of all nations. On that end, re-read the mission posts at the end of the 200 series. From there, consider:

- You're at God's Judgment Seat someday. He says, "You want to get into my Kingdom. Tell me, what have you done with your life to contribute to the kingdom that you say you're so invested in being a part of?"
- You answer: "Well, I inspired a lot of people."
- God: "Inspired them to what?"
- You: "Well, I lived my life as an example, so I suppose I inspired them to take after my example."
- God: "And what did you do as an example to them?"

- You: "I tried to strive for Jesus."
- God: "What does that mean to you?"
- You: "Well, it means that I tried not to sin and to go to church and read my Bible and generally just improve myself all the time."
- God: "And how does you doing any of those things help me today now that the world is passed away?"

This is the conversation you need to be having with God in your prayers. Ask him to have that conversation with you today rather than after it's already too late to go back and do anything about your conclusions from that conversation.

For further reading: Luke 13:6-9, Matthew 7, the parable of the minas/talents, Matthew 13's parable of the sower, Matthew 28:19-20; Acts 1:8 (and appropriate context), etc. You'll get a pretty good idea of how important the concept of spiritual reproduction is to God and why that needs to be a more clear part of your mission.

For reference, my mission is as follows:

- I will glorify God by making disciples of all nations through spiritual generations of discipler-makers living and reproducing among the lost.

My vision, which is my "what I want to have accomplished by the time I'm 80" goal, is:

- I intend to build disciple-making ministries in 60 different countries by the time I'm 60.

From there, I have to ask myself:

- What needs to happen by the time I'm 70 to make that a reality?
- What needs to happen by the time I'm 60 to make my 70-year-old goal a reality?

...

- What needs to happen today so I can make my 6-month goal feasible?

Continue to pursue dating or not?

3 upvotes · 29 August 2019 · /r/askRPC

Not an excerpt. I was referring to Jesus, of course. Though I'm a man, I'm still among the bride of Christ. I can't imagine if Jesus were to have married (which he would have been within his right to do), that his lifestyle would have been particularly different. After all, we know Peter was married, and yet we see him living the same life with Jesus anyway. It just puts a different lens on the ideal husband - and yet we don't deal with Christ exclusively in his poverty, but now also share in his glory. So there's that too ;) But his disciples had to follow him and trust in his future glory before they actually saw that glory as we do now.

Own Your Shit Weekly - August 27, 2019

3 upvotes · 28 August 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Yikes. I didn't realize it was a thing either until a couple years into practice I had to hire outside counsel in another state. My mentor suggested only working with an attorney who did his own appellate work.

I determined after that to do all my own appellate work. Holy crap, does it make a difference in how you approach trial. I've also handled appeals from other attorneys doing the trial and ... let's just say if they don't do appeals they don't know how to set the case up for a win on appeal.

My dad's practice (criminal law) is mostly appellate work now. We've both been able to squeeze out some wins from non-appeal-attorney trials, but it's significantly harder.

If you have a biased or idiot judge, your odds of winning are still the same, but 90% of your strategy should be setting up for the appeal rather than trying to educate the fool on the bench. You can usually figure this out about 2/3 the way into your case.

[FR] A Changing Dynamic

3 upvotes · 28 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Solid report, brother.

Regarding teaching - once you're far enough along, minimal prep time is required. This is especially true if you utilize intentional question-asking to guide the conversation where you want it to go rather than lecturing, which is generally an ineffective way of getting through to people.

More to the point: I would never want to lose opportunity to gain influence within a congregation; but if it's a bad time for opportunity, simply reschedule: "I want be free to run a class right now, but my schedule opens up on this date. Would that work?"

Other people already touched on the other stuff, so I'll just leave it at that. Very encouraging report.

First argument in a while

3 upvotes · 27 August 2019 · /r/askRPC

Correction, this is the first time I lost frame in the past few weeks

Correction: this is the first time you realized you lost frame. I lose frame every day. Most other people never notice it because it's internal to myself (per my last OYS). Frame is not merely an outward projection, but also an internal point of origin.

I have thrown in sexual innuendos to her tantrums before but it usually ends with her whining saying I am not taking her seriously.

This right here is the definition of being in her frame. Are you acting to get a result from her (in her frame) or doing what you want to do because she doesn't get to you and you like to have fun, regardless of her reaction (in your own frame)?

In my wife's case however this does not diffuse the scenario, it just ends up with her ...

You care too much how she reacts. So she reacts the exact opposite way you want. Laugh it off and move on.

When I first discovered the red pill I treated it as a way to get my wife on board. It was an interpersonal relationship reconditioning strategy. Boy was I wrong. That is the very definition of being hung up in her frame - because my goals were still pinned on her, even if I had an independent mission. Even my separate mission from her was in-part designed to get her back on board.

Ironically, it wasn't until I could disassociate from all concern for her thoughts, behaviors, interactions, etc. and be my own man that I was actually able to start getting the results I wanted. The first way, all of the red pill feels like work. This latter way, it's just fun because you do whatever you want and enjoy life and the red pill "strategies" that get taught are literally just a byproduct of having a frame freed from outside influences.

And in this, we recognize very quickly how well our frame measures up to Christ - because when we stop being molded by external expectations, our behaviors stop conforming to those expectations and we learn what our own decisions and behaviors look like, and we see readily that we are not the men we thought we were. We were only playing the part that others expected of us - and those expectations were often more Christ-like than we actually were, but we couldn't see our own sin and non-Christ-likeness because our behaviors had conformed without our heart being transformed.

By stepping out of everyone else's frame and not caring about what your wife thinks or how she'll react or laughing at her when she tells you you're not taking her seriously - that's when you realize just how much a sinner you are and when you can start figuring out how to be Christ-like in the first place rather than merely modifying your behavior to Christ-likeness.

[Discussion] Feminism & RedPillWomen

3 upvotes · 27 August 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

That's pretty much the r/RPChristians take on "churchianity." Every movement follows a process, including both feminism and the church:

1. Someone starts with an important vision.
2. People flock to the vision and growth happens.
3. Organization must occur to keep the fringe edges of growth aligned with the original vision. This is where the church was meant to stop.
4. Institutionalization happens, whereby associating with the brand becomes more important than knowing what that brand's original vision actually was, or contributing to that vision.
5. Death occurs, or a new visionary steps up.

In the case of feminism, they just keep adding new visionaries, wave after wave. It's not the same thing anymore. Neither is the church.

Rethinking about MGTOW as a Christian

3 upvotes · 26 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Per my more substantive comment in this thread, the method of gathering statistics on the subject is riddled with so many flaws that even the "hard stats" you're looking for are inherently unreliable. The "explicit proof" that anyone claims to have is always based on self-reporting, which is highly subjective in nature and the examination criteria rarely ever accounts for this with direct observation. That's why in his videos /u/redpillcoach talks about Gottman's method, which took self-reporting out of the mix and focused on actual observation to make determinations about marriage and relationships. Unfortunately, no one is going to commit domestic violence when they're aware there's a camera watching them.

Source: In addition to being a divorce attorney, I have a degree in statistical methodology.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (08/21/19)

3 upvotes · 21 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

PHYSICAL - Consistently back at the gym after 2 months of cardio-only. Lifts are going back up, so that's a plus. Diet is back on track. I'm dressing nicer - mostly at work, but also at home. Income is projected to have a nice boost in a few months. Sex is good, albeit frequency is a bit down.

MENTAL/EMOTIONAL - I broke frame this morning.

I was up until 3am last night (2 hours later than normal) trying to configure my home office in a way that my desktop would actually work. There was too much electrical interference to get the wireless mouse to work without jumping with the computer behind the desk, so I eventually moved it to be on top of our very large L-shaped desk.

My wife didn't like that. She had arranged the desk exactly the way she wanted it for her work use. So, this morning she acts all bratty about the computer taking up her desk space. To her credit, despite her attitude she did at least try to sound reasonable, saying things like: "I recognize it's not just my desk, but we need to figure out how to share the desk space in a positive way that meets both of our needs." Translation: I know you're only using about 4% of the desk space and I'm using the other 96%, but this is unacceptable and you're going to have to put your computer somewhere else and just find a way to make it work.

For about 10 seconds I wanted to argue with her about it. For another 5 seconds I wanted to look for an alternate solution that accommodates her request. For those 15 seconds, I broke frame.

I remained STFU during those 15 seconds, then simply told her no. This was the only configuration that worked and I wasn't interested in looking for alternative solutions at the time.

The fact that I broke frame had nothing to do with how I interacted with her. It was internal to me - that temptation to return back to my old ways of arguing or acquiescing. It's a uniquely rare feeling anymore.

SPIRITUAL - Still solid. Lots of time in the Word, learning new things, building new relationships with other believers and non-Christians alike. Expanding my ministry influence. Good things are on the horizon, and some are already here.

Faking and Making

3 upvotes · 21 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Sometimes people fake things not because of anyone else's frame, but because they want to become what they're faking at. My son fakes being a super hero all the time. He doesn't do this to impress everyone, as if we actually believe he's a super hero. He does it because he wishes he were actually a super hero.

As we practice this art, we have the capacity to develop a proficiency toward our desired end. Nobody else has to be involved if you don't want them to be.

I'm reminded of something CS Lewis once said:

Do not waste time bothering whether you 'love' your neighbor; act as if you did. As soon as we do this we find one of the great secrets. When you are behaving as if you loved someone, you will presently come to love him.

I believe this holds true in a wider variety of contexts. Perhaps a more common cliché is: "Dress for the job you want." You don't actually have the job you want yet. But if you dress like you do, it sends psychological signals through your brain that train you to make progress in achieving your goals. This is significant and doesn't involve being in anyone else's frame other than your own goals.

Faking and Making

3 upvotes · 20 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

2 Corinthians 5:17 - "If anyone is in Christ he is a new creation. The old has gone, the new has come."

If we really are a new person in Christ's image, then our flesh is the "other" and therefore following the desires of the flesh is living in someone else's frame than our own. My identity is not found in my flesh, but in my spirit which is one with Christ.

The compulsions of my spirit are identical to Christ's not because Jesus said so, but because of who he has made me. It is my original internal desire, not resistant obedience to his external commands.

As I often say, God is scarcely in the business of telling us his plans for our lives and is more interested in transforming us into the kind of people who don't need to ask in the first place.

Looking for advice, Need help. +Apology.

3 upvotes · 16 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Let's be clear: don't work on a better argument to rationalize what you want to believe. Work on figuring out what the Bible actually says. Exegesis, not eisegesis.

If you conclude without preconceived notions or bias that God legitimately embraces premarital sex as a valid act for men, then that's one thing. But using the Bible to justify your own desires is not cool. Just keep that in mind.

Looking for advice, Need help. +Apology.

3 upvotes · 15 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Most women will lie about this question in order to impress the man and make him like her more. Even the week before our wedding, going through our last days of marriage counseling, my wife was saying things like "once a day, maybe every other day." It wasn't long before we were in a dead bedroom anyway. Don't trust what she says when asking her those questions. Of course, if she gives a garbage answer that's against her own interests, I suppose that's reliable :p

OYS - Where Progress is Made (08/14/19)

3 upvotes · 15 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

PHYSICAL

After taking 2 months 90% off related to the moving process, I'm back at lifting and dieting. It feels GOOD and painful at the same time. I had forgotten how sore muscles could get when they're not constantly strained every day. Diet has been going real good too. I've limited myself to under 800 calories the last 2 days and 1300 today, despite burning over 1,000 each day. Of course, this is only the tip of the ice berg after having gained back 9lbs of the 22 I had lost in my previous cut.

Sexually, I've got some ideas on a few things I want to try, props to /u/thechristianalpha - but because my wife occasionally reads my reddit (though she won't admit it), I'd rather not share them publicly just yet.

MENTAL/EMOTIONAL

I decided I'm at a juncture with my kids where it's becoming increasingly important for them to know that I understand them and care about them. We just moved, so my two youngest daughters in daycare have to make a whole new set of friends, my son is going into a new school, and my other daughter is starting school for the first time. Big changes for them, and I can tell it's affecting them, even though they've otherwise fit in with the other kids in the neighborhood extremely well.

So, I figured a good question that would communicate to my kids that I care about their thoughts and feelings would be: If there was anything you could change about Daddy, what would it be? Seemed like a good OYS question - where am I failing my kids? At least from their perspective. Not that I'm going to change (though I might, if I agree with them), but it at least lets them know that I'm interested enough to ask.

- My oldest (son, 7) said: "Sometimes when I say something you don't hear me all the way, and then you ask me what I said and I think you know what I said because I thought you were listening, so I don't want to repeat myself, but you keep asking me, and I think you're just joking, so I get really mad because you're joking so much, but it's really not a joke. I wish you would just hear what I said the first time." Haha. That was totally weird, but a valid point - and one worth working on.
- My second (daughter, 5) said: "Nothing! I like you just the way you are :D :D :D ... oh wait. There iiiiis ONE thing. STOP RUNNING YOUR HANDS THROUGH MY HAIR!!!" I told her: You know you like it when I do that.

- My third (daughter, 4) said: Yeah, I wish you would give me more candy.
- My youngest (daughter, 2) said: "I don't want this water." Apparently she wanted milk.

I also asked my third today how she was doing at her new school and if she made many new friends. She said, "Well, one girl. But she leaves at nap time every day, so we don't get to play much." I asked her about other friends, but she couldn't think of any and said, "I'm just shy." So, we had a really good conversation about how to overcome shyness, but she concluded: "I think I just want to keep being shy." So, I pivoted and talked about ways she could keep being shy (for now) and still make lots of new friends. I also referred her to my wife (a heavy introvert with good social skills) to get some extra "inside information" on how it's done.

SPIRITUAL

Things are going fantastic right now. Too much to type right here and now, but suffice it to say I'm meeting with a ~~pastor~~ congregation leader tomorrow morning and am expecting very good things to come out of the conversation that should really propel my mission 3 years ahead of schedule.

Separate from that angle, I'm also planning on asking him to disciple me so I can reverse-disciple him, thereby mutually benefiting each other in a way that advances God's Kingdom from a variety of angles.

The Kingdom of God is a Party

3 upvotes · 12 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I'm all for bonding over fun rather than negativity and burdens. But it still has to be leading somewhere. If a party turns out to be an effective strategy to get people in the door, what do you do with them once you're there? If this congregation truly found long term success with their model as a groundbreaking missiological practice, why is nobody talking about their model today? Except for you ... based on a book written in the 90s ;)

I'm partially teasing, but the point is that Jesus's model of discipleship is the only model I'm aware of that has consistently proved successful for the past 2,000 years and is still discussed and practiced openly today. The issue we have now is that so much other irrelevant content has flooded in, spawned by the deceptive need to mass market the church since Theodosius I forced everyone to become Christian ... that good missiology has been lost in the sea of human philosophies about missiology. As a result, the definition of discipleship changed drastically from what Jesus meant in borrowing the term from Jewish culture (tweaking its spirit) to some general concept of being good little boys and girls.

Look at the outcome of Jesus's model of discipleship compared to the outcome of churchianity's model and tell me if they in any way are being as or more effective.

I have followed Jesus's model (as best I see it in Scripture) and am seeing similar results - guys who compared to the product of churchianity look like super apostles, like u/TheChristianAlpha, my friends Buck and Chad, a former Pastor Brad I discipled, my recent pastor Dan I discipled, and a handful of others I've worked with over the years - all of whom are still reproducing their lives in others to this day. I say this not to brag, but to shame the mainstream church in the way it hopes to find these people by preaching to the masses until one such guy rears its head (i.e. hunting for a unicorn), whereas I can, through the Spirit, produce such a guy every year - and the next year they're producing even more.

And I'm off topic now. Suffice it to say, if our goal is to produce pew sitters, that's what we'll get. But my goal is to produce super apostles. That means living up to the rigorous standard first, then building other guys up relentlessly as well. Churchianity wants to build up its brand - the institution of the church - more than its people. I'm not okay with that.

Tag: u/chaddownunder - because although I don't disciple him directly, we have enough contact that he's becoming another one of these guys.

Denominations Question from Newcomers and Those Seeking to Return to the Church

3 upvotes · 11 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I actually know a Nazarene pastor who has planted several churches. He says he won't plant a church until he has all 5 roles filled. It's quite interesting how he approaches it.

RP Christians for Women - Cultivating Gratitude / The Power of Fasting

3 upvotes · 6 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Isn't it?

There's certainly a lot of value that can be gained from fasting beyond the biblical purposes, which I think is what you're describing. But the Bible does portray a pretty clear outline of what fasting is intended for in a spiritual sense.

I wrote more about this here:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/blrqw7/share_your_experiences_with_fasting/emr4wi/

I was labeled a misogynist because I said that I preferred someone who was conscious about modesty

3 upvotes · 3 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Nail on the head. Especially that first sentence. I just riled up a bunch of people on TC for saying that there is a higher pursuit in life than feeling closer to God. Screw the mob - but preach truth all the same.

That said, I'm not as inclined to push the modesty agenda because the way most Christians talk about modesty today is exaggerated and assumes a woman can't do anything whatsoever to spark the sexual interest of a man ... and that's just off.

My experience having a break up with my first christian girlfriend

3 upvotes · 2 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I got used to wake up and lay down thinking about my girlfriend, I felt blessed all the time, nothing could make me sad

Most guys think the 400 series doesn't apply to them until they have a problem. This is right here why the good times are the best time to be reminded of the empty/full dynamic - because you were illegitimately full.

I also tolerated her mother, which told her to break up with me

Hah! Try having a mother-in-law who drove to a lake and threatened to jump off the bridge and commit suicide in order to convince her daughter not to marry you.

I should take my distance from those kind of people.

Right, which can mean setting clear boundaries and not backing down on your frame when she tries to crumble it.

The best way to do this is to call out her garbage as part of a joke. She says something snide. You laugh loudly and say, "That's hysterical. I thought you meant that in the mean way." She did, and you just blew it off with a smile. Now she knows you're going to call her on her garbage and everyone else in the room knows there was no other way to interpret it other than the mean way, yet you're cool because you're not being mean back.

I think the right thing to do is just stay away from a girl until you have the guts to handle her.

Sage advice, brother.

it's almost impossible to have abundance without missionary dating.

No missionary dating. Missionary to dating is fine though. I think /u/OsmiumZulu has a post along these lines from a long while back. The general premise is that you share the Gospel with plenty of women, not limiting your outreach to guys only, and expect that if you don't come across a ready-made girl you're going to end up creating one.

I'm still clueless how I will make God the center of my every action but I will pray every moment for this outcome

This is a common misconception. I love my kids, but when I tell them to clean their room I get upset when they hang all over me wanting to spend more time with me.

God did this to Moses in Exodus 14:15 - "Then the LORD said to Moses, 'Why are you crying out to me? Tell the Israelites to move on.'" Basically, "Stop spending time with me and start doing what I told you to do."

Christian culture over-glorifies our relationship with God to the point that we think getting "closer to God" is the most important thing. The result is that we end up like clingy kids that hang all over our parent's neck because it makes us feel good to be near them, but we never actually clean our room, which just makes them angry at us instead.

Then we get all confused, wondering: "How can I be focusing on God so much and yet still feel so distant and my life feel so screwed up?" Duh.

The Main Event

3 upvotes · 1 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

They're actually the same definition of frame. You just don't have a taste for what a nonchristian's frame looks like. That's okay, neither do I. But their frame, as distasteful as it may be to a mature Christian, is uniquely potent at evoking the sexuality of the average women.

More Than Marriage: How churchianity has screwed up friendships too

3 upvotes · 1 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I haven't seen it, so I can't say.

As for mastermind groups, this sounds eerily close to the way CS Lewis describes the trinity - that the relationship between the Father and Son was so strong that their connectivity created a tangible, sentient entity that we call the Holy Spirit. It sounds like he was possibly imputing his "Inklings" mastermind philosophy on his understanding of the trinity, which is somewhat eisegetical (except he acknowledged that he's not interpreting Scripture in doing so), but is still overall a worthwhile notion to consider.

I do know that Paul talks about the Church having one spirit and one purpose. A "mastermind" sounds like the spirit of a community of people that takes on an identity of its own. I like this idea, but it's also a stone's throw away from institutionalization, where the communal identity itself becomes more important than the mission of the community, thereby changing the identity of the spirit of the community away from one of vision to one of institutionalized growth. I'm not okay with that.

What I'm talking about, though, is far more base and simplistic than any of this. My post here was actually heavily inspired by u/ruizbujc's post on r/TrueChristian about building healthier relationships.

In that post, ruiz breaks down different categories of friendships and recognizes that people can be actual, authentic and deeply connected friends even without a "mastermind" hive community spirit/purpose behind them, but that the epitome of friendship is when this common goal is added to an otherwise authentic friendship.

So, in light of the Aristotelian tripartate view of friendship categories, ruiz would say (as do I) that friendships of virtue don't exist in the absence of friendships of pleasure - that friendships of pleasure are the stepping stone to get to virtue, and you can't get there without it. At best, you are business partners at that point, and it would be a bastardization of the world to call each other friends if you don't have that deep enjoyment of each other's company that extends beyond the vision at hand.

It is my view that discipleship cannot exist without actual friendship occurring as part of the process - that something will always be lost and the "virtue" or "purpose" that builds the foundation of the relationship will fade away if there is no connectivity to leave a lasting impression.

I have lived both types. I have known numerous men who have tried to disciple me without the relational component, as have I tried to disciple many men without it. They see me as a great teacher, just as I saw some of those other guys who were over me. But eventually the relationship faded, we forgot about each other, and I had no internal compulsion to keep living up to the ideals they tried to teach me because I had no great and personal loyalty to them.

Justin, however, was the type of guy who actually built a relationship with me that went beyond mere content and purpose. We played sports together, talked about shared interests, watched TV shows/movies together, etc. I knew I could trust him because I saw who he was and not just the content he had to offer. He knew I was a worthwhile investment because he saw how I lived and not just how I nodded at the next great lesson. In fact, his most recent post on his discipleship blog (www.justingravitt.com) lists this relational aspect as the first foundational component of discipleship relationships - and he posts all of his articles on reddit over at /r/disciplemaking under the username u/1Timothy47. It's worth a look.

I hope that adds some clarity.

Joshua Harris, author of "I Kissed Dating Goodbye" is getting divorced and has fallen away from the faith

3 upvotes · 30 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

/u/Hannelore010 hit the main points. I read it when I was dating my wife. I disagreed with a vast majority of things he said. It's mostly his own personal philosophies on dating, inspired by anti-sexual church culture, rather than actually exegeting any Scripture on point.

I used to talk a lot around here about the hierarchy of Philosophy < Praxeology/Science < Theology. He writes from the lowest tier of those (philosophy), as do most "Christian" and "biblical" authors. Instead of exegeting Scripture, they eisegete it - looking for passages to affirm their own views rather than figuring out what is actually being said.

The reality is that the Bible speaks relatively little of the pre-marriage process on a physical level. Guys found girls they liked, paid a pretty penny to the girl's dad, and she became his wife. It was more of a desire and exchange model than courting or dating. Courting was merely a philosophical reaction to the over-sexualized nature of mainstream secular dating.

What both camps fail to realize is that just as the process of living out a godly marriage is parallel in Scripture to Christ's relationship with the church, so also is the pre-marriage process parallel to the process we go through before entering into a relationship with Christ as his bride. That process is called evangelism. And yes, the Bible has a lot to say on that topic. So, we can learn everything about how Christ draws his bride to himself and use that as our model for drawing a bride to us as well. This is not hidden in Scripture at all - most people are just too blind to recognize the parallels God was creating between physical and spiritual things, despite reading countless parables, the epistles talking about it, and even Hebrews 8-10 referencing the earthly things as "copies" and "shadows" of the truer heavenly things. Because of this, virtually every "Christian" or "biblical" book on dating in the mainstream will fall flat.

Should I, a single man, go monk mode until improving or try to find a wife during a slump?

3 upvotes · 30 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

MISSION: DISCIPLESHIP

Way too much focus in your life on apologetics. I think you're misunderstanding the place and value of apologetics. Worry less about convincing people to Christ through wise and persuasive arguments. This will not work in the long term.

And where's the Great Commission in all of this? Are you going on to disciple the people you share apologetic arguments with? I don't see any of that in your mission.

MISSION: MARRIAGE

Why is finding a wife part of your mission? This bit is truly concerning to me. I noticed the "finding the girl you can't keep yourself from banging" posts weren't on your read list. Add them.

If you're chasing after women, they're not chasing after you, and you're not chasing after God. You can't have two masters. Right now you're trying to split your attention between finding a girl and developing your intellectual superiority over atheists. Neither of these are healthy pursuits and they're ultimately going to get you nowhere in eternity.

Moreover, once you're dead, what will your life have amounted to? Who's going to carry in your influence after you're gone? Maybe you hope that one of the guys you persuaded to follow Jesus won't be persuaded to stop following Jesus and that perhaps he'll go on to do great things for God's Kingdom. But how do you know? Certainly if he goes on it won't have been because of you - it will have been because of whoever taught him how to keep going on, and he'll be carrying on their ministry legacy rather than yours. Lots to say on this, but I'm low on time. Simple point: I'm guessing you're already living 1 Cor. 7:33 and you're not even married yet. Stop figuring out how you can please women to get more dates and focus on other things. This is all in my "finding the girl ..." posts.

1. Yes, you can be attractive to women even with an injury. This is purely a frame issue. I've known midgets who could pick up girls without a problem - 8s and 9s even - because they have solid frame.
2. Looks and salary are the same. You can look now, but if you know things will get better later, why bother searching when you know you can do better later? A good reason would be to practice game, even if you don't intend to follow through. This would mean nixing online dating and just master the art of approaching women in real life - not for the purpose of setting up dates, but to improve your ability to interact with women in the first place. The more likely reason, though, is that you're just bored and lonely because you have a crappy mission and no real friends, so you think getting a girlfriend will solve all your emotional problems. In this situation, you're going to find someone who is beneath your maximum capacity, then you're going to have to decide if you're willing to settle for her or dump her once you're back in peak condition and able to pull from a higher tier of women.
3. Yes, it's perfectly appropriate and beneficial to attend on campus ministries. I personally recommend the Navigators, if they have one on your campus. Most of them accept alumni. This is a great way to enhance your social influence, find people to disciple, and meet younger women. Going to a ~~church~~ congregation for a couple weeks won't do much for helping you meet new girls unless you're already phenomenal at your cold-approach game. It usually takes a couple months to start building connections with everyone you'd want to chat up.

4. Stop viewing marriage as a goal to pursue. Get on board with the mission to make disciples. Focus less on intellectual superiority (I know, your PhD program bolsters this aspect about you) and more on your spiritual ambitions. Don't worry about persuading people to make a decision for Christ in a singular moment, but on training them to follow him for an entire lifetime - apologetics as a primary goal is incompatible with this purpose due to its incredibly narrow scope. Develop a stronger frame that doesn't care about how often you get rejected or whether or not girls will find you attractive with an injury.

More Than Marriage: How churchianity has screwed up friendships too

3 upvotes · 30 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good stuff. But why can't Aristotle's categories overlap in the same relationship?

I'm not advocating for friendships of pleasure. I'm saying a friendship can't be effective at its purpose (making disciples) if it lacks pleasure. I've seen and lived through countless examples of "friendships of purpose" that don't have a pleasure or even utility component to them, and they all ultimately fail.

But unless you are going to jail for the sake of the gospel

I actually had Acts 16 in mind when I wrote that bit.

Household Finances

3 upvotes · 29 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I intend to stick with those commitments, even if it's just a smokescreen

Right. This is part of not going Rambo. A guy shouldn't read RP material and become alpha overnight. Even if he internalizes it quickly, he must still pretend to be beta until he gradually eases his way through the transition. /u/bluepillprofessor discusses this at great length in his video blog and book. Since you're still early on, don't skip those.

I couldn't spend money the way I wanted, even though I am the sole breadwinner

That was the exact trigger that led to my parents' divorce. Props for realizing this in advance.

I'm not at the top of her list, not even close. My paycheck is.

Catch up on the sidebar and you'll realize:

- Men love women because men love women.
- Women love men because of what men can do for them.

She will never love you the way you want to be loved. Even if you become the most attractive man in the world, she will not love you for who you are. She will love you for the fact that she can show off to all her girl friends how great of a guy she got ... among other things.

This is a reality of life that is to be embraced, not something to fight against. Don't be mad about it any more than you'd be mad at a worm for lacking the generosity to share his dirt-meal with you. No, women are not worms. But women are women, and there are boundaries over what they are mentally and emotionally capable of, just as there are boundaries over men. Women can be great at emulating authentic, masculine love, but it will only ever be to the same degree that a parrot emulates the words "I love you." It has no clue what those words actually mean; it just knows that saying them produces a good reaction and gets him a cracker.

I'm prepared to open my own bank account, move all cash out of our joint accounts, and remove her access to our family budget.

Right, because continuing with counseling is what's going to keep you from going Rambo. I can't wait to read the update after this. It'll be like the fourth of July.

I'm hoping some of you guys can shoot me some wisdom

Yes, it's a bad idea. It's going Rambo.

What's really going on here is that you got in a fight over finances and now it seems like finances are the most important thing in your marriage. You view them as the most important thing to her. You're willing to blow up your marriage over it, so it seems like the most important thing to you. But then you're going to calm down and realize there are other more important things and it won't be such a big deal.

The best way to handle the situation is to phase yourself in gradually. Start by asking your wife to see a copy of the spreadsheet she maintains to manage your budget because you want to get a snapshot of how things have been going lately - a very plain and innocuous request. You'll find she probably doesn't have a spreadsheet, which will make her feel like she's not doing her job properly without you actually saying it. So, you reply, "No worries. Can you give me an overview of our average net surplus/deficit over the last 6 months? I want to make sure we're planning for long-term savings." She's probably going to have no idea and give you a BS number about how much she usually sees in the account at random times when she checks on it. After a few more questions like that you end the conversation and thank her for the information she was able to provide and that it helps you wrap your head around some of the long-term goals you have, like retirement, vacation-planning, etc. If she asks you what those goals are, stay amorphous. "I haven't decided anything concrete in my head. I needed some information before I could figure out what reasonable goals are in the first place."

About 2 weeks later you start trickling in some information about your long-term goals. "I'm thinking I want to retire by the age of 60 instead of 70. What would it take to do that?" She's going to have no clue. You're going to end up seeing a financial planner. You'll be the one to set up that meeting. You're going to ask her lots of questions about your financial status before meeting with him so that you know how to run the conversation. You're going to tell her, "Just so you know, they're going to try to sell us all kinds of thing that I don't want to buy. I'd rather handle the talking so you don't have to deal with the pressure of telling him no. And if we think it's a good idea, you and I can talk about it afterward and just call him back. Don't worry, we can still consider all the options he gives us, I just don't want to be pressured into making the decisions in front of him, so let me handle the conversation." Most girls hate that kind of pressure anyway, so she'll acquiesce.

After the financial planning meeting you come up with a long-term plan using some of the information the adviser gave you, and then tell your wife that the conversation really motivated you and now you want to be more hands-on with the finances and budgeting.

You get the idea from there. But see how gradual that process is, and how it puts the pivot points on external sources so it doesn't look like you're just turning into a control freak? This is how you slide into things rather than going Rambo.

But you better be really stinkin' good with handling the money once you take over, otherwise it's a bad idea to take over the finances in the first place. Be better than she was. Period.

116 - God is a jerk.

3 upvotes · 25 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

He just cares more about people than they care about themselves.

Right. A jerk is someone who ignores other people's thoughts and feelings and imposes their own wants and desires on a situation instead. Because God knows better for us than we know ourselves, he does this as well. It comes off to people as being a jerk. The only people who don't describe God as a jerk are Christians who feel compelled to rationalize God's behaviors with their own moralistic philosophies, which is an unnecessary (even spiritually harmful) task, per my conversation with Dan_M7.

Husband had an affair - seeking feedback

3 upvotes · 23 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

alpha males are tough to crack

From your descriptions of him, it sounds to me like your husband is not alpha. He seems like a dominant beta. I know I planned a post on it at one point, but can't remember if I ever wrote it, on the topic of how dominance/submissiveness is not synonymous with the alpha/beta dynamic. There can be dominant betas and submissive alphas. Military guys are great examples of submissive alphas. Most of them have very alpha mindsets, yet will behave quite submissively within their chain of command. In the reverse, countless wife-beaters are highly dominant, but have extremely beta mentalities about their lives with blue pill ideologies that are at the core of their rage.

As /u/TheChristianAlpha commented, your husband is almost certainly validation-seeking, which is a very beta, blue-pill mind-frame. But his sexual resentment toward you (as you alluded to in another comment) causes him to treat you with a dominant tone - not because he's a dominant person, but because something in him is emotionally hardened against you.

I just haven't been with someone who is humble enough to change, keep frame, and be the leader he needs to be.

A defining trait of blue-pill betas is that they live in constant reaction to those around them. They don't have their own sense of self. The way you describe him, this seems pretty accurate as to him specifically as well. While his reactions may not take the form of complying with your requests, the fact is that his lack of humility, inability to maintain his own frame, and poor leadership qualities are all founded on a reaction to his relationship with you.

I say this not to your blame, as I have no idea if you're unwittingly doing things to cause him to feel this way or not. At the end of the day, he's got to decide to be man enough to create his own frame. You can't lead him into doing it. At best, you can soften yourself enough that it makes it easier for him to make that decision if/when he's ready.

We'll digress to what life was like before we went to couples counseling and disregard all the work we have put in, in the last year to heal our marriage and sexual intimacy

So you found out about his affair last week, but have already been in counseling together for over a year. That says a lot. As I often say, marriage counseling is a joke and does not work unless you have one of the 0.1% of marriage counselors who actually gets it. 90% of marriage counselors will have interesting insights that sound logical and even seem to give epiphany moments, but it's a ruse. If they don't understand the Bible inside and out (and I mean better than 99% of pastors) and they're clueless on the true nature of men and women (i.e. not red pill), the best they can do is put a bandaid on it and hope the wound heals naturally. That's all that most of counseling is: developing coping strategies rather than healing strategies.

And yes, most people do regress, even if they discover real answers to their problems. Why? Because reverting to our old ways is the most comfortable path of least resistance. Only Jesus can enact a permanent change in us by changing our actual self so that our "old way" is no longer the default mode we shrink back into; rather, it becomes something uncomfortable and distasteful. But without someone woke to disciple him, it's unlikely he'll magically get there on his own.

This is mind numbing to how angry this makes me

Right - and you're not alone. Every woman is infuriated by the prevalent cycle.

- Things get bad.
- Husband promises to fix it.
- Changes are made.
- Time goes on and things go back to the way they were.
- Husband promises to change it again.

And so on. This is part of The Hopeless Cycle I wrote about in 403.

He told me if I was going to divorce him that I should wait until our youngest is 18, which is in 2.5 years.

I'm not sure what a divorce would solve, unless you were planning on getting remarried. Of course, most women are not emotionally stable enough to honor the "no remarriage after divorce" concept in Scripture. My mom is the only one I've known. So, if you plan on sinning by marrying someone else, then yes, go ahead and get divorced now and don't feel like you're stuck because he said you couldn't. Chances are, by the time the divorce process is over, you'll be darn close to that 2.5 year mark anyway (it's 18 months in my state, from start to finish, unless you settle sooner).

If you do intend to honor the no-remarriage rule, then separating/divorcing is only valuable if the pain of being together is so great that it would cause you to fall into even greater sin. Just be warned that a separation like that only encourages him to keep sinning with someone else, further ruining the chances of an eventual reconciliation. After all, if he was willing to have sex with another woman while consciously legally married to you, he's certainly going to be willing to have sex with other women once that restraint is removed and he can ignore the spiritual marriage that still remains.

So, now I'm faced with either divorcing or living with a roommate and shutting down all the work that we have put in to try to heal our sexual intimacy

Why do you have to shut everything down?

This is what I don't get at all. I mean, I empathize with the reaction because of the emotionally tense and frail nature of your position ... but think about things from God's perspective.

- How many times have you cheated on God with another idol or false god? It sounds to me like you've already done this with your husband, and I'd be willing to bet there are at least a dozen more (kids, house, money, and other life expectations are common examples), just as I could name several in my own life.
- When you spiritually cheat on God with these things - focusing on reproducing more abundance of those things in your life than on spiritually reproducing with Christ (i.e. evangelism/discipleship), does God become so emotionally distraught that the relationship breaks down and he can no longer function? Sure, you're not

God. But that doesn't change the fact that God still feels - and feels more fully than we ever could. And yet you treat him this way every time he wants to reproduce with you and you're more interested in something else going on in your life.

- And if God has mercy for all the times you spiritually cheat on him, then fully embraces you with open, loving arms, and is still excited at the opportunity to create new spiritual life through - all because of the power of his forgiveness ... doesn't the parable of the unmerciful servant assume you should pass on to your husband, who has committed a lesser (yet categorically identical) sin against you, the same forgiveness, mercy, and grace?

I get that it's hard to get past your emotions. Believe me, in my testimony post I talked about the girl who cheated on me countless times. I know the emotional pain that comes with that, and it's really stinkin' hard to want to look at the other person, let alone touch them, or even kiss them - and much less have sex with them! Yet this is the model that Christ set for us anyway.

... if your husband is genuinely repentant. If he's not repentant about the situation, then there's no room for grace and forgiveness. But you don't get to define the terms of his repentance. Only God can set that. And the determination of his repentance is between him and God, not him and you.

Remember David, who cheated on his wives with Bathsheba, having sex with one of his best friends' wives and then murdering his friend to cover it up, and then getting Bathsheba's son killed as the consequence of all of this? Do you see how horribly he upturned her entire life? And yet in Psalm 51 when David is reflecting on this he writes, "Against you Lord, you only, have I sinned." Why? Because God is in charge of Bathsheba's life, not David. David doesn't owe anything to Bathsheba because he's not beholden to her expectations over his life; he's only beholden to God's expectations. Yes, she was affected by his sin, but if God paid for David's sin in the person of Christ on the cross (which applies past, present, and future, per Romans 4), then Bathsheba has no right to hold that sin against David when God has forgiven it because of David's repentance. Bathsheba's recourse for the wrong done to her is not against David, but through God and his sovereignty over her life. This is why Paul can say things like in Romans 12:19 - "Do not take revenge, my dear friends, but leave room for God's wrath, for it is written: 'It is mine to avenge; I will repay,' says the Lord." If it's an offense against us, how can it be for God to avenge and not us? Because all offenses are against God and not between people, if we are under God. And this really isn't a hard concept to understand because we do it all the time. When a person commits domestic violence, for example, the wife can't the next day claim a right to attack him to make things fair. It's for the state to decide if/how he's guilty and how to punish him - and she has to accept whatever judgment the state makes, whether she likes it or not.

With that blurb in mind, in God's society, which we call the Church, your husband's sin is against God and not against you. That's a bitter pill to swallow and can be tough to wrap your mind around, given how deeply it affects you. But hopefully it makes sense and can give you peace knowing that you can fully love and embrace your husband because God has dealt with his sin so you don't have to. And if God hasn't dealt with it already on the cross, then he certainly will on Judgment Day. Either way, God's got it covered and you can make the most of today.

Older female Virgin

3 upvotes · 15 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good word. This did inspire one more thought:

saying that if an unbeliever leaves that Christians are free to remarry

The remarriage bit is never referenced in that passage. It only authorizes the leaving.

I told my son the other day, "Get off your tablet and go play with your sisters." He asked, What if they won't play with me? I answered, "Then you don't have to play with them."

Sure enough, he goes outside and comes right back inside 2 minutes later and hops on his tablet. "I thought I told you to get off your tablet," I refrained. He answered, You said to play with my sisters and if they wouldn't play back, then I didn't have to play with them. They didn't play back, so now I don't have to play with them.

At what point in there did I say that he could go back on his tablet? Never. He added words that I never put there in order to reach the conclusion that let him do what he wanted. As a result, he was highly motivated to behave in a way that prevented his sisters from wanting to play with him. How do I know? Because I watched out the window when he went out there and saw him picking on them and causing them to tell him to go away.

In the same way, people can add words to Scripture, then create the situation that justifies them doing what they added. A wife wants to get away from an unbelieving husband to marry who she thinks is a better man? Fine. She stays with him, but acts unbearably so that he divorces her and she's free to marry someone else (even though the Bible never added the "and then you can marry someone else" line; she did that).

Compounding into this is the way that my son defied my original command in the first place in order to rationalize his intended result. He never played with his sisters. He picked on them. He disobeyed me and thought that his disobedience would somehow justify to me that he go back on his tablet, which I never authorized him to do. Likewise, women sin by acting disrespectful and unruly toward their husbands so that he will walk away in order to justify remarrying, which God never authorized them to do.

Older female Virgin

3 upvotes · 15 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

That's the common churchy answer, but that's not what 1 Cor. 7 actually says - and the passages on the topic from Jesus are more telling. This has been discussed at length here and the general consensus is that remarriage after divorce is only non-sin when the divorced spouse dies, or is "preferred sin" when the sins you would commit if you remained single indefinitely (i.e. habitual non-marital sex, potential children out of wedlock, etc.) would have a greater impact on your ability to make disciples than the sin of remarriage after divorce.

As I don't have time to go into it, John Piper's article covers about 95% of the relevant content on this:

<https://www.desiringgod.org/articles/divorce-and-remarriage-a-position-paper>

I'm meeting her dad tomorrow. Any advice?

3 upvotes · 9 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This is the correct answer.

I'm meeting her dad tomorrow. Any advice?

3 upvotes · 9 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Don't tell someone to "be yourself" unless you know their "self" is totally awesome. The only other way this advice works is if the dad is so weak that he'd never be able to muster up the strength to say no to the guy his little girl wants. Which is surprisingly common.

Recent Christian, about to just give up on women.

3 upvotes · 2 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

It's not a safe space to vent. But that's because most guys don't need a safe space for that. They can go to a counselor to vent safely. Vent here and we're going to challenge you, push your buttons, and overall push you to be better. It's not a safe space, but it's a good one.

"Aslan is a lion- the Lion, the great Lion."

"Ooh" said Susan. "I'd thought he was a man. Is he-quite safe? I shall feel rather nervous about meeting a lion"

"Safe?" said Mr Beaver ... "Who said anything about safe? 'Course he isn't safe. But he's good. He's the King, I tell you."

Women don't need men anymore. Why women in the west behave as they do.

3 upvotes · 1 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

It's longer than the New Testament

Bobby, you've made this claim several times now. I just did a word count and the new testament is over double the length of the sidebar. Speaking from your gut without checking the facts is a very democrat-like thing of you to do.

Even if it were longer than the New Testament, so is Wayne Grudem's systematic theology - and there's a lot of hit or miss there too. In fact, most Christian books are longer than our sidebar, and many are actually longer than the New Testament. Go pick a bone with the Christian book store. I guarantee you'll find WAY more pages that are non-New Testament than you will here.

more than half of the topics have to do with a female's frame

This tells me you're absolutely clueless about what "frame" means.

the focus should be on developing the man

If you're MGTOW, sure. But many men have different goals. What does it mean to "develop the man"? I could run off a list of people who will tell you the red pill is ultimately sexual strategy, not some circle jerk of men just wanting to be better men. "Develop the man" into what? Into your idea of what a man should be? Into his own idea of what a man should be? Into God's idea?

Does that include having sex? You've had sex, so either you're being a hypocrite or sex is a reasonable desire for a man to have. Is it okay for a man to develop into someone desires sex and is able to achieve it? Or would you have him develop into a man who desires sex, but isn't able to achieve it? That seems counter-productive. And if it's okay to desire and achieve sex as part of a man's development, shouldn't part of "developing the man" mean teaching him how to have sex? And if the man is already satisfied with most other aspects of his development in life except his sexuality, wouldn't it make sense to focus on conversation about how to develop his sexuality over areas where he is already satisfied with his development and progress?

You make these statements assuming that they mean something, but they're just fluff that lead back to the same conclusions contrary to what you think your point is. What you're really getting at is a MGTOW approach to life - that men can only be men if they act on their own independent of female influence - and this is just idiotic. If a girl decides to cut my arm off, she influenced me. I can't "frame" my way out of that influence. Women make up just over half the population of the world - you can't ignore their influence on your life. And the fact that you write these posts talking about the influence women have on the world is counter-intuitive to your very point in the first place. Aren't you writing all of this as a response to what women have done in society? Doesn't that mean that you were in the "meta-frame" of the feminine imperative when you wrote this post because you wouldn't have written it if you truly were free from female influence? And if you accept that you're under female influence as a matter of general fact and not a frame issue, then shouldn't you best figure out how to optimize your life in light of that influence? Sure, you're welcome to try to change it, but complaining on an internet forum can only take you so far.

Unfortunately, when men get that and realize the women are fickle and not worth their investment, they will have buyers remorse.

And yet you still seem to be interested in having women along for the ride yourself.

But again, this is more of a black pill approach, which is wrong. If you want to debate why the black pill is better than the red pill, go to r/purplepilldebate. I've never been there, but I hear they'll entertain this type of discussion. Or if you want to make a post asking why the black pill is wrong, feel free to do that. But don't push black pill sentiment disguised as someone who pretends to understand the red pill when you don't.

What I really see going on here is that you're a blue pill guy who has been jaded. You still want all the fantasy life to be true, but you realize it won't be true, so you've just given up. It's like when my son was 4 and playing with legos. He wanted to make a superman statue with them. He didn't have enough pieces. It was physically impossible to do what he wanted. If you were in his shoes, you would have just given up and said, "Then don't play with legos ever again." My 4-year-old son was smart enough to realize: "I guess if I can't make a superman statue, I'll just make something else that I enjoy instead." Don't be dumber than a 4-year old and assume the only choices are "blue pill fantasy world or bust." If you choose "or bust," that's fine - but don't tell other men that they must as well, otherwise "they will have buyers remorse" or some silly and ridiculous notion like that.

That conclusion only makes sense if you assume the man is blue pill going in - which for you makes sense because you think you understand the red pill, but you're trying to force it into the blue mentality that you just can't get out of your head, so you assume everyone else here is also doing the same thing. That's why you say things like, "It doesn't matter how red pill you are," and then go on about how you think the woman will hold the frame anyway and that she'll always be in power and it will only ever be a charade for a man to lead under current marriage laws. You think these things because you're not actually red pill and have not lived the married man red pill life. You're speculating about what you THINK might be the case, but you're wrong.

I don't want to hear anymore theory from you. I want to hear evidence. If you don't have observable reality about how red pill marriages function, then don't jump to conclusions and share them as if you somehow know your hypothesis is right before you've ever actually tested any of it.

I dare you. Go on MRP and ask the veterans how their marriages are going compared to how they were pre-RP. Ask them how the frame dynamic works in their homes. Ask them if the marriage laws have given their wives all the power in the home. You'll find that the results are extremely different from the message you preach.

The Red Pill & Religion – with Conk & Sam Botta

3 upvotes · 23 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'll have to listen soon. I'm intrigued at your bullet points, though there's clearly a lack of understanding of what the bible actually says here. I really hope they clarify that they're only talking about cultural christianity and not biblical christianity. That is a massive distinction.

I can hold a megaphone and preach from the rooftops that men are better than women and call myself a feminist ... but would I really be a feminist if that were my message? At some point you have to reconcile the fact of a thing with the label that's slapped on it.

Also, there's a difference between what's good for men and what's good for God, or just what's true. The goal here isn't to advance the male agenda. So stinking what if "the church isn't for men"? If it's true and any other way is a path straight to hell, I'll take truth and heaven any day. Let's not let the red pill agenda control the church any more than the feminine imperative does. Let the bible speak for itself. It happens to be "red pill" anyway, so that solution is far more internally consistent and theologically sound in talking "red pill and religion" than trying to impose secular philosophies on interpretation, application and expression of scripture.

Does she trust you to be a man?

3 upvotes · 19 June 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Solid. It took me several months to figure out that distinction between "king of the betas" and "panty dropper." More guys should be made aware that general self improvement alone is not enough.

The Second Kiss of Death

3 upvotes · 19 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Correct. Pair bonding isn't bad. But it has the potential to be dangerous - especially for singles. "Kids with dynamite" and all. Dynamite is incredibly effective, but thre wrong person in the wrong place at the wrong time, not knowing what he's doing, can really hurt a lot of people, including himself.

The Second Kiss of Death

3 upvotes · 19 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

That would make sense if this phenomenon were limited to my post-RP days. If anything, I'd say that this wavering is far more narrow than it used to be, but that's in part because she does step up her game some.

On Marriage And Mission

3 upvotes · 13 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

THIS POST

Shouldn't I ask, "What is YOUR mission?" In the west we are thoroughly individualistic.

Amen! I love the way you addressed this.

nations, not just the individuals who inhabit them

I've always been intrigued by this notion - and I'm guilty in isolating Matthew 28 from Mark 16 too, but the Mark account does more clearly state: "Go into all the world" and not "make disciples of all nations." The harmonious reading would be that we are to go into all nations to make disciples throughout all of them.

Of course, in saying this, I have to eat my own interpretive measure and deal with the fact that Mark 16 says to "preach the Gospel" and not "make disciples."

- Is the harmonious reading here that Matthew was being flippant with the word "disciple" and really meant "make converts," despite all the other times he talks about discipleship throughout his Gospel, and therefore Mark's view of "making converts" is really what Jesus meant/said?
- Or is it more likely that Mark was speaking colloquially about the Gospel as the foundation on which every disciple is made, whereas Matthew was being more specific of Jesus' intent here because it tied to the entire purpose of his book in the first place, as he is writing primarily to a Jewish audience to show how Jesus was the fulfillment of the prophesies of the Jewish Messiah and that he was the embodiment of Jewish law and culture made complete - and therefore Matthew had a reason for giving the specifics that Mark was less interested in and glossed over?

I think the latter.

vast majority of faithful Christians that have walked this earth have been born to Christian parents

Which is why I often refer to discipleship as a form of "spiritual parenting."

Marriage, and the Godly offspring it is intended to produce, is the primary weapon of evangelism wielded by the church.

I wouldn't call it primary, but it's certainly a powerful one. The Holy Spirit is the primary weapon - "Sword of the Spirit" and all, or even the Word of God, which is "sharper than any two-edged sword." Which begs a curious question: if the "Word of God" relates to the Father's communication to man, is that the Father's way of showing dominance over the Spirit that his Word is sharper than any sword? Or if we assume Jesus as the Word, the same question. Silly thoughts, I know ... but fun stuff to ponder all the same.

Paul here is not giving a blanket statement about marriage and singleness that upends God's creation order and consistently favorable disposition towards marriage

I would agree with you if Jesus hadn't affirmed Paul's view in Matthew 19 even before Paul spoke it. Verses 10 - "If this is the situation between a husband and wife [i.e. unfavorable divorce laws], it is better not to marry." Yes, the disciples were the first MGTOWs. 11 - "Jesus replied, 'Not everyone can accept this word, but only those to whom it has been given ... The one who can accept this should accept it.'"

In other words, Jesus is saying, "If it's at all possible to stay single, do it. But most people are too blue pill'd to realize the truth I just gave you, and even if they did hear it they still might reject it because of how culturally conditioned they are. So, the Spirit will have to intervene for some guys who want to have this better way of life."

Jesus was not referring to a unique time in history, but a very broad statement about his views on marriage going forward. Bear in mind that this was certainly not true in the Old Testament. In a pre-Gospel world, I completely agree with you that marriage was a very favorable thing and God encouraged and endorsed it - and appropriately so, as it helped people understand the Christ/church relationship later. It was a living, millennia-long parable. Now we've got the real-deal in Jesus, and he as much as says in this passage, "Stay single if you're someone who can."

fail to grasp the reality that the most important means of spreading the gospel to all nations that God has given the church is the family

Again, I agree that it's incredibly powerful and important. But I wouldn't elevate it to "most important" status. I'd say that if a guy has a family, then he should by all means make use of it. I committed when I married to have at least 4 kids (as I do) because then my wife and I will have multiplied ourselves through our kids - $2 \times 2 = 4$, so when we're gone we've left behind twice as many as we came in with.

My mission ... to disciple people and nations to be brought into God's dominion and kingdom

I love it!

God purposed marriage to achieve great ends; become the kind of man that can lead his family to those ends.

Amen.

FINAL CAUTION

I think there are a couple places where your "marriage is a great weapon" breaks down.

First, it assumes that every married couple will have kids. In that sense, marriage isn't the weapon; rather, child-rearing is. Marriage is simply a context in which that can happen lawfully for Christians.

Second, are you only talking about male Christians? I had a post recently on whether or not women can disciple other women. We don't actually see any examples in the Bible of women being endorsed disciple-makers even over other women. Dalrock certainly thinks they should not be, except as to life-skills. I'm not as persuaded as my post may have implied (a bit of devil's advocacy there), but the point still stands: if we truly take the view that men are the holders and teachers of doctrine in the church, then does that mean that only male children really count in this reproduction game. What does that say of my 1 boy and 3 girl set of kids? What if you have all girls, like my uncle who had 3 of them and no boys?

Third, and more importantly, is that you also assume a Christian's children will also grow up Christian. The statistics on this are quite dismal. One website pulled together several studies on this subject.

Study Findings: Data from the Southern Baptist Convention indicates that they are currently losing 70-88% of their youth after their freshman year in college. 70% of teenagers involved in church youth groups stop attending church within two years of their high school graduation.

Study Findings: 88% of the children in evangelical homes leave church at the age of 18

Study Findings: A majority of twenty-somethings – 61% of today's young adults – had been church-ed at one point during their teen years but they are now spiritually disengaged.

Study Findings: At least half and possibly over two-thirds of Christian young people will step away from the Christian faith while attending a non-Christian college or university. Between 50% and 66.7% of Assemblies of God young people who attend a non-Christian public or private university will have left the faith four years after entering college.

Study Findings: 70% will leave the faith in college. Only 35% eventually return. 7 in 10 Protestants ages 18 to 30 – both evangelical and mainline – who went to church regularly in high school said they quit attending by age 23. 34% of those said they had not returned, even sporadically, by age 30. That means about one in four Protestant young people have left the church.

Book Findings: 63% don't believe Jesus is the Son of the one true God. 58% believe all faiths teach equally valid truths. 51% don't believe Jesus rose from the dead. 65% don't believe Satan is a real entity. 68% don't believe the Holy Spirit is a real entity

Book Findings: 90% of youth active in high school church programs drop out of church by the time they are sophomores on college.

Not exactly on-point, but interesting nonetheless, in an RP forum:

Study Findings: This research, based on the American Religious Identification Survey 2008, addresses the religious beliefs and behaviors of those born from the early to mid-1960s to the late 1970s to early 1980s:

- Generation X has weakened its ties to Christianity (85% in 1990 v. 75% in 2008)
- Generation X has secularized over time. In 1990 11% were Nones compared to 16% in 2008; 13% of Generation X did not identify with a religion (including Don't Know and refusals) in 1990, compared to 21% in 2008

- Generation X Christian groups became more female dominated over time (with the exception of the Protestant Sects) while the Nones and Other Religions became more male dominated.

There are many, many more that I don't have space to include. Sadly, the Baptist Church's response is to blame the schools and develop more "Christian curriculum" to raise kids in.

As I recall, you're only just now pregnant with your first - and I don't mean this to knock you, but as a future-insight you will likely have. As much as I am a discipleship-minded man who raises my kids with prayer and the Word every day and relational life-modeling, etc., I still have concerns over whether or not my children will remain committed to the faith and become disciple-makers in their future. I just don't know. As perfectly as I may execute a plan to raise them this way, I can't control their spirit or force my plan on their future once they're out of my house. One of my kids gives me real cause for concern. Yes, she's only 5 ... but the makings for trouble in her future are there, and I can only do so much to mold and guide her.

Now, I of all people recognize that ~church~ Sunday service attendance means squat. But even a system designed to be as attractive as possible to young people is failing. So one of two things will result from a family discipleship model:

- It will be even more burdensome than the "sit in my pew and come to heaven" approach, so even more children will be repelled when they get out of the house, or
- Jesus's model will defy human logic, so parents who actually disciple their kids will find them continuing in the faith and making disciples.

Gravitational Centers - A Case Study on the MRP Journey

3 upvotes · 12 June 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Fuzzies = the relational things women say they're attracted to in a man, which make them feel warm and happy.

Tingles = the things women are actually attracted to in a man, which make them feel horny.

As I noted, it's not a perfect graph because if tingles are low enough, no amount effort to produce fuzzies will actually make her happy, so that red zone should actually stretch across the page ... among other things. Maybe I'll tweak it sometime in the future.

Gravitational Centers - A Case Study on the MRP Journey

3 upvotes · 12 June 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Fair enough.

Gravitational Centers - A Case Study on the MRP Journey

3 upvotes · 12 June 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The same color as her soul: black.

Struggling with my faith

3 upvotes · 10 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

My question here is, why do I not see these?

Most people assume miracles are dependent on the faith of the person performing the miracle. This is false. Mark 6:5 notes that Jesus "could not do any miracles there [in his hometown], except lay his hands on a few sick people and heal them." Are we to suggest that Jesus lacked the faith to perform the miracles? No. The people around him lacked the faith to receive them, as he explained in the previous verse.

Jesus was from Nazareth. It was his hometown. They knew him. He grew up there. When he outed himself as the Messiah, they didn't believe him because they thought they knew better. America is known throughout the world as a "Christian country." As much hogwash as that may be, America has known Christianity for a long time. We have a history together. When Christians proclaim to the country the miraculous wonders God can perform, they don't believe because Americans think they know better.

It follows that in America we "could not do any miracles [here], except lay [our] hands on a few sick people and heal them." And yes, these healings do occur.

As someone who laid down everything to Jesus (and lost my family because of it) I feel there should be some powerful evidence there

Notice that most of Jesus' miracles happen because someone approaches him with faith.

- The man at the pool cries out for the Son of David.
- The lame man is lowered through the roof to get to Jesus.
- The blind man asks to be healed.
- The centurion seeks Jesus to ask for healing for his daughter.
- The woman in the crowd touches Jesus's cloak and is healed even without Jesus intending to heal her!

How many people have approached you because they believed you could perform a miracle?

I'm sorry to hear about your mom and the difficulties your family has endured. I guess my point in this response is to take the pressure off of you. It's not about you. The lack of miracles present in your life isn't because you have somehow failed or lacked faith, but because the people around you aren't ready or willing to receive the good works God can do.

I certainly have seen miracles performed. I knew a family whose dead baby was brought back to life after two doctors a month apart confirmed the baby's death in utero (yes, she was almost a month past her due-date when going into labor). I've personally been healed and on two occasions have done the healing. These things do happen and they are for real. But they're not common. Even Paul feared for Epaphroditus when he was ill - and both of them were loyal, faithful followers of Christ who believed. Why wasn't he healed instantly? God had some other purpose - no doubt part of which was to teach us (the church throughout the rest of time) this exact lesson. But now I'm rambling. I hope this helps.

Going to be a father. Resources?

3 upvotes · 17 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Late to the party on this post, but here's what I came up with when in your shoes.

The Purpose of Parenting

You can't measure your success as a parent if you don't know what your goals are as a parent. These goals are neither overly broad ("I want him to grow up to be a godly man") or overly specific ("I want him to be a cardiovascular surgeon by the age of 35"). They are informed by the way God has parented us.

The world will tell you that the goal of parenting is simply to have an emotionally positive relationship with your children. If they walk out the door at the age of 18 knowing that you love them and are proud of them - no matter whether they deserve it or not, then you will have succeeded. This is total garbage. I study child psychology literally every single week and review the research. It's part of my job in knowing how to approach custody cases.

The evidence is just not there. It sounds good to emotionalist liberals, but there are countless people who felt loved by their parents who still wound up leading very unsuccessful, unfulfilled lives, struggling with depression, loneliness, unable to connect in a community, lacking meaningful romantic relationships, etc.

God does not tell us that a person is mature when they feel loved by him. Rather, he says through Paul: "Let those of us who are mature think this way, and if in anything you think otherwise, God will reveal that also to you. Only let us hold true to what we have already attained. Brothers, join in imitating me, and keep your eyes on those who walk according to the example you have in us" (Phil. 3:15-17).

That is, maturity comes from learning how to live in the example of our parents - and it is made complete when we no longer need our parents, though we may certainly still want them around. I don't take this to mean every single detail of our lives, just as Jesus doesn't compel all men to take up carpentry as their career. But it does mean that maturity comes from developing the same driving force in our life as our parents, which Paul explains in the preceding verse: "I press on toward the goal for the prize of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus." That is where spiritual maturity comes from - when we can emulate this "straining forward to what lies ahead" (v14) and an orientation toward achieving clear life goals. The same should be true of earthly maturity: that our children recognize their parents' goals and are able to strive to achieve the mission set out for the - which only works productively if we get our goals from God.

While I don't know much about what he teaches generally, I did read a book on parenting by Chip Ingram. The entire foundation of his book was that the primary purpose of parenting is to teach children how to obey. If they can learn to obey you, they can learn to obey God. I find it hard to argue with that conclusion - especially given all the talking I do about the parallel between the tangible and the spiritual. Just as tangible parenting helps us understand spiritual parenting with those we disciple, so also does being parented for a child by their physical father help them understand how to be spiritually parented by their Father.

In short, my goal as a parent is to teach my children how to obey and to give them a purpose bigger than their own self-interests that they can pursue, which will make a difference for eternity - a purpose that my Father passed down to me through my physical parents and through the man who God used to give me spiritual life.

Get on board with a purpose for your parenting and orient everything around that. As always: Mission matters, nothing else.

Methodology

With my stated goal above, how do I go about accomplishing this? Here are some practical tips that will mostly apply over a long period of time, and not necessarily during the first year of your child's life.

First, Kids are born believing that they are the center of the universe. They're not. Have your own agenda and let them know consistently: "You are important to me, but you're not the most important thing to me, and I do not orient my life around you."

Second, boys in particular get stifled enough by society as-is. They have ambitions and desires and crazy ideas that are totally risky and unsafe. Everyone tells them they shouldn't be this way and that they should just chill out and avoid these adventurous pursuits. This is how boys become feminized. Learning to obey the word "no" is crucial to a boy, but it must also be well-placed. If you can waken his adventurous spirit by finding a way to say "yes," then do it. For example: my son wanted to play with a hammer once. My wife immediately said no. It's really dangerous. He could break himself or something else. Makes sense, right? Don't let kids play with grown-up tools. Screw that. "Yes, you can play with the hammer - just wait until I can do it with you." See how easy that is? Adventurous spirit alive, appropriate cautions taken.

Third, do things WITH your children, not just FOR them or merely telling them what to do or how to do it. I defer back to 208 as the simplified methodology of disciple-making I see in Jesus life:

- Tell them what. Verbally explain to your children who you are and what you expect of them - both in the moment and on broader life goals. This is only the first step because it's probably the least important of all of them.

- Show them how. Actually do things in front of them or show them through guided motions. A classic example is when the guy wraps his arms around a girl to show her how to swing a baseball bat. For my kids, when teaching them how to walk, I'd physically grab their legs and move them in walking motions so they would start to learn. When playing tether ball with my son, I show him how to hit the ball at the right angles to go over the other kids' heads by doing it in front of him.
- Let them try. Once you've shown them, give them a chance. With the tether ball example, he used to want to hit the ball up to go over someone's head. Makes sense to a kid: hit it up to make it go up. After telling him how tension on the rope will cause the ball to swing up if you hit it down, then showing him how it worked, suddenly he understood it and was able to hit the ball effectively on his own.
- Send them out. After they're competent doing something, you can stop supervising. They should be able to function on their own. My son can go play tether ball with other kids on the playground and employ the strategies I taught him even without me being there to remind him.
- Pass it on. As a person begins to excel at something, others start to follow them and want to learn from them. My 7yr old son got really good at folding paper into boomerangs and ninja throwing stars. He gets so excited to show me the new ones he makes after school. Other kids saw him doing it and wanted to learn, so now he's teaching other kids how to do it too. This is beautiful. I didn't have to arrange for this - but there are many things where I do have to be intentional about ensuring my son passes on the things I've taught him to other people. "Do you have any friends who don't know Jesus? Wouldn't it be great if they loved Jesus too? Wouldn't it be cool if you got to be the one to show them how to be like Jesus?"

Fourth, when in doubt, look to how the Father parented humanity. I used to be harsh against legalists. I now understand the value in it - especially as a parent. In humanity's early days, God crafted a covenant of legalism: follow my commands and I'll bless you. Paul later reveals that God never intended legalism, but that humanity without the Spirit and absent the cross was too blind to understand the full picture of God's relationship with his people. My kids are too young to grasp the way I want to relate with them. So, I have to use clear rules and boundaries to create a safe context for them to be able to love and relate with me appropriately. They don't understand why they must clean their room - only that they must do it. As much as I can explain that it's character-building to let them take responsibility for a small domain I've given them, they just can't grasp that concept intellectually yet. So, the law it is. As they mature, my 7yr old son can now understand bits and pieces of the reason behind the rules I place - that the rules are there both for his benefit and my good pleasure. To that end, embrace the fact that legalism, while not an end-goal or even a present interest, is still a practically valuable tool for parenting purposes.

Fifth, controlled emotional expression can be very valuable. I firmly believe that we, as humans, do not have the capacity to infuriate God. He does not emotionally react to us, as if I could flip off the sky and somehow he'd get all fiery-eyed. Yet we see examples of God becoming angry at human behavior all the time. Is God losing frame when this happens? I never understood this until I became a parent. This happens about every other night. My kids are sent to bed, but keep getting out of bed. It's usually for stupid stuff like, "I bumped my hand on the wall. Can I get a bandaid?" No, you cannot have a bandaid if you're not bleeding. It's silly kid stuff. Sometimes my wife and I just laugh - amused mastery. But I'm not trying to get my kids sexually attracted to me; I'm trying to get them to obey me. So, amused mastery isn't always the best strategy at developing obedience. Know what is? Daddy gives a stern look and starts walking slowly toward them. They think, "I made Daddy mad! I better get back into bed before he spansks me!" Was I actually mad? No. But I certainly needed to show them that side of me so they can develop a healthy fear that leads to obedience - and then I am well pleased with them when they stay in bed after that.

And I'm out of room ...

Women Feeling Threatened by Hyper-Sexualized Social Media

3 upvotes · 1 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Yes, I think we're defining the feminine imperative differently. Feminists today would not read Proverbs 31, accounting for the entire cultural context, and conclude that this is what they're striving for. As I understand, they'd say that's what they're running from.

Raiders of the Lost Covenant

3 upvotes · 21 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This is a truly interesting article. I always love reading your stuff, especially when it comes from unique angles that aren't often talked about in RP circles. While my time is limited, let me hit some highlights. Although I understand that your book addresses religion in general, I'm going to reply purely from the Christian biblical perspective (as opposed to the Christian cultural, which the article demonstrates you're already familiar with).

I would still never remarry were I to find myself single tomorrow – I simply cannot endorse marriage, as it exists today, as a good idea for any young man. Remember, this is coming from a guy with a damn good marriage.

I've made remarkably similar comments in the past as well. While my intimate knowledge of marriage law may contribute to this conclusion, the Bible independently leads me to this view as well.

Covenant marriage presumes a mutual religious reverence and understanding of what is expected of a man and a woman before they enter into marriage

While this may be true of the cultural Christianity model, the Bible doesn't make any such prerequisite in the formation of a marriage. While I would still use the word "covenant," the Bible is extremely relaxed on what constitutes a covenant. For example, in Exodus 22:16-17 we see that when two people have unmarried consensual sex, even though they did not intend marriage, the option of marriage must be presented. The implication is that God views the two as married already (i.e. spiritual marriage), which is what triggers the option for a transactional exchange with the woman's father (i.e. legal/contractual marriage). That's not to imply that these laws are still "on the books," so to speak, but that's a much larger conversation.

Why marry at all if what you're taking away from it is nothing you can't get outside of marriage without the risk?

Right, but this goes to the underlying premise of the blue pill mentality in the first place, right? What a blue pill man gets out of marriage is not sex, service, support, etc., but the hope that his fantasies in these things might actually come true. There is a power in this ill-placed hope that makes the blue pill so alluring to people that they not only are blind to the red pill, but even those who are aware despise it.

This reminds me of a case where my client's husband exercised stock-purchase options in his company. It was a closely held corporation, so he was honored when they offered him the right to buy-in a 20% interest. He paid FMV. Turns out it was a sinking ship and the partners were trying to unload their interest before the next company valuation, which would have reflected the downturn. The poor guy bought the stock on the hope that being an invested partner would yield a greater result. What's a guy to do? Either he gave his goods and let the other parties walk away scot-free, or he buckled down and saved the company to realize the gains on his investment while the other parties free-loaded on his efforts, him resenting them all the while.

Sound familiar? The constantly devaluing "golden ticket" is the sinking ship.

And for the premarital sex mindset it's the only game in town if they want sexual access.

Biblically, there are a couple ways to take this.

- Per the Exodus passage, above, when sex occurs, an offer of marriage must follow. This is somewhat different from the assumption that an offer of marriage must come first with the sex to follow (at least insofar as a man's ideologies may compare to reality).
- This phrase also assumes that a man's want of sexual access would compel him to make an intentional effort of seeking a bride to wed. Philosophically, this is a logical leap to make, but it is still contrary to the theological compulsion of Scripture, so you're speaking only about those men who claim to adhere to theological truth while operating on philosophical principles for decision-making in their own lives.

it serves a purpose to convince oneself that a man's spouse is necessarily on the same page as they are with respect to his idealistic concept of love (versus a woman's opportunistic concept of love)

Assuming you've never heard my story, this was the exact situation that led to my marriage. Several years in, my wife admitted openly: "I lied to you about who I was - my sexuality, my spirituality, etc. - in order to get you to marry me." I know many men who can empathize, though their wives have proved less honest (or self-aware) with admitting to what I now see as a shamefully common trope.

he leads with his Emotional Process rather than his Rational Process.

Interestingly, even men in the reverse are not immune if their rational process has a low ceiling. I have met a couple men in the last few months who married because they believed it was the wise thing to do, given influence from church culture (in the absence of their own personal examination of the Bible), even though they felt no emotional passion toward the woman. Both ended up divorced very quickly after.

he wasn't willing to somehow give up on the heroic fight to reform the 'Contractual' marriage

Heroic or idiotically wasteful ... six or half a dozen. I'm all for legal reform, but the Bible only predicts the degradation of society, not a revival of godly principles among secular laws.

To assume a spiritual bond somehow requires acknowledgement from a secular government is nothing short of what should be the most offensive word to spew at any person who claims to follow a religious text: eisegesis.

This has been a constant theme among the Pastors and church leaders I've been interviewing

I'm not surprised, but exceptions do exist. I recently red pill'd one of my pastors. Sadly, he was fired by the head pastor after less than a year because his ideologies didn't line up with the prevailing church culture. Oops, I guess exceptions don't exist ... at least not for long. No, I don't attend that congregation anymore.

Churches are business franchises today

While I don't disagree in premise, as a matter of unpopular semantics, there's a difference between congregations that we culturally call "churches" and what the Bible actually defines as the church. Your thoughts only reflect those who are following the cultural definition.

For example, Underground Church, by Brian Sanders, goes into great detail about how he has formed a "church network" that does not depend on finances. As such, his ministry throughout Tampa, FL is not dependent on appeasing anyone to maintain a revenue stream. I follow a similar model of ministry that requires even less budget than he has, and I'd expect our numbers are not vastly different. This model frees leaders from the constraints that force them to appease the feminine imperative. That doesn't mean all such leaders will reject the feminine imperative (even Brian Sanders embraces female leaders, for example); rather, that leaders can decide for themselves without financial constraints how they interpret the Bible and lead their people.

to ensure their Pastor is on 'team woman'

Oh, like when the head pastor of the congregation I just left once preached, "If Jesus were alive today, he'd be tweeting, 'I support #metoo!'?"

"You should've married a 'real' Christian woman" excuses are something I encounter a LOT from Christian church leaders

Sadly, it's something I've had to fight against regularly even on RPC. There are two ways this plays out:

- There are the cases like mine. I'm confident I was better at vetting when single than any of the guys I've yet met on RPC. But no amount of vetting could have seen through my wife's intentional and openly-acknowledged deception to get that ring.
- I have also known countless cases where the "real deal" happens to change after the wedding. All women are subject to change.

I simply cannot win the "God says so" clause

Nor should you. If God is real and did say so, wouldn't that be determinative? Nevertheless, as I have often proclaimed here: the secular red pill is merely just now discovering from observation what God said through theological revelation long ago. That is, God most certainly DID NOT "say so," as to the many things you're likely hearing from these pastors when they say that phrase. For example:

"It doesn't matter if contractual marriage is one of the worst decisions a man can make today – "God says you should marry."

1. The God of the Bible never actually says this.
2. Jesus says in Matthew 19:12, when the apostles suggest that it's better for a man not to marry: "The one who can accept this should accept it."
3. In 1 Cor. 7 Paul refrains numerous times that it is better not to marry.

Overall, excellent article. While you've hit the nail on the head with regard to mainstream religious culture, there are a few pockets of exception that I've found - many produced through my own ministry, but some even naturally occurring (Dalrock being a great example). These people often part ways with the cultural congregations that dominate the scene, but are significant nonetheless.

I'd be curious if your book presents only the mainstream view, or acknowledges the existence of the rising minority as an actual (perhaps only?) expression of the church. For example, is someone like Dalrock merely reference material, or does his ministry have credibility in your book as an entity to itself? While I'm sure you're unaware of the things branching out of RPC (as I have yet to disclose most of them publicly), would your book assume that groups like us do not exist simply because the mainstream has attempted to monopolize the word "church" under the prevailing cultural model?

I suppose my curiosity here is more in how well you understand ecclesiology and if your book will primarily be targeting a structure that doesn't fit even the most basic bones of biblical ecclesiology in the first place.

Are Christian women really different?

3 upvotes · 12 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

No. You can remain single without being a whiny tard. Don't go MGTOW.

What's your perspective on tunnel vision within the context of dating?

3 upvotes · 8 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

What you think you like is often different than what you actually like

That reminds me of a great Seinfeld episode, where Jerry meets Janeane Garofalo. She's just like him - a female Jerry. He falls in love and it's not long before they're engaged. But as things go south, he breaks it off, saying, "I don't know what I was thinking. I hate myself! How could I ever be married to someone like me?"

Masturbation when your wife withholds: Go, or no-go?

3 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I decided to separate the comments on your post from the theological issues that I'd address separately. Here's what I think on what you wrote; check my latest post for more on the theological nature of the topic.

Great conversation material here. Props for posting it.

when I ask if we can have sex

"Can we have sex tonight?" is not the best way to initiate. There are at least two reasons for this:

- By leaving the decision up to her, you're creating a framework in your home that she holds all the power over sex. She decides if/when you have sex. You're like a child asking for a cookie that only his mother can give. This is a horrible frame to establish. Don't feel bad, it's the one society implicitly compels, so it's quite common, and something I lived through in my pre-RP days.
- If you're asking her for permission, you're implicitly giving her permission to say no. By framing it as a question, you're giving her two options and implying that both options are legitimate. She then has plausible deniability: "You asked a question, I answered. What did you expect?"

The better way to initiate is by revving the engine (check my married man game posts, also employ kino, have conversation on sexy topics, etc.) and then starting the process.

If she cuts you off, it comes from a different place. Instead of answering "no" to a question, now she's being defiant against your leadership. She may have good reason for being defiant (although that may or may not justify it), but at least you're putting her in a frame of mind that she must make a decision to follow or rebel. There's no room for plausible deniability here. No room for her hamster to rationalize why it's okay to have denied you. With a question, she's not denying you. When you put the moves on and she pushes you away, she is denying you. Keep the onus for the sexual dysfunction in the relationship on her, not on ambiguity and permissive denial.

conditions for sexuality

You can't negotiate attraction. Women will tell you it's possible. It's not. You can only negotiate behavior, which is what she's trying to do. "If you give me emotions, I will give you my behaviors" - and implicitly, "but even then you still won't have my heart." She won't want sex. She's not attracted to you. Women who are attracted to their husbands don't negotiate with sex as a tool - they negotiate to get sex from their husbands, not to give it.

it puts me in pretty toxic mindset

The reason is usually that you're too emotionally invested. Do you have better things to do in life? If so, then there's no reason to be upset when she denies you - because you can go do those things. If not, then that's why she's denying you in the first place.

If a woman is designed to be a helpmate, then is she destined to be married?

3 upvotes · 4 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

That's one of many. Materialism is another huge one. How many mega churches do you see with massive projectors, stages, huge buildings, etc.? Ironically, the churches with the most resources are the most prone to operate on a scarcity mentality - while they have lots of resources, they have lots of expenses as well, catering their services away from the mission of the Gospel and toward what keeps the money flowing so they can maintain their massive budgets.

This is one of the things I'm talking about often with my red pill pastor (executive pastor, not head pastor), as he believes the church should switch to an abundance mentality built through crowd-sourcing rather than asset-accumulating, much like the difference between Uber and Taxi companies.

- Uber: Doesn't own a single car. Drivers not official employees. They make money by using other people's assets.
- Taxi: Must purchase lots of cars. Must pay lots of employees. Makes money only on the net after expenses are paid.

Switching this up:

- Modern Church: Spends money on buildings, aesthetics, coffee, staff, etc. in order to bring people to a focal center each week.
- Networked Church: Core, central leadership team works on a minimal budget (office space rent) with no significant expenses, training leaders and sending them out to build their own communities of believers (i.e. churches) in their homes, at coffee shops, public parks, at the gym, etc., essentially repurposing the expenses people are already paying to be used for God's purposes, thereby crowdsourcing the expense without actually increasing anyone's bottom-line by much at all - and the money that is tithed, after covering the salaries of the reduced staff, goes toward actual needs like world missions, assisting the poor, a benevolence fund for people in the church network in need, etc. rather than remodeling a foyer or buying new fancy chairs.

I've mentioned it before, but the book Underground Church references this networking church idea, as the author is actually living this out in Florida right now, having thousands of people within the church network. When they need to meet corporately, they rent a space or find a public location able to accommodate them (like a park) rather than paying millions of dollars on a mortgage to maintain a building to accommodate everyone.

Long story short, the modern church has bought into the materialism of first world countries by assuming we must be fancy and impressive in order to accomplish God's work. In reality, this merely placates people and forces the great commission from "GO make disciples of all nations" to "Hope all the nations come to you to be made into disciples." In other words, money is the biggest idol of the church.

And it's no surprise. What's the feminine imperative right now? Women just sit back and wait for men to come running over. That's how the sexual marketplace works. And how often do we see the bride of Christ say, "Jesus, come to us, join us in our presence, meet us here"? All the stinkin' time. In reality, the bride is meant to GO to her husband and the purposes he calls her.

How idiotic would it be if I told my wife to give the kids a bath and she sits in the living room and says, "Kids, come here so I can give you a bath"? Even worse - what if the kids don't want a bath? They're not going to come. The bath isn't going to get done. My wife is going to end up yelling and screaming. I'm going to confront her about it and say, "Why haven't you given them a bath yet?" She's going to say: "Didn't you hear me? I've been shouting at them all day to come here so I can wash them, but they're not coming. This job you gave me is hard work, and I'm trying my best."

That's what the church is doing to Jesus. I would, of course, tell my wife: "If they don't come to you, then go get them!" That's the easy, obvious answer. But it's an answer the church isn't willing to take. "Don't bring them to the living room to get a bath. Take them to the tub." Church buildings are like the living room - that's not where sanctification happens. It might be where people get motivated to be cleansed, but the cleaning actually happens out in the world, as we live out the work God starts in us. At best, even if my wife did get the kids to come to her in the living room, she could only take off their clothes and get them ready for the bath ... at some point she still has to leave her comfy chair.

This is all more stream of conscious typing, going well beyond the scope of your question ... so I'll just stop there.

A question that I get sometimes from non-believers

3 upvotes · 3 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

/u/cogmob gave the correct reference to answer your question: Romans 1:18-20. People are without excuse because God has already revealed himself through creation.

It's also useful to know that God judges each person according to what they have been given. Luke 12:48 is also on point here: "But the one who did not know, and did what deserved a beating, will receive a light beating. Everyone to whom much was given, of him much will be required, and from him to whom they entrusted much, they will demand the more."

Then there's the parable of the talents, where the one given 5 was expected to produce 5, the one given 10 expected to produce 10, and the one given 1 was expected to produce only 1, and was punished for not even doing that. Or the parable of the unmerciful servant, where the man forgiven of much was expected to forgive as well. The one who has the entire Bible at his fingertips is expected to know and live by the entire Bible. The one without the Bible will only be expected to know and live by what God has revealed through creation - which is quite a bit, if you grasp the fact that the world was without written Scripture for thousands of years, yet still followed God during every age throughout human history - and the fact that most of the Psalms, Proverbs, and Song of Songs is written from an understanding of creation.

Similarly, as /u/helaughsinhidden brought up the issue of babies who die without knowing, Jesus says in John 9:41, "Jesus said to them, 'If you were blind, you would have no guilt; but now that you say, 'We see,' your guilt remains.'" This is reiterated by Paul in Romans 5:13, "for sin indeed was in the world before the law was given, but sin is not counted where there is no law."

For non-Jews, Paul explains: "For when Gentiles, who do not have the law, by nature do what the law requires, they are a law to themselves, even though they do not have the law. They show that the work of the law is written on their hearts, while their conscience also bears witness, and their conflicting thoughts accuse or even excuse them" (Romans 2:14-15). Children are incapable of this inherent understanding of the law and aborted babies do not have the ability to express a conscience.

Also, I got to play with my miscarried child for half an hour, so I know she's in heaven ;)

A question that I get sometimes from non-believers

3 upvotes · 3 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

what they 'would have Been had they Not been mentally ill.'

They would have still been sinners. This statement assumes that in the absence of their mental illness they somehow could have been good enough to warrant being saved.

What examples of F.R. are relevant here?

3 upvotes · 1 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

A field report is meant to be an experiment-result-conclusion story that shows a positive result. We're all instinctively familiar with what doesn't work in the world, so we want to "swap notes" about what does.

As /u/helaughsinhidden noted:

- If you had a difficult patch in your marriage and you tried something new that made things better, report on what you did and how it affected things.
- If you were feeling spiritually impotent and tried sharing your faith in a new way tell us what the change was and how it affected your evangelism and discipleship capacity.
- If your kids have been obnoxious and unruly and you tried a new parenting strategy that managed to get them under control, tell us what you tried and how that was the vehicle for their change.
- If you've been struggling to get a date and tried something different from your past habits and suddenly you have 3 dates lined up, what was the different thing you tried?

For many guys, this "different" thing will be the things they learned here. This reaffirms to people that what we discuss actually works. The rest of the Christian world would rather work on theory and philosophy than on pragmatic reality. The more we can prove our methods with tested results, the better.

But unlike the secular subs, I believe our understanding of intersexual relational dynamics is an open canon. While they may teach that they have already figured out the best way and any new information is frowned upon, I believe that there is room for intuition and trying new strategies that no one has thought of before. Many of them will likely fail, but some will succeed. We want to hear about those successes, give others an opportunity to try them out as well, and see if repetition breeds similar results - and if not, figure out why one man got a different result from another.

That's how FRs work.

Gentlemen, we should take more risks - We are god's people!

3 upvotes · 26 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This is a solid reminder. I'm very much in favor of risk taking. While you allude to it, let me just be clear: the risks should be oriented toward disciple-making. "Seek first His Kingdom (i.e. advance it by adding more disciples and training them to be leaders in his Kingdom) and all these things will be added to you as well" - such as safety, security, basic provision, finances, etc.

While you have taken some more heat in this post than I would have expected, I'm impressed with your positive attitude toward the criticism. Keep trucking, brother.

Biblical marriage vows

3 upvotes · 26 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good stuff, for the most part. Just some things to consider:

- I don't see anything in here about sexual denial or the importance of sexuality to your marriage covenant. If you want to sound all official-like you could say something like: "And as we consecrate these vows tonight, I vow to consecrate them to you every night and will not deprive you when you seek." 1 Cor. 7:5 is a good reference for that one. Your reference to 7:4 is weak, stopping short of the real meat there - and she could interpret "I give my body to you" in any other number of ways that would allow her to still deny you without breaking her vow. While I agree with /u/Deep_Strength that self-made vows are ultimately meaningless because she's going to break them anyway, that doesn't mean yo should make it easy on her by giving her plausible deniability - something women always look for in the first place. If it's there, she'll sniff it out and find it.
- I also don't see any references to your actual mission. As /u/WarriorJesus1915 noted, you should clarify that she is to join you on your mission, just as you joined Christ on his. I would specifically spell this out by quoting the great commission in some capacity: "make disciples of all nations." This might be more of a challenge for you, if you haven't really adopted a clear mission yet or you don't even know what it means to make disciples (most likely because you are stuck with everyone else in assuming Jesus meant the church's vague notion of disciple-making rather than the specific strategy Jesus was referring to).
- I don't see anything in here about the purpose of marriage. Malachi 2:15 says that the purpose of marriage is "to produce godly offspring." In light of the Gospel and passages like Romans 2 and 9, we now understand that the physical offspring of the old testament were a parallel to the spiritual offspring we would have through Christ. As such, the purpose of marriage is to make disciples (per the above), producing spiritual children, just as Paul called his disciples his "children" and Jesus said of those who were his disciples that they had to be "born again" as spiritual babies (Paul also references spiritual infancy). The physical children you will likely have are a guide meant to help you understand how to bear and raise spiritual children. This needs to be in there.

I'm out of time, but I hope that helps. These are just the most important things about marriage, so I wanted to make sure you didn't somehow miss them in your wedding. This all needs to be spelled out to a woman up-front, otherwise she will kick and scream: "This isn't what I signed up for" when you start living these things out.

Solving a Foundational Problem on This Sub: Enabling Closet Bloops

3 upvotes · 15 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I agree - but I'll note two things:

1. You have to get the speck out of your own eye first. If you're a raging glutton with 35% body fat and struggle with sloth in the way you play on your phone all day instead of getting stuff done ... that's a pretty huge plank in your own eye that needs to be addressed first. So, this advice only works if the guy is already conformed to at least a basic degree of biblical masculinity.
2. When communicated, it needs to be done tactfully. Most guys who use this verse do it in the heat of an argument as an expression of their butthurt. That's not the way Jesus taught us to go about confronting someone about their sin in Matthew 18.

Breaking the Nice-Guy: Take Ownership, Ask For Help

3 upvotes · 13 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm having a hard time treating her with love as my wife/helper when she shows so little desire to invest in me and our family

That's because you shouldn't be treating her with love as your wife/helper if she's not acting like a wife/helper (at least as far as classic understandings of the word "love" go). The Lord disciplines those he loves. Is that incorporated into your definition of love? Or how does God respond to believers who are engaged in habitual, unrepentant sin? Is that incorporated in your definition of love in that God is love and everything he does is, by definition, loving?

To be clear, God doesn't yell and scream and stomp his fists as a form of discipline anymore - though he may have done that a select few times in the Old Testament when humanity was still in its infancy/childhood phase. Do contemplate the ways God interacts with his people in the New Testament and do likewise.

How should I respond when I ask for her help and she complains and says 'No' or says yes and just doesn't follow through?

If she says no, I start with a playful threat of punishment. "Aw, my little girl likes to say no? Maybe a spanking is in order." Wink, pat her butt, and say, "Get to it." This works most of the time.

If she still says no and puts a hard stop by refusing to do something, shift the playfulness to: "Not cool. I need your help on this. I can't handle everything myself. Are you my helper or not?" Usually she'll cave, but the times she doesn't she'll respond with something like, "I'm your helper, not your slave. Do it yourself." If you get that reply, maintain a positive demeanor, decide whether or not it's important enough for you to do it on your own, and proceed to making yourself less available for her. After all, her non-contribution is soaking up more of your time. That's going to come out of her time with you, not your free time.

To be clear: ever hear your wife or any woman say, "Maybe I'd have more time and energy for sex if I didn't have to do blah, blah, and blah"? That's a woman's way of conditioning her time and availability to you on your compliance. As the leader, she is the one whose compliance should be evaluated, not yours, so this is just turning the tables to be upright instead of legs up.

Am I going about this all wrong?

See above.

Do I need to keep being steady and taking care of everything I can?

Yes, as above.

Maybe this is a result of years of conditioning the wrong way... I was a sorry BP

Most likely. Mix in the fact that she's a sinner too and you'll probably be closer to the truth.

and now it will take years to undo the damage?

Ball-park: 1 month for every year of marriage. For feminists and intellectually superior women, even longer.

The submissive wife

3 upvotes · 13 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Haha. I appreciate the humor. But I have found that men will eventually get these things done - they just do it on a different threshold than women. A man's threshold for cleanliness is lower than a woman's, so if she waits he'll pretty much never do it in her time-line, but it will still get done when it crosses his threshold ... unless he's a hoarder.

Breaking the Nice-Guy: Take Ownership, Ask For Help

3 upvotes · 13 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Funny, that's what I say too. My wife does have a nook ;)

Breaking the Nice-Guy: Take Ownership, Ask For Help

3 upvotes · 12 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Why would it be wrong to bring new people to church every week? My college discipler came to christ because a girl he liked invited him to go to a service with her. I'm still against evangedating, but I think you get the point.

Submissive behaviour

3 upvotes · 12 March 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

Yes! u/RedPillWonder wrote a fantastic post on the r/RPChristians sidebar in the "for singles" section directed toward women. I do believe he has another 2 part series addressing vetting from both genders' perspectives - part 1 was written in the last week or two, which should address the "options" part (i.e. what a guy vets for) and part 2 will be about what women should vet for. My post history also has a couple posts directed toward women that might be helpful.

My First Successful Fitness/Comfort Test [FR]

3 upvotes · 7 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm going to make it so ridiculous that she can't possibly top it - and I'm going to come off super proud of it. Just straight up irrational, goofy, dumb, silly, and perhaps a twinge obnoxious Right on. This is what we call cocky-funny, mixed with AA.

"I'm not happy" signal

The way you word this is important. There's a difference between: "You're not making me happy" or "You're making me unhappy" and "I'm not happy." I'm not sure which one was really the problem here, but if she's focused more on her own feelings than your misbehavior, then you're right for treating this as a comfort test.

I was still having fun even if she wasn't

If more guys could have this attitude ... so many marriages would be saved.

if you don't want a hug - that's fine" and meaning it!

"And meaning it!" That's the key. You're not pouting. You're not playing the martyr. You're not guilt tripping her. You're just giving her space and being internally stable.

"You could ask me to stand up in a nicer way."

This is funny to me. You're literally laughing and playing with her to get her to stand up, reaching down to pick her up yourself in a light-hearted mood. I'm not sure how much nicer it could get. Her hamster is spinning, looking for some other way to rationalize being mad at you despite the fact that you already did address it in a nice way.

shutting up is usually my best option. So I ignored the comment and kept working, acting like she hadn't said anything.

Right on - not passive-aggressive silence that says, "I don't want to talk to you when you're like that." It's a silence that screams: "If you want my attention, I'm here, but you're going to have to work for it."

I just wrapped her up in my arms and rubbed her back with my hands - a bunch of knots - and we stayed that way for a good minute or two

No words. Just feels.

She melted and was immediately happy the rest of the night. It was as if the incident never happened

Right on. This is the result of a test passed with flying colors. You handled the fitness part, then gave her feels for the comfort part.

walking through the act of a fitness or comfort test isn't as hard as I was making it out to be. I needed (and need) to be comfortable in silence. I need to be cool in as many circumstances as possible. For RPC - this is placing your trust in Christ to work all things out. I don't need to be more witty than my wife, I don't need to jump through all the hoops right verbally or anything. I just need to have my own standards, communicate them, enforce them, not be the first to react to emotional situations, and literally just keep my mouth shut

I normally don't like large quotes - but this whole paragraph is gold.

You'd be shocked, not talking is really easy if you just don't open your mouth, guys. It's crazy.

One of these days I'd like to do a write-up on President Coolidge. He was known as "Silent Cal." One of my favorite quotes of his: "I have noticed that nothing I have ever said ever did me any harm."

He was also known for getting through more meetings than any other president. People would be in and out of his office so fast. Someone asked him how he got through so many meetings in a day: "People eventually just stop talking if you never talk back."

Bonus: He also maintains the same theological position I do: "The only way I know to drive out evil from the country is by the constructive method of filling it with good."

tired of trying to figure out how to be "perfect" so she wouldn't have an emotional night, whatever

Ironically, while nice guys think they have to keep her from becoming emotional to make the conditions right for sex to occur, the exact opposite is true. The more emotionally stimulated a woman is, the more sexual she feels - even if they're not positive emotions. There is, of course, a line, but that comes with common sense.

Theoretically, we'd divorce, it would suck, and at the end of the day I'd still be doing the work I do and hanging out with Jesus

This is the right mind-frame. Excellent example of a mentality that fosters outcome independence and amused mastery.

Excellent post.

I may have messed up (F/R)

3 upvotes · 7 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The thing with walking on egg-shells is ... it's only a problem if you actually care about not breaking them. Put on some shoes and jump all over them. Have some fun. Learn that egg-shells are entertaining to break and smash all over the place. Why do you feel like you need to avoid stepping on any of them? Especially when they're on the floor instead of in the fridge.

If someone leaves an egg shell where it doesn't belong, they can't complain when it gets broken, just like my kids can't complain if I drive over a toy that they left in the driveway. It doesn't go there. If it breaks and they cry, I'm not upset about it - that's their problem, not mine. That doesn't mean I don't try to console them and help them feel better, but the pressure isn't on my shoulders when those things happen, nor is it on your shoulders when your wife gets emotionally wound up over things that are not warranted.

If her mother dies, that's a legitimate egg shell. Don't pull the shell out of the fridge just to smash it. If it's appropriately placed, let it be. Keep it safe. Coddle it, even. But don't let her misplaced emotions control you.

Apart from this - don't "just do it her way to avoid conflict." That's just going to build resentment in you and she'll pick up on it, which will negatively affect her attraction to you and your sex life.

Married Man Game Part 3: Sexting

3 upvotes · 5 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

After you're married, I assume ;)

Married Man Game Part 3: Sexting

3 upvotes · 5 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Update: So I decided to violate my own advice. I was practicing doing some of this before my lunch meeting, where I was going to take over as Trustee of one of my client's trusts. My wife asks: "Ok, will you get a trustee's fee?!"

"Mmm, babe. I'm getting so hot just thinking about it - that trustee fee is going to be so many dollars."

"I'm going to cash them out as ones and sprinkle them all over our bed as we roll around in one dollar bills."

- Oh my gosh stop it

"We're going to buy a new house someday. It's going to be sooo big. So many rooms, we son't be able to stop staring."

"Republicans are going to be in office for the next twenty years ... oooh, it drives me crazy just thinking about it and how Nancy Pelosi is going to get fired someday."

"That work better for ya? ;)"

- You're weird

Haha. I guess sometimes it's okay just to have fun with it.

RPC: a place to stay (or at least return to)

3 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This sounds like I'm reading a CNN article. It's chock full of highly liberal sentiment that cares more about how people feel than what's true. After listening to the audio you sent me earlier, I'm more than a little shocked to read this, as I didn't expect such leftist thinking from you.

If someone feels something it is real to THEM

No, it's not real to them. It only feels real to them. Their feelings are real. Their beliefs are not. Like u/OsmiumZulu said, no matter how hard a man feels like he is a girl, he is still a man. His feelings do not change reality.

The sentiment you're referencing was clearly stated, so let's not dance around it: "RPC isn't a place to stay but more of something to extract the marrow from and move on." This is either true or false. If there is never anything new to learn and such a man somehow has nothing to offer back to the community, and he also has the internal fortitude to practice what he has learned without sliding, then he may be fine to move on. If there is more to uncover from Scripture and shared stories and experiences, then this is not a place to move on from and the statement is false. Feelings have nothing to do with this.

Now, if the statement was: "Rainbows make me happy," then by all means, a person's feelings do, in fact, determine the truth and validity of the statement.

Sentiments are just feelings

Perhaps it's this singular word that got you confused about what OZ was saying. Sentiment has two different meanings. One of them is certainly related to feelings, and it is more commonly talked about as "sentimentality." The other definition of sentiment, which OZ was using, is (quoting google): "a view of or attitude toward a situation or event; an opinion." Some views, beliefs, and opinions are wrong. Not all - some things are certainly unique to each person. But if I'm of the opinion that Jesus was an arrogant know-it-all liar, I'd be wrong. Flat out, that's a wrong opinion.

negativity ... hostility ... judgmental ... arrogance and conceit ... condemning and threatening language ... hate and angst

Please, enlighten me on these comments. I can think of exactly one person's conversations who you could be referencing, and it's a guy who repeatedly undermines moderator authority and tries to convince people to leave this sub. I've seen pastors have harsher conversations over much less - and I have been chastised by the other mods for being too soft on him and giving him too many chances! Yes, this does happen in the church - and if you knew the quantity of conversations we have had with this user over multiple accounts (he always deletes one and creates another, presumably in an effort to deceive the community and the mods once he gets a bad rep), you'd probably be far more understanding.

This kind of behavior is not winning souls to Jesus

It's easy to make this kind of judgmental assumption. You're not a mod, so you don't get the praise reports of professions of faith. You don't get to hear about all the pastors whose churches are being reformed because of this place, or of the people here who have brought non-users to Christ because of the work we're doing, or the new small groups that are started, or people who have committed to join the mission field because of this place.

Around Christmas time I had looked back at what we had accomplished in a year and there were at least a dozen new believers that I know of, 17 people who had re-committed to following Christ, 9 new small groups, 2 church pastors and 3 elders from different churches who are reforming their churches because of what's taught here - and this and more all only coming from just those who have bothered to speak up and tell us. Who knows what all else is going on that we're not hearing about!

If there is no pain-of-disconnect, people will have not a thought of unplugging from this or any other sub

To reference the "or any other sub" category, MRP, TRP, and their respective "ask" subs all seem to have rapidly growing numbers, yet are among the most hostile places on the internet that I've seen. Pretty much everyone who asks even intelligible questions are called "autist" and "fag" and "beta" and accused of all kinds of horrible things. Nevertheless, when I first found TRP it was at 200k members, and it had nearly half a million last I saw before the numbers were taken down from the quarantine. When I first found MRP, there were only 10k members. They're currently sitting at 24,508 - over double!

Something tells me the "feel good, make everyone fall in love with you, develop co-dependency" approach isn't the only way to get people coming back. Those are cheap manipulative strategies that liberals use because they don't have any other way of keeping people returning. Truth is what will keep people coming back here. Cold, hard truth. That doesn't mean we're being mean for the sake of being mean - but u/RedPillWonder wrote up a much better comment on that topic than I'd care to re-hash here.

I thought there might be a nice intersection of Christianity and RP thought and conversation

It is not meant to be that intersection. It is meant to be a Christian sub that appeals to a red pill crowd by showing through shared language that the Bible had all their ideas first.

As with the last time you posted around here, I do find it ironic that you are doing exactly what you accuse everyone else of doing. You are trying to shame people on this sub for the conversations that have been held. You are accusing us of being hostile and arrogant, while simultaneously having a hostile agenda against us and presenting yourself as someone who is better than everyone else and who hasn't decided if he's too good for this place or not, if only we could somehow rise to your level. You accuse us of threatening to ban someone, then make the threat of leaving and suggesting that other people should want to leave too.

I respect you and the things you're doing. I believe you have a lot to offer the Christian community and would love to spur your efforts on. But don't crap all over the work we're doing here, thereby advancing the very hostility and disunity that you accuse us of advancing. And please: don't let liberal ideologies cloud the way you think about how church people "should" behave. Take a good read at RPW's comment here and think about all the stern words that the apostles and Jesus gave people and recognize that it doesn't have to be fluffy feelings and rainbows and butterflies all the time - and that if there is someone who is a danger to the community, that has to be taken seriously.

Tag: /u/Deep_Strength - because OZ already tagged the others.

When i say No the boss Stonewalls me

3 upvotes · 1 March 2019 · /r/askMRP

This, OP. You certainly should have let him open so that you can learn he already told management you'd do it. As soon as you know that, you're in the position of strength. He wrote a check on someone else's dime: yours. He needs you to fund the check he wrote, so he's at your mercy. Either he looks like a fool when his check bounces and he loses cred with management or he works with you so that you can both end in a win-win (my suggestions for that negotiation being in my comment above).

But back to /u/UEMcGill - I don't think OP actually wants to improve his situation. I think he just wants to whine about it now that he realizes his boss has more abundance than he does, which came in the form of another co-worker who could be groomed to take over OP's position. If the boss has already gone too far down that rabbit hole, OP's chances may be shot. Whining here today doesn't compensate for the wisdom he should have exercised weeks ago when this all first went down.

How do you guys view/approach ghosting?

3 upvotes · 1 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

By not being much more invested than she is. What does she contribute that makes you need her so much more than she needs you?

To clean up any misunderstanding...

3 upvotes · 28 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Also don't make apology posts to justify your actions or opinions. This is a bit DEERy and if you are DEERING internet strangers, I'm guessing you are probably DEERING in the real world.

I just made this exact same comment in mod chat about another user, haha. Good to see you're seeing the big picture here.

What do you Christians think of MGTOW?

3 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I think what /u/Adamjensen2030 is saying in this exchange:

even if the laws are ever rigged in men's favour I wouldn't consider marriage anyway since I would have to sacrifice my time and freedom for a wife.

This is an example of a bad attitude

... is really more akin to 1 Cor. 7:32-34 - "An unmarried man is concerned about the Lord's affairs - how he can please the Lord. But a married man is concerned about the affairs of this world - how he can please his wife - and his interests are divided."

I don't think this is a bad attitude. I believe it is a godly one, as it is the very missional-focus that you allude to in your last paragraph. I can't vouch for this user's entire comment history, as I haven't checked it, but this particular language doesn't concern me, as evidenced in his follow-up: "Instead I can keep my freedom and spend more time with God."

The language that does concern me is: "If anything I hate the blue pill white knights that enable their Jezebel behaviors." This does show that, at least in part, some of his motivation is rooted in contempt.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (02/27/19)

3 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

just received the book "SEXY CHRISTIAN" and considering reading it and doing sort of a book report.

You should definitely do a post on that when you're through it.

I've been getting home late too, so it feels like ships passing in the night, so no actual sex this week

You ever wake her up in the middle of the night with your hands down her pants? It's a quick gauge of how attracted she is. If she's attracted, she'll get aroused quickly and won't care too much about being woken up or how tired she is. If she's not attracted to you and is just trying to placate you or fulfill a marital obligation (usually to make her feel good about herself), then she'll turn you down. At least it lets you know where you stand.

What do you Christians think of MGTOW?

3 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

u/redpillwonder just put up an excellent post on this subject this morning as well. I'd recommend giving it a read.

RMV Checklist: How to know if a woman is good marriage material

3 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent post, brother.

BUT (to borrow the F.A.T. acronym from Red Curious) she does need to be faithful, available and teachable.

I discussed this with my RP pastor a few weeks ago and we both agree the "FAT" acronym isn't ideal. He suggested that relationships - both discipleship and romantic - can grow without these qualities, it just takes a massive amount more time and patience and it's a lot riskier, and thus the FAT acronym is really more geared toward relationships that want to develop at a healthy pace. Accordingly, these traits are an accelerant and make things move along much FASTER. See what he did there? Instead of a "FAT" girl, you want one who is "FAST" in the way the relationship can progress. The added S stands for "saved." This is true in disciple-making too, as it's not technically discipleship if they're non-Christians (similar processes and strategies, but evangelism is the other end of the spectrum). Of course, then there's the confusion about what the secular world means when they talk about a "FAST" girl, so it's still not ideal. Thoughts?

she's a nagger or not nice

Fair warning: if you're having this conversation verbally, I wouldn't tell someone not to date a nagger. You say, "Don't date someone who nags a lot." This is much, much clearer.

More broadly: what are your thoughts about the way these balance in dating v. marriage? Specifically, the Bible calls wives to hold to many of these traits (respectful, submissive, faithful, etc.), but pre-marriage relationships were culturally very, very different back then, so there are no direct guidelines for dating (principles of evangelism are the closest I can see, in parallel, which is still indirect).

For example, if you're dating a woman and her father tells her to do one thing and you tell her to do another and she goes with what her dad says, is that a "negative" on her check list because she's being submissive to the current male authority in her life rather than to you?

What if her dad didn't weigh in and she simply disagrees and says, "If I were your wife, I would submit. But we're not married yet, and that's a decision I simply cannot honor right now." Is that okay? Does it make a difference if your decision really is a poor one and her choice is probably the wiser of the options?

Just a few things running through my mind as I read this, given that I've heard women on several occasions make the claim in dating relationships: "We're not married yet, so those verses don't apply. If I were married to him, then I'd gladly follow those passages."

RMV Checklist: How to know if a woman is good marriage material

3 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I guess I overlooked this in /u/RedPillWonder's post:

this post is part one (for men) of a two part series (the second for women)

So I guess he'll be writing the second part sometime :)

RMV Checklist: How to know if a woman is good marriage material

3 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This was discussed and decided it warranted a separate thread, otherwise this one would be ridiculously long. While the entire sub revolves around developing men in this way, a targeted post like this is probably worthwhile too.

A Reply: Yes, the church and Christian writers really say these ridiculous things.

3 upvotes · 22 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

3 short points from your conversation with u/whitified here:

1. My post was a reply to someone who claimed that no Christians were saying these things. Yes, it's cherry picked, but intentionally so - and the fruit was very low hanging to find these (literally under 10 minutes of browsing). I wasn't trying to create a complete cross section of all of the church's teachings on the issue. I think this is appropriate in the context in which I was writing and not an error.
2. Bu sharing my google search terms you can see the questions I was asking. Every single article was trying to address that exact question: "should looks be important to Christians in dating?" One of the authors even asked that exactly in his post as the foundation of what he was writing. I do not believe I have taken any of them out of their intended context.
3. My background is in statistical methodology (prior to law), in which I have a "degree," so accurate research and data gathering matter to me too.

I'm enjoying reading all this, though. Good conversation is good conversation.

A Reply: Yes, the church and Christian writers really say these ridiculous things.

3 upvotes · 22 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Take yer upvote.

Introducing myself and looking for wisdom and advice

3 upvotes · 22 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for sharing your story. There are some good reminders in here of the dangers of living in a blue pill mentality - not only in the damage it causes to relationships, but in the way it distracts a man from any actual purpose in life. This is a clear plan from our enemy, and I'm encouraged to hear you're escaping the prison he had you trapped in for so long.

didn't have a task and purpose in life

This is the main thing I'd have you start with. Get through the 200s and give us another post outlining your mission and what you're going to do with all that you've learned! Be prepared to tell stories about the guys you plan on discipling and the non-Christians whose lives have been ruined by cultural influences that you could set free in Christ!

How screwed am I? 12 questions from Beta Bucks

3 upvotes · 19 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Amen. "Relationships are hard work" is one of the cultural lies I plan on raising in an upcoming post I'll be co-writing with /u/warriorjesus1915. Nobody likes going to work, and even the paycheck doesn't always make it seem worthwhile. This attitude can kill a relationship fast, and yet with the wrong approach to relationships we end up forcing women to feel this anyway, then wonder why they never want to show up and give us a paycheck (sex) for all their hard work.

Any RPChristians Near Dayton, OH?

3 upvotes · 15 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Gotcha. I know of at least 2 others in dayton who have been active at times on RPC, but I'm personally too far from there to do anything in person.

I should note, though, that the guy who disciplined me is in Dayton. I doubt he'd have much availability for anything consistent, as he's already maxed out with all the pastors he disciplines (he exclusively works with pastors now), but he'd probably have good connections with disciple making churches in the Dayton area if you are looking.

Michael's Story?

3 upvotes · 13 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

1/2

Lots of things going on in such a short post that need correction. Let me pick two.

First, you seem to misunderstand the concepts of alpha and beta. When people say that sexless dating is "beta," they're using the term as an insult, not as a descriptor. It's the same thing as calling someone an a-hole. You're not trying to show how his behavior is similar to what a colon does; you're simply insulting him. Of course, there is also an element where such commenters probably do believe the behavior is "beta," but this is only based on projection of their own frame on someone else as if another man must have the same frame as him. I'll explain this latter part from the ground up.

Alpha and beta ultimately relate to a person's influential orientation. That is, alphas pursue their own purposes, uninfluenced by the criticisms or emotional reactions of others, whereas betas live to appease these things in others.

Most people on the secular RP forums project their own purposes on other people. They believe that enhancing sexual gratification should be a man's primary purpose because it's their primary purpose in life. The reason they're on a red pill forum in the first place is to enhance their sexuality or to help others enhance their sexuality. What they fail to recognize is that some people have higher purposes than sex, but still want to maximize their sexuality without compromising their higher goals.

This is somewhat self-intuitive to Christians because we all recognize that sexuality, while important to us, is ultimately subordinate to our mission for Christ. The secular world, however, predominantly buys into evolutionary models of human development, which glorify sexuality as the pinnacle of human existence because that is where propagation of the species and evolutionary development occur. That is, to the secular world, sex is the most important thing in all of existence because it is what drives evolution. If evolution is their god, sex is their holy spirit. In the evolutionary view, even if a guy doesn't consciously prioritize sex this way, his urges toward sexuality are still a biologically conditioned in him anyway, and he is merely rationalizing away his biological conditioning. It's no wonder, then, that they project epitomizing sex as a focal point for every man.

But this is also somewhat frustrating to me, as one of their own sidebar sources (the commandments of poon) says to focus on your mission above the pursuit of women. Again, while self-intuitive to the Christian, the secular world often ignores this commandment of poon or makes it moot by making their pursuit of sex with women their mission.

As a result, if sex is to be a man's mission and a man is in a relationship without sex, it sounds like the man is failing his mission, and therefore could be called "beta." In reality, what they mean to say is: "Sex is my highest priority. You're an idiot if it's not your highest priority too. So if you're not doing things the way I would, you're just a beta chump." They also confuse the alpha/beta dynamic as having to do with a man's sexual philosophy, whereas it is really more related to a man's frame. But again, in the secular world sex and frame are somewhat indistinguishable because many people (not all) believe that a man's frame should be oriented toward sexuality, and a failure to do so means you must have a weak frame because you are sublimating (a beta behavior) your sexual compulsion to something else. That's why they say what they say - they're projecting their own life philosophies on others. As Christians, 2 Cor. 5 tells us that if we are in Christ we are a new creation. That is, the compulsions of the flesh (which might rightly be consistent with what the secular world believes and experiences) are no longer a master over us and we have different purposes, causing a conflict between our flesh and our renewed mind, as Paul references in Romans 7:25 (see also Romans 12:1-2). You can read more on this in the sidebar post: "Defining 'The Red Pill' for Christians."

Second, you seem to be misunderstanding the concept of "AWALT" when you give enough stock to the concept to even ask:

is it possible to go through college finding a future wife that will not cheat on you ... ?

There are so many issues problematic to your thinking inherent in this question that I can't address them all, so let me address the primary points, at least.

The obvious logical answer is "yes." It would be a ridiculous claim to say that anything is impossible when it comes to human behavior. Statistically, it's even more ridiculous to claim that every woman will cheat. So yes, it's certainly possible to find a woman who won't cheat. The question that arises, then, is how to find a woman who won't cheat. There are posts already around here that focus on how to vet women. /u/Deep_Strength has a section in his upcoming book about that. I'll defer to those resources on this topic and move on.

What's more concerning - and this isn't your fault - is the fact that you seem to misapply the concept of "AWALT" to believe that all women in college are sex-craved cheaters. This is false. "AWALT" exists to describe certain tendencies that are common among all women. The fact that all women have an inherent drive to control any man they're in a relationship with is one of these things. God told us this in Genesis 3 and it has remained true ever since. There are many more instinctive drives in women that we could reference.

But even the secular sources will acknowledge that women's drive isn't always toward sex for sex's own sake. Rollo spoke at the 21 convention, for example, noting that a woman's menstrual cycle proves beyond doubt that women, on the whole, will never be as sexually compulsive as men. Instead, when they ride the carousel it's not because they crave physical pleasure. It's because they crave the validation that comes from being with a high quality man. Female sexuality is not about having orgasms; it's about receiving validation that feels so good that it becomes orgasmic for them - and their orgasm is an expression of that validation.

To that end, when TRP says "AWALT" in reference to their potential for cheating, what they mean is that all women desire validation in a way that is most easily received through sexual expression, and if they're not getting that validation from their marriage (not because the quantity of validation is lacking, but the quality of the validation, as this levels with the quality of the husband) then they're going to look elsewhere to get it. That validation becomes a drug that leads to cheating.

These base impulses are within every single woman. But some women are better at controlling them than others. Secular women will have a much, much harder time because they don't know anything different. That's why the divorce rate sky-rocketed as soon as women were given a free-pass and even incentives to divorce men without fault in the 1960s. But mature Christian women live with the renewed mind that comes with the Holy Spirit and the transformed nature that I referenced above. This doesn't mean their flesh is gone - those compulsions are still in the Christian woman. She just has an actual means of combating those instinctive drives: the Holy Spirit and her new self. Some will still fail, and don't ever assume even after careful vetting that this is impossible for the girl you're with. It's not an on/off switch. It's a scale.

My wife is about 4% likely to cheat on me. That's not a high enough probability for me to concern myself with. For other men, their wives may be 80% because of their low spiritual maturity, cultural influences, and marital dissatisfaction, among many other possible factors. Those men are right to incorporate "trust but verify" as an essential part of their frame, whereas I don't care all that much for the "but verify" part right now. I don't need to snoop on my wife's phone because I know that she is mine and mine alone.

Can you find a woman like that in college, who is under 5%? No. Women are still growing and developing in college. So are you. While she might be at a 1% risk in college, after graduation she may rise up to 75%. Why? Because college is a bubble and you can't know what a person will be like when they leave that bubble.

Why the Church misunderstands Jesus and how this screws up your view of leading your wife.

3 upvotes · 12 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

His missiological framework. Consider an obvious example: he told us to make disciples, but didn't preach a lesson (at least not that the apostles recorded) on how to do this. At no point did he say, "Here's what discipleship means to me, and here's how you can disciple someone else." Instead, he showed us with his life. When he taught lessons to the 12, it wasn't just about doing what he taught; he was also modeling how we should teach others. So, it's one thing to learn from the lesson, but it's another thing entirely to recognize: "Jesus taught this to me, I'm supposed to live like Jesus did, so maybe I should teach this to someone else too - and I should also teach that person how to teach others also." Most people get hung up on the lesson itself and never go past that, which is why we get churches that are so focused on sin-avoidance or instant action that they lack any appreciable vision for ministry.

Also, I agree that many people mistakenly think they're living like Jesus. This is, at the core of my post, because they focus on what he said and not what he did. But the words you used point out the problem here: "think they are already following Christ's EXAMPLE by following what he said." An example is a model that you can observe and mimic. Words are not an example. When I teach my son that making bad choices will result in discipline, he might get it at a theory level, but when I tell him, "Remember when you made a bad choice yesterday by yelling at your sister and how you went to time-out for that?" - now he has an example to look at. The example brings theory into reality in a comprehensible way. But there are also many things I want my son to learn that I haven't yet explained to him verbally. I go to the gym regularly. I never told him, "This is why I go to the gym. This is why you should too." But I started taking him on the track with me after my lifting so that he can see me running and run with me. That's all example, even though I never taught him about it. I want him to see my life and strive to be more like me as I strive to be more like Christ. Likewise, there are many things Jesus did that are recorded, but which were independent of anything he or the apostles verbally taught. Read through the book of John with this lens in mind and you'll see what I'm talking about.

Ideas to consider for men who follow Jesus...

3 upvotes · 11 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I can appreciate this reply. As I've said a handful of times: I merely offer men A way, not necessarily THE way. If you don't have a better plan, I'll give you one that has a proven track record that you can default to. Come up with a better plan and you're free to follow that on your own. This is, in essence, what it means when we say that "the red pill is a toolbox." You are to take what works for you and leave behind the rest. Every marriage and relationship is going to need different tools in order to be healthy and successful. If you don't like a particular tool, don't throw out the whole box. Just say, "That one's not for me" and move on. It's that simple.

The way you talk, though (and I assume this is yet another of your alts, Bobby), is as if it must be all-or-nothing. You think we're compelling men: "You must embrace everything we say here or you're not 'man enough' for us." Saying it openly shows that it's a clearly absurd view, but those are the words you seem to be putting into our mouths.

I will note that 1 Peter 3 requires a separate post altogether, so look forward to that soon, as it's one that many people remove from context.

But clearly, the only advice I've really given is straight from God- walk by the spirit.

And we give the exact same advice. We're just going the next step further and showing men how to do that. Saying, "Walk by the Spirit" means very little if you don't include a guide for how men can do that.

My critique is of the red pill in it's entirety. Which includes what you all would call secular red pill. I have a hard time separating the two That's reasonable. I can see why it's hard to distinguish. But this is also why I make it clear that RPC is exclusively 100% from Scripture. I do not preach secular RP concepts as truth, nor will you ever see me reference Rollo or Roosh or any other secular writer as authorities toward conclusions.

Our reference to the secular manosphere is a matter of convenience, not source material. If I find something to be true in Scripture, I also have to find a way to communicate it to people in a way that they will understand. For the target audience we have here, rather than creating new terminology and letting a lot get lost in communication, it's easier to say, "Remember on that secular forum when they talked about amused mastery? What the Bible says is a lot like that," and then I use words that they understand in order to help them more easily understand the Scriptures. There is simply a lot of overlap because ... no surprise ... anyone who studies the WORLD God has made will find a lot of truths that overlap with the WORD God has made. God's Word describes the state of the world and His intentions for it and (shocking!) observations about the world actually line up with what God's Word says rather than being different.

So, why not borrow from observational terminology to help people understand God's Word? Bible translators do this all the time. As linguistics change in a culture, we get new translations that use the new lingo to reach the target audience. One of my pastors recently introduced me to the "Hawai'i Pidgin Bible." Read a few verses. It's crazy. But it's communicating the Bible to a culture in words that people in that culture can understand. That's what RPC is all about - revealing the truth of the Bible using words that the red pill culture can understand.

RPC - it's not clear I have use of it.

If it's not helpful to you, then don't use it. As a single guy who isn't actively seeking a wife (and I encourage all men to avoid actively seeking), you probably have relatively little use for the intergender sexual dynamics aspect of what gets discussed here. I do think you could learn a lot about disciple-making and how to stay mission-focused, but it seems like you've already drawn that from the content here. So, you've found the tools that work for you. Maybe later on in life, if you do find yourself in a relationship or married, you'll start to see value in the other tools. In the meantime, recognize that different people have different needs. So, while you think that much of the content here is misplaced with regard to your own purposes, recognize that it might be on-point for what other men need to hear to get back on track.

I just think living by the spirit is "complete"

That would be great if you were explaining how to live by the Spirit. How do you "live by the Spirit" as a married man? Are there any differences in this if you're single instead? Clearly there are because God has expectations for married people that don't apply to singles. But what about a single man who struggles with porn - how is he to live by the Spirit? It's easy to say, "Stop watching porn," but how does he actually do that?

You see, everything we teach here ultimately has an application. I try to include application points in most of my teaching posts. We're giving the people the "how to" behind the "what to do." "Live by the Spirit" is a what, but does nothing to help people who don't know "how to" do that.

Seek God's will

How? On our sidebar I have posts on getting into God's Word, memorizing Scripture, how to study the Bible, prayer, etc. Telling someone to "seek God's will" is not of great value if you're not explaining how.

Seek ... God's Kingdom

What does that even mean? Good thing I have countless posts on what it means to do this, mostly focusing on the mission God gave to those in His Kingdom, which includes advancing it, sanctifying it, etc.

live by the [S]pirit and try to be like Christ + sanctify myself?

And how do we do this? What if a pastor preaches that part of living by the Spirit for a married man is to do whatever his wife says, because that's the best way he can serve his wife? Is that what the Spirit wants? Because that's what the church teaches ... never so bluntly, but that's the lesson countless men take from it.

Perhaps "living by the Spirit" for a married man means learning how to tell his wife "no." But what if a guy's small group leader is teaching him that he's sinning by doing that because he should love his wife and respect her wishes?

See how these things are not self-intuitive, especially when the church has been led astray by the cultural influences that even you seem to agree are harmful and ungodly? Telling someone to "live by the Spirit" means very little if they're going to go to the wrong sources to figure out how to do that. The result is that they'll think they're living by the Spirit when they're really living by cultural Christianity's expectations - and there is a huge difference.

That's a complete picture for me.

From a bird's eye view, perhaps. But zoom in a little bit and you'll realize as I've been saying that these phrases sound really good but have no actual practical value without a list of "how to"s. I openly admit that some of the "how to" stuff here may not be perfect or may not apply to every guy. That's fine - help refine us.

What I don't like seeing is, "Here are a bunch of things that are imperfect and need changed," but without providing any practical examples of what the problems are or what the change should look like. You can't say, "Don't do X" without adding, "But absolutely do Y."

Tag: /u/rocknrollchuck /u/Deep_Strength

Any RPbros in Oregon?

3 upvotes · 8 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

FYI - Tags in posts don't work. It has to be a comment.

309 specific to RPC or does it also have a RP equivalent?

3 upvotes · 2 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Something went over your head there. The left side is the spiritual reality, the right side is the "rp concept." Leading a family is the rp concept. Discipleship (giving birth to new believers and raising them in spiritual maturity) is the spiritual reality.

Frame?

3 upvotes · 31 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Read 113 parts 1 and 2, 207 and 211. If you still have questions, ask them more specifically.

Discussion: How do you "count others more significant than yourself." while still maintaining the I'm the prize mentality?

3 upvotes · 30 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for responding for me ;)

How to split expenses in home?

3 upvotes · 28 January 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This is better for askMRP. Before it gets removed, let me simply say ...

1. Stop it with all the "she leaves all the expenses on me" garbage. What if you leave all the expenses on her? Don't let her use you as a default.
2. In these scenarios, the best attitude to incorporate into your frame is that it's your household, your budget, and your finances. She's the girl who goes off and makes half of the money that you will decide how to spend. Have her deposit her checks into a joint account, then set clear boundaries on how that account is to be used. I've even known several guys through my divorce law practice who managed to convince their wives to auto-deposit their paychecks into his account that she's not named on. If she has her own separate account, she will screw with you on this every time.
3. Allocate the expenses the way you want to allocate them. She has no business telling you how to allocate it. You tell her. The only reason she gets away with it is because you let her. Lead her instead.
4. From the sound of it, she's the one who picks up the mail and knows what all the bills are. If that's the case, that's your failing as a leader. You need to know your own financial situation. You be the one to get the mail and organize the bills. When you're in control of the bills, you're in control of how they get paid. If she deposits her money into a joint account that you can pay them from, you'll be good.

Weird but good things happening.

3 upvotes · 27 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

If you have that level of influence and voice in your father's life, leverage it into vision casting toward his mission in Christ. Read the "mission matters, nothing else" post in the 200 series to see how everything else will follow if you can be successful at this.

As to your questions:

1. My parents divorced years ago, but i got my dad to read some of NMMNG. It went well and we still talk about principles from the book, as recently as yesterday. As a former pastor he's still highly feminized, so he resists and tries to use passages like Philippians 4 to rationalize female equality in the church. He also won't officialize a relationship with the girl he's dating because "she's too hot for me," he says. Nevertheless, he's making progress, his faith issues being what hold him back. My mom was the self professed dominant in their marriage and post divorce is committed to remaining single. She is highly receptive to any biblical teaching I give on these issues - but I suspect it's because she'll never actually have to apply it again. She's the closest I've ever seen to a single woman embodying NAWALT, but primarily because she's taken herself off the SMP. Hypergamy means nothing to her anymore - a case study I'd like to look more into, as she's very rare in this.
2. Followers should follow both because of love and truth. We see this balance in our own salvation: it's not enough to say we love God if we reject the truth of his Word, or that we embrace the Word fully with no love in our hearts. Jesus also says we must have faith like a child (aka "trust at face value") while Paul says the Bereans were more noble than the Thessalonians because they didn't only take his word for it - they tested everything against Scripture to see if what he said was true (independent thought).

In RP terminology we call this latter concept: "Trust But Verify." Given recent conversations here I may do a post on this soon.

Who Is to Blame for the State of the Western Church?

3 upvotes · 25 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Normally I'd object to blaming our problems or discussing blame at all, but because it was a reply and not the spontaneous product of internal brooding I'll let it slide.

More to the point of your post, I'm reminded of the best church I've been in - and I tell people what made it the best was that it was lay led. There was no head pastor. There were a team of elders with full time day jobs who fulfilled the pastoral role. It was also the closest to a red pill church I've ever been to. They actually did a 7 week series on song of songs and taught about doing oral between spouses and how women should dress up for their husbands, and how men should bear the weight of leadership in the home and not defer to their wives all the time. That was the earliest point of my red pill awakening.

Interestingly, the guy who was the pastor before it became lay led retired to open a cigar shop in Arizona. He was the definition of kind hearted, yet raw masculinity.

Too Little, Too Much

3 upvotes · 23 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Usually spoken from a misunderstanding of AWALT.

Too Little, Too Much

3 upvotes · 23 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Ah yes, because that worked so well for Hosea ... and David ... and Jacob ... and plenty of other people for whom God did the vetting. That's not to say those marriages didn't accomplish a godly purpose. They all certainly did. But they also brought with it a lot of the AWALT tendencies that weren't mitigated by the fact of God doing the vetting.

Too Little, Too Much

3 upvotes · 22 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Not everyone who gets divorced gets "divorce raped." Again, the cautionary tales you read of are almost always extreme situations, not common ones. As most are aware, I'm a divorce attorney. I can personally attest that the vast majority of my cases do not involve either side getting "divorce raped" by the other. There are certainly exceptional cases where that does happen, but it's a significant minority.

Suppose, being generous, that 10% of cases involve actual divorce rape - and 50% of people get divorced ... that's 5% of people who actually fall into the "cautionary tale" scenario. That's not insignificant - it's worth taking note of. But I wouldn't bend my entire life around trying to avoid being one of those 5%, especially when you can effectively mitigate that harm through other means without having to focus on it in the first place.

Too Little, Too Much

3 upvotes · 22 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Be mindful of the cautionary tales, but don't bend your entire life around them.

To quote my original post: "Be mindful of the cautionary tales, but don't bend your entire life around them."

What is the Christian RP Advice to a Wife for Getting Her Husband to Change?

3 upvotes · 17 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

That's the one.

Validation and Interdependency

3 upvotes · 11 January 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Validation for women can certainly be internal too. It's just not their biological or spiritual nature and there isn't the same compulsion for them to have internal validation as there is for men. I'd think this would be obvious just looking around the world.

We've done it, guys. "Traditional Masculinity" is now officially deemed "harmful" by the American Psychological Association. High-five to culture!

3 upvotes · 11 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I feel that if I tried to persuade them, I'd just have a bunch of clones running around who say the same stuff I do

Kinda like Jesus did with his 12? This is a good thing. It's called discipleship. It's what we SHOULD be DOING, not avoiding.

sometimes without really thinking about it or without considering what it could actually mean

If that's the result, it's the mark of a poor discipler. An effective communicator and disciple-maker should use strategies of helping people reach their own conclusions rather than telling them their conclusion. This is how I "persuade" people - not by telling them what they should think and arguing my point (which is the default position of most people on the internet - especially on reddit, where it's not designed for conversational format), but by asking them questions or telling them stories and letting them reach their own conclusions - and if they don't reach the right conclusion, you just ask more questions. That's what Jesus did with his parables and challenges to the Pharisees, the 12, etc.

The parables are obvious, but the questions are when he says things like: "Which is better: for a man to let his donkey die in a ditch on the Sabbath, or for him to get up on the Sabbath and save his donkey?" (paraphrased). The conclusion is obvious, but he's letting his audience (the Pharisees) decide for themselves - and they can't argue against his point because he hasn't made a point for them to argue against.

On reddit, you'll get people who say, "I see what you're doing, but here's the reason why I don't like your question." But dealing with that is easy. Just say, "I wasn't making any assumptions. I know what I would do, but I asked the question because I want to know what you would do and what your answer would be, because yours might be different from mine." This has been very effective for me.

Someone else (or maybe it was you?) suggested I write a post on how to communicate effectively - I feel more inclined that this is necessary.

Validation and Interdependency [MRP Draft]

3 upvotes · 11 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

That's a great question. My gut reaction is to agree with your suggestion. That said, on a closer look there's a difference between needing something for validation and enjoying something when it happens to occur. Many men need sex with their wives to validate their masculinity, but that doesn't mean it's inherently validation-seeking when another man who doesn't need it pursues sex with his wife and enjoys it anyway.

Of course, this all depends on how Glover defines a "love language" - if it's something that is needed to experience love, or if it's merely the most effective way of giving someone enjoyment in the relationship. At the end of the day, it doesn't really matter because "love languages" are merely an interpretive categorization created by a man, much like "homo sapien" is a categorization tool that humans came up with. God didn't create 5 love languages and assign different ones to each person. Glover is just finding patterns and categorizing them, which is different from treating the love languages as if they are a definitive part of a person's makeup.

We've done it, guys. "Traditional Masculinity" is now officially deemed "harmful" by the American Psychological Association. High-five to culture!

3 upvotes · 11 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I change people's minds all the time. The world is not as polarized as the TV would make you think. Polarization just gets better ratings, so it's broadcast more. Most people in my day to day life are open to new ideas if they are communicated with tact - even against strongly held convictions.

For example, my secretary's dad was a senator in the democratic party for years. She grew up with democratic ideals and firmly believed all kinds of liberal and feminist propaganda and called herself a feminist. Last year I had a few conversations with her and she concluded one of them, "My dad would be rolling in his grave if he found out I'm probably a Republican now."

This happens all the time. Maybe I'll do a post someday on persuasion and tactful communication.

We've done it, guys. "Traditional Masculinity" is now officially deemed "harmful" by the American Psychological Association. High-five to culture!

3 upvotes · 11 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I think your orientation is right. I was just pointing out that "you can't really change people that don't want to be changed" doesn't apply to everyone - there are many, many, many people whose minds can and will be changed.

We've done it, guys. "Traditional Masculinity" is now officially deemed "harmful" by the American Psychological Association. High-five to culture!

3 upvotes · 11 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This assumes a false polarization. The point of awareness and discussion isn't for one side to try to convince the other side - it's to reach all the people in the middle who either don't have a side or aren't strongly committed to their side.

Tag: /u/WarriorJesus1915

Life Lesson: Treachery of women even within the church

3 upvotes · 9 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

There's no fence for me. I wrote the sidebar here, brother. I'm happy to discuss why I have my wife working rather than cooking, but that's a little beside the point, so I'll defer it unless you ask.

What I really see going on here is that you tried to give men some situationally specific advice that won't apply in all contexts; I tried to give this caution while being generous to you in the tone of my reply, and you respond by calling me a blue pill beta - not in an effort to help, as when we expose blue pill ideations in field reports or advice threads, but in an attempt to sling personal insults and regain an air of dignity from anyone who might have read my reply to your post. This is further evidence of validation seeking (not to mention all the DEERing), just as all the cheating comes off as validation seeking. It does not help your credibility and judgment here. I look forward to future interactions being more productive.

Escalation the RPC way

3 upvotes · 7 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

That really is the whole point I'm making. If your heart is right then do what you want.

I agree ... but with one caveat: Psalm 37:4, "Delight yourself in the Lord and he will give you the desires of your heart." If you make God your delight, he'll give himself to you - not he'll give you the other things that you desire. Right?

The same principle applies here. Yes, make your heart right. But a heart that is "right" will inherently lend itself toward certain characteristics and behavior patterns. What are those characteristics and behavior patterns? That's what you're really debating. I don't think u/OsmiumZulu would disagree with the foundation; rather, the disagreement is in what behaviors a "right heart" inspires a person to do. The fat, lazy bum example is an extreme way we can all agree: a person with a "right heart" toward God will never end up as a fat, lazy bum because his heart will compel him to care for his body. But to what degree? OZ and I would argue that it's less about a destination and more about a direction - that we are constantly striving for improvement. So, a guy with a "right heart" about God's desires for his body will never be at 18% body fat and think, "I'm in reasonably good shape ... I'm not attractive, but I'm not morbidly obese either, so I can stop trying to improve my body now." But the person at 10% body fat may rightly think, "I would love to improve my body even further, and will indeed keep taking steps in that direction, but there are other areas of improvement that are more compelling right now, so I should work on those before killing myself to get to 9% body fat." Neither of them has given up the goal of improvement, but the amount of time and attention each one gives toward the varying components of self-improvement will be allocated consistently with the greatest need - ergo my prior post on "Fixing your SMV" all about addressing the low hanging fruit.

if your heart is right then your focus will be on things God wants

It's easy to say this while bifurcating out the fact that God also has wants and desires for how we maintain our bodies, or how we steward our skills and finances in the workforce, etc. I say a lot that God desires us to make disciples. So does that mean that the act of discipling someone - all the meetings, phone calls, texts, hang-out times, etc. - is all I'm talking about? Of course not.

A disciple is a follower. Followers have a direction they're moving - and that direction is painted with a clear picture of the path and the person they're following. They know what the outcome looks like from every angle. One must be a disciple before they can be a disciple-maker. So, I must look at all areas of my life that God has any interest in (which is all of them!) and try to conform to God's expectations in each area - and then allow myself to be the model for someone else, just as Christ (or the guy who disciplined me) was my model. That means understanding that God has an expectation about my financial stewardship, on my body size and shape, on my interpersonal skills, etc.

To say that we should focus on making disciples, and then forget what it means to be a disciple - living up to all of God's expectations for our lives - is to undermine any claim of having one's heart rightly oriented toward God and Christ.

However the secular red pill makes Hypergamy a god and a judge in some ways.

Exactly right. Their goal isn't to fix women or change culture, but to make the existing culture work for them. As Christians, we do have an obligation in Ephesians 5 to sanctify our wives, and a broader imperative in numerous places (Acts 1:8 and Matthew 28:19-20 not being the least) to change the culture. So there will be inherent differences in how we approach thing.

The value of secular RP to the Christian is not merely in how to utilize a right knowledge of our present culture to take advantage of it - though we can do that too ... but also because we need to know where we are in order to plot a course to where we're going. If the red pill is knowledge of how current cultural intersexual dynamics function, a man must be red pillled to be highly influential in that culture. It doesn't mean you serve the red pill - it means you have the knowledge of the red pill.

As I've said here quite boldly before: if the Bible said to worship at my wife's foot and submit to her every desire and whim, I would do it. The "red pill" is not my god. Rather, the red pill is a discovery of what God had created in the first place. So, for me, studying "the red pill" - not merely in the secular sense, but in the biblical - is no different from trying to understand the world God created so I can maximize my influence in it. We don't worship the Bible, but it is perhaps the most useful tool we have in our understanding and worship of God. The red pill is another tool that ranks lower than the Bible, but is still a valuable tool all the same.

So, you don't reject or become ambivalent toward the red pill in favor of God because you're comparing two different things: the means and the end; the road and the destination. Nobody says, "I reject the freeway. All I care about is Disney World." There's no comparison. But the freeway is the path I'm going to take to get to Disney World. And while the Freeway itself might be the Bible, the red pill might be more akin to the driving laws - the context for how to interact safely on the freeway.

Escalation the RPC way

3 upvotes · 7 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

As u/OsmiumZulu noted, we aren't meant to follow Jesus' example to every detail. There are points where God expects us to derail - otherwise we would all be carpenters. If I were to tell a man that he needs to learn how to fix a leaky faucet to take care of his home - and this is something every man should be capable of doing - someone could easily say, "Ah, but Jesus never fixed leaky faucets, so you should stop telling men they need to learn how to do this."

Obviously the principle is what applies: know how to manage and take care of your home. Likewise, the principle applies: know how to manage and take care of your body. We don't know how exactly Jesus would have done that in a modern world. Given the severe health differences between food back then and food today, he very well may have taken supplements and spent extra time at the gym to offset the extra grease and carbs. And I don't see Jesus going vegan either ... but that's another conversation. The point is that we don't know what Jesus would have done, but we're making reasonably educated guesses by adopting the character of Christ and living in that - which for many of us includes going to the gym and whatnot, which is quite necessary to maintain a reasonable figure in light of the fact that I drive 10 miles from city to city instead of walking it, and that I have a car to transport my goods instead of carrying them on my back, and that I have power tools to do my carpentry work in my home and don't have to have the strength to do it by hand.

confidence it's usually in reference to God - not yourself

I used to struggle with this very thought, but the comments we see in Scripture is that God is in us - and that this indwelling nature of God in us is what is to give us confidence. It is not just having confidence in God like he's some external magician who we ask to work some magic for us, then have confidence that he'll do it. It's the confidence that God, working through us, will get the job done through what he enables us to do. This seems far more biblically sound to me than the external "magician in the sky" approach that atheists often accuse us of having.

I'm not sure how relevant it is, but I rediscovered a passage recently that is still somewhat shocking to me: "I said, 'You are 'gods,; you are all sons of the Most High' (Psalm 82:6). Jesus quotes this passage when accused by the Pharisees of calling himself God/Messiah, noting that everyone who is of God is also a "god" (lower case) because of our relationship to God.

So, no, we are not to have confidence in ourselves - but our connection to God can certainly be a source of confidence in what we do and what God does through us. Whether we say, "I know God can do it through me," or, "I know I can do it," is just a matter of semantics, and the former almost always comes off as false humility.

contrary to your point - surely there have been fat and timid men that have been useful to others throughout history

Here's where you're talking past each other. I made a post a long time ago about whether or not a man can have multiple priorities or if he should only have one priority from which all other priorities are derived. My conclusion on that matter was the latter: our priority is to do what God put us here to do - our mission: disciple-making. If a man says, "But I also must love my wife," then loving his wife has become a distraction to him from his mission, which is why Paul says in 1 Cor. 7 that those with wives should live as if they had none. However, if a man says, "I should love my wife as an example to the men that I disciple," now he is advancing his mission - his behaviors are the same in both situations, but his frame is very different, and the mission-oriented frame in the latter case will glorify God, whereas the wife-oriented frame in the former case will not.

OZ and I have a lingering disagreement on the role of intentionally seeking a wife. I'm the odd one out of the moderators, as I think I'm the only one who does not believe this should be an intentional pursuit. I tend to view being "useful to others throughout history" (assuming you mean in an eternal context through disciple-making) as being a higher pursuit that the intentional pursuit of a wife will distract from. However, I also believe (as is posted on the sidebar) that of the men who do this, in order to have sufficient help to accomplish all God has given them, they will need women in their lives, and in order to stay sexually pure among those women, a man will eventually have to marry one of them - and that this can also have benefits to a man's mission, even if, per 1 Cor. 7, it is ultimately less productive than if a man were to remain single.

All of that being said, the reality of life is that most Christian men will not accept this view of things. They want to engage in the intentional pursuit of women. While this may downgrade the degree to which a man can be devoted to God, I don't know that the downgrade is significant enough to be a rational consideration for men who otherwise know how to maintain frame. In 1 Cor. 7, Paul's reason for not wanting men married is because they will serve their wife instead of God. But that raises a big question: is he saying that as a matter of certainty that happens in every marriage, or as a generalization of what men tend to do - a generalization that is overcome and defeated for the RP man who knows not to pedestalize his wife? If it's the former, then my view of things is better for God's Kingdom. If it's the latter, then it doesn't matter if an RP man marries or not, as the concern Paul would have about shifting their devotion from God to a wife would be mitigated by their mission-oriented frame, so long as the man remains strong. He's still on "hard mode" in that situation, after all.

More to the point, OZ is clearly referencing the type of man who is in this latter position: a man who wants to intentionally pursue a woman, and who also wants to increase his ability to influence his world for God. I hope you're not contesting the fact that increased worldly qualifications also comes with increased influence in the world. This is just common sense, and it is one of the many reasons why Paul was able to be so influential in the early church: because he had more worldly qualifications than anyone else, so people listened. He references this in Philippians 3, but couples it with the statement that he considers them all a loss - not that it's wrong to have these qualifications, but they're only a loss "compared to the surpassing greatness of Christ Jesus." That is, he did not trust in his worldly qualifications or take pride in them. But that doesn't mean he didn't use them to get his foot in the door. God was strategic when he chose Paul. It wasn't because of Paul's good character that he was chosen, for he was killing Christians. Gamaliel would have been a better option, if that were the case - at least he was open-minded. It wasn't because of his bad character either, for he could have used Caesar Nero instead, if that was the case. Rather, God raised Paul up with a specific background, preparing him to have influence within the ministry he knew he would be called for.

In the same way, there is no harm in gaining influence with outsiders by meeting them on their terms. I know you're not saying men should let themselves go, but trying to counter the point that men should do what they can to earn influence among non-believers is also highly counter-productive. That's really the simple way of saying all of this ... but I felt like processing it in writing anyway, for my own benefit.

Yet, I don't think those are the criteria He uses to judge men

On a grand scale, God is our judge. On the dating scale of finding a wife, different criteria apply, and each woman is her own judge of who she will or won't marry. Context matters. OP was talking about escalating to finding a wife. You made a comment indirectly alluding to the debate over whether men should be doing this, suggesting that men shouldn't feel biblically obligated to make themselves more appealing to women. OZ appropriately responded with an implication that enhancing one's SMV has fringe benefits that also increase one's ability to influence others for Christ, so there's no problem in doing both. At this point, it's not clear, but it seems that you're only looking at it from a mission-framework, whereas OZ is looking at it from a finding-a-wife framework, which involves different judges and different criteria - and the framework OZ is operating in is one that may not have any negative effects on one's mission, but could have positive effects on it as well, and thus it would be unwise not to consider it.

Normally I'd polish this a bit, but I've got a client waiting on me, so I'm just going to have to let you figure out what all I just said without any edits :p

Would the Modern Woman be Attracted to Jesus?

3 upvotes · 27 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

If you're just here to screw with the community and you've already made up your mind, you will be banned for trolling. You clearly have a false idea in your head about who Jesus was, basing your view on your feelings and cultural conditioning over what the bible actually says. This makes me very sad for you and for the man you will one day have to give an account for being. I wish you well. Just don't come here to whine.

NoFITS December update

3 upvotes · 15 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

the rest of the book seems meh

More important than the techniques is the assertive bill of rights. While the techniques help on a practical level, they can easily be faked. Adopting and internalizing each of the bill of rights (with minor biblical exceptions) is what develops your frame into something that is actually strong enough to apply the techniques rather than merely fake your way through them in a conversation. I use that bill of rights frequently with men I disciple and in ministry leadership/training groups I lead at my church. If you haven't internalized this yet, go back - you're missing something huge.

i think they still prefer men to be tough not soyboys

That's all women, brother; not just them. It's just not politically correct for them to admit it here.

what is a good expectation in a potential partner, i mean, should i be hopeful of a 20yr old?

Your lifts are incredible - better than mine are. Your weight is still high. You're getting attention, and that's what matters. What's wrong with shooting for a girl in her early 20s? Sounds reasonable for where you're at. I've known countless people who have had 15-ish years as their age gap. I think my grandparents were over 20 years. My in-laws are 15 years apart. It's common, just not talked about. My dad is 62 and he mostly dates women in their 30s. It's only a problem if you're living in society's frame. She'll know the risks of being with an older guy - having and raising kids, retirement ages, etc. It's up to her if she wants to take those risks. Don't try to make that decision for her by not asking her out.

Single Moms? Divorced ladies? tell me what you guys think.

Personally, I wouldn't. But that's your business to set your own standard.

Yes i know once i get to a lower BF% i can open more doors, but lets take the here and now, not the maybe of tomorrow (but i am working on it).

This phrase really concerns me. I mean REALLY concerns me. I wish u/OsmiumZulu had posted here just to address this comment.

First, if you plan on lowering your body fat and opening those new doors, why would you even worry about settling for what you can get today?

Second, this implies that you think that you can settle for someone who will accept your current body fat and that because she dated you while you were at that body fat, she should be attracted to you after marriage while you have that body fat. This simply isn't true. A guy with 17+% body fat is simply unattractive. I know. I was there. After some recent events, I'm almost back there. I get it. But the fact of the matter is that if a woman marries you when you're not physically attractive, it's not because she wants to have sex with you. She might act excited and aroused by you now, but it's based on factors that will wear off after the wedding.

With where your lifts are at, there's no reason you shouldn't be sub-12% BF except for an awful diet. Dieting is one of my greatest weaknesses too. I do great for about 3-6 months at a time, then I'll have a month or two (usually November/December) that ruins it all and it takes me another 2 months just to get back to where I was. It's hard. But as a single guy with no kids, you really have no excuses.

Third, this phrase also implies that you're limiting yourself. Instead of going for what you want, you're going for what you can get. That's a weak frame that tells me you don't think you're the prize. And maybe you're not. I don't know. What I do know is that you should shoot for what you want, not what you can get. Guys who do that often find that what they want is far more attainable than what they may have previously believed.

Do Looks Matter – The Maroon Pill and The Apex Alpha Predator...

3 upvotes · 12 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Bobby, Bobby, Bobby. It saddens me to read this post, brother. It shows me that you've stopped thinking with Scripture and started thinking with mortal thoughts. Remember, there is a trilogy of sources on which your beliefs can be grounded: philosophy, science, and theology. You're relying on philosophy (logical thinking about attraction) and science (observational reality from tinder testing) and completely neglecting theology in this post, except to the degree that you can think of a few biblical examples to support what you believe to be a scientific conclusion - and weak ones at that.

I've read the black pill and studied it. I am not convinced. You're basically ignoring everything to do with SMV. To be clear, looks are a big part of SMV - and I count them as the largest, tied with a man's frame. I wrote up a post on it a while back: here.

The standard "black pill tests" take a highly attractive guy and prove that women will ignore other negative qualities about him if he is visually attractive enough. In the short-term, this can work, but let those tests play out into a 6month+ relationship and you'll see the numbers vastly changing.

To be clear, the impression you're giving guys is that their only hope for marrying an attractive woman and for her to be sexually attracted to you is to be incredibly physically attractive, otherwise you can never break out of your genetic lottery SMV base. This is simply untrue. All it proves is that better looking guys can get away with more stuff. The red pill already addresses this: "good looking guys are playing on easy mode." That's it.

What the black pill tests cannot prove is the false implication that women will not be attracted to you unless you're good looking. I don't see any tests putting out the perfect guy who's rich, charming, confident, maintains frame, etc. - but who is only average in appearance. And to test that guy, you've got to get off tinder. That's only self-fulfilling prophecy because tinder can ONLY realistically assess looks with the first swipe. So, you're making conclusions that the black pill does not and cannot reach based on the information it has.

And all of that is merely using the same sandy foundation as your post is based on: observational reality. And I could go on with more observations about women who are highly sexually attracted to mediocre or ugly men because of the other qualities that balance out their SMV. I have disciplined some of them and know the personal details about their marriages and sex lives. The attraction is for real - which is why frame is key also, among other things. All the black pill proves is that looks are significant. It doesn't prove how significant they are in comparison to frame.

What's more important in the matter, though, is what God says and how the Bible indicates men and women were created and how we were affected by the fall. This is all on the sidebar. I will stand by my theology as a more accurate measure of attraction cues than humanistic philosophies or black pill testing any day. Don't get lured away, brother. Stick with the Scriptures and you won't go wrong.

Tag: u/deep_strength - I think I'm echoing a bit of what you're saying here and I don't have time to flesh out my thoughts fully, as I have a hearing in 10 minutes.

What does RPChristians think about this marriage video from Larry J. Russell

3 upvotes · 6 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Priorities must be in order: Relationship with God, Spouse comes before the call of God, Children, Extended family/friends

This is just absurd. First, "relationship with God" is not the same thing as your mission for God. Second, your spouse does not come before your mission. Third, Jesus talks so much about the weakness of human familial bonds that I don't even know how we include them in our priority list. Example: "They are not my mother and brothers. You who do the will of my Father are my mother and brothers." Example: "If anyone does not hate his father and mother, brother and sister, wife and children, and even his own life, he cannot be my disciple." Jesus wasn't joking when he said that. It wasn't a gag. That doesn't mean you ignore your family. It means that your context for relating with your family is defined by your mission for God.

Build a solid, covenant relationship with spouse

What's the difference between a "solid covenant relationship" and a normal "covenant relationship"? Is a solid one the kind where you let your spouse do whatever she wants and you have to let her get away with it because you're never allowed to impose consequences or divorce her? The more you focus on the covenant, the worse your relationship will be. The less you focus on the covenant (in favor of your mission), the more secure the covenant becomes as a byproduct.

Establish a one-flesh relationship

Ok, have lots of sex. I'm on board with him here. Wait ... I didn't actually watch the video (at work). He is talking about sex here, right?

Ask your spouse about their needs and meet them

What if my wife says she needs a bigger house, better car, and a vacation to the Bahamas with her girl friends? This is stupid. Watch what they do, not what they say. Don't ask what her needs are - be observant and attentive and take charge. Don't say, "Honey, how would you like me to lead you today?"

Understand Biblical love: 1 Cor. 13, Patient, kind, no envy or pride, etc.

Ok, this really gets me ticked off. It's one of my pet peeves. 1 Cor. 13 is about unity within the church between members of the body of Christ. It is not about spousal love. That passage has been misapplied and misconstrued because of its false context for so many years ... if there's anything that ever gives me cause to doubt the Holy Spirit, it's in wondering how he lets people get away with this type of eisegesis for so long.

As with most Christian content, I'm sure there is some really good stuff in this video. I don't mean to be a total downer on the guy - especially noting that I didn't actually watch the video. I may get to it when a few minutes free up for me. Who knows. My point is that these types of falsities that creep into otherwise good content can be incredibly dangerous and they're the reason the church is screwed up so bad right now.

Let me be clear: I despise the doctrine that only ordained ministers who are seminary trained should be allowed to teach in the church. But when I see all the harm that amateur teaching has caused, I develop a sort of empathy for those absurd extremists. Of course, then I remember that seminaries have been tainted by the bad teachings even worse than everywhere else and that they're the cause of most of these problems ... and my empathy turns back into a combination of indignation and apathy.

Feminine Primacy effect on Doctrine

3 upvotes · 1 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This seems like a real stretch to me ... and I'm not even Arminian.

Go for the gainzzzz. Really? What do you think.

3 upvotes · 30 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You can't possibly know that. At best, you can say, "The Bible doesn't record any accounts of Jesus doing weight training." I'd be shocked if, in actuality, Jesus wasn't playing around with lifting heavy things with the disciples from time to time. It's part of relating. Even my kids do it, without going to a gym.

Go for the gainzzzz. Really? What do you think.

3 upvotes · 29 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

If God/Jesus is the groom and the church is the bride on a spiritual level, just as we have groom and bride on a physical level ... how "spiritually jacked"/powerful is God in the relationship? That's the degree of attractiveness and power we should strive to emulate in our physical marriages as a groom.

Caught wife wanking off

3 upvotes · 15 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

or maybe she's just horny at odd times when you're not around

Timing is huge.

Protection of the innocent femininity

3 upvotes · 14 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Women will not be mods here.

Finding a Tribe, Rasied Weak, Lds, the one myth.

3 upvotes · 5 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I know you're not going to want to hear this, but I cannot in good conscience give you any reply without mentioning that Mormonism preaches a false gospel that cannot save anyone. Most of the advice I give people here about the importance of their mission has, at its foundation, the assumption that it is a mission that God actually supports. Accordingly, following the advice of much of what I write on RPC may not achieve the same results if you are pursuing a mission that God directly opposes. Although I don't support everything CARM says or does, here are two links that provide information on this: (1) an address to those who are mormons, and (2) a resource library for information on Mormonism from a biblical perspective.

For the record, my brother is marrying an ex-Mormon in a few months. I've talked to countless Mormons over the years. I've had friends who are Mormon. I've known people who have converted both into and out of Mormonism. A lot of what I'm saying here isn't just something I read on a blog somewhere, like CARM - it's based on things that I've heard from people who have actually been a part of the church in different levels of authority and who have either been blunt in their honesty or who have left and later saw the error of what was going on.

With that out of the way, let's get to the heart of your questions. First off, I can't make sense of half of your sentences. The grammar is so bad that I literally don't know what you're saying or asking half the time, so here's the best I can make of it.

Would they be able to help if a conflict happen "Scratch" no

It doesn't sound like your existing community would have your back if you needed them. Mormonism is an inherently selfish religion that exists almost entirely for one's own eventual gain. This is starkly different from Christianity, where Jesus teaches us that we should not act for our own gain or what rewards God might give us for our good deeds (though those will certainly come), but because we love God and he deserves everything.

The appropriate biblical attitude is one shared by Brother Lawrence in The Practice of the Presence of God: "I did not engage in a religious life but for the love of God, and I have endeavoured to act only for Him; whatever becomes of me, whether I be lost or saved, I will always continue to act purely for the love of God." That is, Brother Lawrence appropriately recognized that our obligation and desire to love God is completely independent of what we get out of it. While Mormonism teaches that God will give you things in exchange for your devotion, the biblical attitude, as professed by Brother Lawrence, is that he would continue to love and serve God even if he knew he was going to hell for it anyway.

While Mormonism may teach selfishness as a bad thing, it's impossible to eradicate it when it is at the core of their theology. There is no intense camaraderie among brothers who would stand by one another to the death. There is only a sense of doing what needs be done to maximize one's rewards in the afterlife. Don't expect them to jeopardize their eternity for the sake of any love they say they have for you.

Are there not any women that have my standards or "the one myth" there is a young single adults 18-29 but i am 30 and it seems like a problem within the Lds "mormon" according to google

Mormonism is such a small niche within the religious sphere that you are very unlikely to find a single girl who meets whatever standards you may say you have. That said, based on your story, it sounds like you have a lot of work to do before you are a high enough value man to attract that kind of girl in the first place. Get your past traumas and communication skills in order and that can be a big step.

the one myth: sure i bet if look hard there will be a someone hiting the wall looking to snag me up born again virgins all that jazz and Ill get told i should be happy I am with them

You don't have to settle. I would never encourage you to try to convert a girl to Mormonism. But if you are a high value man, a woman who is attracted to you will follow you anywhere you go. In my single days, I had several girls who professed that they would convert to Christianity for me. The pool can be larger than you realize - just don't evangelize. At best, evangelize with the prospect of dating afterward.

They put on faces "or fake act" if you show up to any lds house it will be clean you show up unannounced you will see how they really live

Most people do this. That's not unique to Mormonism or any religion, though I will say that even with 4 kids I do a pretty darn good job keeping my house in order every day.

It seems like a lot of the members are putting on an act and if you try to break out of this act and show your true way of thought you would be shamed

Not to beat a dead horse, but that's because (at least in my view) Mormonism itself is an act founded by someone (Joseph Smith) who put on an act. There have been psychological studies done to demonstrate that if something false is repeated to a person often and frequently enough that their brain will actually rewire itself to believe the falsehood - even if they know it's false (example study).

A great example of this is in being sick. I remember a few days where I would stay home from school claiming to be sick. I got pretty good at faking it. I knew I was faking it. But after faking for long enough something started to happen by the end of the day: I actually got sick. Or at least I thought I was actually sick. My nose would run, my throat get scratchy, my chest congested, etc. Then suddenly the next morning I'd be fine again, as if I was never actually sick. I had psychosomatically developed the physical condition I had deceived my brain into thinking I had.

This same thing can happen on a spiritual level. That is why Mormons place an incredible emphasis on a person's emotions and feelings as a source for discerning truth. How do you know the book of Mormon is true? someone asks. "Because the Holy Spirit has affirmed it in my heart through a powerful experience and burning joy when I read it," is a common response.

But the Bible doesn't give any such weight to emotions. This concept of emotionalism in spirituality is very dangerous and one that I actively combat against in churches that I visit. I have had to fight against it in my own home church until the leadership finally got on board. When that much weight is placed on emotion, it is easy to deceive anyone into anything by manipulating their feelings.

And let me be clear: feelings are very easy to manipulate. I used to make it an intentional point in my life, back in high school, to discern how to evoke emotional reactions out of different types of people. My goal at the time was to use techniques of emotional manipulation to cause people to believe in Jesus. It was twisted and dark, but I essentially had the same plan that Mormonism employs: use people's feelings as a rope to drag them wherever you want them to go. Don't fall for it. Don't be like I used to be, and don't fall for people who do what I used to.

There for trying to act or talk of red pill without slamming bible in it some how will be looked down on.

The red pill and the Bible will always be frowned upon.

Family is Every thing. I do not want children/cant.

Family is everything in Mormonism because that's how they keep Mormonism alive. If two people have 4 kids, they just tripled the number of Mormons in their home. If those kids each have 4 more, that's now 22 Mormons starting with 2 people.

It is very cult like and if my parents were not this way I feel i would be more willing to go.

It's cult-like because it actually is a cult. Don't let your relationship with your family destroy your relationship with God or hold you back.

I have a few goals in my life but I am indifferent if going will help me achieve them

Without knowing those goals, I can't say. If your goal is to become the leader of the Mormon church, then going will not help you achieve that goal. If your goal is to get into heaven someday, then leaving the Mormon church will absolutely help move you in the right direction. If your goal is to stay single for life (as it seems is the case right now), then leaving an environment where everyone is pressuring you to get married and have kids is probably a good idea.

btw i hate it when people give the advice pray and read the book because it seems like the answer when they do not know what to say also my friend got told that when i was around 14, she hung her self later that night.

I'm sorry to hear that. I agree with you that "just pray and read the Bible" is horrible advice - but it's common because many people don't know the answers in the first place, so all they can do is tell you how to find them on your own.

A question about tears in front of your LTR.

3 upvotes · 5 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

We call this: A single man tear. It's the only acceptable way for a man to cry.

Seriously, though - having emotions isn't bad. How you use them is what matters. Certain musicals can still wet my eyes. I enjoy that I can feel things in a beautiful way. But to do it in a context where it shows your woman that she can use your emotional responses as a mechanism of power over you - whether by getting you to cry as a negative reaction to the mean things she says, or by being sappy toward you to make you feel emotionally connected and obligated to her - that's not cool.

Have your single man tear. Just don't lose frame in the midst of it.

How to date "evenly" as a Christian

3 upvotes · 1 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Since that rationalization started affecting which marriages ended in divorce and which last ... or since 1 Cor. 7 was written ... or since the sexual marketplace was deregulated. A good argument could be made for any of those, and more.

Getting married without knowing why and just because you feel like it has always been a bad idea (except maybe before the fall). There have just been different points in history when the risks making it a bad idea were mitigated in different ways.

And the fact that you seem smug about having "got (1) and (2)" shows that you missed the point. Having 2 when you've already got 1 is counterproductive and undermines 1 in most cases. The goal isn't to maximize both.

Intro + question

3 upvotes · 1 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Welcome! I'm short on time, so I'm just going to be a bit blunt here.

Lifting: don't do to a persistent shoulder injury

I've only ever met one guy with an injury that actually prevented lifting. He was working for a moving company and got his arm ripped off while moving a piano down some stairs. It was sewn back on, but he could never lift with that arm again.

For everyone else, it's not a matter of "I can't lift." It's a matter of "I can't lift heavy weights." So, lift low weights and do endurance sets rather than heavy, short sets. You won't gain much strength, but your muscles can still balloon up from that. In fact, that's usually a preferred method for gaining the appearance of strength - the big, bulky frame.

developing my mission my top priority

Cool. Where are you at with that? I can't really help you with much else until you have this solidified in place. Why? Because until you have that mission down pat, you don't know what you're looking for in a helper and she doesn't know what she's signing up for. As such, the foundation of your marriage is purely worldly standards of what to look for in a prospective spouse and not godly standards of what will be effective at accomplishing your or His purposes.

I'm trying to figure out if I'm attracted to.

You're not. At least not yet.

we both seem half-committed

You mean not-committed. Yet. "Half-committed" isn't an actual thing. It's really, "I'm not committed, but I might be willing to commit someday, if some things change."

I know attraction can sometimes take time to develop

Right, but not usually. The longer it takes to develop, the greater the risk that it will (1) not ever fully develop, or (2) revert back to lower levels quite quickly because those lower levels were the foundation in the first place.

axiom that desire cannot be negotiated

Correct. But it can be manufactured. This happens when a guy or gal improves themselves to a degree that they become attractive, whereas they were not before.

I was honest with her

Correction: "I felt compelled to blab my feelings to her."

and texted her

"Because I was too chicken to call her or discuss it in person and it's easier to do these types of things when I can take my time crafting the perfect wording."

saying this in-between state is confusing and frustrating

Translation: "I want someone to make a decision about our relationship, but I'm too scared to be the one to make that decision, so I'm going to put my feelings under your control and let you decide what to do with them."

so we are meeting tomorrow to discuss how to move forward

"Because I don't know how to lead and I need her to tell me what to do."

I don't want to reject a gift of a Godly relationship

Who says this is a gift? A gift from who? If it's from God, you'd better take it. Period. If it's not from God, I'd send it back. How do you know if it's from God or not? You don't. So, the whole frame of thinking is somewhat pointless anyway.

What you really mean is: "I don't want to turn down someone who might have a lot of the qualities I'm looking for in a wife." But you haven't really said what those qualities are - and you can't possibly say what those qualities are until you know what your life mission is.

If your life mission is to have as much great sex as humanly possible, then you should be looking for women who are hot nymphos.

If your life mission is to start a fortune 500 company, then you need to find a wife who has no embarrassing qualities that would give you bad media attention, who can make you look good in public, and as an added bonus is very administratively talented, able to help you get that business off the ground.

If your life mission is to make disciples, then you need to find a wife who is godly, FAT (faithful, available, teachable), and preferably who has a knack for making friends and building deep relationships.

So, again, what's your mission?

Any advice on how to approach this situation with the mind and will of Christ?

Figure out what Christ wants your mission to be first. After that, assess whether or not she's presently skilled at the things necessary to fulfill that mission. If she is, assess your attraction. If she isn't, figure out if she's FAT, and if she is, then assess how attracted you are to her. After that, share your mission with her and ask her to start helping you do so, whether you're in a romantic context or not - this phase can be purely platonic. From there, make a decision on the romantic front if you're attracted enough that you keep thinking about having sex with her, and be an attractive guy in turn.

How do I lead as a man

By figuring out where you're going first. Again: you can't rightly enter a relationship if you don't know what your mission is first.

and figure out if I want to take the lead

Yes, you do. Any other answer is a failure of the biblical relational model and even under worldly standards would put you at a severe risk of having a dead bedroom or ending up in divorce.

and end this or pursue it for at least a date or two more to better discern attraction?

Attraction hits on multiple fronts. She's obviously not crazy hot, or else the physical attraction front would already be ringing bells everywhere. The primary other type of attraction that matters is whether or not you're attracted to the way she can help and support you in all that you're trying to do with your life. But you can't assess that until you know your mission.

Boldly sharing the Gospel - is it unloving?

3 upvotes · 30 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for being a good sport :) I'm sure you are well aware that all of this comes from a place of love. I don't know it all either, but I do believe this is within my gifting.

I agree with this as well, but should that be part of the initial Gospel presentation?

If you're asking about the "still fails to give people an actual purpose and pursuit" bit - yes, all evangelism should give people a direction to point themselves toward so they can start walking. By telling them to "follow Jesus" we are being overly vague to the point that it is useless and leaves incredible room for mainstream churchianity to screw them up, like the foster parents who are out there just to collect the check from the state without any actual investment in how successful their wards are after reaching the age of majority. Mainstream churchianity has no interest in maturing people; it has interest in creating new babies and keeping them in daycare forever.

When Jesus called people, he gave them a purpose. "Follow me and I will make you fishers of men" - that's what he told his disciples. Even those who weren't among the 12 still knew that they were being groomed for something bigger, which is why he preached so incredibly often about the "Kingdom of God" that he was building and what it was like and the role that people would play in that Kingdom. Pointing them toward that Kingdom and their role therein was an essential part of his evangelism process and what I believe made many of the genuine followers decide to follow him in the first place. And then for those who were faithful, he sent them out to start practicing their role.

What I don't see is Jesus merely saying, "Um, guys ... sin is bad, m'kay? So, let's not do that, 'kay? If you stop sinning, that's how you'll follow me. Got it?" Notice again one of my core verses on RPC to single guys looking to get married (i.e. the parallel to evangelism): Matthew 6:33 - it doesn't say, "Get rid of all your sin and all these things will be added to you as well," nor does it say, "Be saved from your sin by grace through faith and ..." it says, "Seek first His Kingdom and his righteousness." That is, we must make (1) the interests of God's Kingdom and (2) our own personal righteousness our priority in order for the verse to trigger.

In short, yes, I do believe that giving people a mission - a purpose in life that actually matters on an eternal scale - is an essential part of evangelism and is the foundation of how Jesus got people to follow him.

So how do we successfully integrate both?

One method is my forever refrain to everyone here: "What's your mission?" One of my pastors (the more red pill'd one) words it: "Who is your king?" That's his evangelism model - he asks everyone, "Who/what is your king?" Interestingly, after telling that to me, we went to a discipleship conference where the speaker refrained over and over throughout the two days: "What's your pledge of allegiance?" as in, where do your allegiances exist?

That's my method: get people on a mission that actually matters for Christ, then show them that their existing life behaviors, philosophies, values, etc. need to be reoriented toward something that is actually productive in accomplishing that mission.

Justin (my college discipler) once commented that he never actually says "the prayer" with anyone - or if he does, it's not until long after they've already been meeting with him, pursuing Christ together. The reason for this is that he doesn't want anyone tricked into believing that some emotional moment can save them apart from an actual pursuit of Christ by adopting the purposes he gives them. The Ray Comfort model of evangelism, among many other notable models, put the focal point on a single decision-making moment. I don't see Jesus doing this in the Bible. I don't see him saying, "pray this first, then come follow me." I do see him asking people just to start following him, and somewhere along the way they'll be saved or turn away - but that the exact moment of salvation is not actually important to Jesus.

reread the 400 Series again before commenting further

To be fair, I have drafted the 400 series in this context not as an evangelistic tool, but as a way for men to conceptualize their problems within a framework that allows the Gospel to transform those areas of their lives that are truly troubling them. That said, my primary use of it outside of RPC is as an evangelistic tool - connecting non-Christians with an actual solution to their felt-needs that gives them hope for a more important role to play in the conclusion as they bear the "image of God" (the end of the illustration) to the world.

I suppose I do often use it with other believers as a freedom ministry tool as well.

Yes, I think He enabled us to live godly in Christ Jesus, share the Gospel and make disciples.

Right. Mainstream churchianity wrongly stops at "live godly in Christ Jesus," assuming that as long as everyone goes from "sinner" to "good little boys and girls," they've done their job. They miss the mission-oriented nature of what it means to follow Jesus. Jesus wasn't merely a "good boy" - he was a "good man on a mission that actually mattered to eternity." Somehow being "good" is all that ever gets talked about in the church.

I see it as a necessary first step, but not the whole model. Perhaps my Gospel presentation does not accurately reflect the complete picture.

Interestingly, most of my evangelism doesn't even address the sin stuff as the first step. I used to. I found it far more effective to focus on the mission first.

My neighbor from a couple years ago is a great example. He was a video game addict - he literally made his living by playing WoW, building up and selling off characters and getting corporate sponsors for conventions and tournaments. He didn't feel like he had a mission at the time, though it could most accurately have been described as getting his main WoW character to be #1 in the world. This is the guy who I actually developed the Lens Illustration for - so that I could help him through some serious issues he was struggling with.

I started asking him questions about what he wanted to get out of life. I asked him how his pursuits at the time were helping him get those things. They weren't and he knew it. He had become a severe alcoholic, struggling with serious depression. Over time I was able to help guide him into a series of purposes that were more productive. While he moved away before I ever officially saw him come to Christ, last I knew he was attending church regularly, quit all video games, and joined the air force. While the mission the air force will give him isn't the one I wanted for him, this whole process of reorienting his life toward a purpose that actually mattered to him was immensely powerful and I do hope and expect that he is continuing to search for the truth about Christ (I had a phone call with him about a year ago and he affirmed this at that time).

At no point did I say "the prayer" with him, but there were many times that he would knock on my door asking to read the Bible together or what God would want from him in some area of his life. He was seeking and trying to follow. That's the kind of reorientation he needed - and in the process he abandoned his video game addiction, quit his alcoholism, and converted sloth into discipline. His sins were being worked out by this new mission orientation. But at no point was he ever worried about eternal judgment for his sins. That just never resonated with him when we discussed it (which is why I had to develop The Lens as a more effective tool to reach him).

So then what do you think about the Charles Spurgeon quote

I actually started addressing that very mentality, but ran out of characters and decided to cut it. In short, I disagree. I believe that this would be an incredibly effective manner of witnessing to Jews. It probably also would have been incredibly effective through the 1950s, when people actually cared to maintain a moral standard. Starting with the 60s, any regard for the law died almost completely.

Today, either people (1) disagree with biblical law in the first place, and therefore feel no condemnation under it, deferring to their own depraved conscience, or (2) agree that they are immoral sinners, but simply don't care because they deny any actual judgment. Trying to argue on these points only leads to persuasive apologetics (i.e. "human wisdom"), not a "demonstration of the Spirit's power," as Paul references in 1 Cor. 2:4-5.

A post on this would be really helpful to me :)

Consider it done ... soon.

when you have time to share those methods

I believe 304 outlines the broader process I use, which is really less of a "Start here, end there" thing and more of a "figure out where they start and move forward from there" thing.

As for the Gospel presentation itself, my preferred method is the "What's your mission?" model (aka "Who's your king?" or "What's your pledge of allegiance?" - though those are less clear). I also call this the Matthew 4:19 model - give people a purpose and invite them to join you in following that purpose together. This is what I do predominantly on RPC. It's effective for both non-Christians and younger believers, though its weakest point is when people do have a purpose they like, but it's misguided.

The Lens Illustration is another presentation model I use.

The "Investigative Bible Discussion" model also works - a time to discuss with non-Christians what the Bible says in a non-threatening context where you're not preaching to them, but just exploring who Jesus is and suggesting they apply some of the things he teaches - if not because they believe he is God, then because they agree he was a moral teacher, and keep moving them forward from there as they become more devoted to Christ.

There are more, but I'm out of characters.

New to Christianity

3 upvotes · 19 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Darn straight. If my original comment wasn't clear enough, this is well warranted.

Blowjobs

3 upvotes · 16 October 2018 · /r/askMRP

Read more on preselection. It's one of the underlying principles that makes dread work. While it is typically used in reference to new girls evaluating a guy for the first time, it also affects a woman's evaluation of her LTR when she perceives that other women see in him something she's missing.

Help me out of this pit

3 upvotes · 12 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You've had a lot of academic pursuit of God, but you sound like you've had no real fruit. How many people are living for Jesus today because of your life? I don't mean people who are going to church or call themselves a Christian. I mean the ones who are out sharing their faith, seeing new people come to Christ regularly, training up other believers, maybe even pastoring churches - and you look back and say, "I'm the reason he's doing that!"?

3 John 1:4 - "I have no greater joy than this: to see that my children are walking in the truth." That's the cure to your depression.

Also, when addressing how to recognize a genuine believer from a false one, Jesus says, "By their fruit you will recognize them" (Matthew 7), referring to the disciples we've made, as He says in Matthew 13's parable of the sower. We are the soil, the Gospel is planted in us, grows out of us, and generates fruit that bears new seed that falls into the nearby soil to produce new plants.

If you're not seeing that fruit, you're always going to question the authenticity of the faith and your own personal relationship with it. Have that fruit and you'll simultaneously kick your doubts and depression to the curb. That's why I preach a man's mission as the most important thing to get him started - it's really what grounds everything else in life.

More to your situation, you are an academic. You've learned a lot about the Bible, but are you actually putting it into practice? Are you adopting the whole of Jesus' life and ministry, or are you taking the things he taught in piecemeal as isolated teachings and not seeing the grander picture of the strategy he was employing toward the mission he was fulfilling? Your masters degrees in theology are something useful, no doubt, but everything Paul knew about Scripture - all his training and knowledge as a Pharisee - he called rubbish and worthless in Philippians. You seem to be treating God's Word as an external thing you learn from and then say, "That's a cool idea, I think I'll try that." You have to adopt and internalize it - it's got to transform you inside and out.

After the above, the second most important thing is to hit the gym. Once you're making significant gains, you'll find your depression lessening. Don't let that be a ruse to think that this will be a long-lasting cure. SL 5x5 is exactly what you should be doing, but how many days a week are you going? When I first started, the answer was 6. Now I'm at 4-5. You're going to need 6 with a 1 day Sabbath for a while. Get your muscles used to being ripped and torn apart every day.

Also, buy some protein powder and have a couple shakes a day. I really can't emphasize this enough. I don't give everyone that instruction, but if you're having trouble building muscle, it makes all the difference. As another user noted, you don't just want blank calories - you need the types of calories that will build your muscular framework. That's lots of protein.

Third, how much of the RPC sidebar content have you read? You haven't mentioned a single thing, so that's a little concerning. Make sure your reading material is on-point and that you're not just taking in the secular sources.

QUESTION RESPONSES

1. See above. Also, go in monk mode for the next 3 months. No approaches. No intentional conversations with girls. Just work on yourself. You sound needy, like you have this idea that getting a girlfriend will fix all of your problems. It won't.
2. Yes, wait until you're ready. I can't say when that will be - it's when you're satisfied that (a) you know your mission in life and it's making a difference for eternity and you are starting to see fruit flow from it, (b) you are no longer compelled by fantasies about getting a girlfriend - if it happens, great, but you don't need it, and (c) when you are comfortable enough in your own skin that you recognize you have become the prize - the kind of guy that girls should crave to be with.
3. RPC sidebar for now.

Mission First Women Always

3 upvotes · 6 October 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I like this. As I write a lot about how "Mission matters, nothing else" and that it should be part of a guy's natural lifestyle to always have women alongside him in his mission - whether that's his wife or the girl he just can't keep himself from banging. I suppose that's my longer way of saying: "Mission first, women always." I like that catch-phrase. Purpose and pleasure certainly create a good balance.

Married Red Pill - Husbands submit yourselves to your wives...

3 upvotes · 3 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Another thought: be cautious of having the mental framework of wanting to know the "red pill interpretation," as if it's just another lens through which we see the world. The red pill is the truth - whatever that truth may be. If the truth were that women became more sexually interested in submissive husbands, that would be the red pill reality.

What you're really asking is how someone with a masculine perspective on intergender relational dynamics would interpret the passages. Quite frankly, I don't really care. I just want to know what the correct interpretation is. U/rocknrollchuck presented a solid biblical case that relied on scripture instead of his own philosophies. I've done it on this sub on those verses too. It's not about how men should look at the verses. It's about figuring out what they actually mean.

Now, I'm sure you already know all of this at least in concept. So why do I spell it out anyway? Because even though I'm sure you agree that the true interpretation is the right and most valuable one, you still asked for a specific lens's perspective rather than just straight up asking what the verses mean. This may sound trite, but it does give some indication of where some lingering blue might be in you. I hope this helps.

Married Red Pill - Husbands submit yourselves to your wives...

3 upvotes · 3 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

But your question wasn't whether or not that interpretation was true. You explicitly asked about how one can embrace this teachings and still be red pill - which assumes it's true.

Phil's September Update

3 upvotes · 3 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for the update, Phil. You should post these in the weekly OYS thread too. Don't worry about the awkward ask out. You already know the issue here. No validation seeking. Nobody else should have the right to tell you who you are or if you're on the right track - their judgments are worthless. A judge is only as good as the power he has, and they have no power to condemn you except what you give them. Sound familiar? "You have no power over me except what God has given you." That's right.

Need Some Help with a New Guy

3 upvotes · 1 October 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I had a similar guy in my group last year. He was a military guy with bpd, tbi, depression, PTSD, and a few lingering issues from his time in Iraq. I respected the hell out of ther guy, but he was certainly a unique case. It's up to you to figure out if it's worth the extra effort to help him beyond what you'd offer any other guy. That said, assuming you proceed, here are a few things I learned.

1. BPD goes in cycles. You'll think you're making progress as he shifts from a low to high phase. Then the low will hit and it's like you lost all your progress. I only got to see 3 cycles with him, but the first reset was certainly frustrating.
2. The most important thing to maintain permanence through the cycles and memory issues is for him to see things with his own eyes and do it with his own hands. Have someone in the group assigned to hang out with him outside of group time to help him practice new life skills and see it done right. This helps bypass short term memory and go straight to long term.
3. Follow Jesus's model rather than a rote teaching model: (1) tell them what, (2) show them how, (3) let them try, (4) send them out, (5) pass it on. Just go really slow with each of the steps. It sounds like he's ready for step 2 on some stuff. But don't skip from 1 to 4 as most groups and teachers do.

4. Isolate logical and emotional approaches to your teaching style. I found that my guy lacked the capacity to retain logical information longer than a few hours, despite clearly understanding it. When something struck an emotional chord within him, that stuck with him into future meetings. I assume this has something to do with the part of his brain that was damaged, but I really don't know.
5. Don't let his issues dominate the group. My guy was generally quiet, so he wasn't my issue. But i did have another guy who had depression years ago who just wanted to talk about his issues all the time. He had great things to say, so people were encouraged to listen to him - but it was all intellectual. He had good thoughts, but it was how because his life didn't follow suit. Don't tolerate that.

I hope this helps.

TRP Has Been Quarantined - Meta Thread

3 upvotes · 28 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yes. I just converted to feminism and will be shutting this whole place down in the next week.

Better Beta Divorce Strategy

3 upvotes · 27 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

just to be specific

State laws vary.

i'm kinda surprised actually you got that one through

I used to be surprised at these things. But now it happens so often that I'm ashamed for the quality of attorneys in my profession. I can get a party to the case not getting it, but there's no good excuse for the attorneys to let things like that slip by. Yet only about 1/3 of them pick up on stuff like that.

what else are you supposed to do with all those extra stacks besides put it in less liquidable after tax assets. in other words, i can only put so much into pre-tax accounts each year by law?

Stocks, mutual funds, whole life insurance, etc. I strongly urge all of my clients to meet with a financial advisor during the pendency of a case to address these types of questions, and also because they'll set up long-term budget planning to make their retirement goals work, which can help me know how hard I need to fight for certain things, which types of retirement accounts my client should get, etc. For example, I had a case recently where the parties had 5 different retirement accounts. Even after tax effecting everything to get a relatively normalized number, there were still peripheral advantages to having the IRA v. the 401K v. the pension v. the stocks, etc. The other side didn't know what was happening, but my client ended up getting the plan types with the most favorable terms and conditions toward their liquidity and future growth potential, whereas she thought he got an even shake because the post-tax dollars lined up. That's not something I could have figured out on my own, given that we were even splitting hairs between two different types of 401Ks, but the financial planner knew exactly what would be most beneficial and made it seem like there was a world of difference.

Long story short, outsource stuff like that to people who know better. Part of being good at my job is knowing the limitations of my own knowledge and experience.

Better Beta Divorce Strategy

3 upvotes · 27 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Maintain it through trial. Go hard alpha with enforcing the order afterward - don't budge an inch. But let me be clear: as long as the kids are minors you NEVER EVER EVER cuss at your ex unless you're doing it playfully and it's obvious. Those will always get brought up next time you go back and it is an easy way to lose shared parenting for being unable to communicate.

Am I being reasonable?

3 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/askMRP

There is no metaphysical standard of reasonable. You want us to give you a standard? We can give you one. That just makes you our tool. Is that better than being your wife's tool if you succumb to her standard? Maybe, but not by much. Figure it out for yourself. This is literally the first or second chapter of WISNIFG.

Dread levels and having an infant (told to chill tf out)

3 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/askMRP

I do see what you're saying by doing fun things together I'm still in her frame and approval seeking. I'll cut that off.

No, that's not what I'm saying at all. You should absolutely do fun things together. What's problematic is when your enjoyment of the activity is influenced by her emotional reaction do it. If you did an escape room and she didn't like it and decided not to participate and pout in the corner until the hour was up ... would that prevent you from having fun or do you have the emotional fortitude to say, "Screw you. I like escape rooms, so I'm going to do it by myself" and then proceed to enjoy it? Or would that affect you and bog you down and ruin it for you?

BJJ ... She actually hates it and wishes I would quit ... If anything it's my side mission

Yeah, so it's obviously not a mission she's excited to get behind. But that might actually be an attractive mission to other girls anyway, so I don't fault you for having this as a side-mission. It just doesn't work with your particular wife.

My goal is to become a nurse practitioner and work in trauma ICU

That's a career path, not a mission.

My mission is to live more authentically

That's not a mission either. That's just a vague statement. Also, if you meet a girl at the bar and she asks, "So what is it you want to accomplish in life?" and you gave this answer, is she going to say, "Heck yeah! That's an awesome mission. I can't wait to follow you on your path to authenticity." No. That's not an attractive mission, if it can even be called a mission at all.

Show my son in this world we live in it is ok to be a man.

Now that's a mission. Your mission is to leave a legacy to the next generation of your lineage. Great. But is it an attractive mission?

Again, let's use the same test. Girl at the bar asks what you're doing in life and you say you're raising your son to be a man. Is she going to say, "I want in. I'd follow a guy to the ends of the living room to fulfill that mission. How can I help? I can't pass up such an exciting opportunity." No. It's not an attractive mission.

Look at Indiana Jones. His mission was to find the lost ark or the holy grail. That's exciting. Look at James Bond. His missions always involve stopping global conspiracies and secret organizations. What woman wouldn't want to help him do it?

Now that's obviously fiction, but the point still stands. If a girl were to ask you what you're doing with your life, what answer could you give that would make her think, "I totally want to be a part of that!"? Winning a BJJ world championship actually sounds like a good mission to me. That's large-scale. It shows discipline and dedication. It's something where she could help you train, cheer you on at competitions, research new strategies and techniques, and possibly even learn it alongside you. It's just not a mission fit for your wife ... or at least not the way you've been leading her in it because you're an isolationist who just wants to go off and do crap by yourself all the time. It's good to get away, but not if you're not giving her something big to join you on as well.

I'm doing that for me. With or without her.

This is the right attitude. That's refreshing to hear. Just make sure that you're making "with her" an option in the first place. If she decides not to join in on your mission after you've invited her, that's her business. But don't exclude her in the first place, otherwise what woman would ever want to follow and submit to you?

My frame is paper thin

Your frame is as strong as your mission. The stronger your mission and the more dedicated to it you are, the less you will need validation from her. You'll get your validation from your mission and the progress you make along the way. The less you need her validation, the stronger your frame and the less likely you'll break it when she acts out.

Dread levels and having an infant (told to chill tf out)

3 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/askMRP

My point ...

...

...

...

Your head.

It's not about how many fun things you do together. That's still in her frame. You're still trying to please her with exciting activities. "She complained on our anniversary" into "She had fun." What the heck? You're judging your success by how much fun she has now?

The "so did I" tag doesn't change the fact of whose frame you're living in. I can do lots of fun things while living in my wife's frame. I truly enjoyed a lot of stuff we did while I was a blue pill beta chump. But the fact that I liked certain parts of it doesn't mean she was begging me to flip her over and take her from behind like she does today.

What's it all working toward? Sure, mommy's proud of the way you fight in your bjj classes. But is that really your life mission? Are you planning on joining a world-class tournament someday, making this a journey that she's excited to follow you on? Or is it just something you do on the side because you like it? What's your life moving toward? Because if you're not going anywhere, she's can't follow you. And women are followers. If she's not following you, she's going to follow someone else. And once you are going somewhere that matters, you might just find yourself surprised at how many other girls want to follow you too.

Difficulty accepting my new reality.

3 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/askMRP

I don't quite know what to do about this, where to put my mindset.

Not here:

I have a new epiphany every day about something my wife has done in the past, why she did it and what it shows she truly thinks or thought about me

Why do you care so much about what she thinks about you? Why does it matter why she did that stuff in the past? You don't have a time machine. You can't go change it all. You know how women operate today. You know how your wife thinks today. Don't worry about connecting old dots. Start making new ones.

I'm finding myself actually feeling resentful of my wife, our relationship's dynamic. Is this just how it is? Suck it up change it?

Of course you're resentful of the dynamic. Your relationship sucks. You've been a pussy and she's been wearing a strap-on. Yeah, change it.

That doesn't mean you have to get a job. I've seen women who are eager to make money and shower it over a high quality man. But being jobless does put you at a disadvantage. Regardless, I'm more talking about getting your act together in the first place. Why are you someone she should want to follow?

Here's the thing: in modern social economics, money is power. It hasn't always been this way. For a time, money didn't exist at all. Raw strength was power. Social status was power. Intelligence was power. She has the power of money. What are you going to do about that? How are you going to take the dominance back in the relationship? Because right now she has you trapped in a little psychological prison that you term as "I am currently almost completely financially dependent on her." Stop thinking that way. If you wanted to, you could beef up your resume, get a decent job, and make a successful life. It might take you a few years to complete that process, but I've seen people do this as late as their 60s and be just fine. She's not the only access you'll ever have to money. She's just the only access you have right now. Do you have options? Then you don't need her. Nevertheless, you can enjoy what she brings to the table and know that you're essentially divorce-rape-proof in the meantime. Sure, it gives you a more difficult time earning her respect and attraction, but it also means you have nothing tying you down to the marriage anyway. She's the one who's going to get stuck paying you child support if she leaves. Turn that into your advantage.

How do I stop going too far and over compensating?

Don't be an idiot. Have a reason for taking control of your life again and what you're going to do with it. Just acting more dominant for the sake of acting more dominant will certainly come off as pathetic, like you're building your frame on sand instead of on a rock. What are you trying to do with your life? What direction are you taking things? How can you change the frame in the relationship so that she works as financial support toward your mission rather than you taking care of the house and kids to support her work?

I don't want to chuck the relationship in the bin, I want it rebuilt differently. Does it have to be knocked down completely first, or is that what I am mentally doing at the moment?

I often take the view that you can't turn ashes to wood. When you've burned something to the ground, it's dead and there's no coming back from that. You can start something new with the same person, but you can't just apply a bandaid to the parts that weren't working and think you're somehow whole again.

Without regard for where you've come from in the past of your relationship, decide today what you want things to look like tomorrow. Imagine that if you were dating someone brand new you just met on Tinder how you would lead the relationship into becoming that. Now imagine she's entering the relationship with the same baggage you gave your wife and contemplate how an effective leader would unpack that baggage - or if he would at all before moving on to the next girl.

Is your wife really that high value that it's worth trying to stick it out with her? If her job is really that great, maybe. After all, you seem to have a pretty cush life. But is all that monetary power going to go to her head in a way she'll never overcome? You've got to figure that out on your own.

Is there a book that deals specifically with a red pill awakening while married?

BPP's book on the sidebar addresses it. I'm also writing one, albeit from an r/RPChristians angle.

Dread levels and having an infant (told to chill tf out)

3 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/askMRP

What are you pursuing in life? Are you Indiana Jones or Dan in Real Life? What about you makes her think: "I want to go where he's going! I'll follow that guy to the ends of the earth"?

Your wife: Well, he has a few bjj competitions that are fun to watch. Oh wait, does she really even go to those?

Intro & Summary

3 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Dang, brother. That is some garbage you were put through growing up. I would ask what you're going to do about it moving forward ... but it sounds like you've already well moved on and made good progress. Props for that.

Question: What's your mission? What's that thing you want to tell God about on judgment day that will make heaven a better place?

Works and desire

3 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

If we only accepted the mercy and grace of God and forgot about the sin, we wouldn't have tempted ourselves again to sin and been able to walk free.

I've quoted it countless times, but I'll do so again. In Practice the Presence of God, it was said of Brother Lawrence that "when he had failed in his duty, he only confessed his fault, saying to God, 'I shall never do otherwise, if you leave me to myself; 'tis you must hinder my falling and mend what is amiss.' That after this, he gave himself no further uneasiness about it."

That's powerful. Embodying that concept radically changed my life.

Good post, brother!

Do you fast?

3 upvotes · 19 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yes, I fast periodically. But you're also not going to find posts in the sidebar about the proper role of baptism or whether or not we should all be speaking in tongues or plenty of other things. To be clear, this is certainly a Christian forum, but it also focuses on (quoting the sidebar):

discuss problems, solutions, and insights on relationships, sex, and biblical masculinity according to biblical principles.

While one could argue that every single aspect of the Christian life somehow relates to "biblical masculinity," and therefore we leave the forum open for discussion on pretty much anything that could be considered related to one of those things, the sidebar content will be limited to those things which are directly related.

One could easily argue that fasting is part of being a biblical man. But women fast too. It's not all that unique to masculinity itself. The only sidebar exception is the 300 series, which is (to my discredit) far from complete and thus far only addresses the very basic disciplines, whereas I would consider for most people that fasting is more of an intermediate thing.

Tell yourself the Truth

3 upvotes · 18 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is an amusing concept. I was actually just having a text conversation with a guy I disciple yesterday about this. We were talking about his struggle to find a relationship and the importance of his mission in that process. At one point I said: You know what I'm going to ask next, right?

He didn't know. I explained, If I can teach you to ask yourself the same questions I would ask you, my job will be done in your life. I believe that. The problem is that most people can't think outside of their own frame to gain a larger perspective on an issue.

I went on to explain: Sometimes when I'm stuck I sit down and have a conversation with Jesus in my head. He always asks questions, never gives blunt answers. But somehow those questions always lead me to what I need to be doing. That's why I ask you so many questions - to do for you what I believe Jesus does for me.

What feels kind of off-putting in posts like these, though, is when people make broad-brush philosophical-sounding claims that don't resonate clearly from Scripture. For example:

Self-examination is a remedy for self-absorption.

or ...

Preaching the gospel to oneself is to bring redemption to the deepest part of you.

or ...

Re-align your shifted self and free yourself to come out of yourself and live fully.

Okay, so those were all in consecutive row. But these types of phrases make me stop and think: What is he really trying to say here? Is self-examination really the remedy to self-absorption? What is self-absorption in the first place and why does it need a remedy? Does he just mean self-centeredness? And if so, how does self-examination actually solve that problem? And what exactly is the "deepest part of me"? Why does it need redemption when I'm already saved? Doesn't the Spirit do that? If so, what does it mean to preach the Gospel to myself? Don't I already have the Gospel? Does the Bible tell us to preach the Gospel to ourselves or is that just some churchy sounding catch-phrase? And what is my shifted self? What does it mean to "come out of myself"? Why can't I live fully in the self God made me to be right now? Is he saying to have an out of body experience?

To be clear, I'm not necessarily disagreeing with some of these phrases. I do see great value in preaching the Gospel to ourselves. That's what the whole 400 series is about, after all. I'm just saying that making these vague claims without defining what you mean by them or giving Scriptural support for them can sound like you're trying to be some guru swami and it actually invites more questions than giving answers ... at least for me.

Either way, thanks for this post!

I feel sort of held back

3 upvotes · 17 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

i have to think so much more, especially around woman im really attracted to

I don't buy the fear explanation. It's too simple and doesn't jive with the fact that this only started after you began to follow Christ. That decision shouldn't increase fear - it should eliminate it (1 John 4:18). There are four likely reasons for this that I can think of, which would each be prompted by a sudden decision to follow Jesus:

- Because before you started following Jesus any woman would do, whereas now you're intentionally more selective, as /u/Redactedddd suggested
- Because the reason you want a woman in the first place has changed.
- I suppose dropping the alcohol, drugs, or whatever other substances you might have been using can also mean you're not as relaxed as you used to be.
- The most likely answer is that you now recognize that women can't fill the void in your life - only Jesus can. As a result, your mind tells you to get women because that's what you know, but your spirit longs for Christ and this conflict is hindering your social game.

The fact that you had a bad breakup can certainly put some psychological factors into play, and they might be tangentially related to fear, but it's more likely than not a form of depression. You likely still feel a sense of loss from the relationship that hasn't quite been filled by Christ. That depression, coupled with a not-yet-fulfilling spiritual bond with Jesus is what's at the root of your social anxiety. Find your peace in Christ and you will find your confidence again.

how can i get it back, the right way, from a christian perspective

I wrote most of this in the 400 series. Find a way to live on the other side of the mirror - the Gospel side - where you're expressing your confidence the way God intends. At that point, it will reflect back into your daily life, including with women.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/05/18)

3 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

/u/rocknrollchuck has given some great advice. Let me supplement a bit.

I started showing up at her work when the EA was ending and he came to me, begging for me not to "be his enemy".

Yeah, like chuck said, don't mate guard. But the fact that his ignoring her still bothers her is a seriously bad sign. It's also one you can't cure.

Women have an internal drive to be in good standing with everyone. They are ruined by the thought that someone out there might be thinking bad things about them. Why? Because women are designed by God to live in other people's frame. When women live in the frame of other women, it's the blind leading the blind because those women don't even know how to maintain their own frame, let alone keep someone else inside of it.

So, it's not surprising to me that your wife is so hung up on this guy avoiding her and not reciprocating attention. Even if she wasn't interested in him anymore, this would still get to her. The best solution is to strengthen your frame and start getting her inside. If you can solve the frame issue, she'll find reassurance within and stop caring so much about why she can't get into this other guy's frame anymore. And if she doesn't, at least you'll be in a better place to handle the fallout.

I'm trying to help her find a new job.

This can help, but the more pressing issue is helping her find a new frame to enter: yours. If you don't buck up your frame, she's just going to repeat this pattern in the new job too.

How do you do this? Stop pandering to her. Stop pedestalizing her. Drop that body fat. Get a decent mission - one with actual eternal consequences. Suck it up and find a new church. No more "we very much dislike trying new churches." There is no "we" about it. You take the lead on this one. And too bad if you don't like it. Do what you've got to do to set yourselves on a good path again. Period. No excuses, especially not, "But I don't wanna!"

We are actively trying to find a new church ... options are limited

Then start one. Seriously, this could be a wonderful short-term mission.

her antidepressants have been hurting her libido

I made my wife switch from Zoloft to Bupropion. It was awkward for her to talk to her gyno about why she wanted to switch meds: to increase her sexuality. I led. She followed. It helped. Nuff said.

She tried to quit but didn't tell anyone and was acting VERY strange

Oh, like when my wife tried to go off Zoloft cold turkey and spent an hour in the closet crying and pounding the wall because I told her I wanted to go to the gym before eating dinner instead of after? That kind of psycho over-reaction stuff?

Here's the thing: mood-stabilizers are addictive. Just like crack, if you try to go off of them, you're going to get withdrawal. My wife experienced that first-hand. Also, the more you use them, the more tolerance you develop. So, the best way to start her dealing with this is:

- First, get her the right medication. I suggested Bupropion because it allegedly has no sexual side-effects, which is unusual for most antidepressants. Interestingly, my wife's Gyno independently recommended the same one.
- Second, Get her on a dosage pattern different from what her doctor recommends. Her doctor will say "1 pill a day" or something like that, just for consistency. That's a bad idea. My wife has busy seasons at work that last for 2.5 months at a time. I have her take a normal dose during this time - that's when she really needs it. After busy season ends, I have her wean down to 1/2 a pill then 1/4 a pill over a couple months, then off until the next busy season. This keeps her body from adapting to the medication and also gives a bigger mood boost when she needs it most because she's jumping from nothing to a full dose. It also keeps her from going psycho while weaning off. I don't know your wife's annual pattern, but a cycle like this can help. Maybe she only needs full pills during PMS and yours is a 1 month cycle instead of my wife's 6-month cycle. That's for you to figure out.
- Third, when she starts acting crazy, she's going to want to go back to a full dose, saying, "See? This isn't working! I need more." Don't let her. Acknowledge that there will always be withdrawal signs. It's inescapable entirely. The point is to get through them, not to give up when they happen.

I served her breakfast in bed this morning ... She loves food, so a lot of my acts of service are food related.

You say it like you're proud. There are times I do nice things for my wife, but it's out of a position of strength and reward. I get the impression that you're doing it to try to appease her. Stop living in her frame.

Also, do you want to encourage her love of food like that? In moderation, I'm sure it's fine. But this can be a quick and easy way toward obesity - especially after you've had your second kid.

[FR] "Lost" Frame for the First Time in a Long Time.

3 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I track with you. But that doesn't mean you just throw in the towel. Your model assumes a high-value man who is stagnant, who isn't going anywhere. This is why I always emphasize on r/RPChristians the importance of having a mission that transcends the relationship and the daily grind of life. Her excitement shouldn't be toward the man, but toward what they're pursuing together. His leadership in pursuing it is what makes him attractive to her. A man without a mission, no matter how high-value, will always be a bore. If Indiana Jones met the girl after he already found the Ark, the Holy Grail, and all that, she'd surely get bored. She wants to be part of the mission alongside him. This is what keeps her engaged.

Moreover, I wrote on a somewhat parallel concept on this sub just 2 weeks ago. Here it is again with applicable commentary in bold.

Consider the old saying, "Women are the gatekeepers of sex; men are the gatekeepers of commitment." Now also consider how much women enjoy dating around. Let's be honest, it's not because they're just as horny as men all the time. Just as a man considers himself to have "conquered" or been "successful" with a woman when he's had sex with her, so also does a woman "conquer" or "succeed" with a man when she's managed to lock down his commitment. Just as a man mistakenly assumes that marriage ends the chase of his wife's sexuality, so also do women mistakenly assume that marriage should end the chase of their husband's commitment [in your terminology, this is when she gets bored, no matter how great he is]. And just as men are polygamous with their desire for sexual conquest, so also are women hypergamous with their commitment conquests, which is what prompts things like branch-swinging [just as a man gets bored of sex with the same woman after a while, so also does she get bored of commitment from the same man after a while]. After all, once you've climbed Denali, you just don't feel as satisfied climbing Pike's Peak. You set your sights on Mt. Everest.

But what would happen if she climbed Pike's Peak, then the next day found that some tectonic plates shifted and the mountain's now a few hundred feet taller and harder to climb? Well, now she can't say she's really locked down Pike's Peak. She's going to have to go at it again. [It's no longer a boring re-hash of what she's already done. It's a new adventure.] What would happen if she locked down her man's commitment and got him to marry her, then she found out that his commitment wasn't as locked down as she once thought? Or what if she had his commitment, but found that there were other parts of his inner-most being that he was holding back - that he hadn't yet trusted her with yet? Surely she would find it a new [non-boring] challenge to get her man to commit even those parts to her, which he otherwise reserved for himself, which is why a man's attractiveness goes up as the woman finds more and more mysterious things about him. It's fun for her to chase after those things, persuading him to unlock them to her.

Just as men love the thrill of the chase of a woman's sexuality and will hop from woman to woman to get it, in the same way, women love the thrill of the chase of a man's commitment and will hop from man to man to get it. [If the man is constantly changing or moving forward on a mission, this triggers the same "newness" and makes it exciting again. Most people just don't take this approach because it's hard work. But Variety is one of the most significant points of DEVI - and sexual strategy isn't only for the bedroom.] It's as much of a drug to them as the high a guy gets from all the sexual IOIs he gets from a new woman. When a man views "the marriage" as a concept in itself, it puts a stop to the chase. It re-frames how men and women relate with each other into an entirely new paradigm focused on intangible standards that make the man and woman assume that "the chase" is over and there are bigger fish to fry.

[FR] "Lost" Frame for the First Time in a Long Time.

3 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Perhaps if there's a better prize out there. Then again, if better men than you want your wife, maybe you're also a bit disillusioned about where the two of you actually stand in comparison with one another.

Field Report- Dropping the Betas, Standing my ground.

3 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I understand. But a modicum of patience is necessary as people receive instruction and learn. I've counseled him once to develop humility. Hopefully he takes that advice seriously.

Introduction + Question

3 upvotes · 5 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good job on putting this list together. Without much time to go too into detail, I did at least want to comment on this:

You will find a lot of articles written about the TRAITS of a Godly woman. A lot of proverbs, and a bunch in the new testament too. Those only show the end product, not how the sausage is made.

This is very important to remember. As I often say: if you can't find a godly woman, raise one up. You've used a simpler and more common colloquialism to communicate this point. Well done.

OYS on Red Pill Christian

3 upvotes · 4 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I've been working sporadically to get auto-mod to post a thread on this and so far it hasn't worked. I'll have to check back in after I've figured it out better.

OYS on Red Pill Christian

3 upvotes · 4 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's a good question. There were reasons initially, but I think they're mostly moot by now. I'll see what I can do about getting something like that set up to be posted weekly.

Church has nominated a female Deacon

3 upvotes · 3 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

So it sounds like, as I suspected, your church uses the title "deacon" for a role different from what the Bible means. In this case, they give more weight and authority to their deacons than the Bible would. This stems from a misbelief that a deacon/servant in the church should be rewarded with extra influence in leadership decisions. The Bible doesn't imply this; it's a human convention and assumes people in the church wouldn't serve just because God wants them to - that they'd only really do it if they got something out of it. Screw that.

To that end, yes, you must oppose this if they're giving these female deacons greater influence over leadership decisions in the church.

I'm still single ... just married [MRP Draft]

3 upvotes · 28 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Darn straight. That's a great way to think about it.

I'm still single ... just married.

3 upvotes · 28 August 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I am a divorce attorney. I'm positioned well enough that if my wife were to leave me, I'd have at least shared parenting with a slight majority of the time with the kids and would not have to pay support. Divorce is not a threat to me.

I'm still single ... just married [MRP Draft]

3 upvotes · 28 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

1 Cor. 11:3 seems to imply otherwise. My mission is to God. 1 Cor. 7 says I am to put that above all else, including my marriage. As I follow Christ, she is to follow me. This is a single line - a chain. You're referencing two parallel lines, which is the egalitarian view, which is not biblical.

Girl i nexted is pissed

3 upvotes · 25 August 2018 · /r/askTRP

If you had gotten what you wanted back then, you wouldn't have felt the compulsion to improve, so you wouldn't have had any potential.

Question on femdom fantasies.

3 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Great response. This strikes me in a strong way:

Down to what troubles me the most as a Christian. We should look for a relationship that mirrors the one that Christ has with the church.

This has long been my view, and it makes me wonder if there is ever a situation where Jesus would want this. I suspect so, but it would be very limited, at best. But even then, it would have to come from a different place than OP is coming from.

Specifically, I used to have femdom fantasies as well - mostly in my lowest blue pill days. But my motivation wasn't the enjoyment of my negative treatment; it was the excitement of seeing a girl who was so into me that she would force me to please her. In other words, it was major validation seeking. But I can see Jesus potentially being tickled at the thought of a Christian being super excited and aggressive about wanting to engage in spiritual reproduction with him, sharing the Gospel all the time and in very assertive ways, which is sometimes necessary (although not every time).

Ready to get engaged (in light of past PMO)

3 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Don't do it with her. That's like saying you're on the fence and can't decide if you should become a republican or a democrat, and then locking yourself in a room with Hillary Clinton for a while, praying that God will give you a clear answer.

Married Man With Girl Friends

3 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Weird ... not sure why reddit removed this post. Anyway, it's approved.

Before answering anything else, it would be helpful to know to what degree you experience temptation to cheat on your wife. My gut reaction is to tell your Bible study guys to screw off for making up "the Bible says!" phrases that the Bible never actually said. But there's also general wisdom in playing it cautious if you're the type of guy who's going to cheat on your wife when she throws a small tantrum. Be wise here.

ONE

They're right - you're to be the husband of one wife ... if you're a leader in the church. And there aren't dozens of verses that say this, I'm pretty sure you quoted the only one. So, I'm curious what other verses they were quoting. Nevertheless, I do interpret 1 Timothy 3:2 as a directive that we should all strive for. That verse simply needed to be said because as a practical reality polygamy was still practiced in that day.

As for whether or not you can have friends of the opposite sex other than your spouse, just look at the apostles. We know for a fact that at least Peter was married (Matthew 8:14), and that so were at least some of "the other apostles" (1 Cor. 9:5). Yet we also know that the apostles spent time with Mary, Martha, and likely several other women as well. In 1 Peter, we see him reference a greeting from the woman who is at Babylon. So, presumably Peter was interacting with other women on a regular basis. He also is the one who spoke about the type of beauty that women should adorn, meaning he was actively looking at other women and contemplating what is godly in a woman and what's not, from which we can presume he spent time around other women. I find it hard to believe he'd set huge standards like that, which were ultimately canonized as Scripture, if he were using his wife as the only template - especially given that we don't have any indication of her godliness, despite other women being singled out for that purpose.

I can't find a direct passage that says, "It is not a sin to have women friends other than your wife" because that just doesn't exist. But the verse that says "Thou shalt not spend time with a woman other than your wife" equally does not exist. To that end, each man is to develop his own conviction, per Romans 14.

TWO

You seem to want to orient this talk around "she ... she ... she." It's her problem. She's the one who wants to control you. She's the one who's selfish. That's weak talk, brother. That's living in her frame, letting her state of being define your conduct and how you approach the conversation.

Another way you're living in her frame: you're assuming you have to have a "talk" to begin with. Why do you assume this? Because you "can tell she wants to have another 'talk.'" See it now?

If you don't want to have that talk, don't have that talk. If she tries to make you have that talk, you can decide if you want to talk back or STFU. You conspicuously left out of your stats the sidebar content you've read. Have you been through WISNIFG yet? If so, look back at your assertive bill of rights #2, 4, and 10.

Depending on how she approaches it, if she's saying, "You shouldn't do this ... You're bad of you do that ... You, you, you," then it's a fitness test. Fog, NI, and AA it away. If she goes into her own insecurities (which is doubtful, but I'll entertain the idea - and a skillful use of NI should bring it there anyway), then it's a comfort test. Reassure her that you're a big boy and she's your little girl and that being extroverted doesn't mean you're going to cheat on her.

Sex Addicted v. Sex Starved [MRP Draft]

3 upvotes · 22 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

If it's on the sidebar, I'm sure I have. I do keep encouraging /u/Deep_Strength to keep posting more of his content here too. It's good stuff and hopefully it would be mutually beneficial as it drives more reddit users to his blog as well.

Pastor's role

3 upvotes · 21 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is the answer right here - far more concise than I would have put it. As a sub-point of #1 (which is appropriately on top), I'd be clear that they must make an intentional, conscious effort to abandon preconceived notions about the faith and stick to rote exegesis of the Scriptures. This, of course, is much more difficult if you're talking to a Catholic/Orthodox pastor/priest because Truth for them is not defined by exegesis and intentionally incorporates "tradition," which implicitly includes concepts that have been a part of church culture for any length of time, at which point you then have to take a more historical approach than a biblical one.

Masculine immaturity is placing responsibilities before roles

3 upvotes · 21 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent post. I really like this. Similar to u/rocknrollchuck, I used to use the analogy of a shoe store owner who always gave away his product to his favorite customer for free going that one day she'd just voluntarily want to start paying him because she liked his shoes so much that she didn't feel right taking them for free.

In reality, she's taking all the money she saved from the store owner to buy some high end Italian designer shoes that she otherwise couldn't have afforded if her freebie giving fan hadn't helped her out so much all that time. Then when she has her designer shoes he gets jealous, asks her to start paying and she laughs at his mediocre stock, walking away with class.

His only real solution here is to make a better product than the Italians and cut her off. Sell to other people to show that he's a high quality businessman and eventually make her jealous ... but by that point he won't care because he's already got tons of other people lined up to buy what he's selling.

What is love?

3 upvotes · 20 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

If we incorporate God as the inspiration of our will, I agree and that becomes a wonderful definition. Otherwise, I could very well murder someone and call it love because:

- It was an act born of my will
- Prompted by my emotional hate of the person
- That emotion led to my act of killing the object of my hate
- And because I believe I am doing him and the world a service by removing him from it

This is why I have never liked the "others more than me" definitions of love. First, because that already has a word: humility. Second, because it gives no objective standard and anything can be rationalized as an act of love.

This is why any good definition of love must account for the fact that "God is love" and therefore nothing can be love if God is not in it.

Q&A on Divorce and Remarriage

3 upvotes · 16 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with what I think u/Rian_Stone is saying. She's the one who has done wrong here, so no need for you to feel guilty over anything.

As you say, you're still married spiritually and legally for now, so screw with her all you want. From there it's just a matter of whether you're acting wisely or not, and it's up to you to figure out how far you're willing to "swim in another man's juices" ... just be careful about getting her pregnant ;)

As for after the divorce, you're free to develop your own conviction. Personally, I find your intentions wise: have nothing to do with this pathetically stereotypical woman. With regard to other women, as I alluded to in my post, there's a reason why Jesus said in Matthew 19 that not everyone can accept a life without sex and why God and his apostles and prophets have had to make concessions throughout history to account for the fallen state of the world we're in, including our own brokenness.

To that end, remarrying may technically be sin ... not unlike the way I technically sin all the time too, but it's a far better option than many other options, including being so preoccupied with controlling sexual urges that you become incapable of doing what God actually has you here for.

"Three reasons why Christian parents are raising slutty girls and beta males"

3 upvotes · 14 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not sure how this logically follows. Non-Christians produce cultural children. As /u/matrixtospartanLV said, Christians who parent like non-Christians (i.e. "weak Christian parenting") will also produce children of the culture. The fact that these are the same doesn't say anything about what "strong Christian parenting" would produce in the face of culture.

Married... with Children

3 upvotes · 13 August 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Solid post. My kids are 6, 4, 3 and 1. I know exactly what you're talking about, and my solution was very similar: mission (which you call vision). I hammer this constantly as the single most important aspect of a sexually fulfilled marriage upon which all other things are built. That's what keeps a man out of his wife's frame and in his own.

Strict Objectivism Necessitates Recalibration

3 upvotes · 13 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Okay, I didn't understand half of that, but this ...

Should she marry anyone at all it's not me; but Jesus Christ within is the epitome of "she's not yours, it's just your turn."

[FR] Duty Sex Doesn't Exist

3 upvotes · 13 August 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Fair enough. Maybe, maybe not. I'm not in your shoes so I really can't say.

Although your preconceived notions on the topic are coloring your feedback - it's feedback I requested all the same. Thanks for the input.

Churches misunderstand attraction

3 upvotes · 10 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Touche. But is that the right reference?

Kicking Porn For Good

3 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

So, I was on mobile while writing that other comment. On further reflection, here are some additional things that have come to mind.

sexual sin does not exclude you from bearing spiritual fruit

Very true. I don't think I ever said that it did. What I said was the reverse: that bearing spiritual fruit is part of the process of overcoming sexual sin. God can use anyone to produce fruit, regardless of their sin, and I fully embrace that concept. But that doesn't mean those people will be free of their sin merely because of the way God uses them.

spiritual fruit in one area is not a cure

Correct again. But a lifestyle oriented toward doing what God put us to do is. When we are facing the right way and taking steps in that direction, by nature we are walking away from the bad directions. The problem is that most Christians define their direction by which way they're not facing. This practice of sin-avoidance doesn't actually orient or point them toward anything godly and ultimately causes many men to fail.

In all of this, I think I agree with the thrust of what you're saying - that God can still use us despite our sin. This is a good word and one that men would do well to listen to. But this post isn't for the men who are questioning the validity of their fruitfulness in the midst of sin. It's for men who want to know how to kick their sinfulness altogether. That requires addressing the issue from a very different angle.

To that end, you'll note that I didn't say "start sharing the Gospel and discipling guys and you'll be free of your porn habits." I laid a foundation that a man must first start with the Gospel, embracing it fully as it relates to his problem (which is more fully fleshed out in the 400-series), and then be operating within his own frame ... and only then does a properly oriented life direction actually start to make a difference.

That's why there are many men who appear to be great evangelists and disciple-makers who still struggle with these issues: because they do not have one or both of the foundational issues supporting their ministry. In my experience, it's usually both. I've rarely found a seminary-trained individual who actually understands the full impact of the Gospel - but even more rare is a Christian who operates in his own frame, and pastors are the worst about this, constantly trying to appease culture's frame or their wife's frame or the elder board's frame, etc.

Kicking Porn For Good

3 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

My pastor said the exact same thing actually.

When he learned to make disciples the way Jesus did, he changed his mind and found this worked for him too. He's one of the 15+ guys I referenced. Others include my dad, who was also a pastor at one point and had a lot of fruit to point to, 6 or 7 guys on staff with parachurch miniseries, 3 small group leaders in my current church, etc. All these guys allegedly had fruit to point to.

There were two threads that many of these men had in common: (1) most of them were taking credit for fruit they hadn't personally produced, simply because they organized or facilitated the environment where someone else could make it happen; and (2) none of their previous fruit were bearing other fruit, so they successfully raised up a tree that was fruitless and defunct ... which some could argue is better than no tree at all (the parable of the fig tree makes me question this).

To be clear, I'm not saying sin prevents us from being fruitful, and don't put words in my mouth on this. You're absolutely right about that! Philippians 1 is for real - "It is true that some preach Christ out of envy and rivalry ... doing so to stir up trouble for me while I am in chains. But what does it matter? The important thing is that in every way, whether from false motives or true, Christ is preached. And because of this I rejoice."

But you're missing a few things in what I wrote. To name a couple: (1) you suggest I'm guilt-tripping men into ministry, but the very first foundational point I laid is that none of this works if someone retains their guilt after the Gospel. (2) You missed that I referenced making a lifestyle of this. If God indwells you, it changes you. You don't need that indwelling to bear fruit, but you do need it if you want the sanctification that comes with God in you.

To go back to my pastor, as he's a great case study on this: he said at one point (combining a few phrases he said over the course of one conversation), "I realize now that I've been doing ministry the wrong way. My seminary schooling never taught me any of this, and I never figured it out in my years of pastoring and studying on my own. I can't believe I had missed something so obvious for so long. I was trying to bear fruit the way secular and church culture modeled it for me and not through the example Jesus modeled for me. It was like I was trying to bear fruit in a lab rather than through the processes God designed in the first place." 6 months later, after he followed a different model of evangelism and discipleship, he reported that he suddenly stopped being tempted toward porn ... and he "couldn't explain it" (the conversation I referenced was merely about changing his philosophy of ministry he got from seminary to a biblically theological one, and it was not in the context of dealing with his porn struggle because, as you say, I didn't want to be the one to disqualify what God could do through him despite his sin, and I rightly assumed that fixing the way he followed God with his ministry would fix the way he followed God with his sexuality). As he last reports, he's still free of porn today and he has me starting an initiative to replicate this in other men in the church as well. That initiative won't work, but it's a good thought and maybe a few will be helped as a result.

Sexual Addiction v. Sexual Starvation

3 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/TheRedPill

As often as I want, which right now is anywhere from 2-5 times a week. I've got more important things to do in life than chase pussy all the time. The important thing is that I get it when I want it.

Sex Addicted v. Sex Starved [MRP Draft]

3 upvotes · 7 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm glad to hear this resonated with you :) What led you to the red pill in the first place? Usually it's something guys stumble on more than women.

How do you reconcile TRP with Christian values?

3 upvotes · 5 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Great response!

The Proverbs 31 Woman In The Modern Era

3 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Misguided though it may be, there is room for men to express their rage. I'd rather a raw man who shows us who he really is inside than a coward who hides it to fit in. I can help the first man, but hardly the second.

You just have to also accept the counsel that /u/Deep_Strength is giving: to learn to move past the rage. The anger stage is a foreign concept to me. I think this is probably because I had already started seeing a lot of this stuff in my job long before finding the red pill (I'm a divorce attorney), so I'd already accepted the failures of both men and women in modern society. But even though I haven't felt the anger stage myself, I do empathetically experience a piece of it when I read about men whose life circumstances have given them good reason to be angry. My heart goes out to you. Keep being real. Don't tone it down as a facade to appease us - tone it down because you want to be a better man in Christ.

The Proverbs 31 Woman In The Modern Era

3 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Proverbs 31 was written by King Lemuel. Some people think he's a pseudonym for Solomon. Others think that Solomon was writing in Proverbs wisdom that he learned from King Lemuel, whoever he may be. Either way, Solomon also said that he didn't find one righteous woman of a thousand (Ecc. 7:28).

What you're suggesting is not a new phenomenon. The Proverbs 31 woman was rare back then. She's rare today. Solomon said she didn't even exist back then. She probably doesn't even exist today.

So, trying to single out the "modern era" doesn't do much for me.

We men literally must tell her how to be this woman by killing her ego and humbling her and then rebuilding her up.

This does resonate with me, though. I have said repeatedly on this sub: If you can't find a godly woman to marry, make one. Pick a woman who has many of the attributes you're looking for, then lead her into developing the rest. When looking for a girl, prioritize the attributes that will be more difficult to lead her into developing. Most notably is her Faithfulness, Availability, and Teachableness. You can't instill these traits in someone easily. But if you find someone with those traits, you can instill anything else in them you desire.

Introduction

3 upvotes · 1 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Hi there, NoFITS!

You've done an excellent job laying out where you're coming from. I really appreciate that, as it gives us plenty of information to work with as we fellowship with you going forward.

The weight thing has already been addressed well by a couple other commenters, so let me go in a different direction.

FIRST

Why do you want to be in a relationship in the first place?

I'm not asking that rhetorically, as if you shouldn't desire this. You were created to desire it. I get it. But the underlying motive for seeking that relationship is different for many people and it speaks volumes about your underlying framework for perceiving the world that can help us reorient you toward swallowing the pill.

And to be clear, /u/matrixtospartanatLV is absolutely right: you still haven't chosen a pill yet. Your post is filled with an apparent intellectual understanding of several foundational red pill concepts, but also has significant undertones that you're still harboring a blue pill ideology of what you think your life should look like.

Understanding why you want to be in a relationship in the first place can help us uproot some of that and steer you in the right direction.

SECOND

What's your low hanging fruit?

I just made a post about yesterday. Obviously looks will be a big one, but if you're evaluating yourself at a 3 right now, at best you're going to get up to a 6 - and even that will take years. What else can you be doing in the immediacy to work on those other 4-ish points that you're lacking? You won't be spending all of your free time at the gym - only most of it. And dieting doesn't consume additional time (if anything, it saves time as you spend less time cooking or going to restaurants). So, what can you work on in those additional hours?

THIRD

With all due respect, you're being picky and choosy right now. Your SMV is high enough to pull single moms and older women who are broken. You say "geeze" to them, but higher value women are probably thinking "geeze" to you. Accept that and embrace it. Then develop a plan to be better.

Getting a girl isn't the best motivation for improving yourself, but if that's what it takes to get you started, get started. Work on your OI and DNGAF attitude along the way. When you've truly become independent of your desire for sex and women, you'll be better off spiritually for it, and you'll be in a position where you're unintentionally more attractive to women anyway.

FOURTH

Lastly, what's your mission?

I see things that you're doing for the Kingdom and to upkeep your own spiritual growth, but what's it all leading toward? Do you have a decisive picture of what your life will be in 10, 20, or 50 years and what you'll have accomplished? Or are you just doing things because you think and know that they're right to do right now? Be intentional with your spiritual disciplines and don't just go with the flow of what you feel like you should be doing in the moment.

[FR] Fixing your SMV

3 upvotes · 31 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Nice. Point noted.

That said, it's actually not as easy as one might think. How's your work-ethic? Are you the guy who browses reddit all day on the job? What about your lifestyle consistency? Do you actually live out everything you preach? Are you telling people not to watch porn, but secretly jacking it in the basement at night? Do you present yourself as a generous and benevolent man, and then walk right by the homeless guy without even glancing his way?

Just having a high moral standard at an intellectual level doesn't mean a woman will perceive you as a moral person with an ethical approach to your life and affairs.

Church Discipline

3 upvotes · 30 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I don't recall Matthew 18 suggesting the discipline be public. The only conclusion I recall there is that if the person continues in non-repentance, they are to be regarded as a non-Christian. It isn't until 1 Cor. 5 that we get further clarity: if they continue to identify as a Christian in the midst of their non-repentance, then we are to cease contact with them. But even that doesn't demand a public proclamation.

Recent breakup - emotional aftermath and conflict

3 upvotes · 30 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

2/2

Now, you might argue back, "But I'm not the greatest catch either. I'd love to have the perfect godly man that you're implying I should look for, but is that man really going to want a girl like me? Someone who's had oral sex and who isn't all that fashionable, etc.?" That's where the red pill can help.

The typical church answer to that question is just to "be yourself and God will bring the right person along." This isn't going to work. Those types of marriages usually end in divorce. I'm a divorce attorney - I see a lot of it. What happens is that these types of people don't make a ton of effort to be attractive all the time, so when someone does finally notice them they get emotionally invested and irrationally infatuated with the relationship. This infatuation typically lasts for about 3-4 years in a dating relationship or until 6-24 months after a marriage, then it dies. After that, the two are left wondering why they even married in the first place - because they let their infatuation/emotions guide their relationship instead of wisdom. When the emotions fade (and they ALWAYS FADE), they realize that the other person really isn't the type of person they would have wanted to marry if they had been sober-minded (i.e. not in an infatuated state). This is what you're feeling toward your ex. You had an emotional infatuation toward him, but if you were to marry him you'd realize after a few years and possibly some kids that he's not actually the type of guy you want to spend the rest of your life with.

This is made even more clear to me when you write:

his distance has also made me realize that I love him.

You seem to be defining love in this sentence by the emotions you experience. Those emotions are "infatuation," not love. Love, biblically, is not an emotion. It is a behavioral orientation. Seriously, look through 1 Cor. 13:4-7, for example. Whenever it says "love is," it's describing something that is an active choice. The times that it uses emotional words (envy, pride, easily angered, etc.) it says "love is not." Or if we look at Hebrew words for love in 103, we see that Raya is defined by the things we do with one another, Ahava is defined by the decisions we make in furtherance of our commitment to one another, and Dod is defined by the way we actively express our passion for one another.

Emotions can prompt us to act in a loving way toward others - especially in a romantic context; but what about when those emotions fade and we're no longer feeling that way? Does that mean it's impossible to love our spouse when we're upset with them? No, because love is defined by the orientation of our conduct - toward someone else or against them - and not our emotions. Jesus did not say, "The one who has gushy feelings for me is the one who loves me." He said, "The one who obeys me ..."

I say all of this simply to point out that you don't really love this man. You want something from him. You want the emotions that you believe he can keep giving you. The sooner you can accept this, the sooner you will be able to move on from this unhealthy relationship.

There's a ton more to say on the practical aspects of your situation, but let me shift gears even further. The point of marriage isn't to make you happy. I get the impression that you're looking for a spouse who will give you the "happily ever after" that Disney always taught you to dream of. A long-standing principle of "red pill" thinking is that "happily ever after" doesn't exist. There is no point where you can stop working and things just magically work out. There is no situation where you're going to be happy for "ever after" that point forward. There will be ups. There will be downs. There will be a ton more mediocre days than either of those. Embrace this. Truth and reality are what will give you sober judgment to make wise decisions. I believe this is why Paul says in Philippians 1 that our "love" should "abound more and more in knowledge and depth of insight." Notice he didn't say that love should abound more and more in our emotions and feelings?

So what is the purpose of marriage? To do God's will. How does that get accomplished in marriage? God gives a man a mission and the man invites a woman along to help him fulfill it. That mission is the purpose of your marriage.

You found a guy who is not on a mission for God. He's on a mission for his own pleasure and gratification. I know you want to defend him in a million different ways, but that's the truth. As we often say on red pill forums: watch what they do, not what they say. Actions speak louder than words. If you were to get this guy back and he proposes and you get married ... you'll still be with a guy who isn't contributing anything of value to God's Kingdom.

When judgment day comes, you will have to answer to God. God's first judgment will be on your husband. Do you want to be the guy who on that day makes excuses or the guy to whom God says, "Well done, good and faithful servant"? Because after your husband is judged, God will look at you and your answer must be, "I helped him do it." So, if your husband is a guy who wastes his life away on things that don't advance God's purposes, you're going to have to tell God, "I helped him do it." But if you're married to a guy who has done God's work and who has produced great fruit for God's Kingdom, you will tell God joyfully: "I helped him do it."

Which woman do you want to be? What vision do you want to help your husband accomplish? And let's be clear, if you marry a guy who isn't doing God's work, and he makes excuses to God on Judgment Day and your turn comes up and you say, "I didn't help him do all that, I did my own thing in your name," do you think God will be proud? Do you think God will say, "I designed you to be a helper to your husband ... but phew, I'm glad you didn't listen to me on that one!" No, he's going to ask you, "Why weren't you faithful to your husband? Why didn't you help him?" And then you will be stuck making excuses to God between your obligation to Him and your obligation to your husband. You don't want to be in that position.

Let this guy go. Read /u/RedPillWonder's post. Become the best prospective bride you can possibly imagine. Go find a guy who is doing something productive to God's Kingdom with his life. Then, if he's not already attractive, send him here and we'll kick his butt in gear.

Recent breakup - emotional aftermath and conflict

3 upvotes · 30 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

1/2

I know I'm a little late to the party, but this is my first day back from vacation. There are certainly a lot of really good answers here - most notably from /u/RedPillWonder. He wrote an incredible piece early in this sub's development, which might be of use to you: here. It goes through a lot of the things that a single woman should be doing and thinking about to prime herself for a successful marriage and to optimize the type of guy she (you) can get. I know it sounds weird talking in those terms, but the reality is that social dynamics do involve a sort of "tiering" or "class" system, where the phrase "he/she's out of my league" actually makes sense in a somewhat literal way - that there are actually leagues, and people will only date within their own league (or very close to it).

With that in mind, it sounds like this guy you've been chasing is in a lower league than you. I get the impression from everything you're describing, including from your comments in this thread, that he's not necessarily a high value man, but that you've somehow pair bonded to him due to your past relationship and you're afraid of the ongoing pain of embracing the loss of that pair bond.

This is a very difficult thing to experience. But it's also a necessary and important thing. Without experiencing the pain of a loss like this, you will not know the gravity of divorce in the future. That's not to say everyone should experience such a loss just to make them more cognizant of the effect of divorce; rather, it's to say that there is something to be redeemed out of the pain you're feeling, which can contribute to your being a better and more faithful spouse in the future.

To get on to the bulk of this, the first thing I want to address is the spiritual maturity aspect to all of this. As /u/matrixtospartanatLV said, you are unequally yoked. You have an actual interest in pursuing your faith. He does not. It sounds like he has developed some weird version of Christianity that is easier for him to follow than the real thing, but you're making excuses for him by simply saying his theology is "complicated." Don't make excuses for him. He abandoned the fellowship, he abandoned biblical convictions on sexuality, and he's continuing in a life defiant to God's wishes and expectations. You don't need a man in your life like that. It will do you great harm.

But let's be clear about this as well: you can't expect him to remain sexually pure when you haven't maintained that boundary either. From one of your other comments, it sounds like you engaged in oral with him on occasion. I get the impression you try to justify it by acknowledging a conviction against doing it before marriage and saying it wasn't often, but the bottom line is that you had a boundary that you chose to cross for this man. You engaged in sexual sin with him, now he's engaging in sexual sin with someone else. In all likelihood, now that he's been overtly sexually active with someone else, for him there's no going back to the way things used to be with you - especially not if you renew your commitment to remaining pure until marriage.

I wish I had something easier to say/hear on that point, but this is the reality of the matter. The fact that you teach

Sunday school or have good feelings about God from time to time when you pray or read the Bible, etc. doesn't negate the spiritual immaturity you lived in while in this relationship. What can negate it, though, is a renewal of your commitment to Christ as your top priority and the one who decides your boundaries. For many people, they end up crossing "personal boundaries" because they're just that: personal. If we recognize that Jesus - our spiritual spouse - is the one who sets our boundaries and that they're not ours to decide whether to keep or break, that can go a long way in bolstering the strength of our determination to keep those boundaries secure.

More to the point, the fact that you are at least oriented toward Christ and he is oriented away speaks volumes of his value as a man. In secular terms, he might be a great catch. I expect he's really good looking, very charming, has a lot of great career prospect/success, etc. But as Christians we don't value things the way the world does; our perception of value is defined by the value God assigns to something. If God values sexual purity, then sexual purity contributes to how we should value a prospective mate. If God values fellowship, then we should value in a prospective mate their drive to fellowship with other believers as well.

When you look at his behaviors and compare them to the traits that God values in a person, do you believe he is the type of man that God wants you to be attracted to? Or is it just your flesh that desires a guy like that? And let's be clear - as /u/OsmiumZulu has noted before - that your flesh will always contribute to your sexuality. Just because God gives you a new spirit doesn't mean he gives you a new libido to match it. So, I get that your flesh will be all tingly for a guy like him, if he's as high value in the secular sense as I assume he must be to have you so hooked on him. But: is it wise to be pursuing a guy like this? The answer must be a resounding no.

Training the Next Generation

3 upvotes · 30 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I was on vacation when this came out, so I wasn't responding to much ... but this is a good topic that needs to be addressed more: how to raise our kids to know the truth of what God expects in marriage and relationships.

Sadly, there is virtually no content in mainstream Christianity that will give an actual biblical look at relationships. The best I can suggest is to do your own personal study with your kids to address these issues. Don't have it be a 1-2 week thing. Let it be ongoing for months.

Where to start? If physical marriage between a man and woman is parallel to spiritual marriage between Christ and his church, then the pre-spiritual-marriage process (evangelism) should also parallel the pre-physical-marriage process (dating). So, study evangelism. Learn how God draws his bride to himself and how the bride is meant to respond. Consider all the principles of what God will and won't do with non-Christians. Look at how God selects and initiates and pursues, etc. Look at the types of people he rejects and turns away from. These are the guiding principles we have for how we should be seeking a potential spouse as well.

Relationship started Secular/RP and now I'm wanting to reset it in the way Christ designed. Is it possible?

3 upvotes · 29 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The degree to which it is possible is directly proportional to the strength of your will power and the internal orientation of your heart. If you are oriented rightly and have a strong will power, it won't be a problem. But you're describing yourself as someone with a weak will power and your heart orientation is still in the "calibrating" phase. You now are aligned the right way, but you don't really know what that means or what it looks like in practice. The fact that you have a mentor at all, though, puts you in the top 3% and will greatly accelerate your progress.

With weak will powered men, the only way a "physical step back" in the relationship actually ever works is if you cut off physical touch entirely for a time and only ease it back in very gradually. Whatever boundaries you set, one you're aroused you'll always cross them.

From what you've written, I get the impression that she will be more of a distraction to you than a help. You're already physically distracted by her and can't stick to your own frame/boundaries. You're preoccupied with the red flags you've noticed. Your feelings toward her seem very wishy washy to the point where you want other people - whether us or your mentor - to tell you how you ought to feel. Long story short, you're already distracted.

But that doesn't mean you can't refocus and make her part of your mission to make disciples. Start discipling her. Set a boundary that you can't be on the same page with a relationship until you're on the same page with Christ first, so the relationship is on hold - public settings only, so you're not tempted. When you're satisfied with her progress and sure she's worth a long term commitment, propose. If you decide it's not going to work, then move on.

In general, though, I'll refrain u/OsmiumZulu's recurring line: "If it's not a hell yeah, it's a hell no." More to say, but I'm sick of typing on mobile.

Should I keep this girl around to potentially LTR later??

3 upvotes · 16 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I definitely didn't get the impression that girl 2 was masculine/dominant. My point isn't about who she is, but in how you interact with her. You seem like you have her on a pedestal and you'll bend to her will. It's not so much that she's trying to lead you as it is that you're trying to follow her and that this will be the orientation of your mind in the relationship.

It's great that girl 2 played an instrumental role in your faith journey. That's a wonderful thing, and I've written a post on the way opposite sexes can do that. But the fact is that you should be getting that guidance from other men, not from her. If you don't have those types of men in your life, I can understand why this was so alluring to you. Your girlfriend, on the other hand, is responding the way a wife should.

I hope this helps :)

Embarrassed and unsure

3 upvotes · 16 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I remember having wet dreams until I was around 21, so that's not unnatural. They stopped after one particular dream.

I was in a dark, but large closet making out with a crazy hot girl. I'm feeling her up and eventually pause, then step out to get a drink. Outside the door, I was apparently at an outdoor bar on an island/beach and all my Christian friends were there too, having no idea what I was just doing. I ordered a milk from the bar (which is weird because I hate milk), recouped my thoughts, talked to my discipler for a brief moment (I don't remember what he said), then went back into the room. She had stripped down to black, highly revealing lingerie, pushed me against the wall, and started sucking on my neck while grinding on me.

I softly pushed her away and said, "This is wrong. I can't do this," and left the room.

Everything immediately faded into blackness and it was just me in the middle of nowhere. Then a voice spoke, "Yes, [RC], even in your dreams you must obey me." Then I woke up. I've never had a wet dream since. I also have very lucid dreams and I make sure not to put myself in that position, though some dreams make it hard. But my mind is oriented, even in my subconscious, toward obedience. That's not to say I'm always perfect - not by a longshot. But I do believe that was a small piece of prophecy over my life and one of two times I have audibly heard the voice of God (although I don't say that often because most people - even Christians - think I'm a loon as soon as I say anything about hearing God audibly).

I've been having sex with my girlfriend is it possibly to reset our relationship on the right path?

3 upvotes · 16 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Hah ... this is the right answer. Get married or get out. I mean, it's possible to keep dating and just cut off the sex, but as a practical matter, once someone falls into temptation repeatedly, it's unlikely they're going to be able to suddenly resist that temptation without a clear "goal date" in mind. In this case, that "goal date" is a wedding date, where they know the "resisting temptation" phase will only be temporary.

Understanding The Outliers?

3 upvotes · 10 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

2/2

Perhaps the most significant reason for the change is aligned with what /u/Willow-girl said about her perceiving herself as a sexual being. My wife was always very attractive and had men interested in her, but she had stifled any thoughts of that interest at all so deep that she never felt sexual. She saw their sexual interest in her not as a sign that she was sexually attractive, but as a sign that men are just pigs and will screw anything under 200lbs. Interestingly, she takes every other comment, glare, or subliminal context involving her incredibly personally ... but sexual interest she casts aside as not being personal about her.

Even today she still tries to avoid anything that might cause other men to become sexually interested in her, but around our own house she'll now make comments about how awesome she is and how I should feel lucky to be married to such a "hot mama." I AA my way through those types of tests well enough that she knows she's really the lucky one - and she'll admit that from time to time too. But my point here is that she's starting to embrace, at least in private, that she is a sexual being.

This happened because I started making her feel sexy. That was the foundation for my writing 104 about making your wife feel sexy. Interestingly, a few months later I almost deleted it and tried to renumber the entire sidebar to exclude it, thinking it was an embarrassment to the sub. It had very beta vibes to me, teaching men how to pump up their wives' egos even more. Yet as we stand today, with voting locked, it's the second highest rated of all of my sidebar content. That blows my mind that my least favorite of all of my content is rated so highly. But looking back, I understand why: because church women are taught not to feel sexy, but teaching them to feel sexy is the exact answer to unlocking their inner-nympho.

My wife explained at one point during an argument before I wrote 104 that she didn't ever feel like having sex because she didn't feel sexy. She was embarrassed of her body in the wake of a pregnancy/delivery, especially because several months post-delivery she still had not gotten back to her pre-pregnancy weight. No amount of blue pill supplication with my words was going to solve the problem. I had to show her with my actions, per Corrolary 2 of 104: Your wife needs to know that she is so irresistible that you will fight through any barrier to get in her panties - even barriers that she herself puts up.

My wife didn't start feeling sexy for the first time in her life until just over a year ago - about the time I created RPC. It's not just about "being more alpha" in your daily routine, how you lead the family, etc. It's about how you initiate with her. How you talk to her. How you touch her while she's eating dinner. How you tease her. The standard self-improvement stuff is the foundation to make all that stuff work. But you still have to make her feel like you're undressing her with your eyes every time you look at her.

But that's disrespectful, Red. It would be awkward to stare at my wife that way. She'd think I'm some kind of creepy perv and that I only want her for her body.

So?

Who cares what she thinks? My wife has made the comment, "You only want me for sex!" so many times I've lost count. She even said that during our 18 month dead bedroom (no sex at all), which still blows my mind. But instead of denying the claim and defending my "honorable character" and the fact that "men should want women for more than just sex" ... I now just say, "Of course not, honey. Hand jobs and groping your boobs are pretty great too." She rolls her eyes, knowing that I'm teasing her - but that teasing, especially as the frequency picks up, is what starts making her feel like a sexual being again.

If I didn't have my crap together with my job, around the house, with my physique, etc. then I'd just come off as icky, but with the proper foundation there's room for her to appreciate the raw desire that I can express to her. We have 4 kids. Sometimes I'll even hammer her against the wall to make out even when they're around. She gets all embarrassed, protesting that we can't do that in front of the kids. I just whisper in her ear, "I know, but I just have to have you right now. I don't care who's watching." With that line, I'm not teasing. Sometimes I legitimately mean it. Other times I'm merely expressing what I want to be feeling toward her because I know that's the starting point to get both of us really in the mood. But the goal is to get her to believe it. We obviously don't have sex in front of our kids on the spot, but it does get her ramped up to put the kids in bed asap, especially if I'm start dipping my hands below her waistline before letting her stop me.

I can't pretend to know your situation exactly, but it seems like you're at the same place I was a year ago. You've probably made a lot of progress on improving your own personal life overall. But I get the impression that you think you being a great guy is what's going to make her wet for you. It's not. That's what enables her to become wet for you. You still have to do something in the moment to trigger her hormones and get the juices flowing. It sounds like you've let her general asexual attitude shape the way you initiate with her, or that you think foreplay starts when sex is actually a possibility. In reality, "foreplay starts in the morning" - but not the way beta Christians say that phrase. It's not because you're doing all the chores and going to work and all that to impress her into sleeping with you. It's because you start playing with her in a sexually alluring way from the beginning of the day.

Peep in on her while she's taking her morning shower. Grope her while she's trying to get her shirt on. Kiss her passionately on your way out the door to work. Tease her through text message while you're at the office. Call her on your way home and tell her she'd better put on something that shows good cleavage because it's been a long day staring at a computer and you need something a little more ... pleasant to look at when you get home. Put your hand on her leg while you're watching the kids play at the mall, then slowly and gradually, bit by bit, slide it up her thigh over time and see how far you can get before she notices.

Chances are that even if she doesn't feel sexy, she still idolizes those who are sexy. She looks at the other women and thinks how easy their lives must be, looking so gorgeous all the time, meeting guys who can give them a 5 bedroom house with granite counter tops and 3 full baths. She either wishes she could be one of them or resents them because she can't be. If you can get her feeling like she is one of them, not only will she start acting like one of them, but she'll also start taking steps to begin looking like one of them too.

Tag: /u/Deep_Strength - because you tend to have some different thoughts on "gaming your wife" that might bring some balance to anything I've said.

Understanding The Outliers?

3 upvotes · 10 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

1/2

I have incredible experience with a woman like this: my own wife. At least, so I thought. My first askMRP post was about this issue exactly. Some of the advice I got was: "Some women are hopeless; divorce her and move on." Others said, "You're clueless. She's just like all the other girls, you just haven't figured out how to tap into that side of her yet." Over a year later, it turns out the latter crowd was right.

As much as you might think you're married to one of the "good girls," I'm sure I was 100x more convinced than you think you are that my wife was an outlier. You talk about your wife having never identified herself as a sexual person - my wife specifically and intentionally identified herself as an anti-sexual person. She thought sex was dirty and gross and only existed to reproduce and keep men from watching porn. She refrained things like, "My parents only ever taught me two things about sex: it's bad and it hurts a lot" and that ingrained in her psyche.

She did not have the party years, did not ride the c-carousel, I'm the only guy she ever dated, ever kissed, and ever held hands with (except her dad). Growing up, when she had sexual desires she stifled and repressed them as evil and refused to think of men in a sexual way. She wouldn't watch movies and think, "He's hot." If any hint of nudity came on, she'd walk away.

That's where I was coming from when I started my journey. As /u/OsmiumZulu points out, some of these women marry men because they want a soft, easy, comfortable life. My wife still brings up every now and then that she's disappointed I didn't become a doctor like I went to school for when we were dating ... I'm only an attorney. She's also made comments that she was never sexually attracted to me, even when we were dating - that she was just told by "the church" to "find the most spiritually mature man you can and marry him," so that's what she did. She also admitted to lying to me about lots of things about herself, including her sexual desires, in order to get me to marry her.

All of that being said, I have still made uncanny strides toward sexual fulfillment. There are some boundaries she hasn't crossed yet, like giving a blowjob. But I can see us moving in that direction. There are other boundaries that I thought she'd never get into that suddenly she's going crazy over.

For example, a few weeks ago she had her first vaginal orgasm and was excited about trying something new. Sex was always silent before, but just last week I literally had her screaming my name so I'd let her have her orgasm. She actually came up with the idea just under a year ago to tie rope to the bedframes, or in another case to bring food into the bedroom.

All of these things that she's now doing are things that two years ago I would have said: "Impossible. My wife will never do that no matter how alpha I become." They're also things that she verbally said she would never do because "anything other than missionary or girl on top is carnal and evil."

No, I didn't give her a theology lesson on sex. She didn't go to a sex therapist or marriage counselor. She didn't talk to any girl friends about it. She didn't hear a sermon on the topic. She didn't read any books about sex, and heaven forbid she ever google "sex" or read a blog post about it.

Things changed because I led her into that change with my actions, not my words. It happened because of all of the content I have put up on the sidebar here.

Tag: /u/rocknrollchuck

Sex god method... RPC Perspective?

3 upvotes · 9 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Where do you think her conviction is coming from: the bible or prudish piety from church culture? That should tell you whether you should honor her conviction or not. If her attitude toward sexual acts that make her husband feel honored and loved is one of pride and condescension against it, that should be rooted out, not honored.

Would anybody be interested in RPChristians Handbook?

3 upvotes · 8 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

To be clear, I said I was working on a book that would include some of the sidebar content, although heavily updated and revised and with lots of new stuff. That said, I'm still many months away from finishing.

Reworking the Sidebar

3 upvotes · 7 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Not a bad idea. It will still be quite a while, of course.

Happy Belated 4th, men. Here's my bi-monthly example of what NOT to do. Link in comments.

3 upvotes · 5 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It reads more like a fake/troll post to me anyway. I think Glass just got a little bit gullible on this one.

Apparently there's a sidebar

3 upvotes · 4 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It's in the 100 Series and 200 Series link. I also just put up links to all of that content as their own compilation threads. I think it's 101 and 203.

What if all you ever did was fail in life.

3 upvotes · 4 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I can certainly empathize with your frustration, my friend. As much as I'd like to help, there are some basics that will really help. In no particular order ...

1. Stats? Body fat, lifts, height, weight, etc.
2. How much of the sidebar material have you read? NMMNG? WISNIFG?
3. How's your relationship with God? How would you rank yourself in each of the seven basics right now (see 300 series)?
4. What's your mission in life? What steps are you taking to pursue it?
5. How's your social network? Do you have lots of friends or one or two close friends or no one at all? What are you doing to meet new people? What are you doing to follow-up with new people you meet?
6. Are you involved in a church? What do you do with your church other than weekly services? Can you articulate the Gospel? Do you feel comfortable sharing the Gospel with anyone else?
7. How's your sense of style? Are you wearing gym shorts and t-shirts or sweats everywhere? Do you have well-fitting jeans and some polos/button-ups?
8. What have your last few dates been like? Who initiated? How was the conversation? What types of things did you do? Why didn't it work out?

These types of things will give us a much better insight into your character and the types of things where you might be falling short which can really help you in the long-run.

Social Influence and Defying Context

3 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

No joke, I was just looking up your number last night to see how you're doing, but I ended up getting side-tracked.

Anyway ... that LAHWF stuff is incredible. That was me in high school/college. I mentioned on MRP once how I used to "run experiments on people." My stuff wasn't as overt as this, but it certainly helped me stand out from the crowd.

My favorite was a bit I called the "Cuban banana." In essence, you introduce yourself to someone, ask about something innocuous like the weather. Whatever they answer you just say, "Oh yeah, that's just like Cuban bananas" (or make up some other nonsensical phrase). She thinks it's weird that I just said that and I say, "Why do you think that's weird? Don't you know what I'm talking about?" She laughs and acts clueless. I say, "Interesting. You've got my attention ... so what did you think I was talking about?" (note: I don't actually explain anything). She then starts trying to rationalize something and I'm like, "That's totally weird. Why would you think I'd mean to say something like that?" and I'll follow-up with related questions that put the pressure on her to reveal information about herself without questioning me anymore: "Are you some kind of botanist or something? I mean, why would you think bananas respond to the weather that way?" I keep asking these types of questions until I have a decent bit of information about her. When I'm done I just say, "Well, this has been an interesting conversation, but you don't have to try so hard." She says, "What are you talking about?" I say, "I just commented on the weather and you started telling me x, and y, and z about yourself. It's not like I'm interviewing you to be my girlfriend or something. Or maybe that's what you wanted. Whatever. Want to go for a walk?"

I wrote it up in more detail here.

I'm fairly new to redpill, but with my Christian beliefs I don't fully trust redpill.

3 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

In response to your post and many others, I have stared today the process of reworking the sidebar to make content more accessible to singles. /u/rocknrollchuck gave a few great links. I wrote one a few months ago here. There are more if we go further back.

My ultimate position on pre-marriage advice goes something like this. God set up a clear parallel between the husband/wife relationship and the Christ/Church relationship. It makes sense, then, that the way we enter into each of those relationships should also be parallel. In the Christ/Church relationship, we call that process evangelism. So, if we study and read up on evangelism - how it's done, the goal/focus, methodologies, etc. - we get more insight on how we should engage in relationships before marriage too. The parable of the sower is probably the best place to start for that.

Reworking the Sidebar

3 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Ugh ... good to know. I have been avoiding the redesign as much as possible.

Dealing with ONEitis

3 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The love of women is fine. This is natural for men. The idolatry of women in their hearts is the problem that causes men to treat women like their god. The solution is not for a man to become more feminine, but for him to abandon idolatry and look to Christ.

Are Christian events a bad date idea...why?

3 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with /u/OsmiumZulu - what you're reading on these other forums is bad advice. Want some good advice? Do whatever you feel like doing. You want to stay for 10 hours? Stay for 10 hours. You want to leave for coffee after 15 minutes? Go get coffee after 15 minutes. You want to introduce her to your male model friend named Chad? Go introduce her.

The phrase "just be yourself" gets a lot of heat, but it's actually good advice. It gets a lot of negativity on red pill subs because most people interpret that as, "It's okay to be shy, nervous, lazy, and idolatrous toward a woman." But are those really traits that define you?

Once you've started your path toward self-improvement (BTW: we don't have your stats and bio here), being yourself IS the best advice. At that point yourself should be pretty darn awesome and attractive to any woman.

Being anything other than yourself would imply that you're ceding who you are in order to appease a woman. Don't do that.

TL;DR - If who you are sucks, don't be yourself - improve yourself. If you've already started that path, don't change who you are to impress a woman; you don't want the woman who forces you to do that in the first place.

Phil's June Update

3 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's because most churches and small group leaders don't understand discipleship the way Jesus practiced it - life on life. When I lead a small group, I'm calling up the guys when I have to go to the grocery store, when I feel like going to a movie, when I read a book and just have to tell someone about what I learned, or when I heard a song on the radio that I thought was cool. Many of them learned to do this back and bonds develop that just don't happen naturally under a modern first world culture.

The solution, though, is not to run from the church like the man who ran back to his gang. It's to transform the church. To be a leader who re-introduces fellowship to God's Kingdom the way God always intended and modeled through Christ. I don't want to hear "It's too hard" or "No one will listen." That's putting a limit on God as if it's your job to do His work.

RPC approach to dealing with Body Dysmorphia and other psychological insecurities?

3 upvotes · 14 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is the answer right here. Nobody cares. Hair is hair. The classic RP answer is to own it. Short guys have it worse than balding guys, but they always seem to make it just fine anyway.

She wants God not you

3 upvotes · 11 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The passage you referenced plus Genesis 2.

[FR] Calculate your "cost per fuck"

3 upvotes · 8 June 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Better now than 10 years from now. Staying longer only makes financial sense in a marriage if you're staying forever or if you're the one divorce raping her.

[NSFW] Sexual Techniques, Strategies, and Games

3 upvotes · 5 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

We were both virgins when we married, so this is all stuff we figured out together.

lol's from women at church

3 upvotes · 4 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Once a woman commits to a man in marriage, especially a Christian woman, it takes a significant emotional betrayal to get her considering other men.

I would qualify this with the spiritual maturity of the woman. There are countless women who self-identify as Christians and attend church services 4 weeks a month, but who would readily succumb to temptation. I have seen it over and over again.

I have also seen very spiritually mature women who married alpha men who were not spiritually mature. These women then lost their maturity, regressed in their relationship with God as a result of the poor leadership of their husbands, and then ended up cheating on their husbands (I've seen this happen at least 3 times in the past few years).

The conclusion here is that if a man wants his wife to remain faithful to him, it's not just about making sure she's a Christian and that he's good looking - he must lead her into spiritual maturity so that she takes her faith commitment seriously. Incidentally, this will also draw her toward her husband and not merely condition her away from leaving her husband.

Maturity is dependent on the mission, so once the man develops his mission from God and orients his life toward the fulfillment of the same and appropriately leads his wife in understanding her role as his helper on that mission - that is when she will be most faithful.

express your fear to your wife

I'm with /u/Deep_Strength on this one - this is generally a bad idea.

I'm not convinced that /u/palmorwrist has made his looks an idol. Maybe he has, maybe he hasn't. What I do see is that he has misunderstood how women evaluate male SMV. Men evaluate female SMV based on looks almost exclusively, so he may naturally assume that women evaluate him that way too.

In reality, looks are only one factor of many that women use. In a man's evaluation of a woman, 8 points may be based on looks alone and the other 2 based on a miscellaneous number of factors. For women, a man's looks might be worth about 3ish points. His charm might be worth another 3 or 4 points. His income is another point, his social status another, etc. At the end of the day, looks might still be the highest contributor, but a downright ugly man could still be a 6 or 7 in a girl's mind if he has all the other factors going for him.

To that end, my impression is that OP's issue is not idolizing looks or fear of what she might do if he's no longer the best looking. It's based on a misunderstanding of how women evaluate a man's attractiveness. Notice that his post and comments here point to his "game" and charm as being what attracted them, yet he assumes it's his looks that did it. If he reorients this understanding all will be well in the world.

Talking About Attraction

As /u/Deep_Strength noted, trying to discuss this issue with her directly could be counter-productive. It's often said in RP: "Women don't want to talk about game; they want a man who naturally understands how to play the game without needing the affirmation of whether he's doing it right or wrong."

- When a woman has to explain to her man how female attraction works, it tells her that he was never naturally attractive to begin with - that he was faking it and eventually his charade got tripped up by a misunderstanding.
- The explanation conversation also sows a seed of doubt because she's now giving him the tools to fake it. If she consoles him with, "It's not just about your looks. I love you because of your x and your y and the way you z," now she's telling him attraction triggers that may have been natural for him, but she'll start to question whether after that he's doing those things because they're natural (which she questioned due to the previous point) or if he's living them out because she gave him inside information. Either way, she no longer knows if she married an attractive man or a man who's good at pretending to be attractive.
- Looking for affirmation from a woman is also more generally a display of low value. It can have a short-term immediate boost to "intimacy," but intimacy levels fade quite quickly as soon as one's attention is redirected toward anything else. After the short-term intimacy boost is gone, the permanent effects on how she views her husband afterward sets in.

- If it were purely a matter of humility, then it might have some permanent boost; but this isn't that. She might see him as more humble as a result of the conversation, but which do you think she'll hone in on more: the fact that he was humble enough to admit he's a fraud or the fact that she married a fraud? 9/10 it's the latter. Even worse - if she gets this impression when he really was the natural alpha all along!

I have experienced all of this in my own marriage. I had that conversation with my wife. I also had her tell me weeks later, "I have no idea if you're doing this because it's who you are or if you're doing it just because you think that's what I want you to be." It's insanely frustrating and had a serious negative impact on our long-term sexuality. What made it so frustrating is that the behaviors she questioned were things that I had always done all my life - even before we were married. But as soon as she had to tell me that she liked those behaviors, suddenly doubt crept in about the authenticity of who I was as a man to her. That's a sucky place to be and I don't recommend any man make the same mistake I did.

Women want to know that their man is the real deal. She wants to know that he's a man who just naturally "gets it" and doesn't have to put on a facade to look the part. For the man, it doesn't matter if he's actually faking his way through it or not. What matters is that she sees it as authentic and he's working toward making it authentic.

OP sounds like he is genuine and authentic. He's not faking anything. The way he interacts with women is part of his natural way of life. So, to express his insecurity about attraction-triggers to his wife will cause her to talk about it and question whether or not he is a genuinely attractive man or if he's just putting on a show to cover up these alleged insecurities.

In reality, I get the impression that OP isn't insecure about his SMV to his wife at all; the only thing he's insecure about is whether or not his SMV is causing him to sin. This is an important distinction. To that end, if his wife is aware (as the original post makes clear she is) and she respects his spiritual maturity (the only variable left open), then she would feel no shame or remorse at convicting him on her own accord when she thought he was acting out of line or leading women on. My wife has had that conversation with me before - and I appreciated that she felt open enough to communicate when she believed my behaviors were crossing a line that might lead someone else on. I made the appropriate adjustments and all was well. But for him to express a false insecurity over what might not actually be an idol and instead could really just be a misunderstanding of SMV factors women look at ... there just seems to be a lot of risk in there over nothing.

To that end ...

Humility's Place

I'm not saying he should avoid showing her his weaknesses. I'm simply saying that he should make darn sure they're weaknesses before he expresses them. And when he does display his weaknesses, it shouldn't be in the context of going to ~~mommy~~ his wife to fix all of his problems for him - and it most certainly should not be him going to her for validation of his masculinity and attractiveness. He should get that from God. Validation-seeking will have far more long-term harmful effects than the short-term intimacy boost.

Instead, presentation of weaknesses should start with a clear acknowledgment of the issue coupled with a statement of repentance and corrected action. "Wife, I realize that I have been doing x. I should not have done that. I've decided to be a better man. In order to be that better man, I'm going to do y and z from now on to address the issue." That's called being transparent, which is almost as big a boost to intimacy as the validation-seeking conversation you suggest.

But let's convert rote transparency into vulnerability. Add after the above: "This won't be easy and I'm going to need you to help me with the y and z parts. You could help me best by doing a, b, and c." Now he's inviting her into his weakness. Even better, he's being a man by leading her in the process of how she can best help him, demonstrating both vulnerability and strength at the same time.

I discovered this formula about six months ago and have had to use it often. I'm not a perfect guy. I screw up a lot. The key is that when I screw up I don't go to my wife for her to tell me, "Everything's going to be okay. Now let me kiss it and make you feel all better." That's what a mom does. I don't want her to feel like my mom. I want a wife who helps me, not a mommy who coddles me. I have this conversation with my wife about once every 3 weeks. Something happens, I realize I made a mistake - or sometimes she lets me know when I've made that mistake, which is fine too - and I address the issue head-on. Admit, repent, improve, involve. That's all there is to it.

lol's from women at church

3 upvotes · 4 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is the correct evaluation. Getting IOIs is healthy and normal for a man who is awesome. Getting IOIs because they're solicited through game is not normal - it's invoked. That's not to say it's totally wrong to employ charm with women other than one's own wife. It just means that one should not do so to a degree that it surpasses his ability to maintain self-control.

To that end, /u/palmorwrist, my advice is simply to get a better sense of where your self-control boundary is. As long as you don't cross that boundary, you're fine. But if your natural/unintentional game is causing you to cause that boundary, putting your mind in the gutter, then you might want to do one of two things: (1) increase your level of self-control, or (2) make a conscious effort to decrease any activity that might put you past your level of self-control.

The first is hard, especially when what you're trying to control is your own thoughts. That said, I can personally attest that it is possible. The second is the easier route. But I also come from the viewpoint that we, as men, should be striving toward what improves us, not running away. The second option strikes me as running away from the problem. The first option - growing one's own self-control - continues to improve you as a man and develop your character into godliness. Remember, Jesus had prostitutes fawning over him, and yet we don't see him shying away. If you want to be more like Christ, the goal isn't to avoid brothels; it's to become so self-controlled that you could walk into a brothel and not have to worry about where your thoughts might lead you. And let's be clear here - we're not even talking about brothels at this point; we're talking about going to church ;)

What is the problem with porn?

3 upvotes · 1 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Based on 3 and 4, you could argue that use of sexually explicit materials in marriage is fine, if it's creating unity.

I was tracking with you until that point. So you're telling me that Matthew 5:28 has an implied exception, "Unless your spouse is okay with it, then it's fine"? To me this is the same thing as the government condoning homosexual marriage. The government doesn't have the right to define what marriage is; only God does. They can steal the word and call something marriage when it's not, but that's the extent of it.

Similarly, we can't delegate the power of defining sinful lust to one's spouse. That rests in God's hands alone. As the human supreme court justices have no spiritual authority to absolve homosexuals of their sexual relationships; likewise the human husbands and wives out there have no spiritual authority to absolve adulterers of their lusts over people other than their spouse.

I like a lot of what you write, but that line is walking on extremely thin ice.

Of course, if by "sexually explicit materials" you mean that those materials are depicting the husband and the wife themselves, that's obviously fine ... or if you're talking about toys or things like that, that's all fine ... unless, of course, one starts entering into objectophilia, but I'll just assume we haven't degraded that far yet.

What is the problem with porn?

3 upvotes · 1 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You're looking at materials themselves and trying to define sin by the inanimate object. In Romans 14:14 Paul says that nothing is unclean in itself; rather, it is only unclean if someone regards it as unclean in his heart. Accordingly, sin is not defined by external factors, but by one's own heart.

As such, reading Song of Solomon - the first thing on your list - could be sin to one person, which is why the Jews forbade young men from reading it. Similarly, a forensic analyst for the FBI might be able to watch videos of sexual acts without lust in his heart because he's so honed in on finding some clue relevant to his case.

Now, as a practical matter, Romans 14:23 also says that anything that does not come from faith is sin. So, that same forensic analyst is sinning if he's doing it just to catch a bad guy; but if he's a Christian and doing his job to the glory of God (1 Cor. 10:31; Col. 3:23), then it's not sin. Similarly, if an atheist is reading Song of Solomon for the purpose of proving something against the Bible, it's still sin.

A redditor on r/TrueChristian once said several years ago that "porn is anything you lose interest in after masturbating." While I wouldn't word it the same way, the sentiment is close. Porn is anything that a person utilizes to cultivate lust. If a man looks at something and happens to lust, it's probably not porn to him. If he then lingers on it because he likes lusting after it, then it becomes porn to him. If he goes looking for more things to increase his lust, those are all certainly porn to him.

I guess you guys might give me some insight here

3 upvotes · 23 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

You're more into her than she is into you. You communicated this verbally, so did she. You're ticked because you wish she were more into you, but she's not. What exactly do you need insight on? This is pretty darn straight forward. If you want her more into you, improve your SMV. If your SMV were high enough she'd be begging you to say ILY to her, not withholding the phrase from you. And trying to force her to say it ... really? You're just showing her that you're a beta wuss by doing that.

Advice. Legal next moves. Etc.

3 upvotes · 22 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

You need to file for divorce ASAP. Stick to your guns and you'll almost certainly get custody. If she earns more than you, as it sounds is the case, many states have a statute precluding the court from contemplating the financial circumstances of the parties. She pays you child support, which solves your money problems.

If you out earn her, as long as you get custody you'll probably still get child support anyway.

Depending on who has more debts, you also may want to request a de facto termination date of the marriage, which would have the assets and liabilities split as of the day she abandoned you and the kid rather than as of the day of final hearing.

Parental abandonment is a big deal. She won't be able to overcome that unless the child is reasonably mature and gung ho on living with mom. Request a phase in period to reacclimate the child to exposure to her mom. Just making that argument in the right context (which you have), even if you don't win on it, changes how the court perceives your case in your favor.

In the meantime, marginalize her time with your child. If old enough, let your child be an active participant in how much she sees her mom. With greater tact and being more veiled, tell her, "I don't want to stand in the way of time with your mom and I will support you seeing her, if that's what you want. But I also don't want to set a precedent that could cause long term harm to our relationship and the home we have established here together. Let's talk about what's best going forward." Giving too much time to mom too soon will undermine all your other arguments and could leave you dead in the water.

(Q4Men) how can i keep my man happy?

3 upvotes · 20 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I would love to answer this question in full, but /u/RedPillWonder already did it in the beginning of this sub's creation far better than I could:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/6nhfri/advice_to_young_women_today_for_a_better_happier/

What is the Greek word for “submit” or “submission” in Ephesians 5?

3 upvotes · 20 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

When addressing the context of the word, I would not only look to the historical understanding of the word in a strict sense, but also to how the author uses and applies it in his own life. In this case, we know that Paul directly ignored the mandate of Emperor Nero to have all Christians killed. If Paul were to have submitted to that mandate, he would have turned himself and all of his brothers into the government. So, we know in Romans 13, for example, that Paul does not mean strict obedience to every governmental and societal mandate.

Instead, we see Paul going about his business, doing what God told him to do, but submitting to the legal repercussions of his actions. If that means going to trial, he goes to trial and makes his argument. If it means going to prison, he goes to prison. If it means being put to death, he submits to death. It does not mean he blindly does whatever the government tells him.

In the same way, for a wife to submit to her husband doesn't necessarily mean blind obedience to every command he ever gives her. It means that she orients herself in a manner that respects and accepts her husband's authority over her. It does not mean that if he tells her to cut her wrists she'd better do it. So, if a wife decides to ignore her husband's instructions with regard to how much money she can spend by buying a $200 purse, if he takes away her credit card she'd better accept that repercussion without any kicking and screaming.

Lessons from two divorce cases

3 upvotes · 14 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

Hah ... send me a PM. I try to avoid doxxing myself.

Thoughts on "Intended for Pleasure" by Ed Wheat?

3 upvotes · 13 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I had it on the sidebar originally, but was persuaded to take it down. The book is really only helpful to virgins about to have sex for the first time, so it has limited application. It has some helpful techniques, but also some very blue moments to watch out for. If you're marrying someone who has never had an orgasm or has trouble with orgasms, the book promotes a positive attitude that will both help with patience and eager anticipation for helping your bride experience pleasure in sex. For men all he had to say was, "Maybe if you clench your butt cheeks some people think that makes it feel better."

But he's also fairly limiting in that his concessions can dissuade eager experimentation. To this day I can't tell if the book was perfect for my marriage because my wife is one of those who can't orgasm from internal stimulation, or if the book cursed us because my wife has in her head that she's just one of those girls and thus isn't willing to try, and that book justified her in feeling that way. Be prepared.

I'm at a loss...

3 upvotes · 8 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

When men hear that their wives want a divorce most people fall in one of two categories: (1) they step up and try to fix it or (2) they give up and let their wives take over ... because what's the point in trying if it's over? You sound like someone who has a mind for the first but your practical reality has been the second.

get things done around the house

Here's the thing - and you'll find several men around here who disagree with me, but bear with me. You're treating the house work like it's her responsibility and you're going to be a "real man" by stepping up and helping her out with it.

In reality, you need to act like you're single. As Paul says in 1 Cor. 7, "Let those with wives live as if they had none." Legalities aside, you need to start living as if you're a single-dad/bachelor and you've got a live-in girlfriend. When you adopt that mentality you'll realize that all of the responsibility for the house, caring for the kids, grocery shopping, etc. is on you. If she happens to help, great. If not, that's fine too. After all, it's your house, your kids, your life, your responsibility, not hers. If she decides she does want to be married to you and wants to join in on what you've got going, then that's her call - but she's going to do that on your terms, not on hers. You've let her run the show for too long.

Am I correct when I assume that she's usually the one who keeps the calendar? That she's the one who talks to the kids' teachers and figures out when the special school days and field trips are? That she's the one who schedules the doctors and dentist appointments for them? That she's the one who decides what chores need to be done and then is asking you to help out with a few of the items? This should all be the reverse.

blessed to find a Christian mentor who has been helping me deal with some deep-seated spiritual issues.

This is wonderful! But don't limit it to free counseling. Have him drive you hard on application. The point isn't just to figure out internal stuff going on. It's to change your life.

haven't significantly increased my muscle mass. I lift 5 days per week at home

That seems to be the issue. Do you have enough weights at home to increase your muscle mass? Most home gym systems don't have enough. Also, you should switch to a SL5x5 (see the sidebar). It's the best routine I've ever found for gaining muscle mass. What you linked to seems to be more about toning, which won't help you bulk.

I had been hoping to finish my cut before moving on to bulking

Why the heck are you cutting?!?!?! No cutting until you're benching over 250. 4 months ago you had multiple comments telling you you're too skinny and you need to be bulking ... and you're still cutting? I don't understand this at all.

Food quality and preparation are things I know my family needs me to better lead with Maybe if they need to lose some weight. When you're bulking any calories will do, although proteins are the best, of course.

broken record calmly telling her I would not tolerate her continued disrespect, after which she demanded a divorce

Yeah, this sounds totally butt-hurt. See my "anatomy of butt-hurt" post on the sidebar. Broken record is a tool to be utilized to get your way on transactional things. It's not a tool to change how another person is feeling or how they communicate with you. STFU would have been the more appropriate response. If you've got the balls for it, when my wife gets like that sometimes I lean in and tickle her. It's totally out of context and drives her crazy, but it displays an amused mastery - lets her know that her fits are a cute little joke to me and that she can't ruin my mood. It also helps pull her out of it because the drastic change of context forces her mind to think about something other than what she's been ranting about, then she can't switch back easily. So yeah, tickling her when she's ticked like that makes her even more ticked at first, but it also goes a long way toward pulling her back down to earth.

To be clear, it usually goes something like this: (1) tickle, (2) she gets mad and says to stop it, (3) I tickle a bit more and make a wise-crack like, "Oh, you mean to stop tickling you here? <tickle again> or here? <tickle again>" (4) she gets mad and says, "I'm being serious. Why don't you take me seriously?" (5) I look her dead in the eye and say, "Babe, you know I love you. I know you're upset. I know we have our issues. I hear you. Things are changing. Give it time. In the meantime, let's have some fun <tickle again>." This works about 90% of the time, even in situations that would have otherwise turned into main events.

I then went radio silent and left the house for a few hours. She didn't appreciate this since I apparently fail too many compliance tests and I suspect she expected more of the same.

Again: butt-hurt. This was more of the same. You failed. Oh well. Accept the loss and move on.

it's no wonder my life is still a mess

Spiritual disciplines don't fix your life, but they are a prerequisite to having a fixed life. If you're not following through here, nothing else will work with any permanency. She has to respect you as a spiritual leader before the other pieces can fall into place.

You're also correct that I don't want her around, if only because I don't find attractive the ...

I get it. There are times I didn't find my wife attractive either. There are some days where she wears completely unflattering clothes and puts on an attitude that makes me want to run for the hills. But I also know that if I want her to adopt my attitude and my charm/appeal, I've got to get her exposed to me. Women are malleable. They're going to be influenced by someone and that's always whoever they spend the most time with. This fails for most couples because the most of their time together is an hour or two after the kids go to be watching Netflix. That's not time together. That's time next to each other. So who is going to influence her? Is it going to be their girl friends? Her family? Chad? Co-workers? Or you? Let it be you.

nearly 10 years of evidence that other people in her life (parents, sister, and kids) have had a far higher priority than I have

Whoops ... there's the answer. It's her family. Change this. Take control of the calendar. Don't be demanding. If she says she already made plans, don't go Rambo and say, "Cancel them, you're coming with me." That will come in time. You're not there yet. But be more intentional about exposing her to your (new) lifestyle.

Glad this has been helpful. That's what this community is for :)

For Singles: Finding the Girl You Can't Keep Yourself From Banging

3 upvotes · 26 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Three things:

1. Who is the one who sets the path and decides where to go: the pursuer or the pursued? And, therefore, if the woman pursues the man, who is really the one leading?
2. You're treating the relationship as a thing in itself, like it's a substantive yet intangible entity. In reality a "relationship" is merely a word that arbitrarily categorizes how two people interact. The notion that it is anything more than that prior to marriage is at the core of all blue pill thinking. There is no such thing as "the relationship" - it's just him and her and each of their own sets of goals and desires until a covenant (marriage) enters the picture.

3. Your comment assumes there is a relationship before marriage, and therefore someone must lead it. My model assumes there is no "the relationship" and therefore there's nothing to lead. If the woman asks for the DTR talk the man can simply say, "There is no relationship. My focus is God and the mission he gave me. If your focus is me and helping me fulfill that mission, that's wonderful and I want to be around people like you. And if in being around you I find we can't keep our hands off each other, I may even propose to you one day. But my goal isn't to get married; it's to make a difference for eternity. If I do get married someday it'll be because that woman meets two requirements: (1) I find her helpful toward my mission and (2) I'm sexually enticed by her."

This notion that a man must "lead the relationship" assumes that the relationship itself is his goal because it's the direction he is going. But I don't believe this is biblical, as a man cannot serve two masters ... and I don't buy into the "first priority, second priority" philosophy. I've never seen a person capable of living it out - even myself.

Should there be secrets within a marriage (specifically a Christian marriage)?

3 upvotes · 26 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This once again falls into the subtle distinctions between theology, philosophy, and praxeology. I wrote a lot more about that here.

It is a theological truth that a husband and wife become one flesh. But you have created a philosophy of what that means and are treating it as a theological conclusion. When you say "that's how I view it" - it's just that: how you view it. It doesn't mean it's the only possible correct view. As such, your reply to /u/chuckus_mangionus is not well taken, as you are asking a question, but then insisting that your original impression is correct and condemning him for not aligning with your philosophical conclusions.

In this particular situation, I do not share your conclusion. Specifically:

- Many presume Samson and Delilah were married. They were certainly having sex, and therefore one flesh. Yet it's obvious that Samson was meant to keep a secret from her.
- Esther kept her nationality a secret from the king, her husband, and this was clearly wise to do until the proper time for her to reveal that secret.
- Proverbs has many passages that talk about the wisdom of keeping secrets and the foolishness of people who can't.
- In the Old Testament the Father refers to himself as Israel's husband, and yet Deuteronomy 29:29 says he has secrets.
- Jesus also often asked people to keep secrets about what he had done for them, stating that they should not tell anyone about their being healed.

In short, in their proper context secrets are good and appropriate and it is wise to keep them. But as /u/purifash noted, if you set a boundary you must follow through with it or else change the boundary. The Bible clearly shows examples where keeping secrets, even between spouses, is perfectly appropriate, but it doesn't mean that you are biblically mandated to keep and maintain that as your own personal boundary. You have the freedom to set whatever boundary you like.

What parts of "Game" should a RP Christian utilize? Which ones should we not utilize?

3 upvotes · 20 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

True. As I often tell guys: you break it, you buy it ... referring to her hymen, of course, though the same applies even if she's not a virgin.

Phil's April Update

3 upvotes · 20 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

As Dawson Trotman once said:

If I were the minister of a church and had deacons or elders to pass the plate and choir members to sing, I would say, "Thank God for your help. We need you. Praise the Lord for these extra things that you do," but I would keep pressing home the big job - "Be fruitful and multiply." All of these other things are incidental to the supreme task of winning a man or woman to Jesus Christ and then helping him or her to go on.

So no, unfortunately, I don't quite count that. They're wonderful things. They're excellent and worthy of high admiration that you do them. But they are not a replacement for what God's actually called you to do.

Imagine your boss giving you a project that is incredibly important to the success of the company. You do 20 other projects that are much easier and more along your interests instead of the one that matters. Your boss comes asking for the finished product, but you don't have it. You tout off the other 20 things you did, hoping that will impress and please him. Think he's going to be happy and excuse your blatant defiance of his management decisions? Probably not - especially if the company takes a hit because you didn't get the job done.

That's how the balance between the great commission and discipleship works.

Google's model probably has the best parallel to this. They have a primary mission they give you, then they also let their employees spend 20% of their time working on independent projects that benefit the company, but which the employee gets to choose and start up on their own, or they can work together with other employees on stuff they're doing. In the same way, as believers, we should spend a portion (20% or so) of our efforts on the side stuff, but the majority of our ministry efforts (80% or so) should be focused on the, as Dawson puts it, "big job."

The reason you say kids ministry "doesn't feel like a mission" is because it's not the mission God designed you for.

Tag: /u/rocknrollchuck - that's why I wouldn't count it.

Screening for a Wife: The Foundation (Part I)

3 upvotes · 18 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent post here.

Disclaimer

To clarify what I think you're saying, AWALT is true with regard to the underlying defaults built into the female human condition (men have it too, just in totally different ways). Some women are better at exercising self-control over their AWALT traits. The point of vetting is to find those who have a higher baseline threshold of self-control. What I mean by that is that:

- Some women have no self-control and can't even fake it.
- Some women have naturally low self-control, but can fake it quite well if given the proper motivation ("He's such a perfect guy, I have to hide my crazy!").
- Others have naturally high self-control and don't need to fake it.
- Others have a naturally low degree of self-control, but have learned to raise their default so that they exercise a high degree of self-control from x point forward without having to fake it.

These last two types of women are who you're vetting to find. 3 is the ideal, but 4 is acceptable if you have a rational basis to put a high degree of trust in the transformation. For example, most of the self-control problems were pre-conversion to the faith, so you can clearly identify Jesus changing their heart and behavior, which is a reliable source of life-change warranting trust.

You cannot determine whether or not she can be a helper to you if you do not know what you need help with.

I can't emphasize this enough.

I wish I had more time to reply further.

What Do I Do? My Wife Is Openly Unattracted To Me + Interested In Other Men / Past Relationships

3 upvotes · 9 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Is it a mission? Yes. Is it a good/attractive one? Probably not, depending on what you do. For secular girls, sure - it's a great mission. And if your wife is a "self-identified Christian" but doesn't actually prioritize her faith, then it'll probably work just fine too. But if her faith is her top priority, as it should be, then she's going to need to see you make a difference for eternity. Most professions don't do that, unless your profession is evangelist, missionary, etc.

To be clear, I'm an attorney. I practice domestic law. I'm constantly helping people who are victims of domestic violence, helping children who have been raped and molested or abused, etc. I'm good at what I do. I have multiple judges singing my praises to my boss. I make great money. But my professional successes were not enough to maintain attraction with my wife, even in the midst of being physically fit, having a wide social network, etc.

I often tell people that the mission needs to be something outside the home and which has an eternal impact.

Steven Anderson on women's roles according to the bible.

3 upvotes · 1 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I don't know that I'd call him a fellow believer. From what I've heard, his understanding of the gospel has some serious issues. But it has been a while since I went through all his stuff.

Is there anything we as young men we can do to slowly dispel a Jezebel spirit with RP principles?

3 upvotes · 29 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is exactly the mindset I've been operating from, without saying a word

Ah, but she's not a psychic. Women communicate covertly. They use body language, subtext, implications, etc. to convey what they're really thinking, regardless what their words say. Don't be like that. Men are direct and to the point. They say what they mean. It's not an "I need to talk about feelings" conversation. It's an "I'm going to tell you like it is and you can either stay or walk away" conversation. The way /u/rocknrollchuck worded it is great - use that word for word if you have to.

Bible commentaries: What can you recommend?

3 upvotes · 29 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I generally recommend guys stay away from commentaries until they've been through the entire Bible a couple times on their own. Commentaries often get used as a crutch that hinders a person's ability to study the Bible for themselves.

That aside, when it is appropriate to use a commentary, I try to avoid ones that do the interpreting for you and stick to the ones that just give additional relevant information, such as historical context, unusual issues in the original text, translational problems, etc. This minimizes the degree to which I'm relying on others to do my work for me.

To that end, the best one I've found for this purpose is the Jamieson, Fausset, Brown Commentary Critical and Explanatory on the Whole Bible. It's available for free on biblestudytools.com (specifically here), but a hard copy can be found here.

If you insist on using a "please do all the hard work for me" commentary, I recommend using at least 5 different commentaries every time so you at least get a balanced perspective.

marriage prep: confront her with my past sexual sins?

3 upvotes · 28 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This might be one of those places where RPC might differ from secular RP. As /u/rocknrollchuck noted, if she is serious about her faith, virginity in her spouse will be highly treasured, not despised.

To be clear we're probably talking on two different wavelengths. For the sake of raw sexual attraction, you're right. If he had slept with dozens of women, she'd probably be more sexually attracted to him. However, given the spiritual implications of this, it would likely cripple their marriage in many other aspects, which would also likely affect her sexual openness toward him. Mix that in with the fact that Christian marriage has other purposes beyond sex (unlike most secular marriages for men) and you can see quickly how things aren't as cut and dry as the secular community might experience.

Is Sex Outside of Marriage a Sin? An Official Stance.

3 upvotes · 26 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I thought he addressed it. I was mistaken.

Anyway, my view is that God often takes into account the reality of life as compared with theological technicality. So, when Moses permitted people to get a certificate of divorce that didn't suddenly make divorce "not sin." It was God's ways of saying, "You're all going to divorce no matter what I say, and if you're going to sin no matter what, at least let me mitigate the effect of your sin by creating some laws and boundaries around it that will help minimize the harm you're going to do."

When it comes to modern day non-virginity ... yeah, it's hard to find a non-virgin. My guess is that God would put things in the same boat: "Yeah, she's sinned and has bound herself to another man, but I'm not in the business of stopping everyone from sinning, especially when they're non-believers and can't do otherwise anyway. So, let's make the best of a bad situation." For some people, maintaining a standard of "virgin-only" makes sense. For others, it doesn't and the harm/sin that would result from their staying single until they found a virgin might be greater than the harm/sin of marrying someone in an adulterous capacity.

From there, that's where John Piper starts to speak - that if you're already in one of those adulterous relationships, the best thing you can do is honor the covenant of that relationship rather than getting divorced to seek someone else. I thought Piper went more into the bit above, but I guess not, so there's how I connect the dots.

Pastor injects Feminism at Wedding Ceremony

3 upvotes · 23 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The guy who disciplined me officiated my wedding and I made him include Malachi 2:15 as the primary and central verse to talk around: "And why did the Lord God make them one with a portion of his Spirit in their union? To produce godly offspring." I then had him talk about discipleship as the primary purpose of the marriage - to produce not only physical offspring through physical oneness, but spiritual offspring through spiritual oneness.

So, not every "sermonette" during a wedding is bad :)

Is Sex Outside of Marriage a Sin? An Official Stance.

3 upvotes · 21 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Ditto.

Is Sex Outside of Marriage a Sin? An Official Stance.

3 upvotes · 21 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

/u/OsmiumZulu summed it up nicely. Note the beginning of my post:

legitimate conversation about the following are still perfectly acceptable: (1) whether or not it is actually sinful, (2) why God or the church believe it is sinful, (3) the practical and spiritual ramifications on life if one side or the other is true (ex. if it weren't sinful, let's explore what that would look like), etc.

I'm not censoring discussions about the subject. Rather, like OZ said, it is the advice that needs to be reigned in from time to time. To be clear, every sub does this. TRP and MRP are notorious for content censoring. There is very little censoring that happens here, so I don't believe /u/Whitified's or your concerns are appropriate at all.

As to the use of profanity, 95% of posts that are removed by the auto-mod for profanity are ultimately approved by us anyway (the only ones I have not approved have been by blatant trolls). We just like to filter how the profanity is being used before it goes public to keep trolls at bay. To that end, I just scrolled through your history and didn't find a single post/comment that was removed from the time this sub was created through the present.

As for the polygamy/monogamy issue ... ?!?!? Where did that come from? As OZ said, we've already had conversations about that and it sounds like you're making snap-judgments about what you think this community believes without actually reading up on it. You're too used to assuming everyone is like the first world church.

If you want to know where we stand on something, either individually or as a community, just post about it. Make sure the post follows the rules and there won't be a problem.

For Singles: Finding the Girl You Can't Keep Yourself From Banging

3 upvotes · 20 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Personally, I recommend guys wait until 30 also. That said, I have less objection than other manosphere bloggers to marrying much younger, as long as the criteria are met: you're on a mission for Christ, she's helpful in the fulfillment of that mission, and you can't keep from banging each other for long.

Personally, I married at 23. It was always a goal of mine to have kids at a younger-ish age so that all of my kids would be 18+ by the time I hit 50, when I intend to retire from secular work into full-time ministry. Given that my 4th and last kid was born when I was 32, I came pretty darn close to meeting that goal.

That said, I was also significantly less informed about the ways of the world before I married. I had many inherently red-pilled traits at the time, but did not intellectually understand it in full to the degree of being able to make informed decisions on how long I should have waited. I'm not sure if I would have done things differently or not, given my other life goals.

A Guide to Manipulation - Part 2: The Tactics

3 upvotes · 15 March 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The fact that some of these are "manipulation" is pathetic.

It's only "pathetic" if you have an aversion to the word "manipulation" as a negative thing. Everyone manipulates everyone else all the time. Manipulation isn't "bad" ... it just is. Now, as I noted in Part 1, the author is coming from the standpoint of trying to protect women (and to the degree that the book is written gender-neutral, weak men) ... so I'm sure she means "manipulation" to be a bad thing. But heck, I manipulate my kids into developing healthy disciplines, learning important skills, eating vegetables, etc. and no one's going to cry about that.

A Guide to Manipulation - Part 2: The Tactics

3 upvotes · 15 March 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Read part 1 for more info, but defending against manipulation is only one possible aspect of utilizing this information for sexual strategy purposes.

Another possible purpose is to recognize when you, as a man, are employing these tactics. By recognizing that, you can then discern what works appropriately within your frame and not.

For example, we all know that #27 "rationalization" should probably be recognized and removed. But #30 "trance and hypnosis" are very fun and valuable for intense sex and a tactic that my wife very much enjoys when I employ for that purpose, as it is essentially within the "I" of DEVI.

That type of discernment and categorisation is what I was calling for at the end and didn't have time to write-up myself in full (on mobile now).

How to connect with and influence others using stories

3 upvotes · 15 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent post. Given how much I write and tell stories and parables IRL I'm actually a little embarrassed reading this that I don't do that more often here.

I'll tell you for sure that this helps in marriage as well. Although this type of information communication doesn't resonate with me personally all too often, my wife doesn't learn through lectures, targeted questions or assigned tasks like I do. But if I can connect something to a personal life story, she absorbs it.

Thanks for this post :)

How to transition into celibacy?

3 upvotes · 14 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a good question and a very difficult issue to deal with. Whenever I broach the subject, the guy I'm speaking with usually enters the conversation with the belief that self-control is an automatic. It's not.

Self-control is a discipline that is not given like an on-switch. It is learned, exercised, and practiced into full functionality. Your post is consistent with my experience in that you're seeing options A and B - one where you exercise total self-control and one where you don't exercise it. It's more like a dimmer switch.

When the light is off, you must be extremely cautious where you tread because you can't see. Crank it up to a faint glow and now you can get around enough to not bump into chairs, but you might still step on toys. Get to mid-level and now you're seeing some of the larger objects on the floor, but you might still step in the syrup caked on the tile and get your foot all sticky. Turn it on all the way and you can roam freely, fully capable of seeing and dealing with any obstacles in the room which you lit.

Every room in the house has its own light. You might be extremely self-controlled when it comes to gambling with the light fully on, but when it comes to sexuality, the light's off and you don't know how to flip the switch because it's a knob.

Application: start slow and work your way up. Begin by only placing yourself in group contexts where you know sex can't happen and refuse to engage beyond that. Your self-control here is not restraining from having sex; it's restraining from putting yourself in more intimate settings, learning to ignore your impulses to push boundaries.

Once you've mastered that phase (which could take as little as weeks or as long as years), then go on solo dates and practice not asking her back to your place. After a while of that learn to hang out alone in a private setting during the day, but have a hard cut-off at night time. Any time you accidentally or intentionally push a boundary, back your boundary up to a previous phase for another couple weeks/months.

The key here is to be intentional in all of this. Right now your default mechanism is to be controlled by your impulses. Read 114 on the learning cycle so that you can introduce self-control and make that your default mechanism in this context as well.

Girl problems

3 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You're probably thinking that she deserves an explanation. Does she really deserve anything from you though? If you want to do something for your own reasons - to get things off your chest, for example - then go for it, but know that it will make you look weak and give her fuel to get sympathy from her girl friends. But if you're moving on, what do you care? Just do what you want.

Girl problems

3 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

No, it's about intergender relational dynamics from a secular praxeological perspective. It is worth the read nonetheless. Just test everything against scripture.

Matthew 16:24-26 interpretation by RPChristians?

3 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Correct. Imagine a kid wanting a cookie. Sometimes this is fine and within the boundaries of my will, but as a parent I must sometimes deny my son that cookie. That is me denying him. He is too young to make the wise choice himself so I exercise difficult grace over him when necessary for his well-being.

As an adult that balance changes. If he wants a cookie I'm not going to stop him. I have commissioned him to make that decision for himself. He can eat hundreds of cookies if he wants, then die of a heart attack or diabetes. Or he can learn to deny himself the thing he's pursuing, which in this case, in a more meta sense, is self pleasure through food.

That's a bit unrealistic in an RP context where we understand some value in maintaining our bodies. But what if instead of cookies we're pursuing money? Or sex? Or marriage/love? Now it hits closer to home for many of us and 1 Cor. 7 starts to make more sense alongside Luke 9's compulsion to "deny oneself." And on an internal scale this is what 403 and 404 are all about - learning to embrace the Gospel in lieu of the way we want our desires met, which won't actually do us any good.

Matthew 16:24-26 interpretation by RPChristians?

3 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Where are you seeing this "empty your ego" phrase? I'm not sure where you're getting that from. The verse says to deny ourselves. The context is that this means to abandon the path we once walked, which was focused on our own purposes, hence "and follow me" instead of the path we had otherwise laid out for ourselves.

There may be other passages about the "empty vessel" concept that some preachers like to utilize (2 Tim. 2:21 comes to mind, but that's more about emptying sin), but it doesn't come from this passage, which is otherwise about the life directive we're on. It's no coincidence that Jesus says this immediately before the transfiguration, where he would discuss his coming death with the 12. That is, just as Satan tempted Jesus with abandoning his mission or finding another way other than God's to fulfill it, he now again had to come to terms with the fact that he must choose between his own path and that laid out by God on the cross (see also the Gethsemane speech in the other gospels). Just as he was making that choice here tells his disciples they must make the same choice - to abandon their own life expectations and directive in favor of spreading the Gospel throughout the world through the disciple making process Jesus's had laid out for them. It was their path or Jesus's. This verse compels them to abandon their own ideologies, not to devoid themselves of any identity.

What were Christ's "boundaries"?

3 upvotes · 5 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Christ came to bring freedom. Before Christ our boundaries were sin and only sin and nothing else. After Christ we have the freedom to do good. That is, the boundaries of our past life were removed. Some people would like to add new boundaries to keep us from returning to that sinful life, but the truth is that as long as we're in these earthly bodies we're always going to have one foot on the other side. So, if you tried to set up a clear, objective boundary, you're going to be building it right between your legs. As Paul says in Romans 7:25, "So then, I myself serve the law of God with my mind, but with my flesh I serve the law of sin."

What you're really getting at is this question: What should RP Christian men be doing to minimize sinfulness in our lives? Is that a fair re-phrasing of your question? If so ...

Sin is obviously bad. We shouldn't do it. But most people, especially when talking about boundaries in relation to sin, are talking about the negative sins only. That is, in order to avoid breaking the command "do not kill" they generally don't keep C4 and nuclear missiles in their homes. In order to avoid breaking the command "do not commit adultery" they work toward having a healthy sex life with their wives and try never to be alone with another woman. In order to avoid breaking the command about looking lustfully at someone who isn't our wife, we put up porn blockers and get accountability partners, etc.

That's all well and good, but what about all the positive commands? What about Ephesians 4:2, "Be completely humble and gentle; be patient, bearing with one another in love"? First, are we actually humble, gentle, and patient? If we are, what safeguard do we have in life to make sure we don't fall away from being humble, gentle, and patient? See how often only half of the spectrum is considered when we talk about "boundaries against sinning"?

As James 4:17 says, "If anyone, then, knows the good they ought to do and doesn't do it, it is sin for him." It's not enough to avoid evil - we must do good also.

With that context in mind, I have found the process of avoiding breaking negative commands to be far easier when one is actively living out the affirmative commands.

- Negative Commands: Do not.
- Affirmative Commands: Do.

It's literally that simple. In Matthew 12 Jesus says that when one casts out an evil spirit, the spirit will wander for some time and decide to return to its former home. If it finds the house empty, it will re-inhabit it with 7 others even worse than the first. Translation: If you manage to kick out a negative command problem in your life, that's fine, but if it's not replaced by an affirmative lifestyle, you're just going to wind up wasting your time on other negative commands instead, and in all likelihood falling back into the same original sin anyway - this time worse off than before. Or to be more direct to the meaning: if an evil spirit was tempting you to evil things and you kick it out, the Holy Spirit should be indwelling in you instead, who will incite you toward good things - following the Affirmative Commands.

Conclusion: The best "boundary" you can set to avoid breaking negative commands is to start living by the affirmative commands. The most important are summarized in the three greats: (1) Love God, (2) Love Others,

(3) Make Disciples. More on this in 110.

How to approach sexual relationships as red pill christian entering my 20s?

3 upvotes · 4 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That last bit ... spot on. My thoughts exactly.

How would one approach this text and hold frame in a beneficial way coming from a Christian perspective?

3 upvotes · 2 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

So just keeping the mindset of abundance mentality is enough to have the high quality man persona?

Well, that's one of many things necessary to be a high value man. It's not just one thing.

how would you recommend cultivating a confident approach to other women rooted in Christ's frame?

That depends on your purpose. If your purpose is "I want to find a wife, so I want to maximize my ability to look for one in a Christ-like manner," my answer is simple: don't do that. I'm guessing you came over from one of the secular RP subs, in which they very much preach a cold-approach to wooing women to you. This makes sense in their secular framework because sex is their goal and marriage doesn't matter. Learning to "confidently approach women" is a great way to get premarital sex or even find relationships in the first place.

But Paul and Jesus seem to be clear enough that we should not be actively pursuing a spouse. We are to be actively pursuing God. If in your pursuit of God you find yourself alongside a woman with whom you share an intense mutual lust, then you've just found your bride. And let's face it, there are so many women in the church that this is pretty darn likely to happen. I just wouldn't be looking for it to happen. After all, marriage laws are so feminized today that not only is this a biblical expectation, but it's also a practical imperative. The idea that "I should want to get married because marriage is awesome!" is a byproduct of society and a contrast to what Jesus and Paul taught. Yes, it's an old testament imperative too - but one that was fulfilled on the cross and redirected to the spiritual imperative of our marriage to Christ as part of his bride, and thus no longer a physical command in an earthly/worldly sense. Long story short: don't be pursuing marriage.

But with this framework in mind, and also knowing that it's 99% likely you're going to find yourself in that "burning passion" situation with another woman anyway, my suggestion is simply to take romance out of the equation. The fear and trembling that comes with approaching a woman only exists because you are looking to her acceptance of your romantic directive toward her as a sign of validation on you as a man, and if she rejects you that means you must not be "man enough" for her, or something along those lines. If you're not looking for a romantic relationship, it's 10x easier to just talk to someone because that validation-seeking isn't there. You're just chatting with her to have fun or because it furthers your mission of disciple-making in some way. If that conversation then organically develops into a romantic, "burning passion" interest in each other, so be it. But you've started with the Christ-like frame of disciple-making, which set the context for the relationship, which will also help it be the rightful foundation of any potential marriage that flows from the relationship as well. That's how you maintain Christ's frame when approaching women - that you stop looking for a romantic relationship with them and start interacting with people more generally because an increased network advances your ability to make disciples, then let things flow from there as they may.

But, how would one lead my ex to Christ? I still care for her. Should one just pray for her, or?

That's the ONEitis talking. We could quote the "Jesus left the 99 to get the 1 sheep" all day, but we're talking about someone who was already one of his sheep and was wandering away. When we're dealing with someone who likely was never saved to begin with (given that your description portrays her as a "self-identified only" Christian), we see Jesus spreading seed to all the different types of soil, but only cultivating the seed that landed on good soil. From there, we have the whole "do not throw your pearls among swine" concept. That is, you share the Gospel, but don't invest all of your efforts on one person. Don't pick thorny soil and think, "I'm going to keep working on this one patch of soil and try and try and try until something grows out of it that produces fruit!" That's a bad theological model of evangelism. Yes, throw the seed to the thorny soil, but don't concentrate all of your efforts there - keep scattering elsewhere too. This is another nudge toward the notion of "spinning plates" and a "shotgun mentality" but in the realm of spiritual reproduction and not merely physical reproductive partners.

Everything else will fall into place (aka; my high value will come and women will come to me instead of me being low value and me pursuing them).

That's the right attitude. I don't see much in the Bible that encourages us to actively seek a spouse for ourselves. I do see a lot of examples of fathers arranging spouses for their children (i.e. God's got it under control). I do also see a lot of examples of women seducing men into relationships - so if you were a woman, I might be telling you a different story. And I do see some passages that discourage us from seeking spouses. But there is scant little in the way of compelling us to marry - especially in a new testament, post-Gospel framework where all the physical commands of the old testament are now spiritual imperatives in our relationship with Christ anyway. That is, any old testament imperative toward marriage is satisfied by our union with Christ through the Gospel and is not necessarily something that must be maintained in a post-Gospel world on a physical level, as both Jesus and Paul affirm.

I'm not saying not to get married. I'm saying you probably (very highly likely) will end up getting married. But I'm also saying that you're going to have found your wife in a more godly way if your godliness draws her to you rather than you desperately looking around to find "the one."

How would one approach this text and hold frame in a beneficial way coming from a Christian perspective?

3 upvotes · 2 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

keeping the option open ... keep the option open ... keep the option open

You say this a lot. In other words, "I kind of have ONEitis, but I'm trying not to. Closing off the door to my ONEitis forever is too hard. I need a fall-back in case this red pill stuff doesn't pan out with anyone else." Fair assessment?

Look, if you're a high value man you could text her back, "Screw off, whore. I never want to talk to you again," and two days later she'd still take you back with a simple line, "Meh, I changed my mind." High value man = options open. Playing into her frame can keep your options open, but it only leads to a path of staying in her frame.

I want to be in Christ.

Excellent. I'm glad this is first on your list. What does that mean to you? Everything you describe is self-puffing.

- Confident
- Stands in the fear of God
- rooted in his Love and Humility

- embody Christ in me
- do what he would do [and here's the catch] in this situation

What about what he would do in every other situation? I'm guessing you'd say, "Yeah, that too, obviously!" But what did Jesus orient his life around? Raising up disciples who would spread the Gospel after he was gone. You have that yet? That's where most people run away and say, "Oh, I don't really mean I want to do everything Jesus did; I just want to be a good person like he was." You're either going to live like Jesus lived or not.

My priorities are ...

all good things that you should be doing. But where's your mission? It sounds like your eventual career is your mission. Making money is a valid mission, but it's a crappy one that is not satisfying in the long-run ... not to an authentic Christian anyway. As a famous rich man once said when asked how much money was enough, "Just a little bit more."

In reality, I don't see your priorities aligning with the things Jesus gave his life to. You want his character, but not his mission. Don't worry - you're not alone. 97.3%-ish of Christianity is in the same boat. Start taking a look at what Jesus prioritized. Consider Matthew 6:19-21 that concludes, "For where your treasure is, there your heart will be also." What is it you treasure? The things you listed as your priorities are all things that "moth and rust destroy and where thieves break in and steal" and things that will be useless in heaven.

- good grades: your college degree will be worthless in heaven
- workout: in heaven you'll have a glorified body, and your physical body here will be dead and gone
- read scripture: good stuff, but you'll be more efficient at this in heaven, as you'll have direct access to divine wisdom and knowledge
- meditate: on what? on things that will survive into eternity? again, this will be more efficient in heaven anyway
- better person: in heaven you'll be a perfect person
- approaching other people confidently: this is a gateway to value, but what are you approaching them for? if just to have friends and relationships, that too will likely fade away or is something you could have more efficiently in heaven anyway

Let me be clear: those are all great, excellent things. But why are you doing them? As the passage says, "lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust destroys and where thieves do not break in and steal."

What are those treasures? You can't bring your body, your money, your degree, your house or car, your career, etc. into heaven. You can bring people into heaven, though. All of the things you listed above can be utilized for the purpose of bringing others into heaven, but they are worthless if left as pursuits in and of themselves.

Repurpose them to an evangelistic degree and suddenly:

- good grades: earn the respect of your peers and make you competent in many relevant areas to foster relationships
- workout: earns the respect of your peers and make you someone they want to be around
- read scripture: gives you the foundational knowledge helpful to sharing your faith and discipling others
- meditate: lets you connect with God for the purpose of directing your purpose of evangelism and discipleship

- better person: earns the respect necessary for people to trust what you have to say and want to hear it
- approaching other people confidently: is absolutely essential in being able to foster new relationships for the sake of the Gospel

All of those are beautiful things - but do you see how their primary value comes not for their own sake, but for how they can be utilized to store up treasures in heaven? Those treasures are the only things we have any capacity to bring into heaven with us in the first place: the souls of the lost.

With an appropriate directive of your purpose, you can then ask: "Is keeping my options open with her going to help me advance this purpose or is it going to detract from that purpose?" 1 Cor. 7 is pretty clear: pursuing romantic relationships will always detract from that purpose.

However, if you're stuck in lust for a woman, and she back to you, then your inevitable sexual sin will be even more of a hindrance to that mission, and thus that's when you should really think about getting married. That's just my reading of 1 Cor. 7 though :p

How would one approach this text and hold frame in a beneficial way coming from a Christian perspective?

3 upvotes · 2 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent comment. I'll address the frame issue separately.

Husbands, love your wives - Interpretation?

3 upvotes · 15 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good reading material on this is very rare. Or to be more clear: there's lots of good material that references one side of the story, but because it completely excludes the other side, it is all grossly misleading.

How did Christ love the church?

- If we disown him, he will disown us (Matthew 10:33; 2 Timothy 2:12)
- If we are wrong, we are to be rebuked, sometimes even publicly (1 Timothy 3:16, 5:20)
- If we disregard his instruction, we are to be disassociated with and put to shame (2 Thessalonians 3:14)
- If we are caught in unrepentant sin, we are to be cast out and not to have community with the family, and we're not even allowed to eat with them (1 Cor. 5:9-13)

Consider how well this would go over in modern feminized church culture (I'll follow the same order to maintain the parallel):

- If a wife divorces her husband, he can counter-sue her for divorce right back. Sure, some churches accept this, but many push the idea that we must keep fighting against the divorce and be gracious and generous in giving from our wealth as she tries to leave. Does God do that when people disown him? Does he still offer his spiritual provision to those who forsake him and leave the church? I think not. [Not that I'm arguing for a no-support law; God is also perfect and human men are not. I do argue that no-fault divorce laws be repealed, though, which would restore a better balance to these types of situations.]
- If your wife does something wrong, imagine assembling all of the children together so that you can rebuke her in front of them so that they can take note not to make the same mistake she just did. What church would endorse this?
- If your wife doesn't follow your instructions, you disassociate with her and shame her by letting her friends and family see that you have separated yourself from her.

- If she is callous and unrepentant in her sin against you, you evict her from the home and refuse to give her any food or shelter. Obviously this isn't even legal today.

Now, I'm not suggesting that these be done at the drop of the hat. "I told her not to burn dinner, but she did it anyway - so now I'm going to shame her in front of her whole family!" Obviously that's not appropriate. Romans 2 says that the judgment is "according to what [s]he has done." There is also always grace and a "forgive and forget" attitude (Hebrews 8:12) for those who are repentant.

But the point is that "love your wives, just as Christ loved the church" is always taken to be the positive type of sacrificial love and rejects the harsher realities of the relational dynamic. Why did Paul then only mention the sacrificial part in this passage? Because husbands were naturally living out the other part. What modern culture finds deplorable, they found commonplace. Husbands were already disciplining their wives and dealing with them quite harshly. Paul put the "gave himself up for her" part in there not as a means of excluding all other aspects of how Christ relates with the church, but to remind them to incorporate this into the way that they were dealing with their wives because it was out of the cultural norm to do so.

Today, when the cultural norm is to be utterly beta toward one's wife, I imagine Paul would have emphasized the other side instead of this.

"Author is Giving Writers $2,800 If They Write a Crime Novel Without a Female Victim" - What to make of this?

3 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

Ah ... it's reminiscent of Rollo's observed cycle between feminists saying "masculinity is toxic" and "you need to man up and take care of her." Or was that MMSLP?

Asking wife's consent?

3 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

/u/Whitified already linked to the Dalrock post I had in mind on something like this, so go read that. But in the meantime, I do think you're taking that one tiny phrase a bit too far. I get the impression that he's saying, "All sources are on board with this."

My guess is that what really happened is that he got the news, went home, told his wife about it, she said, "That's great, dear," he explained to her in more detail what the job would entail and she expressed a few concerns, and he said something like, "I can't do this without your support," and she said, "You have my support," and that was it.

What I seriously doubt happened is him going home and saying, "Honey, this great opportunity came up. You're the boss, so I need to have your permission before I do it. Can I do it?"

Although the first example is still a fairly weak way to approach it, it's not technically wrong. Her job is to be his helper. If he doesn't have his helper's help, that could cause problems. I know this is all just speculation, but that's how the majority of those conversations go that I've heard - and I've heard a lot. He's not asking for permission: he's asking for support from his helper. The second option would, of course, be repulsive, and I do know that many men approach things this way as well.

why is this sin new? I am fairly sure this sin did not exist till about the 1980's

Well, in Romans 1 Paul did say that people would "invent new ways of doing evil." So yes, it's possible that new sins could have been created in the 1980s - and probably still today.

I was also taught at Church that a man who expects his wife to care for the home and kids and support him is selfish and sinning

That is, of course, not sin. The reverse would also be "not sin" - if a man determined that his wife would work and he stay and home and take care of the housework. The important thing is that the man is the one leading and making the judgment calls on how to run the ship. The specific allocation of tasks isn't where the sin is found, although (as I wrote to you in another comment elsewhere) it does affect each party's temptation to abandon the biblical leader-helper dynamic, which would be sinful.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

3 upvotes · 13 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Men and women were created separately, although both were created in the image of God.

Let me note something that almost never gets said - even on this sub. God created Adam and was, at least from our temporal perspective, presumably done. When God created light he knew he was going to create the stars next and the waters and the birds and plants and all of that. He knew he was going to create man.

On a theological level, sure, he knew he was going to create woman too. But do note that God's creation of woman was reactionary to his creation of man. Not to muddle with omniscience, but the way Moses writes the narrative is as if to say that God created man, started to marvel at all he had done, then thought, "Oh, I probably shouldn't leave him alone" - as if the creation of women was an afterthought, not part of the original intent.

Now again, omniscience tells us otherwise - that God knew he was going to create woman all along, just as omniscience tells us that God knew the fall would happen all along. Consider the parallel:

- The narrative of the fall ignores God's omniscience and assumes events unfolded in a cause-effect manner where the effect of sin was distinct from the initial condition that God caused in creating the tree of knowledge of good and evil.
- The narrative of creation ignores God's omniscience and assumes events unfolded in a cause-effect manner where the effect of woman's creation was distinct from the initial condition that God caused in creating man.

Despite the parallel analogies, we find theologians and apologists vehemently trying to explain away the cause-effect dynamic as to the fall, yet fully embracing the cause-effect dynamic in the language of the text as to the creation of woman. Of course, in the interests of full disclosure, I have no problem embracing God's omniscience in the institution of evil in the world and I don't feel any compulsion to explain it away. So, I suppose under my own theology I'd undermine at least this aspect of my argument.

Nevertheless, omniscience or not, there's something to be said about the fact that the narrative is framed this way. So there, I said it. Oh yeah, Paul also said it first in 1 Timothy 2:13 (accounting for the context).

if we define a pagan patriarchy for what it is: one that bases the worth of women and girls on their sexual attractiveness and availability to men.

That's the definition of patriarchy? Could have fooled me :p He needs to open a dictionary: "a system of society or government in which the father or eldest male is head of the family and descent is traced through the male line."

I bet the author cannot cite one example of this in the past 5 years.

This point is the most worthwhile one you've made. It emphasizes that popular opinion is based not on factual representations, but on phantom allegations that pop in and out of reality, or otherwise on the one isolated anecdote that stands as an island in the sea of contrary evidence.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

3 upvotes · 13 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

First off ... why are you reading this guy's stuff in the first place? Are you really shocked that people in the church would have a pro-women sentiment?

This guy is an SJW telling Christians supporting trump is a sin

He never mentioned trump once in this article. Maybe you're talking about another article? Can't comment on this.

or the misogyny of Jesus who chose 12 MALE disciples...

I think you're confusing misogyny for gender bias. Misogyny involves an actual contempt and dislike of women. I love women. Like Sweeny Todd, I could watch pretty women all day long. /u/Whitified had a beautiful comment a few months back in a post on femininity that would knock your socks off. Misogyny in its common definition is not cool. It might even be a sin. After all, is it right to show contempt for a half of the population that God loves and adores? Gender bias is perfectly appropriate. That's what we're really addressing here - not that God prefers men over women, but that God has certainly throughout history prioritized men in certain positions of authority which have been usurped by women in modern culture.

Are these people really saved? are they really shaped by God?

We've addressed this quite a bit on this sub. The Gospel is not "grace through faith and rejecting feminism." Holding a feminist ideology doesn't disqualify someone from salvation. But it does present an incredible hindrance to someone's ability to bear fruit for God's Kingdom. Are they still made in God's image? Absolutely. Are they doing a poor job of reflecting that image to the world? Absolutely. When the fall happened, that image was broken generally. By embracing blue pill ideologies, they're simply saying that there's a part of the mirror that they're not going to try to fix because they think it looks beautiful as-is.

The Wisdom Series: Proverbs; Part One

3 upvotes · 13 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well said. I did a study on the concept once. Guess what I found out the Greek and Hebrew words for fear really mean! ... fear. There are other words in Greek and Hebrew that could have more accurately communicated the concept of reverence. But the biblical authors (yes, several of them!) repeatedly say fear instead.

I'm convinced that it is the feminized church who has tried to change the meaning of this phrase to soften up God's rougher, more masculine qualities.

I mean, seriously ... imagine a husband telling his wife: "Fear me!" Instead husbands are taught to fear their wives and their emotions.

Tag: /u/Tylistanis - per your conversation with /u/OsmiumZulu, this is the prime connection to RP concepts that I see. I do agree with OZ, though, that the connection needs to be made much clearer in the future posts you put up. You'll note that my 300 series (which is ongoing) is mostly about Christian living. But in the first one I set the context for why it's all relevant to developing godly masculinity, and in most of the posts after that I keep weaving deeper relevance. Follow that model and you should do fine.

FR: The Spousal Support Scam

3 upvotes · 9 February 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

It really has no place in modern society.

I was with you up to this line. There is something to be said for lost earning capacity due to the lifestyle practiced during the marriage.

So, if a couple gets divorced in their 20s, yeah ... spousal support is probably not necessary and most courts won't award it (or if they do, not much) because the person has plenty of time to recover any financial loss they may have incurred from abandoning their career for a few years.

But what if you have a woman who has been married for 45 years and is getting divorced at the age of 65 (a case I'm currently working on, representing the wife)? You can't say that spousal support has no place in this case - that she should just be kicked to the curb while her 56 year old husband has another 12 years of earnings at over $150k/yr. Yes, there are some assets to be divided, but not nearly enough to get her from 65 to life expectancy. And there's no way she's going to find appropriate employment to sustain herself when she's 3 years before retirement age.

So, between these two types of extremes, where does the court draw the line? In my county it's about 10 years of marriage. If you're married for less than that, there's probably not going to be any support - or if there is, it's not much - maybe a year or two at most. Once you're over 10 years the court says that a decade of lost earning capacity is significant enough to warrant giving her a kick start in the right direction ... and the further on it is and the less likely she'll ever be able to recover, the greater the award and duration. This system makes sense. But the way it's employed in the "equalizing income" sense is pretty grotesque when you acknowledge that the other person doesn't have to give a similar return of what they were contributing - that's where the real problem is ... not in the award of support in the first place, but in the unequal lifestyle contribution.

Why the Church is Dead

3 upvotes · 9 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I was very tempted to go orthodox at one point myself. The more I looked into it the less I could swallow it. That's not to say they're bad or non-Christians or anything ... The theology is just too far off from scripture to me on several points. They're definitely not sola scriptura.

How many of you guys have hired a PI?

3 upvotes · 9 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

Variances from state to state notwithstanding, this is what I would have said.

However, if there are kids involved, a competent PI can work wonders ... But it's not worth it just for cheating. I once caught someone taking the kid to the gym. PI got footage of the kid being left alone, exiting through a back alley door, and playing barefoot atop broken glass in the alley. Psycho parenting neglect right there.

The Feminine Imperative has replaced the Holy Spirit

3 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Exactly. If a person uses their faith to push any agenda other than the one God gave us, I'd argue they're serving a different master.

The Feminine Imperative has replaced the Holy Spirit

3 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You're absolutely right. But we're not necessarily talking about alpha men who became impotent to put a woman in charge. We're dealing with a woman who wanted to be a leader and impotent men are drawn to join that kind of a flock. They were already impotent. She was already pursuing a leadership role. They happened to find each other. This is how society works. People of similar conviction flock together.

An anatomy of butthurt and the impact on frame

3 upvotes · 7 February 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Point of the post ...

·
·
·

... your head.

This had nothing to do with whatever random example I threw out. It was about internal emotional condition during whatever response you give.

An anatomy of butthurt and the impact on frame

3 upvotes · 6 February 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

And that is my point in the alpha positive section.

211 - An anatomy of butthurt and the impact on frame

3 upvotes · 6 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You punish her for testing you in the first place.

I still don't get your compulsion to reject compliance tests as a legit thing. Every time we pray to God to make our headache go away, we're compliance testing him. We're seeing how much God will bend his will to our own. Sometimes he does it ... if he feels like it. Other times he says no. If God just did everything we asked all the time like a beta, this world would be screwed up. We trust him because he knows in his infinite wisdom when to say yes and no - but the request itself still matters.

I would hate a world where God punished every person who asked him to heal their sick grandmother. "Don't test me! I'm God! You don't ask me to do things! I'm going to make your boss fire you now, you ungrateful peasant!" That's not God.

A 'real man' holds her responsible for not testing him in the first place.

That's about as irrational as believing that you can get rid of the feminist imperative sometime next week.

Self-Righteousness, Pietism and RP

3 upvotes · 6 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I did see that post. What you're describing though is a level above. A guy can't do that stuff freely if he feels like he has to out of obligation. Once he learns to say no first, that's when he becomes capable of saying yes of his own accord.

So a plate blocked me.

3 upvotes · 6 February 2018 · /r/askTRP

"So this plate blocked me."

Your answer is in the title: So ... ?

Wife had abortion without telling me

3 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That is what's tipping me over the edge that this is almost certainly a troll post.

There is no "Christian version" of anything

3 upvotes · 1 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

*Supposed to be True, true.

Problem is, that we live in a world where the church is just a copy of the World

True again. This is a sad reality that I often have to break to men in my own church. The secularization (or as historical scholars prefer to say: paganization) of church practices and form has been a crippling issue for centuries, and is one of the greatest hindrances we have in fulfilling the great commission.

lagging behind the World in all moral/social issues by about 20~ years

I'm not sure I follow on this one. Are you suggesting that 20 years from now the "church" will "catch up" to the world and finally embrace things like homosexual marriage? ... as one example.

contemporary music --> contemporary gospel music. Dating ---> Christian "courtship" (dating with a fancy name). Tinder ---> Christian dating sites/apps, with the "Christian" version supposedly holier than it's secular equivalent.

That's exactly my point. nothing about "contemporary gospel music" or "courtship" or "Christian dating sites/apps" are inherently "Christian." They're not scratching off the paint. They're trying to take black paint, mixing in some white paint to create gray, and then lathering it all over themselves and saying, "At least gray is lighter than black." None of this is what God originally intended.

That's not to say that he disapproves of all of it or that there is no utility in some of it. After all, the whole point of RP isn't necessarily to change the world, but to utilize the existing structure for our own purposes. As Christians, we do have an obligation to the "ministry of reconciliation" - to reconcile the things of this world to God. But because we know that this job will never be complete, there is a degree to which we can utilize the system to accomplish our higher calling of making disciples of all nations.

There is no "Christian version" of anything

3 upvotes · 1 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good thoughts. Of course, you have to consider ...

1. This only makes sense if the Holy Spirit isn't guiding us. The Bible says he is. We may not get it perfectly, but on the whole I believe the Spirit will keep us moving in the right direction, even if we do end up zig-zagging a bit.

2. The above argument notwithstanding, I believe that once a Christian is regenerated, they become slaves to righteousness in their minds, even if they remain slaves to sin in their flesh (Romans 7:25). So, I do believe we can think rightly even if we don't always do rightly.

Conclusion: If we are regenerated by the Holy Spirit, we can scratch away at the black paint because (1) the Spirit helps us do it, and is actually the one who does it for us, and (2) because the Spirit renews our minds so that we are capable of thinking rightly, despite our behaviors otherwise.

Wife wants to take Girls Weekend to Tahoe

3 upvotes · 31 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

Good point. I rescind my statement to the degree that OP might live in one of these places.

FR: The Spousal Support Scam

3 upvotes · 30 January 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

He historically contributed finances, predominantly. She historically contributed services, predominantly. But under the current system he must keep giving what he historically contributed, whereas there is no like expectation for her. Also, post divorce he has two jobs in his home: his and hers. She only has one: hers. This is unequal.

How Can I Bring My Girlfriend to a Relationship with Jesus?

3 upvotes · 29 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

that will hurt her tremendously and will push her much further from God's grace.

You're right. It will. But you're not responsible for how she might hypothetically react to you making a godly decision. If God says, "This is what you must do," then God is responsible for the consequences of that decision, not you. Let him figure out if/when he's going to draw her to himself. Remember: the Spirit is the one who draws people, not you. Don't pretend you can somehow stifle what the Spirit may be trying to do in her heart, or don't pretend that your staying with her can prompt something in her heart that the Spirit isn't otherwise ready or willing to do. Your job is simply to obey God and let Him be responsible for what results.

Leaving her without at least trying to minister to her in my opinion I think is the last thing God wants me to do right now. That's why I'm so lost.

This is you trying to justify your behavior with covert motives. You really want to be with her because you have ONEitis, but you're trying to convince yourself and the rest of us that it's some noble spiritual purpose.

What you're really saying, though, is that you need to trick her into thinking she has a chance at marrying you (when you really know the Bible says you can't) in the hopes that living as if this lie is a possible reality she might change her mind about Christ. That doesn't seem very Christ-like. More to the point: your underlying motive in putting on this trickery and facade is so that you can justify marrying her once she's saved without it being a biblical taboo. That's even more devious and proves even more that your heart isn't in the right place to continue this relationship.

Do I stay with her and help her find the Lord and hope she does at the expense of my own spiritual well-being or do I break her heart and push her probably permanently away from salvation so that I can abide by scripture?

No.

Such drama here ... "probably permanently"? Who saves people: you or God? Is the fate of her eternal soul on your head or God's? Is God sitting up in heaven saying, "Sludgerants, you'd better get this right, because if not I'm blaming you for sending her to hell, and I'm not going to send my Spirit to clean up after your messes. I'm not doing anything to fix your sin!"; Of course not.

You sinned by getting in the relationship with a non-believer in the first place. Yes, there are negative, dirty consequences to that, which you'll have to deal with. But are you going to exacerbate the problem by continuing in the sin on the hope that maybe more sin will make something good happen?

Then there's her to think about too. Imagine 5 years from now and she's down your throat on why you haven't proposed yet, and you say, "Because you're not a Christian yet," and she realizes that she just wasted the last 5 years on a dead-end relationship, when she could be off pursuing things that matter to her more? Maybe your staying with her is denying her the same mud-slinging that led the prodigal son back to his father. Are you willing to gamble her potential happiness in life on an off-hope that you can do something that's beyond your power to control? "One man plants, another waters, but it is God who makes it grow." You've planted, you've watered - it's in God's hands now. Your ongoing efforts to proclaim the Gospel to her are wonderful, but if she hasn't responded to your evangelizing imperative by now, she's in God's hands, not yours.

God bless, brother, and I pray wisdom over you in this very difficult, emotional decision!

How should one phrase to a woman that they don't want to have premarital sex, however, you still want to pursue the relationship?

3 upvotes · 29 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

As my goal is to be a Marriage and Family Therapist, it's been drilled into me that emotional connection is the way to create a foundation for dating.

Yep, and every bit of that training is going to be very, very, very blue pill. Remember what you need to pass your tests, then toss it out the window.

all of the girls I've dated so far have never met my ideals in both of those aspects

Well, do you have a clearly defined mission? Have you communicated that mission to the girls you've dated so far? Have you had in-depth conversations with them about what it looks like for them to pursue that mission alongside you? Have you talked to them about their adopting your mission as their own also?

They're not going to be able to meet your ideals on those things until you lead them into it ;)

my goal is to become more like Christ through theosis and in turn becoming more fully myself through Christ

That's an excellent goal, as long as we remember three things about Jesus' life. Everything he did revolved around three of these things. He didn't do anything if it wasn't advancing all 3 of these simultaneously:

- Love God
- Love Others
- Make Disciples

He says plainly that he only acts to the glory of his father. I'd look up the verse, but I'll assume you take that as a given. We also see his entire ministry as a means of serving others not only in physical ways, but in spiritually drawing them toward God and to himself, which is the most beneficial service we can give another. We also see that he was always amassing followers and, although he tended to the crowd, the majority of his ministry was targeted at training the 12.

So, while I fully endorse your mission in the way that Jesus actually lived his life, when most people say their goal in life is just to "be like Jesus," they usually mean: "Sin as little as possible, know theology as best as possible, and be a good person as often as possible." This type of thinking leaves out the most important aspects of what Jesus came here to do, which he then commissioned us all to do :)

If that's my mission, then how would one pursue that mission and have a woman that helps you with that mission?

Because "love God" and "love Others" are basic concepts that virtually every church already works toward, the only thing about your mission that makes it unique is the "make disciples" part. That's why I just skip to the chase and tell people that my mission is disciple-making. And I 100% believe that this mission is given to all believers, no matter your background, gifting, character, personality, spiritual maturity, age, etc.

As for how you invite your wife alongside you, it starts with theological conversations where you passively (and if she's willing: actively) teach her that her greatest contribution to God's Kingdom is through disciple-making.

Once she's on board with the vision intellectually, she's got to try it on for size. Rather than re-inventing the wheel, I'll defer you to 208 - Leadership Part 2.

Once she's living out your mission on her own, you then combine your efforts and start working collectively as a team, whether by jointly leading small groups to train new waves of disciple-makers, or by picking another married couple to disciple together, both through joint and gender-isolated time together. Or maybe you do it in the context of counseling other married couples in your church jointly, but utilize the opportunity to lead them closer to Christ. Or maybe you start a ministry where you and your wife invite others to go rock climbing and you jointly try to transition the conversation to talk about Jesus. Or maybe you invite neighbors over weekly for a meal to build a relationship toward the goal of talking about Jesus - and in any of these options you have time alone between the two of you to debrief about how the time was and how you can take the next steps. See how this one mission can apply in countless contexts?

Or is that not what you mean by mission?

That just depends on what you mean. As I say in 108, a mission that's focused on only you, her, or the marriage is a garbage mission and often results in so much internal conflict that the marriage dies - even if that mission is something like "grow closer to God together." Yes, it's technically a mission, but it's one that's doomed to fail if it doesn't extend into the world for the purposes God put you here for. The mission is to make disciples. You and her can decide the context in which you do that.

I honestly just want a woman that I enjoy being around and is one of my best friends in life. I hope that isn't blue pill of me to say, haha, but I'd rather that than a woman that I have no friendship/emotional connection with.

It is certainly very blue pill to say, haha. The thing is: if you try to make that type of a relationship a goal to pursue, you will always end up failing. If you abandon that goal and pursue a red pill praxeology about your life, you're going to get your original goal met anyway. You will have that "best friends in life" type relationship with her. But it only happens when you abandon that as a priority, otherwise that friendship will die (reference 108 again).

To be clear, this is similar to the way we become great in the Kingdom of Heaven. If we're trying to be "great"

Jesus says we will actually become the least. But when we give up on that goal and simply do what we're supposed to do, that's the only way we can actually become great anyway. Likewise, if you try to make a "best friends" type marriage work, it will fail; but give up on it and just do what God designed you to do as a man, you'll get that anyway.

How should one phrase to a woman that they don't want to have premarital sex, however, you still want to pursue the relationship?

3 upvotes · 29 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians want to date (get to know her on a deeper emotional level) still

This phrase triggered me to reply again. The purpose of dating isn't to develop an emotional connection. That's your blue pill ideologies coming back to haunt you.

In Malachi 2:15 God makes clear that the purpose of marriage is to produce "godly offspring." That can be physical (as was the case in the OT) or spiritual offspring (as Romans 9 clarifies). In short, because we're in a post-Gospel world, the purpose of marriage and sex is no longer about having babies (i.e. the Catholic attitude), but to produce spiritual generations from our relationship.

Put more clearly: when dating, your goal isn't to develop a deeper emotional connection; rather, it's to work together toward the purpose of making disciples. This is what you should be assessing: "Is she going to help me be a more effective disciple-maker, or is she going to be a distraction?"

Now, in 1 Cor. 7 Paul says that marriage will always be a distraction over service to God. I agree with him entirely. In Matthew 19:10-12 Jesus and the apostles reach the same conclusion - that it's better to remain single so you can be fully devoted to advancing the Kingdom of God (note: Jesus says "for the Kingdom" and not just to edify one's own personal relationship with God, redoubling the focal point on discipleship specifically).

In RP terms, I'd think of it this way: You're the man. You must have a mission. You're inviting a woman to walk alongside you in that mission as your helper. If you make a "deeper emotional level" with her your focus, you are distracted from the mission, and this will cripple your relationship long-term. So, just go do your thing and if she's adding value to your pursuit of your mission, then bring her on board and marry her. If she's not adding value, keep on your mission without her.

"But shouldn't I be adding value to her as well? Shouldn't it be mutual?" You don't add value to her by pursuing her. Your value contribution to the marriage is that she gets to vicariously leech off of your successes in Christ. Whatever you do, as the woman at your side she gets to share in the credit as the one who helped you do it. This is my wife's attitude. This is how women throughout Scripture viewed their marriages. It is the way it should be.

Now, because I'm a sucker for musicals, let me quote a song from the movie The Last Five Years (wonderful film chock full of red pill principles!). The guy is a brilliant, successful writer and Anna Kendrick is a failing actress. She's jealous of his successes, but starts to realize her role in all of it:

And then he smiles

His eyes light up, and how can I complain?

Yes, he's insane, but look what he can do

And I'm a part of that

And it's true, I tend to follow in his stride

Instead of side by side I take his cue
True, but there's no question, there's no doubt
I said I'd stick it out and follow through
And when I do
Then he smiles
And where else can I go?
I didn't know the rules do not apply
And then he smiles and nothing else makes sense
While he invents the world that's passing by
And I'm a part of that ... aren't I? I'm a part of that

In other words, he's doing all of these amazing things, and even though she's failing in her own arena (despite his support of her), she finds value in the fact that she has contributed to his successes. She gets to take part in all of his accomplishments as the one who supported him, inspired him, etc.

What's your mission and are you looking for someone to be "a part of that" in your life?

How Can I Bring My Girlfriend to a Relationship with Jesus?

3 upvotes · 29 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, I like the message, but I'd prioritize it this way ... "Never, ever, EVER get involved with a non-Christian, especially a feminist one."

How Can I Bring My Girlfriend to a Relationship with Jesus?

3 upvotes · 29 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I fully endorse this. Let me add two things, though:

1. In 1 Cor. 7 Paul says that even marrying another believer will lead you away from making God your first priority. How much more if you marry a non-believer!
2. There are very few reasons a guy would refuse to leave a non-Christian girlfriend. An extreme example might be that they have a kid together and he risks losing custody. At that point you're already steeped in sin and now just dealing with the consequences. But the most common reason, which I think is OP's clear issue, is a severe ONEitis for the non-Christian girl. Seriously ... what's so unique and special about her that you have to violate Scripture over her? If he doesn't have ONEitis, then he'd have no problem backing out.

This is part of why ONEitis is so dangerous.

FR: The Spousal Support Scam

3 upvotes · 28 January 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Yeah, didn't see that post, but if you can settle without an attorney, do it. I tell my consults that all the time, suggesting they only come to me to review their documents after they reach an agreement.

The Red Pill Documentary

3 upvotes · 27 January 2018 · /r/RedPillWomen

As a heads up, I think it's on Hulu, if you're already a subscriber.

Christian dating: Good book 2 read together?

3 upvotes · 26 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, those are definitely not books to read together.

How to Handle a Veiled Threat of Domestic Abuse?

3 upvotes · 25 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

You threatening to go to the church elders is weak.

For context, /u/stormtrooper10933 is referencing the Matthew 18 process. It's incredibly likely his wife understands this aspect of church culture and biblical doctrine, so she wouldn't take it as him crying to mommy. Instead, a Christian woman would understand this to mean three things:

- he's willing to escalate the matter to the highest degree of reprimand that the faith permits
- that he will have her deemed an "apostate" or a "non-Christian" (depending on their denomination), thus crippling her ability to participate in many church functions
- with her being deemed a non-Christian, this is the first step in opening the door to divorce without him losing his standing in the church

This last one is most likely what she would take from the threat. In short, this is a Christian way of saying, "Get in line or I'm starting the process to get out." RP suggests men make this threat all the time (assuming it's an honest one). But without knowledge of church culture and biblical doctrine, it's easy to mistake that phrase the way you did ;)

THE FOUNTAIN OF TRUTH

3 upvotes · 25 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good to see some things here have helped you :) I'd love to hear more of your story. Why not make a post and let us know what your journey has looked like so far? Give all the same information you would in an FR or a post on the OYS threads in MRP!

Question about dating - denominational question - (22 y/o male)

3 upvotes · 24 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

All theologically conservative denominations seek out objective truth the best they can. Some are just not intelligent about it. For example, SDAs keep following false prophets. Pentecostals trust in individual prophetic revelation, which on some occasions may be genuine, but there's no real standard for filtering out all the phonies.

I recommended LCMS (not all Lutherans) because they have the best theology I know of AND because you said you see value in tradition and want to find that in wherever you go. To be clear, I'm not LCMS myself, but I do have a deep respect for them.

Question about dating - denominational question - (22 y/o male)

3 upvotes · 24 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Avoid Episcopalians like the plague. They are on the most liberal end of the spectrum among protestants. They reject objective truth and instead believe that culture is the lens through which scripture should be interpreted. So, as culture changes so does the meaning of the bible, ergo their broad acceptance of homosexuality, abortion, etc. The Episcopalian church by me has people on paid staff who are open atheists.

From what you're saying, Lutheran Missouri Synod would be perfect for you. The LCMS also does not have a hard stance on birth control, add I believe other Lutherans do. LCMS also has the strongest scriptural basis for their theology. Also, as Lutherans, they value tradition while appropriately placing it as subordinate to scripture.

To be clear, anything I say in this thread is my own personal views and should not reflect how I intend to moderate the sub. I welcome Catholics, orthodox, Episcopalians, etc. to share their views as well. Although I may have some strong disagreements, I still embrace brothers in Christ who do not compromise the core elements of the Gospel.

Filtering RP through a Christian Worldview

3 upvotes · 23 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting story. Asking a girl to lunch crosses my boundaries, but if you can go further safely, that's your call. But the further you go the greater your temptation.

What I really wanted to note, though, is that the plate was spinning the first time she laughed at one of your jokes over a year ago.

What to do from here is play the Fiona/Donkey game from MMSLP. Your wife is Fiona (presumably most of the time, that is) and this other girl is donkey. Shrek has fun with Donkey, spends time around Donkey, and has playful banter with Donkey. But he's never going to put himself in a position where he's tempted to screw Donkey.

Fasting and lifting

3 upvotes · 22 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

With your stats, I wouldn't recommend doing a cut fast. As /u/Whitified said, there are other ways to fast than food.

Otherwise, you could look into intermittent fasting. Personally, about 5 days a week I skip breakfast and lunch and only eat dinner, usually right after I get back from the gym after work. The fact that I'm not eating for 22-ish hours before I lift might have an impact on my lifts, but my body knows the routine by this point, so I really don't feel it much.

Fasting and lifting

3 upvotes · 22 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I second this.

Thanks for the sub, here's my story

3 upvotes · 11 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

A ... a familiar tale, sad to say. I lived this in a microcosm with my first girlfriend. We weren't married, obviously, but she constantly cheated and I constantly tried to reconcile and it was all just a vain effort. I've also seen countless (literally) people who have been through what you're going through. Just a couple months ago a guy from my church went through this. He asked his wife how many guys she was with while they were married and her response was, "Less than 20." She also gave the "I'll figure things out with God after I settle down with a man" line. Of course, she has yet to settle down.

I don't say any of that to minimize your pain, but to tell you you're not alone. Go to your beta/blue friends and you'll probably hear something like, "Sorry, dude. That sucks and all. I guess it just wasn't meant to be" or "If she's not happy in the marriage, what's a guy to do? I hope you can move on quickly" or "She shouldn't have done that, but you should still be trying to win her back. You can do it! She's worth it!"

The RP community (this one in particular) is about the only place where you'll get the truth: "She's a sinner just like the rest of us, and you can't change that any more than she can change herself - only Jesus can do that. A dog returns to its vomit. Unless she's truly transformed in her identity and spirit by Jesus, AWALT - and even then her old temptations will always haunt her. The fact is, she found a better man and hypergamy ran its course. Now, get back on the saddle and start reading and lifting."

I wish you the best, brother.

Thanks for the sub, here's my story

3 upvotes · 11 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Have yer upvote! This is one thing I often tell my otherwise hesitant clients.

Blood sacrifice? Really?

3 upvotes · 9 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm mostly in agreement with this comment. Everything about this thread makes me want to remove the whole thing, but I agree with the reasons you kept it up - and I was even planning on asking your input in modmail until I read your comment.

More to /u/Whitified - what kind of RP men would we be if we broke frame every time someone gave a bold, highly charged criticism of what we believe? Just as OZ did to Catholics, I could do to Baptists, Pentecostals, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, especially Seventh Day Adventists, Wesleyans, OZ's own Reformed Theology, my own home church: Nazarene (though I don't identify as such) ... basically everyone except the Lutherans ... They just make too much doggone good sense (though I'm not Lutheran either).

My point is that every branch of the faith has some screwed up beliefs. It's especially bad between the Catholics and the reformed because ... Well, you know ... the reformed declaring the office of the papacy to be THE antichrist and all.

Should we intentionally poke jabs at each other? Of course not. But does that mean we must cower and hide the genuine advice we have to offer for fear of upsetting someone else's security in their theological framework? I say bring it on - when the context calls for it. The context here called for it. Poking fun at Catholics in a thread not uniquely tailored to Catholic practices and beliefs would be less appropriate. OZ's reply can essentially be summarized: "Your beef is with Catholicism, not the bible." That's a legit reply. A Catholic defending his theology to OP is also a legit reply. Although they are clearly opposing and charged positions to hold, the value-add is there.

That said, OZ certainly trailed from respectful theological discourse. What he said added value, just as his Catholic responder also added value to the conversation. When value is being added, I'll just assume we're all man enough to take the theology-centered (as opposed to person-centered) criticism that comes with it. I err on the side of not censoring things whenever possible.

As for division, I don't think even highly charged denominational criticisms will cause much of a problem in sparse examples. If everyone started ganging up on Catholics en masse, I'd have a problem with that. Until then, I believe censoring people from expressing deeply held convictions is more likely to cause division from this particular sub when "hold frame and engage in the conversation with amused mastery" is so clearly an option for those of the aggrieved denomination. How do you think I still survive in MRP after all this time?

Blood sacrifice? Really?

3 upvotes · 9 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This would have been far more tasteful if written as a reply to OP and not an emotional (read: frame breaking) rant against another rant :/

Not a virgin

3 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Virginity:* That's up to you. God accepts those who were whores for other "gods" before coming to faith, and he still incorporates them as His bride. Personally, I took your path and found someone who was a virgin because that was important to me personally. My point is that there's no biblical compulsion that you must marry a virgin (rather, Paul assumes non-virgins can marry too), but it's certainly a standard that was honored among God's people for millenia. As you say, the character implications are most important to me when making that assessment, not even just the virginity itself. God can purify her, but to be sanctified ... there has to be mutuality in that and my trust over whether or not wants to pursue sanctification is lower for a woman who has a longer history of sleeping around as compared with someone who has only been with 1 or 2 people as compared with a virgin.

Red Flags: Yeah, these are serious concerns. She probably doesn't meet your standard of character. To pursue a relationship with her would be to lower your standard. Are you okay with that? I mean, really, that's what you're asking us: "Hey guys, should I lower my standards? Are they too high?" Your standards are yours. Personally, I don't compromise much. But when I was dating, I also didn't have to compromise. I was the prize. It wasn't until after I married that I lost my alpha and had to rediscover it over the last year +.

Where to Find: Look up OZ's guide for singles on the sidebar. /u/OsmiumZulu really hit it out of the park with that one.

Now, more generally, what you're dealing with is the "Pick 2 of 3" principle. The three things are: (1) Attractive, (2) Single, (3) committed to Christ. The likelihood of finding someone who meets all three is astronomically low. I think ruizbujc did a statistical analysis on it and found that if you attended 9 churches simultaneously, each being the median church size in the country, that's what it would take to find 1 person who was the right gender, spiritually mature, single, and of an acceptable age. If you remove the "spiritually mature" part and just go with "genuine Christian," this changes to only needing to attend 3 median-sized churches simultaneously to have 1 girl in that whole crowd. Then, of course, you have to find a way among all those people to actually meet this girl.

At this point you have two options: (1) pray and hope God exercise divine authority to bring you together, which does happen on rare circumstances, or (2) compromise on some point. Here's how this plays out:

- Attractive: If you want to compromise here, go for it. This is your easiest way to finding someone who meets all of the rest of your criteria. But be cautious about what type of "unattractive" you look for because that has implications elsewhere. For example, a seriously obese girl likely struggles with gluttony and self-control, implying that she's probably not as spiritually mature as she thinks she is. So, while she might be a virgin - is that because she is self-controlled with her sexuality to be able to follow God, or is it because her lack of self-control has put her in a place where she's never been tempted toward premarital sex in the first place? Looks aren't everything, but they certainly do matter and tell a lot more than just surface-level information.
- Single: This is the easiest one to compromise, if the options are there, but it's also a bit of a catch-22. If she's already married, obviously stay away. Don't break up her marriage. She wouldn't be a virgin at that point anyway, so it would violate one of your given standards. But if she's attractive and spiritually mature and only dating a guy, I say you put yourself in the mix and see what happens. I wouldn't try to get her broken up, but if you're a high value man and she's dating a spiritually immature sleaze ball, for example, then you're probably doing her a favor. But if she's with a guy who's a quality man and she happens to notice your presence and availability and decides she likes you better, let her make that judgment call - don't take that choice away from her merely out of respect for the other guy ... UNLESS the other guy is someone you're spiritually investing in. I have a long story on that, but I'll spare you the details. Suffice it to say, your investment in someone you're discipling is a higher priority than a potential relationship that may or may not turn into marriage.

- Spiritual Maturity: This is the one where you're most likely going to have to cave. The question is simply how much. If she's so spiritually immature that she's sleeping around with other men, I wouldn't touch that. Chances are she's not even saved if she has no discretion in following Christ. Those who are transformed live as one who is transformed and repent quickly when they fail, not returning to their vomit constantly. But do remember that Christ pursued us while we were still sinners. He didn't wait for someone else to meet his standard first. He became a standard and used his perfection to deem us perfect and to sanctify us into becoming perfect. The 105 post goes way more into detail on this.

In short, my solution is that if you can't find a spiritually mature woman with the convictions you're looking for, raise her up. Don't date non-Christians. But if you see a non-Christian who has what you're looking for, while avoiding giving any IOIs, share the Gospel with her. If she responds and comes to faith, then begin discipling her and let the relationship blossom. Whereas secular RP will say "create your slut," I say "disciple your bride." It's the same concept, but addresses the whole of what you, as a man, should be doing for your bride-to-be anyway, per Ephesians 5.

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

3 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Dang, brother ... I had no idea it was this bad. Thanks for the info on this!

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

3 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with everything you've said. The primary reason for bringing up PMS isn't to encourage it, but to cause people to take it more seriously - to realize that having sex with someone is entering into a spiritual bond that shouldn't be taken lightly as it often is today.

The RP is tearing me apart. Don't know what to do.

3 upvotes · 2 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

There was no conversation. He was trying to convince you to abandon the red pill altogether. The merits of that position would make for an interesting discussion. I wouldn't mind entertaining theologically grounded purple pill debate here. But he didn't even try - he just linked to other subs with no actual words/thoughts of his own to explain why. This is low-effort/quality and doesn't give me enough room to bend my own rules in favor of my more intellectual nature that loves a good conversation that challenges deeply held convictions. If he tried to pull that on MRP he would have been banned instantly for "concern trolling." I tend to be more lenient.

Merry Christmas RPC :)

3 upvotes · 25 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

You all too!

Red Pill for my wife?

3 upvotes · 24 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

If you mention anything with "red pill" in the name beware. Think of it like you're a magician on stage. There's someone in the crowd who loves your magic and is fascinated by the whole thing and even dabbles in it a bit herself.

Now, imagine pointing her to a website that explains how all of your tricks are done and it's where you go for all of your content. You think, "This would be perfect for her! It's just the kind of thing she'd love!" And she does love every second of it. She pores into the theory, studies the concepts, trap designs, etc. and is impressed at how much you've been able to master for use in your act.

And then she shows up to your next show. She wants to be impressed ... But somehow the magic is ... gone.

But yes, women are welcome here. For Christian women this will hopefully one day be a better forum for her than RPW. As it stands, there's not much harmony between TRP/MRP and RPW. RPW even recently had a popular post that explained that RP women do not want an RP man (in the TRP sense, at least). They have embraced the same core set of truths, but have different agendas in utilizing them.

In Christianity this is different. The male and female agendas are in harmony (albeit in a very convoluted way, due to sin), so an RPC man and an RPC woman should naturally be drawn to one another. The only problem for your wife looking to this sub at present is that we simply don't have enough women to give her a reasonable breadth of perspective from her own sex. I'm okay with that and don't intend actively to seek to change the status quo on this, but I'm also cool if a shift happens ... just have to see how that plays out when/if the time comes, and would probably have to crack the whip more on modding.

Be the Judge

3 upvotes · 19 December 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'm not postulating, you said as much before.

Saying so was either out of context (as in a case W&S once cited) or was from when I first discovered RP and was working the blue out. To quote WISNIFG: "IV: You have the right to change your mind."

With all due respect to your grandfather, it sounds like you were expecting human church authorities to be the deterrent to any of the divorces either of them may have gone through. That's not what I was referencing.

How to get out of "sure I'll do that for you honey" fram and into "sur, if you make sure you deserve it" frame?

3 upvotes · 15 December 2017 · /r/askMRP

This is the answer.

Book Suggestions?

3 upvotes · 12 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Check out the "working on the sidebar" thread (stickied). It has a lot of suggestions in there.

She's not your's it's just your turn

3 upvotes · 17 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I can't count the number of times I've seen people who had the appearance of great godliness - even to their spouses - and who were leaders in the church, preaching sermons, leading ministries, etc. ... who ended up getting caught cheating on their spouses. As you say, "there is no guarantee. None." Even the most seemingly secure relationships always have that chance. Now, the risk is insanely low for some relationships ... but it's still there.

Wife complains that she feels like I am "leaving her behind".

3 upvotes · 13 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Well said.

Visualize yourself

Fake it til you make it ... it works more often than not.

Failed a fitness test tonight

3 upvotes · 13 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Good word.

These conversations should be separated by time though.

This is key, but even more importantly is to remember that the man must be the one to initiate the reincarnation of the conversation. If she has to bring it up again a couple days later and say, "Did you pray about that?" she's back in the captain's chair and being condescending as if she's your mommy who has to make sure you're doing your chores.

By being the man and initiating that renewal of the conversation, you're showing her (1) that you take her position as your first officer seriously, which helps her take your position as captain seriously, and (2) it lets you set the tone for the conversation on your terms with her doing minimal prep in what she wants to say, so you get to control the course of how things go, which helps avoid DEERING if she were otherwise to put you on the defensive.

What is the difference between an "alpha" and a sociopath?

3 upvotes · 10 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Watch the tone.

Hypergamy for the Married Man

3 upvotes · 9 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I appreciate the feedback here. But let me be clear: divorce is certainly an option for me if ...

1. My wife initiates it
2. She cheats on me
3. She expressly disowns the marriage, even without committing 1 or 2
4. Possibly if she becomes too sexually defiant
5. If remaining in the marriage would lead to greater sin than divorce
6. If I'm willing to admit that I'm not as spiritually mature as I purport to be

Yes, I have a higher threshold that must be reached than most of you, but at the same time, even if I were a non-Christian I wouldn't divorce my wife under her current behavior. She is simply responding too well, which tells me that most of her sexual denial issues were not her failing as a wife, but my failing at being a man and leading.

True story, woke up in the middle of the night three days ago to a hand job - with three of our kids sleeping on the floor in our room. The thought of doing something like that with kids around before would have never crossed her mind ... and hand jobs were rare based on her prior framework of what types of sexual acts were acceptable and not.

The things I referenced in my post as practical application points were simply things I do naturally that I've seen good results from - not me pining over how to get my wife to screw me because I'm too weak to get pussy somewhere else if I wanted it.

Seriously, I don't fully understand how I'm constantly accused of being purple. I'd wager I'm more detached from my wife and outcome independent of the relationship as a whole than even many of the endorsed contributors. I've even told my wife to her face (not that I recommend this) that if she died or left me I would not be crushed, as it would make it easier to pursue my mission without dragging her along. Since that conversation, now she's my scout ship - the smaller vessel that chugs ahead to find opportunities for me to steer toward.

She's abandoned her mission and is doing a lot of the footwork in mine - and has completely adopted and internalized it as her own ... AND is actively teaching other women to do the same for their husbands. Literally just last night she was bragging for my approval about how she was with a group of girls whose husbands were drunk captains (not that she knows it by that name) and how their marriages would be so much better if they could help their husbands find a mission, then be first officers in helping him carry it out and how they'll be miserable until this happens. Her attitude toward me was basically, "Didn't I do a great job, master? Are you proud of me?" And if I hadn't literally just had my balls cut up a few hours before (vasectomy yesterday) she was giving me the "Screw me hard right now!" look. I almost did it anyway, until a bandage fell off and I changed my mind.

She's as much on my mission as I am! She's totally hot. She's sexually responsive. She's gradually increasing sexual boundaries. She's submissive to my leadership. She gives me no attitude 363 days out of the year.

Is she perfect? Not at all. Could I find someone younger and mold her too be better than my wife? Easily. But why would I go through all that time and effort when in the last year (especially in the last 6 months of being RP) I've got her living almost exactly as I want? Why would I abandon all the progress I've made or put the relationship at risk just to prove a point to the fine people of this community?

If that makes me purple, oh well. I'd rather have everything I want and be called purple than risk a good thing just to earn a title among men I've never met.

I'm not sure where these accusations come from that I'm in her frame when I literally feel right now like I'm the one getting everything I want out of my marriage ... except oral (and who's to say that's not another few months down the road?). I suppose I would like it if her initiations were stronger ... but /u/BluepillProfessor has me pretty well convinced that I should expect my wife to be the initiator anyway - and I'm content in that.

Other than those two things, I feel like I'm in a pretty darn ideal and perfect world lately. So with all respect, screw whatever "purple haze" or "purple pill Christian" labels people here want to give me. My goal here is to help men get a piece of what I have, not show them how to earn titles or respect from internet strangers.

Back to Basics – Mystery Method, The Game, and the Rules of the Game, Married Edition

3 upvotes · 3 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Fantastic post. And I thought I was long-winded!

Back to Basics – Mystery Method, The Game, and the Rules of the Game, Married Edition

3 upvotes · 3 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Interesting. I've never heard of the cube, but after reading up on it, I'm reminded of the way I used to experiment on people (and occasionally still do). One of the examples that would get positive responses (as opposed to the many things I tried that didn't) would go something like this:

- Intro: I approach someone on an innocuous issue. It might be, "Nice shoes," or "Can you hand me that?" or "Hey, did you just see that guy do ____?" For the sake of example, let's say I start with, "Nice weather." Her reply doesn't matter. Maybe she says, "Not really, I don't like snow."
- Random Assertion: I say something random out of context as a categorizing statement ... let's go with: It's just like the Cuban bananas thing. She gives a weird look and says, "That seems ... random" or "I've never heard of that."
- Pressure-Flip: For a split second I sound autistic, but my confidence demands a different conclusion, and I flip the pressure on her to make her feel like the weird one for not understanding: Huh, that's weird ... why do you think that was random? I keep pressure flipping until she gives the inevitable answer: "Well, we were talking about the weather and then you said something about Cuba and bananas, and I don't get it."
- Interest Flip: I respond: Interesting. You've got my attention now. Give me your best guess [as if it was her trying to get my attention rather than the other way around]. She makes up something about how maybe the weather in Cuba has chemicals in the rain that would cause Cuba to grow weird bananas and that must be what I was talking about.
- Unsolicited Disclosures: Whatever her answer is, I point out how ridiculous it is: That's ridiculous. Why would the weather in Cuba cause bananas to grow any differently there than anywhere else? Then I highlight something she said and connect it to her personally. Ex. 1: I mean, are you some kind of chemical botanist? or It's interesting that you mentioned rain; I never said rain. Do you have some kind of a rain obsession? Whatever it is, it's obvious that the answer is no, but the question is designed to make her seem like the weird one and get defensive, then reveal a truth about herself to correct my bizarre accusation without me ever directly asking her for that information.
- Loop for More: I keep up a cycle of asking these types of questions, refusing to allow the conversation to follow predictable patterns, always revolving around the one random statement that she can't figure out. After a while, she's totally confused about what I'm talking about, but the confidence with which I'm talking makes her think that I must be making perfect sense and it's just her that doesn't get it, adding to the mystery.
- The Ta-Da: Whenever I'm ready, I stop and say, You know, this has been an interesting conversation, but you don't have to try so hard. She's all like, "What are you talking about?" I say, I just commented on the weather and you start telling me your whole life story ... how you work as an interior designer for a home remodeling company and you love going running in the rain and your sister visited Cuba a year ago and you were jealous that you couldn't join her, etc. She's vaguely impressed that I had learned so much about her and she knows nothing about me. Sometimes I'd get a light punch me in the arm out of playful enjoyment at having met a guy who could dupe her with a fun little game, displaying my dominance of the conversation and intellectual value/cleverness at keeping her going.
- Epilogue: Sometimes she'd not get it right away and assume the Cuban bananas line really did mean something and would ask about it at the end. I simply say, Hey now, I just made that up to see what you'd say and you practically threw yourself at me. I'm not that easy, you know. Since I'm more of a catch-and-release guy, the two times I've tried this routine since finding RP I've also ended with making a joke about my wife finding out some stranger is hitting on me and how she must have some serious balls to hit on a married man and that I'm not into people with balls anyway. She points out she had no way of knowing, and I just laugh it off with, It was nice to meet you, but I've gotta get going.

The World vs Faith

3 upvotes · 2 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I get what you mean by "missing out." I used to feel that way too, and someone else wrote a post on that very _____ subject a few weeks ago. My response is essentially that sin is like meth. Yeah, I know it must feel insanely good. But I also see its addictive nature, the way that it ruins people's lives, the way it affects their brain chemistry, and the host of other negatives that go along with it. Result? I'm curious at what it feels like, but I'm perfectly fine avoiding that path entirely. For more information, check out 207, which addresses how we're meant to handle temptation and sin like this.

But I think what you're getting at is really more of a reconciliation of certain red pill expressions with our faith. "The red pill" has a dichotomy between its descriptive components and its prescriptive components (see this foundational post for more information). As a descriptive understanding of how the world works, the red pill is insanely accurate - far better than scientists and psychologists and politicians have figured out. There are some practical realities that simply can't be tested by an authentic scientific method, so trial and error, experience, and common stories are about the best that the secular world can get, which is what the red pill is, at its core. Someone like /u/Whitified will tell you that it stops there.

But the reddit community decided to take "the red pill" to another level: turning it into sexual strategy. Indeed, the descriptive aspects of the red pill that form its core were discovered in an effort to develop sexual strategy in the first place (TRP started as a breakaway from seddit), but there started to develop an attitude that if someone really embraced those descriptive aspects, then he would inherently embrace certain tangential ideologies too. One of those tangential ideologies is the "anti-marriage" notion that you've picked up on. So, anyone who is "pro-marriage" or "marriage-neutral" is not truly a "red pill man" even if he otherwise embraces all of the other underlying truths. This attitude actually makes perfect sense if sex is a man's highest priority in life. So, if we stick to the notion that RP is sexual strategy and nothing else, then these tangential ideologies really must be embraced for a man to be truly "red pill." That said, at RPC we are firmly convicted that it is appropriate and even necessary that men have other priorities in life higher than sexual fulfillment. From a secular standpoint, sex is the epitome of pleasure, so it makes sense that they would make sexual fulfillment their highest pleasure. But for Christians, we have higher priorities, which allow us to embrace 100% of the descriptive red pill truths and acknowledge that even the prescriptive strategies laid out on places like TRP and MRP are actually the best models, while still giving ourselves freedom to maintain priorities that are higher than those strategies, and thus we may pick and choose which tools to use in our sexual strategy tool-belt, while rejecting the tools that are inconsistent with our higher priorities.

divorce rates are terrible

Secular RP is really worried about this - and rightfully so. The secular divorce rates as well as the divorce rates of "casual Christians" are really high. That said, among Christians who have an active lifestyle of evangelism and discipleship, I seem to recall the rates being something like 5% or less. That means that if you actually live out your faith and it's not just something you think about on Sunday mornings, you have a 95% chance of maintaining your marriage for life.

How can anyone tell someone to spin plates or run game on a woman with just the intention to have sex and nothing more, and be a godly man.

Again, you choose which tools you want to put in your belt. If spinning plates isn't one of those tools because it's inconsistent with our faith, then don't use that tool if your faith is a higher priority to you (as it is for me). That said, spinning plates doesn't require "the intention to have sex." To quote Rollo: "Spinning Plates doesn't necessarily mean you're f---ing all of your plates. It's more of a spreading out of your efforts across a wider pool of subjects." To that end, having a friendly conversation with the waitress across the street from your office periodically is technically "spinning a plate." It develops confidence and abundance mentality, and as long as you're not doing it for the purpose of trying to cheat on your wife, there's nothing unbiblical about it. I get other women showing IOIs toward me periodically - some where I've initiated a harmless conversation and they escalated it to that level and others where they initiated. There's nothing unbiblical about just talking to another woman. It's the modern church that tells us we must set our boundaries higher than biblical standards to make sure we don't cross biblical lines - that's where the problem lies. When the Pharisees did this, Jesus rebuked them for it.

I want to do right, but it just seems to me that right is not only not respected, but isn't valued to any extent really whether it be women or anything else

If you're looking for validation from people - be it RP, women, or the church - you're already moving in the wrong direction. Galatians 1:10 is clear: if you're seeking to please people or get your validation from them and not God, then you aren't rightly a disciple of Christ in the first place. So, who cares whether or not you get respected or valued by other people for doing good? You're not supposed to care about them when you're doing these actions - what you do you do for God.

What's the possibility of a "divorce explosion" in the near future?

3 upvotes · 1 November 2017 · /r/askMRP

I'm inclined to agree with /u/BobbyPeru. Marriage rates are on the decline, so there will be fewer divorces. Statistically, that alone doesn't affect the rate/ratio, but the people who would likely have ended up divorced are the ones who are choosing not to marry in the first place (wise decision, IMO). So, of the people who do get married, they're the ones who had a stronger chance to hold out anyway. Accordingly, I anticipate things will plateau where they are now or the divorce rate may marginally decline in the next couple decades. As /u/creating_my_life said, the interesting thing will be to see what happens when the 20-somethings are at the point that they would have been getting divorced had they married.

Broken beta asking for help with RP career advice

3 upvotes · 30 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Your solution is a blend of upcoming 300-level and 400-level content (sorry, been too busy to write much lately). Specifically, you need a mission and you also need some internal healing.

What's your purpose in life? My guess is you really don't feel like you have one yet and you think your job (whatever that ends up being) will give you one. Wrong.

- We are human beings, not human doings. Don't try to define yourself by what you do; live out of who you are.

Who are you? If you're saved, you're a child of God. Period. Let that truth sink in and percolate for a while. All of your internal healing will come from that one core acknowledgment. Of course, it spreads outward from there, but that's going to be the center of it - that because of the Gospel (Jesus' death and resurrection to save you from sin), you have a restored relationship with God as one of his adopted children and the bride of Christ. [Note: that always fascinates me - that it's not enough God wanted me as his son-in-law by virtue of my union with Christ; he went the next level to adopt me of his own accord.]

As with all children, their identity is given to them by their parents - both in the genetic sense and in the way that we're raised. Eventually we get to move out and become our own people, but as Christians we will dwell in the house of the Lord forever, so we continue to draw our identity from Him for all of time. With that in mind, along with our identity comes our purpose. You cannot decide your purpose for yourself, if you want any true satisfaction in life. You've got to live out God's purpose for you.

- When we acknowledge that we can't live life on our own because we have no life apart from God, that's when we are able to let God step in to begin living His life through us.
 - Are you living your life or God's life? If it's your life, where'd you get it from?
- If you're not living out the reason for why God put you here, that's a pretty darn good explanation for why you're not satisfied with the life you're living.

So, what's God's purpose for you? They're summarized in the three Greats:

- Love God (greatest command), Matthew 22:37-38
- Love Others (second greatest command), Matthew 22:39
- Make Disciples (great commission), Matthew 28:19-20

These are inextricably linked. If you fail in one, you fail in all three.

- If you don't love God, you can't love others (1 John 4:8) or make disciples (Matthew 12:30).
- If you don't love others, you can't love God (1 John 4:20; Matthew 25:40-46) or make disciples (John 13:34-35).
- If you're not making disciples, you can't love God (John 21:15-17; John 14:21) or love others (John 15:16-17).

Most Christians think they have the G and O parts down, but they forget the D, or otherwise try to find ways of rejecting it because that means they actually have to do something - something uncomfortable sometimes. It's much easier just to assume God's only purpose for us is to avoid sinning (i.e. "not doing something"). God is a God of action, not inaction. Find that thing he wants you doing, then go do it. That's where your satisfaction in life will come from. I am confident that this is the mission to make disciples.

Why am I confident about this mission? Because it's only one of two things that we can do on earth that cannot possibly be done in heaven. You want to avoid sin? You have all of eternity in heaven to be sinless. You want to study theology? You have God Himself at your disposal in heaven to learn from. You want to worship God? You have all of time to sing His praises. You want to evangelize and make disciples? Oops, can't do that up there. Oh yeah, that must be why we're here instead, then. In fact, Paul says this plainly: "I desire to depart and be with Christ, which is better by far. But it is more necessary for you that I remain in the body. Convinced of this, I am certain I will remain and will continue with all of you for your progress and joy in the faith" (Philippians 1 somewhere). Who are you helping to "progress" in the faith? Who are you giving the "joy" of faith to in the first place? That's your purpose.

Now, Jesus lays out another plan: "Seek first His Kingdom and His righteousness and all these things will be added to you as well" (Matthew 6:33). In other words, if you're worried about your job or money or clothes or time or finding a wife or whatever - God's solution is, "Don't worry about it. Just pursue the mission I have set for you and I'll take care of the rest." Interestingly, RP teaches that being DNGAF is the best way to show strength and attract a wife to you. It also demonstrates confidence in your performance to employers (if your work quality stands on its own, of course). But you can only actually maintain that attitude if you have a purpose beyond your work itself.

As for the internal healing ... that will have to be a conversation for another day. I can help with stress, anxiety, and all that, but it's a much longer conversation and it will ultimately fail if you don't have a mission anyway. So, you've got to get started with this. Easiest way? Find someone to disciple you.

How do I know if marriage is right for us?

3 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

This past weekend I caught my wife telling my son, "You have to learn to be nice to everyone."

Me: "Not necessarily. Son, unless someone is causing a problem, you should be courteous, polite, and respectful to everyone - but you don't have to be nice." <Aside to my wife> "I don't want him to be a pushover."

My wife gives me a weird look. Says, "Hmm ..." and thinks for 5 minutes in silence. Out of the blue she turns off the radio: "I think you're right."

Me: "Of course I'm right."

Failure, not sure why

3 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, this is great. Made me laugh out loud for real.

Failure, not sure why

3 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Mirroring isn't a bad response IMO, but we never see Jesus really mirroring.

That's a good point. I hadn't thought of that.

When he challenges people, he often does it with a question.

A la my recent post on negative inquiry ;)

206 - Brace Yourself for Battle

3 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Glad I could help :) Just being honest ... it was written specifically with you in mind, based on our most recent exchanges.

Failure, not sure why

3 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not sure RP has an answer. My guess is, assuming she's a Christian, that she has an image in her head of what Jesus looks like and you deviated from that image more than normal.

Now, would Jesus have called that guy out? Probably. He called people out for their garbage all the time. I don't know if you were sinful in how you approached it. Maybe you were, maybe not. But your wife certainly thinks it was sinful. So, maybe it's not the display of bravado that turned her off as much as the display of spiritual immaturity.

That's why we have the 300-series - to help Christian men develop the spiritual maturity necessary to keep their wives attracted (as a secondary purpose, at least). This is a unique facet among Christian relationships that the rest of the RP community simply doesn't have to worry about.

I don't care how "RP" a non-Christian guy is - if a Christian girl is even half way living by the Spirit she's going to be disgusted with him. That spiritual maturity component is absolutely crucial for us. It's not enough to be a man. You must be a godly man.

Defining RP for this sub - and understanding the toolbox

3 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting thoughts, but go ask for a definition at TRP or MRP and see what you get. I'd guess your view is the overwhelming minority. I know because I used to treat it exactly like you (partly because of you) and it got me ridiculed for trying to "change" what the red pill really is, and it always came back to sexual strategy. I don't know all of the origins of RP doctrine (some congressman started it, I gather), but I do have a pretty good idea of what it is today.

206 - Brace Yourself for Battle

3 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

It's not a battle against her - it's a battle to save her. She just happens to be an unwitting participant. I thought you of all people would appreciate that the fight is against the feminist conditioning, not your wife herself.

How does this advice change for dating?

3 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with everything /u/rocknrollchuck said. Read it all a second time, if you haven't done so already.

I will note: When he said "God will change your heart" there's another implication to this - you'll be glad you "missed out" on all the stuff that you want to do as a non-Christian. This is true both in the immediacy, as you start to understand what God has to offer, as well as in eternity when you finally have a right perspective about what sin really is and what it does to a person.

Have you ever done meth? I haven't. I know it must feel INSANELY GOOD. But I also see what it does to a person who gets hooked on it. Result? I don't feel like I'm "missing out" by not doing meth. I'm genuinely glad I've avoided it all my life. It's the same way with sin. Once your heart is changed by the Spirit and you can see sin for what it really is and the spiritual corruption it causes to a person, you'll look back at your life and think, "Phew, I really dodged a bullet there. Glad I got off that train when I did!"

Developing the RP Unfazed Attitude

3 upvotes · 18 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

This is a great post - and a necessary attitude to maintain in developing an attitude of stoicism and maintaining frame.

This was never really my struggle. In fact, after taking the MMPI-2 (the most widely used mental health test), I only had 3 scales that were out of ordinary acceptable ranges, and one of them was "cares too little about what others think of him."

That said, my wife is a full-on emotional people-pleaser. Even random strangers giving her a weird look can ruin her whole day if I'm not there to talk some sense into her. This is something I'll be sharing with her - and really anyone else who gets butthurt easily.

At the end of the day, I think what you're saying boils down to this: Only value the opinions of those who have the proper credentials to chime in. My mother in law is a great example - she's pretty darn psychotic and was, by my wife's admission, a pretty darn horrible parent. Yet my wife somehow feels all kinds of shame and pressure when her mom criticizes her parenting abilities. Why would she care about what a horrible parent has to say on the topic of parenting? Good path to follow ... I'm in.

Now, to the rest of the men here: Why do guys get all butthurt at the things their wives are saying? If get confused about the tax code and my wife wants to ridicule me about it, I get it ... she's a hotshot accountant. Her opinions on tax issues matter.

But if my wife decides to criticize me over how I run my house, how I father my children, how I fix the deck, etc. - she's not an expert in any of these areas. I am. Her opinions on those types of things shouldn't matter to me. And your wife's opinions on those types of things shouldn't matter to you.

Of course, you listen, STFU, fog, AA, AM, etc. through the conversation - but remember that God put you in charge of leading the household for a reason. Listen to what your first mate has to say - and don't throw the baby out with the bathwater, but also don't assume everything she says has value simply because she's your wife.

And this makes sense when dealing with your boss, your friends, your neighbors, that annoying douche at the gym, etc. Solid post.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepillled to answer)

3 upvotes · 17 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

"Science" tells us to do date night and buy presents. Red Pill is not based on "science" but on experience and observation.

Or to clarify: RP is not based on "science" - it's based on science (no quotes).

In contrast, the Bloop culture used "science" to ask women what they like and what they don't like.

My degree in statistical methodology wants to tear itself apart when it reads how most "scientific studies" are actually performed. That's not to say the PUA's methodology is free of things like sample specification, confirmation bias, etc. I haven't ever seen a true scientific study done on these things. The "scientific" community at large simply can't engage because sleeping with a subject gets too personally involved and can't really be done in a closed environment, which taints the reaction. The PUAs have a stronger ability to report actual field results than the scientific community ever could, but the fact that they're mostly not trained in how to engage in research and interpret results leads me to question a lot of things.

As I noted somewhere else, it's easy to figure out which buttons to push to cause different lights to blip, but take off the panel and try to figure out the wiring underneath - the PUAs simply aren't equipped to do this. So, when I posted my "sleeping naked" field report, I specifically denied any actual knowledge on why it worked - I only knew that this button created that result for me. Many flaired people wanted to ignore my suggested rationales and say, "It's because of your DNGAF attitude," but there's no scientific basis for the conclusion that the DNGAF attitude is what caused the response in this situation. They do have confirmation that pushing the DNGAF button will produce a particular result (over time) in other scenarios, but even at that they can't say why pushing that button works. This is the problem in the research methodology employed by PUAs and RP guys.

Unfortunately, when you do have someone like me who comes around who specifically oriented close to 2 decades of my life mastering the art of statistical methodology in real-world environments ... because of my faith and marriage, I simply won't engage in most of the studies necessary to confirm a lot of things from a more scientifically appropriate standard. So, my ability to experiment is limited to my particular wife. I'm okay with that, but it does limit the quantity of useful information I can present, whereas with others I'd be more concerned with the quality of the useful information presented and whether it meets the requirements of actual scientific scrutiny. That's not to say I doubt the results - the consistencies in reports are too overwhelming to ignore. But it does mean a lot of the why is suspect, and there is also the possibility that every time a specific result recurs people were pushing both the red and green buttons, but are only giving the red button credit for the result, not realizing they even pushed the green button in the first place.

Tag: /u/Slipknot_Is_Metal

Share A Tip Saturday

3 upvotes · 16 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

This is solid.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

3 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Reasonable doubt, but I am being honest. The 275lb me was in February and virtually all of the loss was between then and June 8 when I was doing exclusively cardio and heavy dieting. Once I was down to 235 I started lifting. I used to lift in high school and college, when my max bench was 275. When I restarted in early June I was struggling, but would do 160 5x as part of the SL 5x5 routine I began. Two weeks later I made the easy gains to 185 as my max 5x set, lifting 6 days a week and running 2-3 miles before each workout, which helped keep the weight off while I ate a lot to keep my muscles building.

By mid July I was benching 5x 205, late July was 225 (two plates). I hit a plateau there for a month until my brothers came at the end of August, so I actually had spotters and put up 250 as an ORM. From there I started doing 235 as my heavy set and worked up to 255 as a 5x by the end of September. Two Saturdays ago I went to the gym with my dad so I had a spotter again and did 275 once (tried a second and failed). Last week I kept up 255 as my 5x set and this week added another set of 5s to 285 as my current ORM.

My goal has been to get to 300lbs before doing a big cut diet, so I've been pushing super hard, but I'm not going to make it. My wife and I go to Great Wolf Lodge every year with the in-laws and my wife always ends up feeling like crap because her sister and her sister's husband look like super models. Every year in the past I've been grossly overweight (around 265lbs) and it's honestly just been embarrassing. We're going late November this year and I know I'm much better looking than he is now, but I still want one month to cut my body fat down from 15 to 12% and I know I'm not going to keep making gains during that month due to the necessary calorie deficit.

For the record, I don't take steroids. I looked into tren but got too scared by side effects and how easy it is to use it wrongly. I did take protein shakes sporadically for 3 weeks early on though.

More info on my routine in this post from a while ago on RPC. That was toward the end of my plateau.

Clever girl, I wasn't paying attention

3 upvotes · 6 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

The ATBM crowd is still in the emotional honeymoon phase. Remember how it was when you were dating your wife? It's like being on a high. A few months after marriage (2 years on the long end for some couples) and those emotions die down and reality sets in. So, for the already-married, we're not clouded by that emotional voodoo. For the ATBMs, they're not able to think straight. They think these feelings will last forever as long as they're with the person and don't realize that emotional re-stabilization is inevitable and will approach a lot faster than they expect.

Sleeping Naked

3 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Of all the people going to hell, she actually likes you the best. She thinks being pro-Israel will get her a bigger mansion in heaven. My guess is that she's going to end up getting an up close look at your afterlife crib herself, though ;)

Sleeping Naked

3 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I still have young kids who come down still

Yeah, my kids do this too - I have 4 that are all between the ages of 0 and 5. It's a 100% rate that one of them will come in throughout the night, sometimes two. That said, they know just to bring in their blankets and sleep on the floor next to our bed - they're not allowed on the bed anymore. So, neither of us actually have to get out of bed to deal with it, and we often don't even wake up for this. Also, they get up before we do and leave on their own :p upgrading to silk sheets about a year ago, and my wife who was always "cold" and had to sleep in long PJ's now just sleeps in panties and a top

Interesting. Good timing: I just bought her silk pillowcases for her birthday coming up in a couple weeks. Maybe I'll get the sheets to match too.

I really like being cold while I sleep, though. Will the sheets cause me to end up overheating? I always have to have a fan blowing on my face.

Sleeping Naked

3 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Fair point. Maybe she can wear some panties. But even then, I'm not sure how many women really have leakage that bad when the crimson tide isn't rolling in.

She's Mad Because She's Losing

3 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Apart from my divorce work, I've represented several business owners as well (highest net value: $17.5mil - this is also what gives me an edge in working with cases involving self-employed spouses). I can affirm what you're saying.

It's not about winning or losing - it's about the long-term investment you're making in individuals. This is different for mega corporations, where they don't have any interest in seeing people advance from within - they just want someone to serve coffee until they quit and they can hire someone else. With most non-mega companies, the investment in the individual is the driving force behind the relationship. So, rather than it being "We're losing money on Bob because he's not bringing in enough sales," it's, "How can we get Bob from point A to point B so he can generate the sales we need to turn a profit on him?"

Mega corps have disposable income, so the high turnover rates don't kill their business. Small, mid, and even large companies (again, everything short of "mega") have much more to risk with high turn-over rates and often are far more successful if they can help employees improve rather than making snap "win/lose" judgments before taking action.

Tag: /u/sd4c

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

3 upvotes · 2 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

What you're saying makes sense and I agree. But when you term it as "I wouldn't divorce my husband," it makes it sound like you do have a power to divorce that you'd choose not to exercise. What you're really describing is an "I can't divorce my husband" situation - because as humans we are incapable of dissolving what God bound together. To that end, I agree wholeheartedly - the original marriage bond does not go away, despite a civil divorce.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

3 upvotes · 2 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

It sounds like you want a situation where your eventual wife has 100% of the risk of being with you. No society (even Old Testament Israel) has ever been that one-sided and I don't see God supporting it.

absolutely no alimony

What if you've been married for 30 years, she has serious health problems preventing her from working, and you simply didn't save up enough for her half of the assets to get her by for the next 20+ years of life? Too bad, old lady - you can be homeless for all I care seems like the opposite of a Christ-like attitude.

I saw your other comment about this sub involving "men who are Christian but are also seeing the reality of marriage in this day and age." Sure, but the solution to the present reality is not to implement another completely screwed up system. Just because the present system is broken doesn't mean your "no child support, no alimony" system is a better alternative.

I would want the following guarantees: - equal custody

What if you end up beating your children to a bloody pulp. Do you demand equal custody then? Or what if you get injured and become a blind paraplegic? Should you get equal custody then? I think you have these nice idealized notions of what your future should look like, but you're not thinking of every contingency and the fact that no one can ever decide what's best for a child before knowing what the actual situation will be.

For this reason, courts always retain jurisdiction over the placement, care, and support of minor children and these things cannot be waived, no matter where in the US you live. No court will compromise the well-being of a child because of a hypothetical future dispute between you and your hypothetical future wife.

heavily monitored as to what the use was with receipts proving that every penny was going to the kids

I get so fed up with this attitude. I had a case once where the husband was ordered to pay $500/mo in child support and he tried to comb through his wife's bank statements to prove that she was blowing the money on herself. Sure, she spent more than $500/mo in restaurants, clothes, etc. for herself - but so did he for himself. She also had a $1,300 mortgage and over $400/mo in utilities. If she were to have lived in a house suitable only for herself (i.e. didn't have enough space for the kids), her rent/mortgage would have been around $550/mo and her utility usage would have been much less. In other words, from rent and utilities alone, she had at least $900 of additional expenses just for the kids (noting that he was living it up better than she was). His $500/mo covered just over half of rent and utilities that she spent for the kids, meaning any hair cuts, food, restaurants, clothes, school fees, extracurricular costs, etc. - those were all on her and he didn't contribute to them at all.

At least in my state child support is not making one party pay 100% of the expenses for the kids. It's calculated by taking the combined incomes of the parties, then referencing that income number to a chart. That chart was created by researchers in the 70s who published their findings in the 80s as to how much it costs for families at varying income levels to raise children who are not socio-economically disadvantaged. These numbers have not been updated since the 80s, therefore don't account for all the inflation and economic factors that have occurred since then, thus men actually get a huge break. Once the combined income level is cross-referenced in the chart to get how much the family should be spending on the children (different columns based on how many children there are), each party's % contribution toward the joint income is then taken with respect to that number. So, if the chart says for 2 kids at $100,000 joint income that $10,000/yr should be spent on the kids, if Mom makes $20,000/yr and Dad makes $80,000/yr then dad pays 80% of $10,000 in child support = $8,000/yr (i.e. $667/mo). Mom is still responsible for the other $2,000/yr - but because she's now primarily responsible for the expenses for the children accounted for in the research that produced the chart, the presumption is that her $2,000/yr is going toward those expenses. 9 times out of 10, the mother ends up paying all of the extraneous stuff too and dads end up paying less than their fair share.

There are certainly some divorce laws that aren't favorable toward men - but at least in my state child support is not one of them. Also, the entire scenario would play out identically if you were to switch Mom's and Dad's roles. So, don't screw your children's lives over just because you don't understand how these things work.

What you really want is a pre-nup. You want a document that says, "Under such and such circumstances, neither party shall pay alimony to the other." If you just say, "No alimony," virtually no court will honor it because you haven't specified the conditions in which that would apply. You have to show the court that you have both carefully considered possible future scenarios and that in each such scenario you're both agreed that alimony would not apply. My guess is that when you start contemplating such scenarios, if Christ is in you, you'll realize that there are actually many scenarios where you should be paying alimony and you'll rightly agree to it.

But, those scenarios will also be far more limited than what the default laws of your state would likely otherwise provide. Although I do believe child support laws are rational and appropriate, I don't question the fact that custody and spousal support issues usually end up favoring women (regardless of the actual statutes). But don't swap out one bad plan for another - find out what is righteous and do that.

As far as getting spiritually married without having a state marriage, what's your reason for wanting to do this? If it's because you want to have the freedom to divorce your wife with no negative consequences at all - do you really think God will honor that course of action simply because it's not technically 'divorce'? You'd be a fool.

I'm 99.999% sure God cares less for what label the sin falls under and more about what it is you're actually doing.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

3 upvotes · 2 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Common law marriage has been abolished in most states and the states that retain it have greatly watered it down or made it much harder to prove than it was in the old days. Each person should look to a local attorney to figure out what your own state says. My state specifically rejects all claims of common law marriage and will not award property or spousal support on those grounds. That said, if property is commingled sufficiently that it becomes impossible to sort out whose is whose, then the general civil division can get involved, but this doesn't go to the domestic relations court. It's more akin to two farmers who can't remember who bought the tractor 20 years ago fighting over who owns it.

alimony is the right and just thing for most couples where one party makes financial / career sacrifices

Care for the children or not, this is true either way. My state's laws specifically have a statutory presumption that both partners have contributed equally to the marriage regardless of financial contribution. As a result, no one can ever argue, "I bought everything, she contributed nothing." The court's response is simple: As soon as you decided she wasn't pulling her weight, that's when you should have gotten divorced. If you continued in the marriage despite the imbalance in contribution, that's on you, not her.

RP takes their concern about divorce WAY too far for Christians

Agreed. The traditional RP position is that finances are the only thing that matter and women should take 100% of the risk in marriage. This is even more unfair than the current state of the law. That said, in the current law, men do tend to have a greater share of the risk.

time would be better spent vetting

I couldn't agree more.

very conservative Catholic woman

I totally understand your reasoning - but that also brings other baggage with it. So, as with all things ... pros and cons.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

3 upvotes · 2 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not Cathodox, but I do believe their position is the reverse - that Scripture actually only has authority because of tradition - that it's the cornerstone of tradition, but cannot be looked at apart from tradition.

I do believe there is value in tradition - but not as an authority. Nevertheless, if /u/rpw111528 wants to write from the position of tradition having authority, as you say, this may diminish the number of readers who will take the argument as credible, but in the end it's still a valid and unique perspective, different from what many other people would be able to offer. So, take that for what it's worth :p

College Kid... Relationships are hard

3 upvotes · 27 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

1/2

she really loves me

How are you defining love here? That's a huge question to wrestle with and one that, from your post, I get the impression you haven't spent enough time figuring out yet.

she's not aligned towards Christ either

If a girl isn't aligned toward Christ, you need to separate yourself from her. 1 and 2 Corinthians 6 are both pretty clear that you should not be binding your life to non-believers. I'm not a big fan of going around telling people what God's will is for their life, but I can say fairly definitively: God's will is that you not date or marry non-Christians.

I don't want to be alone ... I get a lot of joy out of companionship, but I don't know if it's gone too far.

Yes, it's gone too far. This is what's clouding your judgment. Because you aren't yet satisfied in your relationship with Christ, you're looking to women as a shortcut toward satisfaction. When you are satisfied with Christ, then you stop caring about who you're with or why because your mission in Christ (see 110 and the 300-series) will be all that matters. Incidentally, as /u/Chinchilla_the_Hun implied, this mission is what's going to attract the right kind of girl to you.

My Parallel Story

Here's the deal ... I've been exactly where you are. I was weak and looked to girls to satisfy me. In my arrogance, I thought God was my center, but because I had not yet adopted a mission I was ignorant. I wasn't oriented toward anything. I was just wandering aimlessly through life without a clear purpose. Sometimes I sought joy or happiness, other times I made sacrifices to feel like I contributed to something noble. But on the whole, I knew that when I died and stood before God and he asked me what my life was all about, I would only have a hodgepodge of things I'd tried, never a clear, decisive mission to articulate that brought him glory.

The result of this mentality in me was that I started dating an extremely hot girl who was "not aligned towards Christ either- only the idea of God in general." She said she was a Christian, so that was enough for me. To describe her, "she has a history with anorexia, depression, isolation" ... "and she's absolutely broken inside. Depressed, anxious, insecure, distrusting, erratic, manipulative, bitter... But she really loves me and I think she's a really great partner when she's not in the wrong mood." She had been sexually and physically abused in her childhood and hopped through several foster homes. She was the exact kind of trouble I was attracted to (although I didn't realize I was attracted to troubled women at that point).

Throughout the relationship, she cheated on me constantly (sometimes with her exes, other times with new guys altogether) - every guy on campus wanted in her pants, and she gave it up because she knew I was committed to waiting until marriage. She would also say things like, "You're the guy I want to marry ... but I'm too young to have met you. I need to have my wild, fun days before I settle down."

Despite having no psychological or spiritual training (though I thought I did at the time) to do so, I continued in the relationship on the following thought process:

- No matter how many times she screwed up, I was committed to forgiving her because I misunderstood the "forgive 7 times 77 times" thing Jesus said.
- I thought I could fix her - that because she had few other Christians in her life leading toward Christ, it became my obligation to leverage the relationship for the sake of the Gospel. This process is known as "evangelizing" and is something the Bible actually says not to do, though I was ignorant of that at the time.

Part way into the relationship a guy started discipling me for the first time in my life. It took him all of two seconds to let me know that the relationship was unhealthy and holding me back. I didn't believe him and decided to trod forward anyway. As it turns out, he was right. By making her my project and emotional center of my world, I was stealing away from what God intended to do through me. After I did eventually break up with this girl, within days the mission of disciple-making started to manifest in my life. I spent the next 3 years without any compulsion toward finding a relationship.

To be clear, I did have interest, and did pursue a few women (never to the point of actual dating, though). Women were also constantly swarming me too. I had a 9 who was obsessed with me, but wasn't a Christian. She promised to convert for me, which was tempting but I knew it wouldn't be real, so after a little struggle I gave a hard no. I had several 7.5s/8s who would orbit me. There was even one point where I was absolutely convinced that God wanted me to pursue a particular 9 who was showing clear IOIs (long story), but ultimately was able to step aside - because the guy I was discipling was into her and my mission was more important than finding a mate. That was one of the best decisions I've ever made.

As I continued to pursue that mission, and women kept flocking to me. There are two reasons for this:

- They saw that what I was doing had eternal value and they wanted to associate their lives with mine so they could get credit for helping in the mission God was fulfilling through me (for women, this is a good reason to pursue a guy; I don't say this negatively at all).
- Once I had killed the compulsion to be with someone, I became more attractive to women because everyone wanted to pin down the heart of the guy who wasn't needy or clingy and who everyone thought couldn't be pinned down. That's when God finally opened my eyes and gave me the go-ahead to be with the woman who is now my wife.

FR- Mid divorce

3 upvotes · 27 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

No offense taken. Being "the best client in the history of clients" is good for everyone. The attorney makes less money, but his job gets that much easier and more fun and can focus on spending the retainer on more important things rather than the mundane crap that most clients can do themselves. The client saves a ton of money in the process and ends up getting better representation. It's a win-win.

How can a client help?

- Get all of your financial documents in order. That means everything for the last 3 years for: bank statements, tax returns, W-2s, credit card statements, a copy of your credit report, social security earnings statement, and pretty much anything else you can think of. Get all of this for your spouse as well, if you can. Organize everything categorically (i.e. income docs first, then assets, then liabilities, etc.).
- Create a list of all of your assets and debts, complete with the last 4 digits of every account number and the exact date of each value you put in the spreadsheet, and set each referenced exhibit in a separate stack (keep the historical stuff on its own).
- Get an app that converts text message lists to pdf while retaining the "chat bubble" look (more likely a court will accept it as authentic). Download your entire text message history with any relevant person to your computer, highlight every important text message (don't overdo it), and send it to your attorney.
- Upload any relevant pictures, social media posts, call logs, e-mail history, or the like and send those to your attorney as well.
- Don't call everyday. Give weekly updates, and boil each important thing down to one or two sentences. If it's a major thing, give the 1-2 sentence summary and ask for a call to give more info. The more concise you can be in all communications, the more you will save and the more your attorney can help you.
- For the love of all ... don't try to do legal research. You're wasting your time. Non-attorneys just don't (and can't) get it, no matter how much they think they do. The most annoying thing (and time-consuming) is dealing with a client who thinks he knows the law better than I do.

In essence, pretend like you are an attorney. You'll be a crappy attorney, but if your attorney's job is predominantly to review your work and fix it, that's a heck of a lot better and cheaper than doing it all from scratch.

How to hold sexual energy without losing my mind?

3 upvotes · 26 September 2017 · /r/askTRP

You aren't wrong though - the ultimate answer for where to put that energy is directly into some hot young vag.

Totally not what I meant at all. But anything helpful I would have to contribute wouldn't apply to you. Best wishes, friend.

110 - Stay Plan is the Go Plan

3 upvotes · 26 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Lens is 400-level ;) Getting closer though. My time is freeing up a lot more now that work is in an "ebb" mode before the next "flow" in the cycle starts.

How to hold sexual energy without losing my mind?

3 upvotes · 26 September 2017 · /r/askTRP

The answer to how to deal with your urges depends on what you mean by "doing the Lord's work every time I go out."

110 - Stay Plan is the Go Plan

3 upvotes · 26 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

if they do, it's basically "Jesus loves you, pray this prayer ..."

So true. Or it's preaching at someone (whether from a sidewalk or even in a personal, one-on-one lecture session) rather than coming alongside them like Jesus did. Jesus did preach to the masses, but his strategy was always to live life alongside those he was trying to reach. Interestingly, when Jesus preaches, we don't often see much reaction from the crowd other than those who oppose him. When he comes alongside one person, we usually get some kind of follow-up of the person then going out and telling everyone about what Jesus did. Conclusion? Coming alongside someone is more effective than preaching to the masses.

they believe "If I just live a good Christian life, people will notice my example and ask me about my faith in Christ." Yeah...still waiting for that to happen to me.

I've always despised the saying: "Preach the Gospel always, and when necessary use words." Most people interpret it as an "if necessary" instead of "when." This totally pollutes the good in the saying into a cop-out people use to get away from actual ministry. I have had people ask me about my faith - but only because I initiate. Something the standard beta church-goer can't even do in his own home, much less with a stranger.

handing out Gospel tracts

Room for disagreement on this, but I very strongly discourage this practice. For every 1 person who responds positively, at least a dozen are even more put-off, making it that much harder for other Christians in their lives to make actual progress.

The most effective method of evangelism I've found is what I have dubbed the "expanding core" model. In essence, you've got to find a core of 3. That's either you + 2 other men, if it's a male core; or you and your wife + 2 other couples, if it's a couples core. Build a rock solid fellowship - a bond that makes other people envious. Then, invite a non-Christian guy/couple in as the 4th. Over time, as they (1) see the bond you have in Christ, and (2) see how your faith deeply impacts each of your own lives for the better, and (3) see how your faith is the glue that binds your relationship ... that will attract them. In this model, you don't have to preach the Gospel at the non-Christians ... you talk about it openly among the core in the presence of the non-Christian, but waiting a bit to do this until after the relationship is established.

The best part about this model is that it's natural. It's easy to talk to Christians about Jesus, the Gospel, the Bible, etc. - especially your best Christian friends. Because that's a fundamental part of your relationship, you're demonstrating both relational evangelism and proclamational evangelism simultaneously without coming off as preachy - just as people talking about something they enjoy.

Then, when the non-Christian does start following Jesus (sometimes this process only takes a couple months, sometimes it's a few years), the 4 of you split into 2 and 2 and start building on again. You can add a 5th before splitting, but I've found it's too hard to maintain schedules that way, so someone always ends up left out.

Also note that none of this depends on how much you know about the Bible, as long as one person in the group is competent. You might be the Christian guy who gets the conversation rolling by asking questions, or the guy who brings the concepts down to earth by telling a story about how the concepts apply to your own life. Who knows. It's more about the relational osmosis process than about a skillful presentation where all the pressure is on you. The pressure is, instead, on the spirit of the group, which is the Holy Spirit.

Thanks, this was just what I needed to hear today

Maybe I'll do the evangelism write-up next :) Glad I could help!

The real "Red Pill" that you need to swallow

3 upvotes · 26 September 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

Black pill ... that's even worse than the red pill :p

A month out from the wedding... Finds TRP... Do I call it off?

3 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

To be clear, the bible is totally RP. It's feminized pastors who are the problem. Don't blame God for what some of his people do. Check out r/RPChristians to chat about that more.

I know the redpill advice, want to hear yours.

3 upvotes · 15 September 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

Gotcha, the "e" threw me off. As recently noted by one of the mods in MRP, virtually none of the mods or flaired individuals has been divorced since "discovering RP." That said, note that my flair (which I didn't ask for) is akin to: "don't trust this guy, he's not really RP yet." It's their way of abating the fact that for a while I was making a lot of posts, but not all of them were widely accepted by the community.

That said, one of the reasons I started RPChristians is because I'm anti-divorce (despite my profession - long story there) and I got sick of reading all the comments on MRP: "She's crazy; divorce her" or the more recently disgusting posts on how to cheat on your wife and get away with it (see the one they just made as an announcement, for example).

I'm probably one of the few/only people who hovers here because it's a good balance for me. It helps me challenge what I read in RP stuff to make sure I'm not just blindly accepting things that aren't right - and I do actively reject things. The point of RPChristians is to accept and apply the reality of how God created men and women, much of which RP has accurately discovered, but to apply those truths in a way that fosters an appropriate love-respect dynamic within the marriage, as opposed to the more demeaning aspects of traditional RP advice.

My dad keeps shit testing me what to do?

3 upvotes · 15 September 2017 · /r/RedPillParenting

You can talk to him about stuff without mentioning "the red pill." I've seen lots of minds change on these topics.

Field Report: From verbal sparring to compliments

3 upvotes · 13 September 2017 · /r/RedPillWives

The truck to him was a symbol of masculine validation. He didn't want the truck; he just wanted to feel like a man. Although biblically it's not ideal, most men experience validation through their wives, but if a wife isn't validating then a guy will look to his stuff (house, cars, TV size, etc.).

Buying the truck would be a stupid decision in light of their circumstances (I'm taking her word for it, and context of how she represents his demeanor about the truck). He knew it was a bad decision, but he wanted that validation. She gave him that validation in a subtle, humorous way, which was what he needed to feel like it was okay to get the car he really wanted (the luxury one) rather than the one he felt like he should buy to compensate for his otherwise lack of rugged manliness.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepillled to answer)

3 upvotes · 11 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Props to that. The non-Christians over on askMRP (including a couple with the "MRP Approved" flair) affirmed this in a thread within the last couple days.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepilld to answer)

3 upvotes · 11 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Is this not a valid concern to notice/raise?

No, I think you're inverting the way the covenant was meant to be taken. Circumcision was the symbol of a pact between God and his people. To bear that symbol in a physical way presumed that in your heart you also had that connection to God that those without the symbol did not have. To allow women to be circumcised would be to undermine the unique relationship God has with husbands by giving wives direct access to God, circumventing their husband's authority.

It's like when Moses is at Sinai and the people say, "We're too scared to talk to him, you go talk to him for us." Moses was acting like the husband to Israel, the bride, just as God is husband to Moses, his bride. I also referenced the Exodus 4 passage, where God says, "I'll communicate with you directly, but not with Aaron - he's your responsibility." In the same way, circumcision of the flesh was a symbol of circumcision of the heart, which gave a man a direct connection to God through the covenant, and thus elevated his status above his wife from a purely cultural inequality to a spiritual one as well (note: inequality of role, not value; I will still maintain this distinction).

though I did learn a lot from the rest of your post, but it is only this paragraph onwards that really began to answer the question ... "male dehumanizing/female pedestalizing" concept ... do you not find my atheist friend's argument convincing as well?

The rest of my comment was meant to address (1) your other questions in this thread and, more importantly, (2) the allegations of your atheist friend. Circumcision wasn't about pain/dehumanization - it was a symbolic gesture whereby one should be honored to partake in it. It was a symbol of pride among the Israelites, even though they did not understand it until centuries/millenia later. Its function was tied to the very core of the Gospel and God's mission for the church. This is not "dehumanization" - it's whatever the opposite of that would be. So, no, I don't find it convincing in the slightest.

What would you say against his argument?

I've already said most of what I'd have to say. If I took his words directly, the notion that circumcising an 8 year old boy is somehow meant to make him think in adulthood that it's okay for him to view his life as disposable ... especially in light of the actual gender inequality dynamic present at that time, where women were the disposable ones ... it's just an absurd theory to make - and your atheist friend didn't even identify that as his theory, just a "popular" one. He's not sharing "another angle" - he's literally making up motivations that may never have existed.

If you want to call what I've written an "angle," so be it. But it's an angle that is cohesive with the entire Scriptural narrative and is supported by passage after passage, whereas his directly goes against Scripture without any historical or spiritual evidence to support his position. So, between someone who's speaking hypothetical theory out of his butt that suits his own interests and a position that is consistent throughout dozens of historical texts and several individual authors over thousands of years, I'm going to choose the later every time. The fact that modern betaized pastors are too weak to look into what the Bible really says about these things doesn't minimize the fact that: (1) the Bible says all this, and (2) God's people throughout time who have lived apart from the feminist imperative have reached similar conclusions.

how do you explain God suddenly going "Oh circumcision? Nahh never mind that loool" in the New Testament?

He doesn't. Per my original comment, circumcision was always meant to be a thing of the heart. This is preserved in the new testament. This view is most evident in Jeremiah 9:25-26, "The days are coming, declares the Lord, when I will punish all those who are circumcised merely in the flesh ... for all these nations are uncircumcised, and all the house of Israel are uncircumcised in heart." Paul isn't preaching new theology in his epistles - he's explaining what the legalistic Jews failed to understand from their own Scripture.

More to the point, Paul did still preach in Romans that there was still value in circumcision: "What advantage, then, is there in being a Jew, or what value is there in circumcision? Much in every way!" (3:1). What you're missing is that circumcision was a law and covenant with Israel. But most of Paul's books preach to the Gentiles. So, to Israelites, Paul is saying, "If you want to identify as one under the law, you'd better follow the law. If you're not under the law, then you're better off not adopting the law." So, Paul vehemently opposed any Jew who tried to force a non-Jew to be circumcised.

That would be like a Chinese person trying to argue in an American court that his robber should be sentenced to death because Chinese law would require that. If you're not in China, screw Chinese law. If you're not an Israelite, screw Israelite law. That's the attitude of the New Testament. Now, there's still value in understanding OT law because it was written by the same God who wrote the spiritual laws of the new testament, but we must always look at it from the perspective of what we can learn about our God from knowing what he did then to apply it now - not as rules that must still be followed today.

Do you agree that ... God's old covenant is therefore also directly with the male slaves ... but somehow the man's wife is not directly in a covenant with God if not through her husband?

I think I already answered this in another comment. Physical circumcision is an external symbol, thus is really only about clean v. unclean. Spiritual circumcision is the internalization of the covenant, and thus is a salvific issue. So, if you're asking about salvation, the answer is totally different. But if you're asking purely as a matter of physical circumcision, the answer is yes: the physical symbol was only with men. So, a male slave had a more direct external status as 'clean' in regard to his authority to approach God (think of the requirements to be in different layers of the temple) and others (requirements regarding interpersonal interactions with unclean people) than the slave owner's wife, whose 'cleanliness' was only derivative through her husband (i.e. she was deemed clean because of her husband's circumcision).

If her husband was not circumcised, he was unclean, but so was she, so it didn't really matter. But if a circumcised man were to sleep with a woman from outside of Israel (i.e. whose father was not clean/circumcised), she was unclean until he married her, at which point she was naturalized as an Israelite, allowing circumcision to apply to her by virtue of the marriage, and thus their relations were deemed clean.

What about the female slave then? Hypothetically, say one who has never been allowed to marry?

I think I answered this in another comment. I'll paste it here anyway, though:

Female slaves were still property just like any other women at the time - although they were hybrid property of their husbands and their husbands' masters. As such, they would have had their identity derived through whatever man happened to own them at the time, whether husband, father, or master. If their husband/father/master was circumcised, she was sanctified by virtue of being his property (again, not the same as 'saved'). This meant the relations between her and her husband were "clean" despite the fact that there was no covenant for female circumcision.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepillled to answer)

3 upvotes · 11 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

More to /u/Whitified - I'm simply shocked at the reverse nature of this conversation in the first place. My first reaction is to note that circumcision doesn't make a man "disposable," nor does it imply his subservience to women. If anything, in a biblical context it's a rite of passage that solidifies his position as higher than that of a woman because he has a more direct connection with God than she does, whereas her connection was found through whichever man she belonged to.

But more to the point, the Old Testament is 99.9% of the time accused of being misogynistic and anti-women, and yet somehow because of one single thing (that actually furthers this "anti-women" agenda), it's somehow become gynocentric. This is totally shocking to me.

Try to google anything about the old testament being "anti-men." Do the same for "anti-women." You'll find almost nothing on the first and droves of material on the second (coupled with a ton of blue pill pastors trying to explain away the apparent misogyny).

viewed through this lens

This is exactly what /u/Whitified is doing. The only possible way to read the OT in a gynocentric way is to go in specifically looking to find it. Any natural or objective reading will swing so far the other way that it's virtually impossible to miss. Not to justify every aspect of that; but the facts are the facts.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepillled to answer)

3 upvotes · 11 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

As I wrote in my longer reply, what you seem to be missing is that physical circumcision never actually saved anyone. It was an external representation of an internal change. But even more than that, it was a symbol of a "clean" person as opposed to someone who was "unclean." Moses understood this while writing Deuteronomy, and Jeremiah reaffirmed this: that salvation-based circumcision is ultimately of the heart, not of the flesh. By far, Paul was not the first one to reach this conclusion.

As /u/BluepillProfessor notes, God usually talks about a communal relationship with his people more than a personal one. Although I reject the model of "household salvation" the Bible is abundantly clear in favor of "household sanctification." So, if a man was circumcised physically, his whole family was adopted into the covenant as "sanctified" so that it was not an unclean relationship.

As for slaves, a male slave in those days was usually more akin to an indentured servant. He held an identity of his own, but was still beholden to his master for life and provision. This is a sort of hybrid relationship, but on a grander scale, and even outside the "indentured servant" type of slavery, look to Israeli families during their captivity in Egypt before Moses freed them. You'll note that they were both "slaves," and therefore "property" of Pharaoh. But at the same time, men had their own family units.

Female slaves were still property just like any other women at the time - although they were hybrid property of their husbands and their husbands' masters. As such, they would have had their identity derived through whatever man happened to own them at the time, whether husband, father, or master. If their husband/father/master was circumcised, she was sanctified by virtue of being his property (again, not the same as 'saved'). This meant the relations between her and her husband were "clean" despite the fact that there was no covenant for female circumcision.

Angry Sex - Lessons Learned

3 upvotes · 11 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I've always wanted to experiment with this, but it's incredibly rare for my wife to get truly angry, and far rarer for me. So, does it have to be both persons being angry or can it work if only the woman is angry and the guy is just forceful/dominant?

I have noticed separately, though, that women do generally like it when a guy find them so irresistible that they spontaneously engage in sex at inappropriate times. If my wife is wearing a tank top that shows some nice cleavage, sometimes she'll be in the middle of telling me a story about her day and I just go to town. Totally inappropriate timing, but those are some of the best times. I'd guess angry sex tops it all off because it's the most inappropriate time, meaning your passion has to be extremely high to overcome the natural aversion.

Picking the right attorney

3 upvotes · 10 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Good call. I do occasionally find a client I have to nudge along. I had one client who had $10k of income per year, but his wife earned $450,000. I advised him repeatedly that he was entitled to over $15,000/mo in spousal support from her. He was too beta and had such ONEitis for her (thinking she'd come back to him someday if he was nice in the divorce) that he ultimately settled at half of what he was entitled to. I wasn't trying to be a money-grubber there. He legitimately would have been better off financially if he paid me $10,000 to earn him an extra $8,000 every month for the rest of his life. But, alas, he wanted to settle, so I let him settle (after getting a release from him acknowledging that he was being an idiot).

Picking the right attorney

3 upvotes · 10 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Out of every area of law, family law has the highest rate of going to trial. So, there is that. Even then, though, a majority of cases do settle.

More to /u/BobbyPeru - depositions are a waste of time in 90% of divorce/custody cases. I usually advise my clients against them and only do it (1) if I know for a fact I can get something good out of it, (2) if I need information that I know the other side won't give away in interrogatories (i.e. repeated evasiveness), or (3) if my client insists (which is rare).

Picking the right attorney

3 upvotes · 9 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Unfortunately, this is a common story.

Picking the right attorney

3 upvotes · 8 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

That makes sense. I've had exactly 6 where I was appellant, and lost 2 flat out (hence the easy math). I was trial counsel in one of those 2. Of the other 4, I was trial counsel in 3 of them.

Two of them were dead easy wins though. In the first, the judge made an egregious math error, among other issues. The parties were fighting over the value of an item of property. Mom said it was worth 10,000, dad said it was worth 2,000. The judge reasoned that the most equitable solution would be to subtract the two numbers, thus deciding it was worth 8,000?!? I successfully argued that this method was idiotic because of mom thought 10 and dad thought 8, how could you say it's worth 2?

In the second case, the magistrate prohibited my client from presenting hearsay testimony of what a police officer said when the other side objected. When the other side was up (represented by a hometown hero, I was an out of townner), I made the same objection and it was overruled. I argued inconsistent application of the rules. She stupidly said on the record: "It's my courtroom. I can hear whatever I want or reject whatever I want. If you don't like it, go cry to the judge. Good luck if you think he'll ever reverse me." Indeed, he did not. But the appellate court did!

Picking the right attorney

3 upvotes · 8 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Yeah, that flat fee arrangement is something I've only done once. I'm 99% an hourly guy also.

As for appeals, good for you on those! I usually charge around $10k if I'm defending, $15k if I'm for the appellant, and another $3k if there will be oral arguments - but even that is all hourly, those are just the amounts that the hourly work ends up being. I've never lost a case defending an appeal, but am only about 2 for 3 when I'm trying to get a decision overturned ... but even that I think is a pretty good rate for divorce work.

50/50 v. OYS/Value

3 upvotes · 8 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I like what you're saying in concept, but I'm not sure how many couples it would work for in practice. Certainly an equal 50/50 mindset is out. But even the concept of "equity" seems troublesome. If she can ever argue, "It's not fair," you've got yourself a problem. So, following an equity model gives her authority over you because you have pre-agreed that the concept of fairness is a higher priority than either of you individually. Few people can agree on what "fair" is because we all value things differently.

The golden rule of any relationship is: The one who needs the other less has the power. Associated with this: Increased power = increased value = increased attraction. I'm not even talking about how that power is used. Just being a powerful man in your wife's eyes draws her attraction to you. Even guys who use their power to beat their wives find their wives incredibly attracted to them (although she may still want out for obvious reasons). Likewise, for beta guys where the wife is the one with all the power, they're pining over her with unfulfilled desire. Power is sexy.

When you try to create a system of equity, you're essentially deferring your power in the relationship to an intangible concept that transcends either of you individually: the marriage. Idolizing the marriage over the people within the marriage, in my experience, is not healthy. This is where women start to hamster out on loving the idea of "being married" more than actually loving the person they married. Men idolize the idea of "having sex" more than they care about the woman they're having sex with.

When that power is deferred and the marriage becomes a higher priority than either individual, the husband loses his wife's attraction with the loss of power. The wife loses her satisfaction when her husband inevitably fails to live up to the ideals of a "true equitable marriage." By feeding into her idolatry of the marriage and adopting it as your own, you're setting yourself up for failure at some point. Maybe your wife, specifically, has a naturally high libido or your other qualities overcome the loss of power that you have given to equity, but my guess is that most guys' sex lives would suffer significantly from deferring power to an intangible, unsustainable ideology.

Another potential pitfall of "equity" being the target is that it once again sets up "effort" as an objective standard that she can hold against you. This can work if you are both completely, 100% on the same page about everything in your marriage. But as soon as your standards and expectations deviate, the balance of each of your efforts shifts. 99% of the time, the wife has the higher standard of cleanliness in the home. So, 99% of the time she's going to do more work. She'll perceive her increased effort as an inequity in the marriage. This is a time where I see AWALT as undeniably true.

If she's doing work that she thinks you benefit from and you're not contributing to it, she'll whip out that objective idol (the marriage) and put you in your place. Or, maybe she doesn't for whatever reason and just ends up fostering resentment until she cheats on you with Chad.

For you, this seems to work for now because you apparently are 100% in agreement on meals, allocation of responsibilities, life direction, etc. That type of mutuality is overwhelmingly rare. You might be one in a million. In virtually every marriage, there will be significant disagreements and one person has to have the authority to resolve it.

I've said it here before, and I'll say again: It's not submission until you disagree. My wife and I naturally agree on about 80% of our day to day lives. That's not a huge %age, but it's acceptable. We don't need a weekly meeting to talk about these things because our natural lifestyle accounts for that 80% and we communicate openly with appreciation that neither of us is lazy. On the stuff where we disagree, I don't defer to some objective equitable concept of "the good of the marriage" that we both submit to - because that concept doesn't actually exist. She thinks her way is the more equitable "better for the marriage" way, just as I think mine is. At the end of the day, I'm responsible for my kingdom, so I make the call.

For a long time, I always made that call consistent with her wishes. This was idiotic. I was a puppet leader by choice. She told me what my decision should be. I submitted to her will by adopting that decision as my own. I, therefore, became responsible for her decisions. Bad situation. When things started to go wrong she would blame me: "I was just voicing what I wanted. You didn't have to listen to me. This was your call to make." Arguing, But I made the call you wanted me to make! was never satisfying to her. It was a show of weakness. She lost attraction and our sex life died almost entirely, even after we had recovered from whatever low point we were going through at the time.

Perhaps the most important angle of this is that my wife married me because I was a man on a mission - and still am. She had no purpose or direction in life. She saw that my mission was a higher-value purpose than anything she could come up with or accomplish on her own, and that no other single man she had met to that point had a comparable or more important mission.

When I deferred power to the marriage, that compromised my mission. The result is that she lost sight of the reason for why she married me in the first place. Although I continued to pursue the mission, she pursued the concept of the marriage. She fed into the marriage and I fed into my mission. The result is that she felt that she was the one bearing the burden of supporting the marriage so that I could accomplish my mission, and that she wasn't a part of the mission.

I had to tear down the concept of the marriage as an ideal in itself before we could re-focus on the mission. Once she re-adopted the mission the relational troubles began to resolve themselves. Now, I do take the mission as being a higher priority than her or myself. That's inherently a part of being a Christian, and I'm at peace with that. I'm not saying other guys have to be there. More to the point, though: I am infinitely more capable of fulfilling the mission than she is. So, equitable or not, I tell her what I need to do to advance the mission and what she has to do to enable that to happen and she readily complies. Instead of seeing her efforts as contributing to the marriage which, in her mind was an equitable arrangement, she sees it as contribution to our greater purpose in life. She is working within one context for the purpose of enabling me to work in another. And I actively open doors so she can have direct involvement in the mission as well, rather than being purely sideline support - that way she can taste the fruit of her own labor. All of this happens in the context of me taking care of my own business around the house - not because I have an obligation to be fair and equitable to all that she does, but because it's my house and I'm the one ultimately responsible for it, not her.

I'm not sure how much that clears up, but idolizing fairness or equity still seems to be a source of trouble for most guys. The "us against the world" mentality seems better, but I don't see that as being tied to equity or fairness between the two of you at all.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

3 upvotes · 8 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I get what you're saying, but it's the same stuff marriage counselors have been peddling for decades that simply doesn't work for most of society. I agree that emotional and mental intimacy are essential to a successful marriage, but in my experience, and that of virtually every Christian married man I've disciplined, the different confection points are mostly separate.

- A strong mental and emotional intimacy will not spontaneously generate physical attraction.
- A strong physical and emotional intimacy will not spontaneously generate respect for the other as an intellectual.
- A strong physical and intellectual intimacy will not spontaneously generate emotional passion.

For Christians, we add spiritual intimacy into the mix too, which is also entirely distinct. These things all have separate triggers. Most Christian men are exceedingly good at developing emotional and mental intimacy, but totally lack the ability to cultivate physical or spiritual intimacy. Their wives hang all over them and cuddle and act all lovey dovey and will profess their emotional fuzzies to other women in the church all the time. The pair bonding is there. But the physical drive is absent, even when they're otherwise in great physical shape.

50/50 v. OYS/Value

3 upvotes · 8 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I understood what you meant. I'm a divorce attorney. I get people to true 50/50 all the time. Of course, I see true divorce rape happening too. Either way, thanks for sharing your thoughts.

Q about Starfish

3 upvotes · 7 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Rule 1: Never turn down sex before it starts; only after, if it's bad.

Early on I made the mistake of prematurely turning down sex before it even started because I could tell it wouldn't be any good. This sent the wrong signal: Don't initiate. The signal I wanted to be sending was: Don't be lazy when we're having sex. You have to start sex to get her to realize that's her problem. Even if you can tell she's not into it before you start, you still have to start to show her you're not interested.

Rule 2: Don't get butthurt; don't explain yourself.

If you're butthurt, she may get the hint and realize she needs to step up her game. But you're also associating sex with you getting angry at her. That's a bad association to build. "Thanks for revving my engines. I gotta get stuff done now." But neither of us finished?!? "Just priming the pump for next time! Be ready."

Rule 3/Last Resort: Keep going, but don't finish.

If all else fails and she's still starfishing you and you're not into it, just roll over and ask her to get you off. Let her try for a while before she ultimately gives up. "Don't worry, babe. Maybe next time." Then smile and smack her butt as you walk away. Let her hamster do the work for you. Why couldn't I get him off? Am I not good enough for him anymore? When she sees that her "best moves" aren't cutting it for you, but that your frame is unphased, she might take that as a cue that she actually needs to try. I call this a last resort, though, because if applied long-term it will make her think: (1) that you're low libido and just aren't as into sex as you pretend, or (2) that you're unattractive because you can't finish what you started in the bedroom. Don't let it get to that point. One or two times only as a gentle nudge, then get back on the horse.

Or course, as others have said, before you go denying anything make sure you're actually as high value as you think you are. From our past conversations, you've mentioned that she's a pretty alpha girl herself. SMV is not a static scale we measure everyone against. It's fluid with each person's perception. If she's pretty alpha, she may not perceive her SMV as being lower than yours, even if the rest of the world would think so. You've got to shift her perception of this. (1) Actually improve your SMV. (2) Apply a few levels of dread.

Just realized my best friend is dating a sociopath. Is there any way I can possibly open his eyes or is he a lost cause?

3 upvotes · 5 September 2017 · /r/askTRP

You've described a beta guy, not a sociopath girl. He's flowering her with money, love, and attention for free. How is she a sociopath for accepting this? Any girl would - and they do. AWALT.

She's not his problem. He's his own problem. He has ONEitis. Don't confuse the issues and blame her for his beta failures. Sure, she has problems too, but I'm guessing not all that different than any other woman he could be dating.

Buy him a copy of NMMNG as a gift. That's the best you can do for him.

Can RPChristians use real dread?

3 upvotes · 5 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Rest assured, it is not lost on me who is the source of my strength.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

3 upvotes · 4 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

It's not necessarily wrong, I'm just not a fan. My wife used to do that a lot (still does on rare occasions) and it usually means, "I'm not at all into it right now, but I'll put up with it if you need me to." I loathe that attitude and would rather have no sex at all ... but RP has also taught me not to turn down an initiation, otherwise she'll just stop initiating. Instead, I help her adjust the way she initiates and get herself in the mood long before she ever asks.

[Field Report] Sickened by how little marriage counts and how much physique counts

3 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/TheRedPill

She wasn't a "practicing Catholic." She's a "self-identified Catholic." This is, unfortunately, true of most self-professed religious people. Based on a study of over 400 regular church attenders, 18.65% of regular churchgoers would meet a basic biblical standard of "saved." Most people in church think they're saved just because they go to church and participate, maybe even help as a volunteer every now and then, but they don't have a real relationship with Jesus.

My guess is she's one of those people who participates and volunteers to make herself feel good and give some false reaffirmation, but she hasn't legit been transformed by God yet. If you had found one of the 18.65%, my guess is that your experience would likely have been different (depending on how mature in her faith such a girl would be) - not that the woman herself would be any different (AWALT), but that (at least from my view, take it or leave it) God tends to step in and protect those who pursue him from succumbing to temptation like this. She'd want to, but she would be convicted and stop herself.

Fiance is away for 3 years, need advice

3 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

I've discussed ... breaking up, but she won't take the bait.

All I can do is laugh at this. How much power have you given her? You think she has oneitis for you, but it's obvious you have it for her really, really bad.

You're talking about breaking up not because you actually want to, but as a manipulative tool to get her to have sex with you. You're giving her an ultimatum and that never works. See this list of other crap that doesn't work that you've probably tried. Ultimatums aren't attractive. They don't increase her sex drive for you. They can manipulate behavior, but not negotiate attraction - and that behavior, if unaccompanied by genuine desire, will revert to its natural state. Instead of negotiating for her to desire you right now, become more desirable later. But why play the game on hard mode if you're not actually married? That's what I can't get past. Easy mode is an option to you - jump into easy mode.

I can't figure out how she can be asexual, and this causes a lot of insecurity with me

You didn't read what /u/justpickanyusername said - she's not "asexual." She's "asexual for you." That's a huge difference. If you want her to be sexual for you, you have to become the guy she will be sexual for. 99.9% - that guy exists. Women with true asexuality are even harder to find than the unicorns we all wish we'd discover.

Show outcome indifference, or take charge?

3 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

I'll just leave this here ... <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-4EDhdAHrOg>

Dread-game may be the most important aspect of a Redpill LTR or marriage.

3 upvotes · 29 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I call this the comparison game. It's something that can truly be used to a man's advantage.

Mitch's Red Pill

3 upvotes · 29 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Nah, I've been in bed and didn't see any of this until just now. And I don't think my "cronies" (if I have any) follow me around here. Any username mentions I get are just people looking for me to throw out some free legal advice. Either way, I tend not to downvote things I agree with.

Your "alternate universe" example is something I accepted long before ever finding the red pill. That's just common sense. That's why in my alpha days as a solo musician/hobbyist I would write songs about my girlfriend (now wife) and she'd swoon, but after I developed all the beta traits post-marriage, writing songs for her just became cheesy and unwelcome - "Why did you waste your time recording that when you could have been doing ____?"

cling to the disney dream of a happily ever after style marriage (or at the very least you are willing to compromise on your own happiness for the "sake of the marriage")

I just addressed this in another comment, so I won't go too much into it here other than to ask: where have I expressed this mentality?

I didn't mention it in my other comment, but it's probably also worth noting that for all my life I've rejected the concept of "soul mates" and have for years preached that "happily ever after" doesn't exist (which took a long time to get my own wife to come to grips with).

The guy who mentors me put it best in this comment, a couple years ago. Like Merlin, God essentially opens the door and says, "With a few exceptions, you could really be with anyone you want - just name her and I'll tell you if she's one of those exceptions." Merlin says Guinevere is one of those exceptions, but Arthur says, "Screw you Merlin, I'm marrying her anyway," and it's certainly not a happily ever after for him when Guinevere cheats on him with Launcelot, starting a chain of events that leads to Arthur's final downfall.

Arthur's bigger problem is that he ended up looking for a wife not because he wanted one in the first place, but because his barons and nobles pressured him into it. That's the big flop most people make - getting married because society tells you it's the right thing to do. In Matthew 19 and 1 Cor. 7, we see both Jesus and Paul saying that we're better off not getting married - and this is how I counsel men today. "Cool your jets and think about whether or not this is what you really want to do - because marriage isn't the sunshine and rainbows the world tells you it will be." That's the feminist agenda - and even when it reveals the harsh truths about marriage, it's usually in a sitcom that makes people think, "See how funny it is to have a crappy marriage? You can laugh it off too" - and that's how they placate guys into sticking it out. That's why I can never watch an episode of Everybody Loves Raymond again :/

FR Just filled for divorce

3 upvotes · 26 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

Custody and more parenting time automatically means more child support, right?

Not in the slightest. At least not in my state. Child support is calculated based on a rote formula. If a guy gets more than "local rule" parenting time, then child support can go down, but giving the mother additional parenting time does not increase his child support obligation - it's only a one-way deviation. Technically the law allows it to work two-ways but there is absolutely no precedent in any jurisdiction I've ever researched in my state for an increase.

Many cynics believe women want custody and maximum parenting time precisely because that maximizes the child support payments to them

They're not cynics, this is real. I just finished representing a woman on this exact issue. Granted, the guy more than deserved it (constant acts of physical violence enacted against the mother and the child both; lying about his income; concealing assets; back-alley stock transactions with a privately owned corporations; etc.).

which they can spend however they want, not necessarily on children

So, this accusation always strikes me as potentially truthful, but most often ignorant. In my state, the child support numbers aren't based on future out-of-pocket expenditures alone. It includes things like rent to afford a place big enough for the kids; additional utilities the kids use; additional groceries to keep them fed; etc. In other words, basic living expenses that the mother would have to pay anyway are higher because she has the kids than what she would require if she were alone. The court builds these into the calculations. So, if you've got a child support obligation of $750/mo and the mother has to pay an extra $250/mo to have a 2-bedroom apartment instead of a 1-bedroom (or comparable situation for a house), then 1/3 of your child support obligation is built into this price differential. Tack in an additional, say, $100 for increased utility consumption and $300 for food, that leaves her with $100 left for clothes, extracurricular activities, school expenses, shoes, entertainment, etc. That's obviously not enough - and the courts expect mom to pay the rest out of her own income. Obviously I'm using round/estimated numbers, but that's how it works. Most guys mistakenly think that child support is just about the out-of-pocket stuff that you decide to buy and they forget about the cost differential for all the base necessities of just living.

How could a man "leverage" the female desire for parenting time such that she'd agree to "she gets more parenting time but in exchange he pays her less money"?

"I could fight for shared parenting with 50/50 time, but if you waive child support I'll let you have custody, I just want my time" and if she doesn't bite, "What if I let you have an extra overnight per week, as long as I get the after-school time that night?" Women eat this up. You offer that, she'll usually give you anything else you want financially - including a larger chunk of the retirement. The maternal instinct to feel in control of the children is insanely powerful. The guy can go off and control things in the world all he wants. A wounded woman doesn't experience that control the same way, so her children are her only source of power and stability in life - she'll give anything to keep that security.

About 80% of men I go against don't actually care about custody when they realize that custody has nothing to do with time with the children. They didn't care who picks the pediatrician or the dentist when they were married, and they don't care much more after the marriage is over. Really, those are the only big decisions custody affects. In some occasions it can affect extracurricular activities too, but those usually get spelled out as being joint decisions even in sole custody plans. "School decisions" gets talked about a lot, but in reality there aren't many to be made - you go to school in the district where you live and until high school you don't have much choice on classes, and even then the kids themselves are usually the ones who pick those with a guidance counselor, not the parents.

So, a guy has to ask himself at some point: is it worth $750/mo to be able to choose which pediatrician and dentist your child sees? She could, of course, pick an insanely expensive one and you'll always get stuck with 1/2 the med bills (sometimes more, but rarely) - but this hurts her wallet too, and a cheap doctor v. expensive one won't usually be a cost differential of $750/mo - so you're still saving.

RPW, please don't have this mindset when you get older

3 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Well said.

The alternatives

3 upvotes · 20 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I wrote more about plate theory here, so feel free to reference that.

The general concept is that plate theory exists almost exclusively to foster an abundance mentality. Once you have the abundance mentality, as /u/chinchilla_the_Hun says, "you won't have to" spin plates anymore - or never will have to at all, even in the first place. This is the exact reason why I wrote the 204 post on abundance - to give an alternate route to developing an abundance mentality that doesn't require spinning plates.

That said, I have come to accept that "plate-spinning" in its pure form is not actually problematic. Spinning a plate doesn't mean you're having sex with someone. It merely means you're fostering interest. The key is in how much interest you're generating. Never "awaken love before it so desires" (per Song of Solomon). If she's merely giving IOIs, that's fine. You can get that even without trying. But if you're leading her on to a point where she's become emotionally invested in her relationship with you, you've gone too far.

Ok ASKMRP, riddle me THIS!!!

3 upvotes · 18 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

This is a good and fair reply. Thanks for typing this out.

Plate theory

3 upvotes · 17 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

Plate theory is not about who you're having sex with; it's about who you could have sex with if you wanted to. It exists to give you an abundance mentality if you don't already have one. If you already have an abundance mentality and can maintain it in full confidence with only your LTR, you don't need plates.

So, maybe there's a secretary at work who's never noticed you. You start improving your performance, showing off your alpha, wearing better fitting suits to work, and now she's showing IOIs. For me, it stops there. I know that if I wanted to I could add game and she'd be on me - but I don't need that temptation to cheat.

Other guys would add gaming her, maybe go out to coffee or lunch a few times or something. They do that because they need to prove to themselves that the IOIs were real and not them fantasizing. For me, I don't need that validation. So, I don't take this step and avoid the temptation to cheat. Some guys would go all the way and actually cheat - that's their choice.

I do the same thing at the gym. I chat with the girls there in a non-creepy way. It starts with, [Expected intro] "Hey, mind if I grab that weight over there?" --> [Transition with context] "It gets crowded in here, doesn't it?" -> [Conversation start] "I guess it's nice when it's mostly people you see regularly; get to know who you're working out with. You meet many other people here?" Of course she hasn't. Most of the guys at the gym are alpha-wannabes who wouldn't dare approach her. [Note: between each phase, she gives a response, but it doesn't matter what the response is.] After this short process, I walk away to work out in a different area of the gym without actually starting a conversation. About 40% of the time she'll migrate over 5 minutes later and initiate a conversation with me. I'll be friendly, but give no further IOIs. Why? Because I don't want to be tempted to cheat on my wife. I just do nominal stuff like that to keep reminding myself that if my wife did cheat or leave me, I'd be fine.

To that end, some people could say I'm plating - I put a plate up on the pole and give it one good spin, then walk away and never look back. But plate theory is more about keeping those plates spinning, not just seeing if you could get it to balance in the first place. That's where I draw the line in my own personal life. If you need to keep 3 plates other than your wife spinning to have your abundance mentality, some guys need that. If you can keep your abundance mentality just by knowing you could plate if you wanted to (where I'm at), then test the waters and stop. If you can keep an abundance mentality without ever seeing an IOI outside your marriage, then do that. As /u/GargantuaBlarg29 said, if it helps, do it; if not, don't.

Redpill Caught on Tape, one of the best example of Redpill Principles from a HBO Documentary

3 upvotes · 17 August 2017 · /r/TheRedPill

I'm pretty sure anyone who takes a camera into a bar could create a documentary of RP principles.

On Initiating Social shit vs. being invited, how to expand and what to expect

3 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/askTRP

Because it's easier to talk about theory than practice. Most people really don't know the answers. The ones who are good at social status are naturals and their tips only help if you have certain features that give context. Others are garbage and only talk about what they think might work.

I, personally, am one who was a social-awkward who learned to be a social dominant. I've done a lot of writing about this, including a fiction book simulating most of the key steps that I went through in this phase in the main character.

That said, it's late and I'm too tired to do a full write-up on this sub. I'll probably save that for later and post it in MRP/RPC another time.

Question about fogging

3 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

Well, if you actually did cheat on her, obviously don't use that line! I was giving you the benefit of the doubt there :p

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

3 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Well, I refuse to play the traditional strategies (cook the books, embezzel funds, conceal assets in hidden accounts, etc.), but they are all very effective if the other attorney is not qualified at forensic accounting (which is fairly rare) and is too dumb to know when he needs to hire a forensic accountant.

Beyond illegal means that other attorneys recommend, the best thing you can do is find someone you really trust, tell him that you're legit not going to be able to focus on the business as hard for the next couple of years due to marriage stuff, but that you'd like to go at it full-force once the problems subside. During this time, give him a stronger interest in the company so that your interest diminishes. Get divorced during this time. When it's over, tell him you're ready to resume your prior level of commitment. If you've picked someone trustworthy, this pans out. I've seen this happen about 3 times ... but I can't necessarily advise it because as soon as I do someone's going to get screwed by picking someone not-trustworthy and I'll get blamed for it.

The real winner strategy is to bury the gains in offsetting debt. A good accountant will see through some of this, but 9 times out of 10 it's a winner. I had a case once where a guy co-owned an excavating business. Every time the business started to turn a profit, rather than taking a draw, he'd buy a new piece of heavy machinery with a cost that exceeded the rote profit so there was a loan at the end. Because these assets don't have an immediate resale value upon purchase (same concept as buying a used car and it declining in value significantly as soon as you drive it off the lot), you're essentially growing your business long-term while generating losses in the short-term. So, here's what the transaction looked like:

- Bought a brand new heavy-duty vehicle for $70,000.
- Shortly after purchase and use it has an immediate resale value of $40,000 (could get more, but courts will always look at the immediate liquidation value).
- Put $10,000 down on it.
- $60,000 still on the loan.

Here's the effect:

- By putting $10k down, he has legitimately reduced his income by $10k for that year in exchange for growing his business.
- However, from an accounting standpoint the business has also taken on more debt than it has assets, so there shows a loss of $20,000 on the books, diminishing the appraised value of the company.

So, when wife divorces him, just from that one piece of equipment alone his income just went down by $10k and the amount he has to pay her to buy out her interest in the business has gone down by $20k. And at the end of the day, his business is actually growing as a result of taking these losses, so as soon as the divorce is over he has more capacity to earn money than he did in the first place - and because it's self-employment the court has no ability to impute a prospective earning capacity to him.

Multiply this by multiple machines and larger equipment or other business assets (ex. buying real estate like this and not just machinery) and these phantom losses can be astronomical and seriously reduce his exposure for paying her half of the business or spousal support on what he's actually able to bring home. And because it all falls within legitimate business purposes, nobody can fault him for what he's doing.

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

3 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I still think the game is rigged against men

I'm not saying it isn't - it's just nowhere near as bad as I read some people make it out to be. For every story where the cops escort the guy out, I see 7 or 8 more where their response is, "You have no evidence, go get a court order if you want us to do anything about it."

Even when the woman works it is generally a part time or low skilled job, while the guy brings home the majority of the income.

True ... but whose fault is it for marrying her? If the guy is worth his salt, he should have options and wouldn't have to marry someone who can't contribute equally. Granted, most guys aren't worth their salt right away and they grow into their SMV long after the wedding day. So, all they can do is mitigate their losses for making bad decisions when they were chumps.

Glad to hear people are speaking out though!

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

3 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Don't assume it's one extreme or the other. Middle ground actually exists. The MRAs aren't actually in the trenches most of the time - they're outside observers hearing the horror stories of people who come to them with the worst of the worst. Nobody is going to these guys saying, "My divorce is going amicably - please help!" When all you get is the horror stories, it makes sense you'd assume the divorce boogeyman is a lot scarier than it is. And, again, that's really just giving the feminist agenda the fear-control over men that they want. Everyone needs to stop being so afraid of it and giving up because "they're out to get me" and start prepping like they can actually do something about it - because they can.

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

3 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Best way to preempt the issue: call the cops on yourself. Tell them, "My wife is crazy. I'm about to file for divorce. She's likely to falsely accuse me of stuff. Can you put something on record affirming that I have warned you about this?"

I had a client do that and it worked out spectacularly well. The psychologist in the case said that was the single smartest thing he did in the entire case. When the false allegations came, she was treated with great skepticism and lost major credibility when her other "evidence" didn't pan out. Of course, it helped that the wife was a flaming narcissist and our client tested clean as a whistle.

As for in the moment, when you know tension is high, have your phone audio record every conversation workout her knowing.

After the fact, have friends and witnesses confront her. I had one case where the wife alleged spousal rape. 5 other people confronted her about it and she was dumb enough to tell them all: "It didn't really happen. My attorney made me do that." Instant win.

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

3 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Re-read the post as well as my other comments here - I have addressed that issue ad nauseam.

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

3 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

here in Ontario assets are always split 50/50

Well, you're talking laws of a different country entirely now. But more to my point: assets are always 50/50 no matter where you go in the US too. I was referencing spousal support. The longer you wait, the longer you'll have to pay, and sometimes the more you'll have to pay.

every day that goes by is a day I don't pay child support or alimony

You actually are paying these things by virtue of having her and your children live with you. You're just in more control over where that money goes. But you're still paying for them.

Also, every day that goes by, not only are you paying for all of their costs in-full (as opposed to the partial payment that SS/CS would be), you're increasing your duration for SS/CS - so you're paying more to keep her around.

There is ZERO validity to your statement that I'll be worse off in the future

My statement is: "If she decides to wait another 5-10 years then screw with some other guy and divorce you." If you remain married forever, then you're in a much better spot, assuming you're happy in the marriage. But the longer she postpones the divorce, the longer you're going to pay spousal support, while financing her lifestyle during the time you're still married too. You're fooling yourself if you don't see how this math works.

In the future I won't have child support payments.

True, but (at least in my state), if it's a spousal support case, that doesn't matter anyway. The lack of child support means you have more funds available for spousal support. My state treats the income split as based off of a combined SS/CS calculation, so if one goes down the other goes up. So, you've got to nip it while the SS duration is shorter than the CS duration if you want to make progress. Waiting a decade (to use a random duration) for your kids to turn 18 is increasing the duration of your ultimate spousal support award, while keeping the amount static, assuming static income levels.

More likely, you'll be getting raises during that time, so you'll actually have a higher combined support award if you wait than if you went for it now with a present income level. If your income actually tanks, the courts are more amenable to lowering support than increasing it.

IF I was ordered to pay spousal support it wouldn't be much since that is one component that they do take the reason for divorce into account.

That must be unique to Canada. That's not how it is in the US. I can only speak to my US state's laws.

if she was screwing some other guy and we split she wouldn't see a cent from me in support payments.

Good for Canada. It's not that way in the US.

I have a retirement account that is in MY name and I am keeping as a parachute.

Divorce courts here don't care whose name is on the account. If it was acquired during the marriage, it's marital, not yours. So, the longer you stay together, the longer this accumulates, the more you have to give her (if you were here, that is).

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

3 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

A wise man once said "Expect the best, but be prepared for the worst."

That was me ... for about the past 20 years ;)

You're right that we'd be idiots to assume it couldn't possibly happen to us. But at the same time, walking on eggshells in constant fear of divorce is only going to exacerbate the problem and give the feminist agenda more power in this arena. As Rollo pointed out in his Divorce Inc. post, the change won't come from the top down. Law makers and judges won't fix the problem. It has to come from the bottom up when men stop fearing the feminists.

My post was predominantly about how to set yourself up to avoid that "worst case" scenario. What you're suggesting is that you can't stop a crazy girl, so just accept the fact that it's out of your control ...? That's not helpful.

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

3 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

What you are describing is a myth. It does happen, but nowhere near as commonly as people like to think. That is the feminist agenda trying to keep you afraid, when they don't have as much power in the courts as they think they do. There are certainly some judges to be afraid of, especially in smaller county's, but on the whole most judges won't rule without evidence.

The short term injunction from entering your home or being with your kids is a real threat. That is something that can happen on her word alone. However, the long term implications of it are almost non existent if it is her word alone. This is clearly reversible error if she does not have any documentation or exhibits to backup her claim. I have appealed these cases many times and the Court of Appeals always rejects the case if there is not a sufficient preponderance of the evidence to show that it is more likely that her word is true than yours. That standard always requires some proof beyond her word alone, unless you have negatives working against your credibility, like a prior history of convictions for things like domestic-violence or drug-abuse, etc.

It is true that if you try to go alone, you will very often wind-up far worse then if you had an attorney. But, that's just common-sense. If you can't afford an attorney, I often recommend having clients hire me as a consultant rather than representing them in court. Then, they get the benefit of my legal knowledge, but don't have to pay me thousands of dollars for every court hearing, trial prep, negotiations, etc. This keeps the costs highly mitigated, while still giving them the advantage of knowing how to argue their own case.

Why your wife should work at a real job

3 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Since /u/JDRoedell summoned me, I'll respond to this.

Most states refuse to apply a straight income-computation formula for spousal support (although almost every state does for child support). There are tax-effecting programs to address the tax implications of an award of support, but very few judges follow it by the letter, as the tax implications are only one of about 14 total factors. I've actually had about 4-5 judges tell me point blank: "I do not run any numerical calculations. I go with my gut and in X years on the bench I've been appealed Y times and have never once been overturned."

To that end, the "sacrificed her career" argument is actually an extremely powerful one. But it also relies on affirmative evidence that the higher-earner (even if that's a girl) asked the lower-earner to step out of a career path against the lower-earner's desire. If the lower-earner voluntarily chose to take the role, or it was done by mutual agreement, the impact of the argument is mitigated - especially when the lower-earner is the one begging not to have to work. That's not a sacrifice, and the higher-earner invariably always argues (as I've done successfully many times) that he encouraged her repeatedly to work and advance her career and the lower-earner refused. I recently had a case where a woman was earning $98,000 as an engineer with an international automobile manufacturing company. Just before filing for divorce she was fired. She had 2 other job offers after that but decided she wanted to stay home with the kid instead. Dad (my client) agreed to that for 3 months, but no longer. After that, she still didn't get a job, stole the kid, and ran off to another state. Dad filed for divorce, the court ordered her to seek work. She got a job making doughnuts at a local restaurant for $9.50/hr and argued that was her income capacity. The magistrate wasn't buying it and agreed that because Dad encouraged her to get a job repeatedly and she refused, her failure to earn at her capacity was on her own head. Dad got custody, mom had to pay him child support based on an imputed $98,000 income :D Big win for my client, who actually earned about the same amount.

As far as future earning potential, yes, this is a serious consideration. It is most often brought up when you have an indefinite support term (i.e. married 25+ years), but can apply much sooner than that if the circumstances allow for it. But if a couple has only been married for 10 years, that's not enough time for a court to believe that one's income has been impacted with great significance in most cases.

It is probably worth noting that I did have a case where my client (wife) went through med-school, internship, and completed residency, passed all of her boards, etc. and was a fully licensed doctor - and then quit before actually practicing. That's a butt-ton of education and experience, but the parties agreed she would be a housewife. Fast-forward 18 years (now a 27-year marriage) and the court considered her education and experience so outdated that even though she could potentially re-license herself and earn triple what the husband was making, that is not the lifestyle that he provided to her for the majority of the marriage, so the court only applied her present income-earning capacity of approximately $30,000. Another huge win for my client :)

Although my firm specializes in custody cases involving psychological issues, I'm a numbers-geek. So, I get all the cases involving support calculations and even crafted a tax-effect program for use in my state that a forensic accountant in one of my cases determined to be far more accurate and user-friendly than the prevailing support calculation software used by virtually every court in the state. Unfortunately, my software programmer buddy backed out and the program got too outdated to use anymore and I don't have the time to market the product, so the cost to re-develop it would outweigh the potential profits.

Got married prior to discovering TRP. Now having sadness over the feeling of "not having had sex with enough women."

3 upvotes · 10 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Now you have found RP knowledge and understand women. Holy crap! I could have slayed it as a kid. Gosh dang it all!

This was my gut reaction after finishing NMMNG - thinking about all that could have been. Although I'd been there before in different ways, at that particular point, that phase lasted for about 24 hours.

My practical answer is that one wet hole is almost exactly the same as the next.

Without experience, I've always assumed this. Or, more directly - an orgasm is an orgasm is an orgasm. There might be some that are better than others - but that's usually a product of my mentality or positioning at the time, which can be replicated with anyone who I find attractive. There will always be something inside me (the Bible calls it my sinful nature) that says, "But that hotter girl - she would actually be better," then logic kicks in and tells me: one wet hole is almost exactly the same as the next."

Command the tempting spirits to "get behind you" in the name of Jesus Christ. It works.

THIS! A million times, this! ... such an underappreciated aspect of applying our faith.

Need help pulling my life together after rape charge

3 upvotes · 10 August 2017 · /r/askTRP

By keeping it within marriage.

Always DEERing

3 upvotes · 10 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

You can't go verbally toe to toe with a woman ... She's probably adapted her kung fu quicker than you.

Bear with me to prove a point ... I'm actually better at arguing than most women. As an attorney, that's my job. The best strategy is what I call mental aikido, which i wrote in brief about here and here. It's basically a modified A&A by agreeing with a ridiculous premise and suggesting one carry it out to its logical conclusion - a conclusion that the person insisting on the ridiculous premise wouldn't like. With this tactic in my arsenal (among others), my wife readily acknowledges that she can't beat me in an argument - so, if I choose to DEER, she knows I can "win" every time. If I choose to "mental aikido" her, I win. If I choose to blah blah blah, I win - and she will even acknowledge that what I'm suggesting is objectively better than what she's saying.

Here's the thing, though: "winning" is not actually winning. All I've done is ticked her off or made her feel like an idiot - neither of which makes her want to have sex with me. No matter how gentle you are with the delivery, winning an argument by beating her down with reality isn't going to make her cup overflow into sexy time ... it's just going to make her feel beaten and down. Rather than engaging, she withdraws.

Also, my wife just stopped playing the game after a while. When she realized she could never win, she changed the rules: "I know it's not smart or logical and that you think I'm being dumb ... and I know that what I'm saying actually is dumb - but this is what I want anyway. I wish I could want the smart thing, but I can't - this is what I want and nothing you say is going to change that." Instant loss - and shame on me for playing the game until she got there.

As /u/FF0000_captain said, if you feel compelled to have the final word in an argument, you've already lost the argument. This is true in virtually every arena - whether marriage, arguing to a judge in court, arguing with friends, or arguing on the internet. Ironically, the reason we do it is because we think the last word means we win. That's an idiotic notion.

Tag: /u/leorycrankins

Always DEERing

3 upvotes · 10 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

I go there occasionally too - not to learn anything, but to practice spotting issues and processing solutions through an RP framework.

My wife doesn't test me very often, so I don't get a lot of practice on my own and this actually makes it harder to develop her respect. So, given how rare tests are for me, I want to make sure that when one does come I'm ready for it. So, I see what's going on in other people's marriages to figure out where they went wrong and how to respond to different situations - and this keeps me on my toes for when the real thing comes my way. It's a pattern that has worked quite well for me so far, and I've had at least 3 or 4 times in the last month where something I read on r/deadbedrooms happened to me and I was able to execute exactly as I suggested to an OP on that sub - because I had already prepared for the situation in advance by having read a thread there and replied to it.

In essence, if AWALT, then r/deadbedrooms is the place to go to find out what things I can expect my wife to do to get out of sex or to respond to sexual advances, etc. It's like going to the driving range before actually hitting the holes.

My husband is now TRP

3 upvotes · 9 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

I'm not sure I'm good with this.

I am sure for you: You're not good with this.

I don't want to take on the extra work. I'm not ready for a kid.

The problem is that he's reading about RP without being RP. He's going Rambo, he's telling you about RP (which is like Rule #1 - no talking about fight club), he's making irrational demands, he's not owning his stuff. He wants all the benefits of RP praxeology without actually being RP. Tell him to make a field report on r/marriedredpill or to ask if he's making the right moves on r/askMRP and he's going to get his butt ripped by people like [/u/\[deleted\]](#) (yeah, you've helped me more than I like to let on) telling him that actually being RP is not the same as demanding people to treat you like you're RP. You don't get the submission until you're a guy worth submitting to.

Idk is this what TRP is about?

No.

Is this a phase?

Yes, it's called going Rambo. It's when a guy discovers RP for the first time and tries to implement everything all at once before he's actually internalized things and improved himself. The phase will last until someone knocks some sense into him or until he actually becomes the kind of man where you can actually respect these requests (whether or not you agree).

When his SMV is higher than yours, that's when he's earned the right to start calling the shots - and you'll actually agree with him. From the sound of it, you're bringing a heck ton of value to the table. He's not bringing much. He needs you more than you need him. This means you have the power. Until he gets his act together enough that you need him more, his demands are laughable. But this is going to take a lot of effort and work and more time than he's willing to commit. So, what does he do? He takes the cheater-method: he bluffs it in the hope that you'll believe him. Sure, "fake it til you make it" has a place, but not when your spouse knows you're faking. Then you just look like an idiot.

Can I talk him out of this?

No, probably not. You can't control him - you can only control you. If he's reading RP subs without posting for feedback, any resistance you put up is probably going to be interpreted by him as a fitness test, making him want to try even harder until he "tames" you or pushes you away so far that you just leave him - at which point he'll blame you and call you feminist trash or something because you're a woman who doesn't need him.

If he does ask for feedback and start posting stuff, assuming you're giving an accurate representation of the situation (and I never take this assumption lightly), he's going to get his butt handed to him and will probably be told to go into monk mode for a few months until he actually learns what the heck he's doing before ruining his marriage.

Since he's already open with you about it, probably the best thing you can do to get him in line is to learn RP yourself. He has glorified RP in his mind - he won't listen to you, but he will listen to "RP." So, learn it better than he knows it. If he's falling out of line with his own commitment to RP, show him some sidebar material or posts that explain where he went wrong. Do this enough and he'll realize real fast why we all refrain: "Don't talk about fight club - especially not with your SO/spouse!"

That said, so you don't come off as a shrew, you're probably better off just suggesting he post on r/marriedredpill or r/askmrp to get answers from people who he'll actually listen to. Say things like, "If AWALT, then I'm like that too - so go ask your RP buddies how to deal with me and see what they say." But when you say it, be dead serious - not snippy or sarcastic or anything like that. The best time to approach this kind of stuff is actually out of the blue, not in response to anything he says or does. If it's reactionary, he'll presume an attitude in you. If it's out of the blue and part of a serious conversation he might actually take it seriously.

Disclosing RP/RPW knowledge to your SO

3 upvotes · 9 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

I agree with /u/RedDetergent and /u/i_have_a_semicolon that it's usually preferred not to introduce your SO/spouse to RP stuff. That said, if you do decide to get him on board, r/RPChristians might be a better place for him to learn about these things without being jaded. We reject things like spinning plates, the "sex is the only thing worthwhile in life" attitude, nexting/divorcing someone as soon as they're not meeting expectations, and lots of other non-biblical attitudes that understanding RP praxeology often creates in places like TRP/MRP.

As has been said here before, RP praxeology itself is descriptive, not prescriptive. The conversations that happen on r/theredpill and most of its offshoot subs are people having prescriptive conversations about how to utilize their understanding of descriptive red pill praxeology to get what they want. So, you don't go to r/theredpill to learn about red pill praxeology - you go there to learn how to abuse red pill praxeology for your own advantage. If you want to learn about red pill praxeology, you go to outside sources like several of the linked blogs, books, etc. on the sidebar.

r/RPChristians is more about biblical world-view descriptions and prescriptions while maintaining RP terminology as a tool (as opposed to the blueprint, which is the Bible).

Custody theories that could ruin you ... and the merits of shared parental rights

3 upvotes · 3 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

She's mainly trying to limit my overnights because she wants highest support available to move into the best apartments in town.

In my state, support does not increase based on additional parenting time (it theoretically can, but I've never seen it happen), it only goes down when a father has more time. That is, there's a guideline calculation, which is the baseline. If a father gets equal parenting time, a deviation may apply, decreasing the support amount by up to half (other deviation factors may apply as well).

So, yes, often mothers will try to get additional overnights with the kids to try to keep you from getting that deviation. However, if you get the quality of time you're looking for, you can always argue to the judge - "What extra cost does she have from the time they go to sleep and wake up the next day? However, even if I have less overnights, during my two evenings, I have to pay for their food, the utilities they're using, gas to drive them around, etc., etc."

In the end, most judges and magistrates will not look at the "overnights" as the basis for a deviation due to parenting time - they'll look to who has the higher share of awake time (or "quality time") as the basis for awarding that deviation. This argument is very strong in my county and I've been able to get deviations granted on it in many cases where my client has no overnights other than his every other weekend - because I can prove that the expense shift that would happen in a true 50/50 arrangement is happening anyway, even if it's not 50/50 purely because of the overnights or time at school.

Single Father v. Single Mother Stats

3 upvotes · 3 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Great question. I don't know. I do know that after most custody battles a mother will speak as negatively about the father as she can get away with. Even when the kid sees father being loving and caring during visitation time, the poisoned mentality does continue to screw with the kid, who will often believe his mom over his own actual experience.

106 - What doesn't work

3 upvotes · 31 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

or there is no strategy that will work because their spouse has some other problem getting in the way that needs to be addressed.

To this, I ask the question: if she was single, would she legitimately remain sexless? Or would she end up finding someone else within a few months (assuming no emotional recovery period) who piques her interest?

If it's the first option, you may well be right. But if she's likely to find another guy within a few months, that means her problem isn't really "getting in the way" - it's just getting in your way. As such, you've got to become the guy she would hook up with if she was single. If she'd do it for him, she'd do it for you - but you have to become him or better.

There is, of course, an internal conflict in this process:

- PRO: The fact that you're already married gives her more comfort to sleeping with you, so her guard will innately be lower with you than with Mr. New, meaning she'll more readily accept the new you than Mr. New
- CON: Her long-term familiarity with you will make it take longer for her to see the changes and realize you're as good as or better than Mr. New, who is still overall a mystery to her, and that mystery makes it a tinge bit more exciting. When I wrote in my previous post in "the comparison game," I pointed out how if other women start taking notice of you, she might regain this sense of mystery: "Why do they want my husband? What are they seeing that I'm missing? Has he really changed that much and I just can't see it yet?" So, you can still be on par with Mr. New, but she'll be the last one to notice without some kind of other female attention showing it to her.

The RP Can Only Do So Much Married To An Alcoholic

3 upvotes · 31 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with /u/not-my-hands. Be prepared for the worst, but still hope for the best and pursue the best option. My guess is, to some extent, you probably are fairly unhappy in the relationship and are actually somewhat excited (commingled with nervousness, anger, resentment, etc.) at the prospect of getting out and finding someone new. Who wouldn't want to get out of a bad situation and start over? But don't let those feelings cloud your judgment in prioritizing your marriage if at all possible.

Remember, Jesus left the 99 sheep to go after that one that wandered away. He hunted it down and carried it back. If that sheep had said, "Screw you, Shepherd. I'm not coming back," Jesus may well have let it leave, but he would do this with a heavy heart and not an attitude of, "Yes! Now I don't have to worry about chasing that sheep down every day!" Chase your sheep down, and maintain a right love for her throughout the entire process, even if that love is a hard love.

I even wonder if she's a narcissist

I wrote up a Part-1 post on mental health issues, which I cross-posted in this sub, but declined to write part 2. As you and /u/BluePillProfessor have noted, RP is not an answer to mental health problems, yet most RP people only want to hear that "MORE RP!!!" as the answer to everything. This is the same mistake Mr. Nice Guy makes when he thinks the solution to his marriage problems is to be even nicer. Sometimes there are things that RP will not fix, but there are other solutions that can - and they can be carried out without destroying an RP frame.

Sadly, most mental health professionals are fairly ignorant on what works and what doesn't. If you want to find someone good, go ask a divorce judge: "Who's the best guy in town to help an alcoholic recover?" They're the ones who actually see people at their worst and when they recover (because that's when the recovered addict re-files for more parental rights - so they know when it works and when it doesn't), so they know specific names of people in your area who can actually help. Looking up random websites simply won't get you there, no matter how well you think you've vetted someone.

That said, I wouldn't be quick to confuse "nothing is ever her fault" with narcissism. Yes, this is a huge overlap, but this is also a staple characteristic of all addicts. They believe that if something is their fault, it will clue people (including themselves) into the fact that they have a problem, and if they admit they have a problem then they have trouble rationalizing continuing the problem. So, in order to hide their problem, including from themselves, they have to pretend to be faultless in most every situation.

201 - Healthy Sexual Desire v. Lust/Coveting

3 upvotes · 27 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

But what about the distinction in Job ... How do you reconcile the two?

Job 31:1 is another example of a crummy English translation. The Hebrew word is etbovnen, a conjugation of the root bin, which means "to understand" or "consider," sometimes "discern." In rare uses, it is translated as "observe," but usually in a comprehension capacity, not a "passing by my eyes" observation. The only time it's ever translated "gaze" (as the ESV uses) is in this one verse.

"Understand" or "discern" is actually the strongest interpretation and is consistent with the Septuagint's translation, where the 70 Jewish scholars in 300-ish BC translated Job 31:1 with sunieimi, which is the Koine Greek word for "understand" or "perceive" (this can help). That's not to say a Greek translation of the Hebrew is more accurate; rather, it's to say that the Jews in 300-ish BC believed that "understand" was the best word there rather than merely a "gaze" or a "look," for which there were other words like atenizo (gaze) or idou (look, behold).

This tells me that people far more fluent with the Hebrew language at that time believed Job was saying more than just passive observation - that it was being processed in the mind in some capacity. In fact, parallel uses of the Hebrew word usually are in the context of "wise and understanding/discerning" or "wise and discerning/understanding and experienced" or "a discerning/understanding heart" or "discern between ..." etc. In short, it's a reference to someone who has deep thoughts about something, not just passive observation. It's also interesting to remember the temporal proximity in that Job was probably written in the 500s BC and the Septuagint was written around 300BC. That would be about the difference in language development between today and when America was founded - or in other words, not much. So, those 70 Jewish scholars would have had a pretty strong understanding of the language Job was using.

To that end, I don't think Job is distinguishing between "looking, and letting his heart be enticed." I think Job 31:1 is certainly a reference to a deep contemplation in his mind. Job 31:9-10 then shows the fruit of that deep contemplation when it is put into action. In fact, I get the impression that 9-10 are a reference back to 31:1, where Job is essentially saying, "If I do break that covenant, this is what such a breaking would look like and what I hope would happen to me if I did that." Or, in other words, 31:9-10 are strong indications of what Job meant when he said 31:1 - that he assumed 9-10 were the natural conclusion of a violation of his covenant in 1.

I know word studies can seem like a lot of voodoo because some people like to claim they did a word study, then pick the one bizarre, rarely used translation and run with that to force the verse into their own framework of understanding. So, as with the Bereans in Acts 17, I urge you to challenge me on this. But I do feel pretty confident about my conclusions on Job 31:1 (sorry for the vomit ... this isn't the first time I've been asked about this :p).

Jesus said ... Aren't you concerned about falling on the wrong side of the line here?

Not at all. If I were afraid of judgment, then I would not have been made perfect in love (1 John 4:18). Instead, Jesus states the own terms of what he means in Matthew 5:29-30, and I don't blow it off as hyperbole as most people do (I don't ever see Jesus speaking in hyperbole).

Most people want to look at what Jesus said to do: gouge your eye out; cut your hand off. But they ignore the rationale for why he said to do this: "it is better that you lose one of your members than that your whole body be thrown into hell." To rephrase: If you could save yourself from hell by gouging out your eye or cutting off your hand, you should do it! But we know that won't actually save anyone from hell. To understand why he's saying this at this time, we need to see the greater context of the sermon on the mount:

1. 5:1-16 - God's expectations for how we should live
2. 5:17-20 - God demands perfect obedience; this hasn't changed since the law was given
3. 5:21-48 - People are more sinful than they realize; trying to avoid sin is impossible and won't save you
4. 6:1-34 - Even when you try to do good, you fail and still sin
5. 7:1-6 - We'll be judged by our own failures; comparisons won't exonerate us
6. 7:7-29 - We can avoid God's judgment and find his provision when we seek Him, trusting Jesus' words

This should look familiar, as we often present it more like this:

- A. We were created perfect
- B. We sinned and became imperfect
- C. Our plans to solve the problem (good works, morality, religious practices) always fail
- D. We personally need a savior
- E. Believe/trust in Jesus, following His Word as evidence, and you will be saved

You'll note that this blurb in 5:29-30 about cutting off your eye or hand if it would save you from hell is in the "but you can't avoid sin because it's impossible and won't save you" part, which sets a really, really strong context for Jesus meaning this section both literally and as a pointless endeavor because Ch7 is where he says what the real answer to the problem is. In 5:29-30 he's still expressing the hopelessness of the problem. It's truly a beautiful sermon - to see Jesus presenting the Gospel for the first time, and before he even died, and before the Holy Spirit indwelt people to help them understand it! They didn't have Romans to give them context first. This must have been mind-blowing! I always smile thinking of the sermon on the mount :)

Princeton's new 'men's engagement manager' to combat aggressive masculinity on campus

3 upvotes · 26 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWives

I think that would make international news! It kind of reminds me of this article I just read yesterday (I like having my views challenged, so I read opposing views frequently). It totally bashes any "men's rights" attitude and acts like feminism is the best thing that's happened in civilized history.

The misconceptions and out-of-context statements are astounding. But what I'm most intrigued by is that they quote the TRP Glossary for feminism, explaining how convoluted and horrible it is. Then they quote the dictionary definition: The theory of the political, economic, and social equality of the sexes, as if this describes all of feminism. As far as I can tell, feminism hasn't been about "equality" since the 90s, or even earlier (I was just a kid in the 80s, so I'm not as clear).

Then, what gets really funny is that after trashing the complex definition and quoting an over-simplified one, their VERY NEXT POINT is: "Cult leaders offer a simple solution to increasingly complex world problems."

Sorry for the mini-rant. I'm all for loving, caring for, and respecting women ... but the denial some people are in about what that should look like is just shocking.

Internalizing Red Pill ideologies significantly changed the way I think about men and relationships.

3 upvotes · 25 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

This was a very interesting read. Thanks for sharing! That said, there's one section that I'd like more information on:

Note: Sexual attractiveness can be operationalized in either the physical sense(appearance), mental sense (intelligence), or prestige (power)

For ages, I had intelligence absolutely mastered. My wife would constantly remark on this and most people who meet me will comment that I'm the smartest person they've ever known. I'm not trying to toot my horn here ... just bear with me.

As far as power goes, outside the home I am a man of influence. When I speak, people listen. It usually doesn't take more than 12 months for me to be in a position of leadership in whatever I do, sometimes much shorter. A good example, about a year ago the pastor of our church (read: man with all the power) asked me to disciple him so he could learn to lead like I do. This is how it's always been in all social gatherings, whether it's just having a "game night" with old college friends or being involved in community groups, or dominating everyone in a racquetball league.

- To be fair, inside the home I was a pedestalizing wife-worshiper, thinking that God's plan was for me to serve, serve, serve my wife to love her, as that was her "love language." So, I lost points for that. But when she'd ask what I'm reading and I said, "A book on improving leadership and assertiveness," her response was to laugh at me and say, "You should be writing that book ... and I don't think you need to be any more assertive."

But from all practical perspectives, even with those two things in place to some extreme, we still had a dead bedroom. Why? I was about 50-60lbs overweight. I've now lost 40 of that and am seeing significant progress (although we still have a long way to go).

So, with something like this in mind, how would that statement you made be interpreted?

- Women are turned on by one of those three. If hers was physical, it doesn't matter how intellectual or powerful you were, she's not going to be attracted.
- Women are turned on by a combination of all of these three and the level of sexual attraction is only as strong as the weakest trait. Your physical shape was crap, so her attraction was crap. Raise the physical above the power and the power will be the new limiting agent.
- Your wife should have been attracted to you because your intellect and power should have more than made up for your physical appearance. There must be more going on here than this model would account for.

I'm guessing the middle one, or some variation of it. But I'd love to hear your thoughts on this :)

As for your conclusions, I'm sorry that you feel this way, although I've often wondered if this wouldn't happen to some women. It has often been said: "The best is the worst enemy of the great." You'll never find and marry "the best man" because no man is perfect. You will always find some flaw. It's like George Costanza in Seinfeld (or his similar role in the movie Shallow Hal), who will dump an otherwise perfect girl because she had a slightly crooked toe nail.

More to the point, as his helper, one of the best things you can do is accept a man who isn't perfect and help him. After all, if you find a man who is already perfect and doesn't need you, where is your sense of fulfillment in the relationship?

I'm guessing you don't have a Christian background, but if you can ignore the spiritual side, I wrote a post about this here. The conclusion is that:

A person is considered "attractive" if they have the appearance of: (1) being able to fulfill their duty; and (2) being able to let the other person fulfill their duty also.

For men, their duty is to be a leader/provider/alpha; for women it's to be submissive/helper/seducing. You're looking exclusively for (1) - someone who fulfills his duty perfectly. But I think if you embrace (2) you'll find your options opening widely - embracing the fact that you will not be satisfied in a relationship where a man will not let you fulfill your role for him because he's soooo alpha and independent that he doesn't have a place for you.

In reality, this subtle "need" (if you can call it that; sometimes he doesn't need it, he just wants it) is an imperfection. It is a defect that is designed by God in his character. So, ironically, the "perfect man" who is a 10 is someone who is imperfect if left to himself. You'll never find this guy on the SMP because a 10 doesn't become a 10 until he's got a woman at his side. There are 9s who abound in plenty, though. Let your hypergamy embrace this. You be the one to make a 9 a 10.

Field Report: From verbal sparring to compliments

3 upvotes · 25 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWives

Brilliant response! Love the theory behind it too :)

Your opinion of open marriages?

3 upvotes · 24 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

In addition to the comment I made that /u/rocknroll chuck linked to, there are a few more reasons why an open marriage is a terrible idea.

The biggest one is that you're giving her a blanket invitation to turn her hypergamy back on. When you're in a committed relationship, hypergamy looms in the background, but is often outweighed by the fact that a divorce will decrease her SMV and lower her position in the FSM, as well as from an enjoyment of the beta comforts she receives in the marriage/LTR.

A woman can raise her SMV really fast when some of these threats aren't present or have a psychological impact on her. Although you might be a 7 right now and she might be a 6, with a little makeup, some sexy moves, and that little black dress, she might be dolled up to an 8 and will be pulling better men than you.

In fact, in virtually all marriages, "The grass is always greener." If your SMV hasn't gone up drastically beyond hers, you're probably going to be pulling women on-par with your wife/LTR, but you'll enjoy it more because of the newness of it. You might find people slightly higher. But she's going to realize just how high her heights can go. If you're going to do an open relationship (which I never recommend), it'll almost always backfire if you do it before she turns 40. Even a little post-wall, she can doll herself up a lot faster than you can.

If it helps, I had a client who went this route-ish. He and his wife were very sexually active, but it just wasn't enough for him. So, they started doing threesomes. They began with FFM at first, but she eventually persuaded him that it wasn't fair, so he brought another dude in the picture. One month later, his stuff is on the street, the new guy is living in his house, and he's calling me to handle his divorce. Don't be an idiot. Don't be that guy, whether it's through threesomes or an open relationship. It never works.

Mini-FR - The vasectomy conversation

3 upvotes · 24 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Have you considered that maybe she knows that once you do this, sex will be for pleasure only?

Well, it will have other purposes, but pleasure will certainly be the primary one at that point. But this is a good thought. I doubt she'd consciously think of it this way, but at a subconscious level, now that you've brought it to my attention, I'm very confident that this is going to be an issue I'll have to work through. She certainly does need a "mindset shift." But I also don't want to approach it from the angle of, "I must fix her mindset!"

I'd much rather address it from the angle of: I'm going to be so awesome that you'll be so horny for me that your hamster will try to justify using sex for pleasure instead of procreation. When I have the hamster working for me instead of against me, that's the sweet spot.

105 - Non-Negotiable Attraction

3 upvotes · 21 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

The fact is, when it comes to sex, what man wouldn't want his wife to be totally depraved? ;)

Don't be afraid to tell a girl straight up that you like her or find her attractive. They love that shit if it's coming from a place of confidence and non neediness.

3 upvotes · 21 July 2017 · /r/TheRedPill

I recently made a post about how to compliment a woman in a way that makes her feel sexy. The premise is that when a woman feels sexy, she's more likely to want sex (wives in particular).

What you're proposing is general compliments. To that end, if guys are still noobish about the approach, even though it shouldn't matter sometimes it feels safer complimenting something peripheral, like her shoes, shirt, or interesting jewelry. A couple weeks ago I told one of the gym workers I liked her shoes (she was in gym attire, but shiny, business-attire black flats). We laughed and she made a few comments back. Now, every time I go to the gym, guess who's coming up to me flashing her shoes with a smile ...

But I'm not interested in cheating on my wife, so I leave it at the general with other people. With my wife (and I recommend with any LTR), I go a step further. Here's how I break this down in a few easy examples:

First - Clothes

- Generic: "That dress is driving me crazy"
 - Her interpretation: "He might have a fetish for this style of dress."
- Specific: "The way that dress fits over your body is so tight, and your hips curving out that way ... it's turning me on."
 - Her interpretation: "He noticed the way my unique body shape is complimented and accentuated by my dress - and that makes him want me." Women care less that you notice the clothes than that you notice them and what the clothes say about them.

Second - Hair

- Generic: "I love the way your hair looks today."
 - Her interpretation: "He likes this hair style on women, generally."
- Specific: "When you put your hair up that way, it reminds me of when we were at that one event, and the sex we had afterward - I can't get that out of my mind. [Playful/sarcastic:] Go change your hairdo or I might actually go insane."
 - Her interpretation: "He likes this hair style, but his memories of me are what's turning him on. We must have a strong connection."

Third - Skin

- Generic: "Your skin looks so smooth, I just want to rub my hands all over you."
 - Her interpretation: "He generally likes soft skin. I happened to use lotion today."
- Specific: "Your skin feels so smooth, I want to gently glide my hands across your legs and feel all the goosebumps that come up."
 - Her interpretation: "He's attracted by the way my body responds to his touch, and the way I take care of my skin helped facilitate that!"

Guys are notoriously bad at compliments. We stick with the generic because it's easy, but wives and LTRs want to know that it's her and her alone that we crave. If she thinks it's just about getting sex and any woman will do, that's a huge turn-off. To her, you've just become like the stereotypical sex-craved man-pig who would hump a rock if no one was looking. Show her she's wrong and she'll be putty in your hands! As I said above, when she feels sexy, she feels like sex.

By contrast, a woman considers herself beautiful when she feels like she radiates a positive aesthetic in her environment. This is very different from "sexy." Feeling sexy leads to sex. Feeling beautiful leads to efforts to improve her environment.

My wife used a stun gun on me and I took it

3 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

People are telling you to get out. I won't contradict that advice, but be forewarned that even if she is pretty crazy, if you can't drive, you're probably not getting custody because you can't meet all of your child's needs. If you have an alternative plan that you believe is sustainable your chances go back up a little.

Was this the an RP move? Need advice/input.

3 upvotes · 18 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That's what holds the beta back: showing interest in "discipling" or being friends with her, when really he wants to date her.

Great points. I just want to comment on this briefly. One guy I know and trust once told me: "Dating is discipleship. Marriage is discipleship. Any time you try to divorce these concepts, you've lost the point and you're no longer leading her the way God intended."

To be clear, this assumes a Jesus-model of discipleship and not a rote teaching-model.

In the future, resolve to make your interests and intentions known as soon as possible.

/u/mista_resista - This is key in avoiding the "friend zone." Most people assume the friend zone is something a girl does to you. "She put me in the friend zone!" we say. In reality, we put ourselves in the friend zone. The friend zone is created when we develop oneitis and begin treating that woman differently from the way we would treat a practically identical woman for whom we have no oneitis. It didn't take RP to figure that out, but I think many guys miss this.

The woman you have oneitis for picks up on these differences and responds exactly in-kind. Those differences are almost always beta traits. Why? Because we're not idiots: we know that beta traits develop comfort, which will make a woman stick around. If you don't foster those beta traits, she's going to be gone when the fun is over.

The problem is that if you are all beta from the get-go, you'll get her to stick around, but without the alpha the relationship will never be excited or exciting. So, when you're friend-zoning yourself, you're getting exactly what you put in: she's around you and not leaving, but she's also not willing to escalate because you're not putting in alpha currency.

I have pondered much on what /u/bluepillprofessor dubbed cholomite's law: Tingles without fuzzies won't last. Fuzzies without tingles are worthless.

This should go without saying, but:

- Beta traits foster longevity.
- Alpha traits foster excitement.

As with most guys, you've already figured out the longevity part. You need to grow the alpha. I like to use the word "excite" (verb) for this because I'm a physics nut. Atoms have a ground state with no charge. In that ground state, they're not very interactive and rarely bond with other atoms. However, when something happens to excite the atom, its electrons jump to higher energy states/orbits around the nucleus, making it much easier for that atom to bond with another nearby atom. This is somewhat risky because too much excitement can cause free-radicals to start bouncing around in a system, which is incredibly dangerous. Interestingly, that danger is noticed by the other atoms around and (because of entropy), they are drawn to this atom, feeding off its excitement, preventing it from becoming a rogue-free-radical. The result is that the excited atom doesn't blow its top and the surrounding atoms have their electrons more excited than before. So, even without the excited atom trying to form bonds, other atoms will make their way to it to bond with it anyway, hoping to feed off of its excitement in order to harmonize/equalize the energy within a system. That's what you want.

To simplify this without the physics babble: become more exciting and other people (including girls) will want to be around you. When you find a girl you want, escalate: apply your exciting energy onto her (physically, emotionally, spiritually, mentally, relationally), making her more excited and taming your excitement by gratifying it through the relationship (not just sex, for which you should still wait until marriage).

One final science lesson that might do more to tie this together:

- Guys get excited about sex for no reason (i.e. high electron energy state), whereas girls remain in the ground state most of the time. We cannot expect otherwise.
- Like the electrons, the more the energy state escalates, the more edgy other atoms' electrons in the area become; they start to get excited to, hoping to bond with that electron. This is akin to a guy sending his sexual vibes to his wife (intentionally or not; it doesn't matter).
- Whether the atom initiates or its neighbor (wife) does, a bond is ultimately formed (i.e. sex).
- The probability of atoms forming electron-sharing bonds is often directly related to the degree of excitement of electrons between the two.

- After the bond is formed, the excited atom's electrons are stabilized, often hopping down a rung or two in its excitement levels (ergo the lull after a guy has sex); but the reactionary atom's electrons are often held in a higher state than when they started (ergo the wife's ability to remain aroused for some time, even after her first climax, and also what is commonly called the "afterglow").

Rejecting appreciation ... weird concept, but it works for me.

3 upvotes · 17 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'll definitely look into that. Thanks for your insightful analysis.

Promiscuity and pair bonding

3 upvotes · 15 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

That's what the psychologist recommended. My client decided to settle ... but at least he got custody.

Is Red Pill truly congruent with Holiness?

3 upvotes · 14 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

The question you're asking is really way ahead in the series I have been posting, so I won't likely address it in detail for quite some time yet. That said, here's the short answer.

God intentionally designed physical sexuality to be the height of The Human Experience. I honestly believe this. The reason behind it has to do with what sexuality parallels in the spiritual realm, which is evangelism and discipleship. As a result, it is incredibly important in fostering our desire for an understanding of evangelism and discipleship to have a healthy sexual appetite. A lack thereof almost always correlates with spiritual impotency as well. Although correlation does not always imply causation, biblically I think this mandate is established as a causal relationship.

I have experienced this in my own life, and many men who I have discipled have a firm this as well: a dead bedroom kills motivation for evangelism and discipleship. Someone who does not see physical reproduction positively and as something to be enjoyed will likely not see spiritual reproduction that way either.

Now, you also mentioned something about being too self-centered. The church often teaches a false organization of how love relationships work. The church says to use the joy acronym: Jesus, others, yourself. That is, we should love Jesus first, others after him, and ourselves as the lowest. This is true as far as priority, but it is impossible to follow it in practice.

You quoted the Golden Rule, but missed what Jesus was really saying about how to love others. "Love your neighbor as yourself" assumes you have to know how to love yourself first. If you don't know how to take care of and appreciate yourself and your own desires, you will be incapable of loving others as well. The as yourself part must come before the love others part, in practice.

Likewise, in 1 John 4:20, it says, "Whoever does not love his brother whom he has seen cannot love God whom he has not seen." So, before we can love Jesus effectively we must first learn to love our brothers.

With this order in mind it makes sense to me that we must learn to love ourselves first, so that we are capable of knowing how to love our brothers, and when we love our brothers that is when we become able to love God effectively.

That is not to say that we should be self-centered, rather this is the founding principle of every overflow / abundance ministry. You must make sure that your tank is full first, then your life will overflow into your family, then your family's well-being will overflow into your friends and church, and as your church becomes healthy that health will overflow into a community, which will overflow into a city, which will overflow into a state, etc. That is not to say that we should ever ignore any of these areas of life altogether while waiting to get our own act together, but it does establish a degree of efficiency and how we should approach ministry. Countless pastors will tell you over and over and over again: if you are not emotionally, spiritually, and physically healthy yourself, you are destined to be burned out and ineffective in your ministry.

As I noted in the beginning of this comment, sexual health is an incredibly important area not only in your physical relationship with your spouse, but also because of the subliminal implications it creates on your spiritual life as well. I know I'm being a little vague with this, but I hope this answer is at least a little sufficient for now. Don't worry, I will write more on this later, with the scripture to back it up.

That said, there are things that RP praxeology gets wrong and which violates scripture, and there are some things that it misses altogether, but which the Bible affirms to us. So, you're right in saying that RP only gets you about 95% of the way.

Woman's desire is to their HUSBAND according to God

3 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I think I mentioned a couple of them in my previous comment (Eph. 5, 1 cor. 14), but other examples that show the parallel between human marriage and our relationship with God include:

- Isaiah 54:5 - "For your Maker is your husband"
- Matthew 9:15 - Jesus referencing himself as our bridegroom (parallel in Mark and Luke)
- John 3:28-29 - John the Baptist referencing Jesus as our bridegroom and us as the bride (parallel in one of the other Gospels)
- 2 Corinthians 11:2 - "For I betrothed you to one husband, so that to Christ I might present you as a pure virgin"
- Revelation 19:7 - "for the marriage of the Lamb has come and His bride has made herself ready"
- Revelation 21:2 - "And I saw the holy city ... made ready as a bride adorned for her husband"
- Revelation 22:17 - referencing us as "the bride"

Clearly God intends human marriages to parallel our relationship with Him. 1 John 4:20 gives one additional point of clarity on what I'm suggesting:

- "He who does not love his brother whom he has seen cannot love God whom he has not seen."

This clarifies the direction of the parallel - the physical is a pathway to get to the spiritual. In essence, God gave us physical representations of spiritual concepts as a means to an end. If we want to learn how to love God in the context of a spiritual relationship, loving others in a physical relationship is what will open our eyes to what that's supposed to look like. Then there's Hebrews 8-10 (see specifically 8:5 and 9:23) and Colossians 2:17 that say quite plainly that the earthly things are parallels (literally "copies and shadows") of the heavenly things.

Other good examples of this:

- Physical circumcision correlates to spiritual circumcision (Romans 2:25-29)
- Baptism by water (physical) as compared with baptism by the Spirit (spiritual) (Matthew 3:11)
- The physical nation of Israel correlates to a spiritual nation of God's people (Romans 9:8)

If you want, re-read the book of Leviticus with this in mind and your reality will explode :D

Woman's desire is to their HUSBAND according to God

3 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Very true.

Although it does flow both ways, from Scripture I get the impression that the physical relationship a wife has with her husband is meant to be a road map to help her understand the spiritual relationship God intends the woman to have with Him also. In that sense, a woman's ability to submit to her husband is a stepping stone on her path toward developing an appropriately submissive relationship with God also.

That said, when a woman is struggling with an unbelieving husband or a spiritually immature husband, she often learns (unintentionally) to bypass her husband as a path to connecting with God and building that relationship directly. In these situations, it is then the submissiveness to God that helps them understand how to submit to their husbands, even though this is backwards from what I believe God designed and intended. 1 Cor. 14 and Ephesians 5 come to mind as setting up the "God to husband; husband to wife" structure.

I'm curious what /u/RedPillWonder thinks about this, though?

Woman's desire is to their HUSBAND according to God

3 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

He's trying to trap you into a semantics game. RP strategy says to use fogging in arguments like these, especially when he has a point that's legitimately true. Repent in a technical definition way means "turn around" or "turn away." In Jonah 3:10, as he points out, God turned away from what he suggested he might do. There are many interpretations on this, but if nothing else, from God's expressed communication to his people, he "repented" of his decision, even though he wasn't in the wrong for any of it. The same could be said of God's command to have Abraham sacrifice Isaach - he told him to do it, then he "repented"/turned away from that decision to do something else instead. God's repentance doesn't have an impact on his unchanging nature, nor does it change the fact that repentance in the context spoken to flawed humans is almost always a turning away from sin. In that sense, I would just fog - agree with him where he is technically accurate, but stay assertive as to your equally valid and more prominently true point without backing down.

Remember ... RP tactics aren't just applicable in marriage settings ;)

Woman's desire is to their HUSBAND according to God

3 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

1 Corinthians 5 is the conclusion on this matter to me: "For what have I to do with judging outsiders? Is it not those inside the church whom you are to judge? God judges those outside. 'Purge the evil person from among you.'"

In short, if Courage1611 is stating definitively that homosexuals are outside the church, then this verse states definitively that it's God's place to judge them, not his. If, however, a homosexual attempts to identify with Christ and claim he is within the church, then he subjects himself to the judgment of those people God has put in charge of the church, the penalty for which is excommunication so that they take their rightful place outside the church. If it helps, I once made this illustration to help bring clarity to the matter ... kind of cool to bring it out again after it hasn't been used in so long.

It's also worth noting that Romans 1 does not say that homosexuals are given up to the "reprobate/debased/depraved" mind as Courage1611 suggests. The depraved mind is actually the next layer after being given over to homosexuality. It's a 4-step process:

- Ignore God, worship other things; if you don't repent, God gives you over to ...
- lust and general sexual sin; if you don't repent, God gives you over to ...
- homosexual acts and "dishonorable passions"; if you don't repent, God gives you over to ...
- the depraved mind.

Although I agree that for someone to be beyond forgiveness they must first reach the depraved mind status, I don't see any Scriptural evidence that everyone with a depraved mind has necessarily committed the unforgivable sin or is somehow beyond repentance.

Also, Courage1611 is on the verge of having his comments removed if he keeps talking disrespectfully. Don't be afraid to report him or PM me if you see something out of line.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

3 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Did you read the second paragraph of the post? It appears you are commenting without actually having read what I wrote. Even without that, I would have assumed the title "PART 1" would give the answer here away.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

3 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I couldn't disagree more. Understanding why a person acts the way they do can help drastically in developing strategy for how to get them in your frame. I have to do this all the time when my client also has a PD.

Although we can't control her behavior, we can certainly set our boundaries and enforce them in a way that will maximize the probability of her response conforming to expectation. That's why it's often said here that RP tools are just tools, the man has to figure out which tool is needed at what time and how to use it in a given situation. Understanding why a person does what they do can go a long way in helping to identify not only which tool to use and how to use it, but also in inventing new tools when an existing one won't get the job done.

Also, every book on the sidebar I've read so far starts off with the "why people do what they do" conversation before actually going into the substance ... NMMNG, WISNIFG, MMSLP ... they all see the reasoning behind the method as important. Why? Because "why" does matter. If no one ever asked why, there would be no red pill at all.

MRP opinion on birth control?

3 upvotes · 11 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

It was my way to guarantee 100% control of conception

I personally know 3 different guys who all got girls pregnant after having a vasectomy (DNA results confirmed). I handled their child support cases. Trust me, they were ticked. I do hear it's solid for the most part, but it's certainly not 100%. Be careful.

How did you end up discovering Red Pill truths?

3 upvotes · 11 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

What brought you here? - I hit a low point a couple years back (including a long period of sexlessness in my marriage) and started making small improvements; ramped up my efforts about 6 months ago by running, dieting and being more intentional about being a leader in the home. I can't remember what linked me over, but I saw a post that interested me, caused me to read a few more posts, ended up spending the whole night reading crap and realizing how it's exactly what I had just been doing for the last 6 months with a few extra "tricks of the trade" that I hadn't picked up from reading the Bible alone.

Issue - Crappy sex life was probably the biggest thing for me. My wife wasn't attracted to me. 2 years ago (my low point) she told me point blank: "You're fat and I'm not attracted to you" ... hence my agreement with TRP/MRP that fitness really does matter ... glad I'm knocking that one out of the park now!

T/MRP Advice - In short: Lift, OYS, sidebar. There was also a lot of really bad advice about, "She's broken; get out; she's just too low libido."

Church - 5LL over and over and over ... "Covert contracts are great. Do this and your wife will overflow with love for you!" They wouldn't be so blunt, and I bought into it at first, but that's essentially what I realize they were saying now.

Successful? - Church advice was not successful at all. I will say this in bold: Pastors should NEVER confuse biblical teaching with psychological teaching. 95% of sermons I hear nowadays (even from great pastors, like Tim Keller) are psychology with a little Bible to support it. I don't want teachings that are merely "consistent" with Scripture; they must be "produced by" Scripture. What I read in the Bible that I was implementing for the last 6 months has been very effective; all of it has been T/MRP stuff that I just learned from Scripture. T/MRP added a few new things that have been equally successful.

Search - Can't remember, but it had nothing to do with marriage improvement; it was just an accident.

Faith - My first post was titled "RP and religion ... ?" I'm pretty comfortable, although I get a lot of heat from the "RP and Christianity don't mix!" crowd.

Church Contribution - I disciple my pastor, so I'll probably have him read NMMNG pretty soon. He's totally beta and constantly makes jokes from the pulpit about his wife leading the household. He says it in a joking way, like, "I really lead, I'm just being humble and playing on a Christian trope," but from what he and I talk I get more the impression that although he may "lead" the house by making the final call, that "final call" is 99% aligned with what his wife wants and he calls it "service." In my experience with church discipleship ministries (specifically with the Navigators), if you don't get leadership on board you can't change a culture.

Original Post - https://www.reddit.com/r/askMRP/comments/6jjldo/rp_and_religion/leader ... I thought I was, but I really wasn't

This was totally me reading NMMNG. There were a lot of things I was doing right, but then several other things would hit me hard. Interestingly, at one point after NMMNG when I was reading WISNIFG my wife asked what I was reading and I said, "A book on how to be more assertive." She laughed and said, "You are the last person in the world who needs to learn to be more assertive." So, apparently she didn't perceive me as a "nice guy," but I still felt like one. I was just better at hiding my overly-beta traits.

one month for every year you've been married

/u/BluePillProfessor's time-frame suggestion hasn't been too far off for me. Our 9 year anniversary is in 2 weeks and I started my process 6 months ago (pre-RP, discovered RP 2 weeks ago). The first 6 months were laying the groundwork, then the last 2 weeks have been night and day. I described it to someone: it's like a dad traveling from Disney Land (beta) to the summit of Pike's Peak (alpha). My first 6 months pre-RP were the actual distance being traveled. Once I found RP I was already at the foot of the mountain, wandering aimlessly, not knowing how to climb up - only over. RP was the tipping point, and everything started changing immediately. I can only imagine where we'll be when we officially hit the 9-month mark.

RP Christians: Great Idea

3 upvotes · 11 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That it does :)

Welcome to Red Pill Christians

3 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Glad you're here! I do understand the need for rough and tumble motivation. That said, I also believe it is possible to deliver hard, cold truth in a blunt yet respectable manner. This is often one of my strengths with guys I disciple, and I believe others can pull it off too.

102 - Desire and the Curse

3 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Great advice. I think the issue is this:

- TRP assumes we are unitary beings - we have physical impulses and that's it.
- MRP assumes we are binary beings - we have physical impulses and emotional longings, both of which must be satisfied for an LTR to work.
- CRP knows we are trinitarian beings - we have physical impulses, emotional longings, and spiritual authority, all of which must work and be exercised in harmony for a healthy person and relationship.

I should say, we also all have a "mind," but this is really a common aspect of our being that balances the different aspects of who we are. So, TRP would say our "mind" is what figures out how to get our physical urges met; MRP would say it balances physical urges and emotional longings; CRP would say it is the tool God gave us for implementing body, heart, and spirit. Alternatively, some people lump "heart/mind" together or "spirit/heart" together. I'm not that invested in one particular model ... just to know that we cannot leave out our spirit from the equation.

Red Pill Advice for a 17 year-old?

3 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Didn't mean to come off angry or accusatory, just giving a different perspective.

I don't think extroverted = RP and shy = BP (although there is certainly a trend that can't be ignored), but I do see what you're saying a lot better now. I think these clarifications help complement your original post much better. Thanks for the follow-up! That said, /u/RedPillWonder gave some great advice ... worth a read for guys too.

Help

3 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Most women can't, but this is especially true with BPD. BPD = hamsters on steroids.

6 Questions for Christian Merps

3 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

All great points.

I would reject Mormonism as a legitimate Christian denomination, but I do see where their family structure is more in line with what we see in biblical cultures. Mennonites are another example of a people group that holds a very sound family structure, biblically ... but they're so absent from the rest of inter-church relationships that most people don't consider them a "denomination." They're branded as their own thing entirely.

When you say divorce is preferable to flirting and higher levels of dread, do you see a problem with at-will divorce when someone is unsatisfied, or do you stick with the more traditional, "Only when your spouse dies, cheats, or walks away without coming back" triad for breaking the marriage bond?

101 - Fitness develops attraction

3 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Good thought! I love those verses too :) I used to use that passage to address physical fitness also. The problem is that when I studied it those verses aren't talking about how physically fit someone should be. They're talking about not being sexually immoral with your body.

The closest we can get to imputing a "fitness" context from that passage is several verses earlier when Paul uses the phrase, "Food is meant for the stomach and the stomach for food" (v13) - but then he immediately goes back to sexual immorality and doesn't bring up food again, and after talking about sexual immorality that whole time, that's when he finally brings up the "your body is a temple" part.

Using those verses to talk about physical fitness is not a definitively wrong interpretation ... I just don't find enough context to make it an authoritative interpretation either. That said, I have no qualms with those who disagree on this relatively minor point.

How to bring out the Alpha in a Beta man?

3 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

The point isn't to make women do any of this. It's purely for women whose men won't lead them in the first place.

Help

3 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Great thoughts. One thing ...

find a church that values biblical gender roles and start attending worship there

How do you go about finding this unicorn? I've searched endlessly. I have found countless (literally) churches that verbally preach appropriate biblical gender roles, but absolutely zero (literally) where the congregation actually takes them seriously. I have found exactly 1 church where the pastor modeled biblical gender roles in his own life, but he was only at the church for 2.5 years before relocating.

6 Questions for Christian Merps

3 upvotes · 8 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Great questions. Here are over-simplified answers on otherwise extremely lengthy topics.

ONE

The message of Christ is a simple one:

- Admit we're not perfect
- Believe in Jesus and repent = only way to become perfect

- Commit in your heart to live in light of the truth

The message of the red pill is this:

- Admit that you're a beta screw-up
- Believe in a MAP and repent
- Commit internally to live in light of the truth

For Christians, Jesus is the penultimate expression of manliness, including the aspects of sexuality ... but that's a much, much longer topic and one that I've gotten into way too many times on reddit to re-hash here.

One of my good friends once explained: "TRP has done a stellar job identifying a problem; but they have gone too far in offering a solution." MRP tones the "shack and sack" concept down significantly to coincide with biblical views on LTRs, but still goes too far in promoting active divorce where the guy initiates the leaving.

As for Paul and Peter, Peter had a wife who followed him around on his missionary journeys. He was the alpha with a mission and she helped him on this mission as a supporter (1 Cor. 9:5), while maintaining an appropriate balance of beta traits to give her security in the midst of the dangers they face. Paul wasn't married, but he certainly gave a lot of advice, which rarely (if ever) conflicts with MRP principles.

TWO

I reject the theory that feminism is the cause of this split, as we see gender discrepancies in the church much, much earlier than the feminist movement, which didn't really begin until the 1800s. To give the brief synopsis of my theory:

- In the early 300s AD Emperor Constantine politicized Christianity. Women had no political power, so they were free to connect with it on an emotional/spiritual level. Men could not discern political power from spiritual power; so, although numbers remained equal, their motivations for being involved were very, very different.
- 1600s - American puritanism abuses Christianity as an aggressive manipulative ploy against women, further solidifying that the men's hearts were in the wrong places. Men became more and more attached to other aspects of "the new world" and faith became less appealing when they had other more natural/less-harmfully-manipulative means of controlling their women.
- 1800s - After the American revolution, religious freedom sparked around the world. There were no longer cultural mandates that everyone must attend church, so the men who weren't really into it started trickling out because they weren't socially pressured to the same degree. Women never lost the emotional/spiritual connection, so they remained.
- Late 1800s - The rise of women's suffrage gives the church a new platform in public forums. People had long used biblical concepts in first world countries for the suppression of women's rights, so when the subject became at issue the church's input was actually invited. Different branches played both sides, leading to the split of numerous denominations.
- 1900s - Feminization of the western world gains cultural momentum and the church hops on the bandwagon as its only hope from dying out in an otherwise anti-faith culture. Scriptural interpretation officially changes to meet liberal demands. Industrialization shifts the focus from alpha males b/c most jobs before then were very alpha in nature; desk jobs became more prominent, leading guys to adopt more beta traits; this trickled over to pastors and elders who needed to justify their newfound beta-ness as it was becoming more prominent worldwide.

THREE

I don't know that I would put it so bluntly, but yes, feminism has certainly invaded much of the church. The church can't get around most clear, unambiguous biblical passages, so they'll still verbally preach male headship in the home, but they get around it by applying it in very beta ways that put women on a pedestal. For example: "Men, it's your job to lead the home. This means loving your wife like Christ loved the church, which he died for [Ephesians 5]. So, you need to place your wife's needs, wants and desires above your own and lead with this type of self-sacrificing love."

Interestingly, Jesus set the model of extreme love, but we also see repeatedly, over and over again in Scripture that he did it because that's what increased his glory the most. As many a theologian has said: We are not the center of God's universe; his glory is the reason he's doing all of this, and we exist to glorify Him. Philippians 2 says plainly that God "gave [Jesus] the name that is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow in heaven and on earth and under the earth to the glory and praise of God." That's not to say we should be arrogantly seeking our own glory all the time, but we can't abandon this context when we look at the facts of why God sent Jesus to die in the first place.

FOUR

None in the western church ... pretty much all of them in third world countries. Feminism has really only swept through first world countries. It's part of the "worldly wisdom" of which Paul says, "Although they claim to be wise, they became fools" (Romans 1). I find many first world denominations openly rejecting feminism with their words, but the culture of their congregations still radiates female-headship in the homes. As a result, it's impossible to say which ones really mean it and which ones don't. I haven't found a denomination yet (including my own home church) who "really means it."

FIVE

I've given a lot of thinking to this. My gut-reaction was to say, "No, dread is unbiblical." But then I start looking at all the times Jesus uses dread and I can't get around it. We (the church as a whole) are his bride, but he still says of people who think they're "in" - "I never knew you; away from me you evildoer" (Matthew 7:23). He also preaches quite a bit about hell and all the dangers of what will happen if we're not engaged in a loving relationship with him. It's really quite terrifying.

Here's the thing though ... I don't think he's saying that to scare us into loving us; he's saying it to make us aware of the consequences so that we can make wise and informed decisions. Likewise, we should not intentionally use dread to scare our wives into being sexier for us; rather, it's beneficial for them to know, "If you disown me, I'll disown you before my Father in heaven" (Matthew 10:33) ... or to put it another way, "If you reject my advances [vis a vis the Holy Spirit], I'll divorce you" (eternal security issues aside, of course).

That said, Paul affirms this in 2 Timothy 2 with an additional caveat: "But if we are faithless, he remains faithful." This means that we must, to some degree, give our wives the security that we will love her and be faithful to her even when she isn't perfect in her role ... but if she openly rejects us, all bets are off.

Couple this with combinations of Matthew 18, 1 Corinthians 5 and 1 Cor. 7 we get a much more full picture of how dread levels rise in the church.

SIX

I did a study on "head coverings" about 2 years ago. It was very interesting and resulted in my wife and sisters all going out to buy them (even though that was not necessarily my conclusion). Paul says the reason for head coverings is to show male headship in the home. I started to wonder how the world would be different if all women had a constant reminder of this - and men had that constant encouragement from the women: "I'm giving you permission to be my leader, and this symbol is a reminder to you to take your God-given role."

Suffice it to say, yes, I do believe the next generation can bring back this authority, but I find it highly improbable as long as (1) education, (2) government, (3) media, (4) arts and entertainment, and (5) businesses keep catering to a liberal agenda.

Liberal thinking is to fantasy/idealism as RP thinking is to science/philosophy. Get people grounded in the pragmatic aspects of how the world actually operates (typically because God created it that way) rather than fanciful idealistic notions (usually born from our sinful nature) and that's about the best shot we've got.

Dealing with the stressed wife.

3 upvotes · 7 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

He told me that they both took the Love Languages quiz

I actually posted about the 5LL last week. My conclusion is this: 5LL fosters fuzzies; RP fosters tingles. If you're trying to improve your sex life, 5LL will fail. If you're trying to improve her comfort and trust in the relationship, 5LL is perfect.

But yes, I also noted that 5LL is all about covert contracts. That's the major flaw with the book. As BPP said, 5LL has value in that it opens our eyes to different methods of gaming our wives. So, stick with using it for that purpose.

The biological step-mother.

3 upvotes · 7 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I was confused for a while because I thought this conversation was in the other thread (I was on mobile when I read and responded to you at first). Regardless, thanks for keeping me in check on this. I don't think I ever correlated our actions to her actions in the way most covert contracts work, but I probably did leave that impression and have made two edits as a result. In my summary, I clarified:

[Edit: assuming no other psychological barriers]

[Edit: Desire doesn't always mean sex or action conformity. Women desire things but don't do anything about it all the time. All you're doing is fostering a psychological condition in her that opens doors for active conformity and puts shiny things on the other side; she still has to choose to walk through, and women don't always make the logical choice.]

That said, cultivating psychological conditions is almost purely reactionary. Athol Kay does this a billion times in MMSLP. Whether or not she acts on that psychological conditioning is a different story. As has often been said, women don't always follow logic. So, you can put a pot of gold in front of her and there's always that chance that she might walk away from it for otherwise incomprehensible reasons. To that end, I feel confident in the "this for that" of how you can cause a woman to perceive you, but assuming they will adjust their actions to align with their perceptions is a fantasy that cannot be controlled. That doesn't mean we're without hope, though, or should just ignore her actions and response altogether. This is where probability and statistical methodology comes in.

Lawyer job aside, math and statistics are ingrained in my education and lifestyle. So, where the absoluteness of a legal contract doesn't apply, probabilities and confidence intervals take their place. This is actually true even in the legal world as well, which is why we have contempt of court actions when people break contracts - all we can do is foster a condition where they are likely to act the way we want. If I put a piece of cake on one end of the table and broccoli on the other end, then point my kid at the table, I have created a high probability that he will move toward the side of the table with the cake. The fact that I'm showing him cake (something he naturally desires) is not a covert contract, just like the fact that you expressing yourself to your wife in a way that she naturally desires is not a covert contract, and there's nothing wrong with expecting her to desire you when you act consistently with what she desires. It only becomes a contract when we build an expectation of action into the mix. Those expectations are never contractual obligations (and it ruins it if they become that); but establishing high probability both maintains the fun when you do get what you want, while also keeping you grounded in the possibility that condition does not always produce action.

This prompts me that it might be a good idea to do a post on confidence intervals. They work something like this. There is a normal distribution curve with the "mean" or median (depending on which model you use) being the peak. This represents how all people act within a given system. There are certain outliers on both ends, but the majority of people will fall right within the middle. A confidence interval is the % degree of confidence someone can have that a particular data point will conform to a specific range from the mean. Establishing a psychological setting shifts the mean up or down the scale to get it where you want it. So, on a scale of 1-100, given a certain set of conditions that I have established for my process, I can say, "I am 95% confident that the result will be between 76 and 84." As we widen the range to, say, 70-90, my confidence level increases because I now have an easier target (i.e. the CI might be 98%). If we narrow the range, our CI drops because it's a harder target.

So, as men, we have to decide the range of acceptable outcomes and adjust our system so that we develop an acceptable degree of confidence (usually 90% or higher; sometimes 95% if you want to go by most business standards) that our setting will produce a result within that range. Sure, the 10% or 5% chance might actually happen with our wives, and we build that into the system. But this is a case-by-case basis and not a person-by-person basis. So, out of 20 attempts, my wife might deviate from my expectations 1 or 2 times if my CI is accurate, but certainly not 7 or 8 times. If she does deviate 7 or 8 times, then there is a missing variable that I have not accounted for and it's back to the drawing board. In the midst of all of this, men should continue to be OI in how they proceed, but that doesn't mean we can't be intelligent about how we foster probability. We just can't be upset when we set up a 95% confidence condition and she chooses the 5%.

For the most part, OYS, passing tests, getting fit, and the other good advice here are all of the primary variables. But every individual woman has additional variables that only her husband will know about - they're her unique quirks. For example, my wife hates the word "juicy." So, although I may do everything else right, if I say in the middle of dinner, "This steak is so juicy," that's going to push her to become an outlier, increasing her probability of deviating from the mean and defying the confidence interval. So, I have to start accounting for that in future interactions, whereas men and women who just meet (i.e. TRP people instead of MRP) can't account for these things, giving married men an advantage if they have actually paid attention to their wives even only a little bit throughout the relationship.

I'm not sure how much of that you agree with, and I know math and formulas can't explain everything, but this is how my world functions and I'm finding it to be reliable on a consistent basis. It also explains concepts we see a lot like, "If you always do what you've always done, you'll always get what you've always got" - because the same formula always produces the same data points. To be clear, it's not about setting up a covert contract; it's about fostering probability.

how she responds to all this is irrelevant IMO

In a perfect world, I would agree. Unfortunately, this is TRP thinking and not my interpretation of MRP thinking. If men treated wives like plates, where they just drop and replace her when she doesn't conform, there would be no point of MRP in the first place - everyone would just keep using TRP. The fact of being at MRP presumes that men want to preserve their marriage in some way. So, "you'll easily find her replacement" might be true and a nice preparatory mentality, but it's not what most of us actually want.

This is where men have more variables than TRP accounts for, because there is value in the LTR that often gets undermined. This value causes us to seek to bolster our marital relationships and restore them to their former glory rather than "ditch and replace." To that end, my wife's response does, in fact, matter - just not to my plan for improving and securing my life. I interpret OI meaning that I will keep improving regardless of whether or not my wife responds. It doesn't mean I create an emotional or biological (i.e. sex-drive) detachment to her responses, which would just be a sucky way to live. Even to that end, the "ditch and replace" model actually says the same thing: you are so emotionally and biologically attached to her responses that if she's not meeting that emotional need with her responses you need to find someone else who will.

Legal consequences of divorce alone are enough to prove this. If you're in a 25 year marriage and your wife rejects sex all the time, you can't just say, "What she does is irrelevant; I'll just keep being awesome." At that point you have to accept the sexless life, which will have an impact on you whether you like it or not; or you can fool around on her, she divorces you, and you're stuck paying spousal support for life ... which will have an impact on you whether you like it or not. No matter what, her actions will impact you in some way. She can't control your emotions, but her response to your actions does impact your life condition. This is a reality best not left ignored.

(secret sex club) Does the 20/80 rule follow into extra-marital affairs?

3 upvotes · 26 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Divorce attorney here. About a year and a half ago I did an analysis of over 200 of my cases for why the divorce happened. Of the ones that involved marital infidelity, about 60% of the time it was the wife and 40% it was the man. I went by who cheated first, as the other usually feels no remorse in extramarital affairs after that, which would skew the numbers.

Interestingly, of the 60% of women, about 2/3 explained that Facebook was the culprit, almost always involving someone they had previously been in a relationship with or otherwise had a longstanding connection to (i.e. rarely a one-night-stand at the bar). Most guys aren't actively invested in Facebook stalking to the same degree as women. When women use Facebook in unsatisfying relationships, they remember these past SOs or long-term friends/colleagues and their minds start to wander. Next thing you know, they're sending a very nice "thank you" message or leaving a comment about how cute their kids are. That initiated contact snowballs.

Tag: /u/5xtheflava

Unknowingly married someone with BPD (and was pressured into doing so)

2 upvotes · 27 August 2025 · /r/RPChristians

Caution to ALL Men

This is why I DO NOT recommend marrying someone on less than a year of knowing them. 2-3 is more ideal. Yeah, yeah, "But I want to have sex now!" Sure, if having sex a year earlier is more important than ensuring you don't get into this type of situation, go for it - your decision, your risk, your consequence.

If she truly has BPD, I give you 80% odds you end up divorced. If you have a kid when you divorce, you are dealing with it for the next 18 years, including likely child support and her constantly trying to manipulate everyone in the child's life against you - teachers, doctors, coaches, church friends, and on and on. BPDs almost always fabricate claims of abuse and think their (ex)husband is the one with the mental problems, and they make sure everyone knows exactly what they think/feel about you. Their stories are insanely believable because through what's called "confabulation" they rewrite history in their own brains to comport to their twisted emotional experience instead of the facts, meaning they really believe the things they're saying, which causes others to believe it also ("It didn't look like she was lying when she told me about it, so I trusted her").

Understanding BPD and DBT

The good news is that BPD is treatable with quite high success rates if (1) she is correctly diagnosed as a BPD, (2) she engages specifically in dialectical behavioral therapy, and (3) she agrees with the diagnosis and treatment, wants help, and is committed to following through.

FWIW - BPDs have constant cognitive dissonance, where their thoughts, feelings, and senses all communicate different information to their brains. If you say, "I became frustrated when you did this" and she feels like it's an attack on her, (a) her ears will hear "I became frustrated when you did this" but her feelings will receive it as (b) "You are an awful person for having done this to me; I hate you," and when she tells the story she will genuinely believe that you said she was an awful person and that you hate her (i.e. the confabulation bit) because her brain cannot reconcile the conflicting inputs and it gives her feelings precedence over the facts.

DBT is a type of counseling that focuses on helping borderlines (and other people) recognize that conflicting thoughts can both simultaneously be true. For example: in the exact same moment I can say, "I really want to go to this social event at my church" and also say, "But I'd also rather just veg out at home after a rough week at work." BPDs have massive dynamic swings where they feel like they must always massively love something or massively hate it and are constantly forced to choose. When they recognize that conflicting feelings are acceptable to have - and not just on an intellectual acknowledgement level, but to truly internalize the concept - it helps resolve (a) their ability to perceive facts more accurately, and (b) their ability to self-regulate when they find themselves shifting toward those super swings.

Unknowingly married someone with BPD (and was pressured into doing so)

2 upvotes · 27 August 2025 · /r/RPChristians

History of abuse or significant number of sexual partners/sexual impulsivity are DSM-V diagnostic criteria for BPD. When I do premarital counseling I make the couples take the MMPI test for personality disorders just to make sure they know what they're getting themselves into. In this case, having that information before marriage would have been significant for someone (whether OP or someone else who is advising him who might be more familiar with what red flags to look out for in terms of mental illness) to see those things in order to let him know what he's getting into before committing for life.

Not sure what to do, need guidance.

2 upvotes · 16 August 2025 · /r/RPChristians

I was going to give a bullet-point list of all the obvious red flags in your post, but u/Praexology already did that, so I'll move on.

I saw you post your stats in a comment and u/DonnieWearsVelvet hit the nail on the head. You're a super low-value man right now. Physically, spiritually, mentally ... you have nothing to offer her. Why in the world would you expect her to stick around? I'll give you a reason: because you can be better. That's what every girl wants - a husband who's constantly improving and maturing. On the one hand, every girl has a hard time walking away from a guy who's showing genuine life improvement. On the other, you've probably proven a repeated pattern of "I'll get better" for about 2 weeks followed by "Nope, just went back to my old ways again" for the last 12 years, so she has no reason to believe it'll actually stick this time. And I'm not even talking about the alcohol. I'm talking about everything - the mission, the job, the physique, and on and on.

Okay, so you don't know an action plan to take? I'll give you a freebie and make one for you:

- Next 12 months: no alcohol or drugs. At all. Period. Join a recovery group if you have to.
- Next 12 months, you're hitting the gym 5 days a week. She's not talking to you anyway, so that's a lot of extra free time on your hands. Don't have a gym? Fine, use this bodyweight routine: 200 pushups, 200 squats, 200 lunges, 200 sit-ups, 5k run. Every day. Can't do it? Fine, go until muscular failure every day until you can do it. That's step one.
- Simultaneously (i.e. don't wait), start having daily quiet times (minimum 1 chapter, start in the book of John, then move to Acts, then read the epistles, ending with Romans then Revelation) and 10 minute daily prayer sessions. Alone. You're not doing this to impress her with your newfound spiritual endeavors. In fact, avoid getting caught doing it. If she catches you, add an extra 50 pushups, squats, lunges, sit-ups, and an extra 1 mile jog that day. Do it because you love God and your life is in his hands.

- Simultaneously, find 10 things you can practically do to increase your income. This could be adding certifications to qualify for a promotion. It could be taking on odd-jobs from Craigslist. It could be applying for a new job altogether. Your call. Pick 1 of those 10 things every week and do it. No exceptions, no excuses.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (04/15/24)

2 upvotes · 17 April 2024 · /r/RPChristians

How wet she could get before using lube

Why are you married 6 years and still using lube?

I haven't analyzed it yet.

Yes, a lack of analyzing is the problem. Or perhaps you just push through the LMR and see if that works. If it does, turns out that was the problem. If not, then go guess at what else it might be.

She begged to be allowed to give a handjob as an "appetizer" before we had sex.

On the whole, listen to u/Moist-Bath5827. He's solid. That said, while the underlying principle of his approach is correct, I wouldn't recommend using the word "no" in connection to your wife initiating sex. MMSLP has a principle that's probably the most valuable thing in the book: Never turn your wife down when she initiates. Doing so just conditions her to associate sex with rejection. Accept her invitation, but dominate it by turning it into what you want rather than what she offers. Let her start the hand job. Once you're nice and hard, pull her skirt down and show her how you want to finish. If she insists that it has to be a hand job and nothing else, it's not because she actually wants to give you a hand job.

Most likely, it's either (a) because she wants to placate you, reducing the imperative to have sex later in case she wants to look like she's being sexual toward you while still holding the cards on whether she feels like going through with it or not, or (b) more likely because she's not getting aroused by you throughout the day and she thinks giving you a hand job might be enough sexual contact for her to start thinking about it so she can work herself up to actually wanting to have sex with you later. If she's got that much problem getting wet that you need lube, I'm about 99% sure it's (b) and you just don't know how to make her horny throughout the day.

find some resources on pushing through LMR

If she's consistently offering the "handjob, sex later" deal, LMR isn't your (or really: her) problem. Arousal is. A woman who is sufficiently aroused rarely puts up much, if any, LMR.

Goals: This week: Initiate each morning and night until business travel starts again. Future weeks: Initiate pre-workout at least 2-3 times a week and post workout if no sex pre-workout. Start morning initiations.

Huh? You're legit planning on initiating morning, night, and also before/after workouts? You must have the fastest-producing testicles I've ever heard of, unless you're just planning for that much rejection.

Assurance of Salvation 8/10

Evangelism 0/10

100% the reason your AoS is 8/10 is because of the 0/10 on evangelism. You may think, "No, it's because I still question these things and wonder about those things," but you're wrong. It's the absolute lack of mission/purpose in life. So let's look at that ...

Vision: Be filled with joy and hope, abounding in steadfast love. Generous to all and a solid rock of good theology and truth in my family, church, and community. Be financially secure, but not wasteful, give generously to those in need around me. Encouraging good morals and uprightness in the people around me, an example for the community.

Mission: DRAFT: Use my joy and analytical skills to be a man who stands for truth and righteousness, gives generously to the poor and missions, and strengthens the spiritually weak, so that I can lead in my church and community, creating disciples and giving God more glory.

Okay, Jesus said your mission is to make disciples of all nations. Your mission is a lot of contemporary Christian lingo with no substance. The reason I encourage writing a "vision" statement in addition to your mission is because it's meant to give substance when people are inevitably vague or wishy-washy about their mission. A vision is, by nature, how you see/envision your mission playing out in your life. Yours is basically, "Just be a standup guy."

Imagine you're Sir Sebben, knight of the round table. Your King, Arthur, sends you on a mission to capture the evil sorceress Morgana and bring her back for Merlin to question.

- If Lancelot was assigned this task, it would be ... Mission: kidnap Morgana and bring her back to Camelot. Vision: Take a horse to her castle, swim through the moat, climb in through the kitchen window, slay the servants working in the kitchen before they make a sound, make my way to her chambers, knock her out with the hilt of my sword, toss her over my shoulder, and leave the same way I came.
- Sir Sebben's take ... Mission: Use my a couple of my better personality traits to stand up for virtues I value, and to help other people in a generalized sense, all for the glory of Arthur, my king. Vision: I will accomplish this mission by having a bunch of good personality traits.

Imagine Arthur saying, "Go kidnap Morgana." And then he's like, "Now just to make sure you understood: repeat the mission back to me," and you say the above. What is Arthur to think?

Now imagine God saying, "Go make disciples of all nations," and then he's like, "Now just to make sure you understood: repeat the mission back to me," and you give him the mission statement you wrote above. What is God to think?

Sure, Arthur and God will both say, "Yes, we want you to be a good, standup guy." But they're also going to think you're an idiot for completely ignoring/misunderstanding the mission and having no vision for how you'll carry it out. Process that for a bit.

Question about dating as a single Christian man who's looking for a Christian Woman in 2022

2 upvotes · 13 October 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Perhaps, but I'm not sure if this is a fair comparison.

Think about it this way: if God interacts with us a certain way and you have the option of "follow in God's example" or "make up my own way because I'm not sure God wants us to do with others what he does with us" - which option is the safer route?

I get it. There are some things that are unique to God that we simply can't do. I can't create an entire universe, so I can't follow God's example on that issue. Jesus was a carpenter. I can do some woodworking, but it's not my skillset. I don't think we were supposed to "be like Christ" in that particular aspect of our daily lives because there's a mountain of evidence to show that's not what the Bible means.

But if you have an example in God/Christ and an opportunity to live it out or do your own thing, the safer thing is to behave like God did. In the end, when you are before him on Judgment Day, I would much rather say, "I only did what I saw you doing" rather than, "What you did didn't make sense to me and I didn't agree with the comparison, so I'm going to make up my own thing that I think is better."

Still not too comfortable with this. I'll gladly morph her into a better person of course. But to transform her until something she isn't in the sense you'd turn a normal girl into a tattooed, chain-smoking degenerate.

There's a principle of philosophy that's well-accepted: everybody is constantly changing everyone else around them. The very fact of our existence in someone's conscious awareness has an impact on their lives. This principle is so broadly accepted that the show Girl Meets World declared it in multiple episodes to be the meaning of life ("people change people" is their exact wording). There's two directions to take from here, assuming we're agreed that you will influence people just by existing around them, whether you like it or not (if you want to debate that point, I'm sure there are a number of people who would be willing to engage - I might, if I have time).

FIRST: "transform her into something she isn't"

Who's to say who she "is" in the first place? God, of course. If you do find someone who is a "tattooed, chain-smoking degenerate," do you think God wants that for them. Do you think that is, on an identity-level, who God designed her to be? So if that's who she "is" today, wouldn't it be God's desire that someone help her change out of that?

From there, presuming you're a godly man, don't you think the things you look for in a spouse are going to be more godly than where she is now? Sure, you're absolutely not going to be perfect. You will have expectations of a prospective spouse that will not be godly, however subtle or grand they may be. But if your model, after doing the best you can to seek God's wisdom, for what you're looking for in a wife is coming from a set of expectations that are more godly than the upbringing of the world she was raised in (again: assuming we're not talking about someone who's already a mature believer), then even your imperfect set of standards for a spouse will be better than where she is now. From there, "transforming her into something she isn't" is just a natural part of helping a younger believer (presuming you won't be dating non-believers) become both more godly and a better prospective spouse.

Now, this does change slightly if we shift the conversation to non-sin-based differences. If she likes super hero movies and you're more into spy thrillers ... is it fundamentally wrong to teach her to learn to enjoy spy thrillers with you? That's changing her. She didn't originally like spy thrillers. She is developing new tastes and interests because of you. Is that wrong? And what if you learn to enjoy super hero movies with her? My uncle loves hot sauce. Intensely. It's one of his life passions, looking for new ones and burning his tongue in different flavors. He couldn't stand coffee though. I don't blame him. Coffee is also disgusting to me. His wife was the reverse: 5 cups of coffee a day, but she couldn't handle the heat of hot sauce. They made a deal: she'd learn to eat hot sauce for him, he'd learn to drink coffee for her. They did this for so long that he now drinks coffee on his own, even without her - and she puts hot sauce on her food, even when he's not around. They have both changed into something they weren't before. Are you suggesting this is somehow evil or immoral to expect to change things about your prospective spouse?

SECOND: to influence others or not?

Simply put, with all the bad influences in the world, if you are trying to be like Jesus, shouldn't you invite others to be more like you as you become like Christ? For reference, this is exactly what Paul says in ...

- 1 Cor. 11:1 - "Be imitators of me, as I am of Christ."
- 1 Cor. 4:16 - "Therefore, I urge you to imitate me."
- Philippians 3:17 - "Join one another in following my example, brothers, and carefully observe those who walk according to the pattern we set for you."
- 1 Thessalonians 1:6 - "And you became imitators of us and of the Lord when you welcomed the message with the joy of the Holy Spirit, in spite of your great suffering."
- 2 Thessalonians 3:7-9 - "For you yourselves know how you ought to imitate us ... we wanted to offer ourselves as an example for you to imitate."

You're going to influence/change people whether you like it or not. Best to do it intentionally to something productive rather than passively. It should be no surprise that the enemy frequently uses our passivity against us, as he did in Eden.

I get that many people are nervous and say, "I'm not an apostle, so I can't call someone to be like me." That's bologna. Hebrews 13:7, for example, says, "Remember your leaders, those who spoke to you the word of God. Consider the outcome of their way of life, and imitate their faith." This is an apostle explicitly passing that command of imitation down to others.

From there, someone could argue, "But I'm not a leader, so I shouldn't be calling others to imitate my faith or how I live it out in my own life." Then don't get married because that, de facto, makes you a leader. And if you agree that you should be a leader of your wife and children, then that also means you have an obligation to invite your wife to imitate you.

Question about dating as a single Christian man who's looking for a Christian Woman in 2022

2 upvotes · 9 October 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Then the RMV checklist posted here is useless:

That checklist isn't an "all or nothing" thing. You don't have to have every single criteria met. It's just things guys should be thinking about before committing the rest of their lives to someone.

So, if she isn't Godly, then does that mean she's not Christian or just not a devout Christian as she should be? Could that mean she's still saved and not yet Godly? Or does that mean she's outright secular/agnostic-atheist?

When a non-believer becomes a Christian they are "born again." They're infants at first, not mature. They are not yet "godly" in the practical sense of the word. As someone grows in their faith, they grow in godliness. From there the word "godly" is fairly arbitrary in how it's used and where that line is. Personally, I wouldn't call someone "godly" if they are not actively sharing their faith with others. "Good at avoiding sin"? Sure. "Knowledgeable"? Sure. But "Godly"? If they're not participating in God's purpose to build his Kingdom on Earth, no.

Godliness means someone is "like God." Jesus showed us what it means to be "like God" as a human. Jesus spent his entire ministry building a Kingdom and he told those who were trying to be like him to do the same (i.e. the great commission). You can't claim to be like Jesus (i.e. "godly") if you're not living out the purposes of Jesus in your own life. Simply "avoiding sin" or "learning a lot about the Bible" or "having good emotions toward God" are useful, but drastically miss the point of why we're here on earth in the first place.

I'd rather have her be attractive from the start

Sure. Just remember that "beauty is fleeting." In the end, if you're marrying someone BECAUSE of their attractiveness, you're going to be disappointed at some point down the line. I can't count the number of people who were extremely fit, great facial features, etc. and were drop-dead gorgeous on their wedding day ... then I see them again 3-5 years later and they're plump and clearly haven't bothered to put in much effort toward looking good. Don't be surprised. If you're marrying someone for their looks, you're going to have issues. Yes, looks matter. Just be prepared that they can also change.

Because its almost like molding her into a whole different person than the one I met. That I like a certain version of her that I want her to become, but isn't that way right now.

Isn't this what God does with us, though? We're only following in his example. He finds us as sinners. Does he say, "I love you exactly as you are. Don't change. Keep being a sinner forever because I love you as you are"? No. He says, "I care of you despite who you are, and I will help you change to be sanctified into the person I desire you to be." That's God's plan for us. And if we want to be with him, we must embrace this. If we refuse to allow God to sanctify us or cleanse us from our sins, are we actually saved and do we get to be with him in a covenantal relationship at that level? In the same way, if a woman isn't willing to adjust her life to you, why should you think it appropriate that you somehow have to deal with it and marry her and live with her for the rest of your life anyway, even though she has openly told you she refuses to conform to the standards you're looking for in a wife? That's not to say you need to become some tyrant who's overly nit-picky about every single detail of her character. It's just to say that you expect her to become a better person over time, and that you will help her do this.

And this isn't a slant against women. You're expected to do exactly the same. 1 Cor. 11:3 says that just as Christ follows God, so are men to follow Christ, and women follow their husbands. The same way you can have standards about who you marry, and that your wife has an obligation to work to meet those standards, so also does God have standards and expectations on you and he expects you to work to meet those standards. Just God helps us meet those standards through the Holy Spirit, so also will you have to help your prospective wife. And just as God is gracious and forgiving when we prove imperfect, having died for us to show the extent of his willingness to deal with our failure to abide by his standards, so also are you to be gracious toward your wife, willing to bear the burden of her failures on yourself ... once you have chosen to take on the role of husband in her life (never confuse the line between your biblical obligations as a "boyfriend" v your biblical obligations as a "husband").

Most women want the man she's with to love her for who she currently is and that includes physical appearance and personality caveats.

Obviously women want that. Who wouldn't? But this is a silly idea. People change, whether they like it or not. Overall, statistics show that women, on a personality/character/interests level, tend to change way more than men over time. But even more to the point, the whole "love me for who I am today" is another way of saying, "Never expect better from me."

Think of it in the context of a company. Not an ideal parallel, but bear with me. If you got hired for a job, imagine how you'd feel if the boss said, "However you're performing today, on day 1 of your position here, I never expect you to improve or to do any better. You're free to perform as adequately or inadequately as you do today for the entire rest of your career." As an employee, would you want that job? Absolutely! That's a free ride. But do you think a company like that will succeed? Absolutely not! As an employee, you have the ability to leave that job and find a better one on a whim if the ship starts sinking (i.e. parallel to divorce/remarriage). As Christians, divorce/remarriage isn't a biblical option, but for the secular crowd the whole "take me exactly as I am" concept makes sense because they can enter a marriage with an easy "no expectations on me" ride, and if it doesn't work out because a leader who has no expectations is destined to sink the ship ... well, they just divorce and hop onto another ship. Among Christians, women have to be way more careful that they are following a leader who is actually going to thrive. Nobody wants to commit themselves to a leader who makes poor decisions, and having zero expectations of improvement from those who you are meant to steward and lead is a massive sign that you will fail as a husband.

Again, that's not to say you become some obnoxious tyrant who makes perfectionist demands. You communicate expectations, help those you lead to live up to them, and have significant grace when they can't, bearing the burden and responsibility of their failures on yourself, just as Christ did for you.

It's my mission to live a Christian life, have a Christian family with an attractive wife and children whilst helping my fellow Christians bring more people back to Jesus via evangelizing and discipleship. So, it is partly my mission. :)

Hmm ... I think that's significantly different from what you originally posted as your mission ;)

Question about dating as a single Christian man who's looking for a Christian Woman in 2022

2 upvotes · 8 October 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Extremely black pilling...

Eh, I think you're misusing the word "black pill" here. Black pill is more about whether or not your own looks preventing women from showing any interest in you, and the hopelessness associated with that.

Genetics matter, especially to me which is why I vet them based on this too. Hence why I'm not willing to settle.

Sure, so that affects the "attractiveness" quality. But personality is mostly non-genetic. Although it has genetic traits, it's more a product of how you're raised in the home. Likewise, godliness is absolutely not a genetic trait. These are learned behaviors. So, the only one you're not going to compromise here is that you want someone physically attractive on a genetic level (i.e. someone who doesn't need better clothes, better hair style, weight-loss programs, etc. to become physically attractive). But even then, people with good genetics can still turn out quite unattractive if they let themselves fall into it. This is clear from the countless movie actors who have great genetic traits, but still have candid shots that show how "blah" they look when they're not on set, or how if they gain weight for a role, they look as normative and unattractive as most people. I wouldn't put too much stock into the "genetics are everything" black pill nonsense.

some things aren't teachable e.g. genetics

Again, you're technically correct. But genetics related to "attractiveness" are only one component of attractiveness. Someone can be highly attractive even with bad natural genetics.

Now, if you're not interested in "attraction genetics," and you're instead focusing more on making sure there's no history of cancer, heart disease, high blood pressure, etc., etc. - that's a different matter, and those are things that probably cannot be overcome by qualities that are, in fact, teachable.

That's fine. If she's Christian, attractive and FAST, then I'm good. I'm still on my way to Godliness, but I hope to have a wife who will come join me along the way. :D

Glad to hear it, brother :) You've moving in the right direction with this!

Question about dating as a single Christian man who's looking for a Christian Woman in 2022

2 upvotes · 8 October 2022 · /r/RPChristians

That means that my prospects ... are extremely low

Relevant:

https://www.reddit.com/r/TrueChristian/comments/3s17lr/do_dedicated_christian_women_still_exist_out_there/cwtr1hu/

I agree that the prospects are generally really low if you're in "I'm going to find someone ready-made" mode.

I mean, this rule's essentially asking men to settle for less in terms of physical attraction in favor of the other two attributes

Not at all. I think you're missing the point, which I'm going to get really repetitive on. The point of the 2 of 3 (or 3 of 4) rule is that you aren't likely to find someone "ready-made" in the first place, leading to the conclusion that you're better off helping someone grow and develop in these areas.

While the 2 of 3 rule may apply as to those particular traits, it does NOT apply to the FAST qualities. There are lots of people who meet all 4. Find a FAST person and you can overcome the lacking in any of the "2 of 3" traits.

Personally, I think of the 3, godliness is the easiest to develop in a FAST person. If someone has the S and is truly saved, the Holy Spirit bends them toward sanctification and growth in pursuing Christ, so you already have that advantage working for you. You just have to be open to God using you to be the vehicle that helps them move forward along the path.

Training someone to become physically attractive is much more difficult. Doable, but difficult. You might be working against certain genetic qualities. It could be a financial burden (new wardrobe, hair styling, etc.). People also tend to take their personal appearance more personal than they do the fact that they need to grow in Christ. Most women will very readily acknowledge, "I'm not perfect and I can do a lot to improve in my faith," but very few will take a similarly proactive approach to changing their personal appearance, even if they are teachable on the issue.

Likewise, if it's a personality issue, very few people will admit that they have a defect in their personality. It's too personal, and because it's often not distinctly related to obvious sin or spiritual growth failings (for which there's a far more objective standard), most people would rather say, "This is just who I am" than admit, "You're right, I probably need to work on this" - and without that objective biblical standard to "prove" that they're wrong on the point, it becomes just a matter of personal preference.

To be clear, I've had to make personal improvements in all of these areas, myself. I had fundamental personality defects that I had to overcome - things that weren't sinful, but were interfering with my relationships nonetheless, including with my wife. I also had serious attractiveness problems. I was overweight, dressed poorly, had no muscle, horrible haircut, etc. I've also constantly had to work on issues of godliness throughout my life, and continue to strive in growth in these areas. Suggesting that you can help a woman grow in these areas toward becoming a better potential spouse isn't a crude or inappropriate suggestion. If anything, it would be sexist to say, "I as a man can overcome these things, but a woman can't." If she can, and you see potential in her and care about her, it can only be a good idea for you to want to help her work on these things. And if, as she improves, she becomes someone you want to marry, you can propose. All of this can occur in the context of inviting others, including women, to join you in your mission from Christ to make disciples ... if that were your mission ;)

Question about dating as a single Christian man who's looking for a Christian Woman in 2022

2 upvotes · 6 October 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Are there still attractive Christian women out there who aren't egotistical via being corrupted by their beauty and secular world, but instead remain faithful/devout and true to Christ? If so, where would a man like me be able to find them?

Sure, these women are all around. You just have to remember that the more attractive a woman is, the higher degree of temptation there will be for her to abandon her faith for worldly passions. Unattractive women don't get many men pining over them with love and attraction, so there will be a lot of women who "aren't egotistical via being corrupted by their beauty and secular world" and who "remain faithful/devout and true to Christ" because the temptation is low. The more attractive a woman gets, the greater that temptation gets, which increases the number of people who will fall away. Not everyone, but this is just basic common-sense. Put yourself in their shoes. Imagine you were a total stud and had super-model caliber women trying to sleep with you all the time, constantly pressuring you to have sex outside of marriage, compromising your faith. I don't know how high your self-control is, but most guys would admit that they'd cave. Now knock yourself down several pegs and imagine you're a pimple-faced video game geek and women show no interest in you. Pretty easy to stay "faithful/devout and true to Christ" in the face of this non-temptation, right?

Again, there are plenty of attractive women out there who "aren't egotistical" or "corrupted" and who "remain faithful/devout and true to Christ." They exist. But in many cases, they are still very young and new to the faith. Another point of common-sense is that the most attractive women will find relationships the fastest, so they're harder to find single. This goes double in the church for attractive women who are also godly. Because of how quickly and easily such women can find men who are interested in them, you're either going to have to be in the right relational network and right place at the right time to meet someone and "hit it off" who hits your ideal (i.e. the "unicorn"), which is rare ... or you find someone who is willing to learn and grow alongside you into the level of "non-egotism" "non-corruption" "faithfulness/devoutness" and "trueness to Christ" that you're looking for. In short, I always tell men not to look for unicorns, but to make them. Nobody is perfect. Unicorns don't actually exist. But by discipling a woman who is passionately drawn to serving Christ alongside you, it's very possible that God can help her grow into becoming a unicorn, using you as the vehicle to do it. Just practice prudence and caution along the way and remember that she has the charge: "Daughters of Jerusalem, do not awaken love before it so desires" - meaning you may have to be patient.

Red Pill Christianity

2 upvotes · 6 October 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Hi there. The topic of "Red Pill can be integrated into Christianity" has already been beaten to death here, so I won't rehash that other than to say we aren't integrating anything. We're merely showing where the overlap exists, especially as it stands in contrast to the things mass-culture promulgates.

What I'm more interested in is where you say:

Purpose breaks down into particularities and is different for everyone: someone can be a fireman, an artist, a lawyer - we all have different purposes

I used to conflate "career" and "purpose" too. It's assume your career is your purpose because you spend so much time in it and it often-times derives from your talents and gives a pressure to create your identity around it.

As Christians, our identity is in Christ and our purpose is the one he gave us: "Go, therefore, and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and teaching them to obey everything I have commanded you." That's our purpose. It is not different for every person. It is singular, as Paul says in Philippians 2, "Make my joy complete by being like-minded, having the same love, being one in Spirit and purpose."

Now, that doesn't mean we don't have unique angles for making disciples. We do. That comes from our spiritual gifts, mainly - though talents, hobbies, career skills, etc. can all funnel in as well. Someone who is spiritually gifted as a teacher will find people to disciple among his students, but must still learn how to show them mercy, practice hospitality, model strength of faith, shepherd them, etc., even if those are not their gifts. Likewise, someone spiritually gifted in hospitality may use their home as an opportunity to invite others over who will eventually be discipled - but they must still be willing and able to teach them, pray with them, help them, exhort them, encourage them, etc., even if those aren't technically their gifts. If we add in career paths, it just means plumbers may have opportunities to share Christ with others who have leaky pipes, or lawyers may find people in need of legal help who are also in need of help following Christ to disciple. You don't disciple someone by being their lawyer, but being their lawyer could very well provide you an opportunity to disciple them.

Christ knew and lived his purpose with impeccability. He said, "For this purpose I have come!"

Absolutely! And he also told us what purpose he would give to anyone who claims to be his follower: "Come, follow me, and I will make you fishers of men." This was the very beginning of his ministry. The entirety of his ministry was showing him how to do that. In his last supper before his death and resurrection, he taught repeatedly the importance of their fulfilling this mission. Even after he died, at his ascent his final words were to "make disciples of all nations." In every step of his path with the 12, he was passing on the purpose that we ought to become "fishers of men" for His Kingdom :)

When we live our purpose, we live a life that mirrors Christ

Yes - but only if our purpose also mirror's Christ's purposes. Christ's purpose was to build a Kingdom set apart for God. He did this first through his death and resurrection so that Kingdom could exist at all, and second through discipling those nearest to him so they could, in turn, disciple others as the "firstfruits" (as Paul calls them) of the Kingdom he was building, which we now call the Church (capital C). The "For this purpose have I come" verse you quoted is in John 12. If you keep reading clear on through 12:32, just a few verses later, you see the conclusion of that purpose: "And I, when I am lifted up from the earth, will draw all people to myself." That was his purpose. And our purpose, as given by Him, is to draw others to Him also. That purpose must be what "mirrors Christ."

Overall, good thoughts. I'm glad to see you thinking about these things. Just some little nudges here on further ways to expand on some of the ideas you started.

Smash The Overton Window

2 upvotes · 30 July 2022 · /r/RPChristians

That's why I don't

Oh, I know. I was agreeing with you. Just emphasizing your point. Great video, haha.

highly literate population of Twilight readers

Nice. Point well taken. You're just not talking about literacy anymore.

Normal is the new radical

Right. I think we talked about this on one of the podcasts on the topic of "reactionary politics" or something like that.

Smash The Overton Window

2 upvotes · 30 July 2022 · /r/RPChristians

As I recall, OZ interprets "make disciples of all nations" to mean that the national, corporate entity is "discipled." I interpret Jesus as saying, "What I just did with you for the past few years, go do that with people throughout the whole world."

The pragmatic difference is that my work, then focuses on the individual. Politics is a hobby interest that brushes shoulders with moral responsibility, but not a biblical imperative. For OZ, politics is a biblical mandate. I'm not sure where he stands on one-on-one (or even micro-group) discipleship, which is what I take to be the biblical mandate.

u/osmiumzulu - am I representing you fairly?

No, it's not okay.

2 upvotes · 27 July 2022 · /r/RPChristians

This comment is the definition of malicious interpretation.

BPD wife - I need a miracle from God

2 upvotes · 20 April 2022 · /r/RPChristians

This is wrong. They will not "return to some semblance of normal SOON." If there's going to be a change, it will take lots of time and years of therapy. You have to make the decision now if you're in it for the long-haul to get her help or if you're out the door. There is no "soon" when it comes to borderlines.

Very Basic "2-2 Dinner Party" Social Skills

2 upvotes · 26 February 2022 · /r/MarriedRedPill

That's a Wisconsin thing? My brother and I do those here too. Good stuff.

Very Basic "2-2 Dinner Party" Social Skills

2 upvotes · 26 February 2022 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I agree in principle. But people have also quoted me 3 times this week without me even realizing I was the one who said it. So, sometimes people remember things you say too :p

Abundance Fatigue and "The Meaning of Life"

2 upvotes · 23 February 2022 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Agreed.

Fixing Your OYS - Your Life Will Keep Sucking Until You Read and Apply This Post

2 upvotes · 23 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

This could be a low-testosterone issue, but I'm not so quick to jump on that bandwagon.

I have found through personal experience that an abundance mentality can (not always "will") have an "I've taken this too far" effect where the previously unattainable becomes so easy and commonplace (i.e. actual abundance, beyond just the abundance mentality) that it no longer holds value to you.

Women do this all the time. They have an abundance of male attention. Women don't get wet from male attention anymore the way a female-attention-starved male will get hard every time a woman talks to him. Abundance can turn a previously rare and valuable commodity into swag.

Imagine if a meteorite storm hit earth containing 10x the amount of gold as exists on the whole planet right now. Would the price of gold go up, stay the same, or hit rock-bottom prices with the sudden influx of free/cheap gold? That's what abundance can do to a person.

If you say that "I approach out in public ... Talking to a girl I am genuinely attracted to is not the issue," what's the chance that the game has become too easy for you (or at least that you have the perception that it's too easy) to the point where you don't see women as a valuable commodity in your life?

That's not a bad perception, by the way. I wouldn't fight against it. If anything, I'd encourage it. I don't think you're in a "bad" or "harmful" situation. Leverage it for the Gospel, 1 Cor. 7-style.

Own Your Shit Weekly - December 07, 2021

2 upvotes · 9 December 2021 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Speaking of vague - did you see his mission? This guy has no clue what he wants out of life yet. Can't improve much if you don't know what you're improving into. That's where he needs to start.

Sexual needs in deadbedroom

2 upvotes · 14 October 2021 · /r/RPChristians

What do Christinians red pillers do when there's no sex?

This is an oxymoron. While it's vaguely possible in some remote parallel universe, your wife is not a special snowflake. If you were a "red piller" you'd be getting sex. It's as simple as that. So, there's no scenario where a Christian is a "red piller" but not getting sex.

More to your original post, /u/UpTanks has some great comments here, so I won't push too much further. The main thing I'll toss out in addition is this:

- Because you're committed to remaining a non-Christian, your wife will never respect or follow your life mission.

A bad tree cannot produce good fruit (Matthew 7). Her mission in life is to produce good fruit (Matthew 28:19-20, John 15, etc.). While she has an obligation to remain with you and not divorce you (1 Peter 3, 1 Cor. 7), without a respect for your mission, her respect for YOU as a man will also be non-existent. As a result, her attraction to you can only be made up by an excessive abundance of the non-mission-oriented traits, which is difficult because mission is the primary source from which all those other traits flow. You can have those traits by committing equally to a non-Christian mission, and you will become naturally more attractive as a byproduct, but because she knows it's all built on a foundation of sand rather than rock, it's unclear (and I presume ad hoc rather than a broad-based rule we could give in all scenarios) whether she will ever overcome the cognitive dissonance between a physical desire for you (if you otherwise exemplify these mission-derived qualities with great proficiency) and an underlying rejection of your life goals and ambitions.

At that point, flip a coin and that's about the same odds as guessing right about whether your situation can be solved in your current faith-state. You'll be able to turn her body on because all vaginas are the same, Christian or not ... but her mind is still a powerful agent in the mix and it can just as quickly turn her off.

In your particular scenario, although I despise the concept of divorce, if you are committed to your abandonment of the faith, the most loving thing you can do for her and the kids is to walk away in a context where you remain an involved father, but allow her to raise them in the Christian faith. The most beneficial thing for your own purposes would be to remain in the marriage in order to optimize the possibility that your heart may soften to the faith again someday in the future, even though you don't foresee that as a possibility now - and IF that comes true, that would be the best scenario for both your wife and your children.

If your hangup is your personal past trauma, that's something that can be worked through. But I can empathize with your skepticism on that ground, so I won't push that button here.

Reading through the guide and having some trouble, can someone help me out?

2 upvotes · 14 October 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed. /u/bekfastinbed - studies have been shown that women are more aroused by a muscular guy with extra lbs over a thin guy who has no muscular build to him.

Sometimes I resent my pregnant wife because of her past

2 upvotes · 15 September 2021 · /r/RPChristians

1 Timothy 5:14 - "So I would have younger widows marry, bear children, manage their households, and give the adversary no occasion for slander."

Those men they ought to marry gotta come from somewhere. Broadly, though, I agree with you. Widow isn't a "high priority" wife candidate. But I don't see why it should be a deal-breaker either. That said, there are certainly the "wrong kind" of widow that the passage talks about too, so a guy's still gotta be wise about who he considers.

Anyone want to explain how this post is right/wrong? And in what ways? I'm new to RP and still learning what it's all about...

2 upvotes · 7 August 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Solid.

Conversation Strategies You Won't Find in WISNIFG

2 upvotes · 6 August 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I can get behind all of this. But the "be overt and direct" strategy is not always the best one, and even when it is best it only works for guys who have the frame to pull it off. That's more for communicating plans and expectations, not long term character build and development.

Christian Plate Spinning (Part 2)

2 upvotes · 5 August 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Having an affair as a Christian means you have a weak frame and no business trying to spin plates at that point anyway.

To be clear: if you're a Christian, part of your frame will naturally evolve as you are sanctified toward Christ-likeness to a rejection of infidelity. If you're already there, then having an internal stance of being against infidelity would require you to be weak in order to cave to temptations toward infidelity. If your frame is weak enough that you'd do that, then it's weak enough that you should be focusing on strengthening your frame before working on spinning plates.

From there, if you do have that frame and infidelity isn't a concern for you, then "spinning plates" is just a matter of building abundance - to know that you are the prize and that you are desirable in the world. Once you have that abundance, you don't need to build it anymore and there's no need to spin plates on a sexual dynamic level unless you feel like it just for fun.

There is still value in having female friends, especially if some of these women will be helpful to you in your mission.

The Image You Reflect

2 upvotes · 13 April 2021 · /r/RPChristians

One of the dangers of red pill Christianity I see is that it tricks many men into thinking they have arrived at their sanctification, not realizing that you never arrive until you are dead and raised to life anew

Yeah, I'm not aware of many Nazarenes around here who buy into total sanctification. If anything, the RPC concept of OYS shows that even the most mature and experienced people are still working on making progress. None of us have 'arrived,' and if you see someone who seems to pretend otherwise, let us know.

For that matter, even though I founded RPC, I've still consistently reported my struggles in my OYS and had to issue a public confession of ways that I made mistakes on the discord. This is necessary - and it's important, especially as a leader, to model these things for others to see and follow. So, I'm not sure where you're getting this characterization from.

However, I think in light of our works being filthy rags ...

I have been seeing this and other similar passages being misused lately, as if to assume that these are true of the believer. Isaiah 64:6 is the verse you're referencing - "all our righteous deeds are like a polluted garment." But clip-quoting the passage gives the wrong impression that it's applicable to believers. Let's broaden it:

- Behold, you were angry, and we sinned; in our sins we have been a long time, and shall we be saved? We have all become like one who is unclean, and all our righteous deeds are like a polluted garment. We all fade like a leaf, and our iniquities, like the wind, take us away. There is no one who calls upon your name, who rouses himself to take hold of you; for you have hidden your face from us, and have made us melt in the hand of our iniquities.

This is clearly talking about an unbeliever. There's another way we can confirm this: because Paul quotes this exact passage in Romans 3 in reference to unbelievers, reaching his final conclusion that "all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God." As such, the passage is saying that trying to earn God's favor through good deeds is no better than trying to hand a filthy rag to him.

Hebrews 11:6 is more on-point and adds clarity: "And without faith it is impossible to please God." Does that mean our good deeds after we have faith are also impossible to please God? Of course not.

If the "our good deeds are filthy rags" concept applied to believers, how could passages like Philippians 4:18 be true, where Paul says, "I am well supplied, having received from Epaphroditus the gifts you sent, a fragrant offering, a sacrifice acceptable and pleasing to God"? So either our good deeds are (1) filthy rags that God views as a fragrant offering that's acceptable and pleasing to him, or (2) viewed differently by God based on our motivations - the believer doing things because we love Him, the unbeliever doing it selfishly to earn something from him. Whichever your view is, the result is the same: for believers, we certainly have the ability to do good things that are pleasing to God without our acts being detested the way filthy rags would be.

Now, what I think you're getting at here is that there will always be some minor degree of taint in our motives - that we will never be exactly 100% pure in our motives. And that may be correct. But it may not be either. That precludes the possibility that we ever act in a manner led by the Spirit, as the Spirit is the one who influences and affects our motives. I used to think the same way - that God uses us despite ourselves. Now, having studied the Scriptures further, I'm of the view that God does things through ourselves because of His Spirit's ability to use us and transform us. No, we will never be perfect indefinitely. But we can have moments of perfect intent while influenced by the Spirit - otherwise Scripture itself would be condemned by the same measure of taint that you might argue is "unavoidable." Yet we say it is inspired and infallible because we believe God was able to inspire the authors through their own motives - not that the Spirit controlled their bodies to write each pen stroke, but that God so moved in their hearts that their writings were completely and irrefutably aligned with God's will. And if God did it then, why would we believe he would be any less active in us today when his Word says the opposite - that we would do even greater things?

I don't think our motivation/"who we're doing it for" has really changed that much

For some, I'm sure that's true. But it also seems like the same skepticism that I've heard from non-believers. One friend noted recently that "my wife doesn't believe any true Christians actually exist - people who actually love God. She thinks everyone does it for selfish motives because they think it'll get them into heaven, and nobody is actually pure in their motive. And if every believer is tainted by their own selfishness, then the whole thing is a sham."

The reality is that there are lots of believers who have transcended this obvious plateau. Yes, some are stuck there - many, even. But Paul writes in Romans 9:3, "For I could wish that I were cursed and cut off from Christ for the sake of my people" - that is, that he could wish to go to hell so that others he loves could be saved, just as Jesus says, "No greater love has a man than this: that he would lay down his life for his brother." In Practice the Presence of God, Brother Lawrence says something similar: "Whether I be lost or saved, I will always continue to act purely for the love of God." I have often found myself in the same position at times also. Yes, we can easily fall away, but I do also believe that people can genuinely change in their motivations too - and even with a degree of permanence. But, of course ...

Seeking a wife is a good thing, starting and leading a family is a good thing. You can serve God that way. But of course it will take your heart away from God at times.

As you'll note, I'm very much on board with this line of thinking. I'm not sure if you've read our sidebar yet, but I wrote two posts titled "Finding the girl you can't keep yourself from banging" with the mid-reveal tag-line "(by not trying to find one)". As I've said a number of times: the goal here is to get guys following God. Most guys can't do that because their relationship/marriage/sexuality problems are so insurmountable in their eyes that they can't focus on anything else. Resolving that problem is one waypoint on a broader journey in following Christ. So, if we can get them moving in that direction, it's not hard to take advantage of that inertia to keep them moving even past that issue toward the bigger, better things God has in store for them.

All of that said, I also strongly agree with everything else /u/UpTanks has said.

Announcement: Red Pill Christians will now exclusively be a male only space

2 upvotes · 25 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

One step ahead of you.

Announcement: Red Pill Christians will now exclusively be a male only space

2 upvotes · 23 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I don't intend to take anything down that was up. It's not a retroactive thing. But I haven't run that by the other mods. Maybe they think differently. I'd be surprised, though.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/17/21)

2 upvotes · 22 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Right. One clarification:

Just a clear indication that you did not enter the contract voluntarily at the time

As a matter of technicality - it's not an indication of this. It's an indication of your belief that you didn't enter into the contract voluntarily. While it may seem a small nuance, it's one that matters at law ;)

Curious how/whether you would reconcile Paul's statement to the WISNIFG/MRP doctrine that "you are the ultimate judge of your own actions."

I don't. Paul is right, Manuel Smith is wrong.

That said, there is still utility for those who are just getting started to learn to be their own judge as a waypoint in moving from others' judgments to God's judgment. So, for the blue pill believers, WISNIFG's point is still a useful lesson (among many, many others that would stand alone even if we were to completely nix this one point), but it's not one we linger on indefinitely.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/10/21)

2 upvotes · 10 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

FYI, you posted this as a general comment, not as a reply to anyone. Who was this addressing?

Own Your Shit Weekly - March 02, 2021

2 upvotes · 9 March 2021 · /r/MarriedRedPill

As /u/brainmeatjuice alluded to, I started RPChristians as a way of bringing order to chaos, so to say. I saw people in TRP and MRP observing God's created world and coming to the same conclusions the Bible predicted they would - conclusions that others have ignored with a blanket default cop-out of "that was just past cultures," not realizing that women haven't changed throughout history. Only their strategies and methods for expressing their nature has.

But just as secular "note-swapping" has its limitations in being focused on the details of anyone particular action, when we see through the Bible what the bigger picture looks like, there's an immense amount of clarity that I don't think can be found elsewhere.

If you have specific questions on what you want to "make sense of all this" about, feel free to let me know.

The problem of guilt

2 upvotes · 24 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

This is the way. Too many people get hung up on wanting to blame other people. Blame is a waste of time. Even if you're right about who to blame, it doesn't solve anything. Even worse: blame, when reasonably placed, makes you feel better about the situation. That feeling placates us so we accept our situation rather than working to improve it.

What does it mean to be "fruitful?"

2 upvotes · 18 February 2021 · /r/askRPC

Jesus started with uneducated nobodies. Paul spent his entire life training to be the exact opposite of what God was creating within the Church. Timothy was very young. No excuses.

You're also thinking within the destinalional fallacy of discipleship. It's not about arriving at a destination. It's about the direction you're going. If you're going the right direction, even if you've only just begun, you can invite others to follow you.

What does it mean to be "fruitful?"

2 upvotes · 18 February 2021 · /r/askRPC

Review my comment history. I have addressed this exact question dozens of times quite thoroughly with references and analysis of the relevant passages. Hint: the answer is "make disciples."

Merry Christmas - I've put together my "Tricks of the Trade for a Fun Frame" list as your present - good ideas for fun during the holidays

2 upvotes · 27 January 2021 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Nice. I've done some variation of all the of these also. Good reminders.

Sectarian issues finding relationships?

2 upvotes · 26 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

You'd be surprised by how many celebrities are beta and blue pill, despite having attractive qualities. The fact that you call it an "alpha facade" and say "no man can keep it up forever" tells me you have no idea what alpha really is.

Children before marriage

2 upvotes · 25 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I think my comment went way over your head. Suffice it to say you're too worked up about this issue and your statements are inconsistent. Take a time out.

Children before marriage

2 upvotes · 25 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

You're very confused and wasting tons of time defending a stupid position. Here's the bottom line:

- To God, Marriage = Covenant + Sex. This has been well established through numerous posts throughout this sub's history. I encourage you to scour back to our early days to find them.

When people marry before a governmental entity, the government requires a covenant. By definition, lawful marriage in virtually every known government and religion requires an exchange of vows (or, in secular terms: agreement to contractual terms). The presumption is that after marrying in any of these other entities, you're also having sex.

In this, covenant + sex exists in any of these other contexts. It's not that marrying before buddha somehow means God sanctions what buddhist priests do. It's that God saw a covenant and he saw sex, so you're married in God's eyes, regardless of the context. The judge, priest, pastor, rabbi, brahman, or whatever are completely unnecessary or incidental to the whole thing. They're useful, but not a requirement.

In this, your conclusion is correct that people who marry in a muslim mosque or even before a priest of atheism are still married in God's eyes. But this whole "the government is established by God" argument is the wrong method of getting to the correct conclusion.

How to vet for virgin woman quickly without wasting time?

2 upvotes · 20 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Eh ... the ORM calculators have been fairly inaccurate for me. They calculate my actual ORM much, much higher than it actually is. For example, I remember using it at one point when I could do 285x5, but capped out at 305 1x. It suggested I could do 320. I did eventually work up to a 315 ORM, but certainly not when I ran the calculator.

Of course, maybe I've just trained my physique and psychology to push higher reps at close-to-max weights than a normal person. That was when I only did max-weights I could handle for 5 reps all the time (i.e. no endurance lifting mixed in).

How to vet for virgin woman quickly without wasting time?

2 upvotes · 20 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

My thoughts exactly.

Great Resources about Marriage, Divorce, and Singleness

2 upvotes · 20 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Right. I removed the post for these and other reasons.

Great Resources about Marriage, Divorce, and Singleness

2 upvotes · 20 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I'm removing this. Generally, rules 4 and 8 (just noticed 8 only references videos - it should be all outside content) don't prohibit this type of post without a clear, detailed analysis of the content on the website and why it's valuable or what you found valuable out of it.

For anyone else who wanders back here, this stuff is as blue pill as they come. I took his quizzes:

- The "affair-proof" quiz asks only about how much room there is for temptation. It doesn't even ask about actual temptation. It certainly doesn't ask about the single most significant factor in all of this (discipleship), much less the second: self-control. How can you assess how high-risk someone is for an affair if you don't ask about self-control?
- The "love" quiz emphasizes the same communication-centric approach to marriage that /u/Deep_Strength already touched on. It mentioned nothing about passion, attraction, sexuality, etc. which are all greater tangible evidences of the bond between a husband and wife. I don't care how well you communicate - if you're lacking these things, you don't have a loving, functional relationship.
- The "marriage communication" quiz assumes both spouses answer to each other equally. This is egalitarianism and it's unbiblical.
- The "marriage health" quiz also pushes the same egalitarian view and only has one question vaguely alluding to sexuality, though "intimacy" could just as well mean deep, heart-felt conversations with each other.

I know countless people on places like r/deadbedrooms who could take these quizzes and score extremely high in marital health, yet who are contemplating divorce. It's all a sham.

Sorry, but even if you do comply with the rules on this one, I'm not going to push this content as relevant to this sub, unless you can show me very clear quotes from his book that demonstrate a more biblical framework than this modern culturally-approved garbage.

Why is the single parent rate rising in the US??

2 upvotes · 13 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Bear in mind that "single parent household" in stats includes divorced couples with co-parenting arrangements. The stereotypical "single parent" is the mom whose boyfriend ran out on her and wants nothing to do with the kid. The far more common reality is that dad is fighting for equal rights with the kids and mom is doing everything she can to keep him out of the picture, then she goes around complaining how she's a single mom and the kid's dad is a deadbeat and she needs the world to sympathize with her.

In a technical sense, they're "single" and they're "mothers," but when you have a co-parenting arrangement and the other parent is active and involved, it's hardly what we think of when the image of single parents is "I'm raising these kids all by myself."

There are a lot of legit single moms out there too. But in all my time doing custody cases, I find the legit cases to be EXTREMELY rare. Like ... in over 10 years, I've only seen 3 cases where the other parent was totally uninterested and uninvolved kind of rare.

Getting your wife back after a separation

2 upvotes · 13 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Deciding to divorce is impulsive.

This is a joke, right? Very rarely do I find my clients taking divorce lightly or impulsively. This sounds like you're just making things up out of your butt to justify your position.

I do agree that there are some who file just as a threat. And maybe a couple of my 11+ were still living together. But the vast majority of my clients are already separated at the time of coming to me - sometimes in an apartment, other times with family.

Getting your wife back after a separation

2 upvotes · 12 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Eh, I've said my peace. If you want to keep DEERING your way out of learning today, maybe you'll get it tomorrow.

Marriage is a disaster and I'm not sure where to go...

2 upvotes · 12 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Gotcha. I'd avoid using those terms interchangeably. Words have to keep their appropriate meaning or else we end up in the same craziness liberals create when they start redefining words. ;)

From what I can tell, the most accurate statement would be: "I don't know if he's red pill or not - probably not. But he does come off as alpha." Alpha and red pill aren't the same.

Getting your wife back after a separation

2 upvotes · 12 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Amen.

Marriage is a disaster and I'm not sure where to go...

2 upvotes · 12 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

The biggest problem you have is your mission is STILL based around your wife. You said you don't need a woman for that, but it's still based on healing which has her at the center.

Bingo. Nuff said. When he gets past this point, I'll weigh in.

Has anybody read rollo's book on red pill and religion?

2 upvotes · 11 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Would you suggest it to someone whose faith has been a little shaky lately?

I would not. From the way he talked in precursors announcing the book, his views probably aren't all that different from my own, but he definitely takes it from the perspective of a secular red pill man looking at religion - not as someone from within evaluating our own. As a result, there's bound to be lots of condemnation. The book is high on my priority list to get through soon.

How to prevent or assess sexual incompatibility in a potential wife?

2 upvotes · 26 December 2020 · /r/askRPC

I was an avid disciple-maker at the time we met. But even though this expression of maturity was present, I believe she was ignorant of biblical criteria for maturity and she likely assessed my maturity on more superficial things that can be faked to give an appearance of maturity, like the fact that I was the worship leader in our organization, on the leadership team, she said I was the first person she'd ever met who knew the Bible better than her, and I was extremely well respected by other believers.

How to prevent or assess sexual incompatibility in a potential wife?

2 upvotes · 25 December 2020 · /r/askRPC

I was told by a professional that vaginismus is psychosomatic. Solve the psychological factors and it goes away. When she desires sex, the anxiety about it greatly diminishes, and when that desire is consistent over several months, the anxiety completely withers away altogether. Vaginismus cured. Apparently doctors who treat it are trying to figure out the physical condition, hence all the unknowns. Many therapists/counselors who run across it never conquer the blue pill framework that precludes actual desire from forming, thus only focus on willingness as a way to relax anxiety/tension, which doesn't actually solve the problem because conscious effort toward relaxation works against desire, functioning as a distraction (it's an attempt to eradicate certain feelings, whereas desire inherently involves putting feelings on).

How to prevent or assess sexual incompatibility in a potential wife?

2 upvotes · 25 December 2020 · /r/askRPC

Considering that they agree to marry, they are most likely attracted to each other

I wouldn't make that assumption. My wife commented years after we were married: "I was never attracted to you. Not even when we were in dating, or newlyweds, or when you were in great physical shape."

doctrine that you need to get into bodybuilding to build a fancy body that is sexually desirable

That's not right either. TRP emphasizes lifting because it makes PUA easier. But that's ultimately a cessation to a woman's frame - trying to cater to her desires to get sex from her. The purpose of lifting is to give a man the more personal benefits that help him develop self-confidence, increase his energy, and give him a motivation to live out of his own frame and pursue his mission, while earning influence with those around him.

If looks are as critical as the RP/RPC theory claims

You're talking about the black pill. I've written before that looks aren't necessary (as long as you're past a minimal threshold). Rather, looks decide the difficulty level you're playing on when it comes to sexuality. A guy who isn't all that good looking can still do extremely well with women. Owen Cook is a prime example - short, balding, slightly overweight, and on the autism spectrum ... yet dates playmates. More on that here:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/kfv5cl/rp_christians_and_the_black_pill/ggb7uhc/

how could you negotiate sexual incompatibility

I'm more with u/r3dTull1p on this one: sexual incompatibility, by and large, does not exist. What you are suggesting is distinct from "negotiating," though. You can't negotiate desire, but you can evoke it. In the same way, conditions that you call "sexually incompatible" are likely (in most cases) just desire issues which can be resolved through standard biblical living with red pill awareness.

you have to change the shape and size of your dick

Aaah - so what you mean by "sexual incompatibility" is literally parts just not fitting. In that case, this is a FAR less common phenomenon than you might think. I actually used to believe that this was the case with me and my wife for several years. Even after giving birth, she still experienced a tense pain when I'd insert. We talked to people about it and chalked it up to "incompatibility" - that our parts literally just weren't mean to fit together.

Turns out the "physical pain" she experienced was actually psychosomatic. It was a severe case of vaginismus that 100% away as soon as red pill'd myself and desire entered the equation. But while I was unattractive, even with lubrication, the lack of desire created a psychological pain around sexuality and what we thought was a physical incompatibility turned out to be nothing at all. Go figure.

So, I'm not prone to listen to a guy who claims "my bits and pieces don't fit" until after he's been living the RPC life for a few years, has his wife trying to jump his bones regularly, and still suggests it's a legitimate size issue. But women's bits and pieces are generally so stretchy once that desire component is there (and sometimes even without it) that I just don't buy the "it doesn't fit" excuse in most cases. It's a copout. The very existence of "fisting" should prove this because I'm extremely confident that no man's dick is thicker than a fist. And yet if a woman can be stretched and trained to have an entire fist inside of her, I'm sure even an extremely wide-girth penis on a tiny woman can still be worked to fit ... if she wants it to.

Deuteronomy 24

That's in the context of "something indecent." You'll have a hard time convincing me that his dick being too big is her being "indecent." In fact, it's the norm today that most guys prefer a woman with a small/tight hole. Most likely, the verse is referring to him discovering she's not a virgin (but I'd have to look into it more to confirm that).

RPC doesn't really provide an answer for this and it isn't something it should dismiss as non-existent, since it may even be considered a more serious factor than lifting to look good

I disagree, for the reasons above. As stated, I'd want to see a guy RPC'd for a few years - fully internalized, not just "I read it" and apply a thing here or there - before I'd even entertain that conversation. My guess is that most men who think this is an issue will have the same result I did and it won't actually be an issue any longer.

ask a question about this in /r/TrueChristian

I can tell you their answers:

- "I deal with that too. It sucks. No good answers, but I feel for you."
- "Try praying about it."
- "Go see a doctor."
- "Try having non-penetrative sex."

You get the idea ... mostly useless garbage that doesn't actually address the problem.

And yes, this is absolutely an RPC question because I do believe that RPC and its offshoots is the only Christian forum I've seen on reddit that will actually give advice that might possibly solve the issue - unless there are other forums in /u/osmiumzulu's bank of blogs and podcasts that might have more info on the topic that I'm unaware of.

And lastly, to avoid misunderstanding, do not participate in pre-marital sex.

Agreed.

Tag: u/one7thing

Do not be unequally yoked, part two: electric boogaloo.

2 upvotes · 18 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Dang, bro. My heart goes out to you for that one.

I've been robbed before too, but nowhere near as elaborately.

My Kingdom Come

2 upvotes · 18 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I like this. First thought that comes to mind (and this will be more a monologue of thoughts inspired by your post - maybe not directly related): I can't remember the last time I prayed for some of these thigs. Most of my prayer time is just talking about life with God, and if I ask for help, it's in an OYS capacity - "I'm struggling with this. Mind helping me out?" When I make targeted requests, it's usually big stuff - things that seem impossible for me to do with the empowerment he's already given men.

I'm not sure if this is a good or a bad thing. Maybe every now and then I should go back to those types of prayers I used to pray when I was a late-teen. Could be worthwhile.

But off the cuff, asking God to help me with something like getting a filing done in one of my cases would feel like my wife asking me for help washing a pan. She's fully capable of it. I wouldn't have delegated that task to her if I didn't already know she could take care of it. But if she were to ask me to do something like ... I don't know: open a pickle jar - maybe she's legit not strong enough for it.

I remember in my younger years I was really hung up on creating a codependency with God. "I MUST rely on God for EVERYTHING - even the air I breathe, or the fact that I can even breathe at all." At some point I started reading the passages and realized they weren't about creating codependency, but on keeping us from being arrogant by remembering that God has power over us ... you know, the same way many women need to have their egos kept in check by remembering they have a husband over them (hence the point of head coverings).

For me, that codependency created a solipsism in my faith - everything was about me and God, and even when I was doing external ministry, it was to advance a me-and-God feeling rather than an actual commitment to the mission.

So, I read things like, "Behold, I have given YOU authority ... over all the power of the enemy" and "he called the twelve together and gave THEM authority over all demons and to cure diseases" and "if two of you agree on earth about anything they ask, it will be done for them by my Father in heaven" and to Peter, "I will give YOU the keys of the kingdom of heaven." God doesn't want us to be codependent on him. That's the whole reason Jesus left in the first place - "It is better for you that I go," he says. He didn't want us to be codependent on our relationship with him to do what he has delegated and empowered us to do from his authority transferred to us.

So, now I take personal responsibility to wield the authority Jesus gave me in a wise and effective manner, and my prayer with him is conversation about what I'm doing with that authority, not begging for his help on things he's already authorized and empowered me to do.

Like I said ... probably a bit off topic. But that's what comes to mind with a post like this. Good food for thought all the same.

How do you interpret 1 Peter 3:7?

2 upvotes · 16 December 2020 · /r/askRPC

Given that someone else just asked a parallel question today on the discord, I'll just paste my answer there over here also:

QUESTION

@Married I've been taking a look at 1 Peter 3:7. What has it looked like for you to apply "show honor to the woman as the weaker vessel, since they are heirs with you of the grace of life" in a practical sense?

What specific actions have you done which "honor" your wife?

Even though I do not have a wife, I can see how having this understanding will free you up since you no longer have incorrect expectations she cannot fulfill. I read the Colossians passage and combining that with Ephesians it makes more sense.

I also began thinking about why God would create women to be the weaker vessel. One of the possible reasons I thought of is it makes it so the husband can fulfill the Ephesians 5 passage more effectively as well as promoting trust/respect from the wife to the husband which is a reflection of Christ.

ANSWER

having this understanding will free you up since you no longer have incorrect expectations she cannot fulfill

I don't follow. How YOU express honor TO HER shouldn't affect your expectations of how SHE will think/ behave TO YOU. But yes, it's important to know in advance so you can develop a character that behaves biblically by nature rather than having to learn it on the spot once you're married.

why God would create women to be the weaker vessel

Your rationale is circular and overly complicates the matter. Saying, "God made women weaker so men could lead them" begs: why should men lead their wives? "Oh, because they're the weaker vessel who need leadership." When asking why God created men and women that way, the list of possibilities includes that God COULD have made not only women to be stronger, but he could also have even changed Ephesians 5 if he wanted. So, using Ephesians 5 doesn't resonate well.

Instead, the answer is much, much simpler. God designed marriage to parallel his relationship with his people. The Church is weaker than Christ, so God made women weaker than men. Done.

how you have honored your wives in a practical sense

The Bible leaves this open. One man may honor one way, another another. That said, there's a contextual clue in the passage: "as the weaker vessel." If you can figure out how women are weaker, you can figure out the type of honor Paul was referencing. In this situation, my particular expressions include, without limitation:

- Providing - because she's weaker in her ability to maintain mental health through full-time employment
- Protecting - because she's physically weaker
- Being emotionally stable/uplifting - so that she has a rock to stand on when her weak emotions get blown around like a storm
- Leading our family - because she is weaker in her capacity to process and make biblical decisions beyond her own self-thought

In short, the way I honor my wife is by being the type of man who makes her happy to be around. It's not about pedestalizing her as if I am subservient to her needs. It's about living up to the pedestalization that is due me.

Much of this is also addressed in my post on "the comparison game" in the 100 series.

Podcast Debut Today on The Red Pill YouTube channel: Christianity vs. Churchianity

2 upvotes · 19 November 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I initially misread this as basura.

Don't Be Autistic

2 upvotes · 18 November 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Pick one or two concepts a week and apply them before moving on. Also, keep an outline of things you want to practice so you don't forget. Add to it when you learn something new.

The Basics of Female Frame

2 upvotes · 12 November 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I like this as a starting point, though it needs to be re-organized. I'll work something out - but I appreciate adding to the thought-pot.

"Alphas" at gym, "betas" at life

2 upvotes · 25 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Maybe you're at a "cheap" gym and all the successful older people are at "expensive" gyms.

This.

I was at one of the expensive gyms. I ABSOLUTELY knew people 45+ who were jacked and successful. Their college-age kids worked out with them.

I also think /u/ScholarLad is possibly confusing "successful-looking" people with "successful" people. If you assume successful people aren't jacked except in proven cases, like Arnold, then when you see jacked people you assume they're not successful, then you go around questioning: "Where are all the successful jacked people?" It's a self-affirming mentality. Unless OP is going around asking all the jacked people he sees whether or not they make 6 figures, this type of preconceived, stereo-typed observation is useless.

As to OP's original questions, though: I do agree with /u/Deep_Strength that lifting exists to achieve certain goals in life. Once you're achieving those goals, you switch to maintenance rather than growth. If you find you're slipping and your goals are dipping, then get back to gripping those weights.

Look at what they do, not what they say

2 upvotes · 24 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

But doesn't that make them liars by default?

No.

If my actions and words are not congruent, wouldn't that make me a liar and untrustable?

Most people believe what they're saying and, therefore, are by definition "not lying." The problem is that they don't realize the incongruencies between their words and actions. That is, they are mistaken about their own motives, behaviors, impulses, etc. People subconsciously disillusion themselves all the time in order to cope with the incongruity between their thoughts and their feelings - or what they want and what they wished they wanted, and therefore they repress their actual desires from conscious thought to the degree that they only come out in the form of behavior.

Or is it only women who are not consciously aware of RP concepts that we need to observe this way, where as a feminine RP woman will not be this way?

There are degrees. But on the whole, regardless of how feminine or honest she may be, when it comes to how her vagina works, there's a good chance sexually successful men will have better advice than she will.

I think if someone says 1 thing and does another, they are not congruent in their being and are untrustable.

Untrustable insofar as their incongruencies are concerned. But if they're not being intentionally deceptive, they can generally be reliable where their behaviors and words are consistent.

A letter my Fiance wrote me after I began implementing the red pill threatening to leave?

2 upvotes · 6 October 2020 · /r/askMRP

The theology of mutual submission is wrong. That's called egalitarianism and it's unbiblical. It's based on forced and obvious misreadings of Ephesians 5.

I also don't agree with the whole "duty" concept of marriage. This is based on complementarianism, which sounds biblical to many because it appropriately teaches headship (man = leader; wife = follower), but it mixes in other roles that aren't found in the Bible, making it ultimately an extra-biblical view of marriage (possibly even unbiblical). Specifically, complementarians assign certain "duties" to husbands and wives that the bible doesn't. These can be either physical tasks (husband mows the lawn; wife folds the laundry) or categories (husband provides finances; wife helps around the home) or even relational paradigms (when raising kids, husband is the disciplinarian; wife is the comforter/nurturer).

In my post No, Your Congregation Doesn't Preach "Biblical Headship", I address these and note that a man is free to set his own paradigms for how his marriage is run. If you want to be the stay-at-home dad while she works, go do it. If you want to make her mow the lawn while you fold laundry, go for it. If you want to nurture the kids and she be the disciplinarian - or even that you both do both (my preference) - that's your call. The guy sets the framework for the marriage, the wife is to operate in it.

The problem you're facing is that your fiance doesn't know what your frame is or how to operate in it, and as a result she doesn't want to. Sure, there have been some good shared memories that have caused her to want to figure out more of who you are and what it would be like married to you. So, she asks questions that she THINKS are important and gets answers she doesn't like, so she's questioning whether she really wants to commit to your framework at all.

As for dealing with the blue pill content she's ingesting, dealing with it is extremely simple: "They're wrong. Let's open the Bible and see what it actually says. If you think they're right about something, show me the passage you think proves it, and we'll talk about it." Use it as an opportunity NOT to defend your position, but TO teach her your position. Let her choose if she's willing to embrace your position or not. But for the love of God and her love of you: be fun while you do it.

Of course, this approach assumes you actually know your stuff ahead of time. Read the RPC sidebar for the biblical foundation of many things you'll read on the red pill forums.

How important is context to communicating mission?

2 upvotes · 21 September 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Working on the weight loss/working out. Not a part of my mission.

I used to say the same thing. I used to also say things like, "Doing house chores isn't part of my mission, so why does MRP put such a big focus on 'maintaining the ship'?" As I matured I realized that's all crazy talk.

People follow attractive people who have their crap together. Nobody wanted to be disciplined by me when I was a 35% slob. As I developed my physical appearance (and still going), I noticed my influence among others starting to change as well.

I see lots of Christian in your mission, but ZERO Red Pill not my call beyond incorporating into discipleship efforts

I'm inclined to agree with you here. Contrary to /u/RedPillGlasses' statement, RPC takes the viewpoint that red pill praxeology is merely an observational study of the theological realities already present in Scripture. That is, we're not blending secular red pill with the Bible, as if we must force some mixture between the two. We just take the Bible as it is, which happens to have on its own many of the things observed about human nature in the red pill communities.

Further, because of the observational nature of the red pill, even the secular red pill communities don't demand a guy incorporate "the red pill" into their mission. If a guy wants his mission to involve training a stronger breed of men in the world, the secular red pill would approve. But if he also wants his mission to be making lots of money, the secular red pill would equally approve, as many have done. And the same would go with any other mission, like writing a best-selling novel, or climbing Mt. Everest, or mastering archery. To the red pill, the mission doesn't matter. What matters is whether or not you accurately understand the true nature of the world and women in the way you go about accomplishing your mission, and that the mission is uniquely yours and not the product of external pressure telling you what you should want.

As Christians, the more we are sanctified the more we take on the image of Christ - not from a behavioral modification standpoint, but internally to our own nature. We are literally becoming a new creation, and have already been deemed as such even while still in the process. That new creation, if it is at all becoming like Christ (or else it wouldn't be new), would also involve taking on his mission - not as an external "okay, this is the next thing I have to do to be more like Jesus," but from an internal, "I find myself suddenly wanting to do this, not because the Bible tells me to, but because this passion is just erupting out of me!" way.

In this, "make disciplers" is certainly an appropriate mission, and the only adjustment I'd make from your current mission of "make disciples." Not having the "r" at the end is reflective of a lack of long-term vision. As you note in your post: everything else is just context. Pastoral ministry? That's context. You can make disciplers without being a pastor. Writing? That's just one thing you do to earn credibility and influence so that others see you as someone potentially worth discipling them.

But do work on that weight issue, as it seems you are. I guarantee that the more attractive you become, the greater your influence will grow.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (08/19/20)

2 upvotes · 20 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Stats: 35, 6'0", 18% BF, Married, 1k lb club

Weekly Summary: Crushing it with billing, having great time with my kids, still need to connect with one of the guys I disciple locally who bailed on me yesterday due to his kid's tennis camp. Making progress on the playground again. Looking forward to a weekend with no travel, no guest visitors.

Physical: Body weight lifts on track. Cardio down from previous weeks - shifted to intervals, as I tend to talk to guys I disciple on the phone while getting my run in, which slows me down if the conversation is serious enough or requires continual participation. Goal: In the next 7 days I want to purchase at least $1,000 of items for my home gym (has to be done to get my wife's work credit of 50% up to $500 before she quits) and begin researching contractors to help us remodel our basement to fit the home gym.

Mental/Emotional: Never been better. I'm super pumped about life right now - so many good things going on and great conversations happening. I'm meeting lots of new people. Neighbors are engaging more often. Randos on the street are remembering me and stopping me to chat while I'm out for a run, whether with my kids or on my own (another facet forcing me to do interval running rather than paced distance runs). Wife is noticing that I have more relationships outside the home than she was aware of and that the relationships she was aware of were actually more intentional and tangible than she realized. Healthy dread is setting in.

Spiritual:

- AoS: 10/10 - Never an issue. Lots of fruit.
- QT: 9/10 - I'm getting that daily relational time with God.
- Bible Study: 2/10 - Shocking for me, but this one has been unusually low these past couple weeks. More relational time. I'm okay with that.
- Scripture Memory: 2/10 - Intentionally low; will be hitting this back up again in another month.
- Prayer: 3/10 - Unintentionally low, but rising due to the prayer threads here reminding me throughout the day. Props for that, boys!
- Evangelism: 7/10 - Relationships with non-believers growing, as above. Conversations deepening.
- Fellowship: 10/10 - Never been better, despite COVID.
- Goals for the week: Develop consistency in praying for others.

Temptations: To be excessively harsh or crude with some people in contextually inappropriate times. Wanting to scale back in my career to take a break.

Relationships/Family: Where it needs to be.

Mission: On track.

Do you have any concerns about how it seems like this view errs on the side of control of your wife over her personal growth and freedom?

2 upvotes · 15 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I think what u/Datanami is getting at is simply this:

I'm an attorney. I have another attorney who is starting his own law practice who I'm "mentoring." He's exceptionally good at researching legal issues. After all, that's what law school taught him to do. He knows absolutely nothing about building a case for court.

Should I spend all my time talking to him about how to do legal research because it's important to his role as an attorney? Or would my time be better spent giving him a framework for presenting his case in court - one part of which is legal research? Obviously it makes more sense for me to emphasize the latter.

Now, imagine this guy is such a legal research nut that when his clients hire him he only researches their legal issues, but never actually files the complaint, never attends any hearings, never puts together exhibits or sets up an argument, etc. The most effective approach isn't merely to add on other things to his legal research. I must actively tell him to stop doing legal research for a while. He can't keep up that level of legal research and still do all the other things; he must actually decrease the amount of legal research he's doing so he can fulfill his other responsibilities to his clients.

That's the husband/wife dynamic in a blue pill marriage with a guy who first discovers the red pill.

No, your congregation does not preach "biblical headship"

2 upvotes · 14 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I knew you had one not all that dissimilar. The baseball bat story is one of mine ;)

"Abuse" now means....made a woman feeeeeeeel bad or "raised your voice."

You notice nowadays that "yelling" has also been redefined to "talked to me in a way that made me feel bad"? My business partner literally just told me a story about how he told the secretary: "I've told you 3 times now, and here it is again: you need to ask opposing counsel where that entry is. That's all." The secretary does so, gets off the phone and starts balling, raised her voice at my partner (i.e. her boss) about how awful it was that he was "yelling" at her. He replies:

- Did I raise my voice? Her: "No."
- Did I make a nasty scowl when I spoke? Her: "No."
- Did I clench my fists or hit a wall or pound my desk? Her: "No."
- So you tell me what I did that you interpreted as yelling.

Her: "When you said that it was the 4th time you had to tell me to do this, it was clear you were frustrated with me and it felt like you were yelling."

Palm. To. Face.

I've had that same conversation with my wife years ago when I was new to developing frame.

I think women (people, generally?) are used to associating "you're not obeying" with their parents verbally yelling/screaming at them when they were kids and can't disassociate respectful rebuke from the aggravation of a raised voice, so they experience both despite only getting one.

No, your congregation does not preach "biblical headship"

2 upvotes · 14 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

My definition of love in short is to act in someone's best interest

I'd recommend exploring Scripture more on this.

not necessarily more accurate in the legal setting as you point out, but I would still contend that general public understanding of abuse has improved

I'll still differ. The courts wouldn't be assessing abuse cases the way they do if there wasn't a public opinion inspiring these women to make the claims as they do. Again, most women who make false allegations of abuse actually believe they have been abused. The number of women who believe this are still significantly greater than the number of courts who will give any weight to their claims.

The reality is that the word "abuse" and how it's understood is subjective and relative. God doesn't define abuse or suggest he has some universal standard we must all abide by. So, if it's left in man's hands, which man has the right to say his definition of abuse is better than another's? What you really mean to say is: "modern definitions of abuse are better to me than the old ones," not that they're "more accurate" - because "accurate" in comparison to what standard?

and hence you might unfairly extrapolate those extreme views to the general public

On the contrary: the general public has to believe their claims are rational before it gets to the courts in the first place. Nobody files a law suit on grounds that have absolutely no public support or legal basis - and things don't get codified into laws until the public generally reaches that consensus. I promise you: the courts, as bad as they are on the matter, are FAR less likely to call something "abuse" that gets pushed by feminist bloggers, social justice warriors, and Facebook posts all over. It would be actual lunacy to think otherwise.

Seriously: check this link. Apparently just calling someone "stupid" or yelling is abuse. This isn't John R. Andom's blog. This is healthline.com. You're going to tell me the court opinions of abuse are more expansive than this public opinion piece?

he is redefining marital rape maybe even encouraging it?

I assure you he is not encouraging sexual assault toward one's wife. But do recognize that, historically, marital rape didn't even exist as an offense until the 1970 and even into the 1990s it still wasn't recognized by most states. Rape, by definition, is against someone "not one's spouse." Historically, it has always been well-established that getting married establishes a precedent for all sexual conduct. That doesn't mean all sexual conduct is permissible within marriages. It's just charged as other crimes, like "gross sexual imposition" or "sexual assault" - but it was not "rape." I'm confident what chuck means is that the Bible would not ascribe the word "rape" to any sexual activity between a husband and wife, but it would certainly condemn certain hostile behaviors in the way a man may coerce his wife against her will.

Is your understanding that the secular cultural definition of marital rape, is not a sin but that you do not encourage it because of the potential negative consequence?

No. My position is that culture defines words differently from the Bible. In the biblical sense, marital rape does not exist, even if culture has changed to call it that - just like "gay marriage" does not exist in a biblical sense. It's not marriage, despite culture using those words. But even without calling it "rape," certain conduct is still prohibited by a husband's obligation to love his wife and treat her body as he would his own. At that, I like my body to be in good shape, well-nourished, hydrated, and given lots of powerful orgasms. I don't punch or kick my own body, so I don't do that to my wife. Only a fool needs to coerce sex from his wife.

At the moment I feel convicted that the Orthodox church is the one true church

This is a somewhat absurd statement to make. You're conflating an earthly organizational structure with an intangible spiritual Kingdom of Heaven. Anyone - Orthodox, Protestant, Catholic, or otherwise - who claims to be the "true Church" has no biblical concept of "the Church" in the first place.

Look, I went down that road too. I was literally in talks with my wife about ditching our Protestant congregation and going Orthodox. I understand the appeal. But the more I examined Scripture, the more I realized how absurd their ecclesiology was, and of all branches, I now place the Orthodox perhaps even below the Catholics, though they all have their problems.

But now I feel validated because so many of the errors are refuted by Orthodox theology and their ecumenical councils in the past.

As has been done by countless other believers within the universal (i.e. only actual "true") Church, regardless of which earthly structure they identify with. This is certainly not exclusive to the Orthodox.

For me once I heard a solid argument against sola scriptura (if there is a silver bullet it might be this, for me it was the last punch to crack open my current framework

This is somewhat absurd. There are many protestants who reject sola scriptura too. In fact, I'd wager that most educated protestants do. The majority fall, instead, under what we'd call prima scriptura - which is that Scripture is the primary source of truth and wisdom from God to man, but not the only. As I understand it, that's a doctrine even the Catholics and Orthodox believe. The reformed camp are the ones who seem to push the solas the most.

But even more concerning is that you're basing your assessment of the "ideal congregation" on something as trivial as "the Orthodox reject sola scriptura and reformed theology, therefore I'm going to side with them." I've often written that I care very little what denomination or "sect," if you don't like to call it a "denomination," any man participates in. I only care that he believes the Gospel and is making disciples. And when selecting a congregation you should be less interested in technicalities of theology and more interested in assessing where you will be most capable of making disciples the way Jesus did - how receptive are the people? Are there FAST people in the congregation or primarily pew-sitters? Is there room among the leadership for you to grow in influence within the congregation in your mission to make disciples? These are the things you should be looking at. Theological technicalities are a horrendously awful basis for selecting a congregation and is among the reasons our faith has become so backwards in the first place.

No, your congregation does not preach "biblical headship"

2 upvotes · 14 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

idea of the husband should be the primary pursuer in the husband-wife relationship

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/84gbdv/for_singles_finding_the_girl_you_cant_keep/

I've also commented before about a study I did of every time the Bible uses the words "pursue, pursued, pursuing, seek, etc." and found that for every one example of God pursuing us, we see 20-22 examples of us being implored to seek God and His Kingdom. Huge role reversal there from what's standardly taught.

No, your congregation does not preach "biblical headship"

2 upvotes · 13 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Haha ... brings back memories.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (08/12/20)

2 upvotes · 13 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Fair enough. If it's actually to hurt you, record the incident immediately after (without letting her know, if your state permits), and get her to admit that she hit you while you talk very calmly. Call the police and file a report. Show them the video. Tell them she's threatened to file false charges on you before - even if only implied. Once that's documented they're far less likely to mess with you if she goes running to them later.

No, your congregation does not preach "biblical headship"

2 upvotes · 12 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

even if you are RP conflict is inevitable

I disagree. As /u/rocknrollchuck often says, "It takes two to argue."

I have a post on this on MRP that was pretty popular a while back, titled Be the Judge. Probably time for a re-post, as I apparently never put it on RPC.

Edit: I just created an updated version for RPC, which you'd be better off going to:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/i8hx6w/be_the_judge/

A picture of a relationally solid church community

2 upvotes · 11 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Well said on a lot of this - and spot on with your conclusion! All of this sounds like behavioral modification rather than internal transformation. It's the leadership saying, "You're not allowed to have your own frame, so you must live in mine," rather than teaching them how to develop strong, healthy frames for themselves.

Update: Looking for guidance

2 upvotes · 11 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I know I wouldn't want to have sex with a man who is lazy and entitled.

Of course not. But that's just the thing: you don't want to. But even when the man isn't lazy - he's actively doing things to make his wife happy all the time - the overwhelming majority of women still don't want to have sex with such a man. I've been there. Countless other men have too. It's the Nice Guy Syndrome - the belief that if we are just "nice" enough and "serve" enough and "help out" enough that eventually these things will make her want to have sex.

But the reality is that a woman's vagina doesn't start tingling because the dishes are done and the floor is picked up. On the whole, when a man pedestalizes his wife, treating her like a goddess, she ends up feeling contempt toward him, not attraction. It comes off as pathetic and only bolsters in her mind that she is the leader in the household - because whatever she says goes. And no woman wants to have a man who isn't strong enough in character to lead his family well either.

That's why I say: marriage counseling may solve a couple small problems, but it does it by creating bigger ones. It looks to short-term patch jobs without treating the long-term problems - even encouraging them to persist.

I don't think you would be qualified to diagnose someone with depression or a personality disorder

As a matter of licensure, no. But I do it in an unofficial capacity all the time as part of my career. My law firm focuses on divorce/custody cases that involve mental health issues. Before entering into a court-ordered psychological evaluation I will often have my clients take an MMPI-2 (the official test used to assess personality disorders) and use what I've learned from how psychologists interpret results in other cases as well as from continuing education classes to discern in advance what issues my client is likely to come up with. Over the last 2 years I've been 100% accurate in regard to what the forensic psychologist actually finds. So, am I "qualified" on a licensure level? No. Am I "qualified" in the sense that I know what I'm talking about and am always confirmed by the people who do have the licensure? Absolutely.

And in a marriage, a mental health issue could very likely be causing all of the problems, not just faulty communication

Right, but now you're talking about individual counseling, not marriage counseling. That changes the entire game. I'm 100% in favor of individual therapy when done correctly. Marriage counseling is what I suggest is damaging.

The Origins of the Ekklesia ("Church")

2 upvotes · 7 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right. You have some fair points. I'm not fully persuaded. But, admittedly, I haven't looked into the concept of the OT assembly of Israel as a parallel for the Church before. I'll give it some thought and study soon.

But I'd be extremely skeptical to take a tangible-tangible approach. Generally, everything God does in a physical/tangible way in the OT is meant to foreshadow spiritual concepts in the NT that couldn't be known until after the cross. So, to say that (to make up an example) the assembly of Israel followed a certain tangible structure, rather than saying the Church must follow that tangible structure, it'd be more consistent to suggest that there is a spiritual reality to God's Kingdom that the tangible expression of the Israeli assembly was attempting to parallel.

The Origins of the Ekklesia ("Church")

2 upvotes · 7 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I think it's safe to say that the core concept of "ekklesia" in the NT is whatever the "assembly of the LORD/Israel" was like in the OT

This would make sense if it weren't for 2 things:

1. Jesus was constantly condemning the Jewish people for their misunderstandings of God's intentions, making the Jewish practices generally unreliable for God's spiritual Kingdom
2. While the Septuagint was in Greek, Jesus was likely speaking in Aramaic or, I'm sure at times, Hebrew. When the apostles were writing the epistles, they chose the Greek language because they were writing primarily to a Greek-speaking audience, many of the epistles being directed toward non-Jews who would have understood the Greek ekklesia at Athens without having any clue about the Jewish structures referenced in the Septuagint.

Are you TRULY Red Pill?

2 upvotes · 5 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

RP Option D is a red pill man. He just discovered the red pill independent of the red pill community. Right? Rollo has a number of podcasts where he talks about certain celebrities and the dynamic of "are they red pill or blue pill?" Chances are, for anyone we'd label "red pill" out in the world, they haven't actually read the red pill forums. But that doesn't mean they're not red pill - it just means they're ignorant of the formal concept and they would know it by a different name - by their own internal study and observation of human nature.

For the Christian man under option D, I intentionally left that a little vague, but with the implication that yes, I believe such a person is saved. I believe Romans 1 is clear enough that this limited knowledge from creation is sufficient, even without an actual Bible-in-hand. I also believe there are enough references in Scripture to God judging each person according to what he has been given that it seems to me that if someone was given less knowledge of the Gospel, they will be judged in light of the knowledge that has been made available to them rather than the knowledge that hasn't.

Are you TRULY Red Pill?

2 upvotes · 5 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Define "trust."

OFFICIAL: Cross-posting from other subs. Do's and don'ts.

2 upvotes · 4 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Two things to add, which I thought of after the fact of reading this:

1. When you paste a link, use a .np link and no suggestion of brigading.
2. For extra clarity, "ideally" doesn't mean some redirect posts are okay, just not ideal. What he means is that redirect posts WILL be taken down. Period. I don't care how useful the discussion is over where you're redirecting.

When you have "feeeeeelz" for someone else

2 upvotes · 4 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Have an up-vote for actually watching the movie! I've probably seen it a dozen times now - and listened to the soundtrack many more. So much food for thought, especially when understanding that it's based on a true story.

Both of them resort to unhealthy habits to stand the situation, he starts cheating, she becomes a harpy.

I interpreted the song If I Didn't Believe in You as his "last effort." After that, she completely detaches from him and, essentially, ends the relationship, at which point he has nothing left to try, so he says, "You want to be a harpy? Go for it. I have no room for harpies in my life. I'm moving on."

Or, to be more succinct: her being a harpy is what drove him away; not that his cheating would have occurred independently of her conduct toward him.

That last song, the notion of a goodbye that will last one day and the goodbye that will last forever was so sad i don't recall a time i felt that much despair in a movie.

It's beautiful when a movie can evoke that kind of feeling! Even better: that's an aspect of the song I hadn't really focused on before.

The last movie that made me feel that way was La La Land - though it was less despair and more an oxymoronic combination of forlorn hopefulness.

It's sad to think we, as members of the bride of Christ, often become that girl that just wants to make the husband's life a hell. God help us to be more grateful.

Right. Yet she embodies the churchianity culture. That Christ is glorious, yet we want our piddly congregations to take center-stage, making a name for our own brand of the faith rather than limiting our brand to the name of Christ.

The song A Part of That is, in my view, the epitome of how a wife should understand her context to her husband's mission - and how the Church should relate itself to all that Christ does in the world. Yet just as she abandons this philosophy for her own career ambitions - such as in A Summer in Ohio, where she leaves him to pursue a gig that lasted a few months - so also does the Church depart from the ministry of discipler-making that Jesus established in order to pursue its separate career of congregation-building.

The Origins of the Ekklesia ("Church")

2 upvotes · 2 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Very well said. I think I agree with all of this. Two points to note as clarification, though:

1. Shepherding/pastoring is a legitimate gift/role in the church. Just because people who falsely call themselves pastors have tarnished the word doesn't mean it isn't a legitimate position that many are called to fulfill.

2. Bearing in mind everything you've said - there's still no better place in the world to find people who at least claim to want to follow Jesus. So these congregational structures are still the best resource we have for making disciples because the people who call themselves pastors have already done the hard work for us of gathering such people in one place. Rather than rejecting what they've accomplished because we disagree with aspects of their ministry model, let's figure out how to piggy back off of their work for our own discipler-making mission. Right?

OYS - Where Progress is Made (07/29/20)

2 upvotes · 2 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I believe it's on the discord. Just ask /u/r_horizon or /u/aaaquad for it. I think one of them has a pdf index that includes my latest version (which is still, admittedly, extremely old).

OYS - Where Progress is Made (07/29/20)

2 upvotes · 30 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

1/2

1/3 of the world being killed

I assume you're referring to Revelation 9. For context, remember that John isn't in this vision wandering the entire earth with a tape-measure and a calculator to assess everything in global proportion. There's no indication that he's in a space-craft orbiting the earth to see the 40% or so that would be visible even if he were zoomed out all the way to see the whole earth.

He's watching the war between Rome and the Jewish zealots at Jerusalem. We have to assume he's talking from the frame of reference of what he was shown. The entirety of what he saw was "the world" to him. If he saw the battle between Rome and Jerusalem, "the world" was everything he could see going on during that battle and wouldn't have included the people thousands of miles away that he wouldn't have seen.

In this, on the whole throughout Revelation, Rome is described as a beast and an army of monsters, the same way Daniel's visions refer to the kingdoms as beasts. The Jews were not monstrous beasts, so they're described as humans. With that context in mind, let's break this down:

- 1 The angel sounding his trumpet is likely a literal angel in heaven that brought on the upcoming events.
- 1 The star falling from the sky is the same language used to reference Satan's fall from heaven. It indicates an angelic being descending from heaven to accomplish something on earth (at this point, it's neither clearly demonic or good-angelic).
- 1 The Abyss is generally a reference to the depths of the earth, hell, the sea, or any other number of deep places. It is also used in other books (of Scripture) as a reference to the Gentile masses.
- 1 The key to the Abyss indicates that the angelic being had access to do as it pleased with the Abyss.
- 2 Opening the Abyss is indicative of a volcanic eruption, much like Pompeii, which would involve rising smoke, a giant furnace, and darkening the sun/sky by the smoke.
- 2 Tacitus (Romans historian) recorded without much explanation that "Whole towns were burnt down or buried throughout the richest part of the coast of Campania" (incidentally, the area where Pompeii is located, showing that it did, in fact, have volcanic activity there and during that approximate time-frame).
 - Alternatively, if not a volcano, Rome generally had a "scorched earth" policy with regard to rebellious cities in its empire, slaughtering them and burning everything to the ground to dissuade others from being rebellious. This equally would have fulfilled the passage.

- 3 In the wake of a probable volcanic eruption within the Roman empire (the Abyss), the armies (locusts) leave to swarm the earth (Israel), armed with swords and spears (like scorpion stingers).
- 4 Josephus writes in The Wars of the Jews 6.1.2 that the Romans were forbidden from applying the scorched earth policy on Jerusalem at first because of a vast scarcity of resources. The Jews were actually trying to burn down the trees so the Romans could not use them to make battering rams to enter the city. The Romans were ordered to protect the trees with their lives. See also Deuteronomy 20:19-20, explaining Israel's awareness of this aspect of siege warfare.
- 4 In Deuteronomy 20:19-20 the test for whether to cut down a tree or let it stand was whether or not it bore fruit, which can only be the case if it's a good tree (i.e. saved). The implication is that the Romans, sparing the fruit-bearing trees while cutting down those that didn't, were God's judgment against the Jewish rebels who forsook Christ, whereas those who escaped to Paella earlier in the war were among those who later converted to Christianity.
- 5 The siege on Jerusalem lasted exactly 5 months. Many were wounded from swords, spears, arrows, etc. during this time.
- 5 The reference to not being allowed to kill them during this time could be God literally not allowing the Romans to succeed in breaking through the city earlier.
- 6 This describes how many would have felt during the war.
- 7 Many of the Roman armies would have been on horseback during the battle. The commanders wore golden helmets and obviously had human faces. Do remember that John is watching this entire battle, so while not necessarily zoomed out to see as if from space, watching the entire world (in which point he couldn't have seen the battle or nearly as much detail as he reports), he was still at enough of a distance to see the entire scene, and not so close as to see the details of the armaments, only being able to make things out from a distance. In this, the armor certainly would have appeared exactly as described, and the "human faces" would probably be the only human aspect actually visible.
- 7 Alternatively, many archaeological finds have shown that the Roman horses in battle wore horse-helmets, often molded with human faces on them. Here's an example.
- 7 It's also worth noting that in Joel 2 we see some of the exact same wording used - an army of locusts looking like horses. Joel 2 is a clear reference to human armies, validating the view that the locusts here are actual human armies.
- 8 The helmets the Romans wore would have looked as described. Here's an example where you can see woman-like hair and the teeth coming down the sides like lions. Here's another example that could be interpreted similarly.
- 9 The Romans literally wore metal breastplates.
- 9 As they swarmed toward the city, they certainly would have sounded like thunder and the literally horses/chariots rushing into battle would have sounded exactly like horses/chariots. John may have been observing from too far away to recognize that they were actual horses/chariots.
- 10 This could be a reference to spears, the tail being the shaft that would drag behind, as the soldiers would hold closer to the heavier metal to maintain balance. Alternatively, the Roman ballistas were called "scorpions" so frequently that some translations of Wars of the Jews actually translate "ballista" as "scorpion." These would have been carried on the tails of the horses/chariots to get them into battle.

- 11 Abaddon is a transliteration of the Hebrew word for destruction and it is used virtually interchangeably with Sheol or the Abyss. It's likely a reference to an actual angelic being (good or demonic, I don't know) influencing the battle.
- 11 Abaddon/Apollyon is also likely a dual (or at least alternative, in the sense that "angels" were those sent as messengers to do God's work) reference for General Titus, son of Emperor Vespasian and who also later became the Roman emperor, whose legion at the time was known as the Legio XV Apollinaris, or more colloquially: "Apollo's Fifteenth Legion." In this view, Titus's legion was the one enacting the scorched earth policy against rebellious cities within Rome, being the one who literally caused the fire and smoke in verses 2-3. Titus is the one in charge of the war against Jerusalem and ultimately the one who destroyed the temple in 70AD.
- 12 This is John's commentary; nothing to explain

Leadership Lessons Through a Comparison of Christ and Alexander the Great

2 upvotes · 29 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Not every test is conscious or intentional.

Locked down and lacking motivation

2 upvotes · 28 July 2020 · /r/askRPC

Funny ... /u/skimthedross was literally just talking about that distinction in today's podcast.

Leadership Lessons Through a Comparison of Christ and Alexander the Great

2 upvotes · 28 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

He's fitness testing you. He threw some negative comments your way and you fell for it by getting caught up in the conversation. If you disagree with him, why care so much as to reply? If it benefits you to do so, in order that you learn better how to process the issues, that's one thing. But this seems more like you're just getting huffy. Maintain frame and move on.

Leadership Lessons Through a Comparison of Christ and Alexander the Great

2 upvotes · 28 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Well, if we want to get technical ... yes. Jesus did do this in a more perfect way.

- Death: Jesus accomplished it through his own death.
- Destruction: Jesus refers to his death as "the destruction of this temple." Also, the destruction of the physical temple of Jerusalem in 70AD contributed to the expansion of Christ's spiritual Kingdom.
- Pain: Jesus was whipped and crucified, experiencing horrific pain.
- Satiating the need for power and position: this was the pursuit of religious leaders before Christ; because of Christ's "death, destruction and pain" we no longer prioritize such things for ourselves.

See how that works? Not to say this is at all what /u/BalmoraBoy meant, but it's true all the same.

How do I support my brother while also being loyal to God

2 upvotes · 27 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with much of what you and /u/Billy_King have said. I think what /u/NoFaithInThisSub is referring to is the way that Jesus and John the Baptist were preaching repentance and baptism to who we generally presume were non-believers. This argument is used a lot for a works-based "salvation through repentance" soteriology (not to say NoFITS meant it that way). The key here is to remember that they were both preaching in a pre-Gospel world. Jesus hadn't died yet, so grace through faith, while being the prevailing model through all time, was not understood in the same way - and couldn't have been until the resurrection.

That being said, /u/rocknrollchuck and I have had this conversation a number of times - whether or not the Ray Comfort "make people realize they're sinners so they'll want to be forgiven" model is actually effective. On this, I tend to land on your side of things and believe it is not. I see that lots of Christians will applaud this model as making biblical sense to them, but I don't see him winning as many believers through this model as would warrant the attention it gets. On the whole, it seems ineffective.

That said, I also tend to veer away from the "generic gospel message of Jesus came to die for our sins so that we can be reconciled to God" presentation as well. At some point this does need to be communicated, but most people have to be primed with a context to receive it before it becomes effective.

Lately, the majority of people who I've brought to Christ over the last few years have been men seeking a purpose. When they realize that life isn't just a cycle of wake, work, eat, repeat - that their life actually can make a difference in a grander plan - that seems to be alluring to them. That's what gives the context for them realizing that they want to join God's Kingdom rather than being a drop in a bucket among the rest of the world, pretending their life will matter when inwardly they know it won't.

Divorce and Biblical Dread Game

2 upvotes · 27 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I know the biblicalgenderroles website has some pretty terrible content. /u/Deep_Strength has addressed some of this before. I can't recall the others off-hand.

I do agree that Jesus was openly aggressive when confronted by those who would intentionally lead others away from godliness and repentance. There are a lot of blue pill people today to whom that kind of treatment is warranted. But what I saw in your post was not warranted aggression. It was bitter resentment mixed with exaggeration to the point of factual inaccuracy. That's what I'm concerned about.

Divorce and Biblical Dread Game

2 upvotes · 24 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

No. Mods can't edit someone else's post. It's either all or nothing. And I know at least one of his linked sources is not content I would want anyone here reading.

Episode 9 - No Frame, No Game

2 upvotes · 22 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

For most guys, that's actually the truth. In fact - even for the vets, it's still the truth. The issue is less about whether or not she has a frame and more whether or not it overlaps with his.

Episode 9 - No Frame, No Game

2 upvotes · 22 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Foundational Truth is the material you build your frame out of

I'd clarify that it's the ideal material. Many people built their frame on lies. They even have extremely strong frames built on lies. Look at North Korea. They've persuaded everyone in their country that their leader is a god and the rest of the world is destitute compared to their glory. That leader has a massively strong frame built on falsity. Crazy yet: people LOVE living in that frame. It's both strong and alluring to them. They don't even know they're being oppressed. If the man is a god of any kind, he's a god of projecting his frame, despite operating on falsity rather than truth.

Also, have an up-vote for the Hamilton reference ;)

40 million reasons and not a single excuse

2 upvotes · 15 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

So many up-votes ... so few comments ... so confused. Solid stuff, though, brother.

I have often discussed the difference between reasons and excuses with small groups or men I've disciplined. Because you didn't toss in a definition (at least not that I saw), let me give the simplified way I have tried to boil this down for people:

- Reasons: When you accept responsibility, but other people want more information for why you made the mistake.
- Excuses: When you deny responsibility and insist that other people hear more information for why you made the mistake.

Excuses are compulsive and reactive. Reasons are contemplative and responsive.

What's important to remember here is that both reasons and excuses can be valid or invalid. The validity of a rationale does not automatically make it a good reason rather than an excuse; and the invalidity of a rationale doesn't equate to making up excuses. It merely communicates that the person was not thinking clearly.

Instead, the categorization of a reason/excuse is internal to the person making the statement. Motive matters here.

In all of this, I frequently tell my clients: "Embrace that you will take responsibility for your parenting mistakes. But couch that responsibility in the circumstances under your control which you will strive to change. This is how you will win the heart of the judge and GAL in your case." Moreover, if psych evals are involved, genuine narcissists cannot bear the thought of accepting responsibility for their faults - so learning to accept unquestioned blame pretty much precludes you from testing with an NPD as a man.

Help. // Porn sucks

2 upvotes · 14 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Haha. That's a good way to put it. Admittedly, I didn't read the comments on this one.

Help. // Porn sucks

2 upvotes · 14 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'll ask you the same thing I ask every single person who complains about not being able to overcome porn: Is he disciplining anyone? If not, it's like asking the question: "How do I take this screw out?" I ask if you're turning your screwdriver the right way and you say, "Oh, we don't really think we need a screwdriver. That has nothing to do with getting screws out. But can you help us get this screw out?"

Spiritual reproduction is the screwdriver and porn (watching fantasizing about physically reproductive acts) is the screw. They go hand-in-hand. Why people don't connect these dots and insist that they're unrelated is beyond me.

Also, have you read the 400 series yet? The entire 400 series was originally designed to help people overcome internal struggles, like addiction, guilt, shame, loneliness, depression, etc. I have used that series and its ultimate compulsion toward spiritual reproduction as an effective cure for porn use with countless guys. It works. It's on the sidebar.

Also, you call him an addict. How do you know he's not just starved? Are you actively having sex and he's still watching porn immediately after? Then he's probably addicted. Is he watching porn even when he's not masturbating, just because he likes it? Then he may be addicted. Is he watching porn even during personal crises and missing work over it, or skipping classes, or failing to see a family member hospitalized and in critical condition because of it? Then he may be addicted. Those are things addicts do.

Otherwise, if these types of descriptions don't apply to him, it sounds like he's not addicted, he's just developed an unhealthy habit associated with sexual starvation. I have a post about that in my post history if you want to look it up.

If someone is starving, all they can think about is food. All the time. That's it. Food. Food. Food. As soon as they've had their fill, they move on and think of other things. Sexual starvation is no different. It looks like addiction because of how much you think about it and how much it consumes you - and RIGHTFULLY SO! Someone starving for food needs to have that imperative so they don't starve to death by failing to look for food. In the same way, someone spiritually starving would be spiritually famished and possibly die (depending on your theology) if they never eat spiritual food - God's Word.

Someone spiritually failing to reproduce SHOULD be craving the next person they can share their faith with and ultimately disciple. This is a healthy imperative. Physical sexual starvation is meant to point us to this spiritual reality, and therefore is also a healthy drive to have. But it is meant to be fulfilled not merely through the shadow of physical reproduction, but through the reality of spiritual reproduction. Go there and his spirit will be aligned sufficiently that the temptation in the physical will be out of sight and far from troublesome.

any advice for me as a partner/ female in this fight for my boyfriend would be deeply appreciated

Yeah, you can be the first person he gets to start discipling ... if you're not so offended at him having spiritual authority over you that you refuse to learn from him in a direct way. Most women nowadays are so averse to headship that they insist on chanting "more is caught than taught" as the only way they'll let their husbands teach them anything. Don't be that girl.

Look at how he is following God better than you and ask him to teach you how you can follow Christ the way he does - and that you want him to show you and empower you to do it on your own.

But, if you're like most other women, you don't think he's a "stronger Christian" than you ... most likely because many women are condescending against male porn use to a degree that they believe it surpasses their own sin issues, of which they're generally ignorant. You don't actually want to be more like him; you just want to get the benefit of what he has to offer without having to change yourself. Don't be that girl.

And if he genuinely is not more spiritually mature than you, what are you doing with him in the first place? Why follow someone who will lead you backwards? That makes no sense. That's also a sign of immaturity on the woman's part when it happens, and it calls into question her assessment that the man is really less mature than her.

How the Truth Set Me Free From Masturbation and Pornography

2 upvotes · 6 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

"Give no regard" in the beginning is best understood in the context of "do not seek after them" immediately after. It's not saying to ignore them. It's saying not to have any respect or desire for what they may claim to offer. As /u/Praexology has said, there are many examples where Jesus and the apostles talk to them directly. Your other comment makes me think you understand better than your comments above let on, but I wanted to say this just to be safe.

How the Truth Set Me Free From Masturbation and Pornography

2 upvotes · 6 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Can you give time stamps? I don't have time to listen to these.

How the Truth Set Me Free From Masturbation and Pornography

2 upvotes · 6 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Your discretion here is wise. I live by a similar principle. There are some things I believe, including along the lines of this topic and deliverance ministry, which are best left to very specific situations rather than open forums.

How do I build competence?

2 upvotes · 5 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Haha. Well said. I once heard frame described in terms of characters in a movie. If you're in someone else's frame, you're the supporting character. If you're the star, everyone else revolves around you, even though they may have their own separate lives and separate movies.

In this sense, the narrative comes from the script-writer. We are conditioned through social scripting to believe certain narratives about our lives, many of which are untrue. But if we can take not only the role of the star, but also the writer, then we create our own narrative and carry it through. The direction the plot flows is, then, the course of a man's mission, and the supporting characters and villains are those who help or oppose him along the way.

In this, it's probably wise to advise guys not merely to frame the movie around yourself (i.e. "develop your frame"), but also to learn how to write your own narratives. This idea could use more attention.

Feeling discouraged with many churches' support of the Black Lives Matter movement, including my own.. Are there any truly alt-right/conservative churches left that don't buy into this?

2 upvotes · 2 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

The same responsibility white believers have to any other believer. James 2 dives into this quite clearly, warning against showing favoritism in the first half and against inactive faith when others are in need in the second half.

Consider:

- I see a black man being beaten up by white men. What do I do? I intervene and stop the assailants, or (if I'm incapable of doing so), I get help.
- I see a white man being beaten up by black men. What do I do? I let him get beaten up and do nothing to help him because he's white and privileged and does not need the same help as my black brothers, right? Of course not. I do the exact same thing.

Our obligation to help others does not change because of the color of their skin. I owe nothing more and nothing less to black people than I do to white people, nor am I to show favoritism to one over the other, for we are all one in God's Kingdom. "There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither slave nor free, there is no male and female, for you are all one in Christ Jesus." To suggest that one person deserves better treatment than another because of the color of their skin - even if there is a shared "history of oppression" tied to that skin color - is still a sign of favoritism, which is forbidden within the Church and not modeled by God.

Feeling discouraged with many churches' support of the Black Lives Matter movement, including my own.. Are there any truly alt-right/conservative churches left that don't buy into this?

2 upvotes · 1 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, that was the reason for the reference. Any time I can sneak superman in I will ;)

I once thought about writing a post on superman as the epitome man who wears and balances both blue and red.

Anyone else frustrated with their church leadership re: COVID?

2 upvotes · 1 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Fair enough. Yes, the media decides what is sin for many people to the degree the people develop their own personal convictions from the media rather than Scripture.

Anyone else frustrated with their church leadership re: COVID?

2 upvotes · 1 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

As I recall, the original ekklesia in Greece was on a hill, not in a building. The term referenced the people, not the location or the structure. It was tied to specific purposes, usually war-related and focused on how to achieve the objectives of that greater community purpose. This purpose had little to nothing to do with getting more people to show up to the next meeting; it had everything to do with the advancement of the nation.

This is a far cry from the modern concept of "church" which references a 501(c)(3) organization headquartered in a particular building. Instead of focusing on a clear, united mission, the purpose seems to be to sing some songs, hear a message that might have individual relevance for some people, and get more people to keep showing up so the 501(c)(3) can have a larger user-base.

More to the point: what we see in Scripture is that all believers everywhere are part of a spiritual ekklesia, being "one in Spirit and in purpose" regardless of where we are physically located. The fact that people were meeting in each other's homes as a network of interconnected believers throughout a community rather than in mass meetings doesn't go against what I'm saying - it supports it. The initial structure of the early Church was discipleship-driven, focusing primarily on individual relationships and parenting one another in the faith. It wasn't until the early 300s AD that we see the current congregational model start to rise as a response to Theodosius I mandating Christianity as a national religion, bringing in so many people that the Church shifted away from a discipleship model to a congregational mass-production model. This, of course, is what started crippling the entire thing leading into the dark ages because it abandoned what Jesus taught (discipleship) and took on a worldly appearance in its organizational structure, and the congregations became less like parents and more like spiritual orphanages.

Anyone else frustrated with their church leadership re: COVID?

2 upvotes · 1 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I've met many people who think it's a sin. My own mom and her sister got in a big fight over the issue and haven't talked since. Several congregations are up in arms saying that if you don't wear a mask you're defying God's imperative to love and protect our neighbors, whereas others say the exact opposite. I don't agree it's sin. I've just seen it from soooo many sources that it can't really be denied.

Anyone else frustrated with their church leadership re: COVID?

2 upvotes · 30 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Actually, I believe you're mistaken. Paul in 1 Cor. 8 expressly authorized eating meat sacrificed to idols, and he fought against it being enforced in the early church in the Acts 15 council. There was a big debate over the issue and the council ultimately concluded that even though these things may not technically be sin, it was a necessary command to keep the peace between the Jews and the Gentiles, after which Paul confirmed this view by authorizing eating food sacrificed to idols as part of our freedom in Christ - just not in a manner that might cause someone else to violate his own conscience. This, of course, relates to Romans 14:14, where Paul says that anyone who believes something to be sin and does it anyway is sinning. So, if you eat meat sacrificed to idols, if it's not sin, but your doing so causes someone who believes it's sin to do it, then you are responsible for causing them to stumble.

The point is: the parallel does line up because neither eating food sacrificed to idols nor is refusing to wear a mask outside, or congregating during a pandemic. So, between "not sin" and "not sin," Paul does still give the alternative command that even if it's not sin for you, respect that others don't share the same conviction and don't do something that would cause them to violate their conscience.

In this scenario, many people DO believe that it's sin to go outside without a mask because it puts others at risk. Others DO believe it would be sin for churches congregations to defy the government by meeting in person again. As Romans 14 alludes, those of us who are mature know better - that we have freedom in Christ on these issues and it's not actually sin - but that doesn't give us license to cause someone else to stumble through how we behave in front of them.

In this, I agree with /u/rocknrollchuck's point on this issue, specifically, even though I may apply it differently and ultimately weigh other considerations in as well, which would affect the conversation.

Anyone else frustrated with their church leadership re: COVID?

2 upvotes · 30 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

The link I cited specifically says "The case fatality rate is the number of confirmed deaths divided by the number of confirmed cases."

Right. This affirms what I said - that they're only looking at "confirmed deaths" and not necessarily the cause of death. From what I've read, many of these statistics are including causes of death that may have occurred even if the person wasn't corona positive, but because they were corona positive, it's getting included anyway.

For example, someone has a severe case of pneumonia. They die and are found to be corona positive. There's an 80% chance that person would have died anyway even without corona, but because it's hypothetically possible that corona influenced the death, it gets added to the corona deaths anyway.

Some studies are even including deaths for things like car accidents or gun shot wounds and accounting for those in the corona fatalities simply because the person was corona positive at the time they died.

The OP was talking about an actual church with (I'm assuming) members that skew towards the older and more vulnerable end of the spectrum

What in his post would give you that impression? I currently attend a congregation of around 250-300 adults. I have yet to see a single person over the age of 80, and I'm pretty confident we don't even have anyone over 70. 95% of our attendees are between the ages of 16 and 40, with a select few in the 40-50 age range. This is pretty normal for a lot of congregations these days.

So why would you assume OP's congregation is "skew[ed] towards the older" people?

One last nitpick: the OP said 0.02%, not 0.2%

That's fair. I've seen the .2% number so frequently that my brain just processed it as that. Nevertheless, this website cites a study from Switzerland that found a death rate of under .01% (.0092% to be exact) for confirmed positive cases for those between 20 and 49 years old - which is a very broad age range. So, even .02% is not an unreasonable number to use, depending on which studies you rely on.

How to know if I'm (F) dealing with a narcissist or with someone who has narcissistic traits

(who is a bit arrogant & entitled)?

2 upvotes · 24 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I literally almost wrote: "He sounds more like an ENTP than a narcissist." I am also an ENTP, and on the spectrum from "My life is completely pointless, I might as well just not exist" to "I am the god of the universe and everyone must bow to me," ENTPs err slightly on the latter end. Those who err on the other end naturally assume ENTPs are farther along than they actually are because they're more in that direction than the non-ENTP is.

This stems from a fallacious view that we assume we, ourselves, are always balanced. We can always point to someone more extreme and someone less extreme than us.

- "I'm more evil than Ghandi, but not as evil as Bill Gates"
- "I'm more evil than Bill Gates, but not as evil as Steve Jobs."
- "I'm more evil than Steve Jobs, but not as evil as Chris Brown."
- "I may be more evil than Chris Brown, but I'm not as evil as Hitler."

And then it's made worse when we lose where we are in the spectrum and say:

- "I'm more evil than Ghandi, but less evil than Hitler."

This is where most people land in self-evaluation - and this applies not just to "evil," but to arrogance spectrums, attitude for service, intelligence, compassion, etc. Most people point to extremes and say that because they're between the extremes they're probably fine.

But we then use our own sense of self as the mid-point. So, if my wife thinks she's balanced as a "good person" "ought to be" in regard to her disposition toward self-deprecation v. self-grandiosity, then when she looks at me she sees someone who is "not balanced" to the degree I differ from her and I am more toward the self-grandiosity level in her eyes than a person should be. In reality, our MMPI-2 results showed that I was within ordinary levels for my sense of self-import, but she was so far in the self-deprecation level that my attitude looked abnormal and extreme to her. To put it more simply: She thought she was a 5 and I was a 9. It turns out she was a 2 and I'm a 6.

It reminds me of a Twilight Zone episode from a year or two ago (the recent reboot). A meteor struck the planet and all men became violent raging beasts. They just attacked one another for no reason and were extremely hostile. I kept waiting for that classic "Twilight Zone Twist," but was shocked when there was none. The episode was literally just about a meteorite that made men go insanely aggressive. Yet I had been telling my family as we watched: "I bet the twist is that the meteor actually turned the women so non-confrontational that the women are going to view normal male behavior as if it's unbearably harsh." Sadly, I was wrong - but that's the concept that actually happens in real life psychology.

At first it struck me the way he would say he genuinely thinks he's better than so many people

Is he? I mean, Moses called himself the most humble man on the entire planet. Does that make him arrogant? Jesus constantly berated the disciples for having so little faith, condescending as better than them in that area. Does that make him prideful and ungodly? No. Why not? Because they're perfectly accurate statements to make.

It's often said, yet not often received, that humility is not thinking less of yourself than others; it's thinking accurately of who you are before God and man. It is having a right perception of your own status and living in light of that. That's why, you'll note, that even the secular world in crafting the DSM-V has figured out that narcissists aren't only those who puff themselves up, but also those who berate themselves. Whichever direction you go, it's an inaccurate sense of self that gives more importance to your actual function (for good or bad) than is warranted.

another time, he said while talking about a specific situation that he would be better suited for that position instead of the person they assigned, and that that person wasn't impressive..

Maybe he's right. Maybe he was emotionally wounded by the bad choice and that's his way of rationalizing the situation to make him feel better. It's a defense mechanism, not a sign of arrogance.

What is repetitive though, is talking about things he did that make him look good, from normal day-to-day tasks to charity.

Right. My dad does this all the time. He does something nice for someone, then wants to make sure everyone around him knows and gives him credit for his good deed. I attribute this type of attitude more to obsessiveness about one's reputation rather than a sign of narcissism.

He doesn't accept criticism, especially if it's too personal..

Most people don't. This is a pretty normal trait. Actually, narcissists are MORE likely to accept criticism than non-narcissists because their inflated sense of self makes them care so little of the "feeble minded" opinions of others that the criticism doesn't matter. They only care about the criticism if it's by someone in a context that will hinder their pursuit of grandiosity. So, if their boss criticizes them, they'll care because they want to be rich and any indication that they may fail financially is a huge blow to them. But if their wife criticizes them, they don't give two hoots because "having a good marriage" (whatever that means) isn't a grandiose enough goal to worry about it when it's called into question. So, criticism from their wife often gets ignored rather than affecting them.

Obviously a positive response to criticism is ideal, if it's in the context of being taken seriously. Then there's the positive, yet blowing-you-off response. Then there's the bad response, and worst of all are the apathetic responses.

Not the best with emotions as well

Sensing them or expressing them? ENTPs are generally non-expressive with their emotions, except excitement at their own ideas and ambitions. This is a product of their creative thinking patterns mixed with extroversion. I'm like that and had to learn to overcome it to get my wife's feels up.

But narcissists are so unempathetic that they don't even realize how others are emotionally feeling (contrasted with antisocials-types who realize it, but just don't care).

although he says he's usually upbeat but only from the outside, as he says usually he feels sad from the inside..

Right, the upbeat bit is from the creative excitement of being an ENTP, whereas the "sad from the inside" is likely from a mix of other sources, as there's no correlation between depression, loneliness, sadness, etc. and being an ENTP.

FR: Rejection is Better than Regret

2 upvotes · 21 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is almost worse than your original reply

I actually liked /u/Continuous-Metanoia's original reply. But I agree the modified version is a step-down. It's self-deprecating, saying that you're the type of guy no other girl wants to be with and they all give the boyfriend excuse. It's also not absurd enough to be taken completely as a joke, so the woman might believe there's some truth to it. You're better off amplifying even worse and go with a number like 42.

In this case, an amused "Oh really?" or "Oh really now?" would have been best

I'm more a fan of:

- "I know. So, how about that drink?"
- "I do too! What a coincidence. You're not gonna tell him we're going to hang out tomorrow, right? That'd make things a bit awkward for me."
- "Only one?"
- "Don't worry, I'm not the jealous type."
- "That's so cute! When's he going to propose?"
- "Give me his number and I'll ask him out too. Then it'll be fair."

FR: Rejection is Better than Regret

2 upvotes · 21 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I like your conclusion. One of my more popular MRP posts ("Initiate Often, Confident Always") was based on the same premise (RPC Draft Here). You might find it useful in bolstering your own view on the value of facing rejection.

I'm not sure why the "missional dating" thing had to come up as a preface here. But because you brought it up, note my comments in OZ's thread (which I'm going off of memory; didn't actually re-visit the link). I'd encourage guys not toward evange-dating, but "evangelism-to-dating." That is, don't start the relationship, but let the relationship be something that dangles in front of her as an incentive to getting her pursuing Christ today.

The guy who discipled me was saved because a hot girl invited him to a Bible study. She had no actual interest in him, but he was interested in her. She knew he was interested. She used his interest as leverage to get him following Jesus. They never dated, but countless people are following Jesus today because of his life - literally tens of thousands or more. All because a cute girl used his attraction to draw him toward Jesus.

I have no objection for doing the same in the reverse. But if the boundary was: "I'm not following Jesus unless you date me," that should be a hard pass. Even if they do allegedly "convert" at that point, there's no way to know if it's genuine or only a passive byproduct of the relationship. Be wary of that situation.

RPCC Episode 3: The State of Marriage

2 upvotes · 21 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Gotcha. I think I was referencing some of his general writings. I know he has a book titled "Saving a Low Sex Marriage," which addresses some of this. His podcast series also addresses this. Both of these are on the sidebar. His newer stuff (the "intermediate course" on Gottman) addresses more heavily the tools a man can use when his wife is acting out, which can be helpful.

Actual Conversations With "Abuse" Victims

2 upvotes · 16 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, never been there, but I might visit. Thanks for the tip.

Explaining the Double Standards around Sex

2 upvotes · 14 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, I had the same thought and would have replied as such if you hadn't already.

Explaining the Double Standards around Sex

2 upvotes · 13 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Spot on.

Actual conversations with "abuse" victims.

2 upvotes · 12 June 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Oooh, so you're a woman. I thought this sub was male only and was handling the conversation as such (u/bluepillprofessor - is that not the case?).

Either way, what I'm hearing you say, then, is: "I don't like having sex with my husband, but he gets mad if I don't, and it's not worth it to fight him on it, so I agree. See? My abuse is real." You're literally affirming the exact point of my post.

I also come from a place of believing: "Do not deprive each other except perhaps by mutual consent and for a time, so that you may devote yourselves to prayer. Then come together again so that Satan will not tempt you because of your lack of self-control" (1 Cor. 7:5). Notice that it requires mutual consent within marriage to DENY sex, not to have it.

So, I'm not really inclined to have much sympathy for your position. You don't like having sex with him anymore? File for divorce and you won't have to. By staying married, you're communicating to the world, "What he does to me isn't so bad. Even though I don't like it, I still prefer to be married to him," which is your implicit stamp of approval that you're okay with it. If it's not significant enough of an issue to make you divorce him, why do you think anyone else should take it as significant when you, who are actually experiencing it, don't?

OYS - Where Progress is Made (06/10/20)

2 upvotes · 11 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I've heard of apps for pay that will do this. We're still using freeware at this point. But if you have suggestions, we're open minded.

RPC Video Chat

2 upvotes · 10 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Working on it.

RPCC Episode 3: The State of Marriage

2 upvotes · 9 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I noticed the same thing. u/angusisin had me listening to a series on Revelation that was 29 episodes long, each over an hour. I started it at 1.5x speed and found it too fast, so I dropped to 1.25x. After about 15 minutes I put it back at 1.5x and had no problems, and the next episode and from then on, I was at 2x, which was the fastest the player supported.

I've had to learn to keep my speech pacing down for the sake of the court reporter. At times, it sounds awkward in how I leave pseudo-intentional pauses, but I've trained myself to do it second-nature now because there's nothing worse than when a judge yells at you to slow down because the stenographer can't keep up.

A Complete Idiot's Guide to Conversation

2 upvotes · 7 June 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Dang. I thought I was long! Good stuff though. I'm reminded of the conversation stack, which helped me early on. The idea is that it creates a series of pictures that follow through a general order of how to start a conversation and keep it going when you are otherwise unable to make it happen organically.

- Imagine a name plate. "Hi, I'm John. What's your name?"
- The name plate is on a house. "Where do you live?" or "What part of town are you from?"
- The house has a family inside. "Do you have any kids?" "How is your family doing?" "How hot is your wife?" [Okay, maybe not that last one.]
- The parents are wearing work gloves. "What do you do for a living?"
- The parents are holding tennis racquets with their gloves. "What hobbies do you have?" [I'll never forget one awkward couple, where I asked what they do for fun. "Fun? I'd have to think about that. I don't really know what we do that's fun. We do have lots of sex. That's fun."]
- The parents pack the racquets in the car and the family leaves for vacation. "Have you traveled anywhere interesting lately?" "What places have you been?"
- They drive to a football field and park under the goal posts. "What do you want out of life?" "What makes you passionate and excited for tomorrow?"

The idea is that the conversation gets progressively deeper or more personal as you shift from one topic to the next, leaving room to camp out at any stage for as long as you like. It's also meant to give a clear path for ideas to take the conversation forward every time an individual topic becomes stale.

It's a bit forced, at times, but great for those with social anxiety or a complete lack of conversational skills who are first learning.

Actual Conversations With "Abuse" Victims

2 upvotes · 5 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed.

Actual conversations with "abuse" victims.

2 upvotes · 5 June 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The first is absurd because "yes" means "yes" under any system. The only time there's an actual dispute is on whether or not "no" means "no" or "no" means "I'm playing hard to get, but I really want you to show your dominance by trying harder."

The second is absurd because because it's obvious he didn't actually "make" her give blow jobs. She didn't feel like it, but decided to do it anyway because it was the path of least resistance for her over saying no. If he actually did "make" her, she would have been talking about how he forced her mouth open or tied her down or how he threatened her so heavily that she didn't feel comfortable biting his dick off while she was down there. There are so many ways to get out of a blow job if you didn't want to, and if he did anything that would actually prevent her from taking those alternative paths, she would have brought them up as even more severe forms of abuse that simply didn't occur.

What are your views on prenups with Christianity?

2 upvotes · 3 June 2020 · /r/askRPC

Exactly.

How do I stop being a nice guy?

2 upvotes · 28 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

On the spectrum of nice to jerk, most Christians stay far on the nice side because it's more socially acceptable than being a jerk. But both extremes are destructive. The thing is, if you've been on the nice side for too long, you have to live on the jerk side for a while before you can figure out how to find balance - otherwise you're going to end up being slightly less nice, but feeling like a jerk and thinking you're done, while still being pathetic.

So, go be a jerk for a while. You can do that without sinning. Apparently I wrote another post for the sidebar that never got added: 116 - God is a jerk. Maybe it contributes a bit to the conversation.

Some good news and some questions

2 upvotes · 21 May 2020 · /r/askRPC

Whatever did happen with that girl this post was originally about? It's been 5 months. You still together?

r/RPCWomen is now active.

2 upvotes · 21 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not active enough there. But I do encourage you or others to do so :)

Some good news and some questions

2 upvotes · 21 May 2020 · /r/askRPC

What makes me curious here is why you replied to a 3 month old comment? Haha. I'd completely forgotten about this post.

Either way, if you don't like what someone has to say, just STFU and move on. No sense arguing with internet strangers, unless you feel like you have something to prove to them or you want to learn from them and the "argument" is more about fleshing out different angles of the conversation.

Women are the beloved creation of Gods hand before they are temptation to you

2 upvotes · 21 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Let's be clear. Lusting isn't a sin. Lusting after a woman who isn't your wife is adultery and adultery is a sin. There is no sin of "lust" in the Bible. As I've often noted, Romans 14 is pretty clear that "nothing is unclean in itself." Rather, it's the context and motive that makes a thing unclean.

- Is murder a sin? We have to look at what murder is. "Killing with malicious intent." Killing is an act. Malicious intent is the context in which it's performed. Killing is not sin - God ordered people to kill others all the time. The malicious intent makes it sin.
- Is premarital sex sin? Sex is an act. "Premarital" is the context. Sex is not sinful - it's directly created by God to be a wonderful thing. The context of doing it before marriage is what makes it sinful.

Similarly, lusting in itself is never called a sin. Adultery is the sin.

- Adultery is being married and having sex with someone who isn't your spouse. Having sex (the act) isn't sin. The context of doing it with someone who isn't your spouse is the sin.

Some people dive into this and suggest that a single man cannot commit adultery, therefore he cannot sin by lusting because lusting is not the sin - adultery is.

I tend to go the other way and take the view that we look to the example Jesus set with the Church. Does Jesus ever attempt to engage in spiritually reproductive activity in a way that excludes the Church? No, therefore physically reproductive activity that doesn't involve a wife (i.e. jacking off) is still sin. As for the wandering thoughts, for single men - does Jesus long to reproduce disciples through people who aren't his bride yet? Absolutely! But once the Church was established (i.e. his bride came into being), does he show any indication of desire to reproduce with those who aren't of the Church? Nope.

It's tricky, but worth thinking about and studying.

Finally, as with another recent post, please bring your own thoughts, not someone else's

COMPLETELY agreed ... 99% of the time. The one exception, which is rare but may actually apply here, is when the poster is a woman and she doesn't want to teach her own views (i.e. the whole "I do not permit a woman to teach" thing), in which case it makes sense to relay the message from a man to other men.

Oh, and don't come to our subreddit and imply that men only think of women as sex objects.

Right. As /u/OsmiumZulu says, they're baby making factories too ;)

A Quick Reminder about Women's Competency

2 upvotes · 19 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right on. There are differences, for sure. But there's no sense throwing the baby out with the bathwater. Take what's valuable and leave the rest.

Is marriage worth it?

2 upvotes · 18 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I do agree with you on this comment. If a guy feels like paying for a date, what's the harm in him expressing generosity? Yes, she may use and abuse his generosity for a quick meal, then ghost him. But that's kind of the point of generosity: you're doing it without expectation of anything in return, not because you demand she spend at least the next x months at your side or because you're trying to buy her affection that simply wasn't there.

I'm more concerned with the fundamental compulsion of a man to seek a wife in the first place - that he would want one so badly that he starts paying for things to get her to give him the time of day. That's backwards to me. But if they come across each other while he's out and about making disciples and they notice a mutual sexual attraction that could easily go down-hill if some boundaries aren't put on, then there's no harm in him saying, "Let me take you out to dinner and let's talk." Even the secular world gets this - when they're hiring "helpers"/workers/employees/whatever, when have you ever seen the person desperately applying for the job, hoping to work for their dream employer, be the one to pay the interviewer's meal? It never happens. And yet this generosity from above doesn't compromise the desire dynamic or the abundance mentality of the employer in knowing they could easily interview a few dozen other candidates for the same position.

That said, there is a measure of attraction that can be increased among some types of women when a woman sees that he's high enough value that she has to vie for his attention rather than him spending money to get hers. That attraction factor is probably inherently in all women as a fundamental concept of hypergamy - but it is also overcome by cultural conditioning in those who are raised in highly traditional, conservative homes, as you suggested.

Tag: /u/da_independent_varia /u/benjiii1995

Is marriage worth it?

2 upvotes · 18 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I can obviously only speak to my own jurisdiction, but our office did have a case where the parties specifically avoided filing a marriage certificate with the state, thinking this would protect them. They remained together for 25 years. They had a ceremony in their church about 10 years into the relationship (again, with no marriage certificate). The wife filed for divorce. The husband moved to have the complaint dismissed for lack of jurisdiction over a non-marital relationship. The wife presented their joint tax returns. The judge said, "You have two options. You agree that you were married and give up half your retirement or I'm calling the IRS about your tax fraud. Which is it?"

Now, I can't say what would have happened if they hadn't filed joint taxes. Maybe they would have found "constructive grounds" for creating an implied marital contract, even despite common law marriage being abolished in my state. It's possible. Alternatively, they could have invoked the "technical error" doctrine and say that the parties meant to marry, but it was a mere "technical error" that they didn't file the marriage certificate, and therefore still deem them married.

If you really want a non-legal marriage, the best thing you can do is establish a mutual contract in lieu of marriage (which is, essentially, the same thing as a prenup). This contract would specifically state up-front: "WHEREAS, Party 1 and Party 2 agree that they do not want to bind themselves to the marriage and divorce laws of this state and, therefore, intend this only to be understood as a spiritual union before the God they both profess and not a legal union before any governmental agency." That language in a contract should show enough intent and a clear meeting of the minds on the issue that would help rebut any "implied" or "constructive" marriage later on.

All of that said, none of this helps with the ultimate issue of children. Virtually every state issues default custody of children to mothers because their genetic relationship to the child is evidenced and witnessed by hospital staff through the birthing process before they are permitted to check out (unregistered natural births at home being an obvious, yet unlikely loop-hole). Fathers cannot be proven to have a genetic relationship until after testing. So, even with an affidavit of paternity, the father-child relationship isn't legally established until you file a case in the juvenile court about it ... unless you're legally married, in which case parentage is presumed. Why signing an affidavit of paternity doesn't create a similar presumption is beyond my comprehension. Legislators suck.

The point is: if you refuse legal marriage, you have no legal rights over your children until something is filed in court. So, she can do whatever she wants with the kids at any time and you have no ability to tell her no because you are not lawfully the father until you file an action in court to establish yourself as such, and even then you only have the rights allocated to you by that court.

So, you have four options:

1. Never have kids.
2. Have kids at home and don't assign them a birth certificate (no, being on the birth certificate as a father does not give you the same legal rights as being on the birth certificate as a mother).
3. When you do have kids, file a court action on agreeable terms stating whatever you believe to be biblical. In my state, I'd recommend shared parenting with Father having final decision-making authority on disputes. The reason I don't suggest sole custody to the father is that it precludes the mother from doing many practical things that would be useful to the father, like scheduling doctor's appointments, registering the kids for school, etc. - all things that many guys actively want their wives doing (even though I usually recommend against it, if you want a shot at long-term custody in the event you do split).
4. Just get legally married.

The point is: even if you do manage to avoid legal marriage, it only applies to property division and spousal support. You're still stuck with the laws on child custody/visitation and child support.

So, yes, there's some value in doing it that way. But you have to plan it out properly and take the legal precautions necessary to make sure it actually plays out the way you want it. I would not proceed in that direction without a lawyer.

Tag: /u/IceBear---69 /u/Torn4_025 /u/benjiii1995

How to deal with irreconcilable differences of opinion on very serious issues

2 upvotes · 13 May 2020 · /r/askMRP

At the launch of my drunk captain phase

Okay, so this isn't a current situation.

I feel like the same dynamic keeps playing out in my life, and I keep making the same mistakes.

Why not tell us about the current mistakes? Don't get so hung up on how you handled something in the past that you can't change. Ask about the current problems and how you're handling them now that you should know better.

Discovered an inappropriate relationship

2 upvotes · 11 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Are you suggesting that talking and laughing with an attractive person of the opposite sex is adultery? Yikes! I guess I've committed adultery a number of times then. Obviously that's not the case. Yet this is about how most people characterize the "emotional affair." Emotional affairs are not a concept in Scripture. Covetous lust is equated with adultery. Not feeling any particular emotion.

Frame Fail?

2 upvotes · 7 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

You don't have to try to keep up with me because that also includes loving you, understanding you, and honoring you as best I can as the Bible says.

I'm not sure I'd say this. It over-affirms and gives the impression that she doesn't need to follow because he'll always be good to her no matter how nasty she becomes to him.

I'd word this: "The things God has called me to do will always have a role for a wife to help me fulfill." This lets her know that she will always have a role in his life, but that there is still some imperative to keep growing alongside him, simultaneously reassuring her in the midst of the comfort test and setting a precedent that she should, indeed, grow alongside him as best she can.

Tag: /u/RBdadbod

Roosh V on Jessie Lee Peterson

2 upvotes · 4 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Be careful to balance this view with 1 Cor. 9.

Every Christian Man's Mission

2 upvotes · 1 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm a little disappointed ... after our prior discussion, I was expecting this to be something I'd disagree with and we could start a fascinating conversation on mission ;)

This is all good stuff - and I greatly appreciate the references to back it all up.

A few things to think about ...

Jesus told his followers their Mission - To make disciples of all nations ... Mark 16:15 Go into all the world and preach the gospel to all creation

I'm a bit surprised you didn't use the more obvious Matthew 28:19-20, as it's more clear on the disciple-making language. Given that most scholars agree Mark was written first and Matthew had Mark available to him when writing his book, it's generally accepted that Matthew wrote his "make disciples" bit as a clarification of the calling as being not merely to preach (which, of course, would have been an essential part of it), though the discrepancy can also be in the differing audiences, where Mark is more open to the idea that Gentiles would be reading his book, and therefore wouldn't be as fluent with Jewish concepts of discipleship as Matthew's Jewish audience.

But, I do get that you were trying to use a passage that focused on the "words" component.

But what about existing believers? Is that part of the mission? Of course! We are to serve one another

If I wanted to be nit-picky, this is probably where I could dig in a bit. But I'm guessing we'd end up both saying "semantics!" on the interplay between discipleship and evangelism and what discipleship actually is (i.e. not just verbally preaching).

Even still, when you get to this point:

Paul's writings exhort believers to support and serve others so let's add this to our Mission

Why isolate this into the Christian mission and not the tons of other things Paul's writings exhort believers toward as well? Not that I'd remotely propose this myself, but: Paul also exhorted us not to be sexually immoral, so why not add, "The tertiary Christian mission is to avoid sexual immorality," and then when we read an exhortation not to eat food sacrificed to idols in front of a younger believer who believes it is sin, we add, "The quaternary Christian mission is blah blah blah"? Why is "support and service" singled out here?

I had a conversation a while back with u/TheChristianAlpha and u/angusisin about how churchianity's focus on "service" was really off-base. It seemed to resonate with them at the time, so I'll let them chime in if they want. The gist of it is that we don't see Jesus LOOKING for service opportunities. They find him and he engages (though also often running away and avoiding them - though that was more due to the quantity). Modern churchianity is OBSESSED with looking for service opportunities, which ultimately becomes a distraction from their mission to make disciples, which is why we see all kinds of "I love my city" projects nationwide among congregations, but virtually none of these congregations actually train men in the basic principles of discipleship that Jesus modeled.

Every Christian Man's Mission is to be outwardly focused

Here's where you seem to have gotten into a semantics game with the MRP guys. First, they don't accept the notion that a man should get his mission from an external source - someone else telling a man what he must do with his life. I COMPLETELY agree with them. A man's mission should come from within. When God gives us a new heart and begins sanctifying us and transforming us with the whole "renewing of your mind" stuff from Romans 12, we internally change. Just like secular RP sees all the "I'm a new man" stories, Christians literally become a new person. God creates in us desires that are aligned with his purposes - and those desires increase as we continue to be transformed. This is why Paul can say in Philippians that the true measure of spiritual maturity is taking part in the discipleship principles of life modeling - because it's inherent that as we grow in our faith, we will eventually, of our own initiative, have the same compulsion toward discipleship that Jesus modeled.

At that point, we're not doing it "because the Bible says so" - a rationale that I vehemently reject as an end-reason for doing anything. We do it because we have internally been transformed to someone who WANTS to do it. It is part of our core being - the very essence of Christ, because Christ is in us and one with us, therefore we do by nature the things Christ did. The one who merely does it "because the Bible says so" is merely functioning on behavior-modification. But if it is not flowing from internal transformation, we can only conclude that he's operating on a works-mentality. Yes, there are phases of life where behavior-modification is inevitable. I have to employ these tactics with my children while they are very young. But that's just it - it's a sign of immaturity when people operate on that level. This is why on every red pill sub guys will implore to noobs: "Lift! Start working out. Go to the gym." They don't explain why. The guy just has to conform his behaviors. But if he never internalizes it, it's a pointless endeavor. But by beginning with the behavior, if he does eventually internalize it as a part of who he is as a man, he no longer does it "because the MRP guys will ridicule me if I don't." He does it because he wants to.

Now, I suspect you agree with all of this - and I'm not pretending you don't. But the key word in the phrase I quoted of yours is "Christian." For non-Christian men, they don't have Christ internally changing them toward unity as a singular body being "one in Spirit and in purpose" (Philippians 2). Because they don't have a common, singular purpose, non-Christians can feasibly, within their own frame, develop other missions that make sense and can be internally focused (such as many Buddhist monks trying to achieve a state of zen) or externally focused, just as they can be small (earn $1mil) or grandiose (cure world hunger).

But for the Christian, specifically, all of us collectively being part of a singular body with a singular Spirit and a singular Head and a singular purpose - it only makes sense that the mission we innately want for ourselves from our inner-most being will ultimately emerge to be the one that Jesus lived - and to do it in the way that he lived it. And because Jesus' mission, while internally sourced, was externally focused toward changing the world, so should ours be. In this, you are precisely right in what you said.

"We let our lives point to Jesus," which would be great if it worked. But I don't see it producing fruit. It sounds good, but rarely is lifestyle alone effective.

This is spot on. The whole, "Preach the Gospel always, and if necessary use words" is a total farce (by the way: the original quote was "WHEN" necessary, not "IF"). But the "words" are only the first part. I already linked 208, above. Jesus only ever started with the "tell them what" phase. This is mostly all we can do on reddit as a red pill forum - we can tell people what they need to know. But true discipleship moves on to "show them how," "let them try," "send them out," and ultimately, "pass it on."

Congregations all over the world love to SKIP from "tell them what" to "send them out" with no actual life modeling. This is the real danger. And it's the cause of what you're noticing. People don't know how to verbally share the Gospel because nobody has shown them how or given them an opportunity to practice it.

I believe in the 50s things were different. If you lived a good life, people would assume, "He must be a Christian." Nowadays people just think, "He's a good person." Lifestyle alone doesn't cut it. There has to be intentionality and initiation as part of the process. This is, of course, no different than dating/marriage. What kind of moron walks out the door to go to a restaurant, then gets mad that his wife didn't follow him ... when he never told her where he was going or invited her to come along.

But again, there's the point. Jesus lived a life that people wanted to follow. He DID invite them. But he invited them while he was doing his thing. He didn't hunt them down (except maybe Paul - he could be an outlier).

Be careful however because we are commanded to proclaim not persuade

I agree with this too. Though I think proclamation is not where it ends. We are also called to model - and not in a passive, "I hope someone comes by," pining for external attention kind of way. Rather, we model by projecting our frame and self into the world. Jesus did his thing. Along the way, he saw people who he could use and he invited them to join him. From there, he not only proclaimed the truth - he told them, "Look at me. Watch what I do. Immitate my life. Walk as I walk." Then he put himself out there in a way that they could actually observe and comprehend. This is why the proclamation of the prophets still resulted in a failed people - because even proclamation doesn't cut it. Even the people who BELIEVED the prophets were the ones who killed Jesus. That's why God said, "Fine, if you won't listen to what I tell you, I'll become one of you and you can see the model of my life through my physical presence - and I'll make sure, through discipleship, that model is passed down for spiritual generations for thousands of years until the earth is filled."

Francis Chan

He's one of the few guys who seems to understand discipleship. You watch his Multiply Movement videos with David Platt?

discussion about Mission isn't what is lacking in this sub, what's lacking is action

I wouldn't say it's lacking - but that's because I get all the PMs, phone calls, small group conferences, etc. that nobody else here gets to see. I watch it happening first-hand. It's a beautiful thing.

Is working out THAT important to find a potential spouse.

2 upvotes · 1 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Spot on. And this is why we see so many "good Christian women" who somehow magically forgot about 2 Cor. 6:14 for a few years, then suddenly rediscovered it when they decided being married to a non-Christian guy was far more disruptive to their faith than they expected. Go figure.

Is working out THAT important to find a potential spouse.

2 upvotes · 1 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Working out is not about attracting women.

This. The same act can be done in the female frame or in your own frame. Guys need to figure that out.

If a guy doesn't want to lift, he doesn't have to. That can be part of his frame. But don't be surprised if your weak body results in having a weak frame because you don't get the psychological benefits of lifting ... or that your weak body doesn't get you the results you want. So yeah, you can be in your own garbage frame that nobody else wants anything to do with - and if you're cool with that, then better for you.

But this is why a man needs to figure out what he really wants out of life. This is why mission is so important. It doesn't matter how strong your frame is if its shape is not something uniquely suited to meeting your goals. If you have no goals, you don't know how to shape your frame. If you do have goals, but the shape of your frame isn't suited to accomplish your goals, then you have a problem.

Idealism and Opportunism are not sex specific

2 upvotes · 1 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is an extremely polarized post for me. When I first started reading, I thought, "This needs to go up on the sidebar, it's so good!" But then there were other parts that seemed off.

- "if we look to Jesus we see that He initiates but does not pursue"

I don't know why I've had a hard time putting this so succinctly. I've had long conversations around this concept with guys (and girls) who just don't seem to get it. This puts it EXTREMELY well.

men generally don't ask out and pursue women that they are unhappy or not satisfied with, but women do accept dates, boyfriends, and even marriage sometimes with men who they aren't satisfied completely with

This is another fact that needs to be ingrained into EVERY single guy's head. I can't stress this point enough!

That said, this very claim undermines part of the point of your post. It's another generality that can easily be said in the reverse because there are so many women out there who will drop a man as soon as they find something better, or even just because they're unsatisfied; and there are also many men (even here, as evident from some of the new guy posts we see) who are with women they're not completely satisfied with - even who are only dating, yet still feel some obligation to keep her around.

idealistic (agape) love

I would not consider these synonyms. Agape is one of the noblest forms of love and is based in truth. When "God so agape[d] the world," he knew exactly who humanity was in its fullest and still expressed this virtue toward us.

But when we say that men love "idealistically," I have always understood this to mean that men create an ideal - or ideology - in their head of what the other person is, which is inaccurate. We fantasize and fall in love with the fantasy we create for ourselves, which is nothing like the actual thing. This view is consistent with your battered woman example, yet I'm confident that most biblical scholars would not view battered women as expressing what the Bible refers to as "agape love" toward their abuser because it is founded on a false ideology. It is a delusional love.

This is why men who are blue pill are so prone to such idealistic love - being still wrapped up in fantastic, yet inaccurate notions of womankind - yet red pill men seem to remove the idealism from how they view their spouse to follow a more pragmatic love. I believe this pragmatic love based on full knowledge of the female nature is far more akin to agape than the idealistic love found in blue pill circles. But the point is not to confuse the two as synonyms.

What's really fascinating here is that you're referencing a divide between red pill and blue pill people. Consider:

- You reference men who love idealistically in the context of blue pill examples: "women can do no wrong," "the man must pursue the woman," and churchianity notions of what it means to love like Christ.
- You reference opportunistic men in the context of red pill examples: "spinning plates, cheating, and otherwise can't keep it in their pants"

But doesn't this make sense? Part of the point of the red pill informing men of the trend that "men love idealistically and women love opportunistically" is to help teach men not to be so idealistic in the way they view/love women so that they can level the playing field and not be taken advantage of. So, is it that the saying is false or that the saying is true, but the red pill helps guys learn to overcome the way that this dichotomy takes advantage of them?

While it is much rarer, a woman can pursue a man at all costs

I agree. I also noticed this on occasion in college (but not often), and hardly at all afterward. Even in college, the girl's way of "pursuing a man at all costs" was still just to make herself available and pine over him for years to her friends until senior year when she finally gave up ... or until the brief stint when they do get together and it turns out not to work.

But the point you make here goes against the thrust of your post: "it is much rarer." When we say that "men love idealistically and women opportunistically," we don't mean it's a 100% infallible rule that can never, ever be broken. We don't even mean AWALT in that way. Everyone recognizes there are outliers and scales and ability for people to defy their internal wiring through conscious choice or learned behaviors.

Women can choose to love idealistically in terms of Christ. Although I find this to be much rarer

Again, you're referencing the exception to the rule as a rarity. The fact that it's rare affirms the rule. It doesn't break it.

what Abraham put her through with Abimelech and Pharaoh, that is some idealistic love

It's certainly a submissive love. But, again, it lacks the rosy beer goggles that cover over all the flaws. We also see that same Sarah laughing at Abraham when he told her they were going to have a child.

saying one sex and the other is idealistic and opportunistic has some half truths

In this case, I'd suggest it's more like a 90% truth. Yes, there are exceptions. 10% is not insubstantial. But ...

Yes, there is some bias

And that bias leans in such a way that the guys we say this phrase to are the exact guys who are in the 90% and need to hear it. We tell guys all the time: you need to lift more, bro - even when we know very little about them. But you'll never catch me saying that to someone like u/red-sfplusplus ... because he's in the minority of guys who the go-to advice doesn't apply to anymore (not that he should stop lifting, of course).

but they are not perfect by any measure

This, of course, is absolutely true. And it needs to be said. But "not perfect" isn't the same as "it's useless, so stop saying it," which is the vibe that this post gives off. Maybe you didn't mean it that way ... or maybe you did. But as I've said a few times to different users recently, sometimes when you're a 1 and you need to be a 5, you need to hear a 9 or 10 to get to the truth of the 5 - hearing the 5 and nothing else might only ever move you to a 2 or 3.

Or as u/weakandsensitive once told me (paraphrasing): "Most guys have been beta so long that you can't just teach them how to be an oak from the get-go. They have to learn to be a jerk for a while, living on the other side of the line, before they can figure out how to find their own balance."

In this case, I'd say that some guys need to be told what you call "surface level" tropes because it's the counter-point that makes them critically evaluate their prior framework for viewing the world - and only after fully processing it can they go back and decide for themselves if it's a fundamental truth they're going to live by or the thing they needed to hear at the time to get them where they were going.

To go to the source of the red pill - even Neo needed to be told by the Oracle, "You're not the one," when we all know he was. It wasn't true. But it was what he needed to hear.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (04/29/20)

2 upvotes · 29 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I use an Excel spreadsheet. I'm actually studying Daniel right now too. Interested in a zoom call? I can walk you through how to do all this. Chapter 7 will throw you for a loop too. I'd be interested in your thoughts when you get there.

Refreshing words and an encouragement to start conversations

2 upvotes · 29 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

None of the above. I generally avoid labels like these as much as possible because most of my views don't align very well with any of the labels I've seen. It'd look more like an incredibly complex multi-part venn diagram all over the place. If you have specific questions, feel free to ask them.

No / Bad Sex - Always His Fault?

2 upvotes · 28 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Body fat - doesn't have to be super accurate. Most online tools just ask for a few quick measurements and you can get a ballpark within a % or so. But if you're 22% or 9% - that's a huge difference that matters.

his mentality (of automatically assuming that it must be the man's fault no matter what)

Show me where he communicated this mentality. Quote me the exact words he used.

Has anyone seen dynamics change lately

2 upvotes · 28 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I do believe it's pretty well established that you cannot emulate whoever's body type you want. Not everyone can look like Dwayne Johnson, no matter how much they lift, or even dope. Maximize your body type.

There was a research study done a few years back on this exact issue. Granted, it focused on college students, so take that for what you will. But the results were clear: women always preferred a muscular-looking man over a weak-looking man, even if the muscle brought extra fat with it. Of course, if you have muscle, seeing it is better than having even more muscle that's hidden under fat so you can't see it. The point is to look strong. But there is a threshold where it starts to back-fire, like the hyper-body-builders. If I to order it, according to the study ...

- This is the top of every woman's list
- But this is still better ...
- ... than this, which is better ...
- ... than this, which is still better ...
- ... than this

Can't stop disrespecting women.

2 upvotes · 28 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right. Plus the fact that /u/lilrobin50 had no problem writing in proper English without the use of ebonics. Most writers are encouraged to "write the way you speak" to make it flow more naturally. OP, try speaking the way you write.

That's not to say you should give up ebonics in every scenario. But you do need to know how to communicate in an effective manner to accomplish your goals. If your goal is to build relationships for Christ among those who speak in ebonics, then speak ebonics with them. If it's to attract women or build relationships with those who don't speak ebonics, you're probably better off setting that aside.

Question about my youth group

2 upvotes · 27 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I don't think being married and being red-pill are at odds with one another

Why would they be? There's an entire sub, which is where this sub was primarily born from: r/marriedredpill. Check it out.

I see red-pill more of a lens into our animalistic nature. The natural world.

For the secular crowd, that may be true. They are looking at the way God created humanity and learning from observing it. At RPC, "the red pill" is the exact same "truth" that the secular crowd is uncovering through observation - we just have a textbook that tells us what that truth is up-front.

Think of it this way. One person says, "I'm going to read the Bible to learn about God." Another says, "I'm going to ignore the Bible, but look at nature to learn as much about God as possible." The second person is going to come to a lot of true things about God's nature, but will have a hard time discerning everything. They may even come to some wrong conclusions from time to time, but that's mostly due to misunderstanding the data they're collecting - not that the data itself is wrong. But at the end of the day, they're both still studying the same overarching thing. They're just using two different, yet completely compatible methods of getting there. But the one who utilizes the Bible will have more reliable information than the one who is still experimenting.

Of course, there's also the difference in goals of what people want to use that information for. But that's a different story. My point is ...

I am unsure how much red-pill is the end-all-be-all but rather a lens or a tool to refine and aid our understanding of reality

When you say this, I can understand the confusion, but you're misunderstanding how the red pill functions. It is not a lens through which we interpret the Bible any more than a science text book is a lens through which we interpret the Bible. Rather, it's peripheral supporting information that helps us understand how biblical concepts play out in the real world. While the Bible may be authoritative on an academic level, it's not until we get into the real world that we actually figure out how it's all applied and functions, which is where the red pill comes in.

Question about my youth group

2 upvotes · 27 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

<https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/wiki/glossary>

Question about my youth group

2 upvotes · 27 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

It is not "area dependent." As I've commented before: there are no red pill congregations that I'm aware of. Too many people think that a congregation is "red pill" just because they preach biblical headship. Even the congregations that do preach this often don't have a flock whose marriages follow it - or they pay lip service to headship in the Bible, but teach practices of living out headship that completely undermine what the Bible means.

by it - such as "happy wife, happy life" as a framework for how you lead, or "~~servant~~ subservient leadership."

When a ~~pastor~~ congregation leader starts preaching from the Bible on fitness tests, hypergamy, and preselection/dread, let me know and I'll believe there's a red pill congregation out there.

More to the point of your question: the "blue pill" isn't necessarily defined by being "not red." There are shades of purple, to some degree, though I could be persuaded that purple doesn't actually exist, just as there are not "shades of salvation." Being blue is defined more by the way one still clings to the ideologies that marriage is a blessing, encouraging everyone to be married and praising them when they do, putting incredible burdens and shame on men for marital problems, refusing to talk about women's marital sin issues, such as sexual denial, disrespect, failing to submit, etc. - or treating those issues with extreme caution, while having no problem coming down hard on men. Then there's worship music. If they're still singing songs that say, "Holy Spirit, squirt your grace all over my face," or, "Come inside me. I want you to fill me up with your presence. Fill me again and again." All this fem-centric emotionalist garbage is a product of the blue pill - the notion that congregations are catering their content to women or otherwise trying to feminize and hyper-emotionalize men because "feeling God" is somehow much more important than obeying God.

Get the idea?

Even the so-called "macho" pastors out there are pretty blue pill. Mark Driscoll was often praised as the "pastor for men" because of how "edgy" he was. Yet he still preached the pedestalization of women and man-blame for everything that went wrong in marriages.

No, this is not an "area dependent" thing. It is in every congregation everywhere. Yes, the degree to which it is obvious varies. But I've visited a lot of congregations and others across the globe have done the same. I have yet to hear of a single true "red pill" congregation. I'd be happy for you to prove me wrong.

Is compatibility essential (or even useful!) in a marriage? No, not really.

2 upvotes · 27 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Read the verses around that. She's asking, "Why won't you give me a child?" If they were sleeping together, she'd know it's a pointless question. More likely, her infertility was a cause of tension that interfered with their sexuality.

This is made clearer from the timing of the conversation, being more than enough time after everyone would have known about Rachel's infertility.

Also, she throws her servant at him, as if to say, "Fine, if you won't keep trying to impregnate me because you think God's closed me off, at least have sex with her so I can take the baby."

In short, I disagree. The evidence seems to lean the other way.

Is there anything that we can do to help him?

2 upvotes · 27 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

CHRISTianity where Christ has been replaced by the church. CHURCHianity. In short, the focus is on the growth of the church, not the mission of the church. There's little care if the growth is artificial, as long as people are in the seats. To maximize this growth, compromise with Scripture had to be made, maintaining political correctness and an appeasement of feminists.

Need some advice, long post. And apologize for the scatter brain

2 upvotes · 27 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Amen.

Need some advice, long post. And apologize for the scatter brain

2 upvotes · 26 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

"You don't feel like? Then why'd you wear that outfit today?" Glide you'r hands across her body, let her feel how hard she's made you, then add, "You know what it does to me when you go around looking/acting that sexy."

That's one of countless examples. You go figure out more and report back.

Reposting as text: Advice on how to manage and potentially create a Red Pill women's subreddit for Christian women.

2 upvotes · 26 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Yes, James 2 seems pretty obvious from its own terms.

- 14, "What good is it, my brothers, if someone CLAIMS to have faith but has no deeds?" - he starts the conversation in the context of someone who only has an intellectual acknowledgment that he calls faith, but is not actual faith.
- 18, "Show me your faith without deeds, and I will show you my faith by my deeds" - showing that the deeds are the evidence of faith.
- 22, "his faith was made complete by what he did" - showing that the faith is the initiator and the deeds are the evidence that consecrate it.
- 24, "a person is considered righteous by what they do and not by faith alone" ... as compared with Ephesians 2:8-9, which references salvation, specifically - salvation is by faith, but a reputation as a righteous person, including before God, requires works.

The conclusion is hard to miss: faith is what saves a person and does not require works. Works will always flow from someone who has faith ("A good tree produces good fruit ... a bad tree cannot produce good fruit," per Matthew 7). So, if someone has no works, there's no evidence of their salvation (James 2:18), calling the authenticity of their faith into question.

Another way to put it: Suppose a man marries a woman. They exchange vows, enter into a covenant before God, sign the marriage certificate, hold a ceremony in front of all their friends and family, go on a honeymoon, etc. But they never actually have sex. Maybe they try, but for one reason or another they always get distracted, or it just never happens. Eventually one of them dies before ever having sex. They never consecrated the marriage. They didn't "make it complete." Does that mean they weren't married? Certainly in such circumstances it could be annulled if they chose to annul it before the one died, but everyone would agree, even within biblical terms of a spiritual union, that once they entered into a covenant before God, that covenant became binding as a marriage, even if it wasn't made complete through sex. Under both God's and man's laws such a person would be entitled to all the benefits of property transfer rights a marriage would afford. That is, the covenant created the marriage, but sex makes it complete.

That's perhaps the best example I can see of the relationship between faith and works. Yes, "works" are an integral part of the marriage process in virtually every authentic case. Virtually every couple who gets married will have sex. No, sex on its own cannot make someone married in the absence of a covenant. Yes, a covenant before God can make someone married (albeit a marriage that can be annulled) on its own, even without sex. In the same way, faith by itself can save even without works, but works by themselves without faith cannot ever save anyone; yet in 99.9% of cases, the one who authentically has faith, entering into a covenant relationship with Christ (referred to as the "new covenant" in Hebrews), will have works as part of the process, making complete what faith started. You could also say it's what "seals the deal" in more legal terms.

Reposting as text: Advice on how to manage and potentially create a Red Pill women's subreddit for Christian women.

2 upvotes · 26 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed. It's shocking that even with how controversial our content comes off, you're 10x more likely to get into a heated debate on r/TrueChristian here. I think that speaks a lot about the character of men we're trying to breed.

Reposting as text: Advice on how to manage and potentially create a Red Pill women's subreddit for Christian women.

2 upvotes · 26 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

That's a fair point. I do give more credit to Catholicism than most do. If I had to boil it down, my view is that

- Salvation = Grace + Faith + 0 (i.e. nothing else)

... whereas some people tend to hold to the (in my belief) FALSE view that

- Salvation = Grace + Faith + Proper theology on other issues, like the role of works

... or

- Salvation = Having a soteriological model of Grace + Faith + 0

in which case the soteriological understanding becomes of greater significance than the grace and faith itself.

In my view, while they do teach many wrong things, many Catholics, even under their own doctrine, do ultimately have faith in Jesus, as their doctrine teaches. So, they have faith and accept that it is by grace. So, why should the addition of any other components somehow make faith and grace no longer sufficient? Unless the additional teaching somehow undermines the authenticity of the faith.

In short, while I believe Catholics may have a wrong soteriological model, it could just as easily be said that Arminians believe Calvinists have a wrong soteriological model for suggesting it is by predestination, or vice versa for suggesting we have a choice in the process. Many people have soteriological differences, but as long as grace through faith is a part of that theology and not undermined by the rest, it makes it hard for me to say their particular model won't lead to salvation, even in its core teachings.

That, of course, doesn't mean their other erroneous teachings are acceptable - it only means that they're not so off-base as to make them heretical, as some claim. Not sure if that makes much sense, but it's how I break things down.

Either way, I think your view of staying out of it is a respectable one. I have tried to do the same here, and have been fairly relaxed about leaving up content from Catholics (such as the respect post from the one guy who listed Mary as an exception).

How to make wife stop being a hysterical bitch anytime the kids cry or she is stressed?

2 upvotes · 25 April 2020 · /r/askMRP

Everyone's already said it, but you have no frame. Seriously, did you even read what you wrote? You probably could have deleted the post before submitting it because it's so obvious.

No, you're not a great dad if your 3yr old tells you what to do. That's not "picking your battles." Picking your battles is about STFU during the ones you can't possibly win. If you're a good dad, there's no such thing as losing a battle with your kids. If you're a great dad, you not only win, but you get them wanting you to win. It's not that hard, even with 3yr olds. I've been through it a number of times. I have kids who are 2, 4, 6, and 8. You're on your 3rd kid. You should know how to do this by now.

Also, I just wrote this a couple weeks ago. It addresses exactly what you're talking about. You read it? If not, you're not reading enough. Or maybe you are, but you're not actually internalizing it.

https://www.reddit.com/r/marriedredpill/comments/fu3k1v/have_you_swallowed_the_red_chewable_tablet/

Let's Have a Little Talk About Respect

2 upvotes · 25 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed.

Let's Have a Little Talk About Respect

2 upvotes · 25 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Everyone deserves respect in a general sense

Absolutely not. People must earn my respect.

I think what you mean is that everyone deserves common decency. But even that is unbiblical, if you look at what God says we actually deserve.

Perhaps a more biblical way to put it would be: Nobody deserves our respect, or even common decency, but we give it to others consistently with the way Jesus modeled his life for us because we respect Christ and we recognize and honor the way he views and interacts with others.

Tag: /u/chaseemall

Let's Have a Little Talk About Respect

2 upvotes · 25 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right. I just had this conversation with /u/thechristianalpha. To some degree, the post is something of a bait and switch. It comes off with one clear and obvious meaning to the majority of the world, but the actual meaning turns out to be something quite different, and it only comes out once you really dive into the technicalities of what OP is talking about.

While I only skimmed the post, from reading the comments (including some of his), I'm inclined to think he meant well because he already had a biblical definition in his head, but he forgot that the majority of the world doesn't go by biblical definitions. One should reasonably assume that this is a safe space for that - but particularly with the MASSIVE influx of growth we've had (especially from trolls and objectors), this isn't a safe assumption anymore.

Defining My Mission Statement - OYS follow up.

2 upvotes · 21 April 2020 · /r/askRPC

Your mission statement is good. I have no idea how your vision connects to that at all. Think about it this way:

OVERARCHING GOAL

This is the broadest level of understanding your purpose. When a nation takes action, its overall purposes are broad: to keep its citizens safe, develop economic success, and improve the world. God's overarching goal is that he be glorified by building a kingdom for himself. This is what he asked Adam and Eve to do when filling the earth with godly offspring - it's what he did through Abraham, and what he did through Jesus and the Church, and it will be complete in heaven.

MISSION

A mission is a sub-task that drives forward the overarching goal in some way. It is the broadest way that an individual person can understand their contribution to the overarching goal. In this case, if God's goal is to build a kingdom, he has tasked the Church with the specific mission of making disciples. This is not the only way God is building his kingdom. He has a personal hand in what he's doing. The Father, Son, and Spirit are all working in different ways throughout the world rather than individually discipling people themselves.

This is like a General who orders one battalion to complete one mission on the battlefield - perhaps to rescue hostages, or destroy an enemy base, etc. But he may order other battalions to do something else. Regardless, the Church has its standing orders: make disciples. If you are part of the Church, this is your mission also, as you are within the Church battalion.

Your mission should not be too personal because it's really common to all believers. The problem is: if you don't personalize it in some way, most believers will never internalize it and adopt it. So, I gave the outline as I did in order to help people realize that this is YOUR responsibility just as much as it is mine or a pastor's, etc.

CALLING

Your calling is the context in which you will fulfill that mission. So, once the battalion gets its orders, the leader of that battalion has to decide how best to fulfill it. Suppose the order is to destroy an enemy communication base. He may say to Adam, "You're great with demolitions. You place and prepare the bomb." He may say to Bob, "You're great with transport. It's your job to get Adam to the communications array." He may say to Carl, "You need to lead a team of ground troops to protect the transport." Then he'll say to Dave through Zeek, "You're part of Carl's team." These are all individual callings within the scope of the mission.

God says to some, "You're really good at teaching. I want you to find people among your students to disciple." To another, "You're excellent in the art of hospitality. I want you to invite people into your home to disciple them." And to another, "You're gifted in how merciful you are. Go find those experiencing tragedy and show them mercy, then disciple them." These are where Spiritual gifts come in.

But our own life context is part of it too. "Alex, you're an engineer, so I've got a group of other engineers who I want you discipling. Also, your analytical mind will be great at developing plans to help streamline others toward accomplishing the mission. Bruce, you're a lawyer, so I've got a group of attorneys, judges, and prospective clients I want you working with, as well as neighbors in the suburbs where you live. Go disciple them. Also, your ability to put together a case shows me you can see the bigger picture in what we're doing. I want you to take charge of creating and organizing the structural aspects of how others in my Kingdom will understand and live out the tasks I have for them." This is how our individual CALLING works.

VISION

This is the specific of how you see yourself accomplishing the goal. Once Adam is given the task of blowing up the communications array, he's going to be processing, "What explosive will work best? How many do I need? Where should I place them? etc." The commander will be thinking, "What time of day should we initiate the assault? Which direction should we move in from? What phases can we break things down into in order to better plan and understand what we're doing? etc." Carl will be thinking, "I've got to protect that transport, so how do I position my men? Which gear should we take with us? Where do we anticipate the enemy to be positioned? Do we focus on defense or taking out their offense? If x situation happens or y, how will we respond?"

Your vision is how you SEE your mission playing out in your life. What is your specific, unique role in accomplishing the goal? When we talk about "mission," I'm usually using that as a generally used term, but I really mean for guys to develop their vision. Because a mission is generally quite vague if you don't have any perceptible way of how you're going to accomplish it in your life.

But your vision will also fluctuate over time. If you get injured and can't work anymore, that's going to change a lot about how you see yourself making disciples if your previous plan was to do it in your workplace. You also may discover, along the way, that the communications array has a weak spot you didn't see before, so you need to pivot your approach to a new way of doing things.

For me, my mission is to make disciples; my calling is to craft overarching structures for men to operate within in order to best accomplish our shared mission; my vision is to have spiritual generations flowing from my life throughout the world - and most specifically to have 60 discipler-making pockets of people flowing from those I disciple in 60 different countries by the time I'm 60 years old. That's a huge mile-marker. In order to accomplish it, I have to break my life down into smaller phases - within 5 years I'll have to be x far, and within 10 years y far, and after 20 years, z far, etc. That's my vision for how I'm going to accomplish the mission.

The fun thing with God's overarching purposes is that he gives us all the same mission, but he also gives us all complete autonomy with how we're going to live it out in our own lives. Take ownership of that. Set unrealistic goals that can only be maintained if you have uncanny faith that God will work miracles through you. Then set mile-markers for different points in your life that you can gauge your progress against.

Find Something to Lift around the House

2 upvotes · 20 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I thought about removing this ridiculousness for a number of reasons ... but the community has spoken. I'll let this stay up as a warning to you and others.

If you assume everyone will pussyfoot around your emotional temperament or that you have the right to demand that nobody else every says anything to offend you ... this isn't the place for you. Unless you're learning and trying to grow. Then we can be patient with you.

Someday is a dangerous word

2 upvotes · 17 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

You're like my grandma who turns the TV off and walks out the room the instant she hears a cuss word in a show. "I can't handle that godless filth." Seriously, take what value you can out of this and leave the rest behind. It's not that hard.

The primary thrust of the video is about how to map out goals for your life. I'm not telling you to adopt his goals - just the strategy of mapping them out. Apply common sense and this shouldn't be that hard.

Galatians 5, or The Answer to "Is XXXXXXXX a Sin?"

2 upvotes · 16 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Or, rather, making disciples. I wrote more about this here. The most relevant part:

So, what's God's purpose for you? They're summarized in the three Greats:

- Love God (greatest command), Matthew 22:37-38
- Love Others (second greatest command), Matthew 22:39
- Make Disciples (great commission), Matthew 28:19-20

These are inextricably linked. If you fail in one, you fail in all three.

- If you don't love God, you can't love others (1 John 4:8) or make disciples (Matthew 12:30).
- If you don't love others, you can't love God (1 John 4:20; Matthew 25:40-46) or make disciples (John 13:34-35).
- If you're not making disciples, you can't love God (John 21:15-17; John 14:21) or love others (John 15:16-17).

Most Christians think they have the G and O parts down, but they forget the D, or otherwise try to find ways of rejecting it because that means they actually have to do something - something uncomfortable sometimes. It's much easier just to assume God's only purpose for us is to avoid sinning (i.e. "not doing something"). God is a God of action, not inaction. Find that thing he wants you doing, then go do it. That's where your satisfaction in life will come from. I am confident that this is the mission to make disciples.

Why am I confident about this mission? Because it's only one of two things that we can do on earth that cannot possibly be done in heaven. You want to avoid sin? You have all of eternity in heaven to be sinless. You want to study theology? You have God Himself at your disposal in heaven to learn from. You want to worship God? You have all of time to sing His praises. You want to evangelize and make disciples? Oops, can't do that up there. Oh yeah, that must be why we're here instead, then. In fact, Paul says this plainly: "I desire to depart and be with Christ, which is better by far. But it is more necessary for you that I remain in the body. Convinced of this, I am certain I will remain and will continue with all of you for your progress and joy in the faith" (Philippians 1 somewhere). Who are you helping to "progress" in the faith? Who are you giving the "joy" of faith to in the first place? That's your purpose.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (04/15/20)

2 upvotes · 16 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

allow me time to read more through the 300 material on the topic and begin to develop those skills.

Find a partner and practice your observations. u/TheChristianAlpha (at least when he had more time availability) was interested in practicing this skill too at one point. I'd encourage you to reach out to him to partner in your Bible-study skill development.

A Primer to Visual Arousal Patterns

2 upvotes · 14 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Yep. I've seen that before too. I forgot about it. I can't remember if it's that study or another one, but the result was that women overwhelmingly were more attracted to stronger guys, even if it came with extra fat, over a weakling who had a 6 pack out of scrawniness.

The 3 wisdoms

2 upvotes · 7 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right. I'd love to see you do just that! Just make sure you're actually using a biblical lens. This means making sure you have biblical support for what you're saying. If there's a passage (or series of them) that says, "There are three types of wisdom, here they are," then add that and it's far more likely to go up. Otherwise, it comes off the same as someone who says, "There are 5 stages of grief." That's some psychologist who came up with that. It might have some value to categorize behaviors that way, but it's not a biblical concept and shouldn't be confused for one.

Now, you might be able to find verses to support these three different types of wisdoms - but you didn't use them, which leaves the impression that you're using secular thinking about biblical topics (and therefore assuming it's biblical thinking) rather than actual biblical thinking. Be cautious with that.

When do the lines begin to blur in Christianity?

2 upvotes · 4 April 2020 · /r/askRPC

That's understandable. This can be a tough crowd at times. I will say, there's a reason I included the 300 and 400 series, but you'll also note they get referenced the least in comments and other threads.

I'll also note that my original intent was to make the 300 series the 100 series, as that is truly more foundational than the other stuff. But then I had to remember the target audience and realize that if you want people to get to the things that actually matter, you have to start with the things that matter to them.

When do the lines begin to blur in Christianity?

2 upvotes · 4 April 2020 · /r/askRPC

"Therefore, we don't need the law, all we need is faith"

Yeah, I don't take that conclusion. As I understand it, he's just saying that you don't follow the law for the law's own sake, as if it creates black and white lines. Rather, the law is there to reveal the character of God, as you noted, and to tell us the operative principles of our faith. That's why Jesus was able to "work" on the Sabbath - because he read the law, understood the operative principles, but also recognized that (1) his picking food on the sabbath was from a right, unburdened conscience, and (2) that it served a purpose to advance his ministry with his disciples (i.e. from faith). In this sense, he wasn't compelled to obey the sabbath for the sabbath's own sake ("man was not made for the sabbath's [sake]"), but rather recognized the fact that the sabbath was given for man's benefit - a benefit mankind would not have received early on if it wasn't commanded to do so ("but the sabbath was made for man").

I wrote more about this in (what admittedly has the worst word-choices of any post in the sidebar series) 112.

The pendulum has the potential to swing very hard either way on this one: judaizers vs. lawlessness

Right. I find that most Christians are one or the other, more commonly known as legalists and antinomians. The reality is that young believers need legalism to get a firm foothold in the faith, just as children need hard rules. But when a child becomes a mature adult, they are free from their parents' rules and instead get to operate on love, making use of the spirit of their parents instilled in them since childhood by the way they were raised. Unfortunately, too many people never actually mature this way in the faith - to a point that they personalize a relationship with a spouse and start reproducing (biblically, an expectation of men and women throughout most of Israel's history, per the "be fruitful and multiply" command). We just now understand this to be a spiritual reproduction and multiplication ("make disciples," as you referenced) and not merely a physical one.

On Testosterone

2 upvotes · 3 April 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Gotcha, I'll ignore, then. Unless there's a short-term reason to want to have that look ... like our annual weekend waterpark trip. Thanks for the tip!

When do the lines begin to blur in Christianity?

2 upvotes · 3 April 2020 · /r/askRPC

So what would be your take on this post a buddy of mine wrote on r/TrueChristian?
https://www.reddit.com/r/TrueChristian/comments/f8vuke/is_this_a_sin_is_that_a_sin_not_the_right/

I'm 100% on board with what he said there.

When do the lines begin to blur in Christianity?

2 upvotes · 3 April 2020 · /r/askRPC

Right. So why don't you be the one to make one of those posts? I usually try to avoid recycling old content. But from a fresh source - that can have value.

When do the lines begin to blur in Christianity?

2 upvotes · 3 April 2020 · /r/askRPC

I would argue that Mosaic law isn't meant for sanctification either. But I get and agree with your underlying point about the way it was never intended to be used.

When do the lines begin to blur in Christianity?

2 upvotes · 3 April 2020 · /r/askRPC

I endorse this.

Most Christians Do Not Love Women

2 upvotes · 2 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is exactly what I was going to say. These things often have negative connotations in society - not because they're inherently evil (they're not: nothing is inherently unclean, per Romans 14:14), but because the feminist influences in the world have decided they don't like associating these historical traits of women with who they want women to be today. It is a cultural conditioning that causes people to see certain traits as negative, not an inherent design by God through creation.

Married Man's Guide To Dating

2 upvotes · 31 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Solid post, brother.

I realized some girls just don't like me. Worrying about why is pointless.

This is the point of the polarization concept from Models.

It's not that you are bad, it's that the top 5% are so much better.

Right. This is hypergamy at its most basic levels.

exchange numbers with plans to hang out. I do this with both men and women

This is key. It shows that it's who you are, not a facade you're doing just to get a date that will fade away once you're married.

You can be great at meeting and relating to people if you do it often

Also massively powerful for evangelism. People who say, "That's just not me. I'm an introvert, so I'm excused from doing that," don't realize your underlying point here: IT'S A SKILL. Go work on it. Period. Even introverts can initiate conversations. On the M-B spectrum, I can almost guarantee my wife is a bigger introvert than any guy on here. In fact, after taking an MMPI she scored extremely high for having an avoidant personality disorder - that's how bad her introversion is. Yet I've taught her to initiate with people so that she now invites people over for dinner, hosts game parties, starts text message chains, hosts a small group, etc. She learned the skill.

be the guy that actually follows up

This is a major difference between an evangelist and a disciple-maker. The evangelist is a one-and-done. The disciple-maker keeps going back.

Why is mission so important? Because ...

2 upvotes · 19 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Give me a couple examples please

The obvious ones are what I've heard from a number of guys on MRP:

- Grow my business to become a fortune 500 company
- Become a 10-millionaire
- Sleep with over X number of women

These are missions. They just don't involve making disciples, so they're unbiblical.

I think you're looking at this purely from the perspective of a mature believer who has already bought into the great commission. Props for you on that! But even on r/TrueChristian I've had encounters where people will say things like, "The Great Commission is only for pastors/priests. Jesus didn't give that command to everyone - only the leaders of the church." This is, of course, completely contrary to not only the way the apostles interpreted the Great Commission in their letters, but also the very language of the great commission itself. But my point is that even Christians have unbiblical missions that don't involve making disciples.

Or perhaps a more accurate way to put it is: God gave them a mission to make disciples - so that is, in fact, their mission ... but they've abandoned it for their own ideas of what they want to do with their lives. In this context, when I talk about a man's mission, I mean the one they're actually pursuing, not the one that's implicit in the background that they may be ignoring.

Why is mission so important? Because ...

2 upvotes · 18 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Solid, brother. I love this. I'll just clarify: a man CAN have other missions, but if they don't involve making disciples, they're unbiblical.

I also commonly tell people that God has given us all a singular mission (whether we're accept it or not), but our specific gifts, passions, and life circumstances create the context for carrying out that mission. Glad to see you get it!

Coronavirus Mega Thread

2 upvotes · 17 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Not as good as squats and bench press, but among the best if bodyweight routines.

Coronavirus Mega Thread

2 upvotes · 17 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Well said.

Whose game are you winning?

2 upvotes · 16 March 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

It's different for every guy. I talk about my mission enough on r/RPChristians that I don't need to push the idea here. But you can come up with your own mission. But if it's a weak/crappy mission that's too easy to accomplish and doesn't ultimately amount to anything, it's not going to be attractive. Missions can even be ridiculous and still be attractive - but only if they have long-term substance and aren't wife-focused. For example:

- Bad Mission: "I want to build up the courage to yodel in my driveway sometime in my life." This is idiotic.

You can do that tomorrow.

- Good Mission: Even sticking with the yodeling theme: "I want to become the best selling yodeling artist in the world" - now you've got a mission that shows real ambition ... even if it's a weird/silly one. It's going to take work and dedication. It will require significant commitment and displays of masculine traits, because one can't become the best yodeler without that.

Buuuut ...

- Bad Mission: "I want to become the best selling yodeling artist in the world to impress my wife." This is unattractive. She'll smell the crappy motive a mile away.

When a guy's "mission" is simply to goof off on the weekends, he's going to have a few fun lays, which is great for TRP, but if you want to maintain sexual health in the context of a marriage (i.e. MRP), the mission becomes essential.

Third commandment of poon: "You shall make your mission, not your woman, your priority."

So... you got the "I love you but I'm not in love with you" (ILYBINILWY) speech?

2 upvotes · 12 March 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

There's that too. Then again, my mom just commented recently about how shocked she is at how some of her 300lb co-workers with bumps on their faces will still manage to find reasonably good looking, in-shape guys they wind up getting engaged with. The power of the blue pill knows no bounds at deluding men. As long as guys remain clueless, women will retain the advantage in the sexual marketplace against them.

Whose game are you winning?

2 upvotes · 12 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I feel like sometimes with me you try to force some kind of flaw in my approach. But there are some things that are just basic common sense :p

Whose game are you winning?

2 upvotes · 12 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right, which is what we do. Under $50 a few times a month - no questions asked. No sense wasting my time micro managing her.

Whose game are you winning?

2 upvotes · 12 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

That's a fair caution. Materialism is so far from me that there's no chance I'll ever come close to out-spending her. If I do spend funds, it will be on taking guys I disciple out to eat. Beyond ministry-oriented expenses, I save up for joint vacations to do together.

Appreciation Post - For advice given 1.5 years ago and Question about how to identify Masculine Churches advice given 1.5 years ago ... Reading: 1. Read 60% of RPC sidebar

2 upvotes · 9 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm glad you've finally found some release from a bad relationship. But this incongruity needs to be fixed. The 300s and 400s are where the depth of spiritual growth takes place. In reality, if you are solid with those, you can figure out the 100s and 200s for yourself. As such, they're even more foundational because everything you live by will be derived from those spiritual disciplines you learn therein. Also, they directly relate to ...

Any advice on what to look for as an identifier of a good masculine church?

If you had the spiritual foundation, not only would you have figured out long ago that you should get out of a dead-end relationship, but you also would be far less concerned with finding the "right" "church."

A "masculine church" should not be the goal. Consider that you admitted that you're "very immature," spiritually. Yet you're also believing you're mature enough to know what kind of church you're looking for - you just want us to help you find something that meets the qualifications you believe are best. In this situation, you're not likely to find a masculine congregation, and even if you do it's likely to have so many other problems that it's going to screw you up in other ways that you won't know to look out for.

Now imagine I'm looking for a new job as a website designer. I've done a lot of research on wordpress and know how to use all of its formatting and design. I realize that a lot of companies don't know how to use wordpress properly - to a degree that's embarrassing, but this is because they're the experts at html, which I'm clueless about. So, I go find a company that uses wordpress the same way I do, but they have no clue how to use html and they keep teaching me the wrong way to do it. At the end of the day, I'm no better off in my expertise in the profession than I started, right? I still know how to use wordpress and not html - except now I think I know how to use html because I've got a company training me on it, but they're training me wrong and I'm clueless.

Imagine that I took the other job instead. They can teach me all the wrong ways to use wordpress and that's fine because I know better. I just ignore their advice and for clients that want a wordpress page I create a stunning product for them that surpasses company expectations. Yet when they teach me html, I'm now also learning something of actual value and able to make use of that in the world. Now I am better off.

This is how it is with spiritual growth. I often advise people never commit to one individual congregation, as if a singular congregation is "The Church." It's not. You can attend a congregation for as many years as you can derive benefit from it, and then move on. And that benefit is not limited to your learning, but your capacity for ministering to those around you as well. I may stay in the same body for 50 years if it continually furnishes me new people who are hungry to be discipled and does nothing to stifle the mission God gave me.

Chances are, you know enough about biblical masculinity from what you learn here (if you'd actually finish the sidebar!) that there's relatively little risk that you're going to be led astray on that point by a feminized congregation. However, you also now have something to offer that congregation - an aspect of biblical truth that they lack and which you can provide, thereby benefiting the body in the way they may benefit you in other areas.

Now, it could be that they're a company that sucks at both html and wordpress. Maybe they just offer nothing of value at all. That's possible too. Though I do find that the spiritually mature will always find use of someone else doing the hard work of pooling people together for them.

To become such a spiritually mature person, begin with the 300/400 series on the sidebar and seek out someone you trust to disciple you. I know there are guys on here who would love the chance, so ask around. Just make sure you're faithful, available, and teachable and not someone who's going to fizzle out as soon as the excitement wanes.

In the meantime, you're better off focusing on Scripture than looking for a congregation to spoon feed you. Learn to feed yourself first. If you need a place just to make some friends because you lack the ability to develop a social sphere for yourself, then look for a congregation full of active people rather than passive pew-sitters. You find active ministers among the non-staff members rather than mere passive attenders and that's a congregation worth investing your time in so that when you do become mature you already have the relational clout and history of commitment to the body that will allow you a place of influence among the leadership.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/04/20)

2 upvotes · 5 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Props for the reply, chuck. I didn't mean to call you out or shame you - this is actually one of the most commonly misused passages, especially on r/TrueChristian. So, I don't fault you in the slightest.

That said, on further thought, the relationship between Paul and Timothy is another great example within Scripture of an adult discipling a minor. Their relationship shows an incredibly close relational bond throughout Scripture, referencing parental terms as though it stretches beyond the mere status of Paul as Timothy's spiritual father and into the specific ways of how they interacted in their ministry together (Philippians 2, I believe, addresses this).

How do we know Timothy's age when Paul started discipling him? From Acts 16:1-5 we know that he was picked up on Paul's second missionary journey. 1 Timothy was written 14 years later. 4:12 says, "Don't let anyone look down on you because you are young." I believe the average life expectancy for a Roman (excluding infant mortality) was around 55 years old (best records we have from that time period; also likely the highest life expectancy of anywhere in the world at the time). I can hardly assume someone would be called "young" who was over the half-way hump. So let's say, at the high end, Timothy was 27 when 1 Timothy was written. Subtracting those 14 years to when Paul first started discipling him and had him leave his family to follow him, that would make him 13 years old - and that's on the HIGH end. Even with modern life expectancy, we don't think of "27" as being "young" in the sense that one's age would impact their credibility in ministry. As I understand it, people could become pharisees, even, at much younger ages - and they were considered the most authoritative "elite" ministers among the Jewish communities that Timothy and Paul came from.

So, back to /u/dansnapsit - There's absolutely nothing biblically inappropriate about discipling minors, as this is modeled by Paul. Many people even believe the original disciples were teenagers (based on the years they died relative to) when they first started following Jesus.

Peter is, perhaps, a possible exception, as people think he may have been older because he was married. However, people were also married at much younger ages, back then. Under Jewish law, boys could marry at 14 and girls at 12. So, even with him having a wife, it's still probable that he was a teenager when Jesus first began discipling him.

Never let youth detract you and if adults in the congregation are opposed to this, make sure they're fully aware of the model Jesus and the apostles set for us and the way that the apostles and Timothy are often hailed as being the epitome of what it means to be a disciple - and that this epitome presumably always starts with those who are young.

The Wife Who Truly Loves You

2 upvotes · 4 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Exactly.

Anger, Frame, and Power

2 upvotes · 4 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not sure about all of this, but I do agree with your conclusion. The most essential phrase you've given: "The truly strong don't feel a need to prove their strength." Solid. If you're trying to prove anything to anyone, you're in their frame.

Now, there are concepts when it's okay to operate in someone else's frame. If you want a promotion, you might have to prove to your boss that you're the right man for the job. He has power and authority to decide within his own framework who gets the position. So, keep that caveat in mind.

I tried to share the good news but I think I failed miserably.

2 upvotes · 2 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Props for the turn-around in your life and actually trying to share your faith with those in need. A few notes:

explaining the holy spirit, if they keep on sinning then they are not spirit led yet

You can't become Spirit-led by quitting sin. You quit sin by being Spirit-led. You've got the process backwards.

How do you be Spirit-led? First, Luke 11:13 says to ask God for his Spirit. Second, you repent in your heart - which means not just a repentance AWAY FROM sin (which is not actual repentance by itself); rather, it's a turn TOWARD God's plan for your life. Remember that "anything that does not come from faith is sin." This means that repenting of one sin is still sin if it just leads you to another sin to fill the void. Imagine you're in a room with 360 doors - one at every degree. The door at the 90 degree mark from where you're facing is the only door that is godly. Turning 180 degrees from the sin door you're facing is technically a repentance, but because you haven't turned toward God's plan either, it's a pointless repentance.

What is God's plan for you? "Go, therefore, and make disciples of all nations" is the overarching imperative. If one isn't on board with that first, repentance is a pointless endeavor because you will never be turning toward the door God actually wants you walking through. Once someone starts living on-mission to make disciples, the sin issues get worked out as a byproduct because the Spirit will be the one leading you toward God's purposes for you, which inherently means away from sin.

Too many Christians think sanctification happens in a vacuum - that God will just start sanctifying them because they asked for it. But in reality, sanctification is a refining process meant to qualify people for a purpose. That purpose is inextricably tied to God's overarching goal of making disciples of all nations. So, never ask people to repent for repentance's own sake, as that's a futile venture.

This is the first time I've ever mentioned God to anyone or tried to educate fellow christians and I feel like I failed big time.

As /u/Deep_Strength said, don't sweat it. A big part of the burden is on us - but an even larger part is on Christ. Go back to spiritual reproduction: the wife is to be open to her husband's initiation, but he's still the one who leads in the bedroom. She can have some input on what makes the experience more enjoyable, but most women seem to prefer it when the man takes charge and they don't have to run the show. When you get worried about your performance like this, it's like you're trying to run the show yourself. But Jesus is ultimately the one in control. I could tell stories to back this up, but take my word for it: you do what God told you to do and let him be the one to decide how the people on the other end are receiving it. Do your best to be tactful and improve your skill, but don't put that kind of pressure on yourself any more than you'd want your wife to feel the pressure of your entire sexuality being dependent on her performance in the absence of your leadership in the bedroom.

As far as strategy goes, I wouldn't use "educating" them as your primary method of getting the Gospel across. Most people don't like being told that they're wrong or that their understanding is incomplete. As soon as you do that, even if you can persuade them, their general disposition is to fight against what you're saying to see if maybe you're the wrong one. You have to get people to think things are their own idea first.

The best way to do this in evangelism is simply to ask lots of questions about what they already believe. If they ask you something early in the relationship, answer by asking back first (before you answer): "What do YOU think is the answer to your own question?" Get them talking about their own beliefs enough that (1) you can understand where they're coming from so you know better how to share Christ with them, and (2) they feel comfortable discussing these things to a degree that they start asking you back about your beliefs. Once they're asking you quite regularly what you believe, that's your opening to share your own personal views. When you do this, because it's not you trying to persuade them you're right, they're not psychologically predisposed to fight against what you're saying. They're just listening because they want to know and understand you. And this is when they're most receptive to learning and growing.

In short: If you tell someone what they should believe, they will be skeptical; if they ask you what you believe and you answer, they are receptive. The issue, then, is simply to get them curious enough about what you believe that they actually start asking - and the best way to do this is to find contextually appropriate ways to ask them first, and eventually they will extend the courtesy back.

When you do get the chance to share, it's best to do this through your own testimony first. Again, this comes off as you sharing your own view rather than attempting to persuade them of what their view ought to be. Eventually you can switch to directly attempting to change their view, but it seems most efficient to start here first.

What about BDSM and Roleplay?

2 upvotes · 2 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

What are you trying to insinuate here?

What about BDSM and Roleplay?

2 upvotes · 2 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This seems like needless bickering. /u/Deep_Strength already included in his original comment "form/appearance" - so both translations were covered ("kind" is the other common translation, which is included in "form").

More to the point, are you really challenging the premise that if "you think it can cause others to stumble or you think it might be questionable, don't even engage in that behavior"? Or are you just nitpicking on which verse he used to get to that otherwise perfectly biblical conclusion?

Seeking Godly Counsel 1/2

2 upvotes · 27 January 2020 · /r/askRPC

A few quick tips:

- A man with an abundance mentality will never be hurt and "sobbing" when relationships end.
- Shift from a sniper approach to a shotgun approach to inviting women into your life. The invitation doesn't have to be for the purpose of dating. But having a broader social network, including of women, does help with not only dating, but virtually everything else you'll need for your mission also. If you want to go overseas, how do you think you'll get funding with no social support system? How do you think you'll find people who can teach and train you? How do you think you'll practice for ministering overseas if you don't have a network of people to practice with now? How do you think you'll find a partner?
- Memorize Galatians 1:10 and recite it to yourself 5 times a day (at least an hour apart each time) for the next 30 days.

Update us when you've worked on these things.

Joseph's journey—and maybe yours

2 upvotes · 27 January 2020 · /r/RPChristians

What I can't understand is what is the purpose of presenting my requests to God through prayer and petition?

My wife has brought the request to me many, many, many times that she wants a dog. I always refuse and say we will never get one. But she still loves dogs. She still tells me how much she'd love to have one. Somewhere, deep down, she's hoping she can change my mind, even though I am steadfast in my determination on this issue and have reaffirmed the same repeatedly.

At some point, it's no longer about trying to change my mind. It's about communicating her heart, thoughts, desires, etc. to me so that I know and understand them, lest she think: "Maybe he said no because he didn't realize how truly, deeply I wanted it - and maybe if he knew and understood, then his mind might change." Of course, there's also the parable of the man asking for bread in the middle of the night, where Jesus concludes that the man will wake up and give his friend bread - not because they are friends, but because of the audacity and shameless petition of the one seeking the bread.

To un-muddle some of this - the point of prayer isn't to get from God, but to relate with God. It's just like when my wife talks to me in the evening. She doesn't sit down and plan: "Now's my time to convince my husband to do all these things for me." Instead, she expresses what's on her heart so I know and understand her and can incorporate her wishes into my plan as I see fit. I only incorporate them if I will to do so - that is, I won't incorporate her requests that aren't in my plan (like getting a dog), but there are many things that she requests that I didn't originally intend, yet I add to my plan because my plan is flexible and allows room to incorporate the desires of those I love.

And we know that this matters for God too, as James says plainly: "You do not have because you do not ask. And when you do ask, you ask with wrong motives." In other words, if we don't pray to God, even though he may, through omniscience, know our desires, he will still choose not to incorporate those desires into his will/plan if we don't care enough about them to relay them to him. But even beyond getting what we want, the true value of prayer is in the relational conversation of knowing that our groom understands and knows us, just as a bride longs to know that her man understands and knows her, and thus cherishes the ability to share her heart with him through conversation.

While I deny that conversation is as vital to marriage as many marriage counselors would suggest, I don't deny that it is an important facet of a relationship, more generally. Likewise, some people hang their entire relationship with God on prayer, as if it's the most important aspect of the spiritual life. It's not. But it's certainly AN important one. Just not THE most important one.

Tag: /u/Deep_Strength /u/RedPillWonder

WISNIFG - the 1st assertive right through God

2 upvotes · 12 January 2020 · /r/askRPC

Shouldn't I consider God's judgement and frame as my guide instead of my own?

First, God hasn't judged you yet. That won't happen until Judgment Day. So, it's more accurate to say you will be judged by God someday, but until then you must judge for yourself your own life and actions.

Second, the function of sanctification is to make you more godly/Christ-like. In doing so, your own judgment becomes more aligned with God's so that your self-judgment is consistent with God's eventual judgment over you.

Third, your frame is often described as "your best self." This would be a sinless version of you, as a sinful version is less than your best. As such, living in your frame (i.e. the "perfect you") inherently assumes you are sinless and are, therefore, judging yourself consistently with God's judgment over you. When you sin you break your frame (or show that your otherwise unbroken frame was a bad one), which should offend not only God's eventual judgment over you, but also your present judgment of yourself.

Also - what /u/Deep_Strength said.

2 Year Field Report

2 upvotes · 12 January 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Solid report, brother. I appreciate you sharing this. Being mission-oriented is certainly one of the most foundational concepts RPC has to offer, without which everything else falls apart no matter how well you seem to master it all.

Her priority was everyone EXCEPT me and it was a major irritation.

A simple note here: this is natural for women raised in modern society. They believe the husband is to pour his attention on her so her cup fills up to pour out on everyone else. This originates from the "stay at home mom" shift that replaced "housewife" as the job title. The wife's responsibility shifted away from meeting her husband's needs around the house and toward caring for the kids. How did she have time and energy to focus so much on the kids? Her husband, of course. He would provide all of her needs for her and give her emotional support so she could keep doing "God's work" in raising the kids. And if it's not kids, it's the neighbors or friends from church or anyone else she feels like she wants to spend time with. Church girls, in particular, use the "spiritual impact" of those relationships as a trump-card to keep husbands stuck in that framework.

In reality, the husband should be the outward-focused one. He should not have to make his wife and kids his everything - but he should be calling them to his side constantly, which lets them know they're valuable and needed in his life, which is what a woman really wants to know from her man.

How would a turnaround for the church look like? Making it more RP than Feminist.

2 upvotes · 22 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

But practicing homosexuality in itself is a false reflection.

How would a turnaround for the church look like? Making it more RP than Feminist.

2 upvotes · 22 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I think the relevant thing here is that it's not wrong because Paul said so. It's wrong because it reflects a false image of God to the world. This is the essence of the new covenant: not only that we are free from the law into grace, but also that we are reconciled to God and restored in our capacity to reflect his image.

Our obligation to obedience is not "because the bible says so" - whether that's the law, or Paul, or even Jesus. Our obligation is to live up to the perfect creation we were once made in Eden and now can be again, as defined in Genesis by the image of God.

Anyone who lives by the letter of scripture - even new testament scripture - will be judged by the letter, which is an impossible standard. Better to understand and know God than merely his commands.

How would a turnaround for the church look like? Making it more RP than Feminist.

2 upvotes · 22 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Note the context of the conversation was my telling him you can't use old testament law as an authority on the issue of homosexuality. OT law is informative, but non binding on all issues.

How would a turnaround for the church look like? Making it more RP than Feminist.

2 upvotes · 22 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Then what do you make of all the passages in the new testament where Paul says non Jews aren't subject to old testament law?

Advice on moving forward with Christian dudes who are bp?

2 upvotes · 17 December 2019 · /r/askRPC

Solid.

Christmas Songs

2 upvotes · 17 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

What about A Weight in a Manger? The one where baby Jesus shows the wise men how buff he is?

Christmas Songs

2 upvotes · 17 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

For that matter, most practices we see in Sunday services have pagan origins. Are we to give up on Sunday services too? Some say yes. I'm not there yet.

FR: Fatherhood. Some early observations.

2 upvotes · 17 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent post in its entirety!

Babies have amazing frame.

I'd contemplated doing a series on parenting and this was exactly one of my points. Kids, in general, virtually always operate from their own point of origin. Most parents believe their entire job is to train their kids to stop doing that. I'm taking a slightly different approach with my son. Results TBD, but it's working.

I admit, when my son is screaming his head off for reasons I have yet to diagnose, it can become frustrating.

That was one of my advantages as a younger father. I can deal with 4 kids screaming bloody murder at once and keep reading/eating/whatever. Too many parents are obsessed with attending to their kids' every need. This will ruin them down the road.

The newborn phase is not the time to skimp, pinch pennies, and save.

I'd say this more depends on your phase of life when you have kids. I wouldn't let your newborn change your financial goals. If you're younger, then you should absolutely pinch your pennies. You haven't had the time to save up a war chest yet. Financial wisdom for long-term planning doesn't change because you have a kid. If anything, it becomes harder. If you have a kid later in life to the point where you actually have discretionary income, then go for it. But I would not recommend that path for those who are having kids in their 20s.

Some products, like cloth diapers, work far better than their disposable counter parts and save you a ton of money in the meantime.

So ... this is the exact opposite of what you just said. Cloth diapers are also way more time-consuming than their disposable counter-parts. Either way - your underlying point is absolutely true. There are some things that should not be compromised on, though, so watch out for that. For example - don't buy a used car seat that was in a car accident. Or don't buy used shoes for kids.

Going to the gym is more difficult now.

Welcome to my world ... finally!

Leaving the house to go to the gym also means leaving my wife alone with a newborn. It's doable, but it isn't fun.

It gets worse when you have multiple kids and your wife is adamant that she cannot handle the chaos. The trick is to find ways to bring your kids with you. My 8yo son now works out with me (and good luck finding a gym that will actually let 8yo kids use the equipment!). I also pay for the other kids to have access to their play area ... but even that is less than ideal because then you're shoving your kids in a daycare-type center for most of your quality evening hours every week, if you're doing that every time you go. Another alternative I've found is leaving work early and getting extra hours in at night after everyone else is in bed ... but I also have a job where I make my own hours and not everyone does.

Anyway, I've long been telling people that gym-time is much harder when you have kids (especially multiples who are young), but most people think I'm crazy. It's definitely doable, though. You just have to make sacrifices on some other priorities.

it means you cannot be indulging yourself wasting time screwing around between sets

That's the direction I've taken lately. I used to spend 2.5 hours there 5 days a week (even after my 4th was born). I've lately shifted to about 60 minutes of high-intensity lifting and do my cardio at home. As you note, my gains have stopped. I've probably even dropped a bit. I'm no longer benching close to 300 - I now hover around 265 for my sets (sometimes less if I'm low on calories). I really haven't pushed PRs in months. I only do that when I know I've got an easy couple weeks that I can really dedicate to it.

Another thing worth noting: dieting will become more difficult when your kids are old enough to eat real food and you want to start establishing a pattern of family meals as a time to process your kids' day with them. Before kids, my wife and I often ate separately and I had a lot more autonomy over things. Nowadays, it's awkward if everyone else is eating and I've got an empty plate, or if I've got something different from what everyone else has. I still do it from time to time, but it creates a sense of disunity that I prefer to avoid when I can.

It's not as hard as people make it out to be.

More common advice I often given. It's as hard as you psych yourself out to believe it will be. Having kids is easy. One of the things that my wife claims to be ticked off most about me is the fact that I can manage all 4 kids in public, out to eat, at a playground, walking through stores, etc. with a smile on my face and no problems at all, whereas for her the very thought of walking down the street with all 4 brings a wave of paralyzing stress over her.

Glad to hear this is all going so well for you, brother! Keep being an inspiration to the group.

no offense but wouldn't islam/judaism accomplish your goal faster of having a nuclear family and resisting feminism?

2 upvotes · 12 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

(correct me if I am wrong) But it seems like you guys want

This is obviously where you're wrong. Our goal/desire has nothing to do with this world. We want what God wills. It just so happens that God wills a lot of the things you referenced. They are our goal not because we want them as an end in themselves - we want them because God wants them.

If God desired feminist domination and that men lick toilets to clean them, that's what I'd be fighting for as well. We are not manosphere guys who have chosen to be Christian. We are Christian men who have found commonality between God's desires and the manosphere.

Tag: /u/rocknrollchuck

Own Your Shit Weekly - December 10, 2019

2 upvotes · 11 December 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Some people just can't see their own issues. This guy's obviously one of them. You picked the exact two statements I was going to single out until I saw you already did so.

The thing is: he thinks his drinking isn't a problem so no one else should see it as a problem either. But that's not how it works. If there's a claim of alcohol abuse, ANY drinking at all is viewed as a problem and a risk.

I just went through this with another client. He was furious that the mom was drinking and using meth while breastfeeding. He couldn't wrap his head around why it wasn't okay for him to be using coke and ecstasy. "But I'm not breastfeeding, so it doesn't get in the baby's system, and I don't do it when the baby is with me, so why does it matter?" Idiot.

Then he went to rehab and cleaned up ... until he was caught buying alcohol. "But I'm in rehab for coke and ecstasy, not alcohol," he says. Really?! But that's how people think.

Regardless ... I just spoke to the psychologist this morning, who is recommending my client to get custody, so I was able to wiseen my client up over time. But it took months of idiocy before he finally started to understand how the court would perceive his actions.

This particular user doesn't yet realize that being a standup guy to the court means out of court too - any time anyone involved with the cour could ever figure out what he's doing, including the kids and his stbe. Not just at the actual hearings.

I feel like this girl wanted me to kiss her last date.

2 upvotes · 15 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Me.

A place for your questions and off-topic discussion.

2 upvotes · 8 November 2019 · /r/askRPC

You don't see the line that says "Refer to the RPC sidebar for rules and recommend reading materials"?

A place for your questions and off-topic discussion.

2 upvotes · 8 November 2019 · /r/askRPC

The sidebar incorporates thre RPC rules. Maybe that never got ported to the redesign, if that's what you're looking on.

Sharing church with soon-to-be ex-wife

2 upvotes · 6 November 2019 · /r/askRPC

Solid.

Confession & Repentance?

2 upvotes · 4 November 2019 · /r/askRPC

It's up - unedited, but I ran out of time.

What are your thoughts on kissing a girl on the first date?

2 upvotes · 4 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

not some "line" that you cross but are rather a "direction."

Beautiful. I often teach guys the difference between a "destinational" and "directional" mentality. Most of Christianity only makes sense in a directional framework. The destinational crowd often makes an idol of their own view of Jesus rather than the living, moving, active Jesus who's on the go.

"how much can I do until I'm sinning" is establishing a law that you have to work to keep when, as Christians, we are told to live under grace

Right again. I often tell guys when they ask, "Is <blank> a sin?" that their motive is in the wrong place from the get-go. 99% of the time it's because they're looking to the law to justify their actions. Even if the law justifies that particular behavior and deems it "not sin," the fact that one looks to the law in the first place as their source of justification means they're not looking to Christ to justify them. So, the same law that vindicates them in this one area will condemn them in countless other areas - a standard I'd never want to be subject to in the first place. Better not to look for legal technicalities in Scripture at all and follow a Romans 14:14, 23 approach instead.

Living in grace causes us to desire to do what is right

Yep, because the best way to keep from sinning isn't to try to avoid sinning, but to start doing what's right.

1 Cor 7:1-2 is close: "It is good not to touch a woman"

In that verse, Paul is quoting what they were saying and spends the rest of the chapter clarifying why this is a false/misleading statement and when it's appropriate/not to do so.

How to deal with atheist parents

2 upvotes · 31 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

if they're already dismissing something as concrete ... then something as abstract ... would not really touch their hearts

For your purposes, the point right now isn't to persuade them. It's to set a clear boundary. By focusing on the abstract, as /u/helaughsinhidden suggests, you're showing them that conventional atheist thinking will not persuade you away, so they are wasting their time trying to pull you away. When this happens, they will respect your commitment - and when they respect your decision on this, they'll be more curious as to your commitment to it, despite the fact that it defies their comprehension.

How to communicate self-improvement to a potential partner?

2 upvotes · 27 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

More accurately: you don't have a frame yet; you've learned to be confident and assertive within someone else's frame.

Straight from the horse's mouth: Fuck Chad while you string along Beta Billy for months on end. Another WAATGM in the making.

2 upvotes · 24 October 2019 · /r/WhereAreAllTheGoodMen

This is how you get r/deadbedrooms. This is how you get r/theredpill, r/marriedredpill, and r/whereareallthegoodmen.

Hey, you forgot r/RPChristians ;) The Christian guys are by and large the most duped among all the beta males - and I was once their royal blue king.

Is my marriage salvageable?

2 upvotes · 23 October 2019 · /r/askMRP

Ah, then you're good.

DEERing? DAREing? Something else?

2 upvotes · 21 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

You're spending too much effort trying to condition your wife. Stop that. You're in her frame, caring too much what she thinks or feels. If your wife thinks the moon is made of cheese, how does that belief stop you from living out your mission? What is your mission, by the way? I didn't see that in your post.

I think STFU wouldn't work here because it implies that I can't disagree with her because she's right Implies it to who? If you know your own reason, then it doesn't imply anything of the sort to you. If you're talking about what it implies to her, that's textbook evidence of you giving too many craps about what she thinks. This is what I mean by trying to condition her - you're trying to get her to see things from your perspective. Bad strategy.

She will never understand you. I know that's not a true statement, but it's what you need to tell yourself right now in order to get your head out of your butt. She will never understand you. Chant that to yourself for a few days. If you can fully embrace this concept, then DEERing becomes pointless in the first place. Why try to do the impossible? Why try to convince her of something she will never understand?

Now, in reality, we all know that she will understand you sometimes, but not other times. Right now you're living solely for those "some times" and getting inordinately frustrated when those "other times" come up. When you play the DEERing game, that's life. But by embracing the "other times" as all the time, you'll find

- because you're not forcing your perspective on her, she will be curious about it on her own initiative, which is the starting point of her sliding into your frame
- because her understanding of your position is genuine from her and not external from you, it's more authentic and leads to greater submissiveness and respect
- you'll be more prepared to deal with the frequency of her misunderstandings of your perspective because you take that as the norm rather than assuming she must understand you at all times
- you'll be more pleasantly surprised in those instances where she does see things your way
- you'll also be more attractive to her because you are becoming a powerful man whose perspective on life and reality does not depend on her, rather than being a peer to her who is always trying to communicate eye-to-eye with her, which only motivates her to fight against you due to her curse from Eve.

No matter how you look at it, this is just a better approach all around.

Question: Understanding Passive game vs. Approaching

2 upvotes · 20 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I must say - I'm impressed at how spot-on all of your comments are in this thread. I couldn't agree more.

/u/SingularityOne198 - If it helps, imagine a guy who's a 2 learning all kinds of "active game" strategies to pick up women. His mastery of active game might get him up a couple points to a 4. But what has he really accomplished? His goal is obviously to get a woman in bed with him - something Scripture says is a distraction from his mission that should only be engaged in to avoid temptation, yet he is running toward that temptation full-on.

Conversely, a guy decides he wants to be the best disciple-maker he can be. Screw the pursuit of women. He realizes:

- People are more likely to hear what you have to say and follow you if you're fit, so I better get fit.
- People aren't going to follow you for long if you're a crappy leader, so I'd better learn how to lead.
- People won't trust me if I'm not even confident about what I have to offer, so I'd better work on my confidence.
- I can't get people to follow me if I don't know how to relate with people, so I'd better work on my social skills.

The list goes on. In doing all of this, instead of a 2 trying to pretend he's a 4 to get a 3, now you've got a guy who's fit, a skilled leader, confident, socially talented, etc. - he becomes a 7. Maybe even an 8!

Did him doing these things distract him from his mission like the 2, or did they advance his mission? They were purely for the purpose of advancing his mission. No distractions. He's not even looking for a date. But how much easier do you think he'll find one than the other guy who was emphasizing active game as his primary strategy for upping his SMV? Let's explore that.

That 2 wanted to get a 3 by gaming his way to looking like a 4. It was hard work and he faced a lot of rejection learning how to up his SMV to a 4 through active game techniques. How hard do you think the guy who's a 7/8 has to work to get a 3 to follow him? He probably doesn't even have to ask - they're already doing it just by virtue of the fact that he says hi to them at all. Even more so: he's not even interested in that 3 anymore - he's able to pull 6s and 7s with ease, not even by approaching them, but by them approaching him. He doesn't need active game at all in the first place, though perhaps it could be useful to help him get 8s and 9s.

So, he uses it anyway - but not for the sake of getting an 8 or 9 in his bed. He does it because he's growing a following. People are taking notice of his ministry and the difference he's making for Christ and the women around him start to realize how awesome he is. He realizes he's not reaching many women on his own so he starts inviting women to learn from him so they can go reach the other women that he'd rather not spend his own time on. He strategically picks women he knows have the capacity for great influence. What are the characteristics of that woman?

- She's attractive, because women are highly sensitive to the popularity dynamic among other women and inherently view the most attractive women as the most popular - part of the crowd they wish they were in, though because of their competitive hypergamy, they rarely admit this and will instead pretend to hate her, secretly wanting to be her. Seriously, look how many 9s follow 3s and 4s for life wisdom and guidance. It doesn't happen. But women flock to those above them.
- She's faithful, because someone unreliable won't be trusted by the women you're training her to reach.
- She's available, because she can't help you make disciples if she isn't willing to make the time.
- She's saved, because she can't make disciples if she's not.
- She's teachable, because she won't help your mission if she's not - she'd only be advancing her version of what she thinks she's doing, which may not actually line up.

That's right, she's attractive and FAST - the exact same characteristics a guy should want in a wife anyway. And as he disciples her (and preferably several other women like her), he's going to find that he's becoming sexually attracted to one or most of them to a point where it's hard to keep his pants on, so he decides it's time to marry one of them - not because of how many dates they've gone on, or because they've met some social norm of a relationship context that would dictate proposal as the next step, or because she expects him to propose. He does it because he doesn't want to fall into sexual sin with anyone, and of all the girls he's tempted to do that with, she's the one most helpful to his mission (or at the very least, the least likely to interfere with his mission).

Yes, this is all in the sidebar in the singles section.

Boundaries and Boundary Enforcement

2 upvotes · 18 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

I fully endorse this answer.

Being Supportive on Attitude Issues

2 upvotes · 17 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

Opus Dei, which emphasizes work as a path to sanctification

I've heard this theology before. It's dangerous.

He said his spiritual director said he was actually farther along than many men because he actually WANTS to be home with his family (rather than using work as an escape)

I'm guessing his spiritual director (whatever that means) is a baby boomer. That was true of their generation. It is not true of the majority of men in the present generation of middle-class workers, who are generally lazy on the job and just want to go and chill with their kids all day. This has fed into the breed of working moms to SAHDs that are gradually on the rise. The norm is shifting and your husband is in the new norm.

Ultimately, he's not in a role like lawyer where you bill your hours and clock out.

Yeah, that's not how my job works.

Imagine that you were working on a long, long case that wasn't going to go to trial for a year; your boss keeps butting in to give you advice on what to do, but you think that what your boss is telling you to do might cause you to lose.

That's how my job works. Most of my cases are this way. It's one of the reasons I'm excited to be taking over the firm in 2 weeks - I won't be subject to my boss's bad advice. His advice is incredibly good at making the company money, but incredibly bad at helping clients outright (except in a handful of niche circumstances). And virtually every one of my cases is on an 18 month docket + 6 months for trial and getting a decision - so 2 year projects for each case.

my husband's boss HASN'T successfully delivered a product like the one he's working on. It's not at all obvious that the boss's advice is good for anything besides rising higher up within the organization

I think that's what I just described. I know this exact situation very, very well.

What would you do if you thought following your boss's advice would lose you a case and win you a promotion?

Submit to my boss's authority, even if it violates my own better senses. This is the biblical solution. It is not for me to undermine those God has placed in authority over my life. If I follow their advice and it blows up, that's on them. You just have to document your objections along the way.

I'm a Star Trek junkie. Imagine if Riker or Spock undermined Picard or Kirk every time they disagreed on a matter of principle. Spock was much, much smarter than Kirk, after all. And yet the ship succeeded time and again because Spock knew his role and submitted after voicing and documenting his concerns. And if Kirk did screw up, that documentation of concern would cover Spock's butt the same way I document my concerns against my boss's advice in the form of e-mails to the company or to my boss - especially because he had a habit for a while of giving advice, then getting mad at me for taking it, not remembering he's the one who told me to do it.

and he ultimately thought I had valuable input

How honest was he being here? Or just trying to make you feel valued? I used to do that with my wife, even when I had every intention of disregarding what she said - because she needed to feel that her contribution mattered in the moment.

To be clear: I'm not trying to make a dig at you and suggest you have no value. I'm just making sure you're weighing the other side of what he might be perceiving.

That's not really a realistic expectation with a one year old. I'm doing better at having dinner ready, etc. but our daughter is EXTREMELY needy.

I'm sorry, but I simply can't identify with this. I have 4 kids, including a 2-year old. I've lived through the phase you're at 4 times and with 3 other kids the most recent time. When my youngest was 1 my others were 3, 4, and 6.

My wife has busy seasons where she works 90+ hours a week (like last week), leaving me to (1) work a full time job, (2) take care of all 4 kids, (3) do all of the cooking, (4) manage all of the house and yard work, (5) do all the pick-up/drop-off with school, (6) maintain all of the extracurricular activities for 3 of the kids (youngest isn't old enough), (7) help with homework or general life/relational issues, and (8) do all the night-time routines. All of that falls on me 5 months out of the year (2.5 in spring, 2.5 in fall).

And yes, the house is spotless and dinner on the table every day (granted, I do order out a couple times a week during this season). The one thing I don't keep up with 100% is the laundry - I'm usually a load behind. This past busy season for her I was also working 25% extra hours over what I normally work at my job, due to all the added load of setting up for taking over the company.

My point is: yes, this is INCREDIBLY doable - especially if you only have one kid who isn't even into the 3s yet (the worst age range).

And yes, my youngest is very needy also. I'm often cooking dinner with her in my arms or folding laundry with her in my lap. She follows me around everywhere and doesn't keep herself occupied. Sometimes it means letting her cry it out while I go do other things.

On that point - parenting tip: most psychologists are recognizing that the advice from a decade ago to coddle your kids' emotional needs has proven more harmful than helpful, and the growing trend in advice is that kids need to know that their parents have more important things going on in life than them. The wave of millennials we have now - especially with how screwed up the sexual marketplace is - stems from the fact that when they were children they were taught that they were the center of the universe and their parents' lives revolved around them. I actively tell my kids that I have more important things to do in life than coddle their every need - and that I can help them have an important purpose like that too. This helps mitigate the clinginess when they're older while also instilling the importance of having a biblical mission from a very young age, and hopefully will prevent them from having the same selfish ideologies that plague the millennials today.

So with him, she will fuss for a little bit but he can ignore her and she will go do something else

My wife and I had the same problem. And you already gave the answer: he can ignore her. My wife built a pattern of not ignoring the kids - they were the center of her universe. Result? They knew that she would keep making them her center and give them attention whenever they demanded it. So, for her they'd keep fussing and whining, even at 1 year old, because they knew it would work on her.

We actually found the cure: her busy season. She was forced to start ignoring our kids when she'd work from home. At first, they abused her with whining and clinginess thinking old tactics would work for attention. After a few weeks, they finally gave up and started treating her the same way they did me. It was a painful time for her to let the kids cry it out like that, but the workload forced her to do it. Result? Now when my wife refuses to hold our 2-year-old, instead of crying to be held she goes off and plays with the other kids, building peer-to-peer relationships among the siblings rather than all of our kid's relational energy being focused on the parent-child bond alone, which is unhealthy in exclusion. I know you don't have other kids yet, but it could transition into learning how to play with toys or keep herself occupied.

That sounds really unhealthy. I'm sorry that you were so afraid of your wife's judgment. I know a lot of law firms can be very brutal in the hours they demand; it's a flawed system since more hours don't always mean higher quality work.

When I said I wasn't performing up to par, I didn't mean in the context of a demanding system, but in a lazy way. I have incredible flexibility with my job. I always have. Neither my past nor current employer (and especially not when I become partner of my own firm!) cared what my hours were as long as the work got done, so I always went in and came home as I pleased. I do work from home almost every night after my family goes to bed, but I was referencing lazy days at the office where I would screw around on Reddit or do logic puzzles online for hours. I was truly dishonest for years - but I legitimately didn't have the work to support all the office time, but also didn't want my wife to think I was lazy, so I hid my laziness by doing it in the office where she couldn't see. Fortunately the last few years have legitimately kept me busy and I've been more up-front with my work-load ever since.

primarily he engages in emotional eating

Ah, one of my former vices. He doesn't yet have internal motivation to better himself. This is a sign of spiritual immaturity, even if in the face of a wealth of spiritual knowledge, as I had. There was a traveling preacher who visited our congregation at least once a year who preached on freedom ministry. I remember the "pastor" commenting once, "If he's so free in the Gospel, why hasn't he become free of gluttony yet?" The guy was massively obese and the lack of discipline over his body clearly undermined his spiritual influence.

He also copes with stress by binge watching TV, but then he feels like a loser afterward

Everything you're writing is EXACTLY me 3 years ago. There's hope for him, but he's got to want it himself and probably hit rock-bottom first. And even then, there's no guarantee.

While I greatly appreciate your heart toward encouraging your husband, the way you describe him it almost sounds like your positivity is turning into enabling more than it is helping. Yes, he's happier for it - but so is a drug addict when you give them more meth.

The one who leaves every day for work doesn't appreciate the immense luxury they have just being able to go to the bathroom ALONE

Having been in both roles in differing phases for most of my marriage, I'd prefer being a SAHD over working any day of the week. Period.

[FR] Initiate Often, Confident Always

2 upvotes · 15 October 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

She works from home. And no, she hasn't rejected me when I initiate - I was commenting that if I initiate, she follows and does likewise; if I stop initiating, she stops initiating too.

Red Pill observations at a coaching seminar

2 upvotes · 14 October 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

But what are his thoughts on intergender relational dynamics? A guy like that can still look to his wife for validation. He can still make her his primary mission, as he seeks to excel in his job in order to provide for her every need. He can still fail fitness tests. He can still get butthurt when she rejects his sexual advances.

This is why we can't confuse mere self-improvement with an understanding of sexual dynamics - at least not if u/Rollo-Tomassi has anything to say about it. This man may have been attractive, but we don't necessarily know that he is "red pillled," from the way I understand the term.

Going to the same church as your ex

2 upvotes · 14 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm with /u/ENTPunisher on this one. You said this below

If you're talking about committed Christians active pursuing Christ, then yes the behavior would be important regarding the church's quality

If these are the only people the congregation leader is influencing, he's preaching to the choir. Biblically, the role of the pastor is not to hone the quality of the good sheep who don't wander (that's the job of prophets and teachers); it's to keep the wandering sheep from going too far.

If the congregation leader is focusing only on those who actually pay attention and ignoring those who aren't interested in what he has to say, he's failing at his job. He has a pool of people there who need Jesus more than the choir - people who he already has a context to share Christ with - and if he lets them to their sin rather than addressing it through teaching, rebuking, correcting, and training in righteousness, then that's on him and says a lot of his leadership inadequacy.

To such a congregation leader's credit, this is actually the default of most so-called "pastors," which I say ironically because that title completely ignores the actual biblical role of the pastor.

But the point is that a shepherd's success at his job is not measured by the quality of the sheep who stay, but by his failure to pull back in the sheep who wander off. He is to herd them. Sheep-herder = shepherd. The shepherd is judged not by the ones who follow him, but by the ones who stray. If one wants to take on the title of "pastor," which in a biblical sense (as opposed to the current cultural use) involves shepherding, then the pastor is absolutely to be judged by the least of his flock, not the best of them.

To be fair, the same can be said of teachers. Some people naturally learn quite well. But is a teacher in a classroom successful because of how brilliant his smartest students are, or because of his ability to get through to the kids who would otherwise reject any interest in their own education?

I do agree that at some point a person has to be cut off. But in the case of someone who is in habitual, unrepentant sin - especially, for example, of a sexual nature (not to impute anything on OP) - 1 Cor. 5 would require that such a person either stop identifying as a believer or that they be excommunicated from the congregation until they either (1) repent or (2) stop identifying as a believer (in which case their participation becomes evangelistic in nature). If the "pastor" is not willing to live out this verse, and thereby degrade the quality of his flock by allowing people to participate who have this unrepentant relationship with their sin while claiming the title of "Christian," it gives the Church a bad name - indeed, the name that churchianity has today.

In my view, those kinds of "pastors" should be called to leave the pulpit, regardless of how technically on-point their theology might otherwise be. If they want to teach theology, they should become teachers, not pastors.

... oh, but in modern churchianity pastors are the ones who do the teaching. Per our mod-chat conversation, u/OsmiumZulu - this is another reason why words like this matter. Because churchianity structure today ends up causing way more confusion than it's worth by adopting biblical-sounding words for frameworks and position-titles that don't actually mirror what is present in Scripture.

But I'll get off the soapbox now.

I fell in love with a Muslim girl. What now?

2 upvotes · 11 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

The Muslim god is not the Christian God. The Christian God is triune: Father, Son, and Spirit. If they worship a non-triune god, it's not the same god. Cue the stereotypical, yet highly appropriate "don't be yoked together with unbelievers" verse.

Also, you don't "fall in love" with people. You get obsessive infatuations with them. This is called ONEitis. It is a psychological disease that is unhealthy. Why would you feed into it?

[FR] Comfort Test About Finances and More

2 upvotes · 9 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

She's fiscally conservative but we seem to spend our excess on improvements and projects the last few years as opposed to regular savings

These two statements don't add up. My wife is the same way. If I let her, she'd drain every penny we have on home improvement projects. Most of them are a waste of money. Aesthetics. Women do this. They like pretty things. They realize that if the pretty thing is a trinket for their own personal enjoyment, they're going to get backlash for the waste of money, as the husband sees no value in it.

When it comes to the house, they believe that because "our home is a reflection of who we are," that somehow the husband has to accept it. Then she'll be more specific: "Your home is a reflection of you too." If she's clever, she stops there or deflects to how other people might judge you by your home. But what she really means is: "I'm judging you by the home you let me keep." And then it's purely a matter of how much you care about her judgments of you. That's a frame issue.

We don't have a vision, a direction and that's my fault

I still don't see this vision articulated here.

My vision for my finances is to retire by the age of 50 and switch to full-time ministry. We're on track.

A lot of this has meant deferring home projects in order to put more money into retirement. My wife knows my long-term goals are more important than my short-term goals. She tries to appeal to my mission: "But wouldn't it be better to make disciples now if we fixed up the house now so we could host more people over here now?" No. I can meet people outside the home. And the fact is that 99% of the guys I'd ever meet with simply won't care if there's a section of our basement that's unfinished that we'd like to finish someday. I'd rather let that $25,000 to finish the basement sit in an investment account earning average 10% interest for 2 years before playing with it.

I made a mistake here and didn't share the vision first

You shouldn't have to - but that's her sin issue. Yes, it's better to share the vision, but her respect should not depend on you doing things the most attractive way first. It just goes to show that she's run by her AWALT innate tendencies rather than being able to make conscious choices toward her role as a wife.

"We don't sit and talk in the morning and we don't have coffee outside anymore."

Translation: You used to be emotional tampon. Why can't you go back to being that again? You: "That's what I did. This is what I'm doing. Do you want to join me or keep dwelling on what things used to be like?"

I wouldn't be surprised if in your head somewhere you're thinking, "Yeah, if you get on board with sex, I'll get back on board with coffee outside in the mornings again." But that's regressive thinking. This is the point of my 108 post - you can't regress and expect to make progress. Sure, you might start having coffee outside in the mornings again, but the point of doing that should NOT be a regressive reward ("You were good to me, so now I'll go do one of those old things that you liked as a reward"), but because it fits into the plan moving forward. And if coffee and chat in the morning doesn't fit into the new plan, then it just doesn't fit and it's no longer a viable reward for her.

Me: "I want to share the goals and vision I have for our finances with. I should have done that first and got us on the same page. I skipped right to the actions."

I read this as you saying it with a solemn expression and apologetic tone.

Here's a tip that I've found effective lately: absolutely OYS on stuff like this, but let it protrude from your frame, not as a weakness in your frame.

- "I screwed up and didn't tell you why I wanted to make these changes. Haha. That was stupid. It's because I want to save up for a giant death ray to take over the world. I'm pretty sure those are expensive. We cool now?"

Compare that to:

- "I screwed up. I know I shouldn't have handled the conversation that way. I will try to handle things more appropriately in the future."

What impact do you think those two are going to have on her attitude and ability to absorb into your frame? Even though you're not directly placing her in a position of power on the second one, it's implicit entirely in both the words and the tone: "Will you forgive me?" - and the moment you imply this (even if you don't say it!), you're subjugating yourself to her judgment of you.

The first option, on the other hand, makes it clear that you know you screwed up, but you don't care about her judgment of your screw up. You're going to keep being a happy, fun-loving guy regardless. By teasing her about your own faults and not taking her seriously you're implying: Yeah, I goofed. But you whining about it is something of a joke too. So, let's laugh at the joke and move on.

The later brought resentment and hurt because I was accidentally covertly telling her that I didn't trust her and think she's fiscally irresponsible.

But ... she is fiscally irresponsible. She clearly knows how to set a financial plan and follow through. But her "plan" is only ever in-the-moment expenses that make her feel good about the house and her life. That's an irresponsible vision for the family finances. She cannot be trusted with the money if that's how she's going to spend it. You need to have bigger goals - goals that encompass not just what you do over the next 2 years, but over the next 40 years. Figure that out first, then back-track to figure out how much discretionary room you have left for these house projects.

And don't for a second validate her fiscal responsibility, unless it's to give her a vote of confidence in her ability to help carry out YOUR vision. "I do trust you with the finances. But I'm starting to think longer-term about our future. And if you want to be the old couple sitting on the porch swing together someday, we have to start planning now. Here's the goal. Here's what we need to do to meet that goal. Here's the discretionary room we have in the budget now that can go to house projects, entertainment, sex toys, and if there's any money left over, feeding the kids."

My plan is to add back in communication slowly.

Nah, the damage is done. As u/rocknrollchuck said, you're obviously in a standoff with her and taking this course of action will communicate your willingness to cave in the expectation that she'll cave too. If you were on the brink of divorce, my advice might be different, but I don't get that impression here. Sure, you went a little Rambo, but if the explosions are grenades and not nuclear bombs (i.e. "I'm furious at you!" v. "I'm packing my bags"), you're better off dealing with the damage rather than trying to fix what you blew up.

The plan shouldn't be to un-Rambo yourself at this point. It should be to Jim-Carey yourself. Just have fun. Watch the movie The Mask. Without the mask, IpKiss is a beta pussy. He puts it on and he's a total alpha. People are literally shooting guns at him and he just laughs it off - sometimes even taking it straight on just to show how effortlessly he can deal with the assault. People complain and yell and whine at him and he turns it into a joke. The girl shies away from him and he pushes even closer with exaggerated silliness that finally draws her in.

But as much as Carey is a goof-ball, he Carey cares. Yeah, he laughs at all the bullets being shot because they can't hurt him, but they CAN hurt his girl. So, he protects her. He wants to see her safe. Her well-being matters and is a motivation for all of his zany antics - and those zany antics are the exact means by which he demonstrates his care for her. Oh, and when Rambo blows stuff up, he leaves craters and the audience is tense in their seats. When Jim Carey blows stuff up people laugh and he goes right on laughing with them. And this is basically his persona in all of his movies.

So, don't go Rambo, but if you do, instead of trying to be the medic who cleans up after Rambo, be like Jim Carey.

Second, I feel it's time to share the vision and mission I have with her.

This shouldn't be a prerequisite to her following your lead, but it certainly helps. But share the vision in the context of HER ROLE in that vision. Jesus didn't tell the disciples up-front: "I want to make disciples of the whole world!" He spoke in terms of their role in the process: "Follow me and I'll make you fishers of men." I could tell my wife: Follow me and we're going to retire young and I'll make you a girl whose life has an eternal impact. Granted, I've always done this through my actions and not so much through my words. I suppose in my 5-part understanding of Jesus's model of discipleship (tell them what, show them how, let them try, send them out, pass it on), as much as I harp on the church for skipping "show them how" and "let them try," maybe there's some value in starting with the "tell them what" phase too - maybe words do matter. But they don't matter if you stop there and don't follow up with showing and empowering.

What are you going to tell your wife?

(1) encouraging/praising her

Don't validate her toward the things she wants to be validated in. Validate her in the things that are useful to you. "You look hot in that dress." "I love it when you bend over like that." "Good job saving money this week!"

(2) be more fun, teasing and flirting

Jim Carey.

Of course, he's just one example. Really, what I'm suggesting here is that you find a man who you respect and whose life you want to mirror and learn from the example he shows, then try it out, then make it your own ... you know: let him disciple you, even if he doesn't realize he's doing it. On that point, a fictional movie character probably isn't the best choice, but if there are traits you want to learn that aren't common among men these days, you gotta start somewhere.

Recommendation for a Patriarch's Study Bible?

2 upvotes · 9 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

There's going to be human error no matter how you translate it. But if you have to lean feminist or patriarchal, because the authors were writing in patriarchal societies, translations that lean patriarchal in their language choices are going to put you closer to what the author was thinking when he wrote it. This leads to more accurate interpretations.

As for an existing translation, I study out of the Young's Literal or a Greek-English Interlinear Bible. I read from the ESV. Personally, the KJV-onlyists have put me so far off of the KJV due to the research I've done against it, that I simply can't stand reading from it anymore. It's also part of the stereotype that gives Christians a band name today. 2011 NIV is total garbage - if you can get back to the 1984 NIV, I might prefer that to the ESV.

AWALT and M/W-Complex

2 upvotes · 7 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

True. This topic really deserves more than the snip I gave it - especially among Christians.

Main sub being banned soon.

2 upvotes · 2 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Nah, I overtly say things like red pill, hypergamy, AWALT, etc. quite openly and don't have any problems.

I do get what you're saying, though. My guess is that most people don't know how to communicate effectively enough to segregate the stereotypes about the red pill from the actual underlying praxeology of it. It's the difference between TRP and MRP, really.

Complete Lifting Reset

2 upvotes · 1 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

Makes sense. But it's also a lot of DEERing, and none of that affects your bench.

How to deal with disrespectful tones?

2 upvotes · 1 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

Hmm ... the other comments here are a little disappointing. Way too much emphasis on what to SAY. Depending on how you manage your frame ...

- You could do like /u/Deep_Strength, /u/rocknrollchuck, or /u/OsmiumZulu suggest and just set a clear verbal boundary, like you did: "Don't talk to me like that!" Or ...
- You could say, "I like your boobs. Honk, honk!"

And either option would get you roughly the same response from her. In fact, the latter, as demeaning as it is, probably fares better than the first, even. What you say matters very, very, very little. How you say it and the presence that is communicated when you say it is what matters.

The thing is: you're too hung up on trying to change your wife. There is certainly a degree to which you want to train her and raise her up to be a godly woman. However, the more you get invested in this concept, the more covert contracts will creep up in your life.

- "How many times have I had to tell you to stop talking to me that way?"
- "What's wrong with her? She doesn't listen to the things I'm saying."
- "Is this going to happen in front of our kids too?"

You're going to find yourself constantly spinning circles in your mind about why she won't conform to your expectations that at the end of the day you're going to forget: you're a man and she's a woman. She's not going to think and act like you, and that's okay.

Do you have amused mastery yet? I don't mean if you can practice some conversational art you call amused mastery. I mean actual amused mastery - a mental state that sees the universe from a broader perspective than your immediate circumstances. If you do, you wouldn't give two craps about how disrespectful she talks to you because you realize: (1) in the grand scheme of things, how she talks to you matters very little, and (2) you have more important things going on that can make a difference for eternity than to worry about someone who talks to you that way.

When you understand those two concepts in conjunction, you don't feel the need to snap at her, lecture her, try to change her, etc. You simply give her a choice: "This is what I'm doing. You coming along or not? Oh, and if you want to come, there are some rules. You okay with that?"

When I go to an amusement park, my kids aren't tall enough for half the rides. But the rules are the rules, right? Are those rules an effort by the park staff to force my kids to be taller so they can get on the ride? No. That's absurd. They're kids. I can't force them to be taller, neither can the park staff. It'll happen when it happens, as they mature. In the meantime, they're enforcing their boundaries all the time by refusing my kids the ability to ride the big rides. But they're not yelling at the kids for being too short. They just say, "Sorry, you can't ride the ride because you're too short." There is no anger or animosity. It's just how it is.

See how that works? Now go have that attitude with your wife and the way she speaks to you. Don't let it get to you so much. The instant you feel like you have to talk to her the way you did, the more power she has over you. This very much came off as a loss of frame. Don't tell her what to do. Tell her what you're going to do. Don't tell kids to grow taller. Tell them you're not going to let a short kid on the ride. She can do what she wants, but you're going to do what you want too.

Understanding what vetting does and does not do

2 upvotes · 26 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I surprised at the extent to which I agree with this post. But I think that this is because you and /u/rian_stone are talking about two completely different things that you're both calling "vetting." But before I get to that ...

It's important to realize that:

- Vetting does not increase the quality of the woman you're vetting.
- It does not increase the quality of women that you are capable of getting.
- It does not affect the probability that any particular woman won't screw you over.

What vetting does do is:

- Help you discern quickly which women are lower-quality than they may at first appear.
- Decrease the pool of women you spend time on to be only those of a higher quality (to your/Scriptural taste).

- Affect the chances that the types of girls you spend your time on are less likely to screw you over.

With the above being said, Stoney is working with the cultural definition that is used by most people in the world, including the majority of Christian men I've talked to about vetting. It's a personal-taste/preferential model. You (Deep) are talking about testing a woman's character against Scripture by observing her behaviors. I don't think Stone would call this vetting; he'd call it: Watch what she does, not what she says, combined with: You do you, in that you decide whether or not you're okay with something after you've educated yourself on what's happening.

The fact is: most so-called Christians are so clueless about what the Bible says about dating, what to look for in a spouse, etc. that their version of vetting is identical to what Stone is calling out as hogwash - and he's right. They come up with their own personal preferences, but have no idea where they got that list other than some subliminal cultural imperatives that have been pressed in him for decades, and then he goes off and makes stupid decisions, realizing after it's too late that he didn't know what was best for him.

God does know what's best for us, but that's only categorical. God doesn't say: "Cindy is what's best for you in a wife." He says, "A good wife should be blah, blah, and yadda." So when a Christian guy tries to vet a girl today, he's usually trying to see: Is Cindy smart, funny, good looking, etc.? I'll never forget the shower-thought I read on reddit once: "I never realized how irrelevant liking the same bands would be in a spouse until after I was actually married.* My brother did this - he tried to date girls purely because they had the same musical tastes. Idiotic. But the church told him to look for someone with common interests, so that's what he did.

Most guys are not asking in their vetting process: Is Cindy financially prudent, a hard-worker in the home, submissive, etc.? Why? Because they don't even know what the Bible suggests to look for in a spouse in the first place - and if they think they do, it's usually coming from the hordes of blue pill'd pastors who tell them that the ideal Christian wife candidate has three kids from a past relationship and a ton of financial debt, because you can really save her like Christ saved the church. That's utter foolishness - but that's what most Christians think the Bible expects of them. Heck, even I thought that for a while before I was married.

In that scenario, a guy would be better off heeding Stoney's advice than playing games with his own culturally-infused ideas about vetting.

What makes your post most valuable, though, is the appropriate constraints you put on the capacity of vetting. Some guys think that vetting is the holy grail of wife-selection techniques. It's not, and you recognize this as well. Stone appropriately recognizes that no matter how hard you vet, there are still no guarantees you'll find that unicorn - because unicorns don't exist. Your point is also appropriate: maybe you're not going to find a unicorn, but at least weed out the donkeys if you want a horse.

For the record, if there is any "holy grail" advice on wife-selection, I don't think it's vetting. I think it's a thorough embrace of AWALT (in the way MRP means it, not how the average TRP rage-stage guy uses it) and preparation on the guy's end for the possibility that she loses her ability to repress those traits. So, while I completely agree with you that it's good to weed out the people you KNOW aren't good matches, I want to re-emphasize with great clarity what you merely allude to: The people who pass the vetting test may still end up being just as bad as the people who failed it; they just hid it better until after the ceremony. Vetting only accounts for the readily apparent issues.

Yes, you have weeded out the people who are 100% likely to screw you over, and probably those who are 90% likely ... but you've kept someone who is still 10% or 30% or even 60% likely to screw you over in the hope that probability will work in your favor - or if not probability, then the influence of the Holy Spirit, which only works if the Holy Spirit denied people the choice to act on their flesh from time to time, in which case there would be no sin in the world in the first place. As long as she's still in the flesh, that chance will never be 0%. A guy's vetting "technique" (noting that you haven't addressed that angle) might be able to narrow the pool of women he spends time with down from everyone toward only those who he PERCEIVES only have a 20% chance of screwing him over - not because vetting somehow fixes any one girl to become more trustworthy, but because he's finding one who is less inclined to act on her AWALT tendencies in the first place. This, of course, severely diminishes the pool of women a guy can be with, making abundance a practical impossibility to have, if his risk-threshold is something really low, like 10% (which again, is still based solely on his perception of the risk, not an objective reality).

More to Stoney's point: women change. I love my college roommate's saying: Women want men to change; men want women to stay the same. In the end, neither gets what they want. Women change. It's a fact of life. So, what you vetted for today may not be true of her tomorrow. My wife openly acknowledges that she's not the same girl I married - and that has worked both for me and against me in various ways at various times. I've met countless Christian women who were 100% committed that divorce would never be an option because it's against the Bible ("murder before divorce") ... until I'm welcoming them into my conference room because the husband wasn't doing it for her anymore and someone convinced her that she had some bad theological influences because God would really be okay with it if she made a decision in favor of love ... you know, love for that new guy that God obviously wants her to be with. So, finding that girl who at least appears rock-solid in her theology about divorce is great - but only if she doesn't change her theology. Women are constantly changing, usually in ways they themselves are not controlling, so it's not like she can just will-power her way on certain issues - especially if it's against her own emotional proclivities.

In all of this: vetting should be an easy, early-on weed-out process, not something that you rely on for years.

At the end of the day, I do prefer /u/rian_stone's method over vetting - not that we do away with vetting altogether, as it can be a quick way to sort out the pond (though, again, I'd wager Stone would call this "having standards" and not "vetting"). If vetting is to have any value:

- it has to be understood that it primarily occurs in the first several weeks of the relationship
- that it is to be based on objective biblical standards and not personal taste
- and that it only weeds out obvious flaws, but that the weeds who pass the test could be even worse than the ones who fail it

But all of this puts too much emphasis on a concept that I have always opposed: finding a girl in the wild. At the risk of sounding like I agree with all those blue pill'd pastors, even they will argue that marriage is something you figure out after-the-fact, and that a lot of personal refining and growth has to happen after "I do" for the situation to work. Everyone who has ever said they met "the one" before the wedding day has eventually recognized after the wedding day, "Okay, so she wasn't as perfect as I thought," even if it's followed by, "But I still love her, and she's still my one." I'm by no means suggesting people rush into marriage; but it's to say that everyone - both the red and the blue - acknowledge that you're going to discover things after marriage that you couldn't have predicted, which may affect the way you feel about the other person.

Also, over-estimating the value of vetting puts too much emphasis on the woman's natural state. While vetting diminishes the pool, setting boundaries and being attractive increases the pool. Also uniquely: it works on individual women and not merely categorically.

Accordingly, the better indicator of a successful marriage than the natural state of the woman is the natural state of the man (i.e. not still in the "fake it" phase). Combine this with vetting and you might find:

- Vetting gets you down to a perceived 30% chance that she'll screw you over
- Being the highest value man in her life gets you down to a 20% chance that she'll screw you over
- Combined, that makes for a 6% chance of being screwed over.

Of course, my approach on the sidebar inherently takes care of most of the vetting factors as part of the model itself without vetting needing to be an intentional part of the process. But I recognize I'm also a crazy-crackpot who hasn't been looking for a new wife anytime in the last decade.

Men of Iron

2 upvotes · 25 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

Haha. The only good answer is to stop being a noob - learn Scripture inside and out so you can call BS when you see it. Initially this means researching every issue for yourself as you hear about them, even if you're not particularly interested in it. That's what I did - that and always having a discipler who knew scripture better than I did.

The good news is that you really only have to research each issue once. Most of the time the answer sticks with you. After enough, you've seen it all at least a dozen times until new concepts are the rarity and not the norm, and you can see through bogus claims reflexively.

An easier way, if you have context to do so, is to challenge people: "How do you know that's what this verse really means?"

Meditating on scripture also really helps. More on that in my scripture memory post on the sidebar.

Forbearance and Meekness vs Standing up for Oneself

2 upvotes · 25 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

That's a good word, brother.

Men of Iron

2 upvotes · 25 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

Purple or not, my thoughts here mirror my thoughts on this chain of comments. There's so little in the way of actual disciple-making that if people can get more right than they get wrong, that's a win. Sadly, most congregations can't pass that test, so when things like this pop up that do, I'd rather support them than undermine them because of a few side-issue disagreements.

In this situation, the fact that they're getting guys on board with disciple-making is huge for me. Historically, I've found that if guys spend enough time in the Scripture through discipleship, they're going to get to the right conclusions eventually. The problem is that most people who teach Scripture nowadays are doing it from the perspective of looking up verses to support their topic of interest at any given time. They're not studying Scripture, they're quote-clipping Scripture and calling the time finding those quotes "research." If these guys are teaching actual Bible study, among other disciplines Christian men need to be equipped with (and I don't know - maybe they're not; but if they are), then they'll eventually get where the Spirit wants them to go and I can support that.

I don't know enough about their model yet to endorse or disown them, but I'm certainly intrigued. Props to /u/Iseeitnow7 for asking about it in the first place :)

Indonesia to outlaw sex outside marriage

2 upvotes · 20 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

Haha, good for them. I think this is the post you're referencing. Generally, I'm not into state-mandated morality, as it steals the heart from it. But I'm really interested to see where this experiment takes things. Do you know what religion they're following to do this? Indonesia strikes me as more Buddhist or Hindu than Christian.

Help! Stunned by wife

2 upvotes · 20 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

What makes it obvious trolling is the fact that he says this, then proceeds to give advice on female sexuality. Total garbage, even beyond the whole "prayer is pointless" thing.

My Wife's Emotional Affair

2 upvotes · 16 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

/u/helaughsinhidden hit the ball out of the park on this one already, so let me hit a different angle.

First, props to you for wanting to help other guys learn from your mistakes. We appreciate that around here. But, as has already been said, your mistakes might go beyond what you originally thought.

You should know this by now, but men and women are not on an equal playing field in relationships. Women thrive when they know their husband is attractive to other women. Men just get jealous. When women have a husband who is desired by other women, they up their game to join the competition for his attention. When men have a wife who is desired by other men, they get jealous and protective. Notice two things here:

- When a man causes dread, the wife most often responds positively. She doesn't make or trust her own judgments; but when other women judge a man, her hive mentality kicks in and suddenly she's on board. This is good for a marriage - for a wife to know that her husband is the guy all the other girls want.
- When a woman causes dread, the husband most often responds negatively. He doesn't care what other guys think about his wife's attractiveness. He cares only how hot she is to him. When other guys find her attractive, he gets jealous and over-protective and it stifles her. Some women claim that excessive boundaries make her feel like he "cares enough to protect the sanctity of our marriage" - but that only owns up to the beta bux side, guaranteeing that she keeps getting that provision from him. And notice these agreements are always mutual - she only ever agrees to tone down her outward gaze if he does too.

In reality, a wife wants to know that her husband is desired by other women. Women don't trust their own judgments of a man - they always defer to the herd. If other women find a guy attractive, they conform to the majority view of the guy and accept it. But guys are more narrow in focus, contemplating only their own tastes over what makes a girl attractive to him. Don't fall on the wrong side of this line by creating mutual barriers when the game isn't mutual in the first place. You're acting like God created men and women to have egalitarian roles in marriage. He did not. If marriages are not egalitarian in Scripture, don't make egalitarian compromises in the way you (pretend to) "lead" your marriage.

[FR] Unstoppable Emotional Inertia

2 upvotes · 14 September 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Highest in last 6 months is a 295 bench, 365 squat.

Confronting the myth that you have to “earn sex” in marriage, and that if your wife deprives you, or worse, cheats on you with another man, it is completely your fault as a man for not being “red pillled” enough to stop her. This attitude is blue pillled, and takes away responsibility from women.

2 upvotes · 12 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

u/redpillwomder already referenced that these conversations have taken place here.

But at this point you're mixing church and politics in a way Jesus never did. You're moving toward political revolution, which was never his goal. If caesar wants to let women vote, that's his prerogative, let God's people be managed by God's designs - and that means a male led church.

In God's Kingdom, women do not get a right to vote. If political revolution was my goal, I'd have to reevaluate my entire framework of thinking in the first place - and I'm not going to do that just to answer a question. So for now, the simple answer is caesar to caesar's, God to God's.

Confronting the myth that you have to “earn sex” in marriage, and that if your wife deprives you, or worse, cheats on you with another man, it is completely your fault as a man for not being “red pillled” enough to stop her. This attitude is blue pillled, and takes away responsibility from women.

2 upvotes · 12 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Let them howl. That's one type of abuse that I have yet to see a judge give much credence too. I'm handling a case right now where my client acknowledged in a temporary orders hearing that he put his wife on a tight budget - didn't give her access to credit cards, no access to bank accounts, he bought groceries weekly for her to budget with the kids, etc. She had zero access to any of the family finances. Yikes!

Even worse: opposing counsel is cross-examining him on his bank statements showing that while he left the wife and kids at home to eat peanut butter and jelly, he spent $175 at a high end Italian restaurant one day, $300 at a penthouse steakhouse two days later, $750 at various bars and restaurants the day after that, etc. The guy had spent, on average, $9,500/mo on food and drinks for himself while leaving his wife to cook from the groceries he bought a week ago and no money for even a pizza. I was sweating bullets.

I argue that: (1) he had a high-profile job that required a high-end lifestyle to impress his clients (even though he testified he wasn't paying for them most of the time), (2) his culture (Muslim) found it socially acceptable for a man to engage with the world while the woman stayed home, and she agreed to this arrangement when she quit her job and married him, and (3) she knew this was going on for literally over three decades and didn't file divorce before, so she cannot ex post facto whine about her own past inactions.

My argument ultimately came down to the fact that my $450,000/yr client should not pay ANY spousal support to his non-earning wife because he had to use his income to pay the marital credit cards (that were used to fund his lavish lifestyle that she didn't share in - close to $350,000 in total debt). Opposing counsel was appalled and called my argument misogynistic, at which point I called him out for disrespecting Muslim culture and being racist.

Not surprisingly, the magistrate agreed with me: despite the incredible disparity in income, he ordered NO SPOUSAL SUPPORT - only $1,500 in child support - a pittance to his budget. My client kept the credit card debt, keeps maintaining his lifestyle, the wife was asked to get a job to contribute to the marital finances and the immense marital debt.

Most importantly: the concept of financial abuse, despite being argued by the other side, was totally dismissed on the grounds that "financial abuse is not a legal standard the courts recognize" and "spouses have the prerogative to spend as they will during the marriage, and if at any point one spouse doesn't like it, it is their obligation to file for divorce then, not let it continue on for over 30 years without saying a word."

So yes - they will howl. No, that howling won't do squat. This was the most extreme case I've had, but I've NEVER seen someone win on a financial abuse case if that's all they've really got going for them.

Confronting the myth that you have to “earn sex” in marriage, and that if your wife deprives you, or worse, cheats on you with another man, it is completely your fault as a man for not being “red pill” enough to stop her. This attitude is blue pill, and takes away responsibility from women.

2 upvotes · 12 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm still not sure where you're remotely getting the idea that we're "compensating" rather than following the Bible. /u/RedPillWonder explained this well. We hold women to biblical standards. The Bible doesn't spell out a step-by-step approach for how to get women to fall in line, but it does tell men how to lead. We teach men how to lead, and the red pill has discovered that when men do this, women fall in line.

This is not compensating. This is men living up to biblical standards and discovering that the natural byproduct of this is the sanctification of women - a goal that we could not consistently manufacture on a large scale any other way through secular means.

/u/Deep_Strength talks about this often when he writes on Ephesians 5 - that the duty of the husband is to sanctify his wife. The mods here have spent INCREDIBLE time studying the Scriptures and have discovered something very obvious:

- Shaming and guilting women for their poor behavior does not sanctify them into better behavior or more pure hearts. It increases their rebellion.
- If a man becomes someone she desires to submit to, then when he calls out her sin she will submit to him and take steps toward sanctification because the Spirit working through him helps her.

But the man has to get the plank out of his own eye before he can go yelling about the speck - or even plank - in his wife's eye. This process of the man being right before God first is the process of becoming a godly man, which makes him more attractive and places her in a position of desiring to submit to him.

I see nothing biblical about utilizing guilt and shame and calling in dozens of family members to pressure her into changing. This, to me, is the unbiblical compromise because you do not believe the biblical model of discipleship actually works in marriages. If that is the case, you would be wrong. That biblical model is best summarized in 1 Cor. 11:1 - "Follow me as I follow Christ." It's not surprising that 2 verses later is where it says that Christ is the head of man and man is the head of woman - indicating that the way to get women in line is not by chasing after them to submit all the time, but to follow Christ yourself, independent of her, because your eyes aren't set on your wife, but on Christ.

This whole notion of fixing the wife that you can't get out of your head is a fundamental frame issue - you're in her frame. Stop worrying so much about whether she's rebellious or sexually defiant or whatever. Focus on living up to the full weight of the model Jesus gave you.

I know it sounds like a crazy and ironic catch-22, but the more you try to fix your wife, the more broken she will become; the more you set your eyes on your mission and stop making your wife the center of your world - no matter how well or poor behaved she is at any given time - the more attracted she will become to you, and the more likely she is to start following you as you follow Christ - and as Christ fixes you when you follow him, her act of following you will fix her - not because you're actively trying to fix her, but because living in biblical orientation has a spiritually sanctifying side-effect that does not occur when we live out of biblical alignment.

Confronting the myth that you have to “earn sex” in marriage, and that if your wife deprives you, or worse, cheats on you with another man, it is completely your fault as a man for not being “red pill” enough to stop her. This attitude is blue pill, and takes away responsibility from women.

2 upvotes · 12 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Amen

Confronting the myth that you have to “earn sex” in marriage, and that if your wife deprives you, or worse, cheats on you with another man, it is completely your fault as a man for not being “red pillled” enough to stop her. This attitude is blue pillled, and takes away responsibility from women.

2 upvotes · 11 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Not sure why this got downvoted. Solid.

Fun fact: after Hosea buys her back in Hosea 3 -

3 Then I told her, “You must stay at home with me for many days. You will not be like a prostitute. You will not have sexual relations with another man. I will be your husband.” 4 In the same way the people of Israel will continue many days without a king or a leader. They will be without a sacrifice or a memorial stone. They will be without an ephod or a household god. 5 After this, the people of Israel will come back and look for the Lord their God and for David their king. In the last days they will come to honor the Lord and his goodness.

This is the phase Israel is in right now without a temple, without their high courts, without any ability to enforce the Law of Moses. Fascinating that the state of a nation not just at that time, but across ages of human history is so closely associated with a single man's marriage. Not that I want Hosea's marriage in particular, but I want my marriage to have that kind of power, influence, and reflection to the world of God's character and relationship with his people.

Confronting the myth that you have to “earn sex” in marriage, and that if your wife deprives you, or worse, cheats on you with another man, it is completely your fault as a man for not being “red pillled” enough to stop her. This attitude is blue pillled, and takes away responsibility from women.

2 upvotes · 11 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

You'd be a crappy manager if that was your only recourse. I'd reassign the dud employee to janitorial work and cut his wages down to minimum wage until he either shaped up or walked out. This is what Honda does with crappy employees. They refuse to fire people for some reason (at least the branch near me), but they usually get people back in conformity or out the door.

Your views on divorce rape are skewed and only applicable to a man who is a fool in how he runs his marriage. Even the Proverbs 31 woman had a job crafting and selling things in the marketplace and running a vineyard or buying/selling land. Guys today are idiots because they think that allowing their wife to have any income earning ability at all will undermine their dominance in the home. What it really does is make them divorce-proof, making it so much easier for him to stand steel-faced when she threatens to walk out the door, calling her bluff.

But how does this relate to a Jezebel woman who never changes no matter how great of a man you are? Who always nags, lies, and even cheats, despite you doing everything right? Are you telling me, it's STILL your responsibility?

Your house, your responsibility. That doesn't mean you're without recourse. The Lord disciplines those he loves. So do husbands to the wife he loves.

Guys who aren't divorce-proof are going to have a harder time with this. That's why I've written so much on MRP helping guys to get to a frame where they can lead freely without fear of divorce.

what the hell's the point of such a putrid hateful marriage? There's no way in hell marriage is meant to be like that as you say it is.

First, you're describing it that way, not me. Second, you're talking about a true outlier. Those are rare. 99.9%+ of women aren't the Jezebel you're referencing. If you actually married a Jezebel, let me know and we'll chat. Otherwise, the hypothetical doesn't hold up against the weight of probability.

What's the point of diverting so much time, energy, resources, and management to a marriage that eats away at you and distracts you from your other missions in life? What's the point?

I think you're confusing me with someone who promotes marriage. I encourage guys not to marry. But the pragmatic reality is that they're going to anyway. So, make the best of a bad situation.

then why marry at all and waste your life fixing another woman's mistakes when you can just accomplish your dreams and be happy all the time?

Assuming by "your dreams" you mean "Christ's dreams for you," yeah ... don't marry.

Why subject yourself to a wretched relationship that requires you to babysit a woman and take responsibility for her mistakes, even when her mistakes ruin your life financially or sexually?

Because good managers over their home don't get this result. They get wives who are helpful and contribute substantially toward helping them fulfill their mission and accomplish Christ's dreams for them.

Look, you're WAAAY too hung up on assuming every woman is a Jezebel. They're not. They're hypergamous. This is a huge difference. Hypergamous women are easy to understand and predictable, just like sheep are easy to understand and predictable. It's easy to herd sheep because you know how they're going to respond to basic shepherding skills. You can't turn them into dogs. You can't teach them how to knit. A sheep is going to be a sheep. But that predictability is exactly what makes these relationships so easy once you know the first thing about herding sheep.

Yes, one out of every flock of 10,000 may have that black sheep that refuses to act like a sheep. But you can't create your entire shepherding system around that one.

Confronting the myth that you have to “earn sex” in marriage, and that if your wife deprives you, or worse, cheats on you with another man, it is completely your fault as a man for not being “red pill’d” enough to stop her. This attitude is blue pill’d, and takes away responsibility from women.

2 upvotes · 11 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Before I answer ...

But how does this relate to a Jezebel woman who never changes no matter how great of a man you are? Who always nags, lies, and even cheats, despite you doing everything right?

Are you speaking hypothetically or is this your actual situation? That makes a huge difference in how I respond and in what additional information I would need from you (R2 stuff) to answer.

Edit: Also, if you were a manager in that situation, what would be your solution for dealing with an employee like that who you know you can't fire?

NMMNG thoughts. Stop initiating or initiate often while following MAP.

2 upvotes · 11 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

This is a half way decent field report and belongs on the main sub. You screwed up at various places, you know where you did, you fixed some of it and saw some progress, and now you're looking to keep improving. Bravo.

Biggest issue here is what /u/Deep_Strength already said: you're still in her frame. Stop it. Stop worrying about what she says or does or what she asks of you. If you wanted to massage her butt, you should have done it before she asked.

More directly on that point: STOP trying to change her, manipulate her, or control her. I used to make posts like this and you remind me of how idiotic I must have seemed to the MRP guys - and people like u/weakandsensitive would chew me out for it (thank God they did!). AWALT. You can't "fix" your wife. She will always be a woman. What's that Billy Joel song? Yeah - go read the lyrics of that one.

You withdraw your time and affection not to manipulate her into conforming her behavior, but because you've got better crap to do than deal with a sexually denying harpy.

I'm mixed on the idea of monk mode. On the one hand, /u/rocknrollchuck gives some solid pragmatic advice about always initiating. 1 Cor. 7 says the same thing - if you're going to go monk mode, it's only to be by mutual consent and for a short time. But at the same time, she's already given her consent to withdrawing sexuality by actually withdrawing it. You're right not to go Rambo and force it back all at once. But don't stop initiating - initiate about as often as you were before all this, then as you become more attractive and see her responding, ramp up.

You're really lacking abundance here, though. How many other girls are looking at you? Anyone give you their number recently? You're so hung up on your wife because you don't believe you're the prize. She's the prize you're going to get for all your hard work earning her attraction. Get that attitude out of your head.

FR: The Spell is Broken

2 upvotes · 10 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

It's not bad at all ... IF the guy is content with never having more than duty sex. If that's where OP is at, then by all means: go for understanding.

But the fact is that /u/CarelessBowler5 stated that his experience with duty sex was less than fulfilling and at the core of his disillusionment. As such, I have to assume he is not okay with duty sex, in which case seeking her "understanding" is certainly not going to get him the type of sex he's looking for.

Self-conscious about things I cannot change immediately.

2 upvotes · 10 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

Well ... that was unexpected. In that case, as others have said: stop caring so much. So what if others mock you? Does their judgment of you matter? Galatians 1:10 - "Am I now trying to win the approval of human beings, or of God? Or am I trying to please people? If I were still trying to please people, I would not be a servant of Christ."

Memorize that verse.

FR: The Spell is Broken

2 upvotes · 9 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Which is it!?

It's a scale. 0 is easiest difficulty, 10 is hardest. A normal single guy might have a difficulty of 4 to pick up the average girl for a quick lay. Marriage bumps that difficulty up to an 8. Being ripped drops it back down to a 5. Having an older wife puts it back up to a 6. Random numbers, but you get the idea. You have certain factors making it easier for your wife to find you attractive than, say, a husband at 25% body fat. But you also have things making it harder than a husband whose wife is, say, 10 years younger than him and doesn't have her own pre-established life goals.

FR: The Spell is Broken

2 upvotes · 9 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

If you send that to your wife, I'll permaban you from this sub.

... j/k. But seriously. Don't send it to her. Bad idea.

Personal Finance and Peace

2 upvotes · 8 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Makes perfect sense. I'm handling a case right now where the parties have over 60 credit cards! Insane.

I have one. Period. Everything goes there, easy to track, little room for identity theft or credit card fraud and easy recourse when it happens. No complexity.

My wife did open cards eith old navy and target ... and then couldn't keep track of them and they got behind. No more.

That Girl at Work

2 upvotes · 5 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

turn her into an orbiter - have fun with it, but maintain plausible deniability

This right here is my exact thought on the situation.

All these requirements and all she has to offer is used up pussy and chad's kid(s).

2 upvotes · 4 September 2019 · /r/WhereAreAllTheGoodMen

I have the perfect guy for her. He's short, has no money, and is dumb as rocks, but he self-identifies as a 6'4" man with a 6-figure income and an IQ of 180. They'll get along great. How can I hook them up?

Separating the sexes in church

2 upvotes · 3 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

no direct scriptural commandment on this ... scriptural case using logic

This comes down to the knowledge hierarchy:

- Philosophy is the lowest level. It attempts to answer questions and solve problems through the application of logic and reason. It answers the question: What SHOULD be true?
- Science is the mid-range. It attempts to answer questions and solve problems through observation and experimentation. It answers the question: What is OBSERVABLY true?
- Theology is the highest tier. It attempts to discern truth through the study and application of spiritual revelation from God (i.e. predominantly Scripture). It answers the question: What is ACTUALLY true?

Theology doesn't answer every question, and not every unanswered theological question can be tested through science. As such, logical thinking certainly has its place - and a very, very wide open place at that.

But we must always be cautious to recognize that philosophical thinking - even with Scripture as our inspiration - is still just philosophy. It is not to be given Scriptural weight or authority.

You have some good points to make, but if they aren't backed by Scripture, they're nothing more than human wisdom - which, while valuable, is never something we should build our lives around.

Is it ok to go out to bars a few times/week and socialize?

2 upvotes · 3 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

It's only sin if it's light ;)

I joke ... but I actually had a pastor who made this argument.

How to overcome isolation?

2 upvotes · 3 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The Church is notoriously bad at fostering genuine relationships between people. About a month ago I made a post on this exact subject:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/cjg7pn/more_than_marriage_how_churchianity_has_screwed/

I expect you'll find a lot of useful information there. I made another post about a year and a half ago that takes a more practical "how to" approach than the descriptive nature of the above thread:

https://www.reddit.com/r/marriedredpill/comments/88dtue/social_influence_and_defying_context/

After reading those two, reply here or PM me back if you'd like to chat more about this subject, as it's really one of my strengths and I've helped a lot of guys overcome poor social skills. Hint: 90% of the game is just confidence and learning to say what's on your mind rather than merely thinking about it.

Advice for a young man considering mission

2 upvotes · 29 August 2019 · /r/askRPC

is it a large detriment to your mission to want to marry, despite being content / finding contentment with the current season of being single?

That depends on what you do with the want. I want punch some people in the face. I don't. Wanting to do it doesn't prevent me from making disciples - if anything, it can inspire me to want to get to know them better and potentially disciple them in order to overcome my impression of them. But acting on that want would certainly get in the way if I were to let the desire control me.

Don't let the desire control you and the desire won't affect your mission negatively. As soon as it shifts from "I want this" to "this is an imperative in my life," you've gone too far.

Advice for a young man considering mission

2 upvotes · 29 August 2019 · /r/askRPC

being single in itself is a gift, while others say that it is referring to the ability to stay single for use in ministry by G-d

There are no absolute interpretations of this. My take is simply this: Treat your single years as a gift and try to stay single for as long as possible, per Matthew 19:11-12 and 1 Cor. 7; but if while remaining single you are on the verge of sin, then feel the freedom to marry. It's really that simple.

If we had neon signs emanating from our spirit telling us what spiritual gifts we had, then this would all be a different story. But in the absence of certainty over whether or not you have a particular gift, all we can do is "eagerly desire the greater gifts" by living as if we had them, and if we find we cannot practice them, then to be okay with that and not force it or pretend what is not true.

My mission is simple, minister

The quality of this mission depends on what you mean by "minister." Nowadays this word has become a catch-all for every kind of uplifting activity toward someone. Give money to the poor? You just ministered to them. Share the Gospel? You ministered to a non-Christian. Smiled at someone and brightened their mood? That's a type of ministry.

This word is extremely hollow. Even though the Bible authors use a word we translate as "minister" regularly, it's no shock that Jesus didn't say, "Go minister to all nations," but "Go make disciples of all nations." He meant something very specific. Something he'd just spent 3+ years showing them how to do by doing it with them. They knew exactly what was expected. If that model is what you mean by "minister" then I'm on board with you.

is it morally wrong, or unrealistic to hold that hope that I might find my wife during my mission in a country like this?

Why would it be morally wrong to find a wife among the people you "minister" to? That's actually the exact setting where you should find your wife.

If the emphasis is on the "in a country like this" part, just make sure they're a believer before you go getting yourself involved. That's all.

Is that a distraction to the purpose of the mission?

No, it means you have an insider with unique insights to help you on your mission. Help. ... helper. What does the Bible call a man's helper again?

Is it wrong to have what is effectively wife-hunting as a peripheral motivation for moving abroad, so long as my mission takes precedence?

I once made a post exactly on this point of whether or not it's okay to have multiple priorities. My conclusion from that and since then is that there is only one singular priority: make disciples. Everything is subservient to this and only holds value to the degree that it contributes to this.

But that doesn't diminish the authenticity of the relationships we build along the way and the appropriateness of our desire to let these things develop while we stay mission-oriented. Don't let it be a distraction, but if you can marry an asset, then marry her - and it's not a bad thing at some point to realize: "If I really want to make a difference, I'm going to need some help," and then go find that help.

When I tell guys not to look for a wife, it's because 99% of guys aren't looking for a helper on their mission. They're looking for love, sex, commitment, a partner to share their feels with, etc. /u/helaughsinhidden had an INCREDIBLY good top comment in that thread about this being like you're a secret agent in (ironically to your post) Iran, where you're always loyal to your handler, but if a beautiful woman comes along who has intel that you could use and you marry her because it's the best way to advance your mission - by all means, do it. This is mission-oriented asset-seeking, not "Yeah, I've got a mission, but I really want a wife - can I use making my mission a higher priority as an excuse to still be okay with really wanting a wife really, really badly?"

[FR] A Changing Dynamic

2 upvotes · 28 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

It really depends on the context. When you're paying for a meal, you expect to get what you pay for. If I ask for new shoes and they give me a used pair, is it the adult thing to do to keep them because you take what's given to you? No. You insist on getting what you pay for.

When you're with company, though, and they serve you a meal that you're not paying for, but out of their own grace and kindness to invite you into their home - that's a different story. At that point, you suck it up and maintain appreciation for their hospitality, even if you don't have appreciation for the taste of the food. You can be honest with them about it, but depending on how well you know them and your goal for the meeting, it's often more advantageous toward your goals to eat something you don't like than to turn it down and risk offending them ... unless your goal for going was to enjoy the meal itself.

First argument in a while

2 upvotes · 27 August 2019 · /r/askRPC

I am ever more mad

Why were you mad at her in the first place?

- For taking too long to get ready like a girl does? Or would you rather she be a man and get ready like a man?
- Or was it because she hung up on you when she get emotional like a girl does? Or would you rather her be a man and deal with you straight like a man?
- Or is it that she waited at the dealership like a woman? Or would you rather her be a man and take the lead in the whole process like a man does?

Would you like her to grow a dick and screw you like a man too? ;)

I say explain how I have been treating you badly?

I cheated and read the end first. You obviously see where this went awry.

This is the only part I DEER

The previous question actually has the same impact. When you ask her how you've been treating her badly, she interprets that as: "He wants to know my accusations so he can defend against them, explain himself away, make excuses, and rationalize his behavior."

This needed to be nipped in the bud up-front. Obviously not getting angry and emotional is the place to start. But even after that you can recover quickly with some playfulness.

- She throws a tantrum and throws my stuff on the ground on the passenger side and scoots over.
- Hmm ... are we really doing this? I mean, usually it's swiping stuff off an office desk before we go at it, but I guess a car seat works too.

When you tell a joke in the midst of her being angry, it infuriates her for a brief second that you're not taking her anger seriously, then she realizes that she likes your positive attitude even in the face of her anger. It's a much better context for conversation in the first place. If you respond in anger, there's no way you're taking her seriously. If you DEER, you're not taking her seriously. But if you can have a positive attitude, she knows you can hear and receive what she's saying, even if you play it off as a joke and pretend you don't take it seriously. Then you be the oak when the comfort tests come: "You know I'm just teasing you, babe. I care about you."

Here's another one:

- "And see you don't even care! You just start acting non chill ant and ignoring me."
- Well, the real reason is kind of embarrassing. [Your apparent vulnerability here takes her off-guard.] You know how guys say things like, "You're cute when you're angry"? Well, you're giving me a raging boner right now, but now's not the time or place, so I'm trying to calm myself down.

Situation diffused.

verbal intercourse is optional and to not engage with her emotions

Right. Verbal intercourse is actually a much, much better strategy. But you've got to have the frame for it first. Until then, STFU.

I was angry and it probably appeared in my body language

Right. Go re-read my anatomy of butt-hurt post (late 100s or 200s, I think).

I am clearly still failing tests

You know where you went wrong. Spotting the problem is half the battle.

I read a lot of this not as you failing, but as her frustrated that the power dynamic in the relationship is changing. She needed to blow off some steam. Emotions are high, curing her boredom. She'll calm down, you'll have some great make-up sex, and the kettle will be put on the burner once again.

this is actually the first argument we have had in a while

That's actually concerning to me. You should be teasing out little arguments here and there. Give her small reasons to be mad so it can come out and she never builds up to exploding moments.

EDIT: Also, this is the type of high-quality advice thread that can go on the main sub for other guys to learn from the responses. But it's cool to get some stuff started on this sub too.

was lutheranism cucked from the start?

2 upvotes · 26 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

From the sidebar: We are a subreddit that exists to provide a safe place for Christians to discuss problems, solutions and insights on relationships, sex, and biblical masculinity according to biblical principles.

Brushing up against these principles is not enough, except in rare circumstances that delve into substantive exegesis on an important aspect of Scripture.

If it feels like the thrust of the post is political issues rather than the themes of this sub, it will likely be taken down. A quick way I analyze the quality of these types of posts is two-fold:

1. Is the post trying to persuade toward a political agenda or sanctify the church/raise godly men? The former are automatically removed. The second moves me on to question 2.
2. Is the conversation purely a matter of mental masturbation, or is there a practical application that men today can walk away with and live out in their daily lives?

Most of your posts seem politically motivated, but you have enough language about the impact on the church that I'd be willing to let them slide. However, when it's purely a matter of raising awareness or discussing it for discussion's own sake, and there is no practical application to be had from the conversation, the post is pointless. We can agree in theory on a million points all we want, but if it doesn't lead to action in some way, it's just mental masturbation.

why aren't synagogues or mosques "seeker sensitive"

2 upvotes · 26 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Your posts are becoming unreasonably frequent. You'd be better off saving up some of your entirely valid and highly interesting questions and putting them together in a single, multi-part post. For the sake of avoiding flooding from a single user, I'm going to remove this one and leave the first two up. This one is less on-topic than the last two. I'll check the other ones in a minute.

Leave and Cleave

2 upvotes · 23 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Mad props on the Barzillai reference! I can't remember the last time someone made a biblical reference and I had no idea what they were talking about ... yet there it is. Interesting. But yes, definitely a rare exception.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (08/21/19)

2 upvotes · 21 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

With women, every interaction affects the sexual dynamic. But yes, she knew I'd be setting up the desktop.

Looking for advice, Need help. +Apology.

2 upvotes · 16 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

she has never actually been approached by many guys (probably due to our sheltered environment)

Right. That's why I said to create profiles on a dating app. Your current environment is obscure enough that it's not an accurate reflection of SMV, though it could certainly be used to your advantage if she perceives her SMV as lower simply because the secluded environment keeps her from seeing how easily she could get better guys than you.

i beat her in looks

Then yes, you are right to lower her SMV to account for this. 90% of a woman's SMV is her looks. 10% is her personality - specifically: how seductive does she behave, and does she use body language to imply she has a high sex drive?

i am scratching my head also, but i do believe it is caused by lack of outside interaction, and the idea of sole reliance on your parents until you become the leader of the (a) house.

How old are you? If you're 18+ then these things are absolutely critical to your SMV. If you're under 18, women will give you a pass on living with your parents because it might not make sense to legally emancipate yet.

So, if you're under 18, it's very possible you may be in the upper-8 range. But from everything you've described here, certainly not a 9, especially given the underlying frame issues I'm seeing.

Here's a relevant post I put up once on calculating your SMV. It's not perfect, but it's as good as I can figure it out to-date: https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/93hrxh/fr_fixing_your_smv/

- Looks: Let's assume your looks are as stellar as you think (despite that you haven't been to the gym lately, it seems). That's 3 points

- Confidence/alphaness/frame: 2

- Initiative, passing tests, tell her no - Let's assume you get this point
- Not getting butt-hurt or being controlling - I don't sense this from you, another point
 - OYS and intentional about managing your life and affairs (mission and steps thereto): This conversation makes clear you don't get this point.

- Finances: 1.5 - I'll give you full points for this, even though you're not actually earning any of this yet, so you should be at .5 instead of 1.5

- Charm, charisma, wit, personality, etc.: You admit this is a weakness, so let's go with 0. Even most people who think they're charming/charismatic really aren't worth a full point. Nothing in this conversation implies otherwise here.

- Social status and preselection: As of right now, you admit you have no social status. 0.

- 1/2 point for morality, ethics, etc.: My guess is that she will see your interactions with the other girl (lying in bed naked together) as immoral, and thus won't give you the half point for this. 0.

She will likely view you as a 6.5 based on what I've read in your own posts and comments here and on TRP. Don't over-estimate yourself. That will prevent you from knowing where you actually need to improve.

Looking for advice, Need help. +Apology.

2 upvotes · 16 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

i will be far ahead of her

Wait ... you said she's an 8.5 and we know 10s don't actually exist, except by personal taste. So either you're a 10 to her because of her own personal tastes, in which case all your concerns about her aren't warranted in the first place, or you're at best a 9 among men - which is basically model-quality looks, 6-7-figure income, phenomenal charisma, high social status in a meaningful community, etc. And yet you're still living with your parents. Something doesn't add up here. And even a 9 isn't "far ahead."

I don't think you recognize the advantage women have on the SMV scale. On the whole, your capacity to add value to her life is "far ahead" of her capacity to add value to your life. But that's not how SMV is assessed. She's assessing how many other guys she could get who could offer similar or greater value than you do. Chances are, there are tons - and your grandpa's inheritance doesn't count because you as a man did not earn it, at which point it's not part of your SexualMV, just an asset of yours she might want to acquire. So, the question for her is where you rank among men.

The question for you is how she ranks among women. As an alleged-8.5, you believe that she's one of the hottest ones out there, just beneath model-grade looks. How many guys would want to get down her pants?

If more guys want to get into her pants than girls who want to get into your pants, your SMV is lower. If you're batting away more girls than she is batting away guys, your SMV is higher. That's how you have to compare it.

With that in mind: you both put profiles up on a dating app. Who is going to get more right-swipes? You or her?

Yes, the system is rigged in favor of women. Women will almost always perceive their SMV as higher than his, even if it is objectively false, purely because of the validation they can get from other men so easily. And perception is more important than reality. So the fact that you may actually be higher SMV than her doesn't mean squat in a marriage if she doesn't believe it. It only means something to the dozens of other girls who recognize it - and dread leverages their potential recognition of it to force your wife to take notice, which is why it's so powerful a tactic.

Tag: /u/FuzzyKittenIsFuzzy and /u/RunawayGrain

Looking for advice, Need help. +Apology.

2 upvotes · 16 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

That was intentional.

Looking for advice, Need help. +Apology.

2 upvotes · 16 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

You make some good points, most of which are addressed in this post:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/85wf8w/is_sex_outside_of_marriage_a_sin_an_official/. But I also think you're misunderstanding the historical context of what was and wasn't acceptable in Hebrew/Jewish society. More to the point, as even the OP recognized in another comment: just because the culture at the time did something didn't mean God condoned it or that it conformed to his expectations in any way. Much of the Old Testament is a historical account, not a theological mandate to do what the people did in every story, or else we would all be obligated to kill our brother as Cain killed Abel.

Another big point to note is that when men were having sex with unmarried women, they either were or became financially responsible for the life and well-being of those women, the same as if married. This validates the view that regardless of the technicalities of civil marriage, God acknowledges a spiritual marriage and the obligations that come with it.

To that end, if a guy wants to create a spiritual marriage with a woman through having sex with her despite not signing a civil marriage certificate, I'm fine with that. But that still comes with the covenants of marriage on a spiritual level that cannot be abandoned. This view is much more consistent with the polygamous nature of men throughout Scripture - and I don't hold anything against Christian polygamists and might even endorse it myself (on further research) for any man who (1) lives in a country where it is legally permitted, and (2) has the ability to make it work financially - even if that comes in the form of having his wives work to help support the household.

Looking for advice, Need help. +Apology.

2 upvotes · 16 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm pretty sure I agree with everything you wrote. But none of that explains why sex outside of marriage isn't sin.

Your ultimate conclusion was simply: "marriage is no longer needed." I completely agree. Physical marriage was only a road map designed to point us to the spiritual relationship between Christ and the Church. Now that Christ has come and the reality of our spiritual union to him is understood and actualized, physical marriage is no longer necessary.

But by the same logic, sex itself is no longer necessary. So, if a guy gives up marriage, he ought also to give up sex.

The alternative view is, of course, simply to note that God is the one who created marriage, not culture. So, I fully agree that cultural marriage is absolutely null and void. I readily tell guys on this sub that they can be married before God even without filing a marriage certificate with their county courthouse. Screw the civil institution of marriage.

But this doesn't negate the fact that God created spiritual marriage, which transcends cultural definitions of the word "marriage," and I don't think anything at all in your comment addressed this. You were only addressing why cultural marriage is no longer needed - and an appropriate argument it was too.

So if spiritual marriage can be achieved in the absence of a cultural marriage, then how is it formed? Biblically, long before there were courthouses to file certificates in, this was merely accomplished through a covenant and having sex. The covenant could be implied by conduct. Sex is like signing the contract. So, if you conduct yourselves in a manner that looks like marriage (example: spending lots of time together, planning your time around each other, being physically intimate, etc.) then having sex is just signing the contract implied by that conduct.

More to the point: Jesus says no bad tree produces good fruit. That is, Christ doesn't reproduce with bad trees. Non-Christians are bad trees. Christians are good trees. Jesus only produces fruit through good trees.

This seems pretty darn clear to me that Jesus will not reproduce with someone before they are saved (i.e. before they are his bride). Should we not follow the example of Christ by not reproducing with anyone until they are also first our bride?

Alternatively, there are often times when a person has no clue if or when they're saved. They just start reading, learning, growing, and eventually start sharing what they're reading and learning with others and good fruit is produced. Do you not think at that point that they have already become the bride of Christ by their act of reproducing new spiritual life in others, even though they never had a moment saying any particular vow or covenant (ex. "the prayer")?

Looking for advice, Need help. +Apology.

2 upvotes · 16 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

It comes from 1 Cor. 12:8. Some interpret it as prophetic knowledge. Others interpret it to mean someone is gifted with the ability to understand and remember what they read in Scripture. Many gift inventories often suggest I have this gift, but it really depends on how you interpret the passage.

Warnings for a People Not Listening to God

2 upvotes · 15 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good word, brother. Excellent qualifier on staying in the Word itself. I should have mentioned that up front!

Opinions: Do you ask a woman out to begin dating?

2 upvotes · 14 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Welcome :)

The Kingdom of God is a Party

2 upvotes · 12 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

That is the rub, indeed. I generally agree with /u/AlanNoles that we should sift through the mud - take what works and leave the rest behind, as is common advice on RP forums. But this assumes someone is able to discern good advice from bad advice in the first place, and not everyone is gifted with discernment.

I would never want to tell a feminist to treat /r/marriedredpill, for example, as a place to sift through the garbage and find the few valuable gems. They're going to find them. But they will be entirely different gems from the ones you meant. This advice doesn't work for the 99% of Christians who are unversed in the Bible.

Here's a fun little research article on that exact point:

<https://lifewayresearch.com/2017/04/25/lifeway-research-americans-are-fond-of-the-bible-dont-actually-read-it/>

While I'm skeptical in believing that these numbers are way too high, based on my own experience, even assuming this, we're talking less than 10% of believers who have been through the Bible more than once ... and I'd assume you'd have to be through the Bible more than once to have enough of a grasp on it to know when someone is BSing about Scripture from preaching proper exegesis.

Denominations Question from Newcomers and Those Seeking to Return to the Church

2 upvotes · 12 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

We have steered so far away from the 5 Fold, and Pastor Model which has neglected the way God wants it done

Right. Which is why you see me in my comments/posts now writing like: "if a ~~pastor~~ congregation leader" ... because what we call pastors today are not at all what the Bible intended by that word. We have administrators who preach - and even at that are tainted by incredible egos.

That ego can only truly be offset if there is an apostle as authority over them, an evangelist who gets the credit for the new believers coming in, a teacher who gets the credit for educating the believers, and a prophet who can call out sin and set a vision when appropriate. Only then can a pastor fulfill his function of herding the sheep together down the path and keep them from falling astray. Instead, we have one-stop-shop super-men who feign humility by "delegating" tasks that must be done the ~~pastor's~~ congregation leader's way, rather than the way of the person God gifted at that task in the first place.

Understanding WHY sexual sins are sin.

2 upvotes · 9 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I think you're missing the point. OP isn't making a comment on the physical thing in and of itself and the impact that has on bearing children. He's asking: If we masturbate as husbands, and we bear Christ's image as a husband to the church, then what does that say about Christ?

This question has nothing to do with reproduction in itself and everything to do with whether or not we are reflecting Christ's image to the world. That's a concept I can get on board with.

For the record, I don't know what it says about Christ. Evangelism is parallel to spiritual sex here, right? Physical reproductive process and spiritual reproductive process. So masturbation would be like Jesus trying to evangelize himself just for the fun of it. Is that something Jesus would do? If not, then we probably shouldn't masturbate ourselves either.

For the record, OP did address the masturbation comment elsewhere:

https://www.reddit.com/r/TrueChristian/comments/cnoxy0/understanding_why_sexual_sins_are_sin/ewfszpk/

I tend to agree with his view.

Joshua Harris, author of "I Kissed Dating Goodbye" is getting divorced and has fallen away from the faith

2 upvotes · 30 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

You've got a good word from /u/rocknrollchuck, but let me note separately: my wife went through the pseudo-deconstruction process. She had a few years where she would say she wasn't a Christian, didn't care about God or making disciples, etc. I can go way into the causes, but that's not really the point.

When I talk to people about apologetics, like /u/restless_tradcon, this is the type of situation I'm referencing. Someone who has been indoctrinated into the faith by their upbringing or persuaded by logical argument can VERY easily be deconstructed away as soon as: (1) they hear a more persuasive argument against it, or (2) an emotional situation occurs that overpowers the sentimentality of their original indoctrination, whether that's an emotional moment created by an incredibly persuasive argument, or the pleasant nostalgia of one's childhood traditions.

Luke 10:27 says, "Love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your strength and with all your mind." Think about those 4 for a second:

- Your strength/body is constantly pulling away from God.
- Your mind's default on its own is to believe the most persuasive argument.
- Your heart on its own is to follow whatever produces the emotions it wants.
- Your soul is eternal and uncompromising.

This is why Paul didn't preach to people's flesh, mind, or emotions. He says in 1 Cor. 2 - "When I came to you, I did not come with eloquence or human wisdom as I proclaimed to you the testimony about God ... My message and my preaching were not with wise and persuasive words, but with a demonstration of the Spirit's power, so that your faith might not rest on human wisdom, but on God's power."

Notice how Paul went for the Spirit in the way he spoke.

What does this mean? That's the real kicker. How to do "demonstrate the Spirit's power" in the way you share Christ with someone?

Most people mistakenly believe this verse is talking about miracles that he performed to prove God to everyone. This is somewhat absurd, as there are plenty of situations where Paul showed he didn't perform miracles on command the way Jesus did. Instead of calming the storm, he was shipwrecked. Instead of healing Epaphroditus when he was ill and dying, he worried over his life. Yes, Paul could perform miracles at times, but that's not what this verse is talking about.

In fact, the passage itself gives the answer: "as I proclaimed to you the testimony about God." He shared his own testimony. The "demonstration of the Spirit's power" is in his testimony - the way that God changed him. Only the Spirit could have done that. Paul was a murderer (or at least helped murderers), and turned around to become one of the people he was trying to have killed. That doesn't happen through persuasion or emotional insight. It happens through the power of the Holy Spirit working through the death and resurrection of Christ.

This is made even more clear in the first paragraph of Romans 1, where Paul talks about the Spirit's power being used to raise Christ from the dead - and that this was the core of the Gospel he preached. Then you can read Acts 22 and see how Paul himself worded his own testimony when he preached it - demonstrating the radical change God had made in his life. This was the demonstration of the Spirit's power in his own life.

Why am I telling you this? Because that's what pulled my wife around.

- I stopped trying to convince her through logical argument. Women don't process information that way anyway.
- I stopped trying to coddle her emotions toward Christ. Yes, women are emotional. But they're also emotionally fickle and it would never produce a stable result.
- I stopped trying to get her behaving Christ-like in the flesh, as that would only ever come off as controlling and judgmental.
- Instead, I started demonstrating changes in my own life - things that God was doing through me that she could not have done and that I wouldn't want to do on my own. Only the Holy Spirit working through me could bring about the transformation that was happening, and I preached this transformation to her, letting her know the ways God was changing me, and then letting her see those changes as I lived out my life.

She never made a declaration, "I'm a Christian again! You've convinced me. I see that God is real because of what he did in you." But suddenly she took a sincere interest in finding other believers to connect with. She wanted to be a part of a congregation to live alongside. She wanted to pray with the kids and teach them what the Scriptures say. She wanted to engage in spiritual conversation on a variety of subjects.

I can't say for sure what will happen with your wife. Some people simply reject the Holy Spirit or will blaspheme his work. But I do believe Paul's model is the best one. And John thought so too when he wrote Revelation - that the enemy would be overcome "by the blood of the lamb and the word of our testimony." The blood of the lamb is complete. Our testimony is all that remains. Let your testimony be what inspires her rediscovery of Christ and transformation into the Kingdom, if she has not otherwise wandered off too far.

On a separate theological note, I agree with your distaste for saying "she never was." Calvinists define salvation as someone whose destination is eternity in heaven. By that definition, they're right that salvation can't be lost, because you can't be cast out once you're there. But by their definition, they can also never know who is saved and who isn't, so they play word games with saying, "Then they must have never been saved in the first place." As a technical matter under their own definitions, they're correct.

But most other camps of believers (which make up about 65% of all Christians) use more pragmatic definitions of salvation. Perhaps the weakest is the "right standing before God" definition, which would allow a person to slide in and out of "salvation" as often as they callous their hearts and need to repent. My grandma believed this definition and described salvation as a fragile egg in the hands of a strong protector - if we left his hands we would crack, but it takes a lot to get out of his hands in the first place ... but that God actually had the power to put Humpty Dumpty together again. Yes, my grandma wasn't great at analogies, but that was her view.

A more common definition among non-Calvinists is that salvation is the forgiveness of sins. We are saved from those sins which are forgiven. This results in heaven. Once saved, those sins will never be placed back on us again. However, if one were to commit the unforgiveable sin, his forgiveness of other sins doesn't wipe that one clean because that one was never forgiven in the first place. Once someone blasphemes the Holy Spirit (the unforgiveable sin), there is no repentance. This view is consistent with Hebrews 6:4-6 and 2 Peter 2:20, which imply that there is no return once salvation is "lost."

Depending on your definition of "salvation," one can with complete accuracy say that it can both be lost and never lost. Calvinists, with their definition, are right that it can never be lost. Arminians, with their definition, are right that it can be lost. From there, it's a simple matter of deciding who has the better definition. Calvinists go for theological accuracy, whereas Arminians go for utility. The Calvinist view might be correct, but it holds no value if we have no standard for discerning who is or isn't saved. The Arminian view may have some theological loopholes that can't fully be reconciled, but it gives a framework for discernment as to who are true and false believers, and can provide security for someone struggling with their faith. We see Jesus speaking in both terms of theological accuracy and utility at different times, but on soteriological matters, I get the impression that Jesus errs on the side of utility rather than technicality. That's why he can say, "The one who obeys me is the one who loves me," and yet still be consistent with the rest of Scripture that says faith saves a man, not his obedience. Because Jesus is speaking out of utility rather than trying to make a doctrinal teaching on soteriology.

What is this subreddit's general view of E. Michael Jones?

2 upvotes · 30 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Let me preface, I know very little of the guy beyond what a quick Google search showed me. With that being said, as to all general requests about whether anyone fits within the RP sphere or not ...

I have found little to no disagreements between the things he says and what this subreddit preaches

You're going to find this true of a lot of people. Go read Black's Law Dictionary. You will find no disagreements between the things in that book and what this sub preaches. Why? Because they're hardly overlapping content at all - and when they do, it's legal definitions that merely help understand the words used in divorce courts. But I wouldn't recommend anyone go read Black's Law Dictionary.

Instead of looking for disagreements, what's more interesting is looking for overlap.

- We talk a lot about making disciples here, using a model Jesus gave us. Is the preacher talking about those things? From a quick Google search, E. Michael Jones has never actually written on this topic.
- Hypergamy is pretty much the core, underlying concept that makes up all RP discussion. Has he used that word? Does he teach the true nature of women? I did a search with his name and hypergamy and found no references to him even using the word.
- Fitness tests are one of the most common relational struggles that lead either to sexual fulfillment or divorce. Is he preaching on those and how to pass them? Again, no mention online of him talking about fitness tests.

The list could go on.

The point here is that it's easy to find someone who doesn't technically preach against what we talk about here. But that's because nobody is actually willing to talk about half of the stuff we bring up here in the first place. My guess is that if you asked him about his views on these types of things, the blue would come out pretty quick.

Don't confuse a counter-cultural person with a red pill person. There are plenty of counter-cultural thinkers who have genuinely interesting things to say, but who are still blue pill to the core - even ones who recognize basic biblical marriage roles. The red pill is not about being "alt-right" or "counter-cultural" or anything like that. It's about understanding the true nature of intersexual relational dynamics in the modern sexual marketplace - and on RPC we extend that to the spiritually reproductive marketplace as well. If they're talking about anything else, it's not red pill content. That doesn't make it bad content, it just means that it's off-topic and everyone will have a different reaction.

More Than Marriage: How churchianity has screwed up friendships too

2 upvotes · 30 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right on. Relationships were formed by doing things together.

I think there's also some impact by the main stream's view of what I call "inclusionism" - the compulsion to make everyone feel included and no one left out. The "left the 99 to get the 1" parable being applied wrongly. In this case, it's the desire to make introverts feel included rather than intimidated by teachings on relationships, so they cater all teachings to introverts because the extroverts, at least on the outside, seem like they can handle themselves just fine without preaching that caters to them. The result is everyone being taught to become introverts.

Then we're confused why pew sitters are too scared to talk to new nonchristians.

More Than Marriage: How churchianity has screwed up friendships too

2 upvotes · 30 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Great response. No need to 50/50 split though. You can do both simultaneously. Some of my best spiritual conversations with guys are while we're out playing disc golf or going on a hike.

No Real Man Fallacy

2 upvotes · 29 July 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I fully get what you're saying, but there's still a good bit of content policing that goes on here, especially with anyone who ever gets labeled for concern trolling. Guys you (mods, generally) banned used to come to me for a time, for whatever reason thinking I had any sway here, complaining about being mislabeled as trolls or having their content removed.

When that was happening, I'd most often ignore them because I'm actually all in favor of content policing - particularly after bad content has been proven ineffective (I'll entertain any idea at first), and the world has already proven a heck of a lot to be ineffective. But as appropriate as this may be, it still means that there's some standard that's being held about what types of advice men are allowed to hear here, which puts guardrails around what type of men they're likely to become.

I mean, let's be honest. You say, "literally anything you want so long as you take ownership and it's congruent to YOUR values," but if some guy's values involve pedestalizing his wife's pussy because of some reverse dom fetish he has, and he writes a post about how great his marriage is because he serves her every whim and that every other guy should too ... that crap's getting taken down. It's not going to work for the majority of guys who don't have that kind of fetish. But putting guardrails around what works for the majority also means creating a highway between those guardrails to a particular destination that men who stay within those guardrails will all end up becoming.

So, on a philosophical plane it's easy to say, "We don't dictate what a real man is or isn't," but on a pragmatic level we all know that most people - even alleged "alphas" - are going to feel a compulsion to flow with the majority, and therefore adopt the inevitable result of staying within the guard rails as their ideal of masculinity.

To be clear, I'm not saying MRP needs to change anything about what they're doing or that any of this is wrong. I'm all for it - because the result here are a heck of a lot better than the results of any other sets of guardrails men can find in the world (at least insofar as reaching a secular population).

At the end of the day, if you take away the guardrails and tell men to come up with their own definition of masculinity, the majority will flounder around for a while and default to someone else's view. So, it's better to turn them into a dancing monkey for a time until they're stable enough to figure things out for themselves than just to give them the truth up-front. Incidentally, this is the exact balance Christians deal with on a spiritual level with the pragmatic reality of legalism compared with the theological accuracy of antinomianism - but that's too off-topic to get into.

My advice to those guys is, go out there and recognize pussy is abundant, and it's your choice to hand the keys to YOUR sex life over to someone else

I've noted the same concept on RPC periodically: that a guy can't possibly have a solid frame until he knows with genuine confidence that he could have another girl in his bed in a matter of hours if he wanted. Sexual dependency means a guy either has to abandon his sexuality (and therefore has no business on a red pill forum in the first place, becoming a MGTOW) or never be truly free from the frame of the one he's dependent on.

For me, this did not involve cheating on my wife, but did involve a lot of catch-and-release. At first my reaction was just, "This is cool. Girls are paying attention to me now." Great. But I didn't really internalize it until twice in a month, unsolicited, I had girls at a drive thru writing their number on my receipt based on a 2 minute interaction. That's when things shifted to realizing how easy it could be.

You can't, because you haven't experienced it

Ergo the thrust against mental masturbation. Admittedly, I didn't get that early on, having been more interested in theory than practice, and taking other people's word for it as the pragmatic side without experiencing it for myself. Having been on the other end, I now see the distinction, though it's subtle because it's not particularly different from what I expected. But I know enough guys where it didn't come so easy that I can see why letting theory turn into expectation (i.e. covert contracts) would be dangerous.

my approach which is "You're free to do it my way, or you're free to fuck off. Your choice."

Right, but when no alternative forum exists to give men comparable hope, the practical reality is they're still going to have the same psychological perception as the first guy who says "No, YOU have to do it MY way."

It's like America saying, "You don't like #metoo? You want to live in a country that supports the feminist agenda? Great. Screw off." And the guy looks at every other country in the world and realizes the places without these problems are so much worse off in a myriad of other ways, so he doesn't take "you're free to fuck off" as a viable option, and therefore is internally compelled to conform to your standard - not because it's his standard or even a good standard, but because all the other options short of becoming a millionaire and buying your own private island and turning it into your own country ... well, they just don't work.

116 - God is a jerk.

2 upvotes · 25 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

it's our duty to explain why God is good

Why is that your duty? All you're doing is trying to help someone else rationalize our God with their definition of good - either by changing their definition of "good" to your own (which even still may or may not be God's) or by changing their view of God to conform to their definition. Both efforts are futile.

It's the "how would you feel if someone did that" point we were taught as kids.

Right. We all have this to some base degree - and it's not taught like you describe; rather, it is a lingering shadow of the way we were made in God's image. We didn't become the opposite of his image - we simply became a broken image. But I'm not sure how that changes the conversation any, other than to say that God has given us a conscience that even through our sinfulness gives us varying degrees of intuition of what God's definition of good might be. All the same, many people's consciences vary drastically to the point where only a few small core concepts survive - and even the example you gave that "we all know killing innocent people, or stealing from our parents is bad no matter your religion" is non-existent in several people. We know this no longer because we are human, but because we have societies that reinforce these basic principles so that we can't help but grow up without learning it. That is why we see extremely different degrees of crime in third world countries where these values are not instilled from birth in their people the same way they are in first world countries.

most people have enough basic humanity to know basic morality

Except for all those people groups we constantly hear about from various missionary groups where things like lying and stealing and killing are just commonplace events.

So. When someone judges God with a faulty world view, usually a good Christian answer is enough to change the Atheist's mind(hopefully) because most people already have a basic level of morals to know what you're talking about.

Correct, but you're still teaching them to rely on their own framework of morality to judge God. You're just hopeful that you can get them to judge him as good within that framework. Even if you're successful, it's still a faulty premise for viewing God's goodness in the first place, and therefore their faith is resting on sand.

As I often tell people: If a person can be persuaded toward God through scientific evidence or argumentative philosophy, that same person will be persuaded away from God as soon as they hear more persuasive scientific evidence or philosophical arguments. Because the secular world relies on science and philosophy and God can defy both science and human philosophies, founding faith on secular sources is very sketchy. The secular world will almost always come up with a better argument to persuade them away.

We can't just throw human logic out the window

Except that's exactly what Paul did. In 1 Cor. 2 he talks about he he didn't try to convince or persuade the Corinthians to Christ, which would have been full of worldly wisdom, which cannot be a foundation for spiritual truth.

The Bible says "be wise as serpents and innocent as doves". To be wise is to use our thinking skills.

Right, but wisdom does not equate to apologetic rationalizations and use of human philosophies.

116 - God is a jerk.

2 upvotes · 25 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

So in that regard, if they use the word "jerk" or "evil", is only out of ignorance and not truth.

I think you're still missing the bigger picture here. You're trying to look at Scripture and classify God's actions as either "good" or "bad" and prove that God is on the "good" side of that line and not the "bad" one. When you do this, you're treating "good" and "bad" as judgments over God - even if he always falls on the "good" side of that judgment.

God doesn't have to prove that he's "good" to anyone's concept of what "good" means. He IS good. Period. If I come up with my own philosophies of what define good and evil and then say God is good because he meets that philosophical standard, what does God care about that? He's not beholden to my philosophies - or any other human's conception of these terms.

Accordingly, the terms "good" and "evil" as used broadly in the world are relativistic categorization systems designed to compare people to a communal understanding of the standards that separate those concepts. God has his own different standard for what differentiates good and evil - one that he created and is not beholden to, and which is much broader than we have yet to understand.

So, instead of justifying God's actions to any human's standards of "good" or "evil" by showing that the things he did in the Bible can be rationalized through apologetic philosophy, it's better just to disassociate the behaviors from stereotypical classification systems in the first place and just embrace God for who he is and live in the model he sets without regard for the social acceptability of living that way.

Words have meaning

I agree that words have meaning. But the word "jerk" does not mean "bad person." Even Reader's Digest recognizes there are good times to be a jerk, showing that being a jerk itself is not morally repugnant on a social level.

You're confusing the fact that moral repugnance often causes people to become jerks. But the fact that you can turn paper into ashes doesn't mean you must be able to turn ashes back to paper.

Why? Why change the definition of a word to fit your viewpoint when you can just find a better word?

Because that's not the definition of the word in the first place. Most people that I know don't hear the word jerk and assume the person is evil. They assume he exhibits certain character traits that are commonly found offensive. This absolutely fits the definition of God and is the common understanding of the word.

Husband had an affair - seeking feedback

2 upvotes · 23 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Are you going to do everything you can to preserve this marriage or separate?

As you alluded to in your first comment here, the marriage is always preserved. It just becomes nonfunctional when people separate. To play semantics, a broken marriage when people stay together is malfunctional. Nonfunctional things don't work at all; malfunctioning things work, but not as they should. Then there's dysfunctional, which is the component of a system that causes a malfunction - in this case, they are likely both dysfunctional (as we're all sinners and broken people), but his particular dysfunction is what proximately caused the relational malfunction. Of course, he could say that her dysfunction is what prompted him to make his dysfunctional choices, and she'll say that his dysfunction in other ways caused her to have her dysfunction that caused him to have this other dysfunction and the cycle of blame goes on down the infinite rabbit hole until we get back to the very first sin.

This was a question during my class. wondering what others thoughts were.

2 upvotes · 13 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Nope. Eschatology is one area I've generally veered away from. So many people have asked me about that issue specifically that I did a one week personal study on it (so not much - maybe 20 hours total, only about 1 hour looking at non scriptural sources) and I concluded from my limited review that partial preterism was the closest to what made sense to me. That's about it.

So, what is mid-Acts dispensationalism?

MRP/TRP says it's my fault if my wife cheats on me. What does RPC say?

2 upvotes · 10 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right. Fault isn't an either/or, and it really doesn't matter much anyway.

In law we use the "but for" test. "But for X, would Y have happened?" If the answer is no, then X is responsible. But this test can go back infinitely. "But for the sun rising, would my wife have cheated on me? No, because we'd all be dead."

So, the law came up with a concept called "proximate causation," which limits the "but for" test only to those things which are in a certain degree of influence. The most common concept is foresight. We ask: would an ordinary person reasonably expect that X would cause Y to happen?

- Would an ordinary person suspect the sun's rising to cause his wife to cheat on him? No. It's not a proximate cause.
- Would an ordinary person suspect that being a fat video game addict with no mission in life would cause his wife to cheat on him? Yes. It's a proximate cause.

Proximate cause = his fault. But at law there can be multiple proximate causes.

- Would an ordinary person suspect that a woman deciding to cheat on her husband would cause her to cheat on her husband? Yes. Her decision is a proximate cause as well.

We could argue that her desire to cheat was prompted by her husband's unattractiveness, and therefore that's the root cause. But we all know that women still cheat on even highly attractive men. AWALT. Celebrities get cheat on all the time, despite being top-tier attractive. Hypergamy doesn't care.

So, worry less about who's to blame and more about what you're going to do about it.

Tag: /u/dgd_mobius_centurion - this is more to you.

I'm meeting her dad tomorrow. Any advice?

2 upvotes · 9 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right, because most dads are too weak to tell a girl no to something she wants.

I'm meeting her dad tomorrow. Any advice?

2 upvotes · 9 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This advice only makes sense if "yourself" is a really cool, impressive guy who any dad would want his daughter to marry - or if the dad happens to be even more of a nice guy than you are, so he is too weak to put his foot down to a crappy guy.

Prayer request #2 regarding the University of Florida

2 upvotes · 8 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed. General requests for prayer - especially vague ones - violate Rule 4. They're not related to the purpose of this sub and ultimately do not lead to quality discussion. While prayer is great, there are a million other places a person can go to give prayer requests.

Curious about RP Christian denominations

2 upvotes · 8 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

There are no perfect denominations. I have been part of countless. Denominations I've been a substantial part of for at least 6 months include (accounting for overlap):

- Catholic (3 years)
- Orthodox (5 years)
- Presbyterian (10 years, and another 1 year later in life)
- Baptist (1 year)
- Non-Denominational (off and on, collectively around 4 years)
- Lutheran (3 years)
- Pentacostal branches (including AoG) (4 years, collectively)
- Methodist (9 months)
- Nazarene (6 years)
- Friends, Quaker offshoot (technically all my life, off-and-on for 16 years)

What I've found in all of this is ...

1. Every branch that doesn't compromise the Gospel seems to have received a clear revelation from God on a particular subject.
2. With regard to their revelation, they seem to get that concept better than anyone else. Nobody understands the work of the Spirit and the use of the gifts better than the pentacostal branches. Nobody understands God's sovereignty and God's role in salvation better than the Calvinist branches (Presbyterians, Baptists, etc.). Nobody grasps the importance of sanctification quite like the Nazarenes. And so on. (I'm just going off the top of my head here, these statements probably need a lot more refining).

3. Every denomination takes their one great revelation from God and believes it to be so powerful that they interpret all of Scripture through the lens of that revelation. For the Calvinists, everything is interpreted through a sovereignty lens, so when there are passages that talk about man having a choice, they focus their lens even harder rather than admit that theirs isn't the only truth. Same thing with the Catholics and Orthodox, who grasp the value of history and tradition better than anyone. Yet they filter all of their theology through the lens of tradition, which leads them to several bizarre results.
4. Because of 2 and 3, every denomination has something to offer the others, but their lenses preclude them from offering it in a helpful or meaningful way.
5. In reality, it's as though each denomination is akin to a piece of the body of Christ. The pentacostals might be the tongue. The Cathodox are the memory center of the brain. The Nazarenes are the feet. Etc.

If you only ever study from one denomination, you're missing a lot of what Scripture says and digging yourself into one set of human interpretations of Scripture rather than exploring the full array for yourself. Be an Acts 17 Berean - don't believe something just because your denomination tells you it's true. Challenge it against Scripture. The best way to do that is to spend time with those who disagree with your interpretations, coming to different conclusions - not as combatants, but as allies who want to help you grow.

Get a full picture of God by examining the various truths scattered across the whole of his body. Learn to recognize the lenses that taint their ability to interpret the rest of Scripture. Accept that God is big enough that even apparent logical conflicts to our minds might be true of him anyway. Then you'll be well on your path.

Curious about RP Christian denominations

2 upvotes · 8 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Glad to hear you're figuring things out, brother. Let us know if we can help rebuild a foundation on Christ. Too many congregations and denominations try to make logical and philosophy their foundation, calling it "biblical interpretation," when they fail to look at the person of Christ and the model he set for us as the foundation. Watch what he does, not only what he says. Balance that as the foundation of your faith and you'll see things as Christ intended.

Don't Believe The Lie

2 upvotes · 8 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

You've got some good points here. Let me toss out a few things that crossed my mind while I read.

God did not create women to just go with their emotions or lack any discernment from right or wrong

Actually, that's EXACTLY what he did. Before eating from the tree of knowledge of good and evil, Eve lacked the knowledge of good and evil. She could not discern for herself right from wrong. She only knew what was right. She didn't learn what evil was until after she had done it.

Similarly, before she ate the fruit, Genesis 3 gives two reasons why Eve ate this particular fruit: it was pleasing to the eye and it was desirable. That is, she made an emotional impulse decision. The serpent likely knew this about how God created women and targeted Eve because of it.

The time will come to change our ways

It has always been that time. We have always needed to do this. But it won't happen in full or to any appreciable effect until we're in heaven forever. That doesn't mean we don't try now anyway. Sanctification still has value. But the real value of what you're saying won't be reaped until after Judgment Day.

it is a choice. Not nature.

So do you deny that the sinful nature is part of a person's "nature"? That's an interesting theological conclusion that I've never heard before. Please expand on that, unless I'm misunderstanding you.

Is the greatest thing you can do for a person to bring them to salvation?

2 upvotes · 8 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

As an intellectual exercise, yes. As a practical matter, it's impossible to know if someone is saved if you're not discipling them and seeing fruit flow from their lives. So, if you want to know that you have actually helped a person cross the line into the Kingdom, it's not enough merely to get them to say "the prayer." Tons of people say the prayer who aren't actually saved. You've got to keep discipling them beyond that.

Remember the parable of the fig tree. A living tree was growing inside the master's vineyard. The master recognized it as a living tree. But because it lacked fruit, he was ready to chop it down. Don't let your "converts" become the fruitless tree that gets chopped down. As /u/rocknrollchuck said, Judgment Day is the day this will matter most - not the day they said a prayer.

Jekyll and Hyde

2 upvotes · 2 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

What part of the world are you in?

Jekyll and Hyde

2 upvotes · 2 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Just curious: are you referring to "demons" in the sense of sentient beings or are you talking about "evil spirits" in the sense of evil dispositions people have that they haven't been freed from yet?

There's a huge conflict among different camps as to this type of phenomena and I'm curious how you take it. The last guy who talked about this stuff clarified that he didn't mean "sentient demons" as much as the other kind, which is why I always ask.

Jekyll and Hyde

2 upvotes · 2 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Very interesting. I'd be curious to see that - and especially any scriptural examples.

Meta Frame

2 upvotes · 2 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This is an interesting reply.

the principles that govern attraction are the script

I wouldn't say this. I'd say they're more akin to the laws of nature. When a screenwriter puts together his script, he doesn't write in the script, "In this story, gravity makes things fall to the ground, and the sun is what heats the planet." He doesn't need to say them. They're a given. As difficult as it may be, a script can be changed. Laws of nature cannot be changed.

Laws of attraction are about as concrete as the laws of nature. They are just less understood by the general public than the scientific laws because there is virtually no unbiased scientific study done. u/bluepillprofessor used to talk about this a lot - that most "scientific studies" on attraction and human sexuality are done by Q&A surveys where women are asked questions. But a fundamental concept of RP praxeology is that women don't know what they're attracted to. They only know what they want to be attracted to. As a result, these "scientific studies" only reveal what women wish they were attracted to, but those results ultimately get a guy nowhere in the bedroom. Why? Because either the women were clueless about their own biological impulses, or they're flat out lying to make themselves look good or to make womankind look good.

RP is about figuring out what actually works, rather than what women say will work. Men experiment and share their results. This is very crude science, but science nonetheless. While one guy's field report about picking up 5 girls may not feel like much more than an anecdote, when the same strategies are applied over 30+ other guys out there initiating, suddenly we have a sample size sufficient to create a normal distribution and be considered scientifically reliable - and how much more when there are literally thousands of guys on TRP and MRP testing and reporting back.

That's a long way to say that laws of attraction are laws in which the script must operate, not the script itself. While I recognize that I may be tweaking what I said in my original post here (or maybe not, can't remember), the "script" is the way we are conditioned in society to believe we must function within those laws in order to achieve basic results.

In the case of intersexual relational dynamics, the "script" is: (1) meet a girl, (2) ask her out on a date, (3) have more dates, (4) figure out if you like her or not, (5) become exclusive, (6) when you're ready, propose, (7) get married. This is the pattern that everyone just assumes must happen in order to get married.

Highly conservative Christians created an insurgency script: courtship. (1) Find someone you like. (2) Become friends. (3) Hang out with other people a lot, never alone. (4) Propose one day. (5) Get married.

My sidebar posts on finding the girl you can't keep yourself from banging is another insurgency script. I'm reshaping the way that men get from single ---> married. I believe I'm taking God's script by using the Bible as my primary source material, whereas neither the dating nor courtship scripts are derived from Scripture (at best, they're influenced by scriptural concepts, and even their greatest proponents will often ignorantly begin with phrases like, "The Bible doesn't actually say much directly on finding a spouse").

how we orient ourselves around those principles is the narrative

Correct. Your narrative is the way you function as the director in your own life. It is your frame. The way you project yourself to the world around you. Society has a narrative it wants you to follow. If you live in society's frame under the social narrative, then you are taught to believe that dating is the best way to find a wife, that sex before marriage is perfectly fine, that women are underprivileged and need the protection of the marriage laws to help level the playing field, etc. These are all stories that are spun to rationalize the dating script we have today, which always ends in a state-endorsed marriage certificate being signed and filed.

Guys who know how to develop their own frame project a contrary narrative. They may still follow the script (i.e. the dating to marriage approach above), but perhaps their narrative is one of being a man in crippling fear of what marriage laws could do to him later (i.e. most MGTOWs and black pill guys), or a guy who wants to champion male supremacy by dominating women he dates (the angry TRPers), or the hopeless romantic who's looking for happily ever after (the BPers). These are all different narratives guys create for themselves. As you say, in a sense, this is how a man orients himself around the laws of attraction - at least as best he knows them.

Thus, one who rearranges his life around the primary mission of getting women to sleep with him, IS living in the feminine frame

Not if that's authentically his goal. The feminine imperative's goal with regard to men isn't to get them to become sex-crazed womanizers. That's actually another insurgency script. It abandons the social compulsion toward marriage by creating its own pattern: (1) hit on a chick, (2) have sex with her, (3) rinse and repeat with the same or different chicks. Marriage never enters this man's script in the first place (or if it does, it's not until this pattern has been vamped for dozens of cycles). The narrative surrounding this script is that such men should be condemned by society. A guy with a strong frame can live this script and yet spin his narrative to cause people to believe he is the exception to the societal narrative - and may even be able to persuade other men to become "exceptions" alongside him. He's not really an exception. He's just proven that a guy can be a womanizer and a cool guy without falling into the stereotypes (negative narrative) that society places around womanizers.

To step back, if the man's goal is to have sex with lots of women, he's not living in the feminine frame. He is trying to use his knowledge of the laws of attraction to accomplish his goals though. He created a new script that didn't involve marriage and wrote it using the same laws that everyone else's script uses. Then a narrative is spun around his script - either by society, which will frame him as an evil jerk, or by himself, which will likely be that he's a cool guy that women want. He projects himself as James Bond, whereas society would condemn him as it did Charlie Sheen. Two different narratives around the same womanizing script.

That's all I've got time for. Hopefully this sets enough of a stage to let you know how I'd interpret or respond to the rest of your comment :p

No Wife / Why Women Don't Need You / Do not marry her...

2 upvotes · 27 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I didn't call you ungodly - your words, not mine. I merely contrasted the double sided nature you present. Note that when you mentioned sleeping with this girl, there was no indication of repentance. You were bragging. And to a girl who got you to start DEERing like crazy.

As for judging sins, when there seems to be no indication of repentance, there's certainly room for judgment. 1 Cor. 5 and all. That's the liberals who pretend Christians should never judge.

Red Pill Church site?

2 upvotes · 23 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I think you mean congregations. Oh, and you mean lots of blue pill, feminized people in those congregations.

The Second Kiss of Death

2 upvotes · 20 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

My expectations are hardly that high. But I track with you. Of course, jeans can be sexy. Just depends on the type of jeans, how they fit, etc. Same with a tshirt.

The Second Kiss of Death

2 upvotes · 19 June 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I guess I'm not following. I'm living proof that a woman will jump off a cliff if she sees an attractive man doing it. With limited moral exception (my wife's history of extremist piety in our faith and psychological harm from childhood does have lingering effects), my wife will submit to whatever direction I take her, and then rationalize her own reasons for wanting to do so too. I still can't tell if that bit is to make her feel like she's her own woman when she follows me, or if it's her way of internalizing the way I lead her to be self-motivated about it too - but heck, results are results. All the same, this is coming from a guy who was once told, "I'm not attracted to you, and I never have been, even when we were dating and first married," and "ILY, BINILWY," and a host of other similar things just a few short years ago.

Are there a few exceptions to the rule? Sure. But I thought I was the exception - and in my first post here, I was even told by the guys here on MRP that I was the exception. Turns out we were all wrong and AWALT.

Her understanding the "whats and the whys" isn't important, necessarily. She just needs to be motivated to change, then have someone push her to get going.

The Second Kiss of Death

2 upvotes · 19 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent summary/re-interpretation. Try it out for the next 30 days and write a post on how this goes for you.

The word "nice" comes from the root word "nescire" in Latin, which means "to not know"

2 upvotes · 19 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, indeed. Honestly, "patriarchy" has changed definitions so many times that I don't even know what it means anymore. Is it a system of leadership in the home? An estate planning and probate framework? A governmental system? A scheme by men to suppress women's rights? I guess it depends on who you talk to.

I have fallen in love with my step sister and need advice

2 upvotes · 18 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

More to /u/Torn4christ_24 - my comment on fasting is here:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/blrqw7/share_your_experiences_with_fasting/emr4wi/

Under the principles in there, OP's cause is certainly worth fasting over - if he is genuinely sincere. If he's trolling or just wants someone to talk about his struggle with, while secretly harboring the desire as a stronghold he has no genuine desire to let go of, fasting will do nothing for him. Sadly, from the comments here, I'm guessing he's in this latter category. I'm unpersuaded that OP actually wants to change his desires.

No doubt, he thinks he does. But this is the power of unfulfilled ONEitis - that you believe you want to move on, but your emotionalist nature loves the feelings and attention that the ongoing dilemma brings. You are right to point him to developing a mission because ultimately, if he really does want to move on, this is the only thing that's going to get his head on straight.

On Marriage And Mission

2 upvotes · 13 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

2/2

legal contracts rather than marriage contracts

It's certainly a better option, but it falters in that it only addresses the finances - and not even all of that. The state will NEVER give up jurisdiction over the custody of minor children, which includes the financial support of those children. You cannot agree to arbitrate these rights away or to follow church laws instead of state laws over minors. So, if one party wanted, they could still take advantage of the state laws in custody determinations. Fortunately, most states, juvenile cases notwithstanding, have gender-neutralized their custody laws when the child is born as the product of a marriage. The issue you'll run into is that in your proposal, parties aren't actually married by the state, so all custody cases would become juvenile rather than domestic relations cases.

To simplify this, juvenile cases are custody cases involving parties who were not married at the time the children were born (in some states, conceived - yes, using conception is ironic in the face of abortion laws, but it's more about verification of paternity than validating the life of the child). If parties are never legally married - only "3.0" married, then all cases become juvenile cases. Juvenile cases are the primary stronghold of women because the default position of law is that the mother is the custodial parent until the alleged father can prove he actually is the father. At that point, things start to equalize a bit, but there's still a heavy cultural push in favor of mothers even in juvenile cases, whereas this is somewhat eradicated by domestic courts in larger counties when custody is being decided pursuant to a divorce case. Smaller counties are a different story altogether.

we must recognize that men who opt out of marriage are not necessarily non-committal loafers looking to simply co-habitate

All of this, of course, begs the question: how far are women willing to let this go?

Yes, "that's living in their frame," blah, blah, blah. But it's a serious question nonetheless. Would the feminine imperative push to outlaw church-arbitrated marriage contracts? Or perhaps on a less institutional level, a social movement would react and women would simply refuse ever to get married in this 3.0 system that doesn't advantage them. Are the masses of men willing to go "civilized-MGTOW" to make a stand and prove their point, or do they want women so badly that they'll cave?

The thing is, men who properly understand hypergamy realize they're going to get the woman to cave if they're high enough quality. Men actually hold all the power - and we always have. Men have simply failed to recognize their power over female hypergamy, so they've squandered it and allowed women to take the lead. Red pill men, having recognized how to utilize hypergamy for their own purposes, have the ability to take that power and control back. But as long as the majority of the men in America remain blue, this type of shift to Marriage 3.0 will never happen because the weak men will cave before the women will - and they aren't going to be high enough value men to motivate the women to enter into a Marriage 3.0 arrangement in the first place.

So, if your proposal is to work, we've got to red pill all the men first. But by doing that, we're actually taking away the advantage of being a red pill men, making the competition in the sexual marketplace even more fierce. Right now, a red pill man can get pretty much any girl he wants. He is the prize and women will compete for his attention - top 20% and all. But if things flip and we can get 80% of men to be red pill, what does that do to the sexual marketplace? It's a bit of a catch-22 doing what it would take to get your plan mass-applicable.

u/Bluepillprofessor and u/Rollo-Tomassi, your thoughts would be most welcome on the matter.

Tags in posts don't ping the user, so here's a ping to point them back to your post.

On Marriage And Mission

2 upvotes · 13 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

1/2

How did I miss the marriage 3.0 post?!? Life has been too crazy ... Also, tags in threads don't ping the person, only in comments.

MARRIAGE 3.0 POST

Christian men are effectively LARPing at Marriage 1.0 and are thus afforded no legal protections at all if their wife acts out in rebellion

Very true ... of any man who hasn't followed my advice for guarding against divorce rape. If divorce rape isn't a valid concern (which it shouldn't be for a man who leads appropriately), the authority can be real and not LARPing because she has no weapon against him.

is Marriage 2.0 even marriage at all?

Spot on. It's not - and we've often agreed here that there's a clear distinction between legal and spiritual marriage.

Ship of Theseus

You missed the best part of the exercise: that someone kept all of the original parts that were cast away, mended them, and rebuilt the ship with the original parts. Now who has the original boat? Theseus with his continually upgraded ship that he never left, or the scavenger who took his throwaway pieces and put them back together?

Each time a man says "I do" he is accepting that if his wife divorces him for any reason at all there is a likelihood of him:

If he is not wise in mitigating these risks, that's correct. But again, mitigation options do exist that can minimize all of this. Personally, I know for a fact that I'm divorce proof. Other guys can get there too. The issue is that most guys are not legally-conscious enough to caulk the edges of their ship, leaving room for it to sink if the waves become too big. But which ship is sinking: Theseus' or the scavenger's? ;)

Marriage 3.0 ... held accountable to these vows by the same community

Oh, you mean like when people got married in biblical communities? I think this looks like a marriage 3.0 because we're so used to assuming marriage as a state-sanctioned thing through recent history, but in reality, it'd be more accurate to say:

- Marriage 1.0 - What you call marriage 3.0. Vow before God enforced by a local community.
- Marriage 2.0 - What secular RP calls marriage 1.0. This is when the real marriage 1.0 was shifted to become a governmental institution instead of a community one. To make my point here: even in the US marriage wasn't a legally recognized entity until 1913 and not until 1929 before all states had gotten on-board. That's right - the first 400+ years that Europeans were living on this continent treated marriage as a primarily private matter unenforced by the state.
- Marriage 3.0 - This is what you and secular RP call marriage 2.0, where the laws are less about what's right and more about "split the baby and move on to the next case."
- Marriage 4.0 - Doesn't exist, but this "next step" you're referring to as Marriage 3.0 is really a return to the true Marriage 1.0, which existed for millennia.

For this to have any effect whatsoever, the church has to become something costly to be excommunicated from

What a wonderful fantasy ;) You can, of course, have the state enforce arbitrated decisions presented to the court. It would just have to be clear in the arbitration agreement (executed when the couple gets married before the church) that the arbitrator is not bound by the state's laws, but the church's judgment and biblical discretion. Due to separation of church and state, the state court enforcing the decision of the church-arbitrator would be prohibited from re-evaluating the church's decision because that would involve the state interpreting church doctrine (a huge no-no in a number of cases, even into recent history), but they would certainly have authority to enforce the arbitrator's decision as-written, regardless of whether it agreed with the conclusion, as that would become a binding contractual arrangement subject to civil sanctions independent of marriage laws.

being banished from them is a costly thing not to be taken lightly. Evangelicals have much to learn from this.

Darn straight! This is one of the reasons I keep pushing the decentralized church model. As long as centralized churches congregations focus on getting people to COME to them (their services, their programs, their community activities, etc.), as you say, leaving one body means squat because another one is already pulling you in, having no idea why you might have been kicked out of the first one. And if you're kicked out of 10, there's still another place ready to have you.

With a decentralized model, the leadership isn't interested in keeping people in the doors - it's interested in sending them out. As a result, if one of the 80% who aren't all that serious about following Christ is acting out, they have no qualms getting rid of the person because he/she is an unnecessary drain on their resources anyway. This is how most of the early church understood ministry, and it's how the apostles modeled it - and it's even the very definition of the word ekklesia, which we translate as church. That word was a military term at the time, referring to "a purposed gathering." It was what they would call the meetings where the generals would meet in a singular tent to discuss strategy before leaving the tent to carry out their purpose on the battlefield. Now we're inviting privates and petty officers to those meetings - not to teach them how to be generals, but because we can show off how big our tent meetings are. And then we wonder why we're not winning ground on the battlefield.

My point is: returning to a decentralized, disciple-making model adds value back to being part of a body. This can ABSOLUTELY happen even in today's churchianity climate, as I've seen it happen with a body near me, where continued participation in that particular body actually matters to people and excommunication is a big deal. Interestingly, it's also a network of house churches congregations and not a mass gathering. The issue is: as soon as you develop a community so tight that people would feel consequences for leaving, you get labeled as a cult.

Prenuptial agreements remove temptation from the women and preemptively defeat the incentive to divorce for monetary gain.

This is the exact same view I've been pushing since I first got my law license. You're not planning for future failure. You're disincentivizing either person from divorce by taking away the personal gains they could achieve by breaking the joint union. In many cases, the prenup is a marriage-saver, not a marriage-breaker.

I believe ~~pastors~~ congregational leaders screw this up because they're so used to the old statistics that men were the cheaters and women were left to take care of the house and kids while their husbands were screwing girls at the hotel. In this situation, a prenup would most likely make it easier for the man to leave his wife and kids to run off with the mistress. In that scenario, prenups certainly would facilitate divorce.

But in modern culture, most divorces are filed by women. I also did a study of over 60 cases (I think 67?) that involved infidelity. I found that about 70% of them involved the woman cheating on the man, not the reverse. None of the ones where the woman cheated involved a prenup. So, in this climate, is a prenup more likely to promote divorce or disincentivize it? The answer seems obvious.

Under Marriage 2.0, as his wealth increases his risk in getting married increases, acting as a disincentive towards marriage

You missed the more common reaction: men who are unconcerned with getting wealthy. A larger crowd than MGTOWs are the men who have decided just to give up on the American dream and put around with their lives. They still want girls, and will often find them, but they let the woman run the show, make the money, etc. so they have more time to play video games. And if she leaves him, what does he get to lose? He'll just hop on Tinder and find another desperate girl longing for attention. These guys aren't finding the highest quality women ... but heck, men aren't hypergamous, so they don't need to find top tier girls. Sex is sex to them, and if they can get a free ride for a while, why not?

Yes, Marriage 2.0 protects these men the same way it protects lazy and sexually disinterested women. As I've often said, we're really in a Marriage 2.2 or perhaps 1.8 (or 3.2/2.8 by my graph above) because things have changed since the 60s. The laws aren't gender-biased anymore. They're biased in favor of lesser-earners. By doing this, they are giving people an incentive to earn less, be lazy, irresponsible, etc. This is what Jordan

Peterson talks about when he says that all the privileges of being a man are being taken away, and then the world is shocked when we get these man-boys who aren't willing to keep bearing the responsibilities of being a man without those privileges.

Perhaps the prenup ... looks something like this

You're assuming the man is always the higher earner. In modern culture that isn't always going to be the case, including within the church. Plus, it's foolish for a man to limit his wife's income-earning capacity. Divorce rape aside, what if the man is injured and no longer able to work? Now you're on SSDI for the rest of your life, which isn't all that great. Not that women must work, but that their income-earning capacity should be cultivated anyway.

As for the specifics of these contracts, that would vary from couple to couple based on what they bring into the arrangement.

Based on what I know of red pill thought it seems like this sub recommending marriage over living as Paul did being single is illogical.

2 upvotes · 11 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, makes sense. I thought you were encouraging MGTOWs to get married :p

The world we live in

2 upvotes · 10 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

There's definitely value in it. But I'm also curious about the biblical imperative here. Certainly the passages about sharing each other's burdens and confessing our sins to one another doesn't necessarily mean between the genders - as I know you've mentioned in other threads that it'd be inappropriate for a man to confess his struggles with pornography and masturbation to a single woman - especially one he might be interested in dating, right? And I think you even allude to this in your comment here.

But what about married people? This is where it gets tricky. Certainly Christ's bride should confess our faults to our groom. But is there a biblical case to be made for Jesus confessing to the church? He's perfect, so we really don't get to see that - but even if he wasn't, is that the model he would have set or not? Are there other biblical passages that give us clues on this point?

Who should disciple women?

2 upvotes · 9 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Fair enough, and I'm glad you can recognize this in yourself! But I would encourage you that beginning to disciple others (at least beginning with men) often IS the way you start getting your house in order. Read some of the stuff I've written on Matthew 12.

Here's one of my posts on the subject. The Matthew 12 bit is about half way in, "the solution" section.

Based on what I know of red pill thought it seems like this sub recommending marriage over living as Paul did being single is illogical.

2 upvotes · 7 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'll have to ponder that one. I'm often too pro-single to wrap my head around a pro-marriage concept on the fly. While I despise their attitudes (either cry-babies or rage-stagers), I have a great empathy for the behavioral conclusions MGTOWs reach.

My gut reaction on taking advantage of their hard work is that they're incredibly effective at drawing a crowd of men who are dissatisfied with the status quo. I can't draw a crowd of that size on my own. But if they've done the hard work for me - how can I infiltrate that crowd and "steer the ship," so to say, to derail as many people away from their hateful cry-babying and toward a "responsibility and authority" that is conducive to advancing God's Kingdom in some way? Maybe getting them married is an effective way of doing this - but it also seems like there would be so much resistance that it'd be somewhat self-defeatist.

Or perhaps you were being facetious/sarcastic - I honestly couldn't tell which way you were going with that :p

Based on what I know of red pill thought it seems like this sub recommending marriage over living as Paul did being single is illogical.

2 upvotes · 4 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I think you're right. The question I ask is: how can we take advantage of the hard work they're doing?

I hope this guy can get some advice from this sub

2 upvotes · 4 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Thus the important issue is: What are your lift stats?

I actually laughed out loud at that twist. Definitely the starting point.

I hope this guy can get some advice from this sub

2 upvotes · 4 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This is key. I once asked a now-red-pilled pastor:

On Judgment day, would you rather tell God:

- Sorry, I didn't make many disciples. My marriage was falling apart. But I did manage to keep my wife from divorcing me!

or

- I did everything I could to fulfill the mission you gave me and many people standing here today are the fruit of my labor. I had a woman who helped me for a while, but she abandoned me. It would have been nice if that worked out.

To the first man, God will almost certainly answer: "You were responsible to my purposes for you. If she left, that would have been her rebellion against me, not yours. How do you answer for your own rebellion?"

To the second man God will almost certainly say, "You couldn't control her actions. I see no fault in you, yet she did not want a man living after me. While you may not have been perfect, ultimately she will account for her own choice, not you."

At what point do incorrect beliefs equal "wandered off into myths"?

2 upvotes · 24 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Obviously, these ideas are far from preaching a different gospel, but they also are denying fundamental truths about God's creation and are causing great harm.

A couple people have honed in on this, so let me simplify what I think they're trying to say by saying it's a different gospel.

God is God. We have the option to follow him or not. Some people decide they don't like God because his views don't align with theirs. So, they create their own ideology of what they think their god should really be like - they make a god in their own image. Then they worship that god and say it's the same God of the Bible. In reality, they are following a different god, but use the Bible to say they're worshipping the same God of the Bible.

It's like if my wife were to say she's married to RC and she describes RC as a muscular guy who is 6' tall, blue eyes, and has black hair. Well, the reality is that I have blonde hair. She says, "But remember that one time you had black hair?" and I say, Yeah, I put on a wig for a play and had it on for all of 2 hours. That wasn't my hair, it was just a way I expressed my appearance for a brief, specific time for a brief, specific purpose. But she still goes around saying that she's married to a black-haired man. Is she really talking about me at that point? No, her husband does not have black hair. She's talking about some made-up version of me that isn't real. The more deviating characteristics she builds into her perception of me, the less and less she's actually talking about me with others. Instead, she's talking about what she wishes I would be (no, my wife has never actually done this; it's just an illustration). When someone hears of me from her descriptions and finally meets me, are they likely to recognize me? Have they learned who I am at all or are they going to find I'm someone completely different from what they've been picturing all these years?

When we share about Jesus with others, they develop a perception of who he is and they worship that perception. When they meet the real Jesus on Judgment Day are they going to be able to say, "Yep, that's him. That's the guy I loved and worshiped all my life!" Or are they going to say, "Who are you? You're not at all what I imagined," to which he'll respond, Yeah, because you were never actually worshipping ME in the first place.

Where is the line between "Oh, sorry, I thought you had black hair" and "Oh, sorry, I never would have recognized you based on the description your wife gave"? I have no clue.

Whoever restrains his words...

2 upvotes · 20 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good post.

restraining your words does not gain you greater information

I greatly disagree with this one. I have often played the strategy of staying silent until I learn what's happening in a room, acquiring knowledge through silent observation, before speaking up to accomplish my goals. This is wonderful in court. It works even better in social situations among people you don't know very well.

All the same, I like the concept - especially u/OsmiumZulu's interpretive translation.

As for the last bit, it's absolutely possible to say something wise and insightful with no effort at all.

Whoever restrains his words...

2 upvotes · 20 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Props for referencing the Young's Literal. It's not often I see someone else make use of it - though it's one of my favorites for actual study and understanding.

Finding men to do life with

2 upvotes · 7 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

If you can't find the types of guys you're looking for, raise them up. One of my best friends was a spiritually mature dough boy. I got him going to the gym with me and now he's mostly red pill'd and we share a lot of great conversations. Another guy I know was a very masculine guy already. I shared Christ with him, disciplined him, and now he's off disciplining other guys. We have great conversations about missiology and how to get the Gospel into the nations. And these are just two of the many guys I connect with.

Some people just won't budge. If they're not FAST guys (Faithful, Available, Saved, Teachable), it can take years to see any budging out of them. So, pick another guy and move on.

Not sure how? https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/8vui5/social_influence_and_defying_context/ - that's my explanation about how to build social influence.

See also: https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/awagpe/missional_social_strategy/

Wow Relevant Magazine is so cucked.

2 upvotes · 3 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right on.

1920s were not an evolution of justice, but the beginning of our end. Take women's votes away.

2 upvotes · 2 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah ... that's not true in the slightest.

Women Feeling Threatened by Hyper-Sexualized Social Media

2 upvotes · 30 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for sharing this!

Women Feeling Threatened by Hyper-Sexualized Social Media

2 upvotes · 30 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This is good to hear. Thanks for sharing!

Women Feeling Threatened by Hyper-Sexualized Social Media

2 upvotes · 30 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

women policing their own hypergamy

Who said it would be a women-led forum? For-women doesn't have to mean led-by-women. I believe /u/RedPillWonder has stated an intent as a man to spearhead his writing for the female community, for example.

I think if we start seeing more women posting then guys will subconsciously start catering their posts

What you mean is: "Blue pill guys will keep posting from a blue pill mentality," right? A red pill guy isn't going to care whether or not women are posting here. He's going to post truth regardless. The only people who will be affected by a heightened feminine presence will be the blue pill guys - and that will only make it easier to parse out which is which and give appropriate correction.

More interestingly, though, is the fact that God clearly intends biblical men and godly women to co-exist side-by-side. If what you're saying were true as a general rule, heaven could not exist because the men in heaven would subconsciously start catering their speech to the godly women up there, right? Obviously that's not the case - and you could just as easily argue that heaven will be different because we'll all be resurrected. But isn't it one of the compulsions Jesus gives us to bring God's Kingdom to earth? "On earth as it is in heaven," as he prays - and why pray if we're not going to take steps in that direction?

I'd love a place where men and women could interact in a godly manner today on earth the same way we will in heaven - both sides fully understanding and living in light of their God-given imperative. The church is supposed to be that context, but it has historically failed. Should we give up too?

But perhaps this warrants a broader conversation. Bring it up on our next phone call. I'm free tonight.

Tag: /u/rocknrollchuck

Where can i add some dread?

2 upvotes · 29 April 2019 · /r/askMRP

You're just existing. Without a mission in life, you're boring. This is why your sex life is "not brilliant." There are a million options for what your mission can be - and many of them can incorporate the things you're already doing. But doing things just because they're things to do ... that's a waste.

In my view, having a mission is the single most foundational point of having a great sex life in marriage. Everything else flows from this.

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/7vhh4m/210_mission_matters_nothing_else_matters_only/

Raiders of the Lost Covenant

2 upvotes · 22 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good points here. Eschatology is certainly the area of Scripture I have studied the least, so I won't pretend to know more than you on this area. Off the top of my head, I get the impression from Revelation that Christ's return will occur in a pretty darn dark place in humanity's timeline, and that the return to godly national rule will occur after Christ's return - but I'm open to other views on this.

That's not to say that I disagree with your timeline - I just get the impression that we're in 3, not 4, and that 4 won't occur until after the pre-JD unfulfilled aspects of Revelation occur (noting that I've usually referred to myself as a partial preterist, not a complete one - and even that only by guesswork).

Ruined a relationship with female disciple

2 upvotes · 21 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

have become obsessed with apologetics

As a former master apologist, I empathize greatly with this passion, but this is also the most concerning thing in your entire post. Can you elaborate more on this?

I've realized that this was my first mistake by not having a female friend disciple her instead

Why is that a mistake?

I engaged in it because of my attraction to her and also I suppose because I'm generally a kind person.

Kind person comment aside, your attraction to her should be the very reason you engage in discipling a woman.

we've alternated every time since then.

Good, you're not a money bag to her.

asking if I can invite her to BJJ because she really wants to learn

She could have signed up for any class. She asked you because she's interested in you. This should be obvious, and you even recognize it, but start to rationalize it away.

I got hit with the feeling of missing her

You mean, "I got hit with ONEitis."

So (stupidly), I texted her saying I'm sorry but I don't think we should talk anymore

If you don't want to talk anymore, this isn't stupid. It's blunt honesty, which is appropriate.

she freaks out

Trying to regain your attention, after you've displayed that you're a high value man by rejecting her, which she reads as, "He thinks he can do better; I better pin him down now before I lose him to someone else." Dread.

Because I have no heart balls whatsoever, I stupidly responded "sounds good".

FTFY.

I'm regretting it because now I owe her a proper explanation.

You don't owe her anything.

- "Why did you say those things?"
- Don't worry about it. That's my business.

See how easy that is?

I was afraid of ruining the friendship/discipleship

What's your end-goal for the relationship?

What do you guys say about this?

You're missing many other options, the most obvious being:

D) Meet her and act normal, don't explain anything.

This reminds me of the episode of Seinfeld where George quits his job. He regrets quitting. So, he decides to show up to work the next day anyway and pretend like it never happened. Fun stuff. Go watch that episode - not to learn any life lessons or anything, but because Seinfeld is funny.

Lighten up. Figure out what you want to do before you go making decisions. You're sitting in an air port asking which plane you should get on without ever deciding what destination you want to reach. This is the heart of what /u/WarriorJesus1915 was saying.

Post cut rebulking

2 upvotes · 19 April 2019 · /r/askMRP

I hadn't thought of increasing sleep. Good tip.

Quit being a fucking pussy

2 upvotes · 18 April 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Good stuff here. Solid foundation.

Struggling with enthusiasm and motivation with my faith

2 upvotes · 15 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

How awful would it be if the sincerity of our faith were as fickle as our emotional reactions to it?

3 John 1:4 says, "I have no greater joy than this: to hear that my children are walking in the truth."

I used to be emotionally bipolar about my faith. Now I have a consistent high/fire. I was often told in the church that it's impossible to maintain the fire burning all the time - that every flame is meant to land and every fire is meant to go out, or dim from time to time. I no longer believe this is true.

The solution is simply this: do what God put you here to do and he'll keep throwing jet fuel on whatever sparks or blaze he finds. What did he put you here to do? Make disciples. You start seeing the way your disciples spread the Gospel to others? That's where the emotions come. Try reading the first chapter of Philippians, for example, and marvel at the emotional reaction Paul had at the fact that his disciples were still carrying the Gospel forward to others. It's beautiful. That's how you maintain it - develop spiritual children and see the way they grow and reproduce.

Discussion: Is it okay to masturbate to thoughts of your wife?

2 upvotes · 15 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

That's a long story, but the sin in this verse is adultery. Lust can be adultery. Adultery is still the underlying sin.

This mistake can be significant. For example, some early church fathers concluded that because of this verse it's sinful for a man to lust even after his wife. When we recognize that adultery is the sin in the verse, this issue clears up - it's not adultery if it's your wife.

Discussion: Is it okay to masturbate to thoughts of your wife?

2 upvotes · 15 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right. I was baiting out that answer. It doesn't say lust is sin. It says lustful intent is adultery in someone's heart.

What is the sin in this verse?

Are Christian women really different?

2 upvotes · 12 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, that's not the Holy Spirit then.

What's your perspective on tunnel vision within the context of dating?

2 upvotes · 8 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

While ONEitis may not be your problem right now, my post on ONEitis addresses your questions here.

Discussion: Is it okay to masturbate to thoughts of your wife?

2 upvotes · 6 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

1. Good questions. Same analysis applies: is it prompted by faith and does it glorify God or have the impact of decreasing your sexual expression toward your wife?
2. Good questions again. Sometimes scratching my balls is as good as getting off. I don't know where that line is, nor does the bible tell us. That's why I don't think types of physical pleasure is the rubric God uses, but the questions above instead.

not about the physical act at all, but the heart behind it

Completely agreed. The problem is that we use our own metric for deciding legitimate heart motives and not. Isaiah 64:6 says that even the best things are viewed as filthy rags to God. Similarly, Jesus says that loving our family members can disqualify us from being called his disciples and that we should hate them instead. Nuances aside, how do we go about interpreting these passages other than to conclude that God's standard for what defines a good heart and good motives is different from ours?

So, if I rake my neighbor's yard because I love her, I might feel justified for my good deed, but if it had nothing to do with the fact that God loves her or that it can advance the purpose for which God saved me (i.e. because of my faith) then even that seemingly good motive is repulsive to God.

So, while I agree with you, we must be extremely careful about how we go about assessing the validity of our motives, as common sense morality doesn't cut it in the age of sin.

Masturbation when your wife withholds: Go, or no-go?

2 upvotes · 6 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting. The way you talked, I was expecting the other answer. Good stuff all the same! Thanks for clarifying.

What's so special about Jezebel that she gets her own set of characteristics named after her? Why don't we say all the people addicted to coffee have the spirit of Voltaire? Or all racists have the spirit of Jim Crowe, founder of the kkk?

Masturbation when your wife withholds: Go, or no-go?

2 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

It doesn't seem esoteric at all. It's actually a line of theology that I have studied a lot - much of which I agree with. And there are many more spirits I could name than Jezebel's.

I just don't see value in giving more credit to demonic forces than they deserve, so I only call out a spirit for what it is when it's plain what I'm dealing with. Generic behaviors don't warrant naming spirits, and sexual denial coupled with female rebellion is a generic behavior today ... not to mention the Jezebel spirit is usually associated with sexual promiscuity, not sexual aversion.

Discussion: Is it okay to masturbate to thoughts of your wife?

2 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Couldn't God have created the male body so that sexual stimulation could only occur through pheromones, which would require a woman's physical presence? Or that ejaculation is only possible through chemicals found in a female vagina?

Isn't it at all telling that God didn't create the world this way?

I honestly don't know ... just questions that imply a different conclusion.

I didn't understand your first question though. Are you asking if the Father/Israel relationship is identical to the Christ/Church relationship?

Masturbation when your wife withholds: Go, or no-go?

2 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

"let's have sex" - "No."

She interprets this as a question, even if it's not asked. This is particularly true if you're leaving time for her to respond to your words before initiating further. That response time is where she thinks: "He wants me to tell him whether or not I'm okay with that," which her hamster interprets as an implicit question. My guess is, at least subliminally, that's actually the way you intended it too.

Even when I point out, "hey, this is withholding"

Less talking. While I appreciate the way you're trying to defend and rationalize your approach to sexuality, and you're doing the same stuff that I used to try that I thought would work, this is fundamentally an attraction issue, not a matter of learning how to initiate better.

Initiation only works if the underlying attraction is already there. Talking too much decreases attraction - especially if it comes off as butthurt.

Discussion: Is it okay to masturbate to thoughts of your wife?

2 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

That brings up some good lines in the conversation that I forgot to mention. I definitely should have gotten into the issue of how some people can use it as a replacement for intimacy.

I just saw an episode of Curb Your Enthusiasm where Larry's wife tries to initiate sex and he turns her down because he had already masturbated. That would certainly be problematic.

Good thoughts all around.

Masturbation when your wife withholds: Go, or no-go?

2 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

My answer was too long for the comment box. I'll make a separate post of it so as not to derail the topic of this conversation in your thread with some of the nuances I bring up.

Materialist Hypergamy in the Church

2 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not aware of one, but I'm starting them. Start by reading the book. It's not perfect, but if you can filter out the bad, the good is a type of good you won't find anywhere else. Once you've read it, hit me up again and we'll chat.

Materialist Hypergamy in the Church

2 upvotes · 4 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

"Be realistic, brother. We're doing God's work in this building. Look how many people are showing up to Sunday services because of the way we have stewarded our finances! Look at the capacity our social media marketing team has to reach people all over the internet with the love of Jesus! See how the classes we teach in these rooms are imparting biblical theology to those who didn't know the Bible before! Be realistic about budgeting - when you have this many people who want to know Christ and learn about him from us, that comes with a lot of expenses. We must pay staff to meet with the people, train leaders, run ministries, administrate logistics, etc. We must have a building to accommodate these people and programs. We must have equipment for the worship team to play to help people build an emotional connection with Jesus on Sunday morning. These things aren't cheap."

I've had this conversation dozens of times. I'm with you, brother.

My red pill pastor calculated recently that based on our annual budget and the amount that is specifically allocated toward Sunday services, which he pro-rated for things like our building mortgage, the amount of hours the staff spends preparing for Sunday as compared with other activities, curriculum for kids' ministry, a pro rated cost for the ration of how we use our lighting and sound equipment on Sundays as compared with other times, etc. - he came up with $17,000 per week. And we're a church of only 750-ish people - not a mega church.

He then suggested: "I wonder what I could accomplish for God's Kingdom if I trimmed away the building, the staff, the stage lights, etc. and allocated $17,000 every week to people who would take the Gospel into the community - how much more effective I could be."

I, of course, noted that without the building you wouldn't get the same level of funding. You might get 1/10 of that through personal fund-raising. "Even with $1,700/wk, that's almost $90,000 in a year. I'm still sure I could do better." I agreed. He was right.

Imagine if every congregation adopted this mentality - and the level of tithing remained the same. Instead of tithes going to centralized leadership cores it was spread out through a network of decentralized hubs, each leading their own ministries where they have been called - people from one end of the church funding those in another, distributing the wealth from every tithe to wherever there was a need ... it almost sounds like the early church.

If a woman is designed to be a helpmate, then is she destined to be married?

2 upvotes · 4 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good stuff, brother.

Something to mull over: you used the phrase "relationship with God" (or some people say "relationship with Jesus") a couple times. Are you aware of any times in the Bible where it talks about having a personal relationship with Jesus?

I'm not saying it's bad - and there are certainly phrases that imply this as A way we can interact with Jesus. But the relationship we have with Jesus is never the emphasis of Scripture. That's a concept that was popularized as a soteriological emphasis for the church several decades ago when humanity switched from a duty-model of society into a relational model.

In the early 1900s, for example, it was understood that every man and woman owed a duty to his country. This mentality had been true of most societies throughout time. As our country became more "progressive," we abandoned a corporate social duty and focused more on our feelings and relationships. Instead of owing anything "to crown and country," as some say, we started caring only for those in our immediate social sphere - those with whom we had actual relationships.

Psychologists shifted from a model of practice that focused on the corporate good and integration with society into a model of counseling and understanding human nature that relies primarily on individual relationships - friends, family members, teachers, employers, etc. and making sure that these personalized relationships are healthy.

Even worse, the shift wasn't just about learning how to interact in healthy ways within that relational network: it was more about feeling good and whole despite the pressures created by that relational network. Rather than helping patients learn how to be high-functioning employees, effective parents, and capable spouses, the counselors taught them how to cope with a boss who isn't happy with their performance, children who are disobedient, or the stress of a nagging wife.

As society shifted away from corporate integration model for communities and toward a relational model, the church followed. Instead of recognizing that we have a vital role to play in God's Kingdom and that our duty to our King is our first priority, we were trained to believe that relating with Jesus was our highest priority. "Yes, Jesus has things he wants you to do, but you must have a loving relationship with him first." In reality, Jesus says, "The one who has my commands and obeys them is the one who loves me" (John 14:21). In Jesus's view, where is the emphasis? He is saying that one cannot claim to have a relationship with him if they're not living out his purposes. That is the emphasis. That is what defines the relationship.

Yet this is not what the church teaches. We are taught that having a relationship with Jesus is about:

- How he makes you feel
- Not doing anything that would hurt the relationship (i.e. sin)

- How much time you spend with him in prayer
- How many Bible passages you read
- How passionate you are during worship
- How many conversations you have about him with your small group
- How many sermons you listen to, and how deeply you listen

So, when Jesus says, "Go, therefore, and make disciples of all nations," and we sit around praying, singing kumbaya, and reading our chapter a day - what are we to make of this?

That's not to say that any of these things are bad. Certainly having a relationship with Jesus is both possible and good! I encourage all people in this. But when we mistakenly assume that the relationship is the primary goal of our faith, we make a grievous error and become derailed from the things that Jesus actually intends of us. It's a clever ploy of the enemy, getting us to focus so much on how we feel about Jesus and not displeasing him lest we ruin the "relationship" (i.e. sinning) that we forget the things that Jesus and the apostles modeled as the true primary focus of a believer's life: growing God's Kingdom by making disciples of all nations.

Imagine a husband telling his wife the family mission and she says, "That's great honey, but I really just want a relationship with you. Let's focus on the relationship. I love you so much. Don't you love me? Let's spend lots of time together. Let's cuddle in the living room to netflix and ice cream every day. Let's go on vacations and enjoy each other's company wherever we may be. What a lovely relationship! Sure, your mission matters, but our relationship comes first ... and if there's time and we feel like it, we'll address the mission part together. But you're going to have to be the one to lead in that because my primary focus is on enjoying our relationship."

For most men, this is life. This is reality. That's how women think - and as the bride of Christ, that's the mentality the church ends up in too. We're so relational-focused and stuck in the female frame of mind that we have forgotten what it means to be men for Christ. We are no longer Christ's soldiers (2 Timothy 2:3); we're his self-entitled, bratty, nagging wife who just wants to feel good about the relationship all the time.

Okay, I'm done rambling ...

If a woman is designed to be a helpmate, then is she destined to be married?

2 upvotes · 4 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I think we're agreed. The only place we may differ is the consummation. For those of us living the mission of Christ, the marriage is already consummated. We're don't have to wait until heaven. We're just in a long distance marriage right now, waiting while our groom prepares a place for us to move into.

Incidentally, look at all the idolatry the church is prone toward in our long distance relationship, the same way a wife is prone to other lovers when she's away on business without her husband. While the husband's spirit may be with her, the absence of his physical, manifest presence leaves room for her to look elsewhere, testing the merit of her faithfulness to her man while she does what he sent her to do. So is the condition of the church.

If a woman is designed to be a helpmate, then is she destined to be married?

2 upvotes · 4 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I think we're agreed. The only place we may differ is the consummation. For those of us living the mission of Christ, the marriage is already consummated. We're don't have to wait until heaven. We're just in a long distance marriage right now, waiting while our groom prepares a place for us to move into.

Incidentally, look at all the idolatry the church is prone toward in our long distance relationship, the same way a wife is prone to other lovers when she's away on business without her husband. While the husband's spirit may be with her, the absence of his physical, manifest presence leaves room for her to look elsewhere, testing the merit of her faithfulness to her man while she does what he sent her to do. So is the condition of the church.

Are we servants?

2 upvotes · 3 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm completely dumbfounded that a day has gone by and nobody has referenced Mark 10:45 yet - "For even the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve."

God is not a servant

Jesus was a servant. Jesus is God. God is a servant.

/u/Deep_Strength addressed the underlying issue, though. There's a difference between serving and being subservient.

I did and will continue to lay my life down for her and sacrifice

This is what concerns me a bit, though. Jesus didn't sacrifice for trite things. There were countless more people who could have used his healing, his teaching, his provision, etc. who he simply did not sacrifice for. Instead, he withdrew to spend time with his friends. Why? Because his mission mattered more. His ultimate sacrifice on the cross was not merely a sacrifice for our sake - it was the very heart of his mission for being on earth in the first place.

Don't get hung up on "I must sacrifice for my wife." We sacrifice for Christ, as a bride ought to do for her groom, as we are the bride of Christ. The husband sacrifices for his mission, which in turn benefits the bride, the same way Christ's sacrifice on the cross was for his mission, which benefited his bride.

No more talk about willy nilly "I must sacrifice for my wife" garbage.

It's also somewhat ridiculous to act like making her a cup of soup or picking up medicine at the store is somehow a sacrifice. And then we talk about Jesus' sacrifice on the cross, as if somehow we're talking about the same thing. That's not a sacrifice. That's just being a good steward.

In biblical times, women were their husband's property. Not politically correct today, but consider the interpretive framework here. If a man's donkey was sick, would he refuse to provide it medicine and feed it? "I'm not my donkey's servant!" No donkey-owner would consider that serving his donkey. He considers it taking care of his donkey.

Your wife isn't a donkey, but the concept applies: taking care of her isn't some high and mighty form of sacrificial service. It's just common sense. This kind of misunderstanding, as your friend seems to be having, is why the secular subs started calling people autistic. The idiocy makes me literally cringe right now, if that's how people are interpreting what they read here.

Tag: u/rocknrollchuck /u/OsmiumZulu - is our content really that mute on common sense matters that we have to have posts like this? Do we need to have a sidebar post on exercising common sense?

3 Year Girlfriend with Sexual Past

2 upvotes · 3 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This post screams of a blue pill ideology. You might be trying to sprinkle some alpha/red on your life, but if you're doing it to achieve your blue pill goals, there's a more serious problem in you than in her sexual past. Here's the most concerning phrase in the whole post:

My number 1 thing is I just want a happy marriage and never have a divorce.

First off, marriages can't be happy. You can be happy. She can be happy. You can't control her. You can control yourself. But "the marriage" doesn't have feelings. What you really mean to say is: "I want to be happy when I'm married." But let me ask this:

- Are you happy right now?

If you're not happy now, you won't be happy when you get married. Marriage doesn't make people happy. It is not your source of joy.

Second, you can't control whether or not you get divorced, unless you find out before it happens and you imprison or kill her before it happens (don't do that). If she wants a divorce, you can't stop her - and if you maintain these blue pill ideologies, she's going to fantasize about divorce someday, no matter how sweet and godly you think she is now. This is a fact. What you're vetting for isn't someone who isn't like this, but someone who has the ability to control that impulse when it comes. Her degree of self-control here seems to be incredibly lacking.

Let me emphasize: self-control is a spiritual discipline. We are taught to learn self-control after salvation. It is not something that automatically happens when someone is saved or repents. Her past WILL repeat itself unless she develops the art of self-control. The fact that she hasn't had sex with you is not proof that she has developed self control. You're committed to avoiding sex before marriage, so there's nothing for her to control - either you've got it under control or there's just no situation coming up where she'd need to exercise control in the first place. Get her in a relationship with another guy who's pressuring her to have sex, totally alpha, rippling abs, and who she believes she's in love with - will she have sex with him?

Third, why are you so committed to pursuing marriage in the first place? This is a HUGE red flag for me. I say that not just from a broad male perspective, but if I were a woman, that would be a huge red flag for me. You're rightly concerned about her sexual past, but she should really be concerned about your idolization of marriage.

What's your mission? You've given us nothing about that here.

What are your stats? You haven't mentioned them.

How are you doing on maintaining abundance? No indication of any at all here.

How is she demonstrating her attraction to you? I'm not seeing anything here.

This is a recipe for a trainwreck. You're going to end up married to a girl whose primary experience with sex is feeling guilty about it. You're her safe bet. Her beta bux. As long as you maintain this blue pill ideology that marriage is some wonderful thing that you can't wait for, you're going to keep being beta. Sprinkling alpha behaviors on it will not solve the underlying problem.

Should I marry this girl or am I doomed at having a[n un]happy marriage

DO NOT marry her. You are doomed at having an unhappy marriage. But this is not because of her sexual past. As /u/weakandsensitive said, most girls by age 24 will have had sex already. You need to be looking much younger.

The real reason your marriage will be unhappy is twofold:

1. You're holding on to blue pill ideologies that will never be met. As long as you have these fantasies in your head, your marriage will suck because no wife - no matter how unicorn-like - will ever be able to live up to the fantasy, even if you think your fantasy is "realistic," as many guys often tell me. "I know she won't be perfect. I know we'll have hard times and get into fights. I'm okay with that. I still want to be married and believe that this will make me happy." This is the male hamster's finest. It has never run on that wheel so fast as when it makes up things like this.

2. The fact that your happiness in the relationship is so heavily influenced by her sexual past shows that you're investing too many of your emotions into her. Women are not a good emotional investment. If I put money in the stock market, I'm handing it over to a company in the hope that they will earn more profit with my money than I would. If they screw up, I could really lose out big - years of hard work can be shot down the drain. I want to make sure I invest with finance experts, not financial trainwrecks. Women are emotional trainwrecks. They can't even control their own emotions. Why would you ever invest your emotional growth and stability in them? Express emotions toward them, absolutely. But do not let them have control over your emotional state. That is a bad investment.

Until you drop the fantasy world you're living in and learn to develop your own emotional stability - not self-control over your actions, as she needs, but self-control over your emotions - you are not in a state to be getting married to anyone.

If you can develop that level of emotional self-control, accept your woman for the fact that she's a woman, and come up with an actual reason why you want to get married in the first place - a good reason - then maybe ... just maybe, you'll have a shot at moving past this issue and a chance at being happy.

I can't end without addressing this either:

I feel like the Christlike thing to do is to forgive her /u/rocknrollchuck addressed this from a different perspective.

What do you have to forgive? This is something of an absurd statement. Were you married to her when she had sex with these other guys? If not, then she didn't sin against you. Heck, David was married when he had sex with Bathsheba - and she was too, and he murdered her husband (one of his best friends), and this all got their baby killed ... yet in Psalm 51 David says, "Against you Lord, you only have I sinned."

This is NOT a forgiveness issue. This is a standards issue.

- You have a standard of wanting your wife to be a virgin.
- She does not meet your standard.

It's that simple. Either you're going to lower your standard because you're so emotionally invested in the relationship that you can't get out; or you're going to change your standard because it's not realistic for most attractive women in their mid-20s; or you're going to maintain your standard and let her go. Do not let your hamster convince you this is anything other than a decision about whether or not to lower your standards.

Women always try to frame these issues as forgiveness issues. Why? Because it's so easy to persuade men that the noble thing to do is to forgive. If they can characterize it as forgiveness, they can pressure you to agree to forgive, then they can trick you into overlooking their faults. It's devious, but it has been going on for a very, very long time. In reality, if she didn't commit any sin against you, it's not your issue to forgive.

I had one guy argue: "You're right, she didn't do anything against me when she was with those guys. But she did lie to me about it by not telling me about it for a long time, pretending she was a virgin. That's the issue that I must forgive." That's fine. But the focus of the conversation has changed at that point. Now she's a woman with a sexual past AND a liar. You can forgive the lie. You can choose if you want to marry a liar or not. But that still doesn't address the sexual past aspect. Forgiving her for lying to you doesn't eradicate her sexual past or mean you must change your standards.

3 Year Girlfriend with Sexual Past

2 upvotes · 3 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

you may risk not finding another Christian woman to marry

That only exists if OP lacks abundance. This is a hard-core scarcity mentality. If OP actually has this risk, he's not in a good place to be getting married in the first place.

3 Year Girlfriend with Sexual Past

2 upvotes · 3 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

How many other "amazing women" do you have in your life? u/redwall92 is hitting the nail on the head in this post.

If a woman is designed to be a helpmate, then is she destined to be married?

2 upvotes · 1 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

No twisted hermeneutics. I don't forbid marriage, and I assume that 99.9% of men will get married - and I've created a sub here that aims help men enjoy and be grateful within their marriages, just as I am also married. I'm not sure of any place I've run afoul of this passage. On the contrary, this passage reaffirms me in everything I'm doing.

You must recognize, though, that the same author wrote 1 Cor. 7. We must take Paul's writing together and not in isolation or presume more than I mean.

If a woman is designed to be a helpmate, then is she destined to be married?

2 upvotes · 1 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

/u/Deep_Strength gave the best answer here so far, but maybe I can add some clarity.

In a pre-Gospel world (i.e. before Jesus died, before we received the Holy Spirit) women were made for physical marriage to men on earth. In this sense, yes, every woman was designed to be married to a man, with limited exception (and I'm not even sure I could name any - only that I leave room for the possibility).

But this was never the end-game. Physical marriage in the old testament was always meant to be a parallel to the church's spiritual marriage to Christ. The physical marriage was never the actual goal; it was just a tangible example to help us understand the spiritual reality when the time would come for it to be made known. That time was when the Holy Spirit came and began teaching us the true spiritual meanings of everything in the old testament and everything Jesus did during his time on earth.

God's intention that all women be driven toward physical marriage was meant to foreshadow the way that the church was intended to be driven toward Christ - and that all people who would be Christ's bride (even the non-Christians who are not yet part of the church) should feel an innate longing to become a spiritual bride to someone, ideally Christ. This longing for marriage in women is meant to emphasize the way we should long to become one with Christ.

Note that for men this is different. Christ does not need us. He has no compulsion toward us. That is why man was not made for woman - men were not destined to seek marriage the same way women are. This is true because Christ doesn't need the church. He innately wants the church and desires to work through the church whenever possible, but he doesn't need us, just as men are not destined to have an innate need for marriage - only a general desire.

In light of all of that, in a post-Gospel world where the spiritual truth reigns, we no longer have need for physical marriage in this way - whether man or woman. Physical marriage was the road map, spiritual union with Christ is the destination. You don't need the road map once you arrive at the destination. You can see the destination on the map, but you don't fully get it until you're there - it's only a picture. You can't go inside. You can't walk around on it. It's just a copy, at best, as Hebrews 8-9 says. But once you get there, you do as everyone does: put the map away and enjoy the fact that you've arrived, doing what you meant to do once you got there.

In short, there is no biblical compulsion for women to get married today. As deep noted, 1 Cor. 7 makes that clear. The language encouraging men to avoid marriage is replicated almost word-for-word for women too. This wasn't Paul's effort to be gender neutral, as there was no compulsion toward gender neutrality in that society and he neglects gender neutrality in a lot of other places in Scripture where it would have been appropriate. No, he was calling out women specifically because he recognized the different theological points of origin that men and women live in and wanted to make it clear that this truth - that it's better to remain single - was to be for both theological positions: men's and women's.

All of that said, we are still biologically a product of the original design God gave men and women, which included the way God genetically coded us toward physical marriage. We can't just turn that off voluntarily. So, women will still feel compelled toward marriage, on the whole, even if there is no biblical imperative for them to seek physical marriage anymore.

Open Letter to a Christian Incel

2 upvotes · 28 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This is an encouragement to read. Your background mirrors mine in so many ways, though my wife is only 1 1/2 months older than me ;)

I'd love to chat some more about why she's still contemplating leaving - whether you want to do that here or privately, or not at all, is up to you.

Open Letter to a Christian Incel

2 upvotes · 28 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Showing off isn't over-compensation. It's attractive.

I completely agree with your assessment. But some guys legit can't grow facial hair (I'm one of them). The biggest improvement guy 1 could make is dressing better. Even for the gym, form fitting clothes over a sleeve-rolled t-shirt would do him well.

But as I wrote in another comment on this thread, neither of them has to be rejected on sight if they have the proper frame.

Rejection on sight is usually a guy stabbing himself in the foot based on what he thinks others must be thinking of them. His failure to continue (or even start!) the conversation only creates or affirms those beliefs he feared they had about him, whereas maintaining frame and learning social tact and conversational skills will actively change first impressions.

Open Letter to a Christian Incel

2 upvotes · 28 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

In addition to what /u/OsmiumZulu said, rejection on sight is usually the product of a failed fitness test. "Sorry, you're too ugly for me" is probably your worst nightmare to hear. Most guys will shirk away when they hear that. This is a weak frame.

The attractive guy says, "Too ugly for you? I'm too ugly for Hellen Keller. But I'm guessing you like getting a little ugly every now and then."

If you're really not all that ugly, she'll laugh and be intrigued. If she still isn't interested and is bratty, she may follow-up, "No, seriously. Go away. I'm not interested." To which you respond, "You misspelled interesting ... which is weird because you were talking instead of typing. Either way, I'm interesting enough for both of us."

See how the game works? THERE IS NO SUCH THING AS REJECTION ON SIGHT. It doesn't exist. There are only guys who can't maintain a conversation in the face of rejection, which is a reflection of his need for improved frame and conversational skill.

FR & Two questions- admitting where you need to grow to your wife, and "STFU" vs "Butthurt".

2 upvotes · 28 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Dang, this sounds a lot like old me. I remember leading small groups and waiting until an hour beforehand to start preparing, my wife cleaning the house before I even got home from work, and then she'd get upset because she had to take care of the kids while I taught and led the discussion. Ouch.

In this scenario, she wasn't helping with my mission. She was managing distractions, which would have otherwise been an unkempt house, noisy kids, etc. I wanted her involved in the mission itself, not just to be an enabler so I could have my own mission independent of her. The mission was something we were to be united over, not something a trampled over her with, as she would often get so upset: "And I know I have no right to be mad because you're doing great things for God and I'm worry about who takes the kids to the potty." But I didn't want her to be a potty-taker. I wanted her to be helping me do those great things for God. That mission is what was meant to unify us.

Now, down to business.

First, you're compromising too much. You're showing her that if she whines enough, you'll give in and give her your way. If you want to procrastinate, procrastinate. It's unattractive. I'm telling you not to procrastinate. But I'm also saying that if your reason for not procrastinating is to appease your wife, that's a problem.

Second, don't worry about what she thinks of all of this. That's a sure way to get confused in your own motives. Either you want to include her or you don't. Either you want to manage your house or you want to let her run the home. Either you want to be well prepared or you prefer rushing it at the last minute. Those are all judgment calls you must make. A lot of guys will say, "But if I compromise now, she'll see it as weakness," like I alluded to above. Oh well. Don't worry about how she sees it. Just do what you want to do.

A guy once commented about how his wife kept calling him up to have sex and he'd always come running. "Isn't that her training me? Shouldn't I say no sometimes so she doesn't feel like she's completely in control of our sex life?" The answer should be obvious. If you want to have sex, have sex. It doesn't matter what she thinks about it. If she believes she's winning some power struggle over you because you compromised, let her believe that. The important thing isn't how she perceives you, but the fact that you're operating from your own frame. Her perception will come in time.

Simply put: if her complaint has validity and you want to grow in an area of weakness that she exposed to you, then grow in that area. Just make sure you do it because you want to, not because she told you. That's a huge difference. u/EastThenWest had some great points on this (good stuff, brother!).

Third, you handled the second situation well. At first I was getting hints that you were butthurt without realizing it, but with how things played out I'm willing to give you the benefit of the doubt on that. This is key, though: "I wanted to be quick to forgive so I grabbed her hand and said I forgive her and I love her." You addressed her feels rather than her thoughts. Right move.

I would appreciate your thoughts on how to balance acknowledging where you need to grow

Don't tell her about it. Just do it. Telling her is like a kid saying, "Mommy! Look, I got an A on my test!" when she's your teacher and the one grading your test. Don't be that kid. She's not your mom.

If she's right, she's right. You don't need to defy her and be less godly just to prove that your wife doesn't control you.

and also practicing some dread and STFU without just acting butthurt or emotional yourself.

I didn't see any dread here, but maybe I'm just missing it. You left for 10 minutes and came right back. Pretty low chances that you were of sleeping with another girl or flirting at a bar in those 10 minutes. A 10 minute activity is also not code for "I have more important things to do with my time," especially when followed by, "Then when I get back I'm going to do exactly what you want me to do."

Remember that butthurt isn't just about displaying negative emotions. It's also found in a failure to display emotion at all - robot mode. Avoiding butthurt only exists by exuding a positive frame. You made a good effort to do this and it was well received. Offering to buy her something she didn't ask for might not be the best way to express dominance, but in Christ there is room for voluntary service - not when people demand your service, but when you do it of your own initiative.

Good post. I love reading these stories and what works/what doesn't.

Launching a business with a rebellious wife

2 upvotes · 23 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent reply.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/20/19)

2 upvotes · 21 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good point. That makes more sense. Just don't get stuck in the past or mistakenly assume that those were the "good old days." The "good old days" mentality ruins many people from the good days yet to come.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/20/19)

2 upvotes · 21 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

However isn't it ALSO is a reflection of how my own frame is being perceived by her?

No. My sister is a great example. She once told me, "Sometimes I like to ask my husband questions, even though I know he's going to say no. I don't know why I do it. I guess I just like hearing him say no to me." She doesn't have a negative view of his frame. She tests anyway.

Clearly I should reset and consider what make her think

Nah, as soon as you're in the business of trying to evaluate how she thinks, you're in her frame and heading down the wrong road. Figure out broader aspects of female behavior and psychology, sure. But if you try to hone in on what one particular woman thinks and why, you're going to get lost in limbo.

He posits that marriage will make all of your own flaws also known to someone else that will quickly, not always kindly, make them known to you.

Works real well for the 95%+ of beta guys, right? This statement is just plain false. While it CAN have that impact, most guys go through marriage still clueless of most of their flaws.

To be clearer, this dynamic doesn't point out a man's flaws to him; it points out to him what his wife doesn't like.

There's a huge gap there. Sometimes her distastes are due to actual sins and flaws that he needs to address, but this is not as often the case as her just nit picking him to conform him to her expectations.

when your flaws are made known

Yes, but don't assume your wife always knows what your flaws are or that she's always right when she says something is a flaw. My wife has been wrong about me many, many, many times - and it caused serious psychological harm to me until I started having independent sources in the church telling me, "No, she's wrong about you. I don't see those traits at all. You're not coming off that way to everyone - that's her own hurts, habits, and hangups that are causing her to project those problems onto you."

Not to say she's never helped me discover my flaws. She has. I'm just saying that wives are not the most reliable source of this information and that, in my experience, they're wrong more often than they're right because their expressions of your alleged "flaws" are self-serving as to their own expectations and not grounded in a desire to see you become more godly. While every Christian woman might say that "helping you become a more godly man" is her goal, her idea of a "more godly man" is often very different from God's idea - and usually she comes up with that motive after-the-fact and not before the criticisms start rolling.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/20/19)

2 upvotes · 21 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting stuff, but I'm not liking this book so far.

Relive your "magic moments" because the feelings are still there, just dormant.

This is counter-productive, as I reference in 108 (I think. Whichever one is the life cycle of a relationship). You trek forward, not revert backwards. Indiana Jones didn't say to his girl, "Remember that one time we were in India? That was so fun. Let's ignore the Holy Grail and go back to India." India wasn't fun because of India. It was fun because of the quest they were on at the time. There always has to be a future purpose.

Your mate makes you angry by design to teach you to be more christ like. (purpose for fitness tests)

Now, let's not justify bad behavior. Sin is still sin. Disrespect is still disrespect. The fact that God may use someone's sin to teach you a lesson doesn't excuse their behavior and make it God's design that your wife ticks you off sometimes.

Natural dread implemented consistently over time will cause your wife to get out of her comfort zone all on her own.

Yes.

My wife was commenting on her BMI recently, so I suggested she use a body fat calculator. I pulled one up and she was pleased that she was on the low end of normal, moving toward the "fit" category. Plugging my stats in lists me in the "fit" category. This was a bit shocking to her, as she saw herself as in better shape than me because she's thinner than me. She didn't realize the sheer quantity of muscle mass I maintain is where most of my weight comes from, hence giving me better body fat numbers than she assumed. This was a subtle trigger for hypergamy - seeing that her man is in better shape than her and recognizing that even on a purely physical level I stand above most other men, triggering a small degree of dread too ... and most significantly, on a conversation that I didn't start, so it's not like I'm bragging about it.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/20/19)

2 upvotes · 21 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

no communion or anything (which I'm used to either weekly or bi-weekly)

Most communion in churches today is a total joke. It's not even biblical communion at all, completely defeating the purposes Jesus intended for communion by trying to mass-produce it. I fully subscribe to u/ruizbujc's view: https://www.reddit.com/r/TrueChristian/comments/82q27t/what_do_you_believe_about_the_eucharist_communion/dvc4uhd/

First, I was frustrated and upset that my wife wasn't jumping to come with me

This is somewhat "next level" kind of stuff, but I wouldn't necessarily be worried about whether or not she attends a congregation. After much study and research, I've come to the conclusion that "going to church" is a misnomer in America. The congregations that we see gathering are not, in a biblical sense, "the church" or even part of the biblical church, though there is some overlap. Ironically, the associate pastor at my congregation agrees with me and is trying to persuade the head pastor of the same. Brian Sanders references this a lot in his book Underground Church.

He comes to the same conclusion I do, which is that there are three core biblical components of the church: (1) more than one person, (2) a goal of glorifying God (he says "worship," but glorify seems more biblical to me), and (3) a common mission of disciple-making (he only says "common mission," but the disciple-making is inherent in his model anyway).

The most significant point of clarification on these is the question of what it means to make disciples? Looking at Scripture, I use this definition for discipleship: Purposeful, intentional relationships designed to lead others to live like Christ lived. Inherent in "living like Christ lived" is the fact that Christ made disciples - so we must also teach our disciples how to make more disciples.

With the above in mind, and my pastor agrees, our local congregation:

- Is more than one person. Check.
- Attempts to glorify God. Check.
- But they are not making disciples. Buzzz.

Not a church. Then my pastor looks at me and says, "What about our meetings?"

- We are more than one person. Check.
- We have a goal of glorifying God. Check.
- We have a common disciple-making mission at the core of why we're meeting together. Check.

He concluded, and I agree: "We are the church. What happens on Sunday mornings or in small groups or at our retreats, service projects, etc. - those are all good things, but they're not the church." This affirmed my long-standing view that "congregations" (note: I try not to call them churches anymore) are, at best, very useful tools for finding people to relate with who can be incorporated as part of your "church."

To that end, the "church" is every believer everywhere (i.e. more than one) who intends to glorify God and make disciples. This view is far more consistent with passages like the parable of the fig tree, where those who aren't bearing fruit (i.e. making disciples) are cut down and thrown into the fire. If you're not a disciple-maker, you're not part of God's Kingdom - not part of "the church." That's not to say that discipleship is what saves us; rather, as most modern theologians would say with "good works" in general, disciple-making is the natural byproduct of salvation, which is evidenced by the fact that:

- When the Holy Spirit indwells us, we become Christ's witnesses to the world (Acts 1:8)
- When God's Word is planted in us, we yield a harvest 30, 60, or 100 times what was sown (parable of the sower) - and if we don't, we must not be the good soil
- When Jesus talks about indwelling us (John 17), it's in the context of commissioning his disciples to go out into the world to make more disciples as he did, "As you sent me into the world, Father, now I am sending them."

To that end, if you want your wife to be part of "the church," don't get hung up on a local congregation. Get her excited about your mission to make disciples. Start making disciples first. When guys are calling you constantly asking you to lead them, as often happens for me nowadays, she will see the fruit you bear for Christ's Kingdom and want to engage likewise.

As my wife once told me during an argument when I asked her why she's married to me: "Someday we're going to be standing before God on judgment day and he's going to look at you and be impressed [her words, not my theological conclusion] - he's going to say, 'Well done, good and faithful servant.' I want to be the one standing right next to you saying, 'I helped him do it!'" Get your wife there, not to some gathering to sing a few songs and talk about a sermon you probably won't remember 2 weeks later.

Solving a Foundational Problem on This Sub: Enabling Closet Bloops

2 upvotes · 15 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The only person who mentioned "walking with the Spirit" in that post was /u/Deep_Strength in one of the comments, and he also said: "However, as Christians we don't care about blue pill or red pill labels. We care about the evangelizing and making disciples. Intersexual behavior including marriage and only sex inside marriage can be a part of this mission, but it doesn't define it"

No matter how you want to slice it, the mission God gave us is to make disciples. "Walking with the Spirit" is not a goal in itself. If someone "walks with the Spirit" and never makes a disciples, either he's lying (because the Spirit will always prompt him to make disciples) or he has wasted his life. Check the parable of the fig tree in Luke for more info on that.

Jesus did not say, "Come follow me, and I will make you even better at following me and we can be really close." He said, "Come follow me and I will make you fishers of men." He had an agenda. Following him was never meant to be just about following - it had a clear purpose that it was leading up to. If we forget or ignore that purpose by refusing to acknowledge the intended outcome of following Jesus (becoming fishers of men), then there's no point to following him in the first place. Further, I'd contend that anyone who does not adopt that intended result is not actually following Jesus anyway.

1 John 2:6 is clear on this point - "Whoever claims to live in him must live as Jesus did." Jesus' life was oriented around making disciples. Can we say we are living as Jesus did if we only adopt a few attributes of the character of Jesus or the teachings of Jesus, but never the mission of Jesus? I wrote a lot more about this in this post.

Also, as noted before, the "mission" component is plainly explained in the sidebar. Read posts 103, 108, 110, 113, 208, 209, 210, and the entire 300 series. Nobody can read the sidebar and still be confused about what I mean by point 2 here.

Am I too little too late?

2 upvotes · 15 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

How do I find decent Christian women as a pastor in an 'older church'?

"I'm a bi-vocational pastor" - you should have a social circle outside your church. Even if you don't, you have the perfect foundation for meeting people. Everyone already expects pastors to introduce themselves to new people. It's kind of a pastor "thing."

What I'm really hearing is that you're focusing your social circles primarily on your own church. This is unhealthy for a church leader. That is, you should be training your people to engage with the outside world for Christ, but if you're not engaging with the outside world, modeling it for them, then how can you ever expect them to follow in doing so?

If you are engaging with the outside world, developing your social circle beyond your church, then what's the problem? Meet girls the same way anyone else will. There's been a lot of conversation on here about how churches aren't necessarily the most likely place to find the ideal marriage candidate anyway - not to say that it's a bad place, but there are other options - and perhaps even better ones. OZ and (I think) RPW have written posts on these in the sidebar.

How do I get over my asexual conditioning when it comes to dealing with women IRL?

Why do you want to be married in the first place?

What's your mission?

How many people have you disciplined who are now discipling others?

Right now, I don't see a compelling reason why you would want to be looking for a wife in the first place. It sounds like you're a busy guy with more important things going on. That, in itself, is going to attract women - as you're noticing - and keep them interested. Just don't stop it. And when you notice you're about to have sex with one of them, stop yourself and think, "Goodness, how'd we get here? We should totally get married."

The thing is, you're trying to mix red pill praxeology with blue pill ideology. You have this dream of getting married someday. Something inside you is compelling you to date and be successful with girls and make one your wife. And you're thinking, "How can I use the knowledge the red pill has to offer to make these goals a reality?" You're still very much in the blue pill in the first place.

Want to know how to be successful with girls after the initial attraction? DNGAF. Don't give a crap about trying to date or marry them. Abandon your blue pill hopes and dreams of getting married to a wonderful wife. There needs to be a post on this. <Scratches Chin>

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/13/19)

2 upvotes · 14 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, I do from time to time. It's in some of my older OYS posts. I'll go back to it next time ;)

NSFW: How did you and your man calibrate your sexuality?

2 upvotes · 14 March 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

Humor me: install a porn blocker on his computer. Many women think, "My husband doesn't do that" - especially in the church crowd, like I am. They do. That form of placation can be at the root of a lot of sexual disinterest issues.

As soon as that blocker goes up, either he's going to admit to porn use by confronting you about it (most likely pretending he was trying to look at something safe and it mysteriously triggered) or he's going to hide it and suddenly be interested in having sex with you again - or he'll skip to using his phone.

If he's one of the few who has moved past a porn problem (and yes, guys can - I'm one of them), then it really won't matter anyway.

To be clear, I'm not suggesting this as the most respectful way of handling the situation or the best for relationship-building. But the results would certainly be very interesting to me.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/13/19)

2 upvotes · 14 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I am never comfortable putting anything above a 7 to be honest unless I really feel like I did something exceptional

Now, that's not very fair to the rating system ;) I can see being cautious with a perfect 10, just like we all say the true HB10 doesn't actually exist. But most people think they can't be a 10 at evangelism because they're comparing themselves to Billy Graham. This type of relativity has no place in the Kingdom of God. We are not meant to compare ourselves to others as a rubric for our own progress and maturity. That's the whole message of the cornerstone - that it is a stone like any other, and most likely even smaller and less interesting than the more ornate stones that adorn the entryway to the temple. And yet it is integral to the structural integrity of the entire building.

In short, within your own God-given context, you should certainly be able to qualify yourself as a 10 to the degree that you believe you are measuring up to God's intentions for you at any given time. Don't be too hard on yourself here. It's not about doing something exceptional. It's about doing what's expected. That's all. We cannot exceed God's expectations for us - because to do more than he asked is to extend ourselves beyond the bounds of his will, drudging from our own hubris the belief that somehow we know better how to serve God than he can tell us - a mistake I was once guilty of, and for many years.

To that end, if I were consistently memorizing 2 verses every week, I would give myself a 9 or 10 in Scripture memory. If I feel God is calling me to memorize an entire chapter in a week and I only memorize 15 of the 32 verses in that one week, I might give myself a 3 - not because I failed in the area of Scripture memory (most people would be ecstatic to have memorized 15 verses in a single week!), but because I would have substantially failed in my calling. In the reverse, if God told me, like he told Moses in Exodus, "Stop praying and go lead my people," and I spent 15 hours in deep prayer that week, I must rate myself low in prayer. 15 hours in prayer is exceptional. Most people would think to rate themselves an 11 for that type of devotion to prayer in their week. But if it is not uniquely attuned to what God would have me do that week, then I have failed by using prayer as a cop-out against my actual purpose at that time.

Just a few things to think about :) I don't know what God's calling you to at any given moment, and I hope you're better at following his lead than I often am. But don't be hard on yourself because of grand ideas of what you think it means to be a 10. Judge yourself in the context of your role at any given time and go from there.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/13/19)

2 upvotes · 13 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Conflicting goals are constantly a struggle for me (aesthetics vs hypertrophy vs strength)

I'm right there with you. I will note that a study from a couple years ago found that strong-looking guys were always preferenced by women in a side-by-side comparison. One of their conclusions was that it's better to be strong and overweight than weak with a low body fat. What trips me up is that "strong" in my mind is very different from "looking strong" or even from what a woman perceives as strong.

I have a fast metabolism.

So lucky. Mine is naturally very, very slow.

STFD

Good goal. While I'm not an advocate for mindfulness in the mainstream sense, since high school I developed a technique that has helped me a lot with maintaining a STFD capacity in the midst of fast-paced activity. Ever watch The Flash on the CW? There are moments where he's running so fast that it seems like time stops for everyone else, even though the world is actually still going on at normal paces. He can literally sit in a chair and have a conversation with himself or read a book in the span of a split second.

When I would play racquetball I'd boggle my eyes around the room really fast as the ball came toward me, rather than looking directly at the ball. My muscle-memory already knows the angles and where to hit, I just need time to process in order to get my body to make the shot. I can't actually increase time, so what I can do is adjust my processing speed. By boggling my eyes around like that, I was over-stimulating my brain with random fast-paced images, forcing it to work overtime to pick up every new angle of the court that I was bouncing between. That heightened stimulation gave me the sensation that time was slowing down. The ball literally felt like it was moving at 2/3 the speed it was actually moving due to the heightened processing speed, making it much easier to focus on the exact way I wanted to hit the ball.

After doing this for a while with rote eye movement, I began to be able to will my brain into hyperactive mode without needing to boggle my eyes around the room, mostly by taking a conscious effort to recognize the various stimuli in the room - the ticking of the clock on the wall, hum of the furnace blowing, birds chirping out the window - things that I'd normally ignore. The additional stimuli would heighten my brain's processing speed, slowing the world down proportionately, and giving me a moment to breathe, think, process, and respond without feeling like I'm reacting off-the-cuff - and yet for everyone else's purposes the same amount of time just went by.

RC pointed out that my E score has been low for a while. I can say confidently, it hasn't been above a 1 or 2 - until this week. I'm pushing myself to speak my faith in my daily life.

Glad to hear you're making strides on this. Interestingly, most people assume that improving evangelism means being more vocal about their faith. While this is certainly one strategy, if you look at the sidebar post on the subject, you'll recognize that it only really affects the proclamational half - and that half is only substantially effective if your newfound vocality is in the context of a preestablished relationship. In fact, it's not even half - proclamation is really the last 20%, as that phase moves much, much faster than the relational phase. Most of my evangelistic efforts today are not about sharing the Gospel; they're about building relationships with new non-believers - like the guy I met at the gym who I invited to watch Captain Marvel with me on Sunday. I haven't shared the Gospel with him yet, but he knows I'm a Christian and we mostly just lift and talk about girls and superhero movies. That's the foundation of evangelism.

- Phase 1: I introduced myself.
- Phase 2: I followed up with him repeatedly at the gym
- Phase 3: I earned a favorable disposition with him
- Phase 4: I'm currently in the phase of making him aware of my spiritual beliefs. His present awareness is relatively limited, but will expand on Sunday when we connect outside the gym for the first time.

how to teach versus press play or lecture. Teaching is my goal ... I'm pumped for this

Glad to hear it. Excited for you, bro.

Breaking the Nice-Guy: Take Ownership, Ask For Help

2 upvotes · 13 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, this is hysterical. My original draft of this post actually had an additional paragraph after the "guys, guys, guys ... whose house is it?" line that said something like:

If your gut reaction is to check deed, you're missing the point. Governmental allocation is not the same as biblical headship and responsibility. Try again.

I took it out because, as with a few other paragraphs that didn't make the cut, I assumed it was too peripheral a point that it might distract from the overall message, so it felt like just extra fluff words that I didn't think anyone would actually get tripped up on anyway.

I do have my house titled in both names, but that's for estate planning purposes. I am an attorney, after all. The legal title doesn't affect biblical headship any more than a certificate of marriage filed with the state or a divorce decree thereto affects the status of my spiritual marriage before God.

Breaking the Nice-Guy: Take Ownership, Ask For Help

2 upvotes · 13 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right on. Get divorced? It's all on you. Stay together? Still all on you. Might as well buck up and take the responsibility now and spare the divorce headache/heartache.

Breaking the Nice-Guy: Take Ownership, Ask For Help

2 upvotes · 13 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Pretty much.

Breaking the Nice-Guy: Take Ownership, Ask For Help

2 upvotes · 13 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Ah, I missed the sleeping with them part.

Submissive behaviour

2 upvotes · 12 March 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

Having a statistics background, I'll note that thre math is a bit wonky, but it's certainly interesting to think about. The theory is most likely inspired by what I call the collective dissociative responsibility paradox, based on a true story that occurred in NYC.

Imagine a guy getting beat up in an alley. Several people see it going on out their windows. They observe each other seeing the crime as well. They are all aware that any rational person would call the cops. They also are aware of the fact that there's no point calling the cops a second time after the first person phones in. Result? Everyone assumes someone else already called the cops, so nobody actually calls the cops. Because of the collective assumptions, they each disassociate themselves from personal responsibility.

Imagine a hot girl walking down the street. Several guys have observed her hotness over time. They are aware that other guys observe her too. They are also aware that any rational guy would approach her and want her as a girlfriend/wife. They're also under the belief that there's no point asking her out if she's already in a relationship. Result? Many men assume she's already in a relationship, so most men never ask her out.

Now, there are clearly some bad assumptions in here that most alpha men will ignore - like the fact that you shouldn't ask out a girl who has a boyfriend. Most alpha guys don't care, they'll do it anyway. But it does explain a lot of crummy beta male behavior.

Breaking the Nice-Guy: Take Ownership, Ask For Help

2 upvotes · 12 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Ain't that the truth. I got you in chat and will reply there.

Breaking the Nice-Guy: Take Ownership, Ask For Help

2 upvotes · 12 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Why's that? They harp on chore play a lot?

Submissive behaviour

2 upvotes · 12 March 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

Yes! I didn't know it by that name, but I've heard it discussed before. What are your thoughts?

Submissive behaviour

2 upvotes · 12 March 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

Of course. But that's counsel for the man. She can't change whatever man she ends up with. So, all we can do is focus on her. Or if you're suggesting this as a vetting strategy - that she should only look for men who will give appropriate weight to her opinions, then you're telling a beggar how to be a chooser ;) Once she has options, vetting can start to occur. Gotta get the options first.

Submissive behaviour

2 upvotes · 12 March 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

I don't know about that. Even shy guys have no problem doing things out of place when all the fear and intimidation is stripped away. I was one of them once.

It's like the risk/skill paradigm. There's certainly a difference between a guy who is unskilled and a guy who is afraid to avoid risks, but the two are always weighed in balance. If there is a massive risk to, say, shooting a basketball from center court, a guy with no skill will always shy away from that shot - and even guys with high skill might, but the most elite would be fine at least trying and not think twice about it. However, if the risk is very low because they're shooting from right next to the basket with no one guarding them, even the most unskilled basketball player will take that shot.

Likewise, even the most shy guy would approach girls if there was no intimidation at all. The increase in intimidation just raises the bar on where the guy must be on his shy/confident scale before he's willing to make the approach. But if we take away the intimidation myth - the false belief that guys should pedestalize women and be emotionally invested in the way she reacts to him - then even the most shy guys would have no problem approaching. And, in fact, those guys do tend to have no problem approaching "safe" women who they believe have few other options.

Plan A or B, MAP, or something different?

2 upvotes · 11 March 2019 · /r/askMRP

Good stuff. I'd caution /u/dwebsterlight to take the sex-talk a little easy for right now. Too hard too fast can result in triggering Rambo-mode.

My instinct after reading the OP is that instead of leading, he left. In her mind, there are his activities and her activities and they just don't overlap. This is usually caused when a guy makes a lot of changes but forgets to invite his wife along for the ride. He starts going to the gym, but doesn't bring her with him. He starts collecting stamps, but doesn't ask her to keep an eye out for him. He begins writing a book, but doesn't ask her to be his test reader. He starts something else, but doesn't let her be a part of that something.

When this happens, even an attractive man is going to have trouble keeping his wife on board, and re-initiating is going to be difficult. Studies show that people take a much stronger interest in something if they are part of it from its inception, whereas people joining part-way never truly feel connected to what they've joined. They're supporters of someone else's dream rather than an integral part.

As I often say, a man has to know what his mission first, then he has to assess if that mission is something any woman would ever want to join in on. If it's not, then you've got a crappy mission that will not enhance your sexuality. If it is, but your particular wife isn't one of those women, then you married the wrong woman. Take your lumps for poor vetting. If it is and she, specifically, would be excited about that mission, it's simply a matter of bringing her along for the ride - and doing so in a tactful (my way of saying non-autistic) way.

But if a guy gets too far along in his mission, that's like a marathon runner being 15 miles in and telling his wife to get started. She'll never feel like she can catch up, so she just won't start. At the very best, she'll cheer you on from the sidelines - which is what I found in my own marriage for a long time.

If you want her along, run back and get her. Otherwise, just keep running and recognize that even a world-class athlete couldn't catch-up to someone who had a 15 mile head start, then be satisfied leaving her in the dust or as a sidelined cheerleader who is never actually journeying life alongside you.

If she's not running alongside you, or at least cheering you on, then most game tactics will not work. OP is a case-in-point that missional misalignment can ruin marriages even when the guy is genuinely attractive (giving him the benefit of the doubt). This being the case, I wouldn't dive head-first into sexy talk. A foundation has to be laid first.

Milder levels of kino and "Mmm, you're getting me hard," are probably fine. Something along the lines of, "I've been thinking how bad I want to bend you over on that bouldar and pound you with the mist of that waterfall blowing in our faces" might be a bit much. Either it's going to be played off as a joke, losing alpha points (because, let's face it, if she thinks it's a joke it just reminds her that you're not the type of guy who would ever actually do that), or it's going to sound so out-of-context that it will be received as him playing off his sexual neediness with unrealistic intentions and expectations. Those expectations - especially about a fantastical vision of his sexuality - will place a burden on her that's so unrealistic in the context of their current sex life that she'll feel like she can never live up to the fantasy, so just won't try. Alternatively, even if it's played off as a joke, all she hears is: "Fine, he wants sex. I guess I'll have to make time in my chore-list to get that done in the next month or two."

PSA: Most "RP advice" and "rules" are to stop unattractive men from sabotaging themselves.

2 upvotes · 8 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

So comment on her choice of dress instead

I can see the lemmings now: "He just said I should compliment her attire. I must do that before our dates now, even if i don't really care for it, because then she'll want to have sex with me afterwards."

So much is lost when people ignore context and common sense.

Excellent post, brother.

PSA: Most "RP advice" and "rules" are to stop unattractive men from sabotaging themselves.

2 upvotes · 8 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right on, brother.

I may have messed up (F/R)

2 upvotes · 7 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Let me tell you - I'm a lawyer. I don't talk myself into holes. Even when the conversation takes a direction that I didn't anticipate, I still come out on top. I can DEER better than my wife any day of the week. I will always win the argument.

But even if you were capable of matching her toe-to-toe or besting her in these moments, like I can, I promise you it's still a loss. Even if you could keep the conversation on your terms and successfully persuade her that you're right and she's wrong - you will still have lost attraction by DEERING.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/06/19)

2 upvotes · 6 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

McGee's perspective on biblical manhood seems very "OYS" red pill ... "If I know of a Christian man who tells me his wife is cold to him, I can show you a man who isn't leading his marriage well at all!"

While I don't disagree with the statements of his you're quoting in these sections, I do want to give you a word of caution. /u/Deep_Strength often notes, quite wisely, that one of the great shames of the church is placing ALL of the responsibility on men and not calling out women for their responsibility to respond. Refraining: "If she's not following, you're not leading right" can only go so far. Lots of people don't follow Jesus. Does that mean he isn't leading right?

More to the point: the church is really good at giving lip-service to these ideas, but following through in horrendous ways. When the church attributes a wife's unhappiness to her husband's poor leadership, they usually mean (and follow up in the coming paragraphs) that the husband needs to do a better job leading his wife by serving her, coddling her emotions, providing more money and stuff for her comforts, etc. Don't trust someone just because their framework is correct. I can lay the foundation of a house and build the bones correctly, but when actually putting to together, if I put the bath tub in the living room and try to hook a bed up to the kitchen faucet the place will still end up being a mess.

invited her along but made it clear attendance was optional

Maybe I missed something. Why is this optional?

her believing I don't love her because she doesn't get my time enough

Contrary to liberal ideologies, no two people will ever have the exact same amount of love for each other - or even the exact same kind. If there's going to be a difference, better to err on the side of her seeking your love, and you seeking Christ's love rather than hers. This isn't a terrible thing as long as it doesn't get out of hand.

I passed an "s"/comfort test combo!

Yes, you passed. Good job, brother. Take notes, /u/AlanNoles:

- "we were being silly sarcastic jerks back and forth ... took the opportunity to A&A about how horrible I am and toss it back on her." Rather than arguing against her accusation or caving to it, he makes a joke and stays playful and light-hearted.
- "I told her to get up" - as in him asking her to rise to his level rather than him squatting down to meet her.
- "wrapped my arms around her to pick her up and tickle her" - she wouldn't listen, so he helps her along and maintains a light-hearted tone

- "she squirmed away and I shrugged it off ... 'that's cool' and went back to what I was doing." He doesn't cave and shows he has more important things to do.
- "She shot back" - meaning she realized her manipulative games weren't getting to him, so she's going to make another power play - a final attempt to use her emotions to control him, this time attacking his emotions too: "there are nicer ways you can say that" - trying to play to his guilt and shame.
- "I just ignored" - i.e. STFU. He's not having that kind of disrespect, guilt-tripping, and shaming in his household.
- "A little bit later" - he gives her space and does his own thing, letting her calm down and think rationally.
- "I put my hand on her shoulder with intent ... 'I love you' look, hugged her tight ... She relaxed and was happy the entire rest of the night - it was like nothing happened." She's happy because her man is strong and he's offering his strength to her, which is much safer than if she were running the show because she knows she doesn't have that kind of strength - so if she's the "strong one" in the relationship, how bad would that be?
- Also, at no point did he cave into her demands, apologize for something he didn't do wrong, or submit to the emotional pressures she was putting on him.

This needs to be a field report, brother. Good exchange. Post this for the broader community with better analysis. Feel free to use anything I've put here for inspiration - no need to credit me. Make it your own.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/06/19)

2 upvotes · 6 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

She ends up hanging up on me. I call her back she doesn't answer.

You screwed up. You didn't repent quickly. She screws up with the disrespect of hanging up on you. You reward her by displaying your commitment and affection through calling her back. Why!?

I say ok and throw it all in the trash because I don't need it either.

Translation: I got butt-hurt and played the martyr card by sacrificing what I wanted to do and she didn't like that I got so butthurt and made her look like the bad guy. But I also want to look good to the guys here, so I'm going to hamster a reason why I did what she wanted me to do for me, even though the only thing that actually changed was her yelling at me.

Sound about right?

she ... slams the door ... I walk in after her

Again: why?! Why would you ever reward such bad behavior by displaying heightened commitment and affection in these moments?

She screeches for me to leave her alone but I just throw the blanket off again and pick her up and hold her in my lap until her hamster starts spewing.

So much internal pressure forcing you to do these things. This is your biggest lesson for the week: learn to walk away from bad behavior. Don't reinforce it. If you coddle her with attention and affection when she acts this way, she'll just keep acting that way. And if you're not giving her that kind of attention when she's good, she's just going to keep being bratty because that's the only way for her to get it.

"You're right, that was poor judgement on my part and I was speaking out of anger."

"Sorry, mommy. Please teach me. Lead me into being a better woman just like you. As a woman, you would never get angry, and I should aspire to be just like you."

"You are right it won't happen again."

"Sorry, mommy. I'll never do it again mommy. You're the boss and I promise I'll listen from now on."

Test passed

WHAT?!?!?!? THE?!?!?!? FLIP?!?!?!?

/u/rocknrollchuck - how did you miss this one?

This is the exact opposite of passing a test. You proved that you'd beta-up for her if she throws a hissy fit. In no way did you display alpha confidence in any of this.

Brother, I say this not to demean you, and maybe I need a second opinion here - /u/OsmiumZulu - any thoughts? But this to me sounds like you're just handing her the keys to the kingdom.

Who made the rule that you're not allowed to call out her friends on their sin?

Who made the rule that you must wash your hands before eating brownies?

Who made the rule that you must call her back when she hangs up on you?

Who made the rule that you must follow her into her room and comfort her when she throws a tantrum?

I'm guessing she did - either overtly or by implication through her conduct. Don't walk inside her frame with your tool belt on to fix it up and make it stronger than ever.

Also ...

comfort test

Where was the comfort test? I never saw one. Easy distinction:

- Fitness Tests: You ... you ... you ... You shouldn't have done that. You're an idiot. You screwed up. You need to apologize.
- Comfort Tests: I ... I ... I ... I'm insecure. I'm lonely. I'm concerned about our marriage. I feel like you don't love me.

She was always focused on changing you, never fixing her own feels. That's a huge difference. Don't tell her what she wants to hear. Tell her what she needs to hear. And don't follow silly rules that you didn't create. If you want to eat a brownie without washing your hands, go eat that brownie. I don't want to hear any, "It's not a big deal" or "It's important to her and I don't really care, so why not go along with it?" speeches. That's the whole inch and mile people talk about.

Video 6 in the Relationship Goals sermon on YouTube and it really hit home for me

I'm skeptical. Elaborate on what this series is about as a whole.

sexual energy and how it only works well in the right container

Sounds like more of the church's standard: "Let's talk about all the ways sex can be harmful and say it's good, but never talk about how to improve a broken sex life."

Still doing devotions with my wife nightly ... Only read bible once this week

Huh? How's it a devotion if you're not reading the Bible?

prayer journal ... may not do bible reading but that's her version of pursuing God

My wife did the same for a while, so I track with you. Take what you can get for now. Just be cautious because it fosters an emotionalism view of the faith - that it's more about how you feel (ergo journaling your feelings) than how you learn, apply, grow, obey, etc.

I want to be clear: this comment isn't meant to insult you. I'm using an exaggerated tone on purpose. I want to call to attention the things that should trigger in your mind and using the same tone that I would for anything else just wouldn't give the emphasis where you need to see it. Much love, brother!

EDIT: Ignore the part where I quoted you saying it was a comfort test. I was confusing your post with /u/EastThenWest, who did mention comfort tests. Oops. That's what I get for reading these on-the-go then replying without fully re-reading.

Married Man Game Part 3: Sexting

2 upvotes · 6 March 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Nope. Do what works for you.

Married Man Game Part 3: Sexting

2 upvotes · 5 March 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

It's easy for me to track the date: I found this place the day after we got home from the hospital after the birth of my youngest. June of 2017. Reddit isn't good at rounding.

What's your "one-step-closer-to-apocalypse mode"?

Married Man Game Part 3: Sexting

2 upvotes · 5 March 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Nah, after the first wave of fitness testing from that one post, things have actually been better. After looking at the day she first read this stuff, we've had some of our best sex since she started reading.

Frame is everything.

Travel For Work - Texting game tips?

2 upvotes · 5 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Fun - I was just planning on employing texting game today, so this is in good timing. This is probably better done as a "Married Man Game: Part 3" post, so I'll put my response up separately. Suffice it to say, for your purposes, that the traditional RP advice about texting doesn't apply the same way to LDRs, which are discounted almost entirely in a pre-marriage context. If you're forced into a short-term LDR post-marriage, there's certainly viability in texting for more than just logistics.

RPC: a place to stay (or at least return to)

2 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

None of that is arrogant.

No, the arrogance is in degrading the utility and value of men maintaining long-term relationships and accountability in a place like this by telling them they ought to leave once they've learned a few things, and yet without having any empathy or regard for their personal circumstances and why they might be here in the first place.

You may try to couch it with phrases like, "I think" or "this is just my view," but everyone intuitively understands this as an effort to persuade them to adopt your own view, which is backed up by the fact that you spend the rest of the time in your posts trying to convince them to do just that.

What if this sub is what's keeping a guy focused on the mission of disciple-making and away from his porn addiction and keeping him from cheating on his wife? Then he reads your post and decides, "That guy is right. I've learned what this place has to teach, so I can move on and not need to come back." Then, without that accountability or continued study and learning, he ends up losing his self-control, cheats on his wife, delves back into porn, and abandons his life of ministry. That's on you.

I have seen this happen, and it's not pretty. I have met 2 guys face-to-face who were doing fine, then they stopped reading and engaging here, and soon after they're back into porn and haven't done much to pursue their God-given mission, and their wife was no longer having sex with them, which contributed to their porn problem. After meeting with me, they get back on track and are moving in a right direction again, after engaging with our community once more. And you're encouraging more guys to take that same risk? It's this total non-consideration that comes off as arrogant - as if you think some pie in the sky "just live by the Holy Spirit" is some magical phrase that will solve everyone's problems.

And then when they have no clue what that means, and trying to live out that advice ends up getting them in trouble, what are you going to do but wash your hands of them and say, "Well, obviously you weren't following the Holy Spirit the right way if you ended up like this"?

This is what u/OsmiumZulu was trying to teas out in this post, but you don't seem to care enough to give a passing thought to the struggles other men go through. You teach what works for you and suggest it as "advice" and "suggestions" for other men to follow, but like a woman you try to couch your phrases with enough plausible deniability that you can deny any responsibility when your advance leads someone down the garbage shoot: "He didn't have to take my advice. It was only a suggestion, he's ultimately responsible for figuring out what works for him." This is why James says that teachers will be judged more harshly, brother - and that's not a thing I take lightly as I teach here and IRL.

Boyfriend of 2 years having issues with going to work

2 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

No, you're not naive. Those are good expressions of his concern for your well-being. I'm glad to hear that he has these things working for him.

At that point, I'm persuaded that maybe he does have some semblance of love for you. So, now, it's less a question of whether he loves you and more a question of how much. Enough to pull you from a puddle and buy you coffee, but not enough to get a stable job and provide for you - somewhere in-between those two. Don't settle for an ounce if you deserve a pound. That's not to say you deserve a pound - I have no idea where you stand in terms of SMV and RMV. I'm just saying to be mindful of these things.

The expressions of "love" that you give are also highly beta in nature. No doubt, many women appreciate beta-type behaviors for long-term companions, so this can be a good thing. But he also seems to lack significant alpha traits, which will make for a poor long-term relationship. Alpha traits include such things as ambition, pursuing goals, becoming a competent protector and provider, and having the internal fortitude to withstand the emotional (and physical, though I doubt he's actually sick that much) turmoils that are causing him to skip work all the time. Successful relationships require men to have these alpha traits as well - and they're even better off if a guy leans more on his alpha behaviors than his beta ones. As things are, if this were to continue for another 20 years you'll end up resenting him and likely cheating on him (or he you) because neither of you will be happy.

RPC: a place to stay (or at least return to)

2 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Your same argument could be made about going to church. It's more important to be in God's Word than meet with other believers, so at some point we should stop meeting together with other believers and just focus on reading the Bible for ourselves, right? And yet God's Word tells us just the opposite: "Let us not give up meeting together, as some are in the habit of doing."

You neglect the fact that, first and foremost, this place is founded on God's Word. The advice we give here is not from secular ideologies that war against blue pill cultural practices - we are preaching an application of the Word, whether we include the citations or not. Pastors do the same thing. They teach God's Word, whether they include a citation for every sentence or not.

What's more interesting is that /u/OsmiumZulu called you out on a clear lie and instead of OYS ("You're right, I said I was leaving, but I'm still here. I lied.") and moving on, you DEER and deflect.

RPC: a place to stay (or at least return to)

2 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right - but I want to be clear for anyone else who reads this: when you say you are finding "a new way" that is still in the context of being single and not having sex, right? So, while your way may work for your immediate aim, it doesn't have any proven track record for being able to improve a man's ability to attract women or improve a broken sex life in marriage, correct?

And I'm not saying this as an insult, but as a statement of fact to show the limited context in which you are living and that you have yet to mention what the results are of this "new way." I know many men who are perfectly content and even spiritually joyful while rejecting anything to do with the red pill - it's on r/TrueChristian all the time. But these same men are often single or in dead bedroom marriages, finding joy in Christ to replace their bitterness at a sexless wife. While I applaud their newfound emotional stability through non-RP means (and therefore, as a matter of technicality, unintentionally non biblical means), it still does nothing to actually fix their "forever alone" status or dead bedroom marriage.

RPC: a place to stay (or at least return to)

2 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

No one can serve two masters.

Right. But no one is suggesting making sex our master, and we're already agreed not to make the feminine imperative our master either. We're all on the same page on this point.

There is a flaw to think there is a single path - that somehow what I'm saying is either THE way or NOT the way.

This sub has never pretended to be THE only way. You're actually stealing a line from my discipleship book, referenced on the sidebar, which applies to this sub as well: "What I present here is not THE way, but A way. If God puts you on a better path, go with that path. For everyone else, use this as a default until something better comes along." In the case of this sub, "better" means you're getting the results out of life that you want - the fruit you bear for the kingdom, the respect your wife gives you, improved satisfaction in one's sex life, etc. Some men are already bearing incredible fruit and just need to figure out the sex stuff. Others are having great sex, but needed help getting respect from their wife. We figure out what the needs are, and if it's in our wheelhouse, we help. That's all.

Missional Social Strategy

2 upvotes · 2 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Beautiful. Not to undermine the very important role of pastors who live in biblical alignment with their role - this is an excellent exhortation.

Starting from Fat

2 upvotes · 1 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

It's really simple, eat less and move more.

I used to have a rule of thumb that I would only eat as many calories in a day as I burned at the gym. I'd use calorie burn apps online to estimate how much I'd burn from lifting and running and carry that number into myfitnesspal.com. The weight sheds off crazy fast with this approach. It's not super healthy, but got the first 60lbs off of me in a relatively short time.

Starting from Fat

2 upvotes · 1 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I started at 285lbs 6'0" with a bench press of less than 135 and body fat in the upper-30s. Within 2 months I was 255 with a bench of 225 and body fat in the mid-20s. A few months later I was 225 with a bench of 285 and 15-17% body fat, fluctuating - and I have hovered around there ever since.

When I cut, I cut hard. 500 calories a day or less. Sometimes I'll fast for 5 days straight with nothing but water and vitamins. So, my weight loss was initially very rapid. I haven't done a cut in some time ... I'm probably over 225 again, actually, but my lifts are all also going up. /u/warriorjesus1915 and I are doing a cut together for the next month or two - I'll probably pace myself in a more healthy way this time, but I expect it'll take another 2 months before noticing differences, whereas the hard cuts gave results in less than a week.

Welcome to the journey, brother.

When i say No the boss Stonewalls me

2 upvotes · 1 March 2019 · /r/askMRP

So, you have a scarcity mentality with your career because you haven't been developing abundance. If you're over-paid for what you do and can't find another similar job in your area that will pay the same, it could be that you're not getting paid $1k extra for being on call, but that you've already been paid, for example, $10k extra for nothing and the boss has wised up and decided to put you on call to justify the fact that you're over-compensated for similar jobs in the same area.

Does it suck? Absolutely. But business is business. Either jobs are scarce and you have to take what you can get or you hit the pavement and convince some other chump that you're worth more than what they're offering new employees.

Now, if it were me, I'd do three things in the following order of priority (and they're not mutually exclusive):

1. Start looking for another job.
2. Build relationships with other co-workers to make them loyal to you. I've seen law firms go through this where employee loyalty ultimately trumps whatever the boss wants to do. The risk of losing all of the valuable employees will box in decision-making from the top or, in the case of what happened to my previous boss, the valuable employees will just leave and take all the business with them and the boss will be crippled and have to start something new from the ground up.
3. Accept the burden of being on call all the time for the $1k raise on the condition that if you end up working extra hours due to the calls you get, you can either:
 - get paid a fixed hourly rate for any instances where you actually work off-hours due to being called. He doesn't risk paying you a bunch of extra money for minimal work and you don't risk doing a bunch of extra work for minimal compensation - you will be paid based on the work you do.
 - If he won't pay you extra, have any off-hour work you do when called converted into PTO that you can take at your discretion.
 - If he won't take that, then suggest that if you're called after-hours, you take those hours out of your next business day or out of your Friday afternoon.

In either of the above two options, you're doing the same amount of work, but still getting the $1k bonus for the fact that you might have to shift your hours to inconvenient times.

Long story short, you have options. You just have to exercise them and be willing to up your social game within the workplace and broader workforce. This is why social game is so important.

Lastly, you're not trying to get your boss's dick in your butt (are you?), so don't expect him to respond to red pill sexual strategy by falling in love with you. This is business, not sex. Some of the strategies are useful, but the results are very, very different and can be inconsistent. Don't assume that being an alpha high-value man will always equate to your boss backing down and doing what you say.

How do you guys view/approach ghosting?

2 upvotes · 1 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I never quite saw the connection to ghosting, but this is a fantastic story. Glad to hear it!

How do you guys view/approach ghosting?

2 upvotes · 1 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Spot on, dude.

Interesting site...

2 upvotes · 28 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

You're not just checking in to learn a few useful ideas. You're trying to undermine the fabric of what we're trying to do here and recreate it with your own ideas of what you think it should mean to be "red pill." Let me quote CS Lewis:

The word gentleman originally meant something recognisable; one who had a coat of arms and some landed property. When you called someone "a gentleman" you were not paying him a compliment, but merely stating a fact. If you said he was not "a gentleman" you were not insulting him, but giving information. There was no contradiction in saying that John was a liar and a gentleman; any more than there now is in saying that James is a fool and an M.A. But then there came people who said—so rightly, charitably, spiritually, sensitively, so anything but usefully—"Ah, but surely the important thing about a gentleman is not the coat of arms and the land, but the behaviour? Surely he is the true gentleman who behaves as a gentleman should? Surely in that sense Edward is far more truly a gentleman than John?"

They meant well. To be honourable and courteous and brave is of course a far better thing than to have a coat of arms. But it is not the same thing. Worse still, it is not a thing everyone will agree about. To call a man "a gentleman" in this new, refined sense, becomes, in fact, not a way of giving information about him, but a way of praising him: to deny that he is "a gentleman" becomes simply a way of insulting him. When a word ceases to be a term of description and becomes merely a term of praise, it no longer tells you facts about the object: it only tells you about the speaker's attitude to that object. (A "nice" meal only means a meal the speaker likes.)

A gentleman, once it has been spiritualised and refined out of its old coarse, objective sense, means hardly more than a man whom the speaker likes. As a result, gentleman is now a useless word. We had lots of terms of approval already, so it was not needed for that use; on the other hand if anyone (say, in a historical work) wants to use it in its old sense, he cannot do so without explanations. It has been spoiled for that purpose.

He goes on to say that the word "Christian" is being spoiled by what people think the word should mean rather than sticking to what it actually means. You are doing the EXACT same thing CS Lewis says not to do: trying to define the "red pill" by what you think it should mean rather than what it actually means.

Stop it. This type of behavior will not be permitted for much longer, no matter how many new accounts you want to keep creating to do this.

As CS Lewis alludes to, a man can be both "red pill" and Christian just as he can be "red pill" and a vicious, immoral rapist. You saying that people should follow God is fine. But the way you try to tie this to being "red pill" is not fine. You can't say to what degree a man should or should not be "red pill" in any sense that affects his ability to "follow God" or "walk by the Spirit" - these are two independent concepts, just as you cannot say: "A man should only go to classes for a medical degree so far, but at some point he must stop wasting time in those classes talking about medicine and start focusing on wearing shoes." These concepts are not mutually exclusive and they are generally independent. The degree to which a man learns from taking the red pill has no bearing on his capacity to follow God and live by the Spirit or make disciples. If anything, it enables him to do all of these things to a greater degree, as he escapes the hindrances placed on his ability to follow God by the feminine imperative's influence on his life and framework. Why would you fight against this?

Again: stop it.

Tag: /u/Deep_Strength /u/OsmiumZulu /u/RedPillWonder

Interesting site...

2 upvotes · 28 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

As redwall said, REAL discipleship is not the purpose of this sub. I wish it were, but it's not. Real discipleship is done in person, doing life with others. This sub is no substitute for that.

Amen. And I've got a plan for that, but I'll address that in mod chat privately, as I won't want to take it public for some time.

What do you Christians think of MGTOW?

2 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right on. Romans 14:23 is still the guiding light for me here. If it's not from faith it's sin. I'm 100% convinced that celibacy is the better route over marriage, all other things being equal. But I'd rather (as does Paul) a God-honoring marriage than a defiant MGTOW who doesn't care for God. That defeats the whole purpose of 1 Cor. 7's and Matthew 19's compulsion to remain single.

What do you Christians think of MGTOW?

2 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

He said "JUST follow Jesus" - I think he means that if you only follow Jesus and aren't chasing women around (i.e. go MGTOW), then you'll be fine.

Should I be baptised at the beach rather than my local Church?

2 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

As /u/rocknrollchuck said, you have freedom in how you want to go about this. Should you be baptized? Absolutely. Does it have to be in front of a local congregation? Not at all. The story of Philip and the Ethiopian involves a spontaneous baptism that wasn't in front of a large crowd. This is perfectly fine. As chuck alluded to, when you say:

from my understanding the bible says that baptism is for the remission of our sins and a public declaration of our faith

... the "public declaration" part simply isn't in Scripture. That's a claim that Protestants added to justify de-spiritualization of the sacrament and simplify salvation to a sola fide type model ("faith alone"). That is, if faith alone saves and baptism is not necessary, then Protestants had to come up with another reason for why God and Jesus may have commanded it. "Public profession" is the most logical conclusion, even if it's not mandated in Scripture. This is a flaw in Protestant thinking.

To be clear, I don't buy into the view that it's necessary for salvation either. I'm not Catholic or Orthodox, but I do believe that they recognize a spiritual significance to baptism that Protestants miss out on.

In some respects, we talk about marriage as requiring a covenant and sex, where the covenant lays out the terms and intent to create a binding arrangement (in the case of salvation: through faith) and the act of becoming one-flesh is like signing the contract, sealing it closed ... but baptism is more like the ceremony and the public proclamation is akin to a reception. You don't need a ceremony and reception to get married. You can go to the courthouse on your own and it's perfectly legitimate, or you can make a promise to each other before God without a pastor and God still recognize the spiritual marriage that's formed ... but there's still something special about the otherwise unnecessary pomp and circumstance surrounding a wedding day - even if it's just a courthouse wedding with no one else invited. It creates an internal security in the couple: "Yes, we're actually married," even though (at least at one point) the law would have deemed them married even without it (i.e. common law marriage).

I don't know if that clarifies anything or creates a whole mess of confusion, but that's my conclusion: baptism fosters the feeling of bonding security in a new believer's salvation, despite the fact that it is not what actually does the saving; and if public profession is involved (i.e. it's in front of a church), that's like having a public ceremony or reception at a wedding rather than doing it alone at the courthouse.

On a separate note: This line of thinking also re-bolsters my thoughts on the importance of disciple-making as an assurance of salvation tool. It highlights that the reproductive act, being the signature on the contract, is what binds and seals the deal. A contract may technically be valid on the verbal terms alone, even without the signature of the parties, but it's not secure until that signature appears - a court could rule either way. So, if no one engages in that reproductive effort in their relationship with Christ toward bearing spiritual fruit/offspring (see Malachi 2:15), then their salvation covenant remains unsigned. Is it valid or not? Hard to say. Passages like Matthew 7 and Luke 13:6-9 would seem to imply "not," but other passages lean otherwise.

RMV Checklist: How to know if a woman is good marriage material

2 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Not yet. I'm not sure if u/RedPillWonder plans on addressing that angle or not. I just know I suggested in mod-chat that we address the other side and that pretty much everyone agreed it should be done in a separate post rather than together with assessing female RMV.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (02/20/19)

2 upvotes · 25 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Way to OYS!

It's money she spent, but they are mine to pay

Right. And she spent it because you authorized her to. That's like a CEO giving his CFO the company checkbook saying, "I trust you." It's not the CFO's bill. It's not the CFO's joint bill with the company. It's the company's bill and the CEO is the company. He is the face, the personality, and the person ultimately held responsible. This is the proper mindset - and one I trust you will adapt to very quickly :) After all, you're not one of our very few endorsed contributors for nothing (as of today at least).

why the tiles I installed a couple months ago were cracking so much

Tiles by my front door did this too. Turns out the cement slab under my front door isn't quite even, which contributed to part of our problem, so I have to relay the mortar to balance it better than the first time around.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (02/20/19)

2 upvotes · 25 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

we have 5 kids, she's said she wanted 6 for a while, but for the first time I'm thinking ... maybe not. Going to pray for clarity from the Lord

Clarity is certainly good ... but why the shift from "we have 5 kids" to "she's said she wanted"? Did you not have a plan and intention on this before you started having kids? Obviously it's a bit late to suddenly decide you only want 3. But how much of your (possible?) desire for a 6th is really just a projection of her desire for another?

I also noticed that when you're talking about the kids, you have no problem taking ownership: "my kids." While it may seem trite and could just be habitual communication patterns: "we have unexpected bills" as to your wife, and "we reworked some chores" as to your son. Do you view these as joint-and-equal situations or where you're the head of these things, weighing the input of the other? No assumptions, just bringing up the mentality difference.

Projects include:

Cool. Been 4 days. Which ones are checked off or at least started?

Spinning Plates

2 upvotes · 25 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Here you go.

Here too.

These are both on the sidebar.

A Reply: Yes, the church and Christian writers really say these ridiculous things.

2 upvotes · 24 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Let me just be clear: I have never attended a church that doesn't teach these things - and I've been to a lot. My wife is still emotionally wounded by the fact that the churches she attended growing up taught these things and she can't move past it. We were taught these things in our premarital counseling. Our parents raised us with them. Any pastoral counseling either of us have had to talk through marriage and sexuality issues have taught these things. This is what gets discussed at the small groups either of us have attended.

As originally noted in my post, I'm coming from personal observation and showing through online searching that my experiences in what my wife and I have been taught is taught more broadly too. This was not meant to be a broad scientific point, but another one of many data points.

I have been to exactly one church that said in one sermon that it's okay to want to marry someone you find attractive. While I'm sure many other pastors believe this too, virtually none of them are willing to preach on it.

While I agree that none of this is official doctrine of the church, this kind of teaching is so prevalent in the modern first world church that the comparisons you attempt to draw don't even come close.

Tag: u/whitified

Hello Men, Opinions on JLP?

2 upvotes · 22 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians government has an answer to the issues today and number two

Right. There are no political solutions to our nation's spiritual problems.

A Reply: Yes, the church and Christian writers really say these ridiculous things.

2 upvotes · 22 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Fair points here. For reference, this is the exact reason why I shared which search terms I used to find the articles I referenced ;)

Something tells me we'd be good friends IRL.

A Reply: Yes, the church and Christian writers really say these ridiculous things.

2 upvotes · 22 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I want to start by saying that I greatly respected your reply to /u/deep_strength in the other thread. My use of your reply was not to criticize, but expand on the conversation :)

I seriously doubt any of these authors quoted would tell two people who find each other repulsive that they should pursue a romantic relationship just because they're both Christians for example

I completely agree. I think I addressed this in the post, though. While they would not be willing to admit this openly and directly, the way they communicate leaves no other conclusion in most men's minds because it is not tempered with any actual authorization to contemplate looks as a valid part of attraction.

Consider two people in a parallel situation. They are both considered expert zoologists who have both studied snakes for decades.

- GUY 1: "Snakes do not make good pets. Many snakes are deadly and poisonous. They could kill you. Some snakes are capable of swallowing your child whole. If you're ever around a snake, it might snap at you. You shouldn't touch snakes. They're slimy and gross. People will be afraid if you have a snake as a pet in your home and may not want to come over. They likely won't want to be near you when you're holding a snake. Snakes also kill lots of animals. They're known for stealing other species' babies and snatching their eggs right out of the nest."

How will you view snakes after this?

- GUY 2: He says all of the same things above, but splices into his speech: "Snakes are also friendly, if you know how to handle them well. I've had lots of friends who have become very fond of my snakes once they overcame their initial fears and I showed how tame my snake was. Snakes are also a valuable part of our ecosystem and are integral to the food chain. If there were no snakes, animal populations would become imbalanced and it would harm all of humanity."

Now how do you feel about snakes? Which man can be trusted to give an accurate representation about the role of snakes in our environment? Which man should aspiring zoologists consider learning from in order to advance their knowledge and understanding of the profession?

We have the physical capability to change what we are attracted to

With extremely finite limitations, yes. But there are boundaries that I cannot intentionally cross no matter how hard I may want to will it into existence. My wife is highly attractive too. I do use the word "hot" to describe her at times, and she appreciates the use of that word. But if she were to gain 300lbs, I don't know that I could will myself into being physically attracted to her, no matter how hard I tried. It doesn't mean I'd cheat on her or stop loving her. But it would certainly affect the relationship and there would be practical ramifications in how this affects our emotional connection as well. I did add a caveat at the end that alludes to this, though I'm not sure if you saw the post before or after that was included.

Is it just me? Are modernist Churches very feminine oriented?

2 upvotes · 22 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I appreciate this comment and the research and experience behind it. I'm reminded of when buddha prophesied to a brahman who wanted to "ordain" a woman: "If women are not allowed into the priesthood, our practices will continue for thousands of years. If they are, our number will be 500 years." Curiously, this was prophesied around 500BC, and the are other Buddhist prophecies about Jesus being the fulfillment of buddhism and putting an end to their ways. I interpret this much the same as the way Judaism still carries on after Christ.

Is it just me? Are modernist Churches very feminine oriented?

2 upvotes · 22 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I have two pastors who have referenced studies. I just don't have them handy. They do exist.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (02/20/19)

2 upvotes · 20 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

MISSION: On track; progress flowing faster than ever before.

LIFTS: Pushing boundaries - almost upped my bench to 295 (I couldn't quite get it down all the way). Raised my 5-rep on squat and deadlift up to 335 from 315, haven't tried to up my 365 max on either yet.

DIET: I've started intentionally sporadic cutting again. Higher weight than I'd like to be, but still pushing for 300 on the bench, so somewhat conflicting goals here.

AESTHETICS: Got a new cologne that I like a lot better. Bought some new clothes that actually fit me and aren't as baggy as some of the older stuff I would default to - also long enough that they still fit when I'm doing overhead presses.

LEADERSHIP: Started having daily quiet times with my kids. Wife observed from the outside for a while. Eventually she joined in. Now she participates. She moved on to start having quiet times with them even on days I'm not there. This is beautiful.

I also started praying together with my wife again - something that had been off-limits for a long time, and the 1000 ft rope is finally reeling in. She surprised me the next morning with lingerie as I was walking out of the shower.

SEX: Best it's ever been. New positions. New times of day. New techniques. Heightened energy. While I don't seek the validation, she openly throws it my way both with her words ("You're so good at this!" "That was amazing!") and in actions (initiating in much stronger ways, trying new things).

SPIRITUALLY:

- AoS: 10
- Quiet Time: 8
- Bible Study: 9
- Scripture Memory: 1
- Prayer: 3
- Evangelism: 8
- Fellowship: 10

AREAS FOR IMPROVEMENT:

- Managing my diet more effectively, particularly in relation to my lifting goals
- I need to start taking protein shakes more consistently (I hadn't used them in almost a year and just started again, but not consistently)
- Finding a healthy balance in disciplining my kids between having a stern tone and a positive frame
- Escalating certain relationships from casual acquaintances to useful allies or friends
- Need for continued influence with the lead pastor; I relied too heavily on my red pill pastor, who hasn't been able to cross ministry thresholds on his own

How screwed am I? 12 questions from Beta Bucks

2 upvotes · 19 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good stuff. While I would appreciate another mod to do a write up on this as well, as extra perspectives are fantastic, biblical love expressed through biblical masculinity is clearly related to a post I've been mulling over for the last 4 weeks that I originally wanted to title "The Kind Alpha" and have changed my mind to "The Christian Alpha." Ove got another one half written that will be posted later today, and I'm going to co author a post with warriorjesus after that ... but perhaps next week :p

Addressing the Blue Pill Hate: Manipulation

2 upvotes · 18 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Depends on how you're defining the red and blue pills, I guess. I'd be curious of your definitions, as I'm not sure how you'd argue against scripture being the ultimate source of the solution.

Michael's Story?

2 upvotes · 13 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

2/2

I'm reading a book right now: Underground Church, by Brian Sanders. I'm only a few chapters in, but it's solid stuff and a lot of what I have been preaching for years - over a decade even. In it he talks about his time leading campus ministries and he notes three categories of people who graduated from the student ministry he led:

1. Some would fall away very quickly. As soon as they were out of the fire, the coal died out. They didn't bother looking for other churches or other believers to keep them going. They just got caught up in the world and left Christ behind.
2. Others stay faithful on their own, but reject the church. They realized that the cultural church wasn't living up to the biblical ideals modeled by Jesus and decided that they would just do their own thing. This often led to falling away, but for some it simply meant living a monastic life - trying to be Christlike, but doing so in isolation from any actual purpose. Regardless, they abandoned the vision of building God's Kingdom.
3. The last crowd he references continued with their churches, but did so bitterly, frustrated that their churches weren't living biblically. They still served within those churches and some tried to influence change, but on the whole it was still a very negative experience.

He doesn't reference a fourth crowd who found great churches, plugged in, and flourished with fruit for Christ. Why? Because such perfect churches don't exist and transforming the church (as I am personally finding) is immensely hard work.

Why do people, with few exception, always seem to take a sharp decline in their spiritual maturity and in living out a biblical mission after college? Because college is a bubble and not an accurate predictor of how someone will function in life in the "real world." I put that in quotes because college is the "real world." What happens there matters. It's just not the adult world.

What a woman is like in college is not a good predictor of what she will be like in the adult world. That's not to say you should ignore women in college. It's simply to say that you should not trust your vetting strategies to give you accurate results.

Instead of trusting vetting to find a qualified woman, you should trust your leadership to make a woman qualified. Trusting in vetting has value, but it only goes so far because the conclusion depends entirely on the woman and not yourself, and it assumes that women will never change. A wise friend of mine often said, "I've found that women always want to change their man, and men always want their women to stay the same; but in the end neither of them get what they want." That is, it's incredibly hard to change a man once he is rooted in his way, but women are fickle and change their thoughts, behaviors, and mannerisms constantly. This is because women are naturally followers and not leaders. They mold to whoever they are following at any given moment - whether that's their husband, their pastor, their best friend, the author of a book they're reading at any given time, or social media influences.

But your leadership skills are something you can develop. You can hone them and make them more and more effective. As you become more effective and influential as a leader, you develop greater security in your relationships because the woman you're with is more likely to mold to you and your expectations. If you believe that sex outside of marriage is wrong, and you're a more influential leader in her life than sources that would compel her toward sex outside of marriage, then she will side with you every time. The problem is that most men don't recognize the qualities of a good leader. They start bossing people around and putting processes and systems in place in their relationships and think that this is leading, and are then shocked when their wife cheats on them because she followed her interest in some other guy over her husband's "leadership."

To be clear: I'm not saying not to vet. Absolutely vet. But vetting is only useful as an isolated wife-finding tool if unicorns actually exist. If unicorns don't exist, then you can't vet alone because vetting will never find you what you're looking for. It's like you're looking at hundreds of lumps of clay trying to find one in the shape of a unicorn. Some will look more like a unicorn than others, but at the end of the day they're all still lumps of clay. If you want one that actually resembles of unicorn, you have to mold it into one. That's where developing attractive qualities - most specifically: having a mission and orienting your frame around that mission - are most useful.

That is, you need to know what you want out of life before you can know what you want out of a wife. Once you have your mission in mind, then you know how to vet and how to mold. If I want to carry water from a river to my house, I'm going to want to mold my clay into a vase to help me accomplish my goal. If I want to remember Jesus in my home, then I may want to mold that clay into a cross and hang it on my wall to help me accomplish that goal. If I want to play a game, then I need to mold the clay into game pieces.

Anyway ... I'm out of time. I hope this helps. The long and short of it is this:

1. Don't just try to vet for a high quality woman in college. Vetting is valuable, but not a useful tool in isolation.
2. All women have an innate drive to seek validation, which often expresses itself through sexuality. But some women are better at controlling this instinct than others, which scales with her own spiritual maturity as well as the spiritual maturity of the man who leads her.
3. A sexless pre-marriage relationship is not "beta" if the man has higher priorities in life and therefore the sexlessness is at his choice and not her rejection.

Michael's Story?

2 upvotes · 13 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

My thoughts exactly.

Yes, the Modern Woman would be attracted to Jesus

2 upvotes · 11 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

As a disclaimer, I give no confidence in this assessment at all - I'm doing it more just for the fun of it. About 6 months ago I wrote a post focused on fixing your SMV. The goal of the post wasn't to establish a definitive metric for evaluating male SMV; rather, it was designed to point men to work on their weakest areas first. So, if they were horrible leaders in their home, but chose to up their bench from 290 to 300 before working on leadership skills ... that would be idiotic. Nevertheless, what if I did use the suggested rubric for Jesus?

Looks: 3 points.

- 1 point for being a reasonable body size: 1
- 1 point for being muscular (6 pack, bouncing pecs, etc.): we really don't know. Most people agree that Jesus likely had a fit body, but we'll give the doubters some credit here and suggest only .5 - an average build.
- 1 point for having good hygiene, grooming, and fashion sense: I'll give the haters the benefit of the doubt and say 0 points.

- Points can be lost if you have noticeable physical abnormalities, like an unusual scar or burn marks: I'm not aware of Jesus having anything like this prior to his crucifixion.

Confidence/alphaness/frame: 3 points

- 1 point for showing initiative, passing tests, and having the balls to [say no]: 1
- 1 point for not getting butthurt or being beta-controlling (ex. mate guarding, making rage-demands): 1
- 1 point for being OYS and intentional about managing your life and affairs (mission and steps thereto): 1

1.5 points for your financial position and/or prospects

- We'll just assume 0 points here, unless the woman had enough faith to know that she's never lack for provision while at Jesus' side, as the disciples knew to be true, in which case Jesus would probably gain full points - or somewhere in the middle because no woman would expect to be filthy rich during Jesus' life on earth.

1 point for charm, charisma, wit, personality, etc.

- 1 point there. I don't see Jesus as having a trash personality, and he was certainly charismatic and witty.

1 point for social status and preselection

- Full marks here: 1 point

1/2 point for morality, ethics, and philosophical consistency with one's lifestyle

- 1/2 point

TOTAL: 7

Now, if we have a spiritually mature woman who recognizes that Jesus would never fail to provide, we should add back in something for this, which might bring him to an 8 or 8.5.

I also noted in that post: "Women can re-assign points at their discretion for exceptional features. So, if a guy makes $500,000/yr he might get 3 points on finances, and they'll just steal the other 1.5 points from somewhere else. Or if the guy is incredibly charismatic, funny, and flirtatious, he might get 2 points and she'll steal the missing point from somewhere else that he's lacking."

Many objectively unattractive celebrities prove this point, as u/Deep_Strength alluded to. Women will tingle for them despite their ugliness and poor personalities simply because they're famous. That is, they'll look over all of the other low scores and still have the hots for him because a particular feature is off-the-charts for this guy.

Jesus certainly has a few of these. I'd say this would apply to his personality/charisma, fame, and morality/ethics/etc. So maybe he would rise to the level of a perfect 10 - even on a sexual interest level and not merely a spiritual following level.

So, the implication of u/rocknrollchuck's comment is that women weren't necessarily drawn to him in a sexual manner. But if we assume women back then had similar sexual attraction frameworks as exist today, then he'd be at least a 7, but more likely higher, and possibly even a 10.

Again: don't read into this too much. I'm just screwing around with a rubric taken out of my own context for using it. But it does show that there may have been more attraction toward Jesus than mere spiritual following.

To u/Deep_Strength - I just want to add a quick clarification: many of the things you list in the "not (sexually) attractive" section are not things that will decrease someone's attraction; rather, they are things that will increase attraction if present. A guy can still be a 9 or 10 even if he does not exhibit dark triad traits, for example.

A close friend Tells me He thinks my Wife is hot..

2 upvotes · 11 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

/u/BoiLyon - This is the right answer. Tell him, "Of course my wife's hot" (assuming she is), don't puff up your wife's ego with his comments, and start discipling him to resolving his own issues. It's that simple.

I've had guys hit on my wife before. It's not a big deal. If you have an attractive wife, it's going to happen sooner or later. Amused mastery is key not just in negative contexts, but in positive ones like this too.

My Anger Phase

2 upvotes · 24 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right. Being mindful of the parable of the great banquet in the process.

Too Little, Too Much

2 upvotes · 23 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I don't know that it addresses that specific angle of things, but here is a post where I lay out my testimony and RP-imony.

Too Little, Too Much

2 upvotes · 23 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I've referenced on here before data results from an ongoing church analytical group that showed that people who had an active lifestyle of evangelism and discipleship had less than a 2% divorce rate within the church. So, if you're a casual Christian who doesn't have a clear mission and isn't leading your wife in that mission, then your 50% probability of divorce might make sense - because neither of you are all that committed to the faith in the first place and you don't see divorce as much bigger of a deal than the rest of the world. But if you follow and apply RPC principles, you'll most likely end up in that 2% category. Mission matters, nothing else, brother.

Too Little, Too Much

2 upvotes · 23 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I already do this through periodic phone conversations with some people. I don't mind hosting an AMA sometime, if you think that would help. But like /u/Deep_Strength said, we have a chat channel. I only check it once every few days, but if I know there's a set time where people will come with questions, it could be useful.

Too Little, Too Much

2 upvotes · 23 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Of course :)

Too Little, Too Much

2 upvotes · 22 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right. But that still doesn't warrant a man bending his entire life to focus on divorce-avoidance or that he should position his emotions in a manner that divorce would crush him.

Too Little, Too Much

2 upvotes · 22 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

If you want to take exceptional cases as their own context, sure. But most people don't live in exceptional cases. I just addressed this issue with another user over here.

Shit test question

2 upvotes · 21 January 2019 · /r/askMRP

"Just keeping my eyes open for that threesome we talked about."

Recommended church style or denomination ...

2 upvotes · 19 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

A church full of faithful, available, and teachable people who have doctrinal and feminist problems is better than a church of pew sitters who happen to have a right view of marriage and theology. I can mold the first, but can't do squat with the second. Look for a church based on its potential through your influence, not something ready made ... kind of like looking for a girl.

Counterproductive Desire and the Fallacy of Unconditional Love

2 upvotes · 18 January 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

She even told me that I've been finding her more attractive when she's at her worst. faaaahk.....palmtoface.

Complimenting her inappropriately is certainly a problem. A simple way to fix this is if you can, without being overt or cringe-worthy about it, simply comment or make a joke when you find another woman attractive. This lets her know what you find attractive, but without making it personal to her that she's unattractive. As she sees your attention and appreciation of attractiveness focused on other women more than her, she will eventually think then ask, "Why do you always comment about other women and not me?" That's when you address the situation directly. Let her get to that conclusion on her own, though, without needing to tell her. If she figures it out for herself, it means more to her to work through it.

Is My Girlfriend Wife Material? Need Help.

2 upvotes · 17 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Solid. I intended to say a lot of the same things. The one thing I'll add is that OP will one day regret marrying someone older. I did. My wife is 2 months older than me. I now see girls a decade younger than me that I could pull who could easily be molded into great wives. The regret is easily manageable with a strong sense of self and mission, but I know many guys who crack, such as in a midlife crisis.

Logic is Subjective.

2 upvotes · 17 January 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

It reminds me of the saying: If you say there are two sides to everything, you inherently must agree that there might not be two sides to everything.

Logic is Subjective.

2 upvotes · 16 January 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

If logic is subjective, then the logic you used to write this is also subjective, so there's no real point in having written it in the first place because your logic might not apply to anyone else.

Counterproductive Desire and the Fallacy of Unconditional Love

2 upvotes · 14 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

God does "love unconditionally" but we often get caught up in what we think is "unconditional love" versus what God thinks is "unconditional love."

I'd like to see a verse for that. If we define "love" as an emotional disposition toward a people, you may be right. If we define love by a pattern of decision-making and behaviors toward a people, then I stand by what I said. Personally, I believe the emotions are a byproduct of love - the feeling of being "in love" is not actually "love" itself. The real question at this point is: Does God "love" non-Christians? The answer depends on your definition, but certainly in all circumstances he withholds the beneficial use of his love for non-Christians. But I agree with your premise - that acts of rebuke and discipline, for example, can be included in love and can, therefore, stretch the bounds of some of what I'm saying.

Don't deny each other sex. I don't think things are mutually exclusive.

Right, hence the suggestion I made: accept, but give terms for your acceptance. "Sounds great. I'll get the whipped cream while you put on some lingerie." The suggestion you gave is great for a one-off if you want to prime her for sex, but it isn't something that's feasible to do every single day, and those bland initiations will still come at some point :p

Stop apologizing so much

2 upvotes · 14 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/6qmr2h/106_what_doesnt_work/?utm_content=title&utm_medium=hot&utm_source=reddit&utm_name=RPChristians

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/7vpc0c/211_an_anatomy_of_butthurt_and_the_impact_on_frame/

Validation and Interdependency

2 upvotes · 13 January 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You could expand that into a full post on r/RPChristians.

We've done it, guys. "Traditional Masculinity" is now officially deemed "harmful" by the American Psychological Association. High-five to culture!

2 upvotes · 11 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

And this is a crying shame - that guys over at MRP and TRP blame feminism for all of life's problems and for suppressing masculinity, and suggest that it's men's faults for letting women rise to power ... but then they just throw in the towel and say, "We're too weak to do anything about it, so instead of changing the system we'll just try to maximize what we can do within the system." This seems extremely counter-intuitive to me.

We've done it, guys. "Traditional Masculinity" is now officially deemed "harmful" by the American Psychological Association. High-five to culture!

2 upvotes · 11 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The intended goal is, no doubt, to eradicate from men any impulses that would challenge liberal ideologies. So, if we tell them that being ambitious, adventurous, risk-takers is dangerous and harmful and that men need to stop being that, then when liberals solidify a substantive enough stronghold in leadership, who is going to take them down?

The unintended consequence is that men will become women. There will just be "seed carrying women" and "egg carrying women."

We've done it, guys. "Traditional Masculinity" is now officially deemed "harmful" by the American Psychological Association. High-five to culture!

2 upvotes · 11 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

That's crazy.

We've done it, guys. "Traditional Masculinity" is now officially deemed "harmful" by the American Psychological Association. High-five to culture!

2 upvotes · 11 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good call, though based on personal conversation I happen to know he's referencing a revolution a understanding the sexual marketplace within the church.

310 - Leaving a Legacy

2 upvotes · 10 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This would be easier to discuss next time we chat by phone rather than typing it all.

310 - Leaving a Legacy

2 upvotes · 10 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Where and when did the Church stop intentionally teaching Christians to disciple?

It was a 2-step process between the times of Constantine and Theodosius I in the late 200s/early 300s.

Memorized John 15:2 recently.

That's a good reference too! Recognize that this is all part of Jesus' communion speech (specifically John 13-17) and it'll blow your mind about what Jesus meant when he instituted communion, as compared with the mass-productionalized way we do it today. Communion was always about bonding the body of believers together in fellowship (the Greek word being Koinonia, which the King James translates as "communion") over a common mission of disciple-making, as made obvious through John 13-17. But today we sit isolated in our seats, introspecting by ourselves about our individuality and personal relationship with Christ independent of everyone around us. Not to mention that Acts 2:42 is what all pastors look at to reference the church being the place they were breaking bread ... completely ignoring 2:46, which says the breaking of bread (i.e. communion) happened in people's homes - not over a sterile weekly small group meeting where everyone shares their feelings for an hour and a half, but in a time of bonding over a common mission. I could go on, but you get the idea.

Kinda makes you wonder if we aren't making disciples at some point are we actually even saved? I would lean towards the not being saved, but I guess we'll see someday.

Luke 13's parable of the fig tree is even more explicit on that point. The fig tree is fruitless - not dead, just fruitless. The master wants to cut it down. The vinedresser (i.e. person responsible for that tree) says, "Give me a year to work with him, and then if he's still fruitless, you can cut him down." Nobody cares how strong the wood is, how beautiful the leaves are, etc. Is it bearing fruit? That's the only test.

Then, of course, in Matthew 7 Jesus doesn't say, "Any tree that produces bad fruit will be thrown in the fire." He says, "Any tree that does not produce good fruit." It's not enough to say, "I didn't produce any bad fruit, God!" You have to be able to point to good fruit in your life.

Great comment :)

I unknowingly married a BPD... and I need advice.

2 upvotes · 10 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Glad I could help. Another tid-bit that I was reminded of today with a new client: BPDs like control but don't know how to maintain it. One of their main strategies is to give slivers of hope that are not realistically plausible, but enough to string someone along. If you struggle with a codependency issues, you'll fall for it every time.

In this particular case, my new client is a career beta with a BPD wife. He gives his wife a list of 3 things that she must do to keep him from filing for divorce. I don't recall the first, but the second and third were: (2) go to counseling, (3) make him a priority in her life. At one point he accused her of not including him in her plans for the future and her answer was: "You're right. I don't. So?"

She responds to his list of three things with an immediate no. Then she comes back the next day saying, "I thought about it and decided I was being too harsh. I'm willing to try to live up to the 3 things you listed, but you have to live up to a list of things I want from you too." She then hands him a list 40 long! Some of the items:

- Be more of a leader in the home
- Take charge of planning our vacations
- Quit trying to start this business and get a real job
- Take responsibility for our kids' spiritual growth and development

And the list went on like that. Sound familiar?

Now, objectively, anyone looking at this would know the obvious conclusion: it's never going to work. He gives a list of 3 basic things and she gives a list of 40 specific, yet in many cases major life-changing things in response? That's her way of saying, "This is never going to happen" because she's placing major expectations that he can never live up to. But by framing it in a way that gives him hope - that if he can live up to her 40 things, then maybe it'll work. And he's genuinely tempted by that hope. He said today, "I think I can do most of the things on that list - maybe even all of them. So, we might not need to get divorced if I can make this work." But the reality is that even if he does live up to all of those other things, she has no intention of holding up her end of the bargain. She's just setting up an impossible bargain so that if he fails one of any of the 40, she can blame him for the problem when she fails one of his 3 - and therefore she has an out to keep being herself while still keeping him stuck in the marriage.

The proper solution to this degree of codependency isn't to demand independence through a divorce or separation. It's to refuse to play the game at all. This is done by creating your frame as the foundation of the marriage rather than hers, per my last post. But recognizing another strategy that BPDs use can be helpful all the same.

I certainly wouldn't expect a 7-11 year old to pay their way

That's because they're not intellectually or legally competent to maintain employment. Your wife is both. Her emotional stability does not affect her ability to generate an income. It only affects her desire to do so. By way of example, this new client's wife is the heavier earner. He earns about $60k and she earns around $85k. She is very professionally competent and maintains a great network of business contacts, including being personal friends with the CEO of a major national bank. In professional settings, BPDs can still be highly proficient. They just unravel when emotional issues enter the fray, usually unloading it all on their family at home.

hazy trying to figure out what is realistic for me to expect from her or delegate to her and what isn't Functionally, she should be as competent as any adult. The primary difference is her emotional state. A normal adult can do the dishes without complaining. She may not like it, but she'll do it. A BPD will whine and complain about doing the dishes and how you're not helping around enough and blame everything on you. Remember: she's intellectually as competent as any other adult, so she won't take the same approach to arguments that an 11 year old would. The 11 year old would just wine until you discipline them into doing it. The adult BPD will argue her points in a way that tries to convince you that she's right - but ultimately her emotional gratification is her ultimate desire, not what's best for the family, what's fair to you, or any of those other things that rational adults might contemplate who can get past their emotions.

she feels doing those things isn't significant enough for her so she isn't willing to do them

Just like an 11 year old who doesn't feel like doing the dishes because the mysterious "someone else" can always do them, or because they'll just need done again the next day.

Here's the real deal on that, though: Either (1) she doesn't feel valued or appreciated by you when she does these things, so she stops seeing the value or importance in doing them, or (2) she's emotionally detached from you and doesn't care about your validation of her. The solution is to get her emotional state to depend on you again - not in an unhealthy codependency, but in a godly "she was created to be your helper and will only be satisfied when she lives within her role" kind of way. You do that by establishing the emotional frame within the household per my last comment.

Can I expect / trust my wife to ever be my FO, or do I need to treat her more like that 7-11yr old and just take care of everything myself?

She can absolutely be your first officer. She will just be the crass, unprofessional first officer. You ever watch Breaking Bad? Think of Jesse to Walter White. They had a clear bond. Jesse was his helper. They were on a mission together and stuck through some very hard times. Jesse respected Walter. But he was also a loose cannon who went off his rocker all the time with emotional outbursts and defying instructions ... before ultimately being reigned back in. It's not a perfect example, but it's the first that came to my head. You will never be Kirk and Spock. So, shoot for Walter and Jesse instead.

We are all going to hell

2 upvotes · 29 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Stop trying to tell a football player he's wrong for not throwing the ball in a hoop. Nonchristians aren't playing the same game we are ... at least not consciously. Get them playing the right game first then help them figure out the rules of that game. Trying to make them play by basketball rules while they're still on the football field is a waste of time.

Also, our goal isn't to stop them sinning. It's too get them following Christ. Conquering sin is a byproduct of sanctification, but they can't be sanctified without Jesus anyway. Finding a loving way to tell them they're sinning is not helpful. Getting them in a relationship with Jesus is. It's the Spirit's job to convict unbelievers, not ours.

Once they're saved, only then do we gain the obligation to rebuke - and tactfully at that.

Humility in leadership. Opposites in distinction. Or not?

2 upvotes · 27 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Goodness. Lots of bad content coming out lately. I know you're trying and asking this as a question, so lots of grace here. But your assumptions about humility are way, way, way off - and that's creating the conflict for you.

a humble man would not take leadership, unless asked to Says who? To steal a line that u/redpillwonder stole from me: this all depends on the definitions you're using. It seems like you made up your own definition of humility and eisegetically imputed that into your scriptural interpretation of the command to be humble.

As u/deep_strength noted, humility isn't thinking less of yourself; it's having a right perception of who you are before God and man and living in that. If you know God created you to lead (a family, for example), then it's perfectly humble to take up that position and lead.

The "unless asked to" part is also troubling. You're probably thinking of someone like Moses, who was asked by God in a clear audible voice to lead, and he "humbly" said he didn't think he was the right man for the job. God calls him out on the fact that he wasn't being humble; he was being a coward.

Most people who God calls to leadership don't get the clear audible voice. They are compelled by their internal makeup - by the character God has created in them to want to lead. Don't undermine that.

he simply subjects himself unto the other by doing their will instead.

Where in the world ... or heaven ... or hell ... or the land of ridiculous imaginary ideas did you ever hear this?

Did Jesus sit back and take orders from his disciples? Did Paul let the churches dictate how he witnessed to them? This is nowhere in the bible and is completely eisegetical.

He is seen as an authority, because he is.

And he passed that authority onto us in Matthew 28:19.

Also, we are to meet like Christ, who recognized and exercised leadership and authority over others in appropriate context. Paul did the same and encouraged others: "Follow my example."

What are some RP conservative, fundamental pastors?

2 upvotes · 27 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I haven't seen his marriage stuff, but his discipleship talks are excellent. He's one of the few preachers I would endorse.

Best Man Speech at My Brother's Wedding

2 upvotes · 26 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Two men and two women. The women were both my aunts, who are godly, humble, and submissive women. The two men were randos who essentially said they'd never thought of that before.

Help with over-controlling parents?

2 upvotes · 21 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This sort of question is perfectly appropriate here. There are scant few other places on the internet to get reliable biblical advice on topics like this. This sub explicitly extends beyond sexual strategy alone and into other aspects of biblical masculinity.

Responsibilities and Privileges

2 upvotes · 20 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's my point though: the Matthew 18 process will likely fail because the witnesses and the leadership will virtually always side with the woman ... thus there is no enforcement if God doesn't otherwise change her heart. Doesn't that really still leave it at her discretion if there are no practical consequences for her sin? And if it's at her discretion, how is it the man's right and not a privilege of her whims?

To be clear, I think we agree. I'm just exploring an idea through a thought experiment.

Responsibilities and Privileges

2 upvotes · 19 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Someone's been listening to Jordan Peterson ;)

I do like the responsibility/privilege dynamic. In fact, I've included it in my book. So props for being the one to bring it here in a relatively clear manner.

Of course, my gut reaction was the same as chuck's: what do we do with this information once we have it? I do have some ideas, and I read your reply to him. I'd delete your reply to him, replace it with "I'll add it in the post itself," then edit the post to add a new section in the post titled "Application." You've got a great post, but half of it is in the comments, which will lose readers on the part that actually matters.

[FR] The importance of the basics

2 upvotes · 16 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well said.

Do Looks Matter – The Maroon Pill and The Apex Alpha Predator...

2 upvotes · 12 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

women guided by the spirit would be attracted to other things

The way God created men and women, per the Bible, doesn't differentiate attraction cues between those "guided by the Spirit" and those who aren't. My point in suggesting that there is no Scriptural foundation for your post wasn't to say that only ungodly women who don't live by Scripture would be this way - it was to say that your entire argument cannot be (and is not) supported by Scripture at all. You are relying solely on observation and logic. That is the issue. Your defense in the edit reiterates that this is your foundation.

I believe women in the modern world truly have a barrier where they will not consider males (especially if they are on social media / dating apps).

As noted in my comment: this is uniquely true for social media and dating apps because looks are all you can really assess in those forums. So, if your only source of meeting a girl is online dating, then the black pill suddenly makes a lot of sense. For anyone who is actually approaching women in real life, this no longer holds true on the same level.

That said, I will acknowledge (and I think I even did in my linked post, I can't remember) that the concepts only apply within general averages, as points can span beyond their given thresholds. Rather than 0 points, the elephant man would get negative points - his looks are so atrocious that even perfect marks in every other area could not make up for it with regard to raw sexual attraction. That being said, by definition most men reading this sub will not be the obscure outlier.

if this is a high social media or dating app using 7, she will have an inflated ego and will think she is a 9

And this is why I recommend in-person approaches, not using dating websites. All of your information is conflated within a social media framework. Although such apps can be useful, I believe the advice on this sub from the moderators has consistently been that dating apps should be a last resort to in-person approaches. Tag: u/redpillwonder /u/Deep_Strength /u/OsmiumZulu - just in case I'm mistaken on that point.

My point though, it's not the norm. 90% of the time, the guy who is a 4 or 5 won't have all these elements and won't attract these women.

But that's the whole point of the red pill, isn't it? Most guys don't have those extraneous elements, so we teach them to develop those elements in their life. So, while you're right that 90% of guys may not naturally fall into that category, I'd wager that virtually all of the guys who learn from here and apply it in their lives will be within the 10%. We're still the minority (because the world hates the red pill), but there's a consistent strategy for always being in the other 10% that the world (and especially the church) just isn't willing to embrace: become red pill.

Your post only makes sense if we're talking about the general population, not guys who know how to develop a solid frame, have a charming persona, pass fitness tests, etc.

if you ask a girl would you ever date this guy (let's call him a 4 and her an 8) - and she says, "absolutely not, ever."

Once again, the setup assumes the only criteria she has to go on is whatever picture you're showing her. If her only information about him is his looks, obviously the black pill's "looks are the only thing that matters" mantra is going to be rationalized by the conclusion.

But once again: get out of the "all you get to look at is a picture" examples and watch the 4 approach the 8 at the bar with actual game, frame, confidence, etc. and you're going to see a very, very different result.

This entire post is merely a long-winded way to say, "I don't think the red pill is true or that it actually works." Despite what hundreds of thousands of men on TRP have consistently found to be true, even using only a scientific foundation (i.e. observation and swapping notes), you're saying, "I don't buy it. I don't believe that mediocre-looking guy could ever actually get that total hottie." Instead, you're blaming looks and genetic lottery for some made-up cap in SMV - and only looking at one unique type of filter for relational initiation: image-based.

This is an incredibly disingenuous and misleading approach because it mistakenly causes other men to assume that non-picture-based approaches (ex. asking out an existing friend, co-worker, etc.) will follow the same conclusions as a picture-based framework arrives at. This is simply untrue and it is particularly vexing given that my primary proposed plan for finding a wife (as found in the "How to find the woman you can't keep yourself from banging" post on the sidebar) is not picture-based at all. So, if guys follow my advice, they're going to find very different results from what you're presenting - but if your post is not clear about its extremely narrow focus and application, you're going to give guys the wrong idea about when anything you've said actually applies and not.

So, to be very clear: when you say:

Any man reading this should realize #1 looks matter and #2 do the best you can with what you got.

You need to add the tag: "If your only means of finding a woman is a picture-based social media or dating app."

With that stipulation, I'd be far more inclined to entertain a few of the ideas you're presenting.

Is repentance required in order to be saved?

2 upvotes · 11 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

If someone accepts Jesus Christ as their Lord and Savior

and

but they don't repent

... that's impossible.

Calling someone "Lord" is not the same as them actually being your Lord. In Matthew 7 Jesus says, "Many will say to me on that day, 'Lord, Lord, did we not [do x, y, and z] in your name?' but surely I will say to them, 'I never knew you. Away from me you evildoer.'"

A "Lord" is someone you are submissive to on a macrological level. Your life is oriented around their goals and purposes. While you may maintain autonomy over your personal daily affairs, your entire life purposes are theirs to control. If it helps, think of a knight in King Arthur's Court, who would have called King Arthur their "lord." They lived only do carry out his vision and purposes, but the way they did it was at their discretion.

One of God's visions and purposes for us is to be sanctified. That means to conquer sin in our own lives in order to be more effective at the greater callings he has given us. If someone refuses to give up any particular sin, then they are denying Christ as Lord over their life.

Another way to look at it is this. How many sins does it take to condemn a person to hell? One. Genesis 3 and Romans 6:23 seem to make this clear enough. If you refuse to repent over one sin, but ask for forgiveness of the other 99.9%, even if 99.9% of your sins are forgiven, you still have that one. Right? So where does that leave you, in the end?

Met the church girl for coffee... How to proceed?

2 upvotes · 28 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

God is certainly good. But he's not good because a girl agreed to go out to look at Christmas lights with you. For all you know, she could end up being a crazy psycho woman who divorces you after 5 years of marriage, taking half your stuff. Would God still be good then for the date you got now? Still good: yes. For that reason: not at all.

Keep your mind open, lest you return to blue pill fantasies. Mistakenly assuming that God is orchestrating you going on a date to see Christmas lights is how blue pill fantasies, ONEitis, and idolization all creep in. She's not your soul mate. You don't even know if you're going to marry her. If you really do think God is the one orchestrating this, then you might as well just propose now. If you're not sure if God is orchestrating it or not, be cautious not to give credit to God for what might actually be coming from the enemy. There are still too many questions to have that fuzzy kind of attitude - which is also the source of a lot of unattraction.

Remember, you're the prize. If you have the attitude that you just won the lotto, her attraction toward you will greatly diminish. Either she'll lose interest because of your unattractive attitude toward her or she'll get an inflated sense of her own worth and assume she can pull better than you if a guy like you is so excited to get a date with her. And don't be so arrogant as to assume she can't sniff out that attitude on you because you're so great at hiding it.

I don't mean to beat you up, but you've got a good thing going for you and I don't want to see this blue pill attitude ruin that for you in the long run.

Disturbing Things in This Group

2 upvotes · 26 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Amen.

Worried about never being in a relationship

2 upvotes · 22 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Ah, not the OU by me then.

Soft next and hard next concept

2 upvotes · 20 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This has already been said (/u/Deep_Strength /u/OsmiumZulu and /u/rocknrollchuck all gave great answers), but it was framed as an alternative, not a continuation of the same spectrum. So let me clarify.

For single guys, the concept of nexting is a statement of how you'll spend your time. If a girl isn't, to you, worth the time you're investing in her, then you next her as a way of freeing up your time for something more valuable.

A soft next is when you stop initiating with her because you have better things to do, but if she's going to initiate with you, you're leaving that door open because a person or thing has greater value to you when you can reap that value with less effort. So, if she's going to be the one putting in all the effort to get your time and attention, her value rises, but you're perfectly fine walking away from putting in your own effort and spending your time and effort elsewhere instead.

A hard next is when you are confident that the value she adds to your life is so low (maybe even in the negatives) that even if she were to try to initiate with you, you're still better off spending your time and energy elsewhere.

In marriage, we're doing the same thing. A hard next is either divorce or legal separation. This is where you have some certainty that this person will no longer be able to contribute value to your life, even if you didn't have to put in any effort toward the relationship anymore. You simply want out. Biblically, I believe actual divorce is always sin, but that it's a preferable sin if remaining married would otherwise cause worse sin (i.e. the whole "because of the hardness of your heart" thing).

Soft nexting is simply focusing on the next thing in your life that isn't your wife because the effort you spend on your wife isn't justifying the value you reap for that effort. While singles may think that "next" refers to "next girl," I prefer to think of it as "next priority" on the list of things that matter to you. That's all.

