Ah, but biblically attraction and love are very, very different. Love is a code of conduct with an oriented direction. Attraction is more feelings-driven. I get the impression that she does love him deeply as a matter of behavior. I also get the impression that she has significant internal emotions for him, as he noted elsewhere her saying something about "You have my heart." But she just has a different physical type. I don't think his situation is as bad as he thinks it is.

I also think that for many women attraction is based on a bunch more things than physical appearance alone (which is a black pill principle, not a red one). So, she can still be highly attracted to him despite her disinterest in his physical appearance and he's just not seeing it because he's thinking from a black mentality instead of a red one.

It's even possible that she had an experience that frightened her -- perhaps she was attracted to an unsuitable person (say, a non-Christian)

Now that's an interesting thought! Care to elaborate on how this might affect a person? I know my own wife has been attracted to non-Christians more than me before and has felt shame over it.

I'd love some biblical feedback.

1 upvotes · 2 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Something's obviously not clicking here. I will say, I posted something similar as my very first post on askMRP and several of the responses I got were: "Some people are just too damaged to be fixed, even if you become RP." I got those responses because at the time I was trying to hold a pity party for myself, making it seem like my situation was more hopeless than it actually was. But you've been around the block enough to know this, it seems. Maybe yours really is one of those cases. Who knows.

Part of the disconnect I'm seeing is the whole catch-and-release thing mixed in with your professions of spiritual maturity. To be fair, I've made posts on this sub acknowledging that this type of conduct can be done in a non-sinful way, so I could give you the benefit of the doubt, but I have trouble doing it knowing that most guys probably do have sinful intent in why they're doing it in the first place, and I should probably go back and re-write some of those posts, if I had the time.

without changing my theology to suit my whims if I want to have sex again, I'm either going to wait until my wife dies or we're going to figure this out

As a man in the same boat as you, I can support and encourage this attitude. Don't back down from a theological conviction to appease your flesh. If you genuinely change theological views, that's fine, but don't let the flesh be the root of that change because you know it's always going to lead you astray. That's the whole point of the Spirit being the one to instill our convictions, not our flesh.

the church told me that God would make it all work out if I just found a godly man

There's a female version of the blue pill if I ever saw one. Matthew 6:33 is talking about daily provision, not all of our hopes, wishes, and dreams.

This is obviously normal comfort test garbage, so I reply in kind and pull her out of it and she offers to screw me again

Here's another part of that disconnect. She's saying she's not attracted to you, but she sees you handling your crap and being awesome and adding value to her life and pulling her out of her crazy woman feels and suddenly she wants sex with you ... and you don't believe her.

You say her words and actions align, but here's a clear example where her actions demonstrated that she got the tingles for you despite whatever she thinks of your looks, and you decided to listen to her words instead. Darn right you goofed!

Now, if you're really endorsed on MRP you'd know that a woman's SMV is based virtually entirely on looks and seduction. But you should also know that a man's is not. You're looking at how you evaluate women and assume she's evaluating you the exact same way. In reality, women do account for looks in a man's SMV, but they also account for his income, his charisma, his alpha/dominance/confidence, social status, leadership, etc.

In light of this distinction: It makes perfect sense for her to say, "Your looks, for me, are a low factor, but all these other qualities about you are still really attractive, add to your SMV, and make me enjoy having sex with you." You're saying you don't believe her anymore because she doesn't evaluate sexuality in men the same way you evaluate it in women. That's a big perception problem.

To be clear, you're expecting her to LOOK AT YOU and want to have sex with you when she's already said that your looks are not a sexual trigger for her. So what? Do you see how this makes no logical sense? Use one of the other attraction triggers that make up your SMV as something she can get into. You make good money? Go withdraw a few hundred ones and spread them across your bed and screw her on top of it. She likes that you're spiritually mature? Go read some racy passages with her and tell her you're going to do that to her right now as a way of "applying Scripture." You're a good leader? Like /u/rocknrollchuck said - you be the one to initiate and lead her into that bedroom. You should already know this stuff, but it's easy to forget it when in the midst of your own problems. If I had a dime for every time there was a simple solution to my issues that I couldn't see until someone with an outside perspective had to share it with me ... I'd have a big handful of dimes.

Now, you said elsewhere:

when I'm the one to initiate those are the times it's most common to get crummy sex that I end up walking away from. That fundamental responsive desire is not kicking in for her

I'm starting to wonder if you're not trapped in your own head here. You see this physical attraction issue as such an important thing that you're letting that shape how you perceive her during sex. Is she star-fishing you? What is it about that sex that makes it so bad? Or are you just perceiving it as crappy because she's not the one who initiated it, so you're assuming she must not be into it?

she is adamant that there was only one time where she had sex out of duty (which doesn't reconcile well to me)

Dude, that's exactly what I'm talking about. She's into it, you don't believe her, so you spoil the fun for yourself. Cut that crap out. Oh yeah, and ...

I've never faked an orgasm with you. The only reason I keep having sex with you is because you're so darn good at it.

So what if she doesn't find you physically attractive? You've got it made so much better than many other men here anyway. You've got no reason to be complaining. If this were r/BlackPillChristians that'd be a different story - but we're not for a reason.

Most of her "initiations" are things like ...

Yet you say that these are the times she's most into it. So, once again, is this a perception problem in how you're viewing her and she really is into it or are you lying to us about something?

She says it's not duty sex, but it sure feels like it a lot of the time, though we do have some passionate times too.

How is she moving her body differently between these two situations? Or is it that you're just not feeling passionate about it?

Look, I feel your pain. My wife was raised in that churchy culture too and it about killed our marriage with all the negative psychological garbage about sex that was impressed on her - and it still has an impact and causes problems for us. But you've got this stuff figured out. You've got a mission that she respects and presumably helps you with. You're leading your home, parenting your kids, getting crap done, etc. - and she sees all of this. She's not turning you down. You've got regular sex.

Things aren't perfect. They're never going to be perfect. If it wasn't your looks, it would have been something else. You're not a perfect 10 and you can't expect her to desire you as if you were one. If she's going to knock you down a peg or two for something, what does it matter if it's looks or any other of the factors that make up your SMV? The fact is that in her eyes you're still a solid 9 and she wants to screw you. Yeah, her initiations are weak, and you probably know the psychology behind that better than I do. But you shouldn't be looking for her to initiate in the first place - and be grateful you've got a wife willing to initiate at all!

Is this a thorn in the flesh scenario? I don't think your sex-life is. I think your perception about your wife's sexuality is. But who knows. Take that for what you will.

Homily on Ephesians 5:22-33 by St. John Chrysostom (On Marriage and Family Life)

1 upvotes · 2 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I guess I just believe that scripture came from the Church, not the other way around

Much of Scripture was written before the church. Its codification came from the church. That's a big distinction.

I don't believe in sola scriptura

I'm shaky on this myself. If people mean that the Scriptures are the only infallible authority, I'm not sola scriptura either. If they mean that it is the highest authority and the only one agreed en masse to be infallible, then I suppose I am sola scriptura. But I've heard the phrase used different ways. I do believe there are other authorities that are infallible, but that outside of scripture we're rarely ever going to reach a consensus on what those are.

Denominations are technically a heresy

You have to be careful with the word "heresy" because the Orthodox mean something very different by the word than everyone else. But overall, I agree with the idea that denominations are abiblical on the whole as a dividing line.

Do you mind if I ask what your disagreements with the Orthodox Church are?

There are many, but the two big ones are the necessity of baptism as a prerequisite to salvation and the incorporation of works into their soteriological framework. Apart from that, praying to the saints, emphasis on icons, transubstantiation, apostolic succession, etc.

Technically all the disciples and Church Fathers were "errand boys"

They were errand boys for Christ, not for one particular theological framework. There's a big difference there. As I've often touted on this sub, there's a fundamental difference between being devoted to the original mission from being devoted to the organization that allegedly attempts to fulfill that mission.

I feel that acquiring the virtues and leading by example through prayer, making sure the family goes to church, providing a moral standard (virtues) is the way to "lead" from what the homily says as well as what my priest said just now.

Prayer in that context is deferring leadership to God. That's why when Moses was praying God told him, "Why are you crying out to me? Tell the Israelites to move on." In other words, "Stop praying to me and go lead the people yourself."

Similarly, "making sure the family goes to church" is deferring spiritual leadership away from the man and toward the church. It's saying, "We should be following that guy." I mean, I guess you could say he's leading her to the guy who's going to lead her, but that doesn't do much for me. That's not to say we shouldn't involve our families in a local body; rather, we should not see that as an act of spiritual leadership in the home.

Providing a moral standard is much closer, but even then isn't going anywhere. It's just cutting off roads from where you shouldn't go. "Our family won't do this or won't do that because that's sin." That's the essence of morality. Leadership assumes an active direction with a path to follow.

But I do agree with the "leading by example" part. This is all covered in 208.

It felt like the Spirit

I know you mean well, but this is always a red flag in my mind - people connecting the Spirit with their feelings ;)

He emulates Christ better than most people I know, so that's why I respect his advice

Now that's a good reason :)

I do not believe that I am my own Pope

And I don't think Protestants think this either. We reject the concept entirely.

How do I know my interpretation is correct if I don't check what The Church teaches on the matter

How do you know the church is correct if you don't know what the Spirit teaches on the matter? Because the Spirit speaks through the Church. Okay, but how do you know the Spirit actually is speaking through the Orthodox church? I can't know definitively, but I have faith. So your faith is now in the church? That seems misplaced to me. This is how most conversations with Orthodox end up going.

I don't see it as "brainwashing" if I am conforming more to who Christ is in that "brainwashing"

I'm generally inclined to agree with you here if the message were pure. But when there are falsities mixed in with that process, it's a problem. After all, most efforts at brain washing involve reorienting people toward good goals with subtle, barely noticeable defects (what they want to brainwash you to believe) mixed in so that you take in the bad with the good. That's how it works.

We are all being "brainwashed" by something as we live life, aren't we?

Yes, but in some contexts it's more overt than others.

"how does one know what Truth is if they have no authority?"

The Spirit and sovereignty. Besides, and I know this is going to sound quite blasphemous: Christianity as a whole places way too much weight on truth and understanding. God is much less concerned with what we know than he is with what we do with that knowledge.

Consider when the disciples asked Jesus, "Lord, increase our faith!" Jesus said, "Sure, here's exactly how to do that" ... right? No. He says, "If you had faith like a grain of mustard seed, you could say to this mulberry tree, 'Be uprooted and planted in the sea,' and it would obey you." Translation: Don't worry about learning and growing. Start making use of what you already have. You have enough already for great things. Let God figure out how much he'll fill you along the way.

This is a very much RP concept as well: no more mental masturbation, start acting.

To that end, I will continue to engage with Scripture, but my focus is no longer to discern truth or attempt to understand the complexities of theology. I can coast on what I already know for that. My purpose is to relate with God as I apply what he's already given me.

The Church helps me discern that at times

This is a wise way to say it - not that the church definitively dictates this to you, but that it is a resource God has made available through which we should most often work.

considering scripture is apart of tradition, not the other way around.

And let me be clear again: no apostle wrote their letters with the thought process, "I am compelled by tradition to write this to you." Even if tradition was in their minds it would have been, "In my writing this I am creating tradition," and thereby Scripture is the creation of tradition (although I reject that view too).

The better conclusion is that Scripture is Scripture and the only thing that was produced by tradition is the canonization of Scripture. But when the books themselves were written there was no tradition involved in the act of the apostles putting pen to ink. Don't forget that distinction. Of course, I am very grateful for the tradition that canonized Scripture. I just don't give credit to tradition for having written the Scriptures themselves.

Homily on Ephesians 5:22-33 by St. John Chrysostom (On Marriage and Family Life)

1 upvotes · 1 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I hope I'm not coming across that way

I think it comes across that way due to your flair and the fact that you only post from Orthodox sources. I've really enjoyed our conversations, but there's a part of me that gets a little perturbed when I see a constant stream of Orthodox sources - not because there is anything wrong with being committed to the Orthodox Church (though I certainly have my disagreements), but because it makes you seem linear-minded. If you're getting 90% of your information from one source (the Orthodox church), it raises a question about the integrity of your knowledge and information. The Bible is the one exception, for God himself has said it is sufficient.

For this reason, you'll note that I often stick to quoting Scripture rather than any particular Protestant, Catholic, or Orthodox source - but that when I do address the different branches, I often read from all sources to ensure I understand all positions on a matter before I pray for discernment in the Spirit through Scripture which position is most sound. To that end, there are things I embrace out of Orthodoxy that the Catholics and the Protestants miss, just as there are things that the Catholics have figured out that the Protestants and Orthodox are missing out on, and the same for Protestantism. But when you only post Orthodox information it makes it seem like you're an errand boy for the Orthodox church, which is basically inviting people to challenge everything you say, which degrades the integrity of the otherwise good and valuable messages that you're trying to communicate :)

I just feel that he is saying the external is less important than the internal qualities of a woman.

From what you write, you and I are in total agreement. But I interpreted the author's words as saying we must explicitly reject the external appearances of beauty as a factor for consideration. I didn't see him saying to treat it as "lesser," but that we should disregard it altogether.

I would say that we are to strive for the Kingdom of God above anything else 100% on board here!

It is forthright about the husband being the leader/head of the female, and that the wife is second in authority ... men are to not only love, but to govern the household.

Yes, these are all good things. But even the most blue-pilled pastors will still preach the same things. This isn't a "red pill" mentality. It's a recitation of what Scripture says that blue pill priests/pastors can't deny because the Bible says so.

To discern if a pastor is preaching from a blue perspective or a red don't look at what he preaches; look at how he applies his preaching and how he asks others to apply it. The what should always be Scripture, but the how reveals one's underlying philosophies as distinct from theologies. In this particular homily, the refrain is "love, love, love," which makes it seem very blue to me and that he's trying to explain away the "leadership" passages with male obligation toward the woman.

"Yeah, husbands should lead ... I suppose I must admit that God said that because it's in the Bible and all ... but let's not forget the real important thing here: that husbands should be loving their wives." That's the impression this gives me.

I'm actually going to talk to my priest about that very topic today.

That's a great idea!

So I will get back to everyone about what he says as I think it would be edifying to this community.

And we're back to you being the errand boy for the Orthodox church. Hear out what he says, but also search the Scriptures yourself to see what the Bible says. As is noted in Act 17, Paul actually commends the Bereans for challenging every word he said and testing it against Scripture themselves before believing it. They are called "more noble" because of this attitude. I encourage you to be the same way.

I know this attitude is contrary to the Orthodox and Catholic view of Scripture, which is usually that the church must do all of your interpretation for you and you shouldn't dare think you're wise enough to interpret Scripture for yourself. So, it's easy to look to what some author of a homily said or what your priest said, because they often condition you to see them as the only authority of what the Bible says. But the Bible itself says this is not how it should be - that we should be testing our authorities all the time to ensure that they are maintaining Scriptural consistency.

Don't tell us what your Orthodox priest says. Tells us what the Bible says. And if your Orthodox priest helped you figure it out, that's fine too. But maybe look into Catholic and Protestant resources on the matter also.

I'm not sure if I'm making much sense here, but I'm very much opposed to the brain-washing that goes on in most denominations, of which Protestant denominations are no exception. I oppose it all. But the Catholic and Orthodox churches do seem to make a specific point of it with their authority structure on who's allowed to interpret Scripture and not.

Homily on Ephesians 5:22-33 by St. John Chrysostom (On Marriage and Family Life)

1 upvotes · 1 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

So, in a lot of your posts from orthodox sources I see individual quotes that you pull out that sound red enough, but when I read something like this, everything in the paragraphs after what you pasted is a litany of "love your wife this" and "love your wife that" and "she's one with you, so you should love her." That's not to say he's wrong; it's simply to say that his emphasis is no different than any other theologically-sound, yet philosophically blue-pilled church leader today. But maybe that's just my read of this. I just get the impression that the allegedly "red" bits of some of your posts are just picking and choosing a few key lines to make the orthodox church look better than other denominations.

As to your actual questions:

a single man should search for in a wife are "affection, gentleness, and humility" as those are the "tokens of beauty". What do you think on this?

He actually says "modest-mindedness" instead of humility, which I took more to mean an appreciation of and orientation toward modesty, although I could see how you could read humility in that too.

He also doesn't say they're the "ideal" traits to seek - he just says "let us seek [them] in a wife." He also immediately follows this with a rejection of "loveliness" as a thing to look for in a woman, basically crushing every RP sense of finding the hot wife and being sexually attracted to the person you're marrying. This seems to run contrary to 1 Cor. 7.

Of course, as he notes, affection, gentleness, and modesty-minded are all valuable traits in their own context, so I don't deny that we should seek them :)

How do you see "loving your wife as your own body"?

Well, the innuendo version of this would make it pretty darn clear how most men tend to love their own bodies ;)

As for the rest, we feed our bodies, we protect them from harm, we keep them in shape, we put them to good use and do God's work with them, etc.

Would love to hear your thoughts on other parts of the homily as well. What do you think?

I've already said a lot of it, but the gist of it is that it feels like more of the standard blue pill harping on how much we should love our wives as every other pastor preaches with very, very little imperative toward women on how to treat their men (it's there, but significantly less in comparison) and very, very little direction to men on how to lead other than saying in very vague terms, "lead her."

I do appreciate your submission here, as it's valuable to discuss these things. But this particular one did not resonate well with me. Sorry, brother - but keep up the good work on the search :)

Setting expectations for fat loss and muscle gain

1 upvotes · 28 April 2018 · /r/askMRP

Good to know.

My Story

1 upvotes · 28 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good to know.

My Story

1 upvotes · 28 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree, but the rationale is much more fundamental. It's the distinction between popular vote and hierarchical decision. We do not get to out vote God on matters of the church because we have no right or authority to do so. It is not a democracy. It's not even our church. It's God's. Regardless of what we do with it, we will still be judged by God's standard in the end. So his standard is all that matters.

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

1 upvotes · 27 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

As I've mentioned before, I'm not a house husband. I work full time, my wife works part time.

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

1 upvotes · 27 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Give me a quote from my post that you just replied to that disagrees with something biblical. I'm not going to entertain harassment, so either back up what you say or get permabanned for trolling.

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

1 upvotes · 27 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

What biblical concept of masculinity have I disagreed with?

Musings After a Wedding

1 upvotes · 27 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I tried. In his mind, he's already 34 and doesn't want to wait much longer to have kids. He sees this as their one chance to do something like this before they start trying for kids. He's prioritizing his goal of having kids by a certain time in his life over his finances.

Setting expectations for fat loss and muscle gain

1 upvotes · 27 April 2018 · /r/askMRP

Good point here too. I remember when my grip capped out at 315. I'll have to start using my grip clamps more often.

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

1 upvotes · 27 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Hmm ... the link gives a 404 error. But I'd be happy to review your book :)

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

1 upvotes · 27 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I've never seen "dread" used outside of the context of "threat,"

Well now you have ;)

If everything is being ascribed to game

Again, game only relates to those things which increase (most likely intentionally) one's attractiveness to women. This isn't as wide-spread as you seem to be making it out to be.

Perhaps a better example is hitting an object into a net. Soccer was certainly invented well before ice hockey. So can we say that "hitting an object into a net" is not part of hockey because soccer came up with it first? That just doesn't make sense to me.

I mean, I do understand what you're trying to argue - that because the Bible said something first, we should attribute it to the Bible primarily and not to anything else. But that attitude would create so many problems with an us v. them mentality that Christians would be even more hated than we already are. All of a sudden Christians everywhere would have to object to Buddhists, Atheists, Mormons, Hindus, Muslims, etc., saying that loving other people cannot be called part of their belief systems and moral code because the Bible came up with it first. Just because the Bible said something first doesn't mean the Bible has monopolized the concept so that no one else can claim or use it.

To add to this, most of the aspects where "game" and "biblical masculinity" overlap are employed for entirely different purposes. The Bible says virtually nothing about how to be attractive to a woman. So, if we're talking about increasing attraction, "biblical masculinity" sounds good, but it's out of context because the Bible never prescribes this as a cure to attraction issues. "Game" draws from the Bible (unwittingly) to acknowledge the impact that this biblically unrelated quality has on attraction, thereby making the application of that concept toward attraction unique to game in a way that the Bible does not address. So, while I appreciate what you're trying to do in separating "game" from "biblical masculinity," and I appreciate that you think I'm over-complicating it, I feel as if you're overly-simplifying things in a way that is very off-putting to people in the manosphere who would do better to understand a proper context for application of game with the goal of reorienting their purposes altogether, rather than just being put in an "us v. them" position where they must choose a side between game and anti-game.

You don't need the rest of whatever is left of 'game' In other words, you only need what is in the Bible.

I agree.

I'm not arguing about the small sliver that is non-overlapping.

But by saying "you don't need the rest of whatever is left of 'game'" you are - you're saying that whatever doesn't overlap (i.e. that small sliver of game that remains) must be rejected, but the rest employed as consistent with biblical masculinity.

But here's the catch: that's no different than a secular guy arbitrarily saying, "My moral code rejects that sliver of red pill game, but I embrace all this other stuff" - and it just happens to overlap, but it excludes the biblical aspects that don't overlap. Are you suggesting that this non-Christian man will be just as effective at fostering sexual attraction from his wife by employing "game" because he is only employing those aspects of secular "game" that overlap with the Bible, and therefore he doesn't need the sliver of biblical masculinity that is distinct from "game"?

If we're not talking about "the small sliver that is non-overlapping" then this is the only other conclusion - that the non-Christian "game" proponent who has a basic moral compass can be equally as effective as the "biblical masculinity" proponent.

Setting expectations for fat loss and muscle gain

1 upvotes · 27 April 2018 · /r/askMRP

Thanks for the tip, I'll have to try that out.

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

1 upvotes · 27 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Mars Hill

Oh, I thought you were talking about Driscoll's old church :p I follow now.

I'd be interested in seeing it (if possible)

<https://thereasonforlife.wordpress.com/>

He's helped me write virtually all of the content for this sub, so I consider it co-content, ergo us both presenting it in different ways to different audiences. That said, he is not a regular poster ... he goes in bursts, so you'll see 4 posts a week for a few weeks, then nothing for months at a time ... basically whenever it holds his interest. But comparing what he has to some of the sidebar content I have you'll notice what I'm talking about in the way of identical content with different terminology.

The manosphere is limited in that respect

Indeed. It's a large audience, but still a niche one.

I'm mainly trying to be rid of most of the language of the manosphere now as I write the book that can be hopefully be given to people in Churches.

Yeah, I've started a book that abandons a lot of the manosphere language as well. We'll see if/when I finish it ... I've got 3 other finished books that I want to edit and start working toward publication before I spend too much time on unfinished products. Best luck, though. Writing a book to completion is a grueling task!

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

1 upvotes · 27 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with most of the first chunk.

I prefer the definition of "dread" = making a woman aware of actions and consequences: "If she's not going to treat her husband right, another woman might."

That implies an actual threat, though. Most Christian implementations of dread don't require there to be a threat and can be quite positive and constructive in a relationship.

This is actually one of those conversations I've had with my wife more openly (not necessarily using manosphere terminology). She still jokes about the girl at men's warehouse who was getting handsy with me - and that turns her on, and the fact of her talking about it is what turns her on. That is, she openly acknowledges that other women being attracted to me makes me more attractive to her.

This form of dread has nothing to do with negative consequences. I hope I'm mistaken, but the way you communicate makes it seem like women are bad and need to be punished for their wickedness whenever they express it, and that this is most of how the marriage dynamic should work. My relationship with my wife is very different in that dread has nothing to do with negative reinforcement and everything to do with positive reinforcement. I believe this is how dread should be employed in marriages and that it's very fruitful for both, ergo my sidebar post on positive dread, which scratches the surface of this.

I agree that 3 is the most ideal, but some men do respond to 2 and 1.

Agreed.

Evidence

I see what you're saying, and I agree that "game" rips off of many biblical principles, then adds a few non-biblical ones too. But all of your bullet points are part of that overlap. So, how do we know that it's the "biblical masculinity" part that's solving the problem and not "game"?

Imagine I've got bronchitis. I take two separate antibiotics, A and B, that overlap a lot in function, but also have a few distinguishing traits for each. My bronchitis is cured. It's determined that the function of the antibiotics that cured me was within the overlap. Both pharmaceutical companies want to take credit for having cured my bronchitis so they can advertise another success story. Which company has the legitimate claim to being the cure?

If the cure was legitimately only in the overlap, then they both are legitimately a cure, right? So we can't say that "game" is not a "cure" when the aspects of "biblical masculinity" that function as a cure all also fall within the category of "game."

I'm not arguing that game actually is a cure - only that if you want to claim that game is NOT a cure, you have to demonstrate that the part that's not in the overlap - the part that is unique and distinct to biblical masculinity - is an essential component to curing the problem.

Given that there is a massive overlap between RP prescriptions and biblical masculinity, you've got only a small sliver to work with, and I'm skeptical that there is sufficient praxeological testing that's been performed to demonstrate that this component is vitaly necessary to curing sexual dysfunction in general.

Now, from a theological standpoint, I'm inclined to agree on the basis of faith alone, assuming we're on the same page with what "biblical masculinity" looks like in its entirety, which is a much longer conversation than is worth addressing here and now. And in my view, theology trumps praxeology anyway. But if the theological conclusion, when applied, does not produce the praxeological result we intend, we're left with one of a few options:

- Our theology is wrong.
- Our theology is right, but we applied it incorrectly.
- Our theology is right, but was never designed to address the problem we're trying to solve, for which there is no theological solution, and therefore we're back to secular methods to accomplish that goal.

Setting expectations for fat loss and muscle gain

1 upvotes · 27 April 2018 · /r/askMRP

If I bought some straps, I might try that. Right now I'm capping out what my fingers can hold before the bar slips out of my hand.

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

1 upvotes · 27 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Having a priority list is a useful heuristic reminder to not let other things become an idol, which we are so prone to doing.

I see where you're coming from, but this has also been a source of confusion for many. A priority hierarchy allows room for jumbling of those priorities. Having a singular priority from which all actions are derived leaves no room for confusion and makes it starkly obvious when someone is off-track.

Most Christian men there are opposed to anything to do with "red pill" or "game" as they've heard how "misogynistic" it is from various media sources.

I understand now. Yeah, as noted elsewhere, I'm a fan of using terminology that people will understand and receive. So, to those in the manosphere, using manosphere terminology seems appropriate as the most effective way to minister to them. To those outside of it, we're better off using terminology that they can receive and identify with. To that end, most of the stuff I've posted on the sidebar here is adapted for a non-mansphere audience on a friend's blog, which is shared with his entire church. The content is the same, but the word-choice and presentation is adjusted so that it can be well-received, and he has had a lot of positive feedback from it.

Whenever I mentor men in person I always do it from ...

I do likewise. But that's mostly because most men I disciple IRL have no clue what the red pill even is, so I use a framework that they can understand and communicate truth within that frame of reference and understanding. This is, after all, how Jesus adapted his communication patterns for different audiences.

The Mars Hill method

What's that?

the main issue I have seen seems to be a lack of discipling men away from the RP terminology and thought processes to more of a strict biblical thought process

Well, if they're to re-enter the manosphere to reproduce the process that I started, they're going to need to keep using that terminology. So, I don't see a reason for them to abandon the manosphere terminology while on this sub. But I do expect that they're not using that terminology in other contexts IRL where those they're ministering to are operating under a different mental framework.

To that end, comments and posts on this sub, even if directed at people like /u/akohlan198 and /u/cornthians12345, are still visible to the rest of the community and are often things that I actively want other people to read apart from the individual to which they're directed. So, I write comments as replies to specific individuals, but with an understanding that I have a broader audience of people who might not be ready for that transition. And to that end, I'm not sure why a transition would be necessary at all, as much as it's necessary simply for men to learn how to utilize terminology that communicates most effectively in the context in which they're speaking. If I go to Germany I'd probably be better off using German words than English words. If I go to church I'm better off using "churchy" words to communicate my points. And if I go to the manosphere, I'll be a more efficient communicator if I continue to use manosphere language. The issue is that I think your blog tries to blend the manosphere with the church, drawing from both to create something biblical and uniquely distinct from either, which creates a linguistic issue in how to be effective at reaching both crowds simultaneously. This sub doesn't try much to do that - it has a clear niche audience to the manosphere and does not attempt to pull the church-world into it, although the blog I referenced above which uses the exact same content does the reverse: it presents itself exclusively to the church and makes no effort to reach the manosphere. But I may be making assumptions here on you having a blended target audience :p

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

1 upvotes · 27 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree that biblical marriage is the solution. But as a rote matter of definition and categorization, that overlaps with "game" a lot anyway. Some people have natural game, some have to learn it ... just as some people are more inclined to naturally live out biblical masculinity and others have to learn it.

But the notion that "both husband and wife has conjugal rights over the other at all times" is a little more troublesome. To be clear, I completely agree with the premise. But in practice it leads to a lot of crappy duty sex if the wife isn't attracted. As has often been stated - and something I can fully affirm as a married man, bad sex is worse than no sex at all. So, the rote obligation of conjugal rights does very little to solve the problem that most men are looking to cure through their sexuality.

If we want to take it to that deeper level, when men say they want sex, they really mean they want something else that happens to be provided during sex. That could be rote physical pleasure, but it's more often an emotional intimacy, feeling of empowerment, the enjoyment of being desired, the satisfaction of knowing he's "man enough" to please a woman, or some other psychological longing. These longings (physical pleasure notwithstanding) are really meant to be satisfied in Christ through the Gospel, which is the actual cure (as opposed to "biblical marriage" or "biblical masculinity").

Anyone, men or women, can repent of their sin at any moment.

Unless you're a Calvinist, in which case we have no power to do so and it only happens in God's timing at His will and discretion. I'm not necessarily a Calvinist, but I do acknowledge that there are legitimate lines of theology that indicate that humans don't have the power to repent on their own and that God doesn't necessarily always allow a person to repent or draw them to repentance at all times - that sometimes God lets people wallow in certain sins for a period of time for whatever purpose he might have for them in that.

I agree with the rest of what you said too. The only point of clarification is that if, as I believe, hypergamy is God-designed, then a man "adapting" to biblical expressions of hypergamy is not a man adapting to sin, it's him adapting out of his own rebellion to embrace God's original design for women and how to interact with them.

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

1 upvotes · 27 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

"Do we do what attracts women?" VS "Do we just be men?"

That clarifies a lot. I wish I was around for those debates.

this definition right here already puts the man who employs Game in the Frame of women

I agree. As I noted in another comment, one of my biggest complaints with MRP is the duality of (1) don't be in a womans frame, and (2) let female hypergamy define everything about how you interact with them.

The standard MRP response is that #1 applies to individual women and #2 is okay because it applies to all women as a whole, so if you have abundance you can just leave the individual woman you're with and find another whose expression of hypergamy is more aligned with your own interests. This obviously doesn't work in a christian context.

Why does it even matter what a woman finds attractive?

It depends on the goal. If a man's goal is simply to be the best man he can be - or for Christians, a godly man - then it doesn't matter at all.

If the goal is to get sex, then the conclusion of employing game makes sense. We all agree that the natural cultural influence leads to stifled sexuality. If we take AWALT to be true and that women won't change, the only rational conclusion is that the man must adapt to accomplish the goal. The only alternative conclusions are to deny the underlying premise (AWALT and won't change) or to abandon the goal of sexuality.

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

1 upvotes · 26 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Another thing I thought of ... it seems like your beef with proponents of game is not in the methods themselves, but in the goal those methods are trying to accomplish. You blur the line a lot with several comments about attraction, but it seems your primary goal is not to increase attraction in the wife toward her husband, but to increase submissiveness, obedience, and respect. Game proponents have an entirely distinct goal of increasing sexuality.

You then say you are anti game because it does not cure a problem it never promised to fix. That's like saying, "I'm anti advil because it doesn't cure brain cancer." Advil never purported to be a cure for brain cancer in the first place. But it is far more effective in its own context of curing a headache than a brain surgeon would be, right? Sometimes there is cancer causing the headache, but most of the time there isn't.

If a guy's goal is to fix a dead bedroom with his christian wife, for example, is there any evidence that the "cure" for rebellion and non submissiveness is also the exact same cure to sexual dysfunction in the marriage?

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

1 upvotes · 26 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I agree with everything you've written here. The only bit I disagreed with before was your saying "women stay because of who you are." If who you are sucks, they won't stay. That's a proven fact, especially in my line of work. Also, even if "who you are" is great, the reason they stay isn't because of that - it's because of what "who you are" can offer them. That's what keeps them around. Even if you're the most amazing, impressive person alive and with a heart of gold at that ... if you're not offering anything to her from that - that you only direct your awesomeness to other people than her - then she will leave. You could be the best provider in the world, but if you direct all of your provision to the starving children in third world countries and you don't put food on the table for her and her children to eat, she doesn't care about how great you are as a provider - because it's not directed at her.

Who you are doesn't matter. What you have to offer her does.

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

1 upvotes · 26 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'd be interested to see what you would define "game" as or what you think the traditional way it's been used in the manosphere.

I just did that in another comment, but the short summary is that game is anything a man does that attracts his woman, and some would add the requirement that he intends it for that purpose.

To that end, you act like red pill prescriptions (AA, AM, negging, etc.) are the definition of game, whereas the manosphere is much broader, calling even blue pill strategies "game" - they just say it's bad/ineffective game ... but it's still game because it's something they're doing for the purpose of attracting a woman. Then there's the question of "attracting to what?" because blue pill guys are exceptionally good at attracting women into relationships, but not into sexuality ... but that's another conversation :p

What you're really referencing is a philosophical foundation to a certain branch of methodologies within the broader categorization of "game." To be clear, nothing you've said even says those methods should not be employed - only that the philosophical premise for which they are utilized by the secular community is faulty. To that end, I agree with you, if that's what you really meant. But if I'm misunderstanding you and you really did mean that all forms of trying to attract a woman are "game" and therefore you are against all of them ... then we must inherently differ.

"spinning plates" is sinful ... "agree and amplify" almost every Christian would probably say is "benign," but doesn't dig to the heart of the problem: her bad attitude and/or bad behavior

But one major method of "game" is negative inquiry, which does inherently get to the bottom of sinful behavior - which is why it's my favorite to employ. I agree with you that most stuff prescribed by secular RP amounts to little more than deflection tactics, rather than actually dealing with the problem - and I have often criticized those tactics for being just that. But that doesn't mean they are devoid of all use or cannot be employed in a productive, God-honoring context that does further the mission to increase submissiveness on the wife's part. In fact, I would wager that most aspects of the game methodologies you're referencing do naturally lead toward that end.

From there I see an internal conflict. You say at one point in the original post that caring about her submissiveness and obedience is more important than convincing her from a mental/internal perspective. But when you talk about "the cure" it seems to be more about correcting an inward orientation of her heart - a rebelliousness from the inside and not merely her external behaviors. So which is it?

- If it's just about behaviors, then both "godly masculinity" and "secular game methods" (of which there is overlap) can both be very effective at accomplishing the end-goal.
- If it's more about the internal acceptance and understanding (which you said it is not), then deflection methods will not work ... but I'm not convinced your suggested method of employing "godly masculinity" will either - a simple rebuke and correction.

In the latter part, between the two I'm actually inclined to believe that the allegedly secular methods of game are actually more effective at reorienting a person inwardly than a rebuke and correction. Certainly a woman needs to be rebuked when the situation calls for it, but the other line of game methods creates a natural internal bent toward a submissive attitude by the woman toward her man. It is designed to facilitate her internalizing his spirit (in the form of his attitude, frame, etc.) of the relationship so that she is aligned internally with him, much like we internalize God's Spirit to adopt his attitude, frame, etc. and become aligned internally with him. I do not see "rebuke and correct" as being nearly as effective in this process.

To that end, depending on the maturity of the people and relationship, God handles things differently over time. When humanity was in its physical youth, God did a lot of rebuking and correcting, just as we do to our physical children, just as we do with those who are spiritually young and immature. But as humanity became older God became more example-driven. Instead of much rebuking and correcting of his followers, we see Jesus just living in front of them as an example for them to follow. He did rebuke and correct, but it was much less and he employed more of the aspects of "secular game" than what you call "godly masculinity." And after Jesus ascended, when humanity was finally ready and mature enough to receive God's Spirit, we see that God virtually never does a rebuke and correct (though he certainly leaves room for his church to do that for those who are spiritually young and immature); rather, he imparts his spirit to us and leads through internal transformation and not external behavioral modification. In the same way, I expect that we should treat matured relationships with a focus on internal transformation and not on external behavioral modification. The exception is if you are married to someone who is spiritually immature.

I guess my point in all of this is that if a man was to call his masculinity "godly" it must account for all of how God interacts with humanity and not just how God did it in the old testament.

a slave to passing her hypergamous testing

I agree with this entirely. I have often criticized MRP for having a split dual ideology: (1) don't get in a woman's frame; and (2) let the woman's hypergamy define how you interact with her. This makes no sense to me. They explain it away by saying that #1 applies to individual women, but #2 applies to women as a whole, and therefore a man can remain "masculine" because he doesn't have to submit to any one person's hypergamy - he can find a woman who's expression of hypergamy is more aligned with his interests. Meh ... I'm not entirely convinced.

In other words, "biblical marriage" does everything "game" does but better because it calls out her behavior and helps her repent and learn to control and/or turn away from it.

Other than "rebuke and correct" I'm not sure I've seen anything else from you that describes how it affects her internal orientation to/from God and to/from her husband. I suppose if you elaborate on this we'd probably be much closer in agreement.

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

1 upvotes · 26 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I think I follow. I don't necessarily agree, but I see better what you're saying.

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

1 upvotes · 26 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm confused ... what?

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

1 upvotes · 26 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That was the same thought I had. The whole time I'm confused about how he's defining game.

Blue Pill after God

1 upvotes · 26 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is an interesting comment, but it raises a couple questions:

1. What causes you to believe hypergamy is sinful and not part of God's intended design for women? My review of scripture is the opposite - that hypergamy itself is part of intended design, but as with all things it has been applied in sinful ways.
2. Why do you believe it's a myth that godliness is attractive to [Christian] women? I would wholeheartedly disagree with this assertion with respect to authentic godliness. The issue is that godliness requires a proactive and eternal purpose and being disciplined to carry it out, whereas the church generally tempers the word down to mean simply "someone who doesn't sin often."

Thoughts?

Blue Pill after God

1 upvotes · 26 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Hmm ... this is certainly an interesting notion, and I applaud your creativity. But I think it is rooted in a fundamental misunderstanding of what it means to be "red pillled" or "blue pillled." Your presumption seems to be that women are blue pillled and that this is appropriate.

In reality, as is often acknowledged on MRP, women are inherently red pillled. They understand the fundamentals of game and attraction. Their own hypergamy is what controls most of it. Hypergamy is a red pillled concept when applied to women, and that is the foundation of where all their dreams and fantasies come from - wanting the alpha to reproduce with and the beta-provider to meet all their needs. The red pillled blend between these two qualities is the oak.

To that end, I would suggest that men should not be blue pillled with regard to our relationship with God. If anything, Christ's bride (the Church proper and not just individual people) should embrace hypergamy - to want the best man who is an oak, who is both entirely alpha and attractive, but also a provider and protector. Simply put, that is God. There are none better. If Christ's bride were to have a hypergamous desire, it is already and only fully satisfied in God alone.

Once hypergamy is satisfied in its maximum possible potential, the fantasy goes away, as it becomes reality. In Christ we have that reality. We have no need to fantasize about what could be or what comes next because we already have the fullness of God available to us in the present.

Musings After a Wedding

1 upvotes · 24 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

She actually does a lot of speaking. She often has to give hour long lectures to groups of around 50-75. So, 150 seconds is really nothing, though she's never fully gotten used to it. It's more the other insecurities from the wedding as a foundation and this as the straw that broke the camel's back. It also had a short turnaround, being given this assignment late Saturday and having her mini speech this morning only 2 days later.

Musings After a Wedding

1 upvotes · 24 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

She was told she had to give a 150 second speech to 100 people and she gets nervous about public speaking. That was it.

What parts of "Game" should a RP Christian utilize? Which ones should we not utilize?

1 upvotes · 20 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I didn't say, "Set aside for Bob Jones." Someone else can mean anyone else. But yeah, she could potentially end up single for life. That's just very rare for women.

Phil's April Update

1 upvotes · 20 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Some people are natural thinkers and others are natural feelers. No matter which you are, you can - and should - learn to be proficient in the other. There should be no faking it. You should just learn to be a well balanced person regardless of where your default position is.

For example, every person's default position in life is to be an idiot who leeches off the provision of others (their parents). Then we go to school to become intelligent and self sufficient. There is value in being ignorant and dependent on others at times. There's also value in being knowledgeable and independent at times. We need to learn both skills - but especially the one that is not natural to us.

Do the same in your situation. Don't fake it. Be it. Only fake it if that's what you have to do to figure out what it looks like to make it.

Phil's April Update

1 upvotes · 20 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

By understanding I mean having a right perception of what's actually going on. Most people who are highly emotional in a given situation let their emotions affect their perception away from reality into fantasy. This is the core of all oneitis.

To be clear, it's situation specific, not person specific. So, you can be highly intellectual in most situations, but an emotionalist in this one case.

Phil's April Update

1 upvotes · 20 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The cure to emotionslism is understanding. The cure to intellectualism is feeling. We all have our struggles. You're on one end, but you should see my conversations with intellectuals who have no heart and don't understand why their life sucks.

Phil's April Update

1 upvotes · 20 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

How does her sleeping with other guys or partying negatively impact your life?

Do you have bets going that she won't, so it will bring you financial detriment if she does? Is the hypothetical guy she's sleeping with your best friend, so it will affect your relationship with him? Is it that you think she'll go partying with your boss and say something embarrassing to get you fired? What actual detriment does her conduct cause to your life (as opposed to your emotional state)?

My guess is that it doesn't negatively impact your life at all. It's more about you not getting what you want. That sucks. Oh well. It's not hurting you though. Do you get this emotionally invested in not winning the lotto too?

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 10 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Those whose "faith is strong" wouldn't make such rookie mistakes. Besides, all things are to be tested against scripture. If what he says isn't contrary to scripture, why should I care in the first place? And if it is, I have clear proof he is wrong. It's not as gray as you're trying to make it seem.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 10 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I wouldn't trust him. But that doesn't mean an immediate need for medication either. And to be clear: that's a scenario that had recurred many times in my life.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 10 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It's more nuanced than that, but you seem to have the gist of it. It goes something like this:

- In OT times God spoke directly and audibly through the prophets as God the Father to tell us who he is and what he expects.
- In the gospels, God showed us who he is by action and example through the person of Jesus.
- After Jesus ascended, God now speaks through the Holy Spirit by indwelling within us, transforming us into who he is and to have the natural impulse to do what he expects.

In light of this, as I have often said on this sub, the Spirit rarely (if ever) tells us God's will. He transforms us into the type of people who don't need to be told in the first place - and His Word is the vehicle through which we travel to get there.

That's not to say God can't speak through verbal means; rather he doesn't. This part I wouldn't call impossible, but it's certainly rare, if it happens at all ... and whatever is said will never be inconsistent with the Word.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 10 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That would make it all the more suspect. God doesn't speak through voices like that anymore - not since before Jesus.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 10 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I then said immediately after that we were only talking about an abstract hypothetical - not reality.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 10 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

God won't contradict himself, especially as expressed through His Word. So, what you're suggesting is not God telling someone to do something. You're referencing someone wanting to do something and deluding themselves into believing it's from God. As noted previously, that is not a heart oriented toward obedience, so it's sin. Again, perception is not what defines the skin. Actual orientation does, which God weighs and measures.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 10 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I disagree ... not sure how your logic follows there.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 10 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

If it was a clear command from God, yes, I would do it. But we're only talking in an abstract hypothetical. The bible is clear that God will no longer ask things like that in a post gospel world. The wars of the past were only a physical expression of what Ephesians 6 now says is a battle against spiritual forces and not against flesh and blood. This transition from the physical to the spiritual is something I talk about a lot here.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 10 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That poll would probably be more appropriate for r/truechristian. Although I've entertained the conversation, this entire thread has nothing to do with RP.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 10 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, if God says do it, I do it. There is no line. That's the whole point of the story of Abraham going to sacrifice Isaac.

Of course, I'm going to question some things a lot heavier than others. God asking me to pray with a stranger, I might do on a whim; but asking me to sacrifice my son ... I'd have to go through quite a bit to confirm the command was legitimately from God.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 9 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not sure what you're asking then. Obedience to God at all cost is the line.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 9 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yes, when God's will conflicts with man's laws, we are compelled to break man's law in order to maintain obedience to God. Those situations are rare, but ever increasing in America.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 9 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The whole point of my position in this thread is that we do right by God and accept the consequences that brings in this life. If we break human laws we submit to the consequences of our human authorities.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 9 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I already told you: the police investigation is the example I had in mind. But you're still looking at the conduct to define morality. God looks at the heart. It's not even an issue of emotional state, as your previous question about guilt implied. I can feel guilty while never having done anything wrong. Morality is in the reason for which you do something, accounting for God's Word.

To be clearer, it's about the orientation of a person's heart. Regardless of how a person intellectualizes their behaviors, God knows when their orientation is toward genuine obedience and love for God, rather than justifying their conduct. And that is a standard I readily submit to, acknowledging that Jesus stands in my defense as often as I fail.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 9 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

anything a non believer does, if not for god's purposes, is evil. Anything. None of it is good unless god is involved?

- Romans 14:23 - "Anything that does not come from faith is sin"
- Hebrews 11:6 - "And without faith it is impossible to please God, because anyone who comes to him must believe that he exists"
- Isaiah 64:5-6 - "But when we continued to sin against [your ways], you were angry. How then can we be saved? All of us have become like one who is unclean, and all our righteous acts are like filthy rags."
- Romans 3:10-12 - "None is righteous, no, not one; no one understands; no one seeks for God. All have turned aside; together they have become worthless; no one does good, not even one."
- Romans 8:8 - "Those who are in the flesh cannot please God."

I could keep going ...

The discrepancy is that you're viewing morality as some abstract standard that transcends all things - even God. Your implication is that there are some things that are definitively right and definitively wrong and that these are universal.

In reality, all morality is subjective. I have one set of morals, you have another, the judge in court who decides whether we go to prison, pay a fine, or get off the hook might have a third, etc. Similarly, God has his own moral standard and he will judge the world by that standard.

To that end, God's moral standard is appropriately self-interested. That is, if something pleases him it passes his standard; if it doesn't please him it fails his standard. To say that this is "wrong" or "bad" is to act as if there is something higher than God that can exist as a judge over God - and I'd love to see whatever super-divine revelation people use to reach those conclusions.

In reality, most people say, "Well, we humans all pretty much agree on some of these moral issues, and we think God's wrong, so God must be evil by our standards." That's all well and good, but you're still going to be judged by His standard whether you like it or not. God is the one who decides what is good and what is evil. There is no super-divine standard of good and evil that God just happens to claim to align with - He IS GOOD and IS NOT EVIL not because these things have a meaning of their own, but because his existence defines those terms for the Christian.

As a non-Christian I understand that you don't believe in God, which means you have to find another source for defining good and evil. When you've found that source, you then want to pit that source against anyone else's standard that doesn't align with yours. Again, that's fine for the limited context of living your own life, but you're still going to be judged by God's standard anyway. In a battle between your source for your standard and God, I'm confident God is going to win and your source material for your standard will not be able to excuse you or defend you against God.

So, if it pleases God, it's good. If it doesn't, it's evil. It's as simple as that. That is the entirety of morality. The fact is that most of secular morality is derived from the fact that God ingrained his character in our hearts through creation so that we would inherently share his morality. The ways we have deviated since then are as a result of our rebellion against God, thereby breaking the original intent for morality and rationalizing that somehow we know better, just as Satan did when he rebelled against God.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 8 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Your call. If it's between legalism and antinomianism, I'd suggest legalism is the better of the two, but it's best to find a balance.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 8 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I thought a sin was a sin

That's a common misconception. The new testament refrains in a number of places that some things are sinful for one person and not another. There is no hard list of sins, and even if there were, something like pirating intellectual property couldn't possibly have been contemplated 2000 years ago.

There are underlying principles that make every action capable of being sinful or not sinful. I've used examples here in the past of watching child pornography for non sinful purposes, and most people end up agreeing.

The bible is clear enough that sin is not from the law, but from our hearts. The law only exists to make us conscious of the sin in our hearts. Never confuse the law and sin as being unduly intertwined.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 8 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed. Plus, there's a difference between rationalization, which comes from a philosophical premise, and a theological framework. Rationalization seeks to justify desired behaviors with scripture.

That is the very reason I repeatedly say in this and his last post that OP's heart and attitude make the result sinful no matter what path he chooses, even if it wouldn't be sin for someone else. He just wants to justify getting his way and not feel guilty.

A theological framework accepts our freedom in christ as a foundation and utilizes faith and acceptance of practical consequences of our actions as a driving force for steering or behavior within the bounds of faith.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 8 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I can see how it comes off that way. But it all boils down to who you believe decides right from wrong. If the government dictates morality and God changes his will to adapt to whatever the government says, that leads to one conclusion. If God decides, then the government cannot legislate sin, so we must necessarily determine an alternate rubric. The totality of what I have proposed, and not just the isolated line you quoted, comes straight from Scripture.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 6 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Haha ... you're funny. But it's also sad how much you're lost in your own head. The sheer ignorance in this comment, despite your greatest efforts to sound impressive ... it's stunning. Stop being so defensive.

If you want to pirate, go pirate. But stop trying to use this sub to make you feel good about yourself. This isn't a sub about pirating and you clearly don't want a biblical opinion, only backing yourself up with human philosophies. This is clearly not the place for you if you just want to lead others down in your own stubbornness.

Is Sex Outside of Marriage a Sin? An Official Stance.

1 upvotes · 5 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well said. This is very insightful.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

1 upvotes · 5 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I was reluctant, yet open with a lot of what you said up to the "taxing is robbery" bit. The line about not "owing" anything to the government, and therefore Paul really means we shouldn't pay them because we don't owe them anything ... I'm not buying it. That goes against the obvious plain meaning of what Paul is saying in Scripture (theology) as well as the basic philosophical premise of taxation in the first place.

Now, I'm about as conservative and small-government-minded as they come, but even I acknowledge that someone needs to pay for the roads we all drive on, to inspect the restaurants we eat in, to maintain a military to protect the country from invaders, etc. There are some legitimate expenses that must be met on a communal level. Asking the citizens to privately fund many of these things would never work. Yet the government provides these services anyway, and they are services that benefit us whether we asked for them or not. Is it robbery? You make a good case for it. But can we really say we don't "owe" it? I think not.

Similarly, when you bring up sales taxes, you're forgetting the contributions the government plays in the process. If you cut a deal with your neighbor and it turns out he defrauded you with the goods he sold, (1) who created the law that prohibits him from defrauding you, and (2) who are you going to turn to in order to prove his fraud, and (3) if he is found in fraud, who is going to enforce the penalty of his crime against you? The legislature, judiciary, and executive branches, respectively. Again, they're forcing you to pay them to ensure that this legal backdrop exists, and a case can be made that this is robbery. But it's not a blanket theft, where one takes and gives nothing in return. They are providing a service and if you want to use the threat of that service as a means of ensuring business transactions between private parties are generally safe to engage in with minimal risk of defraudment - that is a value added that the government provides, and there is something owed to the government for that service, regardless of whether or not we asked for that service.

Now, being an attorney I like to think in a legal context, so suppose I get a class-action lawsuit that comes through my door. There are millions of people in the affected class. Individually, each of them would only be entitled to about $100, but spread across those millions, there's a serious paycheck to be had in order to right a serious wrong that's been done. So, I take the case and work with maybe 50 people from the affected class who function as witnesses in quite a large case. We work on the case for 7 years and have 10 employees devoted exclusively to that case, who I pay at an average rate of $150,000 per year (i.e. $10.5 mil over time). We also spend $10mil in legitimate business expenses to fund our operation on the case, including needing a bigger office to house the new employees to handle the case, utilities to run the place, internet access, legal research engines, pricey expert witness fees, etc.

At the end of the day, we win with a verdict of $500 mil. The case is a smashing success. I have a fee agreement approved by the court that says I get paid my full hourly rate for the case in the amount of 10% of the verdict - $50 mil. A normal fee agreement for something like this would be closer to 33-40%, so it's clear I'm working at a bargain price compared to every other attorney.

Now, everyone in the affected class is going to get an $80 check. The 50 people I worked with on the case have no problem with this. Every other person in the protected class, by the millions, starts objecting saying that they don't think they should have to pay me because they didn't agree to my fee. Of course, it would have been impracticable for me to get a signed fee agreement from every person in the affected class. They want their full $100 check for the case I just won them. Should I be paid my rightful fee?

The answer is an obvious and resounding: YES! It doesn't matter that they didn't agree to it. They got the benefit of my services, which added value to them that they would not have gotten if I had not done the work. The service I provided was something that they could not have possibly gotten on their own, unless someone in the protected class was willing to spend over $20 million to win a case to collect a $100 check.

I just forced my labor and services on someone else to their benefit and I expect compensation for those services. I believe it is both legal and moral that (i.e. your category 1) that I be paid my fair fee. If people were allowed to opt out of paying my fee, I would go bankrupt.

This situation happens every single day in law offices. It happens in the business realm also, even in a capitalist economy. It's not surprising, then, that the government does the same thing. In fact, it's most necessary from a governmental angle. As much as I hate governmental interference and push for a reduction in taxes, a total elimination of taxes altogether would not be good for society because there would be no way to fund the countless things that people would not otherwise privately chip in to pay for.

Intellectual property exists and can be interacted with but cannot be defended pro-actively but only re-actively.

First, reactive defense is still a line of defense. As I often tell my clients, the entirety of the law is reactive. We cannot accuse people of crimes before they have been committed. We cannot sue someone for breaking a contract that they haven't yet broken. We cannot make custody determinations based on what a person might do in the future. But that doesn't mean those crimes, contracts, and children aren't very important - enough to use reactive protection as a deterrent.

Also, you can note that virtually all intellectual property that is often pirated has encryption measures put on, which is about the same thing as a fence. But those measures aren't perfect. Piracy is someone pulling out their bolt cutters and chipping away at the fence so they can take what's inside, working around the encryption, or just climbing over to take it. Even the people who use video cameras at movies are working against the "fence" of movie theater employees who periodically patrol and look for this kind of stuff. The fact that the fence is easy to get around, in comparison to the piracy techniques, doesn't change the fact that it's there.

Here's the real deal: Paul wrote Romans 13 as a man who spent most of his life running from the law. If by "submit to your governing authorities" he actually meant, "Obey every law they ever make," then he would be condemning himself for not turning himself in, along with every other Christian Nero (his governing authority) was trying to have killed.

Instead, we see Paul "submitting" to his governing authorities by setting his eyes on God as his primary aim, and accepting the consequences, wherever that took him. That doesn't mean he couldn't present a legal defense, as he did. But it did mean that he was okay with violating statutes and submitting to the penalty. That is submission.

In that sense, whether I'm smuggling Bibles into North Korea or cocaine into America, it doesn't matter. The act of my smuggling is unlawful, but it's not sin itself unless I refuse to accept the due legal penalty for my actions. Similarly, if I park in a handicapped spot, the act of breaking the the state statute about handicapped parking is not sinful; rather, it would be sin if I then refused to pay the parking ticket I got for doing so, unless I could legally defend it. Of course, there are likely other sins associated with many of these types of actions, but violating a legislative statute is not one of them. My heart and motive would be, along with the effect and implication of my actions.

To that end, I don't care if someone wants to pirate or not, as long as they're willing to accept the legal consequences for their actions if they are pursued.

What I'm more concerned with, as /u/rocknrollchuck alluded to in his reply, is the orientation of a person's heart. The fact of most incidents of piracy is that people are looking to consume more of the world, when in reality their hearts and minds should be oriented away from the world. Rather than increasing life comforts, which placate us away from a ministry of discipleship, we should be engaging in actions that advance that ministry. Watching TV could be part of that. Even pirating certain media could contribute to this purpose. But OP has made it clear that his purpose is his own entertainment, not to utilize the pirated content for the purpose of advancing a mission to make disciples. To that end, his intent in wanting to pirate is a sinful intent, regardless of whether it violates some biblical command or not. To that end, with regard to biblical law, he's probably in your category 2, or with regard to human law, in your category 4 - although the exact same actions with a different motive could fall into either category 1 or 3.

Piracy: Pharisaism or Libertarianism?

1 upvotes · 2 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I take it more as: Let the chips lay where they fall. If God put you in one life context, accept it and make the most of it. Culture is screwed up. Don't go out of your way to ingest more of it. I can't help but agree with the sentiment. The classics always become available for free when the copyright expires or if someone has a decent library within driving range.

Social Influence and Defying Context

1 upvotes · 31 March 2018 · /r/TheRedPill

The money you make off of new clients like him will, in the aggregate, contribute to you getting laid.

marriage prep: confront her with my past sexual sins?

1 upvotes · 30 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Of course. But that can't really apply where God's Word doesn't give a clear answer.

Is there anything we as young men we can do to slowly dispel a Jezebel spirit with RP principles?

1 upvotes · 29 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I don't feel compelled to greet her or to not greet her. Sometimes I say hello before she does, and she responds. Other times she say hello, and I'll respond. Other times, neither of us will say a thing, and we leave it at that.

What about the situation where she says hello and you don't respond? Would that be awkward or feel unnatural to you? That's what I'm talking about - that's where you feel compelled.

My wife does this to me all the time. "I love you, honey," expecting an ILY back. Most of the time I simply reply, "Goodnight," and leave it at that. Why? Because I don't feel compelled to say "ILY" to my wife just because she said it. Sometimes I don't even respond to her at all - especially when she's just saying something in passing and isn't really interested in my attention. If she wants my attention, love, and affection, she knows how to get it. But these social niceties of "you must say ILY back to your spouse if they say it to you" is garbage that a man must learn to ignore if he wants to be his own man and not controlled by worldly ideologies.

That's not to say it's bad for me to say ILY back to my wife. What's bad is the feeling of compulsion that I have to respond. I don't have to do anything.

she definitely is not a christian

Then your speech to her needs to be modified: "Hey, things have definitely changed between us. I'm not sure exactly what happened. I was totally into you, but you're not a Christian, so I never pulled the trigger. Admit it or not, you seemed into me too and I'm betting you got upset when I never did anything about it, which has made things weird. Sorry if I led you on at all, but I do value your friendship. I'm grabbing lunch/coffee/whatever after class and I'd like you to join me. If not, no worries."

Although I strictly prohibit evangedating, there's nothing wrong with a guy having a female friend who he's trying to share the Gospel with over a long period of time. If this brings the friendship back where you want it, all the better. But if you think this is going to tempt you to be more than friends with her, then ignore this advice and just ignore her as well. Don't put yourself in a position of being tempted to sin (i.e. dating a non-Christian, I'm not even talking about sex with her).

I get that it is unique because for the first time I haven't been able to just ghost/run

Ergo the ancient saying: "Don't crap where you eat."

Maybe i'm projecting

Here's the thing about projecting: if you're uncertain whether or not you're projecting, you're projecting. Not projecting is when you actually know the answer with some degree of certainty.

my connection to God is weak

Find someone to disciple you. Go to a church on campus and ask around for a mature believer. Find a parachurch ministry on campus and get involved and ask around for someone to disciple you. You've got options. I know you've got a full schedule. But some things are too important to get dropped off the priority list.

Tag: /u/rocknrollchuck - because there's some unique information here that I didn't see elsewhere in this thread and it changes the game quite a bit.

Is there anything we as young men we can do to slowly dispel a Jezebel spirit with RP principles?

1 upvotes · 29 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

if you truly do, please let me know

I do.

walk away with whatever small dignity I still have

The conversation is how you get your dignity back. Your dignity is not dependent on whether or not she accepts you/rejects you. It is dependent on whether or not you can be your own man, not controlled by social stigma.

it is a bit late to have the talk.

You're the third person I've had to tell this to this week alone: learn to defy context.

Lots of guys like to complain, "There's no real context to talk about ____" or "I don't have a context to introduce myself" or "My wife and I don't have that type of relationship - there's no context to bring that up." Translation: I'm a man who is ruled and controlled by context and social stigma.

When I begin discipling a guy, I often give homework in the first few meetings: Go have a 60 second conversation with someone you've never met before and without any context for the conversation. One guy from a couple weeks ago explained that he did this by meeting a girl online and having a date with her. NO. That doesn't count. Setting up a date creates context.

I'm talking about coming up to someone on the street, walking your cart next to them in the grocery store, or chatting them up in an elevator. I don't care if it's a guy or girl. It doesn't matter. Just start conversations with random people for no apparent reason.

This is how you increase your social network. It's how you display an alpha "I DNGAF about social stigma" attitude. It's how you get ahead in your career. It's how you influence people. It's how you make a difference in the world for Christ. Learn to function without context.

When you say "it is a bit late to have the talk" you really mean, "There's no context for it, so it would seem weird for me to bring it up that way." So? It's obviously still bothering you. She might not see context for it, but you certainly do. Why should you care what context she sees or not? For all you know, she's had the exact same thoughts running through her head. It doesn't matter.

Learn to ignore context and just do what you want to do regardless of whether or not it violates social stigma.

Is the wife's desire in Genesis 3:16 affectionate or antagonistic? Let's explore

1 upvotes · 26 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I usually use WLC: <http://www.scripture4all.org/OnlineInterlinear/OTpdf/gen3.pdf>

I also cross-reference that with biblehub.org for the Strongs numbers. It's the only one I know of that's free online. biblestudytools.com also uses the Biblia Hebraica Stuttgartensia, which is also based on the Leningrad Codex and I think was the actual codex that the WLC was transcribed from (WLC is the online version of the BHS). From my understanding, the Leningrad Codex is the oldest complete manuscript, though there are some older partial manuscripts. I haven't looked much into those.

Pastor injects Feminism at Wedding Ceremony

1 upvotes · 26 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Women don't want to beta-fy their men; they want to know definitively whether or not their man is alpha or beta. Hypergamy's AF and BB sides gives her room to enjoy either aspect of their man, they just want to know what his character is to know how to take advantage of the situation. If it's an AF dynamic, they will enjoy and appreciate strong attraction to him and submit to his lead to maintain that attraction and healthy relationship. If it's a BB dynamic, they will enjoy controlling and manipulating him to get all of their comforts met. Whether the man is AF or BB isn't her choice, but when she figures out which type of a relationship she's in, then she knows how to work in that system for her greatest gain. That's why she tests. And she keeps on testing to make sure things don't change, as they often do ... or that if things do change, that she changes her strategy accordingly.

I'm sure i read on married rp that marriage is dating mode on hard.

The saying is that MRP is RP on hard mode, not necessarily "dating on hard mode." It's harder to get positive responses in a marriage context because as you practice RP strategies, your wife learns and adapts to them. Pick up a new girl at the bar every day and you can employ the same 5 tricks over and over and over again and keep getting laid. Try those same 5 tricks with the same woman over and over and over again and you'll have a dead bedroom. You have to constantly change your tactics. You also have to work toward the softer oak qualities, which can be a difficult balance that doesn't need to be maintained in the dating realm, where you can just be in pure jerk-mode and do just fine.

Is Sex Outside of Marriage a Sin? An Official Stance.

1 upvotes · 24 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm on the same wavelength as John Piper on that issue. Feel free to skip to the conclusions, but the whole paper is solid: <https://www.desiringgod.org/articles/divorce-remarriage-a-position-paper>

Is the wife's desire in Genesis 3:16 affectionate or antagonistic? Let's explore

1 upvotes · 23 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed on all counts.

Pastor injects Feminism at Wedding Ceremony

1 upvotes · 23 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Sin [bad] desires Cain [man], but Cain [man] should rule over sin [bad]. Wife [?] desires husband [man], but husband [man] should rule over wife [?]. If the passages are parallel (as I agree with you: they are), then the parallel position the wife is in is that of sin. So, I'm not sure how you can utilize that to say her desire for her husband is "not bad" when the implication of the parallel is clearly the opposite.

If you want to get really technical, the Hebrew reads as follows: we'el isek tesuqatek we'hu yimsal bak. Here's the breakdown (strong's ID in brackets):

- we'el [413] - the "we" is a conjunctive ("and," though sometimes silent); the "el" has a dual meaning, the two most common out of 404 uses being: 162 translations as "against" and 75 translations as "toward." Accordingly, there is no agreement on whether or not the author originally meant "and toward" or "and against," thus there can be no definitive conclusion.
- isek [376] - from the root "ish" for "man" (this is consistent with the two most common translations: 746 for "man" and 669 for "men," the next closest being "each" at 148. Some variation of "husband" is about 70. All 6 uses in the Bible of this particular conjugation of ish (specifically: isek) are within the 70 re: husbands.
- tesuqatek [8669] - longing/desire (nothing funny; it's only used 3 times in the Bible and all are consistent with this definition); the particular conjugation implies "you/your" instead of "my" or "his" or something else
- we'hu [1931] - again, the "we" is a conjunctive. "hu" can mean he/she/it/this/who; of its uses in the Bible, it's virtually always in the masculine
- yimsal [4910] - rule/control/have dominion. Its 4 most common uses are rule (27), ruler (18), rules (9), and rulers (6). This conjugation implies a "him/her/it" as the subject doing the ruling.

- bak - not referenced in the Strong's, but in this verse most translations agree: "over you"

If I put this all together it could read like any one of the following:

- (1) And toward husband you desire and he rule over you
- (2) And against husband you desire and he rule over you
- (3) And toward man you desire and he rule over you
- (4) And against man you desire and he rule over you

Given the context of child-bearing and the marriage between Adam and Eve, it's highly probable we're dealing with 1 or 2 (i.e. the "husband" options), but if it were 3 or 4 it would say quite a bit about why women through history constantly seek their identity through men (3) or why they are also simultaneously constantly trying to seek control over men (4).

But if I'm right about the "husband" translation, then the only other real distinction is whether or not her desires are to be directed toward her husband or against his interests. This is why some translations reference a positive desire for a husband (NIV, KJV), but others reference a contrary/controlling desire (ESV, NLT).

Now, the Genesis 4:7 parallel looks like this: we'elleka tesuqatow we'attah timsal bow. Here's the comparative breakdown:

- we'elleka - same as we'el, except it adds a reversing conjunctive ("but"), making it now mean "but toward/against"
- tesuqatow - same as tesuqatek, but with the subject of "it" instead of "you/your" - "it desires"
- we'attah - parallel to we'hu; where "hu" meant a third party (he/she/it), the attah references "you" - "and you"
- timsal - same as "yimsal" except the subject ruling is no longer a third party, but "you" - "you rule"
- bow - same as "bak," but presumably a change in directive from "you" to "it"

These two phrases are unmistakably meant to parallel one another, as they are virtually identical except as to conjugation. To that end, Genesis 4:7 should be very key in our interpretation of Genesis 3:16. Which one makes more sense (noting that "it" is a reference to hatat ("sin") from earlier in the verse):

- (a) But toward [you] it desires and you rule it
- (b) But against [you] it desires and you rule it

Between these two, does sin have a positive, affectionate desire toward us, or does it have a desire that works against us? If indeed these two verses are meant to be a parallel of one another, then the answer must be the same for both. Because sin's desire is a controlling desire against our interests, I don't see how we can contextually read a wife's desire as stated in the 'curse' as being an affectionate, positive desire for us ... unless we argue that Moses (the presumed author of Genesis) just accidentally used the exact same phrases a mere few paragraphs apart and had no intention of connecting the two, and God somehow has let the church mistake a connection between those verses for close to 3,500 years since this was put to writing without providing a prophet to communicate otherwise.

TL;DR - It seems pretty clear that the language in Genesis 3:16 references a woman having a desire against her husband (not for him), which is evident both from the fact that the "against" translation has over 2x the usage as the "toward" for the operative word (162 v. 75) and also because the language in Genesis 4:7 is an incredible parallel with 3:16, but clearly means to be interpreted in the "against" sense, and therefore 3:16 should be interpreted in the "against" sense also.

Tag: /u/Xoramung

Pastor injects Feminism at Wedding Ceremony

1 upvotes · 23 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed. I don't know why she keeps deleting solid comments!

Humility - the “mother of all virtues,” and pride, “the cause of all sin.”

1 upvotes · 22 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed, Romans 14:23 being another solid voucher for faith as a secondary.

Is Sex Outside of Marriage a Sin? An Official Stance.

1 upvotes · 21 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

What was, then?

Is Sex Outside of Marriage a Sin? An Official Stance.

1 upvotes · 21 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

There's nothing different that would be done now that wouldn't have been done before /u/Red-Curious made this new post.

Exactly!

Open thread idea

1 upvotes · 21 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

spare time

Lifting, racquetball, biking/hiking, writing, playing guitar, reading/listening to audio books, a smattering of TV shows, musicals

sports teams

Ick ... never did understand the value of watching other men engage in physical activity. Most sports are too boring or repetitive for me to enjoy. Boxing and tennis are the two exceptions, but those are both for peripheral reasons than the sport itself.

Open thread idea

1 upvotes · 21 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Ah, boxing ... one of two sports I can actually bear to watch. Strangely enough, tennis is the other one. Hilly trails are solid too - especially on a bike ride with the kids in a trailer. That's better than squats sometimes!

Since men are the prize in a marriage, is a dowry a blue pill idea? I'm curious to know since dowry's are in the Bible, was that an example of the cultural shift towards hypergamy?

1 upvotes · 20 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It sounds like you got it. I agree with pretty much everything you said, except maybe the one time you used the term "dowry" instead of "bride price" ;) Excellent write-up, and better than I would have put it.

Update to an update

1 upvotes · 20 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well said.

Pursuing a Godly Woman - Advice Needed

1 upvotes · 20 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I was going to reply independently, but you hit the nail on the head too hard that I'll just up vote this instead.

How to transition into celibacy?

1 upvotes · 16 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I wasn't challenging what you believe. I was referencing your gross misrepresentation of my beliefs on the matter, which you're still doing by attributing an "end game" to me that I absolutely do not support. This is blatant trolling. Take your 3- day ban as a warning. This is not for whatever ideas you want to support or argue against. It is for trolling. Period. Now learn to suck it up and stop being so whiny all the time.

A Guide to Manipulation - Part 2: The Tactics

1 upvotes · 16 March 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Well said. I completely agree.

A Guide to Manipulation - Part 2: The Tactics

1 upvotes · 15 March 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You're only looking at one side of the coin in the point of the post. Despite the original critique by /u/creating_my_life, there's a reason I assigned the genders in the order I did (and internally debated doing it in the reverse).

How to transition into celibacy?

1 upvotes · 14 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This mirror's my thoughts and comment as well. Well said.

How to transition into celibacy?

1 upvotes · 14 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree, but would add one caveat: Paul's suggestion of marriage is when your sexual desire is mutual with another person, not necessarily a unilateral compulsion to masturbate.

How to transition into celibacy?

1 upvotes · 14 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Dude ... you just can't let that go. There's a difference between "It's a bad idea, but it's not sin" and "I want every guy doing this!" Stop mischaracterizing things or you will be banned as a troll.

A Guide to Manipulation - Part 1: Are You Being Manipulated?

1 upvotes · 13 March 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

It's not an either/or concept. As noted, people who are manipulated are also "weak, whiny losers." If they weren't, they likely wouldn't be so susceptible to manipulation in the first place.

In the posts you glossed through, I'd wager most of them do involve guys whose "weak, whiny" victim pukes stem from manipulation, even if it goes unidentified. Heck, most of NMMNG and MMSLP are about identifying how blue pill men have been manipulated by society and their wives and how to respond to that. Virtually every fitness test or comfort test incorporates a form of manipulation (otherwise it wouldn't be a test).

I do agree that there is no cabal of womanhood at the top plotting how to advance female hypergamous desires. Most manipulation is inherent to a person's fundamental character and not overt or intentional ... hence the book title referencing "covert" manipulative tactics.

A Guide to Manipulation - Part 1: Are You Being Manipulated?

1 upvotes · 13 March 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Fair points. It's worth noting here that these are not the techniques themselves (those are reserved for the next post, per my intro). These are, as you note, symptoms for identifying if you've been the subject of manipulation, which gives a better context for the subsequent post. So, you're spot on.

In addition to the books on the sidebar, what books have helped you develop a RP mindset?

1 upvotes · 13 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

With disclaimers, I'm fine with it as long as OZ approves, noting that I have not reviewed them myself.

In addition to the books on the sidebar, what books have helped you develop a RP mindset?

1 upvotes · 13 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I don't know that I've given an official "position" on the subject for the sub other than that the undeniable biblical conditions allowing for the termination of a marriage should not be rejected, which are: (1) death, (2) unbelieving spouse leaves, (3) cheating.

As to 3, everyone agrees that porneia includes cheating. If we want to interpret more into it than just that, we're leaving the realm of universal acceptance and entering personal interpretation. To that end, I won't deny a person from making such a claim or arguing that theological point, but if it's made as a recommendation to someone it MUST be supported with a theological rationale for why that's okay. BPP's book does provide that theological rationale, as I recall, and therefore it's still up on the sidebar, even if I did disagree with him.

To that end, I'm still undecided myself. I see so, so, so, so, so much in the Bible about how God treats those who don't produce fruit. As I've refrained over and over, I believe that fruit is defined by spiritual reproduction, which is parallel to physical reproduction. So, in the parable of the fig tree if the master is going to chop down and burn the tree that doesn't produce fruit (i.e. spiritually reproduce), despite the fact that it is otherwise a grown tree, the implication is that someone can technically be spiritually alive because as the soil the Gospel sprang up in them to produce a tree ... but if they don't allow that tree to reproduce, then Jesus will divorce them. In the physical context, you can be technically married to someone and that marriage is alive, valid, and genuine, but if there's no reproductive acts going on (leaving the birth control issue aside), then does that mean one's wife should also be "chopped down and thrown into the fire" metaphorically, which I take to mean divorced from the relationship? I'm inclined to say yes, and that's consistent with /u/BluepillProfessor's conclusion as well ... I just get there from a different angle than a strict broadening of the word porneia. But this is tying together so many passages in so many different contexts that I'm not confident enough to make it an official position.

Husband pastor & quite time

1 upvotes · 13 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I dictated the last response during a car ride yesterday. I finally have a moment to sit down for this one ...

Just because something falls within one's responsibility or purview doesn't mean they have to do ALL of the activities on their own.

I agree. But does that now mean that because the house is the wife's domain over which she is "despot of the oikos" ... that the man is to be her helper? That when he fixes the deck or mows the yard or whatever, he's functioning not in a leader capacity, but in helping her with her domain?

A woman today could call any number of companies with a wide array of services to have things done and she'd still be the one who makes sure it got taken care of.

Who's paying for that if she's a stay-at-home who doesn't earn income?

it's interpretation vs application

You say this twice, but I don't get it. It's an interpretation issue because we're trying to interpret whether or not God assigned (1) all of the housework as the wife's domain, (2) part of it, or (3) only the degree which her husband delegates to her. This isn't an application issue; it's an interpretation issue of what Scripture actually says and not. Once you answer that question, only then can you move into the application framework of how to get those responsibilities done ... but you have to figure out what the actual responsibility is first.

they're over that entire thing.

Good, consistency here :)

But as her head, the husband could overrule her on anything he wanted. It's like a general having someone heading up a different part of the military under his command

I don't see the analogy. Is the general also functioning in the same capacity as a private would in that facility? No, the general is off doing other things. So, are you suggesting that the man is okay to just go to work and never do any work around the house ever because that's the wife's domain? That seems to be what you're implying, but you're not saying it directly, so I'm not sure.

And if the man does have an obligation to take part in certain responsibilities around the home, how does that reconcile with it being her domain and him helping her with her assignment from God (assuming, as you suggest, that this actually is part of her assignment) rather than the reverse?

it was helpful to see how he views scripture so here's mine

Yep, we're on the same page with most of this, although it appears there are still some branching baths, and that's okay. Here are the couple exceptions/notes:

when He comments two, three or more times on a topic, it gives greater context and clarity.

Indeed. I used to maintain (I'm not as strict anymore) that I would not teach something as a hard theological truth unless I could prove it from 3 places with at least one from each testament. This is a good principle.

Interpreting passages literally doesn't mean they can't carry symbolism or other aspects

By definition this is impossible. Google the word literal ... "Taking words in their usual or most basic sense without metaphor or allegory." As soon as you incorporate metaphor or allegory or symbolism or whatever, you've left the realm of literalism. I do agree with your two examples on that part though. But you're leaving literal interpretation to do it. You're just saying that both the literal and the non-literal interpretations are true and valuable. I agree as to the examples given.

Understand the way we talk and communicate and if one wants to look at scripture and interpret through a particular "lens," this would be the best way to do so.

I still think this is an inappropriate lens when you're comparing how people talk and communicate today with how they talked and communicated in biblical context and the frames of reference and understanding that people would have had in those communications at that time as well.

going too far in either direction can lead to error

Completely agreed :) This is part of the "context" in the "authorial intent" model. And let's be clear: everyone uses a model/lens. It's impossible not to.

RC, on a personal note, I consider you a friend. Don't take the lighthearted jabs personally, nor do I take any offense to criticisms of my positions.

This is mutual :) Sorry if I come off as otherwise at different times. I try to be pretty flat in my communication tone online, and given the feedback I get from other subs I'm often highly praised through PMs and comments for my ability to communicate in an "unoffensive" manner in an online forum ... but on RPC I let myself go from time to time, paying less caution and attention than I should, assuming guys here should be tough enough to take it :/ Sorry if I let that go too far.

Husband pastor & quite time

1 upvotes · 13 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent run-down!

In addition to the books on the sidebar, what books have helped you develop a RP mindset?

1 upvotes · 13 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It would fit under "RP Reading Material," where we already have non-Christian content. I simply don't have the time to read all of these posts right now, but if both you and /u/rocknrollchuck acknowledge that they add value AND (language notwithstanding) that there is nothing biblically inconsistent or sinful being promoted, then I'll trust you both and add it, getting around to reading them all myself when I'm available. But this could certainly be a good addition.

The way I'd add it is simply as a reference to the comment itself, although it'd also be appropriate to re-create the comment into a post with a bit more description and some of the cautionary notes if there are aspects of certain things in the linked content that Christians would do well to ignore.

Husband pastor & quite time

1 upvotes · 12 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

What you're describing IS the principles/context model. The context tells us the author's intent and is usually discerned from the plain language of the text (plus cross references, understanding of history, etc.).

In your sports announcer example, you're still agreeing that when the announcer intends to be taken literally we take him literally, and when he intends to be taken metaphorically we take him metaphorically.

The whole "the way people talk" thing doesn't make sense to me because there's so much evidence that people back then had different communication patterns from what we utilize today. 10 minutes of watching sci-fi with a newly discovered species will show a great example of what I'm talking about. But even with that aside, "the way people talk" is still centered around authorial intent. We talk on the assumption that people will understand what we're intending, not secretly hoping that they come to a different conclusion than the one we meant (unless you're being intentionally deceptive through implication, which my interpretation model assumes will never be the case with regard to the bible).

Long story short, 99% of what you're describing IS the model I propose and not some 4th interpretational structure (though I don't deny that others do exist). If I understand correctly, you're saying "I'm a literalist, but I'm okay with accepting things as non literal when it's clear that the author didn't intend to be taken literally." That's what I'm saying.

Regarding that last bit, I still see nothing in the grammar to imply these as present expectations. I'm not sure how you're pigeon holing me into "one application" when my interpretation of the passage leaves several possible applications and your interpretation (which I still believe is inconsistent with everything you said here) is the one that prescribes only one non sinful application: that women MUST take care of the house regardless of how their husbands instruct.

Looking at the other things listed in that passage and saying "are we to ignore these too?" is a smoke screen. It's like when my pastor tried to use 1 Corinthians 6:19-20 to preach on exercise, diet and physical fitness. Does God want us to exercise, diet and be physically fit? Absolutely. But that's not the passage to draw those conclusions from, as that passage is about sexual immorality. Assuming "Paul would have been cool if we took his words out of context" is a bad premise.

Likewise, the notions of chastity and being obedient to one's husband are good things ... But this passage isn't the proper place to draw those conclusions. You must leave the "literal historical- grammar" or "plain language of the text" to make that leap, which is why I believe you're being inconsistent here. No matter how you slice it, Paul simply didn't say "young women for all cultures throughout all of time MUST obey these things." If you said that to Paul he'd probably say something like, "I appreciate what you're trying to do, but did you even read what I wrote? I didn't say anything so extreme as you're implying.

What you're doing to Paul is the same thing that k-something777 guy was trying to do to me. I say a husband has the option of being a SAHD without it being sin and he jumps to "God luck with your society where women run everything - the government, businesses, etc." I said nothing of the sort - he just took something I said and interpreted/applied it to an extreme degree.

The same goes for much of the OT law. Some people like to hyper apply it to non Israelites across time. Paul specifically rejected that conclusion, declaring that it was only relevant in the actual context in which it was given: to the Jews, before Jesus's death/resurrection. He refused to extrapolate countless bible passages into his own context. He said they're still useful, but that they should not be obeyed literally. This even includes circumcision, which God called an eternal covenant ... yet he wished for the emasculation of those who tried to enforce it out of context. Accordingly, I'm very cautious about me being the one to enforce and demand obedience to one application of contextually questionable passages.

Douglas Wilson: Sexual devotion as a resemblance of Christ and the church

1 upvotes · 10 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That makes more sense.

Rollo Tomassi – Interviews and Video

1 upvotes · 9 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm done having babies. There's a difference ;) The spit-up, late night crying, gated staircases, etc. are all things I don't want to return to. I also don't want to go through my wife being pregnant again. Can I deal with it? Sure. Do I have any desire to? Absolutely not.

Rollo Tomassi – Interviews and Video

1 upvotes · 9 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's a good word of caution. I don't think I'm doing that, but I'll definitely be more observant and self-aware going forward, so thanks for the warning. In this case I do stand by what I said - that we are God's creations/children returning to him, not someone else's creations/children being adopted in (although we were certainly under satan's dominion for a time, per John 8:44). The other things you referenced I don't believe are things I've ever said, though I can see some people here trying to argue them.

Regarding adoption, my view will never sway from James 1:27 - "Religion that God our father accepts as pure and faultless is this: to look after orphans and widows in their distress and to keep oneself from being polluted by the world." In my mind, adoption is a perfectly legitimate and appropriate method of doing this. One could also run an orphanage and not actually adopt the kids. Or one could financially support an orphanage or sponsor a family who can't otherwise afford to adopt, etc. I am currently contemplating adoption in my own life, which is partially why I asked the question I did.

All of that to say: I have nothing against adoption. I do have a frame issue if a guy is only adopting because his wife tells him she wants to (which happens to be the majority of cases). Although I respect Rollo's insights, and therefore find value in seeking his response, he's not my god and I'm not bound to do what he says; but that doesn't mean he has nothing to contribute to the conversation. I'm not sure if any of that makes sense, but that's where I'm at right now :p

Douglas Wilson: Sexual devotion as a resemblance of Christ and the church

1 upvotes · 9 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is certainly an interesting read. I do have a different take than the author, though. Here's my understanding of what he's saying:

- Christ is our groom; we are his bride.
- This relationship parallels the husband/wife relationship.
- If a husband looks at another woman longingly, because as the husband he is the model for Christ, that implies to the rest of the world that Christ is also attracted to others outside his church/bride as well.

When we word his argument that way, the answer becomes obvious: OF COURSE Christ is attracted to those outside the church and wants to be in relationship with them too.

Now, someone could bring up the fact that the Church as a whole is Christ's bride - it's not that he has several brides and he's looking at increasing his polygamous count by eyeing non-believers to bring into the fold. To that end, even when he brings non-believers in, he's really just refining his existing bride and making her whole, not cheating on her.

The parallel would more apply to Jesus looking at other things that he could have made his bride instead, like morality, politics, economics, businesses, etc. Those things are not Christ's bride and if Christ abandoned his church to focus on those things, then he certainly would be a cheater.

But here's the thing: Jesus wants "all things" reconciled to himself. Whether it's people or non-people, in the church or out of the church, Jesus wants all things reconciled to himself. In my mind, that's just like Jesus driving down the street and seeing an economic crisis and thinking, "Man, that's so tempting, I wish I could just go in there and make her mine! But ... I'll let her to herself and stay faithful to my bride, the Church, as the vehicle through which I'll eventually deal with that stuff."

Long story short: I think Jesus does look longingly at things other than "the Church" and has a great desire to see all those other things reconciled to and united with himself, just like a husband might see another woman and want her united with him. That desire isn't anything bad. But acting on it surely would be.

The last bit about telling your kids when you're having sex with their mom, though ... hmm ... I'll have to think on that. I certainly like showing my kids when I give physical attention/kino to my wife and I think that's productive. But they're still too young for me to contemplate how they'd respond to the thought of us having sex with their knowledge.

Rollo Tomassi – Interviews and Video

1 upvotes · 9 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well, that depends on how you want to look at it. Yes, we're adopted as God's children. That is clear. But it's not like we were born to someone else.

I think of it more like the prodigal son. We were born to a good father. We abandoned him and gave up all rights of sonship and any claim as heirs. From a legal standpoint, this would be like emancipating ourselves and then being adopted by the devil. Then, through the Gospel, God allows us to come back, adopting us back into the family from which we were originally born to begin with.

In that sense, we have always been originally from his line and the adoption is predominantly a legal snafu and not a claim that we're not "biologically" (or in this sense, spiritually) God's.

Rollo Tomassi – Interviews and Video

1 upvotes · 7 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Re: #2 - That doesn't sound odd at all. Makes perfect sense to me.

That said, I'm still unclear on how proactive cuckoldry serves hypergamy when the child isn't her own offspring, as would be the case in traditional cuckoldry.

Rollo Tomassi – Interviews and Video

1 upvotes · 7 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Having fished the video now, you talked about men having an imperative to ensure paternity and not wanting to raise another man's kids and women wanting to reproduce through their hypergamous imperative. How does adoption fit into this?

I've done some adoption work in my legal career and do acknowledge straight up that it's virtually always the woman who initiates the idea of wanting to adopt. Ignoring the cases of step parent adoption (which would be far more obvious) ...

1. How does this reconcile with hypergamy when she's asking her man to raise a kid that isn't even hers to begin with?
2. What do we make of the rare men who actually are the instigators in wanting to adopt?

Examples of Terrible Advise

1 upvotes · 7 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Definitely not :p

Examples of Terrible Advise

1 upvotes · 7 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm making up words here, but I'd say there are physical fetishes, like a foot fetish - it's about the size, shape, smell, texture, etc. A conceptual fetish is more along the lines of the pregnancy example where a guy thinks: because she's pregnant I know she's a sexual being, there's another life inside her and I want to put more put my life giving seed in her, etc. I don't buy the "I did that to her" thing because most guys with a legit pregnancy fetish feel the same way about pregnancy porn where it wasn't them.

And yes, it matters beyond just completion. As you've noted many times, sex is not just about having an orgasm and there is such a thing as bad sex even when you finish.

Examples of Terrible Advise

1 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent suggestion. Sorry it took me until just now to get around to this post. Thanks for sharing this. It is certainly worthwhile to know what preconceived notions people have in their minds, and once you've been removed from that for long enough it's easy to forget.

Examples of Terrible Advise

1 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

who would find her physically attractive?

Well, there is a whole fetish around that. But I don't think it's so much a physical appearance thing as a conceptual fetish. But for the most part, I fully agree.

EDIT: Should have read the next comment down before posting this :p

Is working with kids at church worth the risk?

1 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I am sure the church would not pay a lawyer to defend us

Actually, the law suit would be defended by the church, as you are acting in a capacity as an agent when you work in a volunteer capacity in a children's ministry. That does not absolve you of any criminal conduct that is alleged, but it does mean that any civil suit would be against the church as well, and any conclusion on that claim would be bound to you personally as well by virtue of collateral estoppel. So, if the church was successful in its defense, you would be personally absolved as to any legal issues that overlapped. But again, criminal issues do not overlap. That also doesn't technically affirm that you were acting in your capacity as an agent for the church, thus you would have to participate in the litigation to some degree anyway. But most likely the same lawyer would handle your and the church's claim and you'd sign a waiver of conflict to let him do so.

Personally, I steer far away from children's ministry. I serve in my church, but not in that capacity because my gifts are more aligned with teaching and apostleship. Don't do children's ministry because you're pressured by the church to serve there. Serve where God has gifted you to serve.

Girl problems

1 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

No. It makes you look weak

Maybe you can help me with this. I've never understood this RP argument from the secular community. If you're dropping the girl and never intending to resume communication, why should a guy care about whether or not she thinks he looks weak?

My thought is: "If you want to, then do it; otherwise don't. But don't do it because you think she deserves it from you."

How to approach "proposing"?

1 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I posted that before you replied to Chuck. We're on the same page now :) I agree this all goes hand-in-hand. The communication can be what prompts the reactions that OP can observe. I wasn't trying to downplay verbal communication ... but actions are certainly superior to verbal communication and are our primary mode of honest communication. But I didn't see the "actions" part in your original comment and it was all talk, talk, talk ... so that was a quick red flag for me.

How to approach "proposing"?

1 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I think /u/Red-Curious said his wife did something similar to this on some issues.

I think you're referencing the way that my wife ex post facto admitted to having "tricked" me into marrying her. She knew up-front that my mission was disciple-making. At an intellectual level she knew that mission was more important than anything else and she wanted to leech off of my spiritual successes so that she could stand alongside me on judgment day saying, "I helped him do it!"

But at a heart level, she was still neck-deep in materialism as her primary aims and pursuits and tried consistently for years to get me to abandon my disciple-making efforts in order to gratify her materialism. As beta as I was for most of that time, that was the one thing I never really backed down on, though I certainly slowed down for certain phases.

All the same: you're right, and as /u/Uncommon_Sense_123 said, some girls will say anything just to get that commitment. I've lived it. AWALT in the sense that this undercurrent is in all women (though some can control it better than others).

pay attention to their consistent actions and not only words

That's what I was looking for!

I imagine kids are a very close third, though. Higher?

Surprising as it may be, I've virtually never seen a couple divorce based on parenting disagreements or over issues of how many kids to have or anything like that. The only times it happens is when one parent becomes abusive toward the children, which is very rare.

Sex and money are the two primary in-marriage fights. Kids are the #1 thing fought over in divorce, though. I'm not saying people don't fight over how to raise the kids or other child-related issues, but it's usually not something that riles them up enough to cripple a marriage.

Piracy: Pharisaism or Libertarianism?

1 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I understand all of that. The push back isn't about being mentally fit. It's about your heart condition and how you're pursuing that mental fitness. You get no push back about physical fitness because you're not proposing to do anything illegal. If you came in asking, "Can I forge an ID to my local gym to get in without paying?" I'm sure you'd get similar push back. It doesn't matter if it's a "high brow" or "low brow" gym. The question isn't in the content; it's in the condition of your heart. That condition right now is one of "I'm going to do whatever I want and no one's going to convince me out of it; butt hopefully someone can justify it for me so I can stop feeling guilty." That's not cool. Even if there is a non sinful way to engage in piracy (as I believe there is), this bull headed attitude makes it sinful for you anyway. That's why there's no point actually answering the question.

Piracy: Pharisaism or Libertarianism?

1 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

And I explained why a direct answer would be detrimental. There are some contexts where its sin and other's where its not. The difference is the condition of the heart. With where OP's heart is, it's going to be sin for him regardless, so why should I violate Romans 14 and 1 Cor. 8 by saying something that might enable him in his sin? I'm not going to do that.

Piracy: Pharisaism or Libertarianism?

1 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Defensive much? I'm not suggesting 100% of your time has to be reading the bible or praying or witnessing, etc. I AM SAYING that if you haven't mastered those things as an active part of your daily life yet, you shouldn't be wasting your time on pirating things. Worry about the secondary things after you've first developed a lifestyle that revolves around the primary things.

Of course, your "personal development" argument is all hogwash, and I'm pretty sure you know it. I've played Earthbound too, but in no way am I better as a person because of it. I blew several hours on my own amusement, had some fun, moved on, and that was about it. I'm sure you can rationalize some deeper significance of you let your hamster run fast enough, but at the end of the day that's all you're doing: hamstering.

Even worse, you're coming in with your mind made up about doing something without regard for its potential sinfulness and then asking us to do your hamstering for you so you can keep doing it without feeling guilty. Even if we gave you that justification (and I could, with biblical reference) your heart is so far from the right place on this that it wouldn't do you any good.

I am thoroughly convinced that when it comes to piracy the proper and manly thing to do is to solemnly ignore the law.

This is what I'm talking about. If your mind is already made up, why bother asking in the first place? And what does this have to do with manliness? Worldly concepts of "machismo" and "stick it to the man" are not where you should go to define masculinity.

Piracy: Pharisaism or Libertarianism?

1 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Why are you so concerned with self entertainment in the first place? How many times have you read the bible the whole way through? How many people are you sharing your faith with?

Look, if you want to find some biblical technicality to justify your behavior under the law, I'm sure you can find it. But when you use the law to justify yourself the law will bite back to condemn you every time, and I know you have not kept all of it. Stop looking to technicalities to make the guilt go away and start living for Christ. If you have extra time, then worry about piracy issues.

Girl problems

1 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Meh, if there's no ring she's fair game. Hypergamy makes that clear enough, and you're not ruining a biblical covenant or anything. That said, I this particular case I agree.

How to approach sexaul relationships as red pilld christian entering my 20s?

1 upvotes · 5 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

But people do keep asking about it

To be clear, I included Rule 7 from Day 1 for a reason. I'm okay with occasional questions, "Is PMS really a sin?" Although most women do tend to sin during PMS, pre-marital sex is still a sin. I'm open for debating the topic of why it's sinful or someone trying to challenge that it shouldn't be classified as sin, but the fact is that until there is some clear evidence to the contrary, this incredibly long-standing interpretation of Scripture will remain. To use a Romans 14:23 argument, "Anything that does not come from faith is sin" - so if there's a dispute I err on the side of "yes it's sin" until someone can prove otherwise (more on that later), even if only to protect the spiritually weak. Anyone who encourages premarital sex is in violation of Rule 7 and the comment will be removed (although I have been lenient on this before).

/u/Red-Curious said he/this sub held the position of being opposed to non-marital sex.

I will affirm that position again here today and perhaps again in a stickied post, if necessary.

I still think the benefits of taking an official position outweighs anything else

I agree. The official position is that sex outside of the context of marriage is sin.

First ... Second ... Third ...

Fourth, even if someone could convince me that sex outside of marriage is not sinful (and good luck at that!) 1 Cor. 8:9 still applies on a communal level: "Be careful, however, that the exercise of your rights does not become a stumbling block to the weak." Or what about 1 peter 2:16? "Live as free people, but do not use your freedom as a cover-up for evil; live as God's slaves." Or what about Romans 14:12-14? "So then each of us will give an account of himself to God [on disputed matters]. Therefore let us not pass judgment on one another any longer, but rather decide never to put a stumbling block or hindrance in the way of a brother ... it is unclean for anyone who thinks it unclean." ... and so on.

Having an official position and censoring comments are two very different things, as you know.

I'm lax on my policing because I don't like censoring speech. That said, blatant suggestions toward someone that they should sin should be reported and the comment removed. Yes, some types of speech are dangerous enough that they do need to be policed.

Unless I missed something, your comments stand and he accepts other points of view

Correct - although /u/Whitified and I disagree on this point, this falls into the category of comments where policing would be inappropriate. I have also consistently in virtually all of my posts on discipleship acknowledged that people can decide their mission for themselves, and that it is only my own personal belief that discipleship should be mass-incorporated into all men's missions. This is my way of mitigating between "where I stand" and "where the sub stands," although I will continue to preach my own convictions, as I believe in this particular case that it would be sinful of me not to do so, given the severity of the language Jesus uses for those who are not spiritually reproducing. Nevertheless, qualifiers can help mitigate that whenever appropriate. And if I forget to use a qualifier here or there, oh well. People can deal with it.

I think the concern about policing is unwarranted.

I have never removed a single thread from this sub (except for the one time we were brigaded), and I have approved all but maybe 3 or 4 removed comments that were removed by the automoderator, and those 3 or 4 were clear trolls. Yes, any concern about content policing is highly unwarranted, except to the degree that if people do start suggesting sinful behavior and I notice it (I don't have the time to read every comment in every thread anymore like I used to, and sometimes I miss entire threads altogether) ... I will remove that.

Tag: /u/rocknrollchuck and /u/OsmiumZulu - just to make sure the other mods see this as my position as well, in case they want to weigh in.

Wife and I fight when I am ill.

1 upvotes · 2 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I don't think we're saying anything differently. We're just coming at it from different perspectives and me perhaps having a bit more knowledge about OP's wife in particular than the rest of the sub might have.

I will say in general that I've known several women who really did see their men as children and felt like they were mommies. This type of "care, nurturing, affect," etc. was very different from the type that I'm guessing you give to your husband. If I know you as I think you do, your care, nurturing, and affection in his times of illness come from a place of loving respect.

In OP's case, his mom wasn't doing it out of loving respect. She was doing it out of (to put it crudely) condescending doting over her child. She sees her child as someone lesser who needs her care, so she can dote all over his every need when he's sick because she's the mother and it's in her realm of power, authority, and responsibility to care for her sick child. This is a very different mental state than the loving, submissive respect that you express for your husband when you help him out while he's down.

Or maybe I'm wrong. Maybe you are condescendingly doting toward your husband like a mother to her child when he's sick? I doubt it :p

Yes, wives nurture. But they do it in different ways and from a different internal place than when a mother nurtures. That's what I was really getting at. And I do think I noted several times in my comment "you're right to expect this ... she should be doing more, etc." :) I actually texted OP privately before commenting that your reply was probably the most on-point with my gut reaction to the matter. He has a right to expect wifely nurturing, but he also can't change her or force her into it.

Wife and I fight when I am ill.

1 upvotes · 2 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Decide whether you want to be her husband & lover or another one of her children. Choose carefully because you can't be both.

That's the most important thing he said. /u/BirdManBrrrr's analysis is spot on. I'll comment separately with a more direct reply, though.

But yes, there is a harsh reality that is at play here. One that you'll have to accept and deal with.

Husband pastor & quite time

1 upvotes · 2 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good stuff. DC makes for poor movies because their characters are conceptually cool, but with the exception of Batman (who has had PHENOMENAL! movies), their comics and story lines mostly relied on the characters themselves to drive the story, rather than on the plot. Super man comics are cool because superman is cool, not because the plot was particularly ingenious.

Marvel had weaker characters (albeit still very cool ones), so they had little choice but to utilize plot mechanisms to drive the story forward - like the Age of Apocalypse series, or the Phoenix Saga, or Days of Future Past (if you can't tell, I was mostly an X-Men guy in my younger days :p).

Husband pastor & quite time

1 upvotes · 2 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This whole sub at times feels like a place where you play One True Man

I'm not sure exactly what you mean by this, but I'm guessing I'd readily embrace the concept. Jesus was the one true man. We are all meant to model and emulate his life, both pre- and post-ascent, to the utmost degree. In that sense, Jesus is the one true man and we must all adopt the character, attitude, mission, etc. of that one true man. I'm not sure how that's even a question or why it's a bad thing.

One True Man is the start of BluePill among men

Again, I'm totally unclear on what you mean here. What starts the "BluePill among men" is developing an imperfect or incomplete picture of the one true man: Jesus Christ.

I also take issue with your idea of "discipleship"

That's fair. As long as someone is following the model of Christ in principle, I accept that there is room for disagreement. As I often tell people: What I propose is not "THE" way, it is "A" way - and one you should follow if God hasn't yet shown you a better way.

in the meantime I hope you understand why people here at times may seem to not have much interest in some of your theological or "discipleship" posts: because the reason we fled the BluePill churches, is so we can stop having to listen to someone play One True Man.

Meh. I take it more as people just not wanting to feel a sense of obligation in their faith. They just want to get better sex and keep pursuing worldly aims. Nevertheless, I will continue preaching what I believe Jesus called us to preach. I also believe that marital sexuality and satisfaction are so heavily tied to this mission that I cannot rightly set people right in their marriages if I'm not giving them the tools to do so, discipleship being the primary one.

Basically the series will be devoted to analyzing and exposing the nonsense that Complementarian pastors preach from the pulpits

I look forward to reading it :)

Husband pastor & quite time

1 upvotes · 2 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well, he wasn't born in Kansas, but certainly raised there ;) He's also the first massively popularized of all super-powered heroes (Doctor Occult and Mandrake the Magician notwithstanding, and of much lesser fame, albeit still quite popular). Cap Am lagged a few years behind. I actually heard once that Cap Am's character and personality was originally inspired by Superman. But that may just be conjecture :p

As far as the movies go, I'm more of a Marvel fan as well. I've always said: DC has the better characters, Marvel has the better stories. Marvel simply cannot match the brilliance not only in function, but in the personalities and character histories as well of Superman, Green Lantern, Batman, Wonder Woman, etc. Most marvel characters tend to have cookie-cutter formats to them, at least in their early days (some reboots in modern times have added more depth) ... but Marvel has done a heck of a lot more in the way of story-telling using their characters than DC has done, especially in the movies.

Husband pastor & quite time

1 upvotes · 2 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Amen. And yes, I'm a bit of a super hero junkie myself, although Superman is the true American hero ;) Cap Am is cool too, though. He's my wife's fav.

Husband pastor & quite time

1 upvotes · 2 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Haha. I'm not saying the argument is the dark side. It's actually a legitimate viewpoint, albeit one I disagree with. I'm more concerned with kash's seething lust for debate in a condescending tone. It's just not enjoyable to maintain a conversation like that :/ You're humble enough that I can enjoy when we disagree and yet still talk about it. I'll get to your latest when I'm at a desktop.

Husband pastor & quite time

1 upvotes · 1 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, well-put :)

A movement?

1 upvotes · 1 March 2018 · /r/TheRedPill

Fair reply, but I think you're talking about the MRA version of the red pill and not the reddit version, which I understand to be openly different in purpose.

Husband pastor & quite time

1 upvotes · 27 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The answer, of course, depends on what you mean by the word "pastor." A biblical definition relates to the shepherding process. The shepherd's job is to keep the sheep safe, steer them from one pasture to another, keep them from wandering off, and bring them back when they do wander. To that end, yes, a biblical husband should be fulfilling this role. But if you mean that a husband must function like the modern job description of a pastor, then the answer is no.

Most of the content on this sub is about how to live that role ;) It starts with pursuing a mission outside the family, which I believe for all Christians must incorporate discipleship, and inviting the family along in that mission. It also means maintaining the ship to run smoothly in the pursuit of that mission.

I do not have joint quiet times with my wife. Although this is not a bad idea, it has historically not been a beneficial pattern in my own marriage. Rather, we hold each other accountable to spending time with God by discussing with one another what God has been showing us in our time with him at different phases of life. Of course, this might not necessarily be from a quiet time. Instead of a quiet time, I may have spent 2 hours studying a passage, or 45 minutes in prayer, or an hour memorizing scripture, etc. There are other ways to connect with God than just through quiet time, although it is a staple that should not remain absent in exchange for other methods for too long.

207 - Perseverance, Sin, and Fitness Tests

1 upvotes · 24 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

He actually isn't pastoring anymore. He opened a cigar shop out there as his primary means of meeting and ministering to non-Christians. I'll reach out to him, though I can't make any promises.

RP Biblical Compendium Favorites

1 upvotes · 24 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I thought she was Saul's daughter.

RP Biblical Compendium Favorites

1 upvotes · 23 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

True dat. Some people take it as an implication that it wasn't God who made her barren - it was that David wouldn't have sex with her ever again.

RP Biblical Compendium Favorites

1 upvotes · 22 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well said.

Jesus defined masculinity

1 upvotes · 22 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

"Pastor" is not a word found in scripture.

Okay, the word "love" is not a word found in scripture either. Neither is the word "God." Technically they're all words that we translate into "love" and "God" just as Ephesians 4:11 is often translated to use the word "pastors." This is an idiotic argument.

I'm also not sure the word "church" is pluralized in scriptures

Well, we only have one collective "Scripture," so I'm not sure I'd pluralize that either. But 2 Corinthians 11:28 certainly uses ekklesion instead of ekklesia, pluralizing the word. See also 2 Cor. 8:18, 19, 23, 24; 1 Thessalonians 2:14; and Revelation 1:20. Of course, there's a difference between when ekklesia is used to reference the global church as compared with the local congregational church.

Yes wives and husbands should both submit to one another in love as scripture commands(according Ephesians 5 if I'm not mistaken)

Nah, the context of Ephesians 5 is quite clear that the "submit to one another" is a continuation of the previous sentence, when Paul is speaking to our peers in our congregation. He then goes into marriage as a stark contrast; "Wives, submit to your own husbands" as if to say, "Just because you're peers in your congregation doesn't mean I'm changing the authority structure God intended for marriage." This is fairly obvious from the context of the passage itself, especially in the original language - as has been the interpretation for two millennia. It wasn't until the church feminized that people utilized the English translation to create ambiguity, then afterward tried to rationalize that translation through grammatical acrobatics in the Greek.

Jesus defined masculinity

1 upvotes · 22 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

We are not the main red pill sub.

Jesus defined masculinity

1 upvotes · 22 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

He's a troll. I made a stickied post to remind everyone of this, as that affects how they engage.

Jesus defined masculinity

1 upvotes · 22 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Troll or not, here's my reply ...

I like looking to Christ as a model of masculinity as well, but we must incorporate his time before birth and post-ascent into that model, lest we make the grave mistake of assuming Jesus' identity and model to us is only based on his time on earth.

Before birth, John 1 tells us Jesus was the Word of God. He was the one who put into action what the Father spoke and decided. So, when God spoke into creation, "Let there be light," John 1 tells us that this creation was actually through the Word and by the Word - Jesus was the one who did it. I suspect this also means that when God takes action in the Old Testament, if the Father spoke it, the Son is the one who did it.

In a post-ascent world, Jesus now models masculinity in how he deals with his bride, the Church. So, when Jesus says things like, "Disown me and I'll disown you before my Father [the judge]," that's an example that we know to be true about how Jesus engages with his bride, despite the fact that we don't see him doing this much during his actual time on earth. The same thing goes for how Jesus disciplines, guides, and corrects the church, or how he casts some people out and doesn't even let others get started in the first place. It also models how we should be spiritually reproductive, compared to our physical reproductive drives. The list goes on.

With that in mind ...

He didn't use violence.

On-Earth: He did also say, "I did not come to bring peace, but the sword." Also, he specifically tells them in Luke 22:35-38 that they should NOT follow the model he gave them while he was on earth of "don't take anything with you on your ministry journey; just trust God," but instead, "Let the one who has a moneybag take it, and likewise a knapsack. And let the one who has no sword sell his cloak and buy one." To be clear: Jesus is saying, "Don't just focus on what we did while I was here, but prepare for the times to come also."

Pre-birth: God is constantly ordering wars and acts of violence as a means of modeling God's intolerance for sin and provision for his bride at the expense of those who aren't.

Post-ascent: He does condemn people to hell and eternal conscious torment ... so there's something to be said for that. Of course, he would never do this to his bride, but he's fine with kicking other people in the butt.

RP Praxeology: We don't teach to use violence either. I don't think TRP or MRP do either. I'm not sure why that's at issue. "Get buff" doesn't imply "so you can punch someone in the face."

He expressed his emotions.

On-Earth: Absolutely. But he wasn't controlled by them. When Jesus had compassion on the crowds because they were "like sheep without a shepherd" (Matthew 9:36), he didn't let that compassion change his plan to become their shepherd; he instead deferred that responsibility to other people so he could continue on his mission (v37-38). When talking to the rich young man Jesus "looked at him and loved him," but he didn't compromise his standard of discipleship to make an exception for this man. When "Jesus wept" (John 11:35), it was over Lazarus whom he loved - but he had been warned 3 days earlier that Lazarus was dying and instead of going to heal him, Jesus continued doing his own thing and let Lazarus die because his emotional disposition toward Lazarus did not control his mission.

Pre-birth: God's emotional disposition is communicated through the prophets, and it is most often an emotional state of anger. We don't see a clear emotional disposition from Christ during this time.

Post-ascent: Jesus' emotional disposition toward the world is communicated through the Spirit within us, who not only affirms, uplifts, and encourages, but also convicts and condemns.

RP Praxeology: Go ask anyone on MRP - RP isn't about concealing emotions; it's about controlling them. Go read my post on butt-hurt too.

He didn't marry, he didn't pursue women. He stayed single and even Paul said this is far better..

On-Earth: Well, Jesus said so too: "The one who can accept this [indefinite singleness] should" (Matthew 19:11).

Pre-birth: Through the creation process, he created woman for man and said that this is "very good." So, we can't entirely say that Jesus is opposed to marriage. If anything, his on-earth statement makes it clear that "not many" people can follow in his singleness and that he doesn't expect those to do so who can't.

Post-ascent: Yes, Jesus is married. He is the bridegroom, the church is his bride. I'm not sure how you can argue around this. He didn't marry on earth, but his oneness bond with his church that the Bible directly calls a marriage is fairly clear.

RP Praxeology: Secular and biblical RP agrees: we shouldn't be making marriage a primary goal in life. So, I'm not sure the issue here. RP says marriage is unwise, but that if someone wants to get married anyway, that's a man's decision to make.

He showed affection.

I lump this into the "he expressed his emotions" thing. It's just a technique for how he expressed emotions.

I will simply note that kino and game are all about this.

He showed complete forgiveness to the adulterous woman.

On-Earth: Let's be clear: he didn't forgive her; he simply declined to condemn her, then he compelled her to stop sinning. We don't know if she did or didn't. It's like the parable of the Barren Fig Tree - the tree had no fruit for 3 years, so the master wanted to cut it down; but the caretaker said, "Give me another year; I'll tend the soil and fertilize it, and if after that it still doesn't bear fruit, then go ahead and cut it down." Jesus was giving this woman her extra year after cultivating something in her. The ball was in her court at that point.

Pre-birth: God struck many people down with little to no opportunity for conviction to lead to repentance. If Jesus is the Word who put into action the Father's decrees, then he very well may have been the one doing it.

Post-ascent: All sins and blasphemies are forgiven of someone who actually is Christ's bride, if his bride is repentant. But when someone ceases to repent, 1 Cor. 5 and Hebrews 10 share some harsh words about such people being expelled and being subject to fiery judgment and wrath.

RP Praxeology: This is part of being an oak. Secular RP takes the position that women are just the way we are and we should accept them at that rather than trying to change them. This means forgiving women for doing the stupid things women do, and appreciating the wonderful things that women do. RP has never suggested we shouldn't forgive women who make mistakes. In fact, even in secular RP threads where a guy has been cheated on, only part of the crowd condemns him for staying with her, and the rest embrace the fact that he wants to make it work and advise him on how to operate under that framework.

Some of his closest friends were women.

On-Earth: None of the 12. His deepest relationships were with them. This is fairly undeniable. Although the women were the first to preach of his resurrection, it was the 11 who were given the great commission (Matthew 28:16), and not these women.

Pre-birth: The only person God ever called his friend was Moses. Deborah is the rare exception of a female prophet and virtually everyone else God utilized in a major way was male. When Melchizedek appeared (who I believe was a manifestation of Jesus, although I accept that this is debatable), he spoke with Abraham, a man. When he appeared in the fire with S, M, and A, they were men. When he appeared to Gideon, that was also to a man. We don't have any Christophany experiences with women that I'm aware of.

Post-ascent: Absolutely Christ works with women. Paul models this to the men: "I entreat Euodia and I entreat Syntyche to agree in the Lord [these women were catty]. Yes, I ask you also, true companion, help these women, who have labored side by side with me in the gospel." But we also see the authority structure given by Paul, setting the context for how that "side by side" labor was done: "I do not permit a woman to teach or to assume authority over a man" (1 Timothy 2:12). Given that Paul says in 1 Corinthians 7 that his authority in writing his letters is as "one who is trustworthy in Christ Jesus," I have to assume that Jesus not only adopts Paul's words, but was the one who through the Spirit inspired them.

RP Praxeology: As most secular RP men will tell you - RP men love women. That's kind of the whole shtick. We want to be around women constantly. In a feminized culture, women flock to other women and men flock to women - it's men who no one cares to be around. Secular RP on reddit doesn't seek to change this; rather, it seeks to embrace it to a man's advantage - how to be around even more women all the time. This is good for a man's confidence, social value, preselection, dread, etc.

Long story short, it sounds like you're trying to do some kind of "gotcha!" post about how RPC is somehow inconsistent because Jesus embraced women and adopted traits that look at first blush to be inconsistent with what you think RPC is proposing about masculinity. This comes from a place of ignorance about RPC and secular RP as well.

Now, with the context behind what you've said, let's add back in all the other attributes about Jesus that we also reference on this sub that you left out ... and now we're starting to get at a complete picture, as opposed to the grossly misleading one you're trying to set forth.

Introduction and a FR

1 upvotes · 22 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Hello past me. Nice to meet you :) To be clear:

- Grew up in the church; became a Christian in college; heavily involved in college campus ministry; staff with campus ministry after college; got married shortly after college as a horny idealistic virgin; wife threatened divorce periodically; married about 10 years; several little ones (I have 4); dead bedroom (although your 10x/yr surpassed my 0-3); together almost purely for biblical reasons; struggled with porn; made changes, wife was slow, but other women responded fast

That is where we diverged. You went down the road I wanted to take - and one that I know works from a sexual standpoint. You escalated past the levels of dread that I was willing to go and saw two things result, although you only alluded to the second: (1) your sex life revitalized quicker than mine, and (2) your capacity for disciple-making tanked (if you were doing it at all) and now you're on the road to earning that respect back with your church and spiritual peers.

Whether you realize it or not, it's this second point that is at the core of your struggle to reconcile RP with your faith. Your RP-ness appears in your mind to have been the cause of your reputation change within church leadership, so you perceive this as a conflict - that it's RP or ministry, and you've only recently found this sub as a means of seeing that the two don't actually diverge :) Unfortunately, this sub was created 7 months ago and your story started 8 :/ I apologize for not having been 6 months ahead of where I am now - and how much better I would have been for it too!

I know it sounds weird for me to apologize about that, but I firmly believe that our obligation is not only to those we actively minister to, but also to those people who we failed to minister to because we had our head up our butts for too long. If I had been more faithful in my calling to Christ, I would have discovered and started RPC not just 6 months sooner, but years sooner. I wonder that many people here today might have followed your path if I had waited another 6 months before getting started. That's on me. And that same obligation is on you for the people whose lives you could have changed had you not tarnished your reputation. Fortunately in our faith there is always room for redemption :)

My biggest encouragement to you is not to waste time. Sometimes it's easy to think: "Okay, I screwed up big. Now I need to wait a year or two to re-earn trust before I can get going again." In reality, the very moment we repent is the best place we'll ever be in spiritually. A year later, even if we're generally moving in the right direction, we'll probably notice our path looking like a drunk man's walk - it's wobbling back and forth all over the place. But immediately after repentance, your eyes are exactly where they need to be. "Yes, I just cheated on my wife last week. Yes, I know you probably don't trust me. I'm happy to earn your trust in time, but until then I'm going to keep doing God's work all the same." That needs to be your attitude ... of course exchanging "last week" with "8 months ago." I'm just trying to illustrate the point that you don't need to wait :)

one thing I was taught on MRP was to never apologize, because its weak. That has proven to be poor advice

Here's the thing: secular RP is men swapping notes. Christian RP is people reading straight from the textbook. Secular RP claims to be a praxeology, but muddles in a lot of philosophy too. Christian RP is predominantly a theology that muddles in praxeology to fill in the gaps and tries to limit the work of philosophy to structural frameworks in our thinking, rather than fact and application discernment.

The "don't apologize" thing is a philosophy. It is a statement of what "should be true" if the world worked in a logical, rational way. But the Bible tells us plainly that in a post-fall world, things are not always logical and rational because man's broken thinking is different from God's original design. However, original design only really makes sense in a Christian marriage. So, in a secular marriage where both parties are trying to live out praxeological realities of how the world is post-fall and neither is regenerated in their heart, the "no apology" thing actually makes sense and works.

In a Christian relationship, we know that confession and repentance is at the core of the Gospel for anyone who is in sin - and it is something that should not be abandoned. Why? Because a heart oriented toward Christ will be attracted to other hearts that are re-orienting themselves toward Christ. If you're married to a non-Christian girl, that's a different story because she's still operating in the framework of the sinful nature. But to a woman who operates on godliness as the standard, there is nothing more attractive than a man who is as Christ-like as possible.

The vicarious repentance theory of the cross (see 402) says that we're incapable of repenting perfectly, so Christ took our sins on himself to repent of them for us. Similarly, the moral example theory states that we are to live in the example of what Jesus laid out - and so if he repented of our sins on our behalf, we should still follow in his example and continue to do the same. When he confesses our sins for us because we're too ignorant to do it ourselves if left on our own ("Father, forgive them for they know not what they have done"), that is a reminder that we need to do so as well.

So, when you say your apology is "from a place of true ownership and strength" that's what I think you mean. It is not a plea to her. It is an acknowledgment of your godliness - that you know who you are before Christ and readily accept that inferiority and reorientation. That's attractive. That's powerful. That builds trust. That's what alt-OYS is all about, as opposed to the blue pill mentality that we must hide our flaws to impress people into loving us.

My wife chewed me out for something the other day and she was right. At first I blew it off and moved on, but later was convicted to return and acknowledge the issue. That acknowledgement got her horny enough that she actually woke up in the middle of the night for sex when I went to bed - something that's somewhat of a rarity.

In RP terms this is the push/pull dynamic. You're positive and affirming at some moments, and shaky and unpredictable at other times. She knows you have the capacity to go off the deep end, and every now and then something you do reminds her of that capacity, so she perceives you as an unknown quantity, but you also provide enough pull to give her the comfort and security she needs to open up to you and trust you, despite her insecurities. As I often note to people IRL who are doubting their faith: doubt is a good thing. We don't want to let it control us, but it also affirms to us that our salvation actually does rest on faith itself and not heady arguments or philosophical understandings. Over-confidence in eternal security is often the downfall of many Christians, who then become ineffective and fruitless in their lives - a thing that might actually prove their confidence misplaced altogether. Over-doubt leads to the same problem from the other end. But a nice push-pull dynamic is healthy in our faith and self-evaluation and it draws us closer to Christ, just as it draws our wives closer to us.

All in all, this is an excellent FR. Thanks for sharing :)

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

1 upvotes · 21 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The arrogance is strong with this one.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

1 upvotes · 21 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Again ... total ignorance and twisting what I said to some idiotic extreme.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

1 upvotes · 21 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Meh ... you're just young and ignorant. I'm okay with not reaching an agreement.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

1 upvotes · 20 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Totally inaccurate. My wife wants to quit her job and I tell her to keep working. That's how she can best serve our family right now. The blue pill church would tell me, "If your wife wants to quit her job so she can stay at home to clean and play with kids all day, you should make that sacrifice for her - work yourself twice as hard to make up for her lost income."

No thanks. I'll take time with my kids instead.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

1 upvotes · 20 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

So basically you're her help meet

I have no idea how you got this even remotely out of anything I said. I out earn my wife. I set the mission for our family and how to accomplish it. I lead, she follows. She doesn't have a mission or agenda other than the one I give her.

If you want to continue clinging to this idiotic notion that a person's job or economic gain is the only mission they can possibly have, then this conversation is over. The bible is clear enough that money is not our master, so stop acting like the bible is all about who earns what.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

1 upvotes · 20 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

he chose to limit it to adam.

Who says he limited it to Adam? I get the impression that if women tried to work in the fields it would be just as hard for them as well. The fact that he spoke a universal curse in Adam's direction was an indication of the practical reality that Eve would not be able to do the type of groundwork that needed to be done if she was to bear enough children to "fill the earth and multiply." Her pains in pregnancy would prevent this, creating a practical imbalance in each of their economic functions in the marriage - not a God-mandated one.

Throughout history the home role as always been seen as the support role, a woman demanding to work just because she earns more is now Godly?

The man working and the woman staying at home was never "godly" either - it was just a practical reality. You're making a cultural argument, suggesting that "because the culture at the time of the Bible did this, that must mean God wanted it done that way." But the Philistines, Babylonians, Ninevites, etc. all had similar cultures. There was nothing uniquely "godly" about men working and women staying at home. It was just the practical reality of the world and at no point did God ever say, "I endorse this culture, all other cultures must be just like it."

I know our culture likes to think staying at home is harder, but it is not.

You're right there!

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

1 upvotes · 20 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Again, that's not his mission - and if it is his mission, he's missed what God was actually calling him to. If they are not making disciples and bearing fruit for God's Kingdom, then yes, they did it in vain.

It sounds harsh to say that, but I literally just met with a guy over lunch whose job is to train church pastors. In one of his meetings last week he had a pastor tell him with a grave, solemn face, "I have been wasting the last 28 years of my life pursuing the wrong things in my ministry. All of my efforts were in vain because I have no fruit to show for it - I have no genuine disciples living today from my ministry." He had lots of people showing up on Sunday mornings and going to Bible studies and whatnot - but no one who was actively reproducing their lives for Christ because of his efforts. This is the sad reality of most pastors who have missed the model that Christ laid out for us.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

1 upvotes · 20 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

your example with a wife earning 250k is all based on money not what we were created for it means that that family is money focused.

That's because your arguments have all been about economic provision - that the husband must out-earn his wife or else he's not a "provider."

a man;s job is more than making disciples if he is married Paul states this is a disadvantage for married people as they have to focus on providing and caring for a wife and kids

Let's be clear about 1 Cor. 7 - it does not say that "providing and caring for a wife and kids" is the man's "job." It says "the married man is anxious about worldly things, how to please his wife" (v33). It lists this as a source of anxiety and distraction, not as biblical obligation. To the contrary: "From now on, let those who have wives live as though they had none" (v29). Now, there are other passages that condemn a man for failing to "take care of/provide for" his family, but 1 Cor. 7 isn't one of them.

you really think God would swap roles and give men the mission to be workers at home, and help meets to their husbands?

I think you mean "help meets to their wives" in the end there. But again, as I've said in other comments, you're confusing the authority structure for the economic function of each spouse. It would be a sin for a man to be his wife's "helper" or "help meet," if you prefer that term. But a wife can still be a man's "helper" if she is the breadwinner and he stays at home. It's all about the mission and who's leading it. If she's working, isn't her financial income helping the husband as well? Economics has nothing to do with it.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

1 upvotes · 20 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

it is like the head covering verses- of course we do not practice it literally but we still need to practice it

You're arguing against yourself now. Either be a hyper-literalist or not. But make up your mind. Either both 1 Timothy and Titus are to be applied literally without regard for cultural context or they are both to be applied understood literally, but applied within appropriate cultural context. Don't pick and choose.

The purpose of the head covering isn't to respect her husband. It is to demonstrate a cultural symbol of her husband's headship over her. Culture at that time would have known what the head covering represented. Cultures today in middle-eastern countries still understand this - and they are right for wearing head coverings in their own cultural context. My wife demonstrates this in an American culture not through what she wears (because the verse isn't about the cloth itself), but by how she conducts herself in public and how she speaks of me. Back then, women were scarcely alone and uncovered in public and were not speaking to men - that's what the head covering was for, in part. So, they didn't have the opportunity to display their husband's headship through their actions the same way that is available today, which in modern culture is obvious and sticks out like a sore thumb.

Tag: /u/redpillwonder

Asking wife's consent?

1 upvotes · 20 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

and you think that is not a feminist utopia?

Of course that would be a feminist utopia. The question isn't whether or not feminists would be happy. Feminism is not the enemy. Sin is the enemy. Feminism just happens to overlap with sinfulness in most of its ideologies (albeit not all of them). Accordingly, feminism itself is a sinful ideology on the whole because it incorporates sin as something they want society to strive for.

That said, "men running the home ... while women work and run businesses" is fine ... "and society" is not. Men should be running society. The trick is, of course, that it's hard to differentiate between business leadership and societal influence. That's why men need to maintain a prominent role in business leadership as a whole. But on an individual level, I don't see the problem with a few employees here and there being women whose husbands stay at home and lead the family from there.

God is all powerful and can do anything, if he really believes some men's mission is to serve God and make disciples by running the home there would have been examples in the bible.

Nah, that's a logical fallacy. First off, disciple-making is the mission of ALL MEN, whether a man wants to embrace this or not. That's something he'll have to answer to on judgment day. Second, you don't make disciples "by running the home." Your job is only a context, not the method by which you do it. Third, by your logic no one could ever perform surgery on a dying patient. "God is all powerful and can do anything, if he really believes some men should be performing surgeries to save lives, then there would have been examples in the bible." There are a billion other possible examples of things that God wants us doing today that could not have worked in a past society. So, this is a really, really weak argument.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

1 upvotes · 20 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I think I'll join in the conversation

That's why I tagged you :)

I'm always leery of cultural arguments

Me too. That's exactly why I take the position I do. Proponents of returning to a historical culture look at how things used to be and say, "God put his stamp of approval on that culture and even today we should follow exactly what they were doing." This abandons theology and puts cultural philosophies in its place.

they are easily used to alter an interpretation of scripture

Agreed. And that is dangerous. But consider that (1) scripture can be re-interpreted based on changing culture, but also (2) scripture can be re-interpreted to support a static culture. Both are equally dangerous forms of eisegesis.

complementarians (and I know you're not one)

I can't even say that I fully grasp what "complementarianism" is. By my understanding of the definition, I am one:

someone who believes that men and women have equal value in God's eyes, but who were created to have different authoritative roles that are not equal on a hierarchical level. But many self-identified complementarians are really egalitarian, which I am certainly not.

That purpose can be accomplished by interpreting the passage literally.

You're confusing interpretation with application. The literal interpretation is that at the time Paul wrote the passage, , , and ____ would cause the word of God to be reviled. That is a literal interpretation. A literal application would say we are to obey the literal text regardless of context ... i.e. the Westboro Baptist Church ;)

No it doesn't. It talks about the characteristics of a virtuous woman, and asks rhetorically, "Who can find a woman like this?"

Good point. But the same context still applies. On an interpretational level P31 is suggesting that a godly woman in that culture would strive to this standard, much like Titus 2 doesn't command young women to work in the home, it only asks that older women teach younger women that as a standard.

A woman can obey the words mentioned in Titus and do (or not do) some of the things the Proverbs 31 woman did.

Sure, but you're entering a theological inconsistency when you do that - unless your point is simply to say that women can do the Titus 2 things but don't have to. To that end, I totally agree. There's nothing wrong with a woman working in the home, just as there's nothing wrong with a woman planting a vineyard. But those are not things she is obligated to do - they are things that in their own cultural context would produce the intended result. But if there are other ways of producing that intended result, then that is acceptable as well. The intended result is what matters, not the means of how we get there - unless it's something where the Bible explicitly says, "It must be done this way."

For example, when Jesus lays a pattern for disciple-making, he clearly shows us how he intended it to be done and the church is wrong when we abandon his methodology in favor of our own philosophies of ministry. But if we look at Matthew 10:5-6, for example - "Go nowhere among the Gentiles and enter no town of the Samaritans, but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" ... are we to interpret this literally too? That's why Matthew 28:19-20's great commission is so potent - the words themselves drive the application as being culturally transitive and transcendent. We do not have similar language in many other passages, which is why we need the Spirit to give us discernment. I do not follow the line of theology that says, "This must apply today because it's in the new testament."

A great example is 1 Timothy 2:9-10 - "women should adorn themselves in respectable apparel, with modesty and self-control, not with braided hair and gold or pearls or costly attire, but with what is proper for women who profess godliness - with good works." This passage doesn't discriminate between private and public settings. In fact, it says plainly: "in every place." Yet women braid their hair all the time - and I find it attractive, especially when my wife does it (it's one of my kinks). I also like it when my wife does NOT adorn herself in "respectable apparel" and I even enjoy it when she shows off cleavage in public. That most certainly would have not met the standard of "respectable apparel" in Paul's time. If we apply this passage literally today, so much for the whole "create your slut" and having a "sexy wife" - those go right out the window. And to be clear, this is literally the exact verse before the part about "let a woman learn quietly with all submissiveness. I do not permit a woman to teach or exercise authority over a man." So, are we going to accept a literal interpretation of one, yet cast out the other? Do you see how just trying to take things literally causes intense cognitive dissonance in the application process?

What makes sense is that Paul is talking about the type of flashy attire that would intimate a woman was a prostitute or otherwise dressing in a prideful, showy way. Today, braiding your hair and wearing gold and pearls aren't things that only whores and rich girls do. Doing these doesn't impugn a woman's character in many parts of the world because it is commonplace. So, I let my wife wear her gold wedding ring and braid her hair for me. But in the very next verses about leadership, Paul then connects them to creation, suggesting that this part transcends culture, just like the great commission.

Does this make sense? Who knows, maybe you will actually forbid your wife from braiding her hair or wearing jewelry or any clothes that cost more than $x (whatever you define as "costly"). I know my wife braids her hair, wears gold and pearls, and has some expensive lingerie and dresses. Maybe she's in sin. I don't think so.

What's with the "hyper?" Literalist fits fine

Because I consider myself a literalist most of the time. Like the whole "cut off your hand if it causes you to sin" bit ... I believe Jesus was speaking literally, not figuratively. Similarly, when Jesus says, "If anyone does not hate his father and mother, etc. he cannot be my disciple," I believe he was speaking literally and not in hyperbole. But the literal interpretation doesn't make sense until you actually understand the context of the passage. To break it down:

- Non-literalism is when someone ignores context in order to reach conclusions that make sense to them
- Literalism is when we look at the context of a passage to find the most clear, direct, and literal interpretation of what the author likely meant
- Hyper literalism is when we look only at the exact letter of what's being said and ignore the context

So, a "literal" reading of Titus 2 would say that , , and are things Paul suggests are ways of preventing the Word of God from being reviled. A hyper literalist says that we must do , , and regardless of the context in which Paul said it or the context of the person trying to apply it. For reference, a non-literal reading would suggest that Titus 2 is speaking of general principles that are valuable for us to understand, but that we can apply them however we see fit. These are not the only 3 interpretive frameworks, but they are common ones.

Titus clearly states that young women are to be taught to do these things

I addressed this above: it's not even a command that young women must do these things - it's merely a command that older women are to teach the young women to do them. My point is that it's not as simple as "This passage says young women should 'work at home,' so all women should work at home." You can't remove the thing being taught from the reason for which it is being taught.

a wife's primary concern should be working at home.

Where'd you jump from "working at home" to "this must be her primary concern"?

If she can do both, great! But if her career gets in the way of being a keeper/worker at home, that's a problem, and the word of God is reviled.

Let me be clear: in a modern culture a man would be a fool not to facilitate his wife's earning capacity in some way. A failure to do so is drastically shifting the balance of power in the relationship and is the primary reason people are afraid of divorce rape in the first place. As you note, the Bible does not put an economic quota on husbands or wives or suggest who must earn more. This is a purely cultural argument that is simply not found in Scripture, which was the point I believe /u/Kashmon777 was predominantly trying to make.

But I also don't think there is anything sinful if the wife works and the man stays at home. Even outside exigent circumstances, I don't see a command: "Husbands, thou shalt not stay at home and work; instead, thou shalt earn more money than your wife." It's simply not there.

I fully agree that a woman should not ONLY WORK and do absolutely nothing around the home. That would certainly be sinful. But to say that work around the home must be her "primary concern" is taking it too far. I believe the "primary concern" of the wife should be what her husband tells her should be her primary concern.

Right now my wife is in busy season. As a tax accountant before April 15, she'll soon be working close to 80 hours a week and come April that will ramp up to over 100 hours per week. I have instructed her not to worry about the housework. I'm all OYS anyway. It's my house. I'm responsible for it, not her. When she's not in busy season, I delegate a lot of that responsibility to her, but it's still my responsibility and not hers. Am I in sin for telling my wife to focus on work during busy season and to let me deal with the housework? I don't think so. I don't think Titus 2 condemns either her or me.

Is woman created in God's image? Let's explore.

1 upvotes · 19 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good point

Husbands lead by supporting wife's dream career?

1 upvotes · 17 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Some of it is just the fact of where the media is at right now with #metoo and church responses.

The feminism in the church problem isn't so much about church structure as it is about family structure. How are men taught to run the families? Most blue pill churches will only emphasize Christ's sacrifice and issuance of free will and suggest that men do likewise. They will pay lip service to the concept of men leading the home, but if the man leads in a direction that the wife doesn't like, he is shamed for "not considering her feelings" in his leadership decisions.

In short: "Men, you must lead your families, but all of your leadership decisions must be aligned with what your wife thinks is best or else you're not being a good enough servant."

When evaluating your church followed the same principle you do at home: look at their actions, not their words. Most churches preach the right things, but very few people actually live it out - even the pastors.

Husbands lead by supporting wife's dream career?

1 upvotes · 17 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I second this.

Husbands, love your wives - Interpretation?

1 upvotes · 16 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is true.

Christian Beta Book on Manhood

1 upvotes · 15 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

but some in the ancient Roman culture interpreted the indignant anger of Jesus in the temple as an effeminate characteristic

i.e. "Model your life after Jesus, except for when he was being emotionally aggressive and physically rageful, like a woman." I cannot even comprehend the hamstering it takes to concoct this type of idea.

The idea of mutual submission has always been something I've heard preached but, I do not tend to agree with this anymore.

It comes from Ephesians 5 and is a textual ambiguity. In the original Greek, there was no punctuation. In the first half of the chapter Paul talks about relationships with other believers/peers, then he says "submit to one another in love" and then he says "wives, submit to your own husbands" and talks about the husband-wife dynamic.

The blue pill preachers have argued that because there was no punctuation, the "submit" language should really go with the second half of the chapter. They suggest this because they believe the two "submit" languages are obviously an intention to pair together ideas. As such, they believe Paul is starting with "submit to one another," and then extrapolating, "Wives, submit to your husbands this way," and then explains the husband's obligation to love his wife as a "husbands, submit to your wives that way" kind of thing. There is no definitive textual proof that they are wrong. But the text doesn't prove them right either - it is a genuine ambiguity where the argument is a legitimate, albeit weak one.

Many others, myself included, believe Paul is referencing the mutuality among believers when he says "submit to one another." He is literally talking about unity throughout the whole book of Ephesians. Cutting down the barrier between Jew and Gentile was a major point of the book (IIRC). So, it makes sense that he'd conclude his diatribe on how to interact with one another with a statement of mutual submission, much like he said in Philippians, "Consider others better than yourself." This is consistent. But then he doesn't want to confuse anyone, so he immediately changes gears and says, "Oh yeah, but that 'submit to one another' thing - that wasn't for marriage. Wives, you still have to submit to your husbands," and then he explains this in 1 Timothy, 1 Corinthians, and other places - that the mutuality in the relationship with other believers does not change the authority structure in the marriage. That's why we see the sharp contrast between: "submit to one another. wives, submit to your husbands" with no follow-up for husbands to submit to wives. That contrast clearly indicates that the "wives, submit to your husbands" was a clarification of his intent on writing the "submit to one another" line - that it was not to extend to marriage.

There's also the possibility that the specific conjugation of the word hypotassomenoi is a direct connector to the prior sentence, but I don't know enough about Greek to confirm or deny this. If its conjugation is "submit" as an active verb, then it tells us nothing. If it is "submitting" as a gerund, this would definitively connect it to the prior section and greatly weaken the argument the blue pill's alleged connection to the marriage context. The ESV, KJV, and Young's Literal and Biblos Interlinear Bible (i.e. a translation similar to the Young's Literal that tries to go pure word-for-word) all translate it as a gerund, the 2011 (i.e. post-gender-neutralization) NIV and the NASB translate it as an active verb. The only other example of that identical conjugation in Scripture is in 1 Peter 2:18, where both the Young's Literal and Biblos Interlinear Bible translate it as a gerund, but the ESV, NIV, and KJV all translate it as an active verb. /shrug ... I tend to rely on the Young's Literal on matters like these, as they are more text-for-text adaptations rather than thought-for-thought adaptations, which is what the ESV, KJV, and NIV are more attuned to.

Jesus never submits to his church, although he does serve her and give himself for her good.

That's the right conclusion, as long as we remember that his purpose was to do God's will, and that his purpose for his bride is to do God's will - and he both modeled and told us plainly that God's will was to make disciples. His bride's purpose is not his highest priority: God's purpose for him is his highest priority, and the fulfillment of that purpose is where his glory is found, just as a husband is glorified in God's eyes and man's (on judgment day, not in this world, of course) through the fruit that he bears while making disciples.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

1 upvotes · 15 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

2/2

Genesis paints a picture of women now having pain in child birth and men having to toil to feed himself and family- why would God have gendered it if men were not meant to provide

This is probably where most of your confusion is. You're assuming the curse is a command. It's not. It's a description of how things would work from then on. "I will surely multiply your pain in childbearing" is not a command: "all women must bear children" - or else what do we do of the many women throughout Scripture whose wombs were closed by God Himself!? Is God forcing them to break the command given to them in the curse, and thereby God is forcing them into sin? No, because the curse is not a command.

Likewise, "cursed is the ground because of you; in pain you shall eat of it" is not a command that men must work the ground. It is simply a saying that the ground itself is cursed, which affected men because men back then (and today still) are the primary farmers.

"But then the whole bit about 'your desire shall be to control your husband, but he shall rule over you'? So God's not commanding that men must be the leaders?" Some people make that logical leap, but the authoritative structure actually comes from the creation narrative itself (i.e. Genesis 2), not the curse. /u/RedPillWonder reminded me of that early on in this sub when I had overlooked it in one of my comments.

Long story short: don't look to the curse to find any form of command of what men and women should be doing - look at it as a series of descriptors of how God determined the world would function. Also ... is it any surprise that in the early/mid-1900s we finally see the curse reversing for both men and women?

- Men: Because now women are working more too, easing male obligation for labor. Also because we started using factories and mechanized processes for generating food rather than farming the land.
- Women: Because feminism started to rise, giving women more authority in the household. Also because medications were developed to ease the pain in child-bearing.

For approximately 6,000 years the curse was in full-effect. Only today has the passive descriptive nature of what God set in motion been predominantly thwarted, only existing in minority subsets of society. But all of that is just a side point to what we're otherwise discussing.

you say that we can ignore Titus 2:5 because of that cultural context why then can't we interpret the verses against homosexuality to be only for that culture?

I never said we ignore Titus 2:5 - I said we look at the purpose for the examples Paul gave. The purpose is what is to be fulfilled, not the examples, just like with the P31 woman - we look to the character traits of that woman, not the specific examples of what she was doing. When we look to things like homosexuality, the biblical narrative is consistent in the purpose for why it is seen as an abomination: because it breaks the image of God that is meant to be reflected through the family.

That's a much longer point to reach, but let me boil it down to the essentials:

- God created the family unit to reflect his relationship with the church.
- In Malachi 2:15 God said that the primary purpose of marriage and sexuality is to "produce godly offspring." It is not enough to produce physical offspring (as God proved by wiping away the ungodly with a flood) - they must be spiritually alive offspring, not spiritually dead.
- The Spiritual parallel tells us that the primary purpose of our union with Christ is to produce spiritual offspring - not just warm bodies in the seats on Sunday, but people who are spiritually alive.
- If the primary purpose of the church is spiritual reproduction (i.e. "make disciples of all nations") and the marriage unit is meant to be a parallel and reflection of that purpose, yet reproduction is impossible in a homosexual context, then it clearly breaks the parallel God is trying to establish.

- If homosexual marriage were permissible, it would imply that God's relationship with his church is more about intimate pleasure than actual spiritual reproduction, which would set a bad precedent and undermine the imperative of making disciples of all nations.

In all of this, the purpose of God condemning homosexuality is an eternal one. No matter what culture, time period, or life context, God's relationship with his church will never change and the marriage relationship will always be a reflection of that relationship. However, the way that culture might be led into reviling God's Word is something that actually does change throughout different cultures and time periods.

Note in all of this that I'm not referencing the Levitical law about homosexuality - I'm merely referencing the general spiritual condemnation of it. The Levitical law is no longer applicable today, so I do not call for the deaths of homosexuals, as many fundamental literalists attempt to do.

I find this interesting- throughout almost all cultures the woman looking after the home was always as in support to her husband- not one man in the bible was a house daddy while his wife ran businesses or plowed the fields and that was 6000 years of culture.

Well, I guess that sucks for all the wives of the men who came home from war physically maimed and incapable of working in the field or generating income. Seriously, though: you're again trying to compare a culture where the only income-generating jobs were jobs that women were inferior to men at performing. Until technology rose to level the capacity of women to generate income with men's, it makes sense that in such low-tech societies virtually all the examples we see are of men. But don't confuse "there are no biblical examples" with "God mandated it to be this way."

There are also no biblical examples of men working with computers. So, are you going to make the same logical leap and say: "For 6,000 years of culture men never worked with computers. And now today most men do - this is obviously sin because we don't see any examples of it in the Bible where God approves of it." That is a huge logical fallacy.

caring for the home has always been the support role.

No, submitting to her husband has always been the support role. If the husband tells his wife to leave the home and go buy a vineyard and plant it (per Proverbs 31), would you suggest that she's doing wrong and being unsupportive? Don't confuse cultural context with biblical imperative. This is a very, very dangerous thing to do. Unless God puts his stamp of approval on a culture and says, "Yes, that's exactly how I want things done - everyone should model this," we cannot say that just because Israel did it that way, we should do it that way too.

if what you say is true a lot of feminists would love this- they can have their careers and take on the world and think they are supporting their husbands

Haha, quite the opposite. If the husband tells his wife to get a job and she does, do you think feminists will support that? No, they're going to say, "You don't tell us what to do!" You make the mistake of assuming all feminists want high-paying careers. It's not about career advancement. Feminists want opportunities - they want the ability to choose for themselves whether they stay at home or work without a man telling them which it should be. If the husbands ask their wives to work, it's not that the wives "think they are supporting their husbands" - they actually are supporting their husbands.

while their husbands can run the home thinking they are the leader

If this was at the husbands' discretion, then they're not "thinking they are the leader" - they actually are the leader.

even though everything they are doing is really to support the wife's work and mission.

Phew ... you're really hung up on this idea that money and mission are tied together. Jesus said it plainly: "You cannot serve both God and money" (Matthew 6:24). As long as you keep thinking "money-maker = mission-maker" you're going to be in a very spiritually dark place. Our mission is to make disciples, not to make money.

there are now even single women Christian clubs that encourage women to be breadwinners and find men who want to be at home....

Now this I agree is sinful. It's not women looking to be submissive and supportive toward their husbands. It's women looking for men who will be submissive and supportive of the women's intentions. This defies the leadership structure because she is saying, "I will only 'follow my husband' if he is going to lead where I want him to go anyway." As my former pastor used to say: It's not submission until you disagree.

I still believe God created men to take on the world, not support his wife while she takes on the world

Again, you're confusing mission and money. Having a job isn't you "taking on the world." Advancing God's Kingdom through a lifestyle of discipleship is. Whether or not the man or the woman - or both or neither - has a job is all just context for that lifestyle.

I guess I am in the minority on this earth.

I would hope that mistaken theology is in the minority ;)

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

1 upvotes · 15 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

1/2

gendered curse to Adam making it difficult for him to provide. He did not give it to Eve

Are you suggesting women should never grow fruit and vegetables in their garden at home because this is the "man's job"? Or are you suggesting that God is concerned about money (which didn't even exist in Eden) and who provides it?

Eden had no money back then, so we can't look at the curse as a form of monetary provision issue. To that end, there's no prohibition against a woman earning an income (and Proverbs 31 specifically encourages this). Instead, the curse says that the man would have trouble growing food from the ground. So, if all house husbands also managed a garden in their back yard, would that satisfy you?

Do you see how absurd this line of logic sounds? You're trying to connect points where the text makes no connection - pitting labor with economic gain.

Here's how the curse worked: While in Eden all of the family's needs were handed to them on a silver platter. Adam was responsible to lead his wife and ensure the family unit was safe and healthy, which was easy because God did all the work. After the fall, the curse withdrew all of the provisions of Eden so that the responsibility of keeping the family safe and healthy would now be difficult work and not come naturally.

Whether a man is a house husband or a working father doesn't change the fact that he has hard work to do - that his responsibility to keep the family safe and healthy is more difficult now than it would have been in Eden.

Now, suppose two men have an earning capacity of minimum wage and they're each married to a woman who has an earning capacity of $250,000 per year (this happens all the time). Man 1 forbids his wife from working so that he can work two full-time jobs at McDonald's and Burger King while she takes care of the house. Man 2 lets his wife work while he manages the family finances, takes care of the household, and devotes his life to sharing his faith with those in his neighborhood. Which of these two men is exercising wisdom in his leadership of the home? Which of these two men will be more fruitful at carrying out the task God has given us of making disciples? Which of these two men is more likely to be neutralizing resentment and earning his wife's respect and admiration?

You see, you're trying to set aside all pragmatic wisdom just to satisfy your preconceived notion about who should earn the money in the household - and using a passage to justify your position that was written about a time before money even existed. Provision can come in any other number of ways, most notably through leadership and management of family resources. Both men and women are consistently expected throughout the Bible to generate resources for the family. Why does it matter who generates the money and who generates the food and who generates the clothing, etc.?

Titus 2

You're trying to throw the baby out with the bath water. "I have carrots, peas, corn, and rat killer in my kitchen pantry. I'm cooking dinner. I can't use the rat killer because that's meant for a different context, so I guess I can't use anything else in the pantry either ... we'll just have to go without food tonight."

It's not about isolating one thing and throwing it out. It's about looking at the purpose for what was being included in the first place. In this case, that purpose is: "that the word of God may not be reviled." Back then all of those things were necessary to ensure that the word of God was not reviled. He was giving examples of things that would keep the word of God from being reviled, not making an exclusive list of things that must always be done.

P31 says a wife should buy real estate and plant a vineyard, Titus 2 doesn't. If Titus 2 is an exclusive list of mandates, how do we reconcile that? Or with P31 saying she should also give to the poor, sell things in the marketplace, or make deliveries to merchants. Titus 2 doesn't mention those things either, so should we erase those things from the P31 woman?

Or, if we're taking hyper-literalist interpretations of Scripture, why aren't you going around condemning every woman who hasn't delivered goods to a merchant? What about all those families out there where the wife hasn't bought real estate and planted a vineyard? We better condemn them for that sin too, right? See how ridiculous that sounds? Anyone would look at P31 and say, "Obviously those are just examples of what a godly woman does, not a list of things that all women must do." But for some reason when you get to Titus 2 you're taking the opposite approach: "This is a list of things all women must do, they're not examples of what keeps the word of God from being reviled." This is a severe logical inconsistency.

If Titus 2 does not matter anymore because the instructions were for that culture/context

I'm not saying Titus 2 doesn't matter. It matters immensely. It matters that the word of God is not reviled among outsiders. It matters to know that Paul believed we should think in practical, specific ways about what would cause an outsider to revile God's Word. What I'm not interested in are legalistic, literalist interpretations of texts that ignore the meaning behind what is said - especially when the meaning is given right there in the text itself.

I can at least understand the "greet one another with a holy kiss" people taking that literally. There are actual people (I had a friend who was one of them) who would kiss every Christian - man or woman - he spoke with on the belief that this is what Paul was commanding. At least in that verse there's no given meaning. Paul doesn't say, "so that you set a positive context for your interaction." That's probably what he actually meant, but without those words in the text, I can understand skipping to a literalist interpretation (even if it is a dumb interpretation). But you're taking a text where the actual intent is given and erasing that intention from the context of how you're interpreting the rest of the passage. That's dangerous.

God commanded Adam to work- if he is not working and playing the role of mother is he then not fulfilling his duty?

You're confusing "work" with "earn income." Again, these are not the same. House husbands do work hard - and if they don't, they're sinning. They should be exercising labor for the good of the family, and orienting the resource generation capacity of himself and his wife in a manner that most efficiently provides for his family. If that means having her generate monetary resources and him generating labor around the home, such as dinner to eat, raising godly children, fixing the deck, ministering to the neighbors, etc. - that is actual work. Maybe you just have the idea in your head that "stay at homes" just mope around watching TV and playing video games all day. That's not how it works in a biblical context - and if the guy is doing that, it's sin.

so you are saying God can command a husband to be a house husband and support his wife's career and ambitions? That can be his mission....

Finally - we get to the MOST IMPORTANT distinction in all of this: the mission. No, this is ABSOLUTELY NOT his mission. Want to know what else is ABSOLUTELY NOT his mission? Making money. That's a horrible mission - and one that the Bible clearly says should NOT be our mission. Our mission is to make disciples.

If a man can be more effective sending his wife to work a day job while he devotes his life to ministry, for example (as is the case for countless pastors and missionaries), he is fulfilling his role and duty. He is WORKING toward the mission that God has in mind for him. In Eden the mission to make disciples didn't exist because anyone who would have been born sinless wouldn't need discipleship. So, God gave Adam other things to do. After the fall, God's primary priority was no longer on naming animals and tending the garden - it was on reconciling humanity to himself. That was, is, and always will be the mission for so long as this earth exists.

To be clear: the man's job is to orient the family toward the goal of making disciples. THAT is the only "work" that matters. The context he does it in - be it as an income provider or a stay-at-home-dad - doesn't matter. He should do that in the most efficient manner possible. But we do see consistently throughout Scripture that if the man fails to account for the provision of his family in pursuit of that mission, he will fail in his mission as well.

1 Timothy 5 says this plainly: "But if anyone does not provide for his relatives, and especially for members of his household, he has denied the faith and is worse than an unbeliever." This is not a verse about "men must work." It is a verse about a man ensuring that while he's on mission for Christ he's not neglecting the needs of the family - that he's still fostering an environment where his wife and children are provided for. Whether that is through his direct provision or his leadership decision to have his wife be the income-generator doesn't matter.

Asking wife's consent?

1 upvotes · 15 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

There are several in MRP. I just don't remember their names.

"Author is Giving Writers $2,800 If They Write a Crime Novel Without a Female Victim" - What to make of this?

1 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

Yeah ... a rule I've been employing since day 1, although its origin for me was a beta place: to avoid temptation to cheat. How things have changed ...

"Author is Giving Writers $2,800 If They Write a Crime Novel Without a Female Victim" - What to make of this?

1 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That was my first thought.

"Author is Giving Writers $2,800 If They Write a Crime Novel Without a Female Victim" - What to make of this?

1 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

Indeed.

"Author is Giving Writers $2,800 If They Write a Crime Novel Without a Female Victim" - What to make of this?

1 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

True, true.

"Author is Giving Writers $2,800 If They Write a Crime Novel Without a Female Victim" - What to make of this?

1 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Gosh ... kind of sounds like being married.

But men are still predators in this scenario ... they're just even worse predators because now they just kill anyone and everyone.

"Author is Giving Writers $2,800 If They Write a Crime Novel Without a Female Victim" - What to make of this?

1 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

What's #MentorHer?

"Author is Giving Writers $2,800 If They Write a Crime Novel Without a Female Victim" - What to make of this?

1 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

Good point. Of course your citations are significantly outdated and it could be a reference to a modern market. Nevertheless, I agree with you. It's not that these books don't exist today ... it's that a feminist nation didn't care to buy them, so they never made it big.

"Author is Giving Writers $2,800 If They Write a Crime Novel Without a Female Victim" - What to make of this?

1 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

- women get's her vicarious vagina tingles seeing other women being dominated by dark triad mofos, then
- turns around get's here guilty feelz assuaged by seeing said dark triad mofo get his commupance

Brilliant connection there - especially given the growing popularity of the sympathetic villain today, where authors are intentionally trying to foster an emotional bond with the dark triad perpetrator.

"Author is Giving Writers $2,800 If They Write a Crime Novel Without a Female Victim" - What to make of this?

1 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

Meh, this has relatively little to do with #metoo other than to clarify that the original motive behind the competition is coming from a feminist agenda.

I thought the context of the article was quite a novel idea worth discussing, distinctly different from anything addressed by the barrage of #metoo posts. Of course, this is why I posted it here rather than on the main MRP sub - so as not to clutter things over there with something that's little more than a point of amusement for me.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

1 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Fair point. To be clear, the context of "all things are permissible, but not everything is beneficial" is Paul quoting a philosophical mantra that the Corinthians used to justify their sinfulness in a book where his primary purpose is to rebuke them for that sin. He's trying to show them that by their own philosophy of hyper-grace (or anti-nomianism), there's still a pragmatic value in getting bad behavior under control.

More to the point, Romans 14:23 is clear: "Anything that does not come from faith is sin." Romans 14:14 (same chapter even!) also says, "Nothing is unclean in itself; but it is unclean for anyone who thinks it unclean." In other words, nothing is inherently sinful - but if we do it for any reason other than faith, then it is sinful. I interpret this to mean that "all things are 'wrong' unless definitively redeemed as 'right'" [and I should have added] by virtue of being done as a product of our faith in Christ. In that sense, if done in faith, nothing is sinful. But doing something while separately having faith does not mean something is done "in faith." So, while "all things are permissible" for the one who is acting in faith, once we leave the realm of "in faith" ... not so much. Most people cannot in good faith steal from their neighbor and say, "I did it for God!" I'm guessing the same is true of homosexuality: "I had to put my penis in that man's butt for God!" But for more innocuous things, like vegging out to TV, there are certainly ways that can be redeemed for God's purposes, as you may meet someone the next day who loves whatever show you watched and you now can build a relationship with someone who needs Jesus. In such a case, if someone's heart is in the right place while doing it, he can "Netflix and chill" with no sin.

intelligent people can be distracted by philosophical arguments

Agreed - and that's why I try to avoid philosophy and stick to theology. There are a billion things that can be philosophically determined to make sense and be good ways of thinking/living ... but Scripture and theology only have one actual conclusion.

Gotta go clean my MIL's house now, which is probably a more productive use of my time, lol.

Haha, most certainly. Thanks for the entertaining conversation and a new perspective on a criticism of Christ's ministry! I love being educated on these things, as I learn best through hearing new opposition.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

1 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a really good reply. I haven't heard that criticism of Christ's role before.

My gut reaction is two-fold: (1) Jesus did have real-world concerns, he just knew God would meet them apart from his seeking. This is clear from Matthew 6, where he gives his "don't worry about how your needs will be met" speech. And yes, Jesus did have a job too, as everyone knows he was a carpenter. He also lived off of the support of others throughout his active ministry, staying in people's homes, which is how many active missionaries today live. These are practical real-world ways of living in a ministry setting. He modeled both for us because not everyone is called to be a traveling missionary and not everyone is called to have a day job, so he showed that both are appropriate through his lifestyle.

(2) Christians would do right to abandon real-world concerns just like Jesus did - and in the same logical context Jesus did. The spiritual is what matters. So, when he says, "Go and sin no more," he's deferring to God's judgment against her for whatever she may do after the fact, not man's judgment in imposing some legal penalty on her. But we don't see Jesus saying, "Go and sin no more" to the Pharisees. We see him condemning them and engaging in a ministry that undermined their authority, causing severe practical consequence to their power. So, if secular judges had the same divine wisdom as to who could be trusted to "go and sin no more" as compared to those who need to be knocked down a few pegs, I'd bet the secular system would work just as well.

To that end, although Jesus was not exerting physical authority over those who did continue to sin (like the rich young ruler, as a popular example), he does defer to spiritual authority. If human courts looked to God's role as judge as a model, I do believe the world would be in a far, far, far better place. To those who are truly repentant and reformed, God sets them free. To those who are hardened, he sends them to the lake of fire. And these are just for the guilty people (for in the spiritual realm no one is innocent). There would be less prison crowding issues and a greater encouragement for people to reform.

The only point where this becomes impractical is in the fact that a human judge cannot know with definitive certainty whether a person is truly repentant or not. He can only go on his best judgment.

Well, I'm in the same position as Jesus here, lol. I'm not running anything beyond my own life

True, but all men are biblically called to more than our own lives. So, while this works quite appropriately for your purposes, when talking to another man I cannot impart the same sentiment.

but at the end of the day, it's ultimately between them and their Creator. Who am I to judge?!

As to non-believers, you're right - it's not our role to judge. In fact, 1 Cor. 5 specifically says, "Who am I to judge those outside the church?" yet he concludes that it actually is our responsibility to judge those within the church. Of course, as you said, that judgment is often reserved for those within the church who have the authority to do so and not necessarily the casual attendee.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

1 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

what about protection, provision and spiritual headship are those stereotypes?

Protection and provision yes, spiritual headship no. Spiritual headship is something God directly commanded in a manner that transcends cultural context. Protection and provision are not directly commanded outside of cultural context.

so even though Christ provides for the Church and God commanded adam to work before Eve came along men do not have to provide?

Sure, Christ provides, but the Proverbs 31 woman also has a job - she makes things and sells them in the marketplace. And yes, Adam was commanded to work first, but then God created a "helper" for him - not that she wouldn't have to work, but that she would help him do the work.

What about Timothy and Titus where women are asked to be workers at home?

I don't remember Timothy mentioning this, as his focus was more on authority in the church and that women should learn from their husbands. In Titus, if we applied your logic of taking a statement and stripping it from the point that's being made, then we'd be back to endorsing slavery a few verses later. The purpose in that section is: "that the word of God may not be reviled." In other words, "I don't want God's word reviled, so here are things you can do to accomplish that purpose." At the time it was a fact of life that women were working at home. This was expected. But many women (as is even more common today) were lazy and not actually doing anything. He's saying, "Don't be a lazy bum. Be diligent with your duties, otherwise people might hate God's Word because the people who profess it aren't living the kids of lives we want."

wait why is same sex a sin ?

Because the Bible says so.

but women get to ignore Titus 2

They don't. Culture just picks and chooses which verses they're going to impose on people. In the end, "God will judge each person according to what he has done" (Romans 2). So, regardless of how culture judges people, God's judgment is what matters. Women will not escape judgment for ignoring their sinfulness any more than homosexuals will escape judgment for trying to justify theirs.

I think your big confusion here is that you're assuming culture itself is the judge. It's not. God is. Just because culture says something doesn't mean God will follow suit.

P31 (HER husband was not a house husband as so many people think- she was caring for her home as well) and go and have careers?

What's P31 and who is the "HER" you're referring to? This part confused me.

since you said men and women can swap roles in the home (but it will be challenging) is there then no difference between male and female?

Of course there is. Any biologist will tell you that. There are hormonal distinctions, body build distinctions, muscular distinctions, psychological distinctions, etc. There are all kinds of differences. On the whole, men are better suited for certain types of jobs, including anything that involves heavy lifting. On the whole, women are suited for certain types of jobs, including things that involve a tender touch and an eye for beauty (i.e. caring for a home). But there are some tasks where men and women are equally capable because their natural biological leanings and God-given qualities simply don't have a preference.

A lot of these neutral positions are things that did not exist in biblical times. Back then, virtually all jobs required some form of hard manual labor. People were hitting things with hammers, building houses, tossing bales of hay, rearing large and small animals, fighting battles, etc. These are all things men are better suited for from a purely strength-based standard alone. So, it made sense that they would do these things and women would help by filling in the gaps, doing the things the men did not have the time to do, which often involved the housework and caring for children.

In a modern society, the vast majority of jobs do not require similar levels of hard, manual labor. In fact, many jobs today are better suited for women. Being in sales, for example, is typically far more profitable if you're a woman because her good looks can entice men to buy things. As is often said, sex sells. Particularly in a feminized culture, it's a lot harder to tell a woman no than a man. Although one could argue that women should be secretaries and men should be supervisors and CEOs because of an alleged intelligence difference (noting that this is not something the Bible specifically states; rather, it is a practical observation that is rapidly changing in a feminized world where most college attendees are women) ... but many companies are shifting away from raw intelligence as a standard for hiring supervisors and CEOs, noting that the smartest people don't make the most profit; rather, those who are relationally sensitive enough to foster interoffice relations are the ones who are maximizing efficiency. Guess who happens to be biologically more attuned to relational sensitivity?

I'm not saying this is how it should be. I'm saying this is how it is. There's also no biblical mandate that things cannot be this way. All we see is the example of a culture where all of the money-paying jobs required a degree of physical labor that women simply could not perform.

God did not make Eve to help Adam?

Correct.

they can be swapped?

No. You're confusing "employment" with "God's purposes." Eve wasn't created to help Adam produce income. Eve was created to help Adam do what God put Adam on the earth to do. Before the fall, that was simply maintaining what God had created. After the fall, that job became redeeming what God had created. Employment wasn't even a thing at that time. So, I don't buy into the notion that God cares which spouse is employed or not (other than to the degree that it increases temptation); rather, is the husband rightly on God's actual mission for him, and is his wife helping him with that? A man's job is not his mission from God. His mission from God is to make disciples of all nations.

as long as the one with the male genitals is in authority?

Yes, as long as the man is the one who is in authority on how to pursue the mission from God, it does not matter who is employed and who does the dishes. 1 Cor. is clear enough that God gives the mission to the man and teaches him how to fulfill it, and the man is to invite his wife to help him and teach her how to help him. Who has what secular job really doesn't matter.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

1 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

it is wrong to question if these people are saved even though they preach feminism

Now, we should always question the authenticity of someone's faith. That said, although feminist ideologies do not disqualify salvation, it does bring about a great reason for doubting someone's theological understanding.

it just seems like Christians hate anything male or man like and want to weaken them

To play devil's advocate briefly, you've got to have an extremely air-tight theology before you make a statement like that. The things the world calls "masculine" may, in fact, be the exact opposite of what God intended of men. We can't use the world's definition of "masculine" and get mad at Christians for refusing to embrace it. That's the same as the world trying to define marriage one way and then getting mad at the church for disagreeing because the Bible says something else.

That's why I'm trying to take greater care on this sub going forward to ensure that everything I say is sourced in the Bible first and not trying to "Christianize" RP concepts, as if the Bible must adopt secular notions.

some of our friends in my youth group happily are planning to get married with him being a house husband. I was like are you even Christian but apparently that is wrong to ask.

I used to have this ideology and had strong convictions about it. I've swung the other way now. The important thing is not the specific tasks each person does, but the authority structure within the home. So, if the husband wants to cook and clean while the wife goes off to work, I don't see anything sinful about that. The reason that these family structures often fail on a biblical level, though, is because society ingrains in us that money is power and authority. So, whoever is providing the money has the power. So, if a wife is the breadwinner, she will inherently understand that she has the ability to control the allocation of finances regardless of what her husband says. He can't redirect her paycheck to himself, but she can redirect it to make sure he has no access. So, the ultimately practical authority rests with her in that case. She must voluntarily humble herself to submit to her husband, which is hard for many women to do when the Bible is the only reason for them to do it. In addition: just as women struggle with control issues, men struggle with passivity and being a house-husband gives him too much opportunity to fall into this ingrained passivity.

So, although the structure itself is not sinful, when you have a working mom and a stay at home dad the inherent temptation toward female control and male passivity is exponentially increased by the fact that they each are now in a context where the most natural thing to do would be to live in light of those sinful patterns that they already want to live in anyway.

Which got me thinking can I be Christian and have sex with a man?

No.

What should one do, should we still worship with these people?

Not alongside them as peers, but in front of them as leaders paving the way for them to walk toward the truth.

Is woman created in God's image? Let's explore.

1 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I have to admit ... I stopped after 5 or 6 paragraphs when I realized he wasn't anywhere near answering the question. Can you paste just the relevant part?

Is woman created in God's image? Let's explore.

1 upvotes · 13 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with the second part. Although I didn't get into this in the original post, I'm more inclined toward the view that the "image of God" phrase relates to having a trinitarian nature - a body, like Christ; a soul/spirit, like the Holy Spirit; and the intangible workings of our head and heart, like the Father who is the intangible "head" of the trinity and whose heart the Gospel reconciled us to.

The Wisdom Series: Proverbs; Part One

1 upvotes · 13 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

"Does Job fear God for nothing" means "He fears you, but hasn't he benefited from this?" It doesn't change the nature of the fear Job had for God.

Let me throw out another example. Consider a zoo worker with some of the more deadly animals. They interact with those animals daily. There's YouTube videos of them going up and giving hugs to bears and lions and stuff. They totally love those animals. They also fear them. It's not just a reverence for the majesty of the animal - it is an actual, honest to goodness acknowledgment of the danger they're in while with that animal.

God likens himself to a lion many times. Like Aslan in the Lord of the Rings, we should have a healthy fear that the Lion of Judah could tear us to shreds if he wanted. But that fear works alongside, and not in conflict with, a trust. That's why when Lucy asks of Aslan, "Is he safe?" Mr. Beaver can answer, "Safe? Of course he's not safe. But he's good."

I do believe that Job had an appropriate fear of the Lord. I also believe that the entire rest of the book of Job after the part you cited is EXACTLY WHY Job had a fear of the Lord - because God was responsible for all of the calamities that befell Job by virtue of withdrawing his "hedge" of protection.

And then the last several chapters of God chewing out Job - that is once again a beautiful picture of the healthy fear that God was intentionally trying to instill on Job. I don't imagine God was quaking at Job with that type of a rant the way he did just to get Job to revere him. Job is genuinely terrified, and it's clear from God in those chapters that this was the intended result.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

1 upvotes · 13 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The operative word there is "believes." If one truly believes the Gospel the way I outlined it in 401 (the whole "killer slides a note under your door" analogy), then yes, they are fine regardless of their mistaken theology.

The issue is that some people claim genuine belief, but turn around and intentionally choose which theologies to believe based on what suits their interests and advantages most. This is evidence that a person is not concerned with the truth, but with his own interests. As such, his "belief" in Christ as savior is equally as shallow as his interests in discerning truth in the Word of God.

Or to be more clear: one cannot claim Jesus and yet reject the Word of God, which John 1 says is Jesus.

So, to those who have read, researched, studied, and come to a resolute conclusion that feminism is good, blue pill ideologies are what Christ intended, and homosexuality is not a sin, etc. - I'm confident their salvation is secure, however misguided they may be. Even more so, to those who learn under such a person and have good reason to trust the conclusions of the person under whom they are learning, I'm confident they're fine too, from a salvation perspective (obviously there are other serious dangers in believing bad theology that I won't get into here).

But when we get people who decide first what they want to believe and then try to find a theological support for it - those people probably won't pass muster on Judgment Day. I can't say for sure, but that's my suspicion. I should add: this is also true of men in the red pill arena. If men come here not looking for truth, but for biblical support for their worldly convictions, that is equally shallow and condemning as those who try to find biblical support for their blue pill convictions. The fact that one or the other happens to stumble across the correct answer doesn't change the fact that his heart was not with Christ in the first place - it was with the idol he has made of his own ideologies.

This is why Jesus says, "Whoever has my commands and keeps them is the one who loves me." Translation: "If you try to justify your own way of life instead of trying to figure out what I actually expect, you don't love me."

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

1 upvotes · 13 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

So we're dealing with a definitional difference. It's like liberals saying Christians are "intolerant" because we refuse to support and encourage sinful behavior, even to the point of some dictionaries changing their definition of "intolerant" to coincide with their new meaning.

At least as far as I'm aware, the dictionary definition of misogyny is "dislike of, contempt for, or ingrained prejudice against women." I suppose you could call gender bias a "prejudice against" in certain contexts ... but if we really want to split hairs, of those three forms of misogyny I would suggest that the "dislike" of women is not sinful, the "contempt" of women is, and the "ingrained prejudice against" is not.

Is woman created in God's image? Let's explore.

1 upvotes · 13 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Note: Man is the "image and glory of God" but woman is only referenced as the "glory of man." Whose image is she in, if the image of man is specifically excluded? I'm not saying this is a definitive conclusion here either, but this verse, if anything, seems to reaffirm that woman is in God's image, but still reaffirming the God > man > woman chain of authority and "glory."

What is the actual danger?

1 upvotes · 13 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Then they scratch their heads and wonder why the fruit is crap

I don't think they see it as crap though. I think we're the only ones who recognize it for what it is. A sinner loves their sin. Only the Christian knows how disgusting and rotten it is.

What is the actual danger?

1 upvotes · 13 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

My point in referencing the authors wasn't to prove who was right and who was wrong. It's simply to say that the modern day leaders of the church are still reading and drawing from that 1800 years of church history that you said they are entirely throwing away. They're not. They're accepting influence from these men, but doing their best in wisdom and the Spirit to discern what's true from false. Unless you're proposing that one of the early church fathers actually had 100% of all theology correct and no one should ever disagree with him? Other than Jesus, of course. Even in their own day, the fathers of the church throughout time constantly disagreed with one another. So who do we trust? Are you shocked, then, that people today agree with some things that some ancient guy said, but disagree with other things? There is no unanimous opinion here.

Such as this entire paragraph:

I have no idea what you're talking about. It seems to me like you're looking at media coverage and a handful of bloggers. I don't count people pressing the "like" button on facebook as a legitimate protest ... otherwise most people on the planet would be considered protesters and activists. In reality we know they're just lazy bums who spend too much time on social media.

the religious Right is the only group opposing (or used to) legalizing of gay marriage in the West

Sure, a select few "used to" actually do something to oppose it, and countless others were opposed to it in their hearts but did nothing to show it. But at the same time, once the law is changed, no matter which country, it's really, really, really unlikely to get that reversed immediately. Prohibition is about the only time I can think of that happening on a national scale like that. Even Trump's alleged repeal of Obamacare was really just a series of tweaks and adjustments.

But it won't get into secularism, feminism, and all other manners of perversions and destructions.

So you think the seculars, the feminists, and perverts are going to think society is better under the fruit of the Church rather than under leaders who promote secularism, feminism, and perversions? Your point before was that if the world saw the fruit of what the church could do, they would likely agree the world is a better place. I'm simply not buying it - the secular will always want the secular.

So cool! Whats the problem then?

The same thing as within Protestantism: other theological differences.

Here's the thing: the Catholics and Orthodox set themselves apart because they believe tradition gives them some extra right to do so - that they're better than everyone else because they're somehow descended from the apostles (as if Protestants aren't). From their perspective and how they understand ecclesiology, that makes sense.

But from a Protestant perspective, the Catholics and Orthodox aren't any different from the Baptists and Pentacostals and Nazarene and Methodists and Presbyterians and Lutherans, etc. They might as well be just another Protestant denomination. The only reason they're not is because they object to that label.

The one exception is the hard-core Calvinists, who often suggest that the office of the papacy is the seat of the anti-Christ (i.e. whoever the pope is at a given time *is the anti-Christ) and that all Catholics are therefore serving the anti-Christ to the degree that they know and pursue actual Catholic doctrine. I do believe they grant broad leniency to those who attend Catholic mass, but are clueless about Catholic doctrine and just love Jesus. I'll let OZ speak on that more, though, as I'm sure he's more familiar with hard-core Calvinist culture than I am.

What is the actual danger?

1 upvotes · 12 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Mobile, so can't respond fully, but you're confusing past with present. Didn't preach the gospel and don't have it today are two different things.

There was corruption before Theodosius I, but nowhere near the same degree.

Nobody abandoned 1800 years of wisdom. Everyone still built off of what came before. They just abandoned the man made structure. Also, a lot of that wisdom was actually corruption, so someone had to sort it out at some point.

I agree that tradition is fallible yet important. I have often made my claim that every denomination has received a genuine revelation and goes awry when they center all theology around that revelation. Tradition is that revelation for the Catholic church.

A return to patriarchy would certainly be one potential solution, but you're only looking to the worldly impact, as the Jewish zealots did. I'm more interested in the impact on God's spiritual kingdom in heaven, not as much the physical kingdom on earth.

What is the actual danger?

1 upvotes · 12 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Back then they couldn't serve God. They could only serve what a corrupt hierarchy told them was God. That's why people like CS Lewis started arguing that God would judge people by what they did with what they were given rather than expecting them actually to serve him.

But no, I'm not saying all Catholics and Orthodox are going to hell or that they lack the true Gospel. I'm only saying that throughout most of three church's history they weren't preaching the true Gospel. They were preaching whatever kept them in power. People were being saved not through the church, but despite it. Today people can find genuine salvation through the church, although they choose to live despite it.

I actually attribute some of this benefit to a concept you condemn: separation of church and state. When Theodosius I mandated everyone to be Christian, communing church and state, he invited three corruption to come in. When the church tasted power, we saw that even the church is not immune to the concept that power corrupts. When in America there ceased to be a direct political power connected with the church, we saw the church starting to straighten itself out for a while ... until culture degraded so far that it undermined the progress the church had made, as the church then attempted to follow culture to appease it to keep numbers in the door, per your 20 year lag estimate and my post on the denominational life cycle.

TLDR: withdrawing time & attention, the last ditch, roommate, not wife

1 upvotes · 12 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree - that our mission to God is above familial obligation.

TLDR: withdrawing time & attention, the last ditch, roommate, not wife

1 upvotes · 12 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

7:29 - "From now on, let those who have wives live as though they had none"

What is the actual danger?

1 upvotes · 11 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Meh ... I'm not convinced. As bad as things are now, there were some seriously dark times in the church's history before sola scriptura became a thing. Although culture has continued to degrade, I do believe the church today is in a better place than where it was when Martin Luther seceded, for instance.

How Institutions Die

1 upvotes · 11 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

What do you have to do to renew a institution to get back to basics without founding another one?

In this comment I wrote the following:

Specifically, I hold that there are 6 contexts in which we can engage in a mission with respect to the church:

- Despite the Church: This is when the church is directly opposed to what you're doing and you find no support; so you must leave the church to pursue your mission
- Outside the Church: The church isn't opposed to what you're doing, but they won't endorse or support it and they won't allow it in their walls, so you've got to do it on your own separately while otherwise continuing to attend.
- Within the Church: The church isn't opposed, but they won't endorse/support it, but they don't object to your engaging with its members toward your mission.
- Utilizing the Church: The church isn't opposed, but they won't endorse/support, but their existing independent functions offer a useful opportunity to work toward your purpose in tandem with them working toward theirs.
- Transforming the Church: The church thinks what you're doing is good and they're willing to learn from you and adopt your mission as part of their vision for the entire congregation (i.e. not just "cool idea, go start a ministry for whoever wants to join).
- Alongside the Church: The church is already on board with your mission and have adopted it in their vision and you're supply spurring one another on.

The institution becomes the way it is because of the leadership. Most visionaries choose the "despite the church" path because most church leaders are very stubborn and not willing to change. Some visionaries work outside the church or within until they gain traction. If the visionary utilizes the church's resources for his purposes, there's a good chance his influence will rub off. If the visionary makes his focus to transform the church, that's what will recycle the institution back to the original vision (or a new one, for good or bad) without causing a split. I could give several examples of this type of stuff happening - both with good visions and bad ones - but I'll just assume this makes sense unless you say otherwise :p

How can you achieve a big organisation which puts vision first from start to eternity?

The only way I know of is the way Jesus modeled: discipleship. Size only becomes a hindrance to the vision if the leaders are the only ones trained to carry out the vision. Under the current church model, the leaders in the church treat are only occasionally trained to make disciples. They are more intentionally trained at keeping people in the church and bringing in small numbers of people just to keep them in too. Most of it is a placation game. Because the members of the church are not trained to carry out the vision on their own, and the only people who MIGHT have that training are the people who are preoccupied with administrative/organizational obligations.

But imagine if every person in a church was trained at disciple-making. Most people's first reactions to this suggestion is to assume that there would have to be some course or curriculum to put all the walk-ins through. Why? Because most newcomers to churches today are walk-ins (whether by invitation or on their own) who have never been discipled before. But if everyone in the church is trained at disciple-making and has actually been discipled, then the church's primary form of growth will not be from walk-ins, but through the next generation of disciples.

If a church were to start from scratch, this would mean very slow growth in the early phases and incredibly fast growth in the later stages. But there would also be more than sufficient leaders among the people to sustain the growth. Under the current church model, there are only a select few who are employed to manage the growth - and if the growth exceeds their capacity, the solution is not to train the people to manage themselves through intentional disciple-making ... it's to hire a new staff member. Given the ratio of congregants to staff members at virtually every church, it's impossible for each staff member to have an appreciable impact on the lives of the congregants toward the great commission. Instead, they're just maintaining people and hoping that God teaches them what they need to know to advance the great commission or make disciples ... or some churches just don't even expect that from their congregants in the first place.

That's some of the theory behind the issue, anyway. There's a lot of more pragmatic stuff, if that's what you were looking for, but I chose to address the question by giving a bird's eye model rather than a specific methodology ... but I could share that too ... it would just take a while :p

How Institutions Die

1 upvotes · 10 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That was the whole point of the institutionalization phase - that after enough growth and organization a shift happens away from the vision and toward the betterment of the institution itself. As noted in the original post, some Christians allege that this is actually a good thing. I think otherwise.

Of course, my one anecdote does little to prove that God would be faithful to all other churches as well, if we relied on his provision rather than secular means of keeping the institution alive. Fortunately we have clear scripture on point for that one ... But it's easier to trust the proven methods of the world than God's Word.

What's even worse is that the world's institutionalization method actually works so darn well ... But it kills the vision in order to work. Yet the institution says, "If it's working, why mess with it?" And they wrongly attribute as God's provision what the enemy is giving. Better to Satan than a dying church living in God's power for God's purposes is a thriving power dependent on his provision placated beyond the point of being effective.

How Institutions Die

1 upvotes · 10 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm confused. What was your point?

What is the actual danger?

1 upvotes · 9 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It is, indeed, beautiful. My best friend from jr high/high school's father was an EO priest and I attended his services occasionally. I do remember loving the marvel of it all. Of course, a local EO church building is nowhere near what you see in the video.

As for the beauty in the rest of it ... remember that the producers are intentionally trying to frame it to bring a tear to your eye ;)

If converts is all you want, being "light of the world" is still the best way to maximize converts.

Agreed.

and while we are on this topic: the past 400 years~ has proven that Sola Scriptura is incapable of leading societies... something to think about Hahaha ... Oh, I look at it more as if the first 1,600 years proved that tradition did a far, far, far worse job. We know that society will degenerate into greater depravity over time until Christ's return, so I'm not expecting society to improve ... but I do think we're far better off today on a spiritual level than where society was for the first 1500 or so years of Christianity after the apostles all died. Or, more pointedly, the 1300-ish years following Theodosius I's reign as Emperor of Rome - the guy who screwed it all up by culturalizing the church in the first place.

How Institutions Die

1 upvotes · 9 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Cool, you already know then ;)

How Institutions Die

1 upvotes · 9 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Do you mean from the time of Theodosius I through the reformation? You've got google at your fingertips.

What is the actual danger?

1 upvotes · 9 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Top result on Google: critical decline in orthodox church membership. After being nearly bamboozled by the Orthodox church when I contemplated joining, I'm very cautious about claims made about them or by them.

Even from a purely numbers perspective, being not feminized is how you maximize converts.

I don't understand this claim.

Other than that, I agree with the heart in what you're saying. The blue pill does set a terrible example and #2 really is a huge "if."

What is the actual danger?

1 upvotes · 9 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'll probably come back to give a more full comment, but for now I want to respond to something you said to /u/rocknrollchuck:

Those same people, before Christ, would not have attended a feminist church because their socio-political ideologies were more important to them than a prospective faith. So, if the church had not feminized itself those people would have gone to hell. Right?

Correct. Men are designed by God to be natural leaders (i.e. alphas). The church right now is targeting women and beta men to join the flock. This makes sense, given that "it is the sick who need a doctor, not the healthy" and like the Pharisees, most alpha men assume they are healthy. That's not to say alphas can't be humble too; rather, it's that it's harder to steer an alpha - to get him to follow you, because he's more naturally bent to lead and to want to bring you into his frame. It's extremely hard for the church to target alpha men. Is it better to save countless women and betas or a select few alphas?

Suppose the church changed its strategy and started targeting alpha men instead of betas. What would happen?

This is the connection to discipleship here. The disciple-maker asks: *Is it better to add thousands of followers to the church daily or to multiply through a few leaders annually? I know for a fact that you know the math on this: if you add 1,000 people every day for 30 years of ministry, you've just saved 10,920,000! That's a lot of people in a somewhat exaggerated example, as we know it would be virtually impossible to maintain that pattern, which is why most churches taper off in size. Now, suppose you target one alpha who will adopt the mission and run with it instead of those 1,000. And suppose you spend an entire year on just that one guy, pain-stakingly reorienting his life toward the mission of disciple-making. At the end of year 1 you have 2 guys, at the end of year 2 you have 4, at the end of year 3 you have 8 ... by year 30 you've reached 1,073,741,824. That's 10x more people! And if a person's ministry starts in his 20s or 30s, he's probably got more like 60 years of ministry to put in - and on an exponential scale. So, even if he does have some dud disciples he makes, I can all but guarantee that the ministry that flows from his life will be far more effective than the ministry of addition when targeting followers instead of new leaders.

But I'm not even done yet! The beauty in what we're trying to do with this sub is that we're not just trying to bring alphas into the faith (although that too); rather, we're trying to help the beta men who have already been indoctrinated into the church become alpha. It's a nice little double-whammy there, and there's a giant pool of beta men floating around who, if they alpha-ed up and adopted the mission of Christ, could radically change the world from one end to the other.

Does theology triumph over biology?

1 upvotes · 9 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Ah, I didn't notice that. Thanks for the heads up.

The Feminine Imperative has replaced the Holy Spirit

1 upvotes · 9 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

True. Though I do think there's a difference between intentional service and unwittingly passive. Otherwise we'd all have thousands of masters.

The Feminine Imperative has replaced the Holy Spirit

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's not spontaneous, though. That's reacting to the unstable environment the guy is fostering (whether intentionally or not). He creates sexual tension. She reacts.

If he's a supplicating beta, how often do you think he'll be creating that sexual tension as compared with trying to avoid tension hoping that will increase sexuality?

To be clear, it's certainly a scale. Women can and are spontaneous at times. But it's maybe 95% responsive and 5% spontaneous.

Does theology triumph over biology?

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Now I see where you're coming from.

If he's referencing actual sinful conduct, then I agree with what he's saying, though I would word it more that Christ triumphs over biological impulses toward sinful behavior. The theology itself doesn't do anything if not through Christ in us.

If he's using "biology" as a reference to all sexual desire, that's certainly inappropriate, as not all sexual desire is sinful. But I believe Piper would also agree that sexual desire is healthy in the context of marriage, and not necessarily sinful outside of marriage, otherwise 1 Cor. 7 would never give a context for people to get married in the first place.

It's not "Fitness Test", it's a Sh*t Test

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with you in concept, but in addition to what the words imply, we also have to select words that adequately convey what we're trying to say.

So, if we called them "evil sin women are depraved tests," that would certainly convey the type of sentiment you're going for. But no one would have any idea what we're talking about. It could be a reference to a high school biology exam, for all they know.

Calling it a "fitness test" might not convey the sentiment, but it certainly addresses the concept appropriately.

In a battle between the two, communicating the right concept is a higher priority than communicating the right sentiment, although I agree that both have immense value. I still have yet to see a suggested alternative that other RP men could read and say, "Oh yeah, that. I know what he's talking about." In the meantime, MMSLP called them fitness tests. The greater RP community knows them by that name. That name avoids profanity, which regardless of what you say will continue to be a priority to me. So, I think it's appropriate.

As to the rest of your comment, I do not equate masculinity and harshness as being the same, nor do I find a Scriptural basis for this. I'm happy to entertain any Scripture to show me otherwise, though.

It's not "Fitness Test", it's a Sh*t Test

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

"Punish" and "discipline" is one and the same.

No, they're not.

The only difference, if there is one, is the motivation behind it.

That's one difference. The other is the utilitarian purpose of discipline as opposed to the retributive function. The way you "punish" someone from a retributive perspective will be very different from how you "discipline" someone from a utilitarian standpoint.

Yes, "fitness test" is but an attempt to make "s.../compliance tests" sound moral.

No, it was merely a method of finding an alternative to a cuss word. I seem to recall making this a primary point in the beginning. You're trying to impute a motive on me that simply wasn't there. If you want to come up with some other name for it that is more direct, be my guest - call it "sinful requests made by women as a test tests" for all I care. I wish you well in trying to get whatever you come up with to catch on.

But let's not pretend actual "fitness tests" aren't a thing at all. Yes, I get that you only believe in compliance tests, but you will not persuade me that "fitness tests" don't exist too, or that the two don't often overlap.

The Feminine Imperative has replaced the Holy Spirit

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

But words matter. Although it may seem like splitting hairs, this distinction is highly relevant. This word choice makes the tacit implication to the rest of society that the church - and even God himself - places identification with an institution as its primary aim.

To add to my previous comment, and more to /u/Rollo-Tomassi, this is one of the stark dangers in how this woman is thinking and communicating. It shows that her own soteriological framework is centered around self-identification and not around Christ. But it also shows that her misguided framework can affect how society understands the Gospel itself. When we detract from Christ himself in favor of an institutionalized label, the church very much works against God's interests in advancing the Gospel and only promotes the interests of advancing the label.

The fact that she answered "no" doesn't change the impact that this framing of the question has toward adopting an institutionalized view of the "church" to begin with, as compared to the actual spiritual bond that Christ meant when he prayed "that all of them may be one, Father, just as you are in me and I am in you. May they also be in us so that the world may believe that you have sent me." Remove this spiritual bond for an institutionalized identification and we also lose the "so that" part of the passage.

It's not "Fitness Test", it's a Sh*t Test

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

aka Emperor of the Universe.

Sure, but Christ doesn't act the way you're describing a "well-respected Emperor" would act. He doesn't "relieve you of your post and smear your name all over the news the next day" simply because you prayed for something stupid. I really have no idea how your brain is trying to connect all this right now.

"If you are God, you will do X"

That's not a compliance test, though.

admit that it is disrespect. And disrespecting your husband is a sin.

Of course I admit this. I literally just said it in the part you quoted. But different sins warrant different responses, and those responses should be modeled after how Christ interacts with his bride. You've given some great examples of how sinful men have responded to these types of things. I'm not interested in that. The goal isn't to punish women. The goal is to increase godliness - both in the man and in his wife. But I cannot change another person. I cannot change women. You cannot change women. Only God can do that. And even God often opts not to change people in the absence of their express request that he do so. So, why do you keep going on and on about punishing women? Didn't John say, "There is no fear in love, but perfect love casts out fear. For fear has to do with punishment, and whoever fears has not been perfected in love"? (1 John 4:18). Didn't Paul write, "There is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus"? (Romans 8:1). So, where are you drawing this idea that a wife must be punished for her sin?

If you want to go punish people who aren't your wife when they test you, go for it. How does God punish them? He withdraws his presence from them and does not let them into relationship with him. Great. Go do that. But show me a biblical basis for the model you're proposing and I'd be happy to reconsider. But that basis had better be reflected in how Christ interacts with his bride.

It's not "Fitness Test", it's a Sh*t Test

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not defending women. I'm just describing how they behave. I'm not saying it's a morally right thing. In fact, I've said the opposite - that it is the product of sin. But it is what it is. RP is not about changing women. It is about understanding the truth of how they function and utilizing the system for our purposes. RPC simply assumes "our purposes" are "God's purposes" if we are in Christ.

try to ask a well-respected Emperor

Meh, you're just advocating that men should be violent and aggressive now. I don't see those as being biblical principles in this context. Other contexts, sure ... good luck on this one. Besides, I'm not supposed to model myself after a "well-respected Emperor." I'm to mode myself after Christ. We ask him to do stupid stuff for us all the time. "Jesus, please heal my grandmother's hung toe nail. It's really hurting her." I haven't seen such a Christian be smitten with lightning yet.

Wow, so sh.../fitness tests are a "help" now?

I'm so confused on how you are reading what I wrote.

Why the Church is Dead

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It can start nice and easy as a weekend bible study with friends then it turns into more.

This is worthy of a post. I've already got the content written ... I'll paste and adapt it soon.

Yet I have yet to meet a male christian in my community that is worth talking to. they are mostly vapid, or lack depth.

Isn't that why we were given the mission to make disciples? We're not called to "Go and find disciples from among all the nations." We're called to go and make disciples of all nations. If people don't meet your expectations, you disciple them into becoming someone worth relating with.

Why the Church is Dead

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

At least you're honest.

It's not "Fitness Test", it's a Sh*t Test

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

But a wife tests his husband, hey that's fine. Yep.

Nah, I've acknowledged a few times that this is a product of the fall. But there are "sins" in the proper sense, which are morally condemnable, and there is "sin" in the general sense, which is found in the way the world functions. Just as men had an operating system overhaul after the fall, so did women. Fitness testing is part of that overhaul. Yes, it's a product of sin. Pre-fall they wouldn't have to test at all because men would actually be who they were designed to be. But the fact that they operate like this now doesn't make it morally condemnable behavior. It just labels her a "sinful person," just like the student is labeled a "rebellious kid." The treason example is totally off-point. Testing through requests is very different from acting defiantly. Active defiance should have consequences. But asking the government to regulate something like cow farts ... that's not treason. Of course, that would fall in the category of compliance testing and not fitness testing.

But then you have situations like the bill passed by Texas lawmakers to commemorate the Boston Strangler for his "unconventional techniques involving population control. This guy wasn't trying to get away with anything. He was testing his colleagues to see if they were fit to be passing legislation. They were not. It's also not treason.

It's to be a helpmeet to her husband, and serve God.

The Bible is pretty clear that (unless she's single) her purpose to "serve God" is defined by her help to her husband.

So if her husband doesn't "Man up!", she doesn't have to or can't fulfil her purpose and direction in life? WTF?

No, it just means that she's fulfilling a moot purpose. It's still her purpose. She's still being faithful to what God asked of her. It's not her fault her husband is squandering the resources God is having her throw at him vis a vis her help. And that's not to say she can't do other things ... I just don't see much of imperative that she must do other things or have her own independent purpose outside of what God has called her husband to lead the family in doing. Do you have any passages in mind? Admittedly, I'm not super well-versed on passages where God gives women an independent calling that diverges from her husband's leadership.

Why the Church is Dead

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent post - both the original and SE's commentary.

I could give one anecdote after the next, but the most recent is from three weeks ago, when my pastor said from the stage: "If Jesus had Twitter, he would be writing right now, 'I support #metoo.'"

I had a talk with him afterward about that comment and he agreed that was a dumb thing to say and that he's in total ignorance about all the ridiculous garbage the #metoo campaign has caused. He said he'd edit the video afterward to remove that part ... not sure if he ever did. At least he's willing to listen to reason, even if his foundation is in the wrong place to begin with.

More to the point, as I noted to /u/ReddJive, there's a difference between the institutional church and the koinonia and ekklesia referenced in the Bible. One can reject the institutionalization of the church, yet still embrace relationships with other believers.

That said, it's often said that the purpose of "the red pill" is not to change the system, but to use the system to make it work for us.

So, my response is not to abandon the institutionalized church. Rather, I use my "church" for my own purposes - purposes which I believe are straight from God, which the institutionalized church has otherwise abandoned. I have found great success in this method, as have several of my IRL peers.

Why the Church is Dead

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for referencing this. I hadn't seen that one - and although I may differ on a few points, it is on the whole a work of art.

Why the Church is Dead

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Personally, I don't buy into the view that the institutionalized "church" is what the Bible meant when it referenced the words ekklesia and koinonia (although I know my Cathodox friends would disagree). To that end, I don't fault you for leaving the institutionalized church.

That said, do you still have a network of believers with whom you meet regularly for the purpose of building one another up and spurring each other on toward love and good deeds? Hebrews 10:24-25 and all. If the answer is yes, then you have a koinonia bond among believers, which is your "local church," and when you consider the network they have with other believers, who are networked with others, etc. that's how you fit within the greater ekklesia.

Just make sure you're not abandoning all real-life, in-person connections with other believers in an intentional environment.

It's not "Fitness Test", it's a Sh*t Test

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Never seen it. Is it good?

It's a classic. A nerdy teacher goes into a classroom of all the "bad kids" who are "too cool for school" and tries to teach them math. They try to walk all over him, but it turns out they really did want to succeed all along - they just didn't believe anyone was willing or able to help them do it. He does it. These "troubled youths" end up going from failing grades and being sentenced to summer school to passing AP Calculus by senior year.

It's actually a true story. And as the movie also reflects, the school board thought all the kids cheated because no one believed any of them could pass the test ... so they had to re-take the test several months later in a more controlled environment, and they passed again.

Exactly. Which I mentioned in the OP: "S...-tests" are to see how much she can get away with, and how likely she is to get her way

And to see if her man will actually take charge and give her a purpose and direction in life and boundaries to fulfill it. It's not just about getting her way. It's also about knowing her husband can lead.

210 - Mission Matters. Nothing Else Matters. Only Mission. Go.

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed. I've always seen AM as a mind-frame/perspective and not as an actual response. But that perspective might inspire someone to poke fun at the situation too :)

It's not "Fitness Test", it's a Sh*t Test

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Oh, come on. I'm sure you've seen Stand and Deliver. At first it was about the kids doing whatever they wanted. But it quickly turned into a test of whether or not this guy could actually teach them something - and they tested him hard about it. In the end, they wanted to learn under a good teacher - and they did.

This is how it goes in real life too. Ever read a book on child psychology? It's virtually unanimously agreed that children do not want to get their way all the time. Instead, virtually every child psychologist accepts that children have an affirmative desire to have their parents set rules and boundaries. Those boundaries give the children comfort and security, knowing that they will be loved, protected, and safe as long as they don't stray, and that it will benefit them long-term.

It's the same with wives. I can't count the number of times throughout the first 7 years of my marriage when my wife would get upset with me over this very issue. The most common example was the quality of housework. I had a very low standard. In my blue pill mindset, I believed that maintaining a low standard would take the pressure off of my wife to have everything looking perfect and spotless. Good, right? She gets away with not having to do a ton of housework. This is your concept of "seeing how much she can get away with."

What was her response? At least once every 3 months freaking out at me. Over what? "Why won't you get angry at me for leaving the house like this?!? I get that you don't want to put pressure on me, but that's not what I want. You need to start caring. You need to figure out what things should look like and yell at me when it doesn't happen." I kid you not. This happened at least 4 times a year.

So, no. My wife's nagging me about certain household issues weren't to see how much she could get away with or lightening her load or increasing mine. It was 100% about wanting me to take charge and seeing if I would do it, then getting furiously mad when I wouldn't.

210 - Mission Matters. Nothing Else Matters. Only Mission. Go.

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Outcome Independence: I'm going to do this even if she doesn't respond the way I want. Why? Because that's what I want to do and I'm not going to be controlled by her responses.

Amused Mastery: In the grand scheme of things, this isn't a big deal. No matter how severe her emotional reaction is, I've got a good perspective on the situation.

I used to get reamed on MRP for applying OI on a larger scale and was repeatedly put in my place, being told by mods and ECs alike that OI is only about isolated incidents. AM is more about a larger perspective.

211 - An anatomy of butthurt and the impact on frame

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Consider a wife who doesn't even have to ask because her husband takes care of that for her.

This is, of course, the ideal. And I do this type of stuff all the time, personally. The problem isn't in doing the task. It's in why you're doing the task. If it's because the guy is a leader who gets stuff done, props to him. If it's because his wife/mommy had to tell him to do it and he's afraid of what might happen if he says no ... that's not so cool. A guy can't do things of his own volition until he first learns to say no to doing things of someone else's volition. Once he has that freedom to say no, then he can choose whether to comply with requests or do his own thing - and whatever he does, it's from a right motive.

It's not "Fitness Test", it's a Sh*t Test

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

"See how much we can get away with" = "See how capable of a leader he is." They're the same. The only distinction is that you're saying her motive is to maximize her freedoms (which we also agree with: the BB side of hypergamy). We're all saying that she has a second motive as well: she wants to be with a strong leader.

The sinful nature causes women to want to maximize their freedoms with a beta bucks. But original design is still mixed in there as well, which is the desire to have a man lead - to be with an alpha. How can a woman know if he's alpha? She can't ask him because most guys would give false impressions to get in her pants. Instead, she has to observe his behaviors. But how's she going to do that when she just met the guy at the bar? She has to concoct a situation where he will display those behaviors. Ergo ... she tests him to see which he is.

In marriage it's a bit different. They do get to observe behaviors, but the routine of daily life puts both people on auto-pilot a lot of the time. So, when the husband doesn't have opportunity to show his alpha, she doesn't know if he's gone beta because of the routine nature of marriage, and therefore has given up leading in exchange for that routine, or if the routine is a product of his leadership. To that end, she must do things periodically to remind herself - and it's a win-win for her. Either she gets her requests met (BB) or she is affirmed that her husband is a capable leader (AF).

So yes, both the fall and original design are mixed up in women, just as is the case for men (though we obviously follow a different pattern).

211 - An anatomy of butthurt and the impact on frame

1 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

True, true. But those are not tools new guys should be playing with.

Self-Righteousness, Pietism and RP

1 upvotes · 6 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

True ... but I don't see all of it.

Self-Righteousness, Pietism and RP

1 upvotes · 6 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It amazes me how parents' lives nowadays seem to revolve around toting kids to various activities.

This is how millenials were born ... everything revolved around them all their lives, and now they think it still should.

When I was growing up, we were expected to amuse ourselves and not pester the adults unless someone was bleeding copiously, lol.

Me too.

The thread I alluded to on MRP definitely struck me as an "I stood up to Mommy!" brag.

It did have that tone, but I like to give people the benefit of the doubt.

Sad when a relationship descends to that level, IMO

Agreed.

Self-Righteousness, Pietism and RP

1 upvotes · 6 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

In the world in which I grew up, the husband got first pick off the platter of fried chicken

That's definitely different. Everything has always been in the reverse for as long as I've ever known it. Kids went first so that they had something to keep them occupied while the adults served themselves. Then the men always had to let the women go first, and the guys went last. It was passed off as being a "servant," but it really was just more of a social convention, as very few of the men actively contemplated service through this structure ... they were just doing what had always been done. I've never been in a social environment where it wasn't "ladies first."

terrible twos

Oh, I'm fully aware of the concept. I have 4 kids and my profession has me working alongside child psychologists and experts on child development constantly, and as a Guardian ad Litem, I'm constantly taking courses teaching me the cutting edge information on child development. So, I agree entirely that the "terrible twos" is a thing (although my personal experience says that the 3s are the worst).

My point wasn't to contest the idea of the terrible twos. It was to challenge the notion that this can in any way remotely be tied to a marriage relationship. A person only has context to shame someone with, "You're acting like a child," if she considers herself to have authority as a mother.

But the reverse is the same too. My kids often ask me for things. As their father I have to tell them "no" almost as often as they try to play the "no" game with me. Does that mean I'm acting like a child when I constantly tell my kids "no ... no ... no ... no ... no" when they want to do dangerous things or when they ask 100x for a piece of candy before dinner? No, that's me acting like an adult.

Likewise, how often does the government want to do stuff and the president has to say no? How many CEOs have to repeatedly cry "no" to their employees who want to get away with more and more? When children say "no" it's usually to legitimate requests. When people in positions of responsibility say "no" it's usually because there's a greater purpose behind the decision - even if that purpose is nothing more than to foster respect for authority. Sure, you could probably come up with several examples where a CEO does this with wrong motives. But that doesn't change the fact that many do it for right motives.

Similarly, we can't just automatically conclude a man is acting like a child when he constantly says no to his wife, unless we are also concluding that his wife is trying to treat him like a child or act like his mother. And if there are alternative and legitimate examples of men learning to say "no" in a right context, we must explore those possibilities too before drawing a cheap comparison to a two year old.

Self-Righteousness, Pietism and RP

1 upvotes · 6 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That would all make sense if, in fact, we did live in an ideal world. But the fact is that boys are taught from a young age that they must serve women. Outside the church there is no reason given. Inside the church there is a reason given, but it's lost on most because it's easier for parents just to pass it off on the secular world and sari that's just how the world should work.

That said, the terrible twos analogy is lost on me. It only makes sense if you treat the words wife and mommy as synonymous or if you believe deep down somewhere that a wife should have authority over her husband. Take that foundation away and there's nothing wrong with a man saying no to every request.

Now ... will that type of behavior get him his intended result if perpetuated ad infinitum? Probably not. Even MMSLP acknowledges that some requests are reasonable and should be complied with. The only time when the answer should always be no is for actual compliance tests. If she's not testing and just needs help ... a guy is free to say yes, as long as he first internalizes that he also has the freedom to say no.

Self-Righteousness, Pietism and RP

1 upvotes · 6 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Why are you still funding her? Take her name off the bank accounts and credit cards. If she's not going to contribute to the marriage, why should she get to leech?

If you cut her off, she'll either make the decision to leave for you (hint: if she's as pious as she thinks, she won't) or she'll start to realize how good you've been to her (more likely but not a guarantee) or she'll resent you even more but you won't care because you'll be enjoying the financial freedom. Plus, as you start spending the money on yourself, the less she'll get in the event of a divorce, the less motivation for her to leave, the more motivation to shape up.

Self-Righteousness, Pietism and RP

1 upvotes · 6 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good questions here. I'll just add to OP that roses and chocolates and supplication don't make you a hero ... they make you a meal ticket. What types of guys did she used to fantasize about as a teenager before she got so up tight? That's not to say you supplicate by becoming that man. Rather, you look for principles that you can incorporate. And don't defer to professions. Women aren't attracted to professions. They are attracted to the kinds of men who do well in those professions. Those traits can be carried into you as a man no matter what your profession.

Self-Righteousness, Pietism and RP

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Hard indeed. That's why it has value. Nobody greatly values something that's easy.

Self-Righteousness, Pietism and RP

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Hahaha. That's funny. It's rare for someone to directly negotiate like that. Women are usually covert in their bargaining.

Also, "not butthurt" and "robot" are mutually exclusive. Stoicism doesn't mean to withdraw all emotion (which is butthurt). It means that you can tolerate intense torture without being affected.

- negative emotional reaction = butthurt
- No emotion = butthurt
- positive emotion = not butthurt

The only way to be not butthurt is to react with positive emotion.

It's not "Fitness Test", it's a Sh*t Test

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Secular RP organizes them differently, but yes. Secular RP uses the term "fitness test" as an umbrella over all such circumstances. Beneath that they have s tests and comfort tests.

Due to my refusal to use the s word, before creating RPC it was recommended I say "fitness test" instead of "s-test." To distinguish, I started using the terminology "fitness tests" and "comfort tests" as the only two in my paradigm. What you're referencing as a dichotomy between fitness tests and s-tests I have just called fitness tests regardless of the differences between them.

In reality, better terminology would be: (1) comfort tests, (2) fitness tests, and (3) compliance tests.

For secular RP purposes, 2 and 3 make sense to be called s-tests. For RPC purposes, I can see responds for distinguishing or grouping.

It's not "Fitness Test", it's a Sh*t Test

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It depends on the motive at the time. If it's done for the purpose of testing fitness (as in the case of the several examples I gave you), then it's not wrong. It's like Gideon testing with the fleece or Thomas testing to see Jesus' hand-holes, or God saying, "Bring the full tithe into the storehouse, that there may be food in my house. And thereby put me to the test, says the Lord of hoes, if I will not open the windows of heaven for you and pour down for you a blessing until there is no more need" (Malachi 3:10). Those kinds of tests are fine. Women do fitness test along these lines. Like Gideon, they want to make sure they're following someone who can come through when the going gets tough before putting them and their children's lives on the line. Yes, divorce is favorable to a woman by comparison ... but it's also still worse than if she had married the right man in the first place.

If her purpose is simply to be a nag and get her way, that's sin and needs to be responded to as such.

Wife had abortion without telling me

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

So you're on board with me: just tell people not to get married in the first place :p

It's not "Fitness Test", it's a Sh*t Test

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, I'll still disagree. I think it's both, as I've already said.

No. You punish her. You shall not test the Lord... even if he passes/ignores your tests.

How does God punish people in a New Testament, post-Gospel world? Romans 1:18 et seq. - "God gave them over to ..."

If God's form of punishment is to ignore us and let us waddle around in our own sinfulness until we return to his headship, we as husbands do the same. Wife doesn't want to follow? Ignore her and keep on pursuing your mission until she's ready to come back or irreconcilably runs off, which 1 Cor. 7 also allows (after Matthew 18 if she calls herself a Christian).

It's not "Fitness Test", it's a Sh*t Test

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

any speech-limitation is by the Feminine Imperative to tone police

Non-feminists can limit speech too. Just look at North Korea or most of the middle east.

More to the point on this, you'll note that I approve virtually every comment with profanity in it (including this one, which triggered the auto-mod filter). Nevertheless, there have been several incidents in the past where trolls came in here mouthing off ... and trolls virtually always come with profanity. So, I'd rather have the post removed and manually approve it rather than risk getting troll spammed and have to manually look for and remove all of their comments.

And yes, she is testing his fitness. I'm not sure how you're missing this :p

sigh ... it was only 14 minutes

Wife had abortion without telling me

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Because the theology of "complementarianism" isn't what's bad - it's the application of those who ascribe that label to themselves. If we followed your logic, we should say, "Don't marry Christian women" because 99% of Christian women fall under hypergamous AWALT models. In reality, you WANT a true, genuine Christian woman, even if most people who self-identify with that label are not actual Christians. In the same way, you WANT a true, genuine complementarian, even if 99% of people who self-identify with that label are not actual complementarians in practice. See what I'm saying?

There is no "Christian version" of anything

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well said.

Self-Righteousness, Pietism and RP

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Where they all are now? I don't know

Go here and listen to the top sermon: "Born to Reproduce." Dawson Trotman tells a story exactly like this. He went every day for over a year on the principle that he would not go to sleep without sharing his faith with at least one person each day. One day he comes across a man walking along the side of the road and picks him up to give him a ride. He shares Christ with that man only to realize that he had already shared Christ with that man a year ago ... and the man said the prayer and confessed Christ as Lord and said all kinds of great things ... and here he was a year later and could hardly remember the Gospel and wasn't living for Christ. That's when Dawson adopted the mission of disciple-making as Jesus modeled it for us, as opposed to the church model of "Get them to say the prayer and invite them to church." I had a very similar story of people constantly saying the prayer under my witness, going to church for years ... and eventually dying away. I had literally a decade of my life invested in that kind of ministry - and I was highly praised by numerous pastors, elders, and teachers in the church - and not a single fruit to show for it from that decade today. It wasn't until I started the mission of disciple-making that I now see people several generations down from me who are still reproducing new generations and bearing good fruit. My past ministry predominantly ended up like the bad types of soil, but only after intentional disciple-making did I see a crop 30, 60, or even 100x its yield.

I wouldn't call it formal discipleship, but it seems to be heading that direction.

Excellent! You already have a starting point, which is further than most :) Take hold of this and keep driving forward.

I can definitely see how my following God on his mission has suffered since leaving full time vocational ministry.

It's possible. But I also see that most people in full-time vocational ministry end up doing it out of obligation, not out of desire. Notice those words? Evangelism is like spiritual sex and discipleship is like spiritual child-rearing. Do you like your wife to be functioning out of desire or obligation? When it's not a job, it's a lot easier to show God where your true passion is :)

It has been these last few years after the transition out of Pastoral ministry that my marriage has really been sinking.

As you appropriately note: because she doesn't respect you if you're not producing on mission. Now, there's probably also an undercurrent of her wanting the prestige of being the pastor's wife, which assists in her feeling righteous in her piety.

So naturally with all of this exercise over the last couple years, my testosterone and sex drive has greatly increased. Meanwhile, my wife's has declined from sub-average to straight boring and nearly nonexistent especially after having two kids.

Ouch. I went through that pain in my blue pill days. I even got to the point of having the rock-hard 6-pack abs, but she still had no sexual interest. After killing myself for a year to maintain that I eventually concluded that my physical fitness didn't affect her attractiveness to me, so I gained a ton of weight in the following years. Interestingly, I'm in good shape now, but still don't have that 6-pack (15% BF), yet I gave up on her and just started pursuing my mission ... and whaddaya know ... sex is back, and experimenting with new things is on the table. BTW, we just had our 4th kid 7 months ago.

Wife had abortion without telling me

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Once again, 99% of the Church are either Egalitarian, or claims to be "Complementarian" but supports disgustingly bluepill/contradictory pastors. This is what people like Dalrock exposes.

This I can agree with - and they live out blue pill ideologies in their own lives as well.

Yes, in a way you can say we RedPilled Christians are the true "Complementarians". But I won't identifying or associating with such a group where 99% of the group has "veered off-course".

Well ... that's why I refuse virtually all Christianese labels in the first place. I dare you to find one example on this sub where I identify myself with a particular denomination, for example. You won't find it.

It's not "Fitness Test", it's a Sh*t Test

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

see how much she can get away with, and how likely she is to get her way

Okay ... that's the same thing, but from a different angle. Hypergamy is AFBB. Or as /u/Rollo-Tomassi put it in his 21 Convention interview: "Alpha Seed, Beta Need."

Your author is looking at the BB side of hypergamy. He's absolutely right. With a beta husband, she wants to get away with as much as she possibly can.

But when you consider the AF/alpha-seed part of hypergamy, she likes being told "no" because it affirms the authenticity of the man's perceived alpha-ness. It makes her attracted to him because if he can pursue his mission without being swayed away by her antics, then he is that much less likely to be swayed away by the world in other areas affecting the well-being of the family. He knows what's best and right and he does it. End of story. That's very attractive to a woman.

So, if your author is beta or stuck in the world of purple, it would make perfect sense that hypergamy is just about her getting as much as she can out of the relationship. But when a man is alpha in a marriage context, that drive changes.

Although I don't take it as conclusive evidence, I have actually asked this exact question of several women, including 2 sisters, my mother, 3 female co-workers, and 3 other women in my church. I phrased it like this: "Are you ever frustrated at how often your husband/ex/bf/guys in general tell(s) you no?" Here were the results:

- Older sister (Christian) with an extreme beta husband: "You see how whipped he is. I can get him to do anything I want, and it's really annoying. I don't think he's ever said no to me. Sometimes I wish he'd say no, but in the meantime I'm just going to keep taking advantage of him." [I kid you not, these were almost her exact words. My older sister is blunt.]
- Younger sister (Christian) with an alpha husband: "I ask him to do things all the time, secretly hoping he'll tell me no. I really like that I have a strong leader for a husband and when I feel like seeing it, that's when I ask him for things like that."
- Mom, divorced Christian: "Hah! I wish your dad told me no more often. We didn't get along great, and part of that is because we never really had any boundaries for how things should go."
- Co-worker, divorced Christian: "Oh, I think it's very important for a man to know how to say no to his wife. My husband was actually very good at that and I really appreciated that he had a good grasp on how to lead our family." [They divorced for other reasons unrelated to any RP issue.]

- Co-worker, single non-Christian: "Aw, some guys are just really nice like that. I like guys who know how to make a woman happy. I've never dated one, though, so I guess I can't really know what that side is like. I just know that I've always liked the guys I dated, who were the kind who already had their own direction in life and it's just never worked out."

I'm low on time, so I'll skip the others. You get my point. There was only one person who said that she didn't like it when her husband told her no, and she was married to a career beta, so his saying "no" didn't come off as alpha attractiveness ... it came off as a "BB" not doing his job.

This is of course a feminist Frame, and must be rejected

How do you reject it? You ignore the test and do your own thing (i.e. you pass it).

To be clear, I've made the argument before that all of RP is about subjugating to the frame of women. It's all about understanding how women think, act, what makes them horny, etc. and then working within THAT framework instead of creating one's own framework.

But here's the thing: when a man creates his own frame and lives it out, prioritizing his own interests ... that's exactly the same answer as the conclusion of the person who is trying to figure out how to game women from a praxeological viewpoint. From a secular standpoint this is a weird and humorous overlap - that a man living out his frame and not buckling to his woman's is the best way to operate within her hypergamous framework. But from a Christian worldview it just looks like God creating men and women in a way that works together in perfect harmony ... until society adopts sinful attitudes in the form of the feminist imperative.

Wife had abortion without telling me

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Gotcha. That makes sense.

Wife had abortion without telling me

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I've read some Dalrock, albeit not those posts. Nevertheless, on a quick skim I'm still not persuaded.

If I had any hint at all that what you're saying is true on a theological level, I'd be more inclined to accept it as a simple difference of observational experience. But I get the impression you're taking literature away from actuality, and I'm not sure how rooted in fact Dalrock is, as compared with argument and hypothetical impression. Maybe I'm missing something and didn't scour those posts deeply enough, though.

Nevertheless, I'm incredibly active on a prominent Christian sub larger than MRP, I'm constantly reading commentaries, listening to sermons, reading books by Christian authors on-topic, etc. - and I don't get a hint at what I think you're implying about the complementarian view on any theological level. Theologically, virtually every Christian I come in contact with is on board with the notion that men lead and women follow/submit/help.

The biggest sentiment I get which skews the application of this concept is when someone says, "If the husband is a good leader, then he will put his wife's interests above his own." This is the rare position - less than 5%. The more common version (maybe 25%) will say, "If the husband is a good leader, then he will put the family's interests above his own." I think this is a sentiment that even other secular RP authors have affirmed. Of course, I expect you and I reject even this.

I'd say at least 2/3 Christians acknowledge that the purpose of male headship is to place God's interests as the highest priority and that the man is to adopt God's interests as his own, if he is to call himself Christ-like in how he leads his family. I find no fault in this attitude and this application of complementarianism. But again, this is based on observation of thousands of comments from different Christians across the internet and in-person. I'd be curious where the opposing facts come from that are so drastically in conflict with what I've seen going on.

God Punishes Beta Men

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Ah, I see it now. I assumed the link was meant to go to the comment that appeared at the top, but it was 3 comments below that and just off the page :p

Self-Righteousness, Pietism and RP

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

My wife WAS where your wife is at. She had an insane "holier than thou" attitude about everything. If she heard a couple cuss words in a movie, she'd walk away. Anything with a pg-13 sex scene was turned off with the comment: "This is too dirty. We shouldn't be watching this." Similar things to you as the whole "drinking is sin" and "any position but missionary isn't what God intended." Don't even get me started on the judgmentalism against other people (though she always hamstered herself into thinking it was righteous conviction). I'd suggest that my wife was far worse than you think your wife is ... but I doubt you'd believe me.

How do you deal with this?

You don't. I played my wife's game for a while. It started out by trying to live up to all of her legalism to impress her. Yeah, beta strategy didn't work. Then I moved into trying to convince her that she was wrong about all the things she thought were sinful. That was idiotic too. She simply argued back that I was trying to rationalize and justify my sinful desires because I wasn't willing to give them up and that God would be happier with us if we hold ourselves to extremely high standards (theologically inaccurate, but she wouldn't admit that).

Then I shifted to convicting her of her sinfulness because of her self-righteous behavior and for replacing God's actual standard with "rules taught by men." That is, instead of defending my behavior as "not-sinful" I went on the offensive with her. LET ALL MEN TAKE NOTE: this strategy also fails because women are meant to learn through following their husbands. She should derive her convictions from following me. Instead, she assumed she was getting her convictions straight from God. Because women are (in all but a few cases) incapable of discerning between their emotions and divine inspiration, she would not back down and acknowledge her own sinfulness.

Solution? I stopped playing the game.

Self-righteousness is ALWAYS rooted in a comparison game. The focus of 107 is on comparison between husbands, but the concept extends further into all comparisons women make. In this case, it's a comparison between her spiritual piety and that of other women. My solution is always the same: stop playing the game. Don't even engage.

What do you do instead? Lead her.

How do you lead her? See 208. The sidebar exists for a reason ;)

You keep trying this process and it's not working? Because you haven't adopted God's frame and you haven't developed how that will be implemented in your life (see also: the lower-right quadrant) and you haven't been practicing maintaining frame in action.

Let me summarize all of this for you very plainly: (1) Get a mission; (2) Orient every aspect of your life around fulfillment of that mission: (3) ... actually, that's it. It's just 1 and 2. Everything else on this sub just naturally works itself out if you live within your marriage as if you're single and wholly devoted to God. Seriously, that's it.

So, as much as I appreciate /u/OsmiumZulu asking for stats, which are a great indicator of how independent you are of your wife by a demonstration of your commitment to physical fitness, personal hobbies, and other stuff ... the stats I want to know most are these: *How many people are following Jesus today because of your life? Who are you discipling today? Which non-Christians have you shared your faith with in the past month?

If you're not living out this mission that God gave you, then you're not following God. You're telling God, "Sorry, but I've got better things to do than follow your lead." If that's how you follow God, why would you expect your wife to follow you any differently? She's only doing what you're modeling for her.

Self-Righteousness, Pietism and RP

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I AA'd and said, yes, maybe I am hiding something

That's actually just A. The amplify would have been: "Hey, if you know about all the girls I'm flirting with, it'll just take the fun out of it." Now you've amplified it from "hiding" to actually flirting with other girls.

You could also mix it with escalation: "Of course I'm hiding something ... just not on my phone" <point to your penis>. My wife used to be a spiritual prude too. It was so infuriating. She's learned to laugh at this stuff now ... it just took time.

Broken Record'd her for the next 20 minutes "I am not going to submit to your use of fear to interrogate me".

This is a solid move. It does show that you're starting to break out of her frame - which is good. But it's also a defensive move. It shows that you're guarding yourself against her frame (and appropriately). Your next step is to get her into your frame, which is where several NIs followed by a well-placed AA can really help. ~~Do a Ctrl+F search in my comment history for~~ ... nix that: here's the comment I was going to have you look for ... and no joke: it was already written to you back then too.

I sat there, STFU and listened to her tell me that I was being manipulative and hiding something

Well ... you were hiding something. You were hiding the fact that you had nothing to hide ... just to prove a point.

The fact that it ever escalated to this point is very problematic. You got butt-hurt over her nagging. Butt-hurt = broken frame. So, I guess the "broken record" wasn't enough to guard against her emotions. Rather than going to your car, stick the phone down your pants and say, "If you want it, you're going to have to play around down there to find it." Then, if she tries, jostle around a little and act turned on, and eventually let her have your phone. Then laugh at her when she finds nothing on it.

You say you "knew this was a perfect dread moment" - but you tried to hype up the dread. This is the definition of going Rambo: you've got a tiny little pistol to do a bit of damage, but somehow when you shot at a tree the whole thing exploded and caused a chain reaction that blew up the whole village. Ease up. Have fun with her and don't get butt-hurt.

I went back in, put my phone on the table and said, here...look at Instagram...but on my terms, not on yours.

Haha, it's cute that you think it was on your terms. You only did it because she threw a fit. If she wasn't screaming and whining you never would have done that just because you felt like it.

She ignored me the rest of the night and didn't look at it.

Because in her mind, by the time you came back in the house after her, or at some other point during the whole ordeal, you deleted the incriminating evidence so she knew she wouldn't find anything anyway. You already lost her trust. Alpha men increase trust by being an oak. Beta men decrease trust by any number of ways, but being butt-hurt and controlling are two of the most common.

Self-Righteousness, Pietism and RP

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The fact that you even utter the phrase "enough for her" is a bluepill ideology. I know Willow-girl provoked it, but don't even entertain that idea. It presumes that you're not already enough for her and that she doesn't have to be enough for you. As /u/TonyProvelone said, this is evidence that you're living in her frame. I'll write more in an actual reply.

Self-Righteousness, Pietism and RP

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I hope you have this comment saved as a text document on your desktop so you don't have to re-type it every time. It always needs to be asked!

Wife had abortion without telling me

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is true except as to the 99% thing. I find that the overwhelming majority of Christians in America profess: "Equal value, different roles." Those "different roles" don't mean "she must stay in the kitchen and he must go to work"; rather, it means that he leads, she follows. The theology is correct.

The problem is, as /u/RedPillWonder suggested, there are so many non-Christians in the church calling themselves Christians, influencing how the crowd mentality views an application of the leader-follower dynamic that even with the correct theology, their application is way, way off.

I have not met many Christians who would describe themselves as egalitarian. Although many would call themselves "complementarian," at a theological level I don't see the problem with this. Complementarianism endorses the leader-helper dynamic, which is biblical and appropriate. It's how people apply complementarian principles that starts to get off-course. Or maybe I'm misunderstanding what you mean by complementarianism?

And yes, we do refrain "don't marry a feminist" quite frequently here.

Wife had abortion without telling me

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

never marry anyone who's not red pill

My understanding from /u/BluepillProfessor and several other ECs on MRP (which I tend to agree with) is that women are naturally red pill. They don't need anyone to teach them how the game works because it's in their nature, particularly in a feminist society where women are taught that they have the choice to do whatever they want - stay at home, be a CEO, be a porn star, raise kids, etc. To that end, their default position is: "Dominate me like I want, or I'll trample you with hypergamy." Every woman gets this instinctively - and they really don't have any other option but to be red pill.

Men, on the other hand, have to learn it because our options are: Dominate like they want or get trampled over by hypergamy. With women, either option works just fine - they either get their AF or their BB, and sometimes both. But with men, we are taught to be trampled by hypergamy and the option to dominate is suppressed as much as possible. Most men must intentionally learn to be "red pill" because they never knew that dominating a woman was even a legitimate option in the first place. For women, all options are legitimate, thus all women are red pill - there is no stifling that they must learn and overcome.

Wife had abortion without telling me

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

True dat.

Wife had abortion without telling me

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That was my thought as well. Troll or not, there's still use in processing hypotheticals and learning from what others would recommend in different situations. Right on, /u/RedPillWonder.

There is no "Christian version" of anything

1 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

it doesn't matter how the structural relation of government works

This is a lot of how I see it too. It's incredibly rare that the Father in the OT or Jesus in the Gospels tries to change government or economics. Their focus was on changing culture. I can't imagine after the Father and Jesus rejected governmental and economic uprising as a means of instituting their plan that the Holy Spirit would be any different in a post-Gospel world today. Instead, just as the Father and Jesus transformed cultures for their purposes, I imagine this is the goal of the Holy Spirit as well.

To that end, the institution of slavery was a predominantly governmental and economic institution. How the culture treated and interacted with slaves was a cultural issue - and that is, not surprisingly, where we see the Bible intervening.

Feminism, on the other hand, is different. It started as a political movement with very little cultural traction. When it did gain political power, then big-business saw the money in it and decided to make it an economic affair. When big-business then advertised these feminist ideals to the masses, it became a cultural phenomenon, that cyclically gave rise to more political power, giving rise to more economic gain from pushing the agenda, etc.

To that end, there is certainly a cultural component to feminism itself, not just how we should treat feminists. Where the Bible was silent on the political/economic institution of slavery, there is direct command as to rejection of the cultural infestation of feminism.

I'd rather have a good and wise dictator any day than a corrupt bureaucrat in the White House.

This is why my former pastor (and the only truly masculine/RP pastor I've ever known) used to say frequently: "The only form of political governance that God ever endorsed was a benevolent dictatorship."

FR: Crawling back to RP after some struggles, wife kicks me while I am down.

1 upvotes · 4 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Haha ... It's an old joke. I won't try it again.

Even Jesus debunked the Soul Mate Myth.

1 upvotes · 3 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed ... and I felt that honor to.

Thoughts on my family vs. my wife

1 upvotes · 2 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

Agreed. I can't count the number of times my family has said of my brother in law, "Why can't he stand up to her?"

How to deal with silent treatment

1 upvotes · 2 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

My thoughts exactly

There is no "Christian version" of anything

1 upvotes · 2 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not sure why God would have Noah build an ark big enough for people he knew would never be on it.

There is no "Christian version" of anything

1 upvotes · 1 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Fair points. I don't agree on every point, but I do understand where you're coming from.

There is no "Christian version" of anything

1 upvotes · 1 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

but because the Church has been conforming even on things I'm sure you'll consider "clear biblical mandates" since the 1800s

Bear in mind that I was only referencing a minority of the church. The majority of the church has never conformed on the "clear biblical mandate" issues.

Which is fishy, isn't it? Because after some time has passed, the overall church is one which is more progressive/liberal than the one it was.

That depends on how you define "more progressive/liberal." I wouldn't say the overall church has been this way. But I suppose you could argue that any change at all is "progressive/liberal" simply because the conservative stance implies a maintenance of the status quo.

The most progressive/liberal change in the church is on the issue of feminism, and that's one of the rare exceptions that has taken root on a clearly mandated biblical issue - and even at that, the church has not adopted the feminist imperative in full; it has only compromised. That is, the church on the whole still verbally professes the "leader/helper" dynamic and male headship.

The way they compromised is by adopting the feminist imperative whenever possible in that it does not violate Scripture. So, on all theological issues, they have held true to God's Word. But if God's Word gives any room for interpretation, they have given women the benefit of the doubt rather than the patriarchal tradition that was in place when those Scriptures were written.

Now, you and I agree that this is a very dangerous thing to do. It violates my interpretation of Scripture, as well as that of most every guy here. But most of the issues within the feminization of the church are not in opposition to the "clear biblical mandates." It more has to do with culturalization of non-biblical issues. So, you'll get a pastor who preaches male headship, but then still comments: "make sure you run that by your wife first." There's no biblical mandate that husbands must not run things by their wives first. But the implication is where the danger is because the common attendee cannot discern between the clear biblical mandate and the implications of cultural terminology being used from the pulpit. Accordingly, they will reach incorrect conclusions on those biblical mandates without understanding the delicate (albeit incredibly misguided) line that the pastor is trying to walk in appeasing both Scriptural authority and cultural agenda.

Anyway ... I'm ranting at this point and have had 4 phone calls while trying to write this and forgot where I was going. My point is that feminization of the church is bad, but the ways that it's feminized are mostly a discredit to healthy marriages and practice of biblical principles and, at least as I have seen it, do not directly compromise on the language of Scripture itself in the vast majority of churches. I'm not sure if that makes sense or not, though.

Looking in the US as a foreigner, it sure doesn't seem like an "overwhelming majority" of churches is against female pastors/priests.

Admittedly, I'm going from personal experience here, not statisticians. That said, the stats do show that for mainline churches (i.e. the bulk), there are only 10% of female clergy. This shows an overwhelming majority. Even the Nazarenes who explicitly allow female clergy still only have 11% - 1% higher than the average. So yes, I think 90% is a justifiable number to say "overwhelming majority."

In terms of your paint analogy. I can only say it's taking black paint, and placing a Christian label on it. It's Christian black paint! Hardly surprising the Christian who wants to buy black paint, asks himself "Is there a Christian version of this?"

Agreed.

There is no "Christian version" of anything

1 upvotes · 1 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree that the actual secular/spiritual dynamic is far more sinister. But I can't help but notice that the types of issues brought up are things that were never part of the "white" to begin with. The white wall is issuing moral judgments about whether or not the gray bits of paint are more white or more gray.

So, in the case of slavery, there is no compulsion in Scripture to prohibit slavery, nor is there a compulsion to employ it as a socio-economic device. The same goes for female voting rights. The Bible is conspicuously silent on the matter of telling human governments how they should run themselves, and thus makes no statement on whether or not women should be able to vote in a secular governmental election (noting that such elections didn't even exist in the time the Bible was written).

On issues where the Bible does have a clear mandate, we do see a sharp division of the church. The minority trend is toward liberal theology, which I think is much of what you're referring to: those who interpret Scripture through the lens of culture such that as culture changes, so does the actual meaning (rather than just the perceived meaning) of Scripture.

Because the overwhelming majority of churches today are theologically conservative, we have yet to see the church violate a clear, direct command. I do see the issue of female pastors/priests being one where even some conservative theological churches have given in, but this isn't a 20-year thing ... it's been going on since the Methodists in the 1800s. Not surprisingly, my home church (although I do not subscribe to the denomination, personally) is Nazarene and holds a predominantly conservative view of theology, but did have a female associate pastor for a time. They justified this on the grounds that there was still a male head. Also, the Nazarene church was born from the early methodists, so it's not surprising that some of that liberal theology was carried in.

Nevertheless, the overwhelming majority of churches have stood firm on this issue despite over a century and a half of increasing cultural pressure. Why? Because there are clear biblical mandates, as opposed to the other issues you referenced, which were purely cultural issues that the church had not yet processed a position on.

Now, one could argue that we should expect an increase in theologically liberal churches to account for the change in culture ... but the data shows otherwise, as virtually every news source is actually reporting a decline in ratio of theologically liberal churches as compared to theologically conservative ones.

There is no "Christian version" of anything

1 upvotes · 1 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

My thought precisely.

Facebook

1 upvotes · 1 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

My thoughts exactly.

The interplay between theology, praxeology, and philosophy on human behavior

1 upvotes · 1 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yes, someone argued that

The interplay between theology, praxeology, and philosophy on human behavior

1 upvotes · 1 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I don't dispute that. And if the bible had said, "The Egyptians were so distraught over what God had done that they ..." then I'd be more inclined to agree that God did not miraculously change their disposition. But when the bible says, "God made them favorably disposed," I feel like I must believe God did change their disposition. I have a hard time believing God inspired Moses to write something in a way that clearly says one thing when he really meant something else that could have easily been communicated with different language.

She's getting chubby...

1 upvotes · 1 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

Amen

Even Jesus debunked the Soul Mate Myth.

1 upvotes · 31 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Under the new definition I would still reject the concept on numerous pragmatic grounds, but I might accept it as a valid biblical belief under Calvinist theology.

She's getting chubby...

1 upvotes · 31 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

People just don't like the word dread because it implies the goal is to weaponize fear to get sex. Some suggest that the fear component implied by that word undermines the genuineness of her desire in exchange for something artificial, akin to hysterical bonding. Most guys here don't care if the attraction is genuine or artificial. Better sex = better sex.

If we called it "cultivating the effect of preselection post-marriage" the entire concept might be far easier for most of the world to swallow. But then /u/BluepillProfessor would have to rewrite his book and none of us want to make him do that just to appease the bloops.

Even Jesus debunked the Soul Mate Myth.

1 upvotes · 31 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not saying anything about his case other than that we don't have enough data to draw any conclusions.

- we only see 4-5 cases in scripture of God intervening to get two people hitched.
- we don't know if God does this for others or not, but the implication of 1 Cor. 7 is not - that most marriages should originate with two people lusting after each other, not some divine miraculous story or plan
- of the 4-5 we only know God's purpose in why he drew them together: Hosea ... We cannot draw any conclusions on the others as to whether they are more akin to Hosea's story, where God prioritized a specific purpose over romance, or if they are more akin to a Disney romance fairy tale idea of soul mates who ate paired by divine providence
- we have zero confirmed examples of God intending romance as his purpose for drawing two people into marriage.

For reference, the 4-5 in thinking of are (1) Adam and Eve, (2) Isaac and Rebekah, (3) Hosea and Gomer, (4) David being given Saul's wives by God, and (5) Mary/Joseph (who are iffy ... God didn't bring them together, he just told Joseph not to leave). In which of these did God say, "I'm putting you with that person because they can make you happier than anyone else possibly could"? #2 is the only one we could possibly infer that from. For 1 and 3 God tells us his purpose for putting them together and it's not romance. We don't know the purpose for 4 except by assumption (ex. Solidify David's position as king). I don't really count 5 but any inference of romance there doesn't come from God's words ... at best only by his approval of the relationship which they themselves may have experienced romance in (we assume but don't know).

I think we're saying the same thing but thought I should clarify anyway.

Even Jesus debunked the Soul Mate Myth.

1 upvotes · 31 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Let me clarify: the soulmate concept implies that God has predetermined two specific people to pair up and intervenes to cause this to happen. We see maybe 4 or 5 examples of this happening in Scripture. It's very, very rare. The majority of people seem to have no clear, direct divine intervention directing them toward a specific individual.

So, in Hosea's case we see one clear example where God goes cockeyed and puts him in a crummy marriage for a bad purpose. In the other 4 or so examples, we don't have any information on whether or not God did it for their feels and happiness in the relationship or for a specific purpose that advances his Kingdom. Sure, God could do both, but we don't know that either.

To that end, with only 4 or 5 examples to look at, we can't say that Hosea is an "exception" to the rule of how God treats marriages when he intervenes to put two people together. We know that he is the clearest example and the only one where we know the specific purpose for why God chose that girl (or rather that kind of girl). So, Hosea might actually be the rule and not the exception, when considering only relationships where God acknowledged his intervention, and we just get less explanation for the other examples.

That's what I meant. God's intervention in the first place is the exception. And if God doesn't intervene directly very often, then the concept of a soulmate doesn't make sense to rely on for the vast majority of people on the planet.

Even Jesus debunked the Soul Mate Myth.

1 upvotes · 31 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I've been thinking more on this. You're right that the definition of a soulmate matters greatly. I'm going to assume that everyone who believes in a soulmate means that their soulmate is the person with whom they will have the greatest possible degree of relational happiness in the marriage as compared with anyone else that they could have married. Is that a fair point? It doesn't mean everything will be a Disney happily-ever-after, but it does mean that you'll fare better with that person than you would with anyone else.

With that in mind, we do know for a fact from Hosea's story, if nothing else, that not everyone gets that type of a soul mate. So, there is no Scriptural basis for any individual person on earth today to believe that they automatically have a soulmate either. To that end, believing in the concept of a soulmate is useless because there is no way to know (1) if you're one of the ones who does get a soulmate, or (2) if you are, who that person will actually be and if the person you married actually is the one God had assigned for you.

The other fallacy in that "best relational match" mentality is that it assumes God's purpose in assigning someone a spouse is always for the good of the relationship. This is a nice blue pill fantasy, but I'm more inclined to observe from Scripture that God is more concerned with the functional purpose of relationships than with the feels of the people in them. That's not to say God wants you to be unhappy in a marriage; rather, it's that having his purpose in putting you together fulfilled is of greater significance to him than your feelings - and your feelings are not that purpose. To that end, we also know that God wants us to rest on Him for that degree of satisfaction, validation, and support, not on our spouses, making idols of them. So yes, it's good to have feels for your spouse, but I'm more persuaded that God has higher purposes for marriage and any possible conception of a "soul mate" that I know of to exist on a mass scale is not aligned with biblical principles.

Thoughts?

Even Jesus debunked the Soul Mate Myth.

1 upvotes · 31 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

How do we know Hosea is an exception? There are so few examples of God intervening to bring people into marriage that we can hardly even establish a rule in the first place. That's my point: we simply can't know.

Even Jesus debunked the Soul Mate Myth.

1 upvotes · 31 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The vast majority (359 times) it is translated as "find."

"Find" is fairly neutral. It doesn't imply a searching. It usually comes across to me as, "Hey, look what I found!" as if someone came across something without looking. The "I found you!" hide-and-seek context seems to be the rarity, including when you skim the verses, like Cain saying "if anyone finds me they will kill me." He doesn't mean anyone is looking for him; rather, that they will happen upon him.

While I readily agree that an argument could be made both ways, I see very few biblical passages where a man makes searching for a wife a significant priority.

God can be involved in the process of a man's search for a wife

I agree for sure. But why the man would be actively searching for a wife in the first place is beyond me. Once upon a time it made sense. Post-marriage, the cognitive dissonance set in and I changed my tune pretty quickly. But that's a longer story than I'd care to get into here, chock full of caveats and exceptions, and I'm confident you already know it anyway.

Do you believe God wants, let's say the majority of people to never marry?

I do build a lot of support around 1 Cor. 7, but I do also believe God intends most people to get married. This view actually comes from the Matthew 19:12-ish passage when Jesus is speaking on point. Two things to note from that passage: (1) Jesus implies that only a small percentage of people can actually follow through with the perpetually single life; (2) The only people who can successfully live that way are those who have been specifically given that ability by God.

From the first point, we know that most people will end up married, but the second point is what proves that this is God's intention. If God only expects people to remain single if he uniquely empowers them to that life, and he only uniquely empowers a few, then it follows that God's will for the majority of people is that they should marry. Of course, Nothing in the Matthew passage explicitly states that celibacy is a gift given only to the few. It might be given to the majority. I'm just going off of implication.

My point, though, was not about the numbers of how many people should be rejecting marriage. My point was simply about the method of getting married. I don't believe (though I am open to correction) that there is any clear New Testament biblical mandate to get married, and that any OT mandate that may have existed was predominantly for the purpose of filling the earth in number (i.e. fulfilling the first command to humanity), which is really now a spiritual command to fulfill and not a physical one. In the absence of such a compulsion, I believe the preferred method of finding a spouse would be Paul's suggestion in 1 Cor. 7 - Pursue God full-heartedly as if you're destined to remain single forever, then get married when you and a woman find yourselves having trouble holding back your lust. This not only maximizes a person's ability to focus on their relationship with God throughout their single life, but it also maximizes the amount of time they get to spend doing that, and it also maximizes their ability to prepare for marriage through more intentional effort toward spiritual growth, and it maximizes the man's capacity to lead his wife because he has been in her role (a la his relationship with Christ) longer before being confused by a dual role, and all kinds of other benefits. So, not only is this view (at least in my understanding) biblically compelled, but it is also incredibly advantageous on a practical level to both God's Kingdom and the man himself, as well as to his wife.

the statement that God hasn't or doesn't aid anyone unless they are in that state isn't accurate in every situation, or at least could be worded better

I don't think we can know definitively one way or the other. I will say that the majority of casual Christians still do end up getting divorced. So, of the people sitting in the pews, the overwhelming majority of them were probably not aided by God in finding their spouse in any way, as I doubt that God would lead them into a relationship that he knew would end in them doing something he hates. I'm more inclined to think that God would lead such people away from marriage until they're ready before offering his sovereign services.

As for serious Christians, the divorce rates are significantly lower. But that still doesn't guarantee that God actually did assist them in finding one another. Have I shared the Arthur/Merlin dynamic on finding a wife before? That's a perfect example of how I see God's role - not that he aids in bringing people together (unless he actually wants them together); rather, that he warns people of potential pitfalls, then lets them make up their own minds anyway.

Wife wants to take Girls Weekend to Tahoe

1 upvotes · 31 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

Okay ... so suburb prices or downtown prices?

Working on the Sidebar

1 upvotes · 31 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'd love to review a pdf. Thanks! Is it a file or a link? PM me details.

Even Jesus debunked the Soul Mate Myth.

1 upvotes · 31 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good timing on this. I literally just last night finished the ONEitis and sniper/shotgun sections of my RPC book. I contemplated converting parts of it into a post, as I hadn't written on the subject directly here yet. I'll let the conversation in this thread do that for me instead. I hadn't considered this passage, but will review it more closely now.

I'm confident that the soulmate myth (and the concept of ONEitis as a whole) was one of three leading contributors to the mass feminization of the church. The second was the confusion of philosophy and theology, which I just posted on today (though without getting into the historical impact).

Even Jesus debunked the Soul Mate Myth.

1 upvotes · 31 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Understanding the context that you appropriately reject the soulmate myth on the whole, in light of your post, how do you fit Hosea into all this?

She was not what anyone would call a soulmate. But God told him to marry her anyway. And she brought him great distress (though I'm sure marrying a prostitute brought incredible sex as well). So, if she was appointed to him by God but defied traditional notions of a soulmate, how do we know the other women appointed by God to other men were given to them to meet a Disney style soulmate either? What if God had another purpose for those marriages?

The interplay between theology, praxeology, and philosophy on human behavior

1 upvotes · 31 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's precisely what I linked. I enjoy Adam4d

The interplay between theology, praxeology, and philosophy on human behavior

1 upvotes · 30 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

As you appropriately note, ontology is a subset of philosophy, not an independent school of thought. Even at that, I don't think it's about truth as much as it is about what it means to "exist" or to be "real." So, the laws of science, for example, would not be ontological truths; rather, trying to understand what it means for the laws of science to exist would be an ontological subject.

Similarly, as you also noted, epistemology is also a subset of philosophy. Its focus isn't necessarily on figuring out perceived truth; rather, it's about analyzing how humans develop perceptions in the first place and what the purpose/meaning behind our knowledge/perceptions is. So, what humans perceive about morality would not be an epistemological subject; but studying how humanity develops those perceptions in the first place is.

Again, both of these are subsets of philosophy and rely squarely on logic and reason to make any claims. Theology and praxeology use logic and reason as a tool, but always make them subservient to divine revelation (in the case of theology) or observable patterns (in the case of praxeology). So, if logic/reason say, "Women should want to be faithful to a good beta-provider" (a blue pill philosophy) but praxeology observes that she'll go screw Chad anyway, and this is shown repetitively across countless scenarios, then the practical result defies the logical conclusion, and therefore trumps the philosophy.

All of the above in mind, I'm doubtful that an ontologist or epistemologist would have any unique insights to offer on the subject of intergender relational dynamics, and instead their representatives would agree: "We don't study that kind of stuff. But what we would study is how intergender relational dynamics came into being and the nature of their existence as an intangible concept (in the case of ontology) or how different men and women have come to the conclusions they have about intergender relational dynamics and the thought processes necessary to reach those conclusions and the purposes we can utilize that information for (in the case of epistemology).

More to the point, because both ontology and epistemology (as subsets of philosophy) are not grounded in actual fact, but logical conclusions about ideas, they are still grounded in what "should be," as I suggested was the function of philosophy in my original post. To be clear, I'm not talking "should be" in a moralistic sense. I'm talking about it in a logical sense. Logically, betas may conclude that if a man is nice to a woman then she will like him. This is philosophy because it follows a natural logical chain of events that if A occurs, then B should result.

As such, your dismissal of philosophy as concerned only with "what should be true" is not only an undue criticism - it is itself a philosophical statement, and so ought to be rejected on your view.

Let's be clear: I'm only dismissing philosophy in regard to its value in helping men improve their position in intergender relational dynamics. Philosophy has incredible value in many other areas of life - including in the sense that I utilize philosophical thinking to discern when philosophy, theology, and praxeology should be employed. To that end, you're very right in that my entire post is philosophical in nature. But that's because I'm cultivating a philosophy for how RPer's should prioritize the branches of knowledge. To that end, my philosophical rationale for my post should not be rejected because I am not philosophizing about intergender relational dynamics themselves or suggesting what a person should do in order to achieve a particular result.

Now, I suppose I could argue that I don't need theology to prove anything I've said. Consider: Praxeologically, I could argue that there's enough observed evidence that trusting a praxeology over philosophy will get better results in intergender relational dynamics (ergo success rates of red pill praxeological strategies as compared with blue pill philosophical strategies). So, praxeology is self-affirming as to its own effectiveness and I don't need philosophy to prove that. But because RPC is relatively new, we have yet to develop observation to prove its effectiveness, and because we cannot observe eternity, heaven, hell, etc., we could never utilize praxeology to validate theology in its role in this hierarchy. Instead, we can take the theological conclusion that "God's thoughts are higher than our thoughts" and that "the wisdom of the world is foolishness in God's sight," and thereby conclude that because both praxeology and philosophy come from worldly sources, they must both be deemed subservient to theology. Add in Proverbs 14:12 and we see that theology has significance into eternal consequences as well, which should under all schools of thought transcend all other purposes. Of course, as with praxeology, these theological statements are also self-affirming.

Anyway, thanks for your comment! This has been the most useful reply in helping me flesh out my thoughts on this some more :)

The interplay between theology, praxeology, and philosophy on human behavior

1 upvotes · 30 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well, if you ask a Calvinist, "it's not a salvation issue," but somehow if you disagree with their deterministic views, you're a heretic who will burn in hell for eternity ;) (Don't worry, OZ, I know you're not a cage-stager!)

The interplay between theology, praxeology, and philosophy on human behavior

1 upvotes · 30 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

But then that kind of spits in the face of free will. It is more like He impressed on their hearts and they did with it as they will.

Ah, I go the other way on this. I do believe that God has the ability to cause a person to act without regard for their free-will in specific moments when he so desires. Or, in the case of the Egyptians, causes them to experience a situation or a mood/sentiment that they ordinarily would not have chosen to submit themselves to.

But ... this is a minor issue and I'm okay with disagreements.

The interplay between theology, praxeology, and philosophy on human behavior

1 upvotes · 30 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good thoughts. But this goes back to the age old question: is a man "red pill" when (1) he embraces the truth and adjusts his behaviors accordingly to suit his own purposes in light of that truth, or (2) is he "red pill" when he follows the prescribed behaviors of other "red pill" men and how they believe a person should respond to the knowledge of the truth?

The interplay between theology, praxeology, and philosophy on human behavior

1 upvotes · 30 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I've certainly seen that. And in some theory, what you're saying could be true. But in this case we see direct divine intervention: "God made them favorably disposed." I mean, you could interpret that as the plagues being God's method for doing this, but I would expect the passage to have said something like, "The Egyptians were so upset at what God had just done that they gave the Israelites everything." But Moses wanted to clarify, emphasizing that this was an unusual and unexpected thing, defying ordinary praxeological assessment.

Thanks guys

1 upvotes · 30 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Something you said prompted me to make a post that I had been contemplating for some time, but was never inspired actually to put up here. Thanks!

FR: The Spousal Support Scam

1 upvotes · 30 January 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I see what you're saying. It's probably not worded the best. Nevertheless, the point is that under an equal contribution law 100% of his paycheck going to the family means 50% benefits her and 50% benefits him. So, in that legal framework, no matter how much or little she had a say on where the money went, 50% is attributed to her.

FR: The Spousal Support Scam

1 upvotes · 30 January 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

After the divorce "the family" doesn't exist.

How Can I Bring My Girlfriend to a Relationship with Jesus?

1 upvotes · 30 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I also don't believe God has put me in this position for almost 2 years to ...

Because God didn't. You did. But I also believe God gives us free will, so maybe /u/OsmiumZulu, our resident TULIP-peddler may have a different perspective ;)

to simply break up with her now without even attempting to minister to her You've had 2 years to try. Mission failed. Move on.

when I'm in a better position to get through to her than anyone else has ever been

And you've been in that position for two years. /u/RedPillWonder's comment is spot on point here. You dropped the ball. That's cool. We all do. I failed at leading my wife properly for the first 7 years of our marriage. That's hard to recover from. I also failed to "save" my ex-girlfriend Rachel, despite that I was the only person actively speaking Christ in her life - and that was with intentional effort and being highly skilled and trained in evangelism and discipleship and spending 3+ hours a day 5 days a week in the basement of a chapel praying over her with tears down my face. Trust me, I know where you're coming from. I know how important this is. But OZ is right - "You can't" save her. Only God can. By trying to usurp that authority and place the responsibility on your own shoulders, you're doing a very dangerous thing both for you and for your own relationship with God.

To that end, it IS a helpful statement because it's the truth. God must be the one to work in her.

hearing from many of you that I should leave the relationship is hard to swallow when I have loved this girl for a very long time

And there confirms my suspicion, as articulated in my other comment in this thread: your real reason for wanting to stay is not to "save her" (although I believe there is some truth to this as a secondary motivation that you have escalated to the forefront in your effort to maximize your DEERING position); rather, it is to preserve all of the time and affection you have invested into the relationship ... to spare yourself the emotional impact of the breakup.

My response notwithstanding, heed the words of /u/RedPillWonder very closely. I respect him greatly, as I do OZ, and we are all just trying to help you. I know OZ's brevity sometimes leaves too much to implication, but we are all replying here because we care about you and seeing God's will done in your life both for her good and yours. Peace, brother.

404 - The Lens Part 2: The Empty-Full Dynamic

1 upvotes · 29 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I've contemplated an askRPC sub, but we just don't have a large enough user base to justify its existence yet. But my hope is to get there someday. In the meantime, I do think most Christians are currently utilizing askMRP as their first option, either due to a lack of awareness of RPC or in fear that they'll get purple advice rather than red. If you have any ideas on how to promote the sub to move on that direction, I'm all ears :)

404 - The Lens Part 2: The Empty-Full Dynamic

1 upvotes · 29 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I was wondering if you'd come back around after I finally started posting some of this stuff :) You have commented a few times about looking forward to this. In the next one I'll actually post the image file of the illustration, which should help give more clarity too, given that most people today are visual learners.

How Can I Bring My Girlfriend to a Relationship with Jesus?

1 upvotes · 29 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

My thoughts exactly. I almost summoned you to say exactly this, but saw you beat me to it!

How Can I Bring My Girlfriend to a Relationship with Jesus?

1 upvotes · 29 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm convinced this is the girl God has put in my life for me to spend the rest of my life with.

What makes you convinced of this. As /u/sdrawkcab_kaeps_i noted quite appropriately, marrying a non-Christian is sin. James 1 says that God will not tempt anyone to sin. Period. So, I can say with 100% confidence that if she is a non-Christian, you are severely confused about how to discern God's will, attributing your feelings to the prompting of the Spirit, which is an incredibly dangerous endeavor. As Proverbs 14:12 says, "There is a way that seems right to a man, but in the end it leads to death." Don't follow what feels right to you. Follow what the Bible says. I don't mean to be harsh, but you're treading down a path to certain doom.

she thinks Christians are judgemental, hypocrites, and overall believe things that she doesn't agree with

And yet she wants to marry a judgmental hypocrite? This is the definition of cognitive dissonance - the land where hamsters thrive.

So, either she doesn't really believe this about Christians because of her relationship with you ... or the alternative is that you're not living like a Christian should, thus you're hiding and suppressing all the things that if she knew them about you or exactly how serious you are about these issues, she would turn tail and run.

Her parents are also divorced ... mom is not religious ... he was also the one taking her to church

I.e. Christian and non-Christian fell in love and got married, but dad's faith was a downer on the relationship and they ended up getting divorced. I know there are other factors in there too, but you're walking into a relationship where this is going to be a significant factor for you too - and it's always exacerbated when you have kids.

she says she would never want to be like them

Ah, the old "Hypocrite!" fallacy. As Dawson Trotman once said, in order to hide behind something, you have to be smaller than it.

I don't think she is truly saved

I don't say this lightly, but with a heavy and solemn heart: given what you described this is a certainty.

how can I bring her into a relationship with God when her attitude is already predisposed to be against it due to her life experiences? How can I bring us closer together in God without seeming pushy or accidentally pushing her away from me?

If you're RP aware yet, you already know the clear answers.

- Don't have ONEitis. You've got it bad for this girl. You think she's special and you're afraid to lose her. You think that no other girl in the Christian dating pool can be as good as her, or that if they exist you're not likely to bag one of them. This stems from a total lack of abundance mentality.
- As the man, you need to set the clear boundaries for the relationship. If you're also a Christian, you need to set those boundaries in a way that does not conflict with biblical teaching. Because the Bible prohibits being with a non-Christian, you need to set a clear boundary: "I have been studying my faith and come to the conclusion that we should not be together. I would like nothing more than to maintain our relationship, but our spiritual differences are only going to bring us trouble in the future if we don't call this off now. Our relationship might end up just like you're parents - especially given that you side with your mom and your dad's and my faith is one of the reasons why. I love you, and I hate the thought that this may further push you away from Jesus, and I hope that someday you'll see your perception of Christians is misguided. But I need to do what my conscience convicts me is right. I care about you, but we cannot love each other the way we each need to be loved. Goodbye."
- The fact that you're afraid of coming off "pushy" or "accidentally pushing her away from me" is troubling. First, it shows that you're less concerned with pushing her away from God than you are in ruining your emotional connection with her. Set your priorities straight. Second, you should do what is right regardless of how it comes off. Once you've determined what is right, then you can start thinking about tact in how to act on your decision in the most effective manner possible. Biblically, the answer is clear: do not marry a non-Christian. even for those who are already married to non-Christians, in 1 Cor. 7:15-16 Paul says to let them go. You're thinking, "But isn't it better if I can save her?" In that same passage says, "How do you know, husband, whether you will save your wife?" That is, you can't make a decision to pursue sin on the hypothetical chance that it might become un sinful if she becomes saved.

Let me be clear: I'm speaking from experience here. In college I met a girl at a party named Heidi. She was totally hot and totally into me. After that party she constantly tried to meet up with me to walk to classes, grab a meal, etc. I was totally into her too, by the way. I was not red pill aware at the time (this was before reddit even existed, much less TRP/MRP), but was pretty darn alpha anyway. She was a non-Christian, so I drew a clear boundary. She still orbited me anyway. Eventually she started saying she would convert for me. When I told her that "for me" wasn't an option because it wouldn't be genuine faith, she changed and said, "No, I've been looking into it and I think I really do believe it. It makes sense and it's starting to change my life!" So, I decided to play a test. I'd give a hard no and see how she responded over the next few weeks. If she continued to pursue her "newfound faith," then I would go back and give the relationship a chance. After all, as I said, I was totally into her too. Sure enough, as soon as I drew that hard line she abandoned all pursuits of the faith IMMEDIATELY. A few weeks later I started dating the girl who is now my wife.

Don't screw around with non-Christians, either literally or figuratively. Don't just be a man - be a godly man. Set clear boundaries consistent with biblical principles and follow through.

THE FOUNTAIN OF TRUTH

1 upvotes · 29 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is really interesting and good to know! I'm excited for the eventual release of the book. As has been suggested numerous times on this sub, I have already begun work on such a book myself and don't anticipate it being too much longer before a first draft is finished. Of course, the more material on the subject the better. I hope for anything we do to compliment one another, not compete.

I believe this is true "frame" rooted in the Fear of the Lord.

1 upvotes · 28 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Glad to hear it :)

Rollo Tomassi – The 21 Convnetion Talks

1 upvotes · 27 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good to know. Is that 75% of just the 2017 convention or of all content on the site available to subscribers?

Hypergamy in the Bible (Song of Songs)?

1 upvotes · 27 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed entirely.

FR: Crawling back to RP after some struggles, wife kicks me while I am down.

1 upvotes · 26 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Fair point. I'll edit the post to clarify.

Christian dating: Good book 2 read together?

1 upvotes · 26 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

/u/TheGlassStone's original comment was on point. You need to be making the decisions, not responding to her suggestions. That said, I side with Athol Kay in MMSLP when he says, essentially, "Sometimes my wife brings up things that are genuinely good ideas and I go along with it. That's why she's there - to help me, and making good suggestions is helpful for me in running the family. I just need to be okay with saying no if it's not helpful."

In this case, her suggestion is helpful ... but ONLY if the book isn't going to reinforce blue pill ideologies of marriage and gender roles. If it does, it's not going to be helpful. I'm going to summon /u/BluePillProfessor to this thread, as he's far more well-read than any of us and will probably have the perfect recommendation.

Rather than reading a book together (as there are very, very few directed at both men and women jointly that are any good), it might make more sense for you to read MMSLP and her to read one of Laura Doyle's books, like The Surrendered Wife or First Kill All the Marriage Counselors. If you must, suggest that in your own independent readings for your own gender, you can get together at different times to discuss what you've been learning. This will give you a time to lead and guide her, while knowing that she's going to be reading helpful content instead of blue pill garbage.

Christian dating: Good book 2 read together?

1 upvotes · 26 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I had a post on it a while back. Can't remember if it was here or on askMRP, but the consensus is that the entire book promotes covert contracts. "If you fill her love tank the way it needs to be filled, then she will ____ in return."

The love languages have value in that it gives 5 new ways to conceptualize gaming your wife. But that can be summarized in one chapter. Literally everything else in the book exists solely to promote the covert contracts.

Christian dating: Good book 2 read together?

1 upvotes · 26 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, those are definitely not books to read together.

How to Handle a Veiled Threat of Domestic Abuse?

1 upvotes · 26 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

Thick skin wasn't the point. Suppose I'm asking Tanner Guzy about an outfit I'm trying on, but I have a giant mustard stain on the shirt. Chances are I'm only going to get comments about the mustard stain. I'm going to be left thinking, "I know there's a mustard stain, don't worry about that thing, I'm looking for commentary on the other aspects of the outfit, I can figure out the mustard stain on my own," but they still only bring up the mustard stain anyway.

That's what I was suggesting might happen, which for many commenters is what happened ... they honed in on that one singular issue and ignored giving commentary on the rest :/

Hypergamy in the Bible (Song of Songs)?

1 upvotes · 25 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good points.

How to Handle a Veiled Threat of Domestic Abuse?

1 upvotes · 25 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

True. But if they're ridiculing you for the wrong reasons then they might not share the legitimate ridicule you need to hear ;)

Hypergamy in the Bible (Song of Songs)?

1 upvotes · 25 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well said. The other thing I'd add to the Bathsheba case is that she probably knew her bath was visible from the king's window ...

How to Handle a Veiled Threat of Domestic Abuse?

1 upvotes · 25 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

My other comment on point notwithstanding, /u/SteelToeShitKicker is right - don't trust that the church elders will side with you, and she may not worry about her reputation with them if she think they'll believe her over you ... and she even said that's her stance directly, per your post. So, the threat is not a credible one if she thinks she'll come out on top, and instead you're subjecting yourself to someone who might cave to protect the woman.

Now, my church has recently had a few situations where it sided with the man. But in those cases the evidence was clear ... you can't really hide getting pregnant by Chad and having an abortion. In your case, if it's your word against hers, you'd better have a darn good reputation with those elders before making that claim.

Hypergamy in the Bible (Song of Songs)?

1 upvotes · 25 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Gotcha. I can see that implied in there now. It's been a while since I've read it, so I didn't recall it being flirtatious, but I'll take your word at it :)

FR: Crawling back to RP after some struggles, wife kicks me while I am down.

1 upvotes · 25 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good response on the whole, but I will note that he did take his disciples to Gathsemene with him, where he did show some serious signs of weakness. That said, I think he went off alone during those parts, hence coming back repeatedly to find them sleeping.

106 - What doesn't work

1 upvotes · 25 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for sharing this.

I desire validation for pretty much everything

My latest post should resonate clearly with you, then: 404 - The Lens Part 2: The Empty-Full Dynamic. The entire post is about where to find fullness and validation and how the Gospel is the answer (which is set up more in Part 1 and will be explained more clearly in Part 3).

Question about dating - denominational question - (22 y/o male)

1 upvotes · 25 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Sex in general, or specifically, sex within marriage and only with your spouse is viewed as very good.

On a theological level, absolutely. But when was the last time you heard a sermon openly preached that talked about the wonder and beauty of sex without giving at least equal or more time to the sinfulness of sex out of context? It doesn't happen. Ever. Of course, this is rare among most other denominations too. I just hear the rumors of Southern Baptists treating it as more taboo than most.

THE FOUNTAIN OF TRUTH

1 upvotes · 25 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I second that :)

Having my mother NOT come out for the birth of our child due to the way my wife treats my mother?

1 upvotes · 24 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

Agreed.

Having my mother NOT come out for the birth of our child due to the way my wife treats my mother?

1 upvotes · 24 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

That depends on how well you've trained your mom and your wife. My wife loves my mom more than her own mom.

Filtering RP through a Christian Worldview

1 upvotes · 23 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

My understanding of MGTOW is that rejection of women is their core tenet. You can't be MGTOW if you pursue a romantic relationship with a woman in any capacity. Is this wrong?

I have no desire for my wife. I cheated. What is the end-game?

1 upvotes · 22 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

Interesting. Is Jack back? Last I knew he'd been gone for a year and a half. I only know TFA by his blog. W&S is the guy who routinely condemns me for choosing not to cheat on my wife or divorce her even though things are good. I really don't understand him.

Watching her world fall apart post separation. MRP fixes the man, not the relationship.

1 upvotes · 16 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

As smart and insightful as he is, /u/Red-Curious is still wrestling with this fact of life. Without the credible threat of ending it, any Dread is greatly attenuated at best and completely worthless in most cases.

This is where many of my statements are taken with severely limited or otherwise wrong context altogether. My wife occasionally expresses serious concerns that I'll just up and leave her, specifically because she sees how much I'm like my dad and that's what my dad did to my mom. In her mind the threat is real. In my mind, my options for divorce are broader than most other Christians typically give (and theologically I believe I'm right), and my wife knows this. On top of that, I've expressed multiple times that if staying in the marriage is going to lead to a greater degree of sin than leaving, then I have no problem taking the better of two bad options - and my wife knows this. I also fully embrace the idea that a credible threat of divorce is essential toward her desire for me (as opposed to mere fear at the possibilities) because women always want what they can't lock down and what another woman might get.

If I'm purple because I choose in my own life to exchange "divorce her at the drop of a hat" for "divorce her when the situation calls for it," so be it. But since I've started leaning red, the situation has never called for it or even come close ... so I'm not sure why my views on divorce are constantly criticized - ESPECIALLY when my most publicized contributions here are specifically on that subject.

Blood sacrifice? Really?

1 upvotes · 12 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I follow you. I'm just strongly against censorship as well. Mud-slinging like this really only gets dirty when it happens both ways. When one person does it and the other takes the high road, onlookers simply say, "Okay, there just happen to be a few jerks here like everywhere else," but don't condemn the whole community for it.

Working on the Sidebar

1 upvotes · 11 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

NMMNG, WISNIFG, and MMSLP for sure. Beyond that, they're hit-or-miss. They all have great information from a secular vantage point, but you're going to have to filter out a lot more information.

Specifically, NMMNG addresses Christians as most of his examples. So, although he's coming from a secular worldview, Christianity is a big part of the book and is highly relevant.

WISNIFG is just a typical psychology book. There's some evolutionary stuff in there that might not align with Scripture, but the bulk and meat of the book are still relevant and nothing is contrary to Scripture.

MMSLP has some content that Christians should directly reject, but I often found myself wondering if Athol Kay wasn't a closet Christian just because of how often some of his views align with ours. Again, the good outweighs the bad.

The other books tend to be far more philosophical in nature, which makes them inherently more dangerous. Although there's positive value in each of them, it would be a lot harder for a new Christian to filter the good from the bad than with the 3 main ones, which is why I haven't added any more of them to the sidebar.

I hope that helps :)

Blood sacrifice? Really?

1 upvotes · 11 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Of course. How a Christian should behave is fairly obvious. How to moderate those who disagree or just happen to slip up is what the whole conversation has been about - not what should have been done in the first instance.

Blood sacrifice? Really?

1 upvotes · 11 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree that's the preferred course of action. The issue we're discussing here is not what a Christian participant should do, but what the moderation team should do. To that end, every Christian should live out #1, and I doubt you'll ever see otherwise from me.

But when someone else, who I can't control, makes an offensive statement, should I cater to every person who says, "I'm offended! The authorities better do something to stop people from offending me!"? That's the exact attitude in America that the liberals take and I'm sick of the government trying to police everyone because of how "offended" someone else might get.

It's ridiculous that a CEO or politician or whoever has to lose his job and disassociate with a path that he's invested decades of his life into because he said something that offended a woman. How much worse would it be if a law was passed that compelled the government to remove that person from his job if he chose not to buckle to the social pressure!

Now, you and /u/TonyProvelone are telling me to do just that: pass a new law on this sub (or enforce old laws new ways) that censors content that someone else might find offensive ... and on an RP sub, no less. This is the liberal agenda all over again - and one that the feminists employ as their primary weapon. And now you're telling me that it's actually a good, rational idea? That's not like you to give so much credit to the prime weapon of the feminists, that simple phrase: "I'm offended!"

What kind of example would that set if this community falls into the same trap that the rest of the world falls into? Wouldn't that be serving to advance the feminist agenda if the feminists could point to us and say, "See? You do it too!"?

Long story short, Christians should be respectful in how we communicate things. /u/OsmiumZulu is no exception. Something that's blatantly and intentionally disrespectful should be removed. But I'm not going to cater to every person who shouts, "I'm offended by that!"

Blood sacrifice? Really?

1 upvotes · 11 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Dang ... and there it goes. I hope you're just misunderstanding Catholicism on all of this because it's contrary to what I've heard from a dozen other learned Catholics, including a priest.

But if what you've said here is true, I'm 10x more persuaded to agree with /u/OsmiumZulu that Catholicism is a non Christian cult that so far distorts the Gospel and twists scripture with absolute zero regard for context that it's leading people away from Christ and should be labeled a threat and banished.

For the sake of the fact that you are the only Catholic I've known to express such an extreme view, I'm just going to assume you're the one who is mistaken on the true bounds of Catholic doctrine, particularly on soteriology. So, as to ongoing policy of this sub, I'll continue to embrace Catholics as fellow brothers as I always have. But I'm going to have to keep a watchful eye on any theological statements that may compromise the sufficiency of the Gospel.

Blood sacrifice? Really?

1 upvotes · 10 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Because we're all brothers in Christ, are we not?

Well, if they're going to hell, then they aren't a brother in Christ. So ... no. Or are you saying someone can be "in Christ" and still go to hell?

Blood sacrifice? Really?

1 upvotes · 10 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Sorry, not sure how the link applies. Are you implying that every single person as part of BSF International agrees with each other on every single theological point in advance so there is no conflict at all?

Am I butt-hurt? No.

To be clear, I was only referencing your original reply to OZ, which certainly came off this way. Sorry if I made a mistake on that.

My point is: is this the proper forum for such debate, or is it best left to other subs and forums?

I'm not familiar with any other subs that encourage people to tough it out and accept criticism. The hard-core type of debates where feelings might get hurt are pretty much universally rejected on other subs. For example, I frequent r/TrueChristian, and I can tell you there that any type of direct insult is removed immediately.

So, as far as forums for hard-core debate, this is probably one of the few places where men are trying to be trained to deal with that kind of criticism and attack. So, it's more appropriate than other forums.

Do I want this forum to be exclusively dedicated to that? Absolutely not. But I'm not sure why we should censor it just to protect a man's feelings either.

How much energy has been wasted going round-about with denominational issues, when we all could have been rallying together to help the OP in a loving and constructive Christian manner?

One of the few things I actually found valuable from my capstone class in college over a decade ago was a repeated insistence that true knowledge comes not from discussing one point to completion, but from starting with a point and seeing the implications that point has on countless other issues - following the rabbit trail from one intellectual concept to the next.

So, should OP get his question answered? Absolutely. Does that mean every single thread must be devoted solely to OP's issue and not ever rabbit trail onto other tangential topics? Nah, I'm all for rabbit trails - when they are productive.

To that matter, I don't think any "energy has been wasted" on this conversation. I've enjoyed going back and forth with you on this and I'm learning a lot about you and your perception of Catholicism, and it's causing me to re-evaluate what I believe and why and how firmly I'm convicted in those beliefs and what actually constitutes a soteriological issue and not all kinds of other stuff. There's no waste in that, otherwise I wouldn't engage any further.

Blood sacrifice? Really?

1 upvotes · 10 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I know Your Son said it and all, but I reject it

That's not a fair characterization, though. We simply believe that Jesus spoke in metaphors sometimes ... like all those parables he constantly told. He didn't start the parable of the sower with, "Hey guys, just so you know, I'm about to tell you a story about a farmer. This isn't a real farmer. It's just a metaphor. I want to make that clear up front." No, he just said, "A sower went out to sow."

I can stand in good conscience before God telling him, "I fully embraced what I believe Jesus meant when he said that." I'm not rejecting what he said by any means.

turning your back on me after I gave my life for your sins, my response would be to shut the door and leave you in the darkness where there is wailing and gnashing of teeth

Dang. That's harsh, and I certainly don't see Jesus doing that. So, a Protestant missionary who has devoted his whole life sharing the Gospel of Jesus all across the world is going to be sent to hell because (assuming the Catholic view is true) he misunderstood what Jesus meant on one doctrinal issue? Jesus was certainly harsh, but the Matthew 7 test of bearing good fruit seems to weigh more heavily here. Jesus specifically said that was a soteriological issue: "If you fail to bear good fruit, you're cut down and thrown into the fire." I don't see, "If you misunderstand what I meant about whether the cracker is actually my flesh or metaphorically my flesh, you're going to hell - so get it right!" That totally does not seem like the Jesus of the Bible.

If an agnostic ...

The agnostic here would obviously be condemned - because he rejected Jesus directly. You're extending not just the core tenets of the Gospel as soteriological issues - you're saying every theological point ever made is a theological issue if someone disagrees with the Catholic position.

Maybe this is unique to Protestantism, but in a Protestant framework, if someone (A)dmits they're a sinner, (B)elieves that Jesus died and rose from the dead to save them from that sin, and (C)ommits their life to becoming more like Jesus, then they are saved and the finer points of theology don't affect salvation.

So, if you take that exact same example, but replace "chooses to reject Jesus Christ as the Son of God" with "chooses to believe that shellfish are still unclean," the answer is obvious: no, that's not a salvific issue, so the person is still saved despite their theological misunderstanding.

You must be baptized as a Christian.

Agree or not, I can at least understand why some people take this as a salvific issue - the Bible directly says as much.

Also, when you die, your soul must be in a state of grace. In other words, no unconfessed mortal sins which separate you from the grace of God.

Again, agree or not, confession of sins is obviously a salvific issue in Scripture, so I can at least understand this.

Blood sacrifice? Really?

1 upvotes · 10 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Sure, that sounds like a great model on paper. But at the end of the day, how much growth can be had if you're only talking about things on which everyone already agrees?

then denomination should only come up if the OP is trying to discern how RP and their own denomination's teaching can co-exist

Which is exactly what OP did in this thread. He noted, "I had a Catholic upbringing" and highlighted numerous doctrinal qualms, several of which exclusively apply to Catholic teachings. He then referenced how his being RP seemed at odds with faith and was pulling him away. I think this is exactly what you're describing - which is why it was left up.

Here's the deal: RP or not, my goal on this sub is to develop godly men. It just so happens to be that godly = RP and vice versa as far as the descriptive aspects, and even with much of the prescriptive as well.

I don't owe anything to "RP" as a concept. If theological discussion helps men become more godly, even if it's not part of the "RP" prescribed checklist, I say we do it anyway. No one on TRP or MRP would ever say: "You're not allowed to go to a comedy club because RP doesn't every explicitly say to do this." Or for that matter, when RP prescribes things, there's no implied: "You can only do these things and nothing else." No, a guy can go to a comedy club if he wants to and not violate RP. A guy can talk theology if he wants to and not violate RP. If that theological conversation can cause one party or the other to be more aware of their faith, then there's value in that. So, from a "Christian" standpoint, I'd promote that kind of conversation anyway, even if it's not RP-prescribed.

As to the way that conversation is held out, getting butt-hurt violates RP and getting mean or nasty toward people violates our faith. In the RP forums they don't remove comments that come off as butt-hurt, they just call it out for what it is. I would assume if someone is being mean and nasty we can do the same - call them out on it and not expect the comment to be censored. But, as previously noted, there are some lines to be drawn where censorship should start taking place. I think I've given an outline of where that should happen. But you telling me in a previous comment that I'm going to hell because I don't believe in transubstantiation ... well, should I remove that too? That's highly offensive to any Protestant who has ever heard that word. Yet it added value to my understanding of how Catholics think, despite the extreme nature of the accusation and potential for offense, so I leave it up - and I don't get butt-hurt or emotional about it. Instead, I can write this with a smile. And I'd hope we can all maintain that amused mastery in the midst of these conversations :)

Also, if all Protestants who have ever heard a Catholic teaching they disagree with are going to hell ... why engage/interact with Protestants in the first place? Genuine curiosity there.

Tag: /u/OsmiumZulu - just to keep you aware of this conversation.

Blood sacrifice? Really?

1 upvotes · 10 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

So does that mean: salvation = faith + never rejecting a Catholic teaching once you've heard it? That seems bizarre to me.

So, because of the fact that I'm fully fluent with the doctrine of transubstantiation but choose to believe otherwise, I'm condemned to hell? I was not aware that this was a soteriological issue in Catholicism.

What other requirements are there on salvation in the Catholic church that don't involve Jesus's death and resurrection?

Blood sacrifice? Really?

1 upvotes · 10 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Did that group ever have someone up front asking questions like OP?

Blood sacrifice? Really?

1 upvotes · 10 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I think the best course of action here is to avoid ALL conversation that is divisive among Christians.

That's nice on paper, but it's a practical impossibility. I can barely say "don't cheat on your wife" in this sub without someone trying to raise a huff about what "porneia" and "epithumeo" and "moicheia" mean. I do it too :p And I think that conversation is fruitful to have, even if it stems from theological disagreements.

What you're saying here is, "There are subjects that I'm just too emotional about and I can't handle any criticism, so I'd like it if everyone could just cater to my emotions and not say anything that might set me off." That's pretty much the opposite of the RP attitude. When our wives try to do that to us, that's where we're advising one another: Don't be manipulated by other people's emotions.

Now, I know you don't mean it to sound like that, but that's really how it comes off. There have been times I have wanted to remove comments and posts from here because they so strongly oppose what I actually believe that it's somewhat offensive ... but I don't. I leave them up. And I don't get all huffy with a snide reply to wave my emotions in their face. Instead, I give a calm reply grounded in sensible spiritual reflection, prayer, and a desire to see my opponent drawn closer to Christ.

An impassioned, emotional reply (which the Proverbs speak against doing) only shows concern to defend an intangible idea and treats the other person as your enemy. In reality, without compromising on the idea, we should treat the other person as a friend who is misguided and needs to be set in the right direction. And if you know any such effort will fail based on the severity of his own demeanor or past interactions, then the "pearls and swine" concept comes up (or the parable of the Great Banquet is my preferred), which is where /u/OsmiumZulu landed in declining to let the conversation escalate any further than it already had. Although I agree his original comment was very harsh, his conduct after-the-fact in refusing to escalate has been appropriate :)

Of course, I'm not accusing you of escalation either ... I was just noting this because OZ already used in this thread the exact "pearls/swine" reference that I was getting at.

Blood sacrifice? Really?

1 upvotes · 10 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

to Catholics, you just said ...

I'm not saying the "true body, blood, soul, and Divinity of Jesus Christ is ... meh ... an inanimate object" - I'm saying that the doctrine behind this system of belief is an inanimate. If someone were to say "Jesus' body and blood" is stupid or "the communion bread and wine themselves are stupid" then I'd be more inclined to agree. But your belief that these things are the actual body and blood of Jesus is not itself animate. A belief, idea, doctrine, etc. is by definition inanimate and intangible.

If someone doesn't want to believe in transubstantiation, that's fine. We'll all have to answer for what we believe or don't believe on judgement day.

Genuine curiosity: do you (or Catholics in general) believe that God will change how he judges someone based on mistaken theology of transubstantiation? If so, what will that judgment be? A lesser heaven? A loss of salvation and condemnation to hell? God saying, "Aw, that's silly - you got it wrong. Now you know the truth. Be on your way"?

To us, the Eucharist is Jesus.

Correct. But your beliefs about the Eucharist (including the belief that "the Eucharist is Jesus") are still beliefs, which are inanimate ideas. Whether they're grounded in truth has yet to be seen, and I'm okay with that. But, of course, whether or not a Catholic can be okay with that really depends on the answer to my last question, which was a point I've never heard anyone try to make before.

when people call the Eucharist a lie, we have an emotional reaction and take it personal because, well, it's personal.

I don't think the Bible calls us to have an emotional reaction like this, though. In John 15:17-18 Jesus says, "This is my command: Love each other. If the world hates you, keep in mind that it hated me first." I take this to mean, "When people get all huffy, chill out. Keep on loving each other. Remember, I took the brunt of all that hate, so you don't have to be upset by it."

Nowhere in Scripture do I see a compulsion: "Get emotional when you see people who misinterpret theological points!" At best Peter says to prepare a defense for why we believe what we do. That's a far cry from "have an emotional reaction and take it personal."

I mean, I have to imagine the apostles were ridiculed all the time for their beliefs. 1 Cor. 4 goes into detail about all of this and Paul concludes that they were the "scum of the world, the refuse of all things" because of how bad it got. But never once did have have an emotional reaction or take it personally. Instead, his very next words are: "I do not write these things to make you ashamed." Then he goes on with a sound admonishment, not born from harsh emotional reaction, but with calm, cool, and collected words designed to appeal to their more positive senses. This is how we should respond - take after Paul's example. Never let someone rile you up. Never break frame because someone mocks your faith.

Blood sacrifice? Really?

1 upvotes · 10 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You wouldn't know it when the standard operating procedure around here whenever Catholicism comes up is "bash Catholic teaching and dogma, call them pagans and idolaters, and downvote all comments by Catholics."

Yeah, I don't know that this degree of response is warranted. There are certainly more protestants here than otherwise. But I don't get the impression that this type of response - especially to that degree - is as common as your comment would imply.

The problem is, most people who are quick to condemn Catholics don't even know the how's or why's of what Catholics believe, and stick their fingers in their ears when a Catholic tries to explain it.

There are, of course, some who really do understand it, but still present it in the most negative light possible in order to create an emotional reaction to an otherwise intellectual conversation. I see this happening a lot too.

Compounding this is the fact that most people who call themselves "Catholic" are doing it wrong.

This is a serious problem as well, and probably the real culprit. People who don't understand their own faith trying to fill the role of apologist and simply making mistakes along the way that gets the whole denomination in trouble. This is basically the plot of the musical The Book of Mormon.

(unless someone wants to enter a theological debate.) In an environment like this where Christian men are supposed to be coming together to help each other as Christian men

I don't mind theological debate here either. I think that's necessary for men to grow in their faith. There's a difference between learning something through sound teaching and learning something because your beliefs were actually tested and you had to defend them or otherwise realize they were wrong. The latter is usually far more effective at promulgating long-lasting change in behavior.

hurling insults around only results in infighting as people stand up in defense of what they believe

Correct. The way the "insult" is "hurled" is of particular significance to me. As a baseline, with exceptions, I usually mod Rule 1 based on who the insult is hurled at and whether or not the post, even with the insult, adds value to the conversation. If there's no value, the comment is gone. Period. If there is value, then I look at the direction of the insult. Saying, "Transubstantiation is a stupid doctrine" is fine. Everyone has the right to their own opinion and I prefer not to censor commentary on inanimate objects. If someone wants to take that personally because they believe in transubstantiation, that's their own problem for choosing to take it personally.

Now, if the insult is thrown at a person or people group, that's different. For example, "Anyone who believes in transubstantiation is an idiot" is different because now you're inviting people to take it personally. You've left the realm of criticizing an idea into criticizing people. I also extend this to people groups. So, saying, "Catholicism is idiotic because they believe in transubstantiation" is out of line. Technically "Catholicism" is not a person, but people so closely identify with that categorization that you cannot legitimately separate someone from this label, if they've chosen to identify with that label.

Personally, I think it's silly to identify with any such label in the first place. The Catholic church doesn't save people any more than the Nazarenes or the Baptists or the Pentacostals. Jesus saves us. So, I'm not a "[fill in denomination]" - I'm a Christian - a mini-Christ, or a follower of Christ.

So, although I attend a Nazarene church (despite some theological differences), I don't get all huffy when I hear people mocking them for some of their more bizarre views. Why? Because being a member of a Nazarene church is not part of my identity in Christ. But if someone "slanders the noble name of him to whom I belong" (Jesus, per James 2:7), that's where I get up in arms and will defend the name of my Lord - the name that is above every other name ... and the guy who mows my lawn is very appreciative of these efforts at defending and glorifying the name of Jesus ;)

I doubt if I said “reformationists are followers of Satan via his puppet Martin Luther” I doubt others would sit idly by and say nothing

Yeah, I literally just had to remove a post where someone was claiming that George Lucas was a Satanist and that anyone who watched Star Wars was going to hell. People get hyped up over stupid crap all the time. Things that blunt are not tolerated ... unless they add value.

Condoning such behavior is troublesome enough, but when a mod engages in it it's even worse.

For the record, I did have a private chat with OZ last night about this. He is now aware of the standards I utilize for Rule 1 and I think he's on the same page now. I can't guarantee his loose words won't slip out again, but to some degree I just assume guys here can have an amused mastery mentality in some of this, or otherwise can take it as practice developing that mentality.

Blood sacrifice? Really?

1 upvotes · 10 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I removed his comment.

Blood sacrifice? Really?

1 upvotes · 10 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The break of frame is the emotional way in which he got worked up about the situation. A rote apologetic response would have looked very different - from both of them!

Blood sacrifice? Really?

1 upvotes · 10 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Okay, now that I've got some time in front of a desktop, here's what I'd like to say.

FIRST: /u/OsmiumZulu and /u/TonyProvelone have some good points on both sides, albeit communicated somewhat tactlessly or emotionally charged. It's clear that what you're struggling with is based on your influence from Catholicism. But it's also a gross misunderstanding of a lot of Catholic teachings. To that end, I do believe Catholics are genuine Christians (excepting those who just sit in the pews and fake it, which Protestants have as well). So, it's worth either looking into other denominations whose views might be easier to take in, or otherwise have some lengthy conversations with a Catholic apologist who can help you understand what's really going on.

SECOND: When contemplating leaving the faith, always ask yourself: Am I feeling this way because of who God is and what the Bible actually says? Or am I doing this because of what his people have done? The fact is, as you seem to understand, that God is real. The truth is truth, whether you choose to turn a blind eye or not. If you reject God because you have read and understand the Bible for yourself and are making an informed decision to turn the other way, I can respect that. I think it's a really unwise decision. If you stand on the railroad tracks and see a train coming, but look it dead in the eye and say, "Come at me, bro" ... so be it. You've made an unwise decision that cost you your life, but at least it was an informed one. But if you're saying, "Bob got off the railroad tracks and he's a douchebag and he's telling everyone else to get off the tracks too, so I'm going to stay on because I can't stand all those stupid things Bob says, and I don't believe a train will ever come anyway" ... well, now you're gambling your own life on an emotional reaction to someone else. Or to convert this concept back to reality: why risk your eternal fate on an emotional reaction to what other people say about God? Why not go to God Himself, through the Scriptures, prayer, fellowship, evangelism, etc. (basically the 7 basics from the 300 series so far) and make that judgment call based on the facts? Don't let your distaste for God's screwed up people (Catholics and Protestants alike) be the stakes upon which you gamble eternity.

THIRD: As /u/redpillwonder pointed out, it seems as though the foundation of your faith was an intellectual assent to a certain set of assumptive principles. Now you're deciding that maybe those assumptions didn't make as much intellectual sense as you first thought. I get it. Faith isn't meant to rest on intellectual acknowledgment or assumptions. 1 Cor. 2 specifically says that Paul avoided using "wise and persuasive arguments" to convince people to the faith because that makes the foundation of your faith little more than sand. The next time you hear a "good point," the sand starts to shift and you can never have a rock solid foundation. Instead, he says that the foundation of the faith should be from a demonstration of the Spirit's power. In some cases this could be a miraculous sign, but we don't see Paul doing miracles to convert people, so I doubt that's what he meant. Instead, we see him telling people his testimony. He shows people the incredible change that God had done in his life - something that all others would have called impossible, given where he had come from. That is the testimony of the power of the Spirit. This testimony won't persuade intellectual skeptics, but when someone sets aside that skepticism and pursues a genuine relationship with God themselves, the transformative power of the Spirit in one's own life becomes undeniable.

I hope this helps, brother. I wish you the best!

Blood sacrifice? Really?

1 upvotes · 9 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

To /u/Flagfootball99 - this is a solid reply. Heed his words well.

Holy crap, life is good ! What are some of you thinking ?

1 upvotes · 8 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

Well ... that affirms my last paragraph then :p

I don't want to go to church anymore.

1 upvotes · 8 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

As /u/redpillwonder noted: "It's not about you." This is the biggest thing to remember in all of this. But let me give more context to this statement.

"Church" as we know it today isn't what the apostles had in mind or were trying to establish. They did have regular meetings back then, but they functioned very differently. They often started in a group gathering, but filtered into people's homes to build genuine relationships - and that's where the good stuff happened. That's what Jesus modeled with establishing communion. Feel free to look at 103 for more on what that kind of fellowship/communion/koinonia is supposed to look like.

With that in mind, koinonia is the word often used in Scripture to reference local congregational gatherings or small groups. Ekklesia is the word used to reference the larger, more global understanding of the church as a whole. Koinonia was never associated strictly with a set weekly time to gather. It followed more along the lines of what Jesus said: "Where two or three are gathered in my name, there am I with them." To that end, your koinonia - your local church - is made up of those people with whom you are in relationship and gathering together for the purposes of the faith.

To that end, my koinonia involves several people from my local congregation, some of my family, some friends from other congregations, people who live in my area, colleagues, etc. These are all people with whom I meet for the intentional purpose of expanding the Gospel in our own lives and among those around us. Do I need to attend a Sunday service to do this? Absolutely not.

Having established that Sunday services are not a biblical mandate (including in light of Hebrews 10:25, which is fulfilled through intentional relationships on a smaller scale) and highlighting the incredible danger of making a Sunday morning service your primary means of connecting with God and other believers (some of which you alluded to in your post), let me add this ...

- The current Sunday morning service routine is something that God has allowed to go on for centuries. We shouldn't spit in God's face by rejecting something he has tacitly approved.
- This structure of "church" originated with the Jewish synagogue movement, where the Jews in captivity under Babylon and Rome had to hold secret meetings to teach each other the law so that their history would not be forgotten. The Jews who converted to Christianity adopted a similar structure, which worked well when the early church had to meet secretly also, to avoid Nero. There is no mandate that we adopt this structure, but it did have value - particularly in times when information about the faith was suppressed and difficult to learn, legally. Although it doesn't convert well to a free-exercise of religion form of government, some of the value can still be retained - as long as it is not one's only or even primary source for advancing the Gospel in his/her own life or for others.
- The current structure is a very convenient tool for those with a right understanding of ecclesiology to utilize for the fulfillment of their mission. Specifically, my mission is to make disciples and advance the Gospel (which is the first part of the disciple-making process). Given that most of the pew-sitters in my church are self-deceived about their faith, and that an even greater number of people are not actually practicing their faith daily or actively participating in the mission God gave them, what better place do I have to find people with whom to share the Gospel and to begin discipling than a local congregation?
 - Do I limit myself to my local congregation? Certainly not. Do I treat the local congregation itself as "my church"? No way. But do I use it as a resource to find people who want to know and grow in Christ and to have a platform for advancing the mission God gave me? Absolutely.

Once you find your mission in the faith, I think you'll also find that the best way to accomplish that mission in light of the cultural climate of the first-world church is to work through a local congregation. At times I almost feel machiavellian about it, until I remember who's following who. That is, I'm manipulating my congregation to suit the purposes God gave me. I have no interest in the pastor's "vision" (if he even has one). I'm just using them for my own vision. Doesn't that sound wrong? But then I remember how culturally assimilated the church was before my influence and that sense of "manipulation" and "using them" turns into redeeming and reconciling them - especially when the leadership started seeing the influence I had and adopted my vision as their own. Before me the church's vision was simply to get people in the door. I kid you not, their mission statement was: "To provide a spiritual home for the unchurched." Their mission today? "To make disciples who make disciples." Do they admit that this mission-change came from me? Probably not. I think pride causes the pastor to think he came up with that on his own. I'm okay with that. I don't need the credit - I only want the win for Christ.

But the key in all of this is to look at the local congregation as a tool for you to utilize on your mission to make disciples. If your pastor has wrongly bought into a false vision or a misunderstanding of a koinonia gathering or ecclesiology, ignore his vision, but use his platform to advance your own. This is, after all, much of how Paul and Peter functioned in converting the Jews.

Christian Plate Spinning ... Seriously? Sure. Let's do this.

1 upvotes · 8 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with you there. But not everyone does.

Not a virgin

1 upvotes · 8 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good to know. That said, we do have to be conscientious of how our actions affect others. So, if you're intentionally stringing along a girl who you have no interest in "pursuing anything with" - that's a problem. I address this a lot more in my plate spinning post.

Here's how I see it:

- If you're not interested in marriage, just avoid girls altogether. Jesus and Paul are both pretty clear that this is the preferred route for those who can handle it.
 - To be clear: those who "can't handle it" I define as those who have an actual girl in their life who they can't stop themselves from screwing if they don't get married. "I'm a porn addict" is not a good reason to get married and doesn't invoke 1 Cor. 7 - and 99.9% of men find that marriage does not cure a porn addiction like they hoped it would.
- If you are set on getting married, that's fine too, but Paul calls it the lesser options. In this case, go build a wide network of women who you might be interested in and start getting to know them. This could be going on dates one-on-one or hanging out in groups. It doesn't really matter. There's no problem with dating many people at the same time, just don't lie to them and say you're exclusive when you're not - that would violate RP principles anyway.
- If someone isn't marriage material, drop her as one of your plates. Let her move on and find someone else. Don't waste her time. After all, if you're not marrying her, you can't have sex with her, so what are you getting out of the relationship that you can't otherwise get by just being friends or by finding someone else?

In my view, if you are stringing someone along on the false premise that she thinks the relationship has a chance at ending up in marriage, that's sin. If you make it clear to her that it's not going anywhere and she hangs on anyway, that's her fault, not yours.

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

1 upvotes · 6 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I agree that the sermon on the mount is not about updating the commands. As a whole, he's preaching the gospel. It follows a pattern like this:

1. Here's what you should look like (beattitudes)
2. God expects perfection. Here's all the ways you fail.
3. Even when you try to do good, you still fail. You can't succeed your own way.
4. I'm the answer for you.
5. Once I'm your foundation, build on that.

The point of sections 2 and 3 aren't to lay down harder laws, but to set the stage for chapter 7 when he reveals that he is the answer.

EDIT: How the heck did the auto-mod remove this?!?

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

1 upvotes · 6 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good thoughts. I'm going to have to re-read the passages now to refresh on what it says exactly :)

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

1 upvotes · 5 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's quite a bluepill way of looking at it.

Not everything is red and blue. Sometimes the truth is just the truth.

SMV. If something cause a woman's SMV to drop... of course God would be concerned about it

How do we know that God cares about SMV though? I don't see him ever referencing such a standard. He creates ugly people as well as hot people. There's no assumption in Scripture that God wants everyone to strive to have some optimal SMV.

"Why would God be concerned if a woman is raped?" - said no one today ever

I wouldn't say that either. But there are all kinds of moral ways SMV is affected.

Surely you're not making the point that God does not value virginity in unmarried woman? Surely you're not making the point that sex before marriage is good/not sin? Or that virginity is a social construct...?

I might be saying that virginity is a social construct, possibly derived from God's expectations. Specifically, I don't think God ever said, "You should marry virgins if at all possible." I think God simply doesn't want people having sex outside of marriage. By definition that makes them non-virgins, but God's interest in virginity stops there. I might be missing something in Scripture about this, though. I just don't remember reading anything beyond the concept of no premarital sex.

But at the same time you're hesitant to endorse any view that demands/requires a woman stay a virgin before marriage.

I'm just trying to figure out what God actually said and not. As I've said in other threads, virginity was quite important to me when picking my wife, and I do encourage other guys to maintain that standard as well. But there's still value in discerning whether that standard is something God-endorsed or a man-endorsed. I agree it's a wise standard all the same.

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

1 upvotes · 5 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's too bad. I used to go there a lot. I'm not sure I ever saw that much dogma to begin with.

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

1 upvotes · 5 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, no thanks.

Not a virgin

1 upvotes · 5 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Eek

Not a virgin

1 upvotes · 5 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I d x

Not a virgin

1 upvotes · 5 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good point. But I don't like to assume every guy here takes the wise advice given, which in this case would be to get out. So, I still like to ponder making the best of the alternative.

Not a virgin

1 upvotes · 5 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent comment here. In short: be patient, rob the cradle.

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

1 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

As for God's Bride, yeah, God does demand her to be unblemished, nothing less. Kinda why Jesus has to die True. But the point there is that God took the responsibility on himself and took his bride as she was - "While we were still sinners, Christ died for us."

More significantly, is that a man might care. And a woman should care that men might care.

Might and should - absolutely. But do women have a motivation to care in modern society? If this is proven true, will that really given men more power in some way, or will the women still say, "Too bad, if you want to hit this you're going to have to accept me as I am"? If women are as empowered as you suggest, "should" turns into "I don't really feel like caring about this."

If something would cause a woman's marriage value to drop in a man's eyes, of course God would be strict about it. I think that's what RPWonder was trying to say.

I'm confused here. When does God talk about marriage values?

Ever asked a Bluepill pastor "why was virginity so emphasized in the Bible?" He'll struggle to answer, it's hilarious. An idea like telephony will help us to understand this Biblical emphasis.

Was it all that emphasized, though? I see passages about not lying about being a virgin, but not much more. The references to virginity seem to be more cultural in nature.

It would also expand our thoughts: What other consequences of promiscuity could people be suffering, without their knowledge, that they could have prevented if only they had listened to the wisdom of the Bible?

Good point!

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

1 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

But if a woman wants to get married, a man's sentiment is everything. Especially if a woman wants to "lock down a mate", so to speak. She has to care about a man's sentiments?

As you often note, women have all the power. So, why should she bother expending her time, effort, energy, self-denial, etc. to "lock down a [particular] mate" when she can just move on to the next guy? She doesn't have to do anything if she has the power.

RP is about truth. RP has to go where no one dares to go. It's within the spirit of RP to explore even possible truths.

Try telling that to the guys over at MRP every time I try to introduce an idea that has proven to work in my life and with others I've observed ... yet is something they haven't tested themselves. It's a constant recitation of: "No, only mod-established dogma applies. New ideas are not allowed."

I once did a post on personality disorders with a "Part 1" tag on it. I commented that part 2 would address how to handle a woman with each type of disorder. An EC told me something akin to, "The answer better be to improve yourself the RP way or divorce her. If it's not, I'll tell you off." People don't want to explore new ideas there. I'm even okay if my ideas, observations, and experiences are proven to be wrong or outliers - I just like the conversation for what it is. They don't. Oh well. And TRP is such a joke with wannabes that I can't really trust anything they do in the way of exploring theory. I probably should have referenced MRP as the one to assess all this.

TRP has no agenda, other than possibly to best serve one's own interests.

I don't think that's true, from what I've read there.

Whoever, dishonestly or with a fraudulent intention, goes through the ceremony of being married, knowing that he is not thereby lawfully married, shall be punished with imprisonment

I can't speak officially, but my impression is that this isn't for what you're describing with a mutual endeavor - it's to prevent a man from tricking a woman into thinking they're legally married when they're not, thereby cheating her of her rights under a divorce. It's a work-around to common-law marriage.

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

1 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

so why mention waiting for them to "approve" it?

My point was simply that it's more of a secular topic, so I'd expect secular RP to address it before we do. That said, my response to /u/Whitified retracts this a teeny bit. I just see this as something that'd be more up their alley than it would be ours. So, why would I harp on a topic that hasn't even made its way through its own natural environment first? That might just be coming from my ignorance and doubt, though. To that end ...

I'm simply saying it's better not to claim it as truth OR outright dismiss it.

This I agree with. But then should we start bringing up claims of people's children being affected by alien probing? I mean, there's no science to prove this doesn't happen either, and there are a lot of scientists that do believe in the existence of aliens. I know I'm being ridiculous and facetious with the comparison here, but that's the slippery slope we go down when we start allowing pseudo-science to take the center stage. I try to avoid getting people worked up over "maybe this might have a chance of possibly being true." There are enough hard facts to worry about that hypotheticals are usually on my back-burner. But ... as I told /u/Whitified, I'm totally not opposed to a fair and balanced representation of the subject as its own thread :) I think that could make for fun and enlightening conversation. There just needs to be some kind of bolded disclaimer that it's pure theory based on implications from scientific findings, not proven facts.

It does interest me, however, in trying to get a better understanding of God's heart and the reasons why He feels so strongly about women being virgins before marriage

That's a good point. But does God really feel that strongly about women actually being virgins - or about them lying about it to induce a man to marry them? I take from those passages that it's more about the fact that marriage is an eternal bond and tricking someone into marrying you and becoming one flesh with you under false pretenses has life-long implications, and thus should have life-long (or rather, life-shortening) ramifications.

More notably, if I'm right about death being the only thing that frees someone from the bond of marriage to remarry, then it makes sense that if she got the guy to marry her under false pretenses, the only way he could get out of that marriage to undo the harm is if she died.

I haven't seen much in the Bible coming from God demanding women be virgins before a man marries them.

If it's true, it does shed greater light and give a better understanding of why He was so strict and why He feels so strongly about this

What light, exactly does that shed? If you or /u/Whitified does make a post on this, that's what I'd like to see answered :) Why would God care if trace amounts of DNA of a past lover are present in another man's offspring? We already know that God is not very concerned with blood lineage (per Romans 9 and other passages) as compared with spiritual bonds. Of course, 1 Cor. 6 and 2 Cor. 6 both talk about what is commonly known today as "soul ties," which are formed by becoming one flesh with someone outside of a marriage covenant. How does that factor into all of this? What's the real spiritual implication today? Or are we back to saying that God really does care about whose blood and DNA a person happens to have?

All good thoughts ... I just have too many questions about this right now and not enough time to process it without help :p

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

1 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Especially if it's potentially a big deal.

True, but the evidence among genetic tests on humans (at least from my cases and observations first-hand) proves that it is not a "big deal" to the actual genetic makeup of a human being. It may be a "big deal" to a father's sentimentality on the matter, but sentiment is so subjective that I can't quite quantify that or push one idea for all people as if everyone must also think it important.

Nevertheless, if you want to make a post on it, I would most likely not take it down - as long as you do as you say and label it appropriately as "pseudo-science."

But at the same time, by encouraging this to be another factor, you're even further pushing men to a standard where they are less likely ever to find a spouse in the first place. Or to put it another way, you're encouraging them to adopt your standard, saying "Here's another reason why you should be super careful about who you marry." That's fine - we all do that. Just be aware of what it is :)

It's enough to turn a potential husband's stomach inside-out

I suppose that depends on the man. I'm not sure that would really have an impact on me the way you seem to be reacting to it. But it's also something where I'm not at risk of having to deal with it, so I would only take my commentary in its limited context.

Someone once commented that TRP is merely a complementing position to Feminism.

I think that was me. I know I've said that before.

This theory is completely against their goals. RPW or RPC will have to be the pioneers here.

Perhaps. I suppose you're right that it would have to come from someone who endorses an RP worldview while simultaneously still embracing marriage and child-rearing in some capacity. To that end, have you changed your view on this?

The reason I think TRP would be a more apt fit is because it furthers their goal of avoiding commitment. It tells a man, "If she's been with another guy, that's another reason not to procreate with her - because your kids might be part him too." It doesn't prevent a man from having sex with her. If women frequented TRP, then sure, it would have the negative impact to their goals by decreasing female sexuality. But I simply don't see that being the case. It only serves to promote their anti-marriage, anti-women agenda.

I just find your rationale... bad. That's all

My rationale is simply that I've seen the DNA testing numbers with my own eyes when performed on humans. 20+ year marriage numbers don't have any more impact on the degree of genetic matching than a one night stand. I'm not sure how direct, personal knowledge on tests involving humans is a "bad rationale" as compared with pseudo-science performed on fruit flies.

(Now if only there's a way for a sub to promote a theory, without actually endorsing it... hmmm)

You could make a post on it :p

Not a virgin

1 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Date younger. Don't try to find someone your own age if you want your standards met. If you can, great. But if you're 30, date a 20 year old. If you're 40, you can still get away with dating girls in their mid-20s. My dad's 61 and dating a 33 year old. My boss married a girl over 20 years younger than him. My wife's parents have a 9 year age gap. My grandparents were 17 years apart. Just stay legal, of course. But younger girls tend to bring less baggage with them. If you can find a winner your own age and that's your ideal, go for it. But if you're restricting yourself to, say, a 4-year age gap, you're really cutting off a lot of options.

Christian Plate Spinning ... Seriously? Sure. Let's do this.

1 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Sorry to hear that. My parents went through that too. I've seen it play out first hand as well as with many of my clients/cases. Maybe I just wrongly assume other people are as hyper aware of this issue as I am, so I might not be giving it due concern even with my guidelines section.

Christian Plate Spinning ... Seriously? Sure. Let's do this.

1 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Sure, with an innocent until proven guilty attitude that makes sense. And to be clear, I never suggested cultivating these orbiters - only that as one's value goes up one should see this type of thing happening from innocuous interactions and that at the outset, as long as you're not intentionally trying to get yourself or someone else tempted, there's nothing wrong with a little, as secular RP calls it, "catch and release."

As to my specific circumstances, I'd be shocked if my wife processed things as you suggest. She often struggles against being quite condescending and assumes other people don't live up to her standard until proven otherwise. Guilty until proven innocent. Sadly, this attitude even carries into the handful of times she's had actual jury duty. This is part of the reason why I'm the only guy she ever dated.

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

1 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The Deuteronomy passage only references the king, much like Timothy only references an overseer.

I do tend to agree that polygamy was not part of God's original design in Eden, but neither was Netflix and Chill. Perhaps a better example is divorce. Jesus comments that it is permissible in the event of martial unfaithfulness, implying it is not sin; rather it is an inevitable natural byproduct of being in a world tainted by sin. Yet no one would argue God intended divorce for humanity even before sin, right?

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

1 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good reference. I quote verse 15 so much I forgot about 14 :p

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

1 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm inclined to agree. But is this ever spelled out in scripture, or is the scriptural reference about fathers having the right to deny simply a convention God put in place due to cultural issues, much like God saying to treat slaves well not necessarily being an implicit approval of slavery?

Christian Plate Spinning ... Seriously? Sure. Let's do this.

1 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

My thoughts exactly.

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

1 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a good reply. But where do you see in scripture a clear statement that a covenant is required?

I do agree that God must join the people for it to be valid. But who's to say he doesn't do this every time two people choose to become one flesh? This is what genesis seems to imply to me. That and OZ's questions are mine as well.

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

1 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed.

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

1 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed.

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

1 upvotes · 3 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Haha ... not upset by anything. Just enjoying the conversation. Sorry if its feeling heated on your end.

Christian Plate Spinning ... Seriously? Sure. Let's do this.

1 upvotes · 3 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

She already has those guys in her life. I'm okay with it. I know she won't cheat, and I'm higher value than her orbiters anyway. Sometimes the balance of my value and reliance on her faith to keep her faithful tilts one way or the other, but either way I'm not worried about it.

Christian Plate Spinning ... Seriously? Sure. Let's do this.

1 upvotes · 3 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I think you're assuming more than I mean in a lot of this. Where you draw the line is fine for you. I have given a clear no. What she does from there is her responsibility. I'm not going to be mean to someone or switch gyms to avoid leading someone on who has given me IOIs.

And yes, my wife also has orbiters. I'm okay with this and accept it as a fact of life. Attractive, high value people will draw the attention of other people. That's how life is. We're not going to hide in caves to avoid every person who might possibly develop feelings for us just because we're nice, outgoing people.

Thoughts on "premarital sex" and polygamy

1 upvotes · 3 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I am not Catholic, and protestant "acceptance of church fathers" isn't that we treat them as having divine authority ... they just have some really good things to say at times, so we respect them. But they're not infallible and we reject the ideas they preach that don't find their basis in scripture.

To refrain what I said in my post, since you seem to like to ignore things that don't fit in with the characterization you want to portray: I'm not after a polygamous relationship nor do I recommend anyone else look for one. I'm merely trying to figure out a genuine scriptural framework for marriage. Don't imply more than I mean.

As for Adam and Eve, you're confusing a scripturally compelled view with a scripturally consistent one.

- Compelled = three bible says it directly and to deny it would be to deny the bible.
- Consistent = the view is not compelled by the bible, but nothing in the bible denies it either.

"Your desire shall be for him but he shall rule over you" and the litany of corroborating passages are compelled statements. "He created Eve and not Eves" is a true observation (unless you buy into Lilith), but the interpretation you make from this is merely consistent and not compelled. One could just as easily use the same logic to say, "Because God didn't create Adam with two wives, men shouldn't have two wives ... because God didn't create us with clothes we shouldn't wear clothes ... let's all be nudists."

Christian Plate Spinning ... Seriously? Sure. Let's do this.

1 upvotes · 3 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That depends on what you mean by "enjoying."

- Do I have butterflies in my stomach whenever she's around? No. That is more of a woman's response to these types of things. Assuming you are a woman from context, you may have mistakenly assumed your natural reaction would be a man's natural reaction as well. To your credit, most guys are beta and cannot control their emotions, so you might be seeing a lot of guys fitting that stereotype anyway.
- Do I assess what's going on, evaluate the implications of the exchange, and appreciate her effort in wanting to connect with me? Sure, who wouldn't?

Now, anyone who knows me knows I'm not a cold, analyzing robot any more than I am an emotional wreck. It's not all or nothing. But I do control what I feel and when I feel it, for the most part. That includes romantic feelings.

Christian Plate Spinning ... Seriously? Sure. Let's do this.

1 upvotes · 3 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, nice.

Christian Plate Spinning ... Seriously? Sure. Let's do this.

1 upvotes · 3 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

On the mass whole, this is true. The problem is when Romans 14:14 comes into play, along with the litany of passages that reference doing something for the wrong reasons.

So, saying "hi" and having a conversation wouldn't be sinful in 99.9% of cases, but there's always going to be that one guy who is totally doing it for all the wrong reasons. Maybe he really wants to cheat on his wife, but he's so fat and ugly that it never actually happens - he never gets past "hi" and a basic conversation. Does that mean his "hi" and conversation wasn't sin just because she eventually shied away before ever letting him actually hit on her? No, it's still sin because of the intention he had going into the conversation. Just my thought, though :p

Even this would meet Dalrock's test as being "otherwise sinful."

As to the test itself, I must ask:

- loving to who?
- what are the bounds of the role of the biblical husband?
 - For example, is it part of the biblical role that the husband have an abundance mentality, and thus his efforts are furthering that role? I doubt such a case could be made legitimately, but that doesn't mean it isn't profitable anyway.
 - Or does he simply mean that it's not a violation of the biblical role assigned to the husband? In which case it doesn't necessarily have to be an affirmative attribute of that role and it's not really necessary to mention that role to begin with.

Christian Plate Spinning ... Seriously? Sure. Let's do this.

1 upvotes · 3 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's exactly why I included a section on guidelines.

Christian Plate Spinning ... Seriously? Sure. Let's do this.

1 upvotes · 3 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

If someone got to that point where the spinning thoughts are mutual he has gone too far and crossed a line that shouldn't be crossed. He has started to develop a ONEitis for this new girl, wondering how great she would be over his wife. That ONEitis is, of course, dangerous ... but often the cause of divorce ... and also the reason why second marriages have an even worse success rate than first ones. A man with true abundance doesn't have to think about the other girl.

Interesting article from 2011 I thought would be beneficial to share | Her Desire, His Rule

1 upvotes · 2 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a good response. That said, a husband does accept moral agency for the actions of his wife and she loses moral autonomy when she is directly acting under his authority on a gray area. So, if I tell my wife to do something that God later determines was sinful, I'm responsible for her having done it because I am the one who told her to do it and it would have violated her obligation to me if she had refused without cause.

This, of course, changes when it is obvious sin. If I tell her to murder my boss after a bad day at work, no matter how serious I may be, she has a clear obligation to remain faithful to God first. Although I still accept moral agency and responsibility for her act in killing my boss, she does not lose her moral autonomy because she followed through while knowing it was wrong.

The RP is tearing me apart. Don't know what to do.

1 upvotes · 2 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

/u/macmeeler probably has some good stuff to say on this, as I know he's gone through some serious ONEitis problems.

As /u/RedPillWonder said, RP is first and foremost about understanding how the world works. Where secular RP is "men swapping notes," in the Bible we have a textbook where God waves his big divine hand and says, "But guys, I'm telling you how I created the world!" As I said in this post, it's up to each of us to decide what to do with that information and how best to utilize it. If your primary goal in life is to maximize your sexuality, then "hard-core red" makes the most sense. This, of course, does require compromising your faith. That's why your title says, "RP is tearing me apart" - because you see where the hardcore position requires compromise. Hardcore = "sex is the highest priority in life."

Most men here are not hardcore. We acknowledge that through our faith we have higher priorities than sex alone, although sex is certainly up there on the list. That doesn't mean we're "less aware" than our hardcore friends or that we're "less willing" to utilize our knowledge of how the world works. It simply means that we're applying that knowledge toward a different allocation of priorities. To that end, I highly recommend reading that entire post I linked above - it really addresses much of what I think you might be struggling with.

As for spinning plates, this is a big enough topic that comes up often enough that I'm just going to have to do a post on it.

For those who are married or want to marry: Why?

1 upvotes · 2 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

the question "What's in it for me?", which still hasn't really been answered yet

I think I tagged you, but in case it didn't go through, I replied to /u/Whitified with my response.

For those who are married or want to marry: Why?

1 upvotes · 2 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Let me be clear: I wasn't suggesting marriage as a first-choice thing that should be desired. Remaining single is always better. But his question was not "what's in it for me?" as you suggest - it was "why do you do it?" The latter question assumes the marriage is happening and is trying to discern the motive behind the action.

As to the question you pose here, "Why should I marry?" - to /u/redthrown18332, my answer is: You shouldn't. It's that simple. I advise this to everyone I disciple.

As to the question you pose below, "What's in it for me?" - to that I say: a lot. Anyone with half a brain can create a giant list of ways that marriage is beneficial. But the cons outweigh the pros, in my opinion - unless someone is lacking in their ability to make disciples or is otherwise tempted into sexual sin, which tips the scale.

So really, how are you any different from the Trad-Cons so desperate for men to marry in this time and age? Like them, you basically admit that it's a raw deal for OP, but then use the "it's not about you!" angle to get him to accept a bad deal anyway.

I was answering a question. Again, I would never encourage someone toward marriage who isn't already married, unless they are struggling with sexual sin or are otherwise incapable of grasping how to make disciples.

As you said, marriage is about preventing sexual immorality. We agree on this. So definitely, if one is to marry, that has to be the reason.

That's one of the reasons the Bible gives - specifically the 1 Cor. 7 one. I append Malachi 2:15 onto this, which states that the point of marriage is to produce "godly offspring," which I believe (in conjunction with several places in Romans) is about spiritual offspring in a post-Gospel world and not merely physical offspring.

So a man can think he's marrying for sex (to prevent sexual immorality), yet end up having no sex in his marriage anyway.

This is one of the many reasons why I interpret 1 Cor. 7's compulsion to marry in a very, very limited context: only when that temptation is with another actual person.

Most people interpret it to include masturbation. They think, "I can't stop looking at porn, so I'd better get married to get this sexual sin under control." This is faulty thinking and it virtually never works. Marriage is never the relief that these guys think and in 100% of cases I tell men that they should resolve their pornography addiction before considering marriage - and only then decide whether they still want to pursue marriage. Of course, I have a 0% success rate with getting guys to follow-through on this particular bit of advice, so there's that :p

Or more specifically, why the modern legal contract of marriage?

If you recall from other threads on the subject, I distinguish between spiritual marriage and civil marriage. Ruiz's A History of Marriage post (which should really be sidebar material) also does a good job making this line pretty clear.

To that end, I have no problem if someone wants to be spiritually married before God, but never signs the legal document with their government. They, of course, should not then file jointly for taxes or receive other similar benefits. But that's a choice they're free to make. As independent parties with no real bond, they're free to craft whatever "spiritual marriage contract" they want, which can be a way for a couple to make up their own divorce laws (although you do have to be careful with the idea of including sex as a contractual obligation, which I think is illegal in most states).

I believe your friend /u/ruizbujc agrees with me when I say that legal marriage is not the same thing as God's marriage.

There it is ... same page here.

Let's assume that all men "who cannot control themselves" indeed MUST marry, like you said.

I would add: "...with another woman physically present in their lives."

why can't the OP /u/redthrown18332 have standards as to who he wants to marry?

Absolutely he should.

So what is wrong with OP deciding that, should he marry, he wants a wife who will 'love' him the way he wants to be 'loved'?

Nothing.

Such exceptions among women do exist, according to your comments above. Most of RP agrees.

I'm not sure I said that. Women are capable of loving a man the way God prescribes men should be loved. But the way God prescribes and what we, in our sinfulness, actually want are two different things. That's why I said in my original comment that from a secular perspective (taking God out of the picture), I agree with the RP principle that a woman cannot love a man the way he wants to be loved. To quote myself: "From a secular worldview, they're absolutely correct."

Yet according to your interpretation a man who doesn't or never meet this woman, still MUST marry someone (aka settle).

According to my interpretation, if a man only "MUST marry someone (aka settle)" if he's about to have sex with her because he cannot control himself.

Simply put, OP is about to have sex with a girl who doesn't meet his "standard" for marriage - he has already compromised his standard. Because I equate two people becoming one flesh through an intentional union (i.e. not rape, which might still apply anyway) with spiritual marriage, if OP has sex with a woman he has just married her in God's eyes and his standard is pointless - because he himself did not enforce it.

Or to be more blunt, as /u/BluePillProfessor forever refrains: acta non verba or "look at what people do, not what they say." So, to say he has a ridiculously high standard of what he'd expect before marrying, but then going off to become one flesh with someone who doesn't meet that standard ... that just tells me from his actions that his verbal standard was worthless to him.

I hope you see how this interpretation, taken to it's logical conclusion, basically = settle

Quite the opposite - it's a call to speak with one's actions, not just one's voice. Verbalizing a standard means nothing if a person is quick to drop it. If a person has a very high standard and is able to remain sexually pure until he meets someone who fits the bill, then that's the better option. But if he compromises his own standard to have sex with someone, then he has shown his true standard.

Hopefully your response would not be "But they are selfish standards!!!"

I would never :p A guy needs to be a little selfish every now and then - especially when choosing who he will and won't marry.

And it was actually pretty well-received. I still stand by it

I would stand by that too :)

For those who are married or want to marry: Why?

1 upvotes · 21 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Touche.

For those who are married or want to marry: Why?

1 upvotes · 21 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Oh, my main comment in this thread was too long and I had to edit it down :p

For those who are married or want to marry: Why?

1 upvotes · 21 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I follow what you're saying, but the ECs at MRP say otherwise and I agree with them.

Be the Judge

1 upvotes · 21 December 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Of course - and I still do in most circumstances. Don't assume that just because I'm saying "in some situations explaining or rationalizing can be beneficial" that I think we should always explain or rationalize. It's still the rarity when we should do those things. But to refuse to do them ever under any circumstances - whether with your wife or when defending yourself in court - that's just nonsense. After applying RP principles strictly for a few months and seeing great results, I started adding wisdom and discretion back into the mix on a few small things like this and found that with the foundation of other RP practices already in place, having adjusted the framework of the relationship, both submissiveness and sexuality were enhanced by selectively engaging with my wife's ability to understand what I'm doing, how and why. Just don't go overboard with it. You don't always explain the how and why. In most cases the "what" is enough. But sprinkle in a little "how" and "why" and my experience has been much, much better than when I was withholding these things altogether. "How and why" = explanation and rationalization.

To be clear: I still don't see much use for defending or making excuses in any marital context, but you do need those in other contexts in life. It sounds macho and manly to say, "That makes someone else your judge and you should never do that," but there are situations where someone else actually is your judge and has authority to enforce their judgments. A man would be wise not to ignore that every time.

Be the Judge

1 upvotes · 21 December 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

She doesn't just want you to do it in advance - she wants you to do it without asking her for permission when you do get a plan together. Don't ask for permission or approval unless failing to do so may land you in legal trouble.

17 year old Catholic

1 upvotes · 21 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

In a pre-Gospel world that functional dichotomy made sense. Today, the goal is to have spiritual children (i.e. "make disciples"), not necessarily physical ones. In Romans 9 Paul makes it clear that physical lineage no longer matters - only spiritual lineage. That's not to say it's bad to marry or have kids. I have done both myself. But both Jesus and Paul say that in a post gospel world this is the lesser option.

Be the Judge

1 upvotes · 20 December 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The best followers/submissives are the ones who internalize the directive of the leader. They can anticipate the leader's needs and function independently without the need for micromanagement. This is much easier accomplished if the follower understands the why behind the what.

It has nothing to do with a man "needing" her to understand. He can function just fine if she doesn't. But his life is a lot easier if she does. Demanding that a man avoid all explanations and rationalizations in all contexts reduces her ability to follow, doing a disservice to the efficiency in running the ship.

Again, you're only addressing the context from a frame of need or weakness in a man, but ignoring the advantages these things can and should serve - and I'm abundantly confident that if I watched your marriage for any appreciable length of time I'd see several incidents of you doing exactly what I describe.

Be the Judge

1 upvotes · 20 December 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Best advice I got? Assume the reader is stupid, don't be too proud to walk them through something.

In other words: "Explain more, not less."

Be the Judge

1 upvotes · 20 December 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I agree with what you're saying - but you also have to realize that you're talking about DEERING in one particular context. The sentiment I was responding to was made clear when bogey said: "DEER is always a bad choice in every situation." This is simply and obviously not true. As you say: "in context of the sexual marketplace" - I'm more inclined to agree in the majority of cases.

But even then there is room to waver. As I noted to /u/Rian_Stone, I might want to explain to my wife why I'm telling her to do something because that explanation gives her additional useful information and context for following through. I might want to rationalize a decision I'm making so that she can receive it and internalize it, which helps her enter my frame, as opposed to an unexplained decision where she might otherwise try to object or argue or even secretly resent me for insisting on something she doesn't understand. Now, you might say, "Go ahead and let her resent you," but that doesn't seem like good sexual strategy either. Helping her conform to my likeness, my frame, my way of perceiving the world - that does.

As Alpha-Providers, we neither care what she thinks in the moment, nor do we want her validation.

I wholeheartedly agree. But you can explain or rationalize things from a different place that isn't rooted in succumbing to her judgment or validation. I think for most people it does come from that place and you're so used to seeing it that way that it's hard to conceive of alternatives.

she is inherently an emotional not rational being

I fully agree here too. But just as men are capable of being emotional at times, so are women also capable of being rational at times. We can and should use that capability to our advantage when it suits us. To that end, an appeal to her emotion can still take the form of a rationalization.

In the case of Rollo he's not seeking validation of those he's explaining too, in fact he is teaching.

Correct. And what is wrong with explaining and rationalizing things to our wives at times, when necessary to teach them our worldview and how to live within our frame? Acta non verba, sure. But being mute on all matters except sexual advances and issuing orders is just going to make you seem mentally challenged.

17 year old Catholic

1 upvotes · 20 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I disagree.

You're right. I stand corrected. I was more referencing the RP concept that his options will rise with his SMV, which will rise with age into mid-30s.

The nuclear family is not the only way of doing family.

You're right on this as well. But in America I make certain assumptions about what level of support a family will give to a child who wants to get married before it's socially acceptable to do so. The answer is generally: very little.

17 year old Catholic

1 upvotes · 20 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

not sure if this is the right place ... I can't seem to find an askRPC subreddit

Simply put, there aren't enough people here to warrant creating one yet. Hopefully this place grows and in time we will develop one. For now, this is the right place.

are the views expressed here Roman Catholic views or Christian (any denomination) views?

Although it's not a perfect standard, the Nicene Creed is what I use to filter Christian users from non-Christian ones. That said, even non-Christians are welcome to participate here. So, for mormons, as an example, I wouldn't allow them to call themselves "Christian" or promote theological viewpoints inconsistent with the Nicene Creed (see Rule 3), but they're certainly still welcome to engage in conversation without doing those two things. I'm not aware of anything in Catholicism that violates one of its own core creeds, so you're good to go :) Just expect theological differences from the non-Catholic users. I'm told a lot of RP men are Orthodox as well, if that means anything to you.

I see a lot of posts concerning people who are married. Am I in the wrong subreddit due to my age?

No, this is still the right place. This isn't exclusively for married people, but because most people find this place through MRP instead of TRP (I've never advertised on TRP) our existing user-base is mostly married men. I do know several singles, though. Get some more on in here and I'm sure you'll see more posts about the single life creep up. /u/OsmiumZulu has some good stuff posted, one of which is on the sidebar.

Does this subreddit require an in-depth understanding and knowledge of the Bible and Church teachings before participating?

No, but receiving benefit from this sub does require teachability. If you're not willing to learn, apply, and grow from viewpoints that are different from what you already think and have established in your mind, there's really no point. That said, there are some people here who are very knowledgeable in the Scriptures, so if you happen to say something that's theologically inaccurate or correct, be willing to receive correction or engage in productive discourse to get to the bottom of the issue.

how does RPC address a situation in which an individual is keen on self improvement, sexual strategy and staying committed to the faith in an area where Christianity isn't the majority, and most of those that do identify as Christians do not take it seriously?

You're describing virtually the whole world. Most people in the church are only self-proclaimed Christians, but are likely not genuinely saved. At least in America, I can assure you that Christianity is not the majority. So, most of the advice here will apply.

A lot of the Christian women (and men too) don't care about the teachings on pre marital sex and marriage etc, choosing what bits to believe in

You're talking about the distinction between "I believe in Jesus and God's Word" and "I believe in my own ideology of Jesus and God's Word." Only one saves.

The odds of finding one who is a Catholic, takes their faith seriously, and is physically, mentally, and spiritually compatible with me are very slim.

Check out some of the earlier posts here. The "odds" have been addressed a lot in the first couple months of RPC. See the links in the last paragraph of my comment on this thread (which was also directed toward singles, by the way). You're right, it's dismal. But I also explain that if you're not hopeful of finding a unicorn, you're better off finding a decent horse and raising her up to be the kind of person you want as a wife. Disciple her.

I am considering actually adopting that TRP mentality as it seems to be the only viable option in this case

In other words: I can't find a woman who is (1) attractive, (2) spiritually mature, and (3) single. I realize that the "spiritually mature" part is the bottleneck, so I have to compromise there. Rather than finding someone who is spiritually young and disciplining her into spiritual maturity, I'd rather abandon my own spiritual maturity to be on her level.

Now, let me be clear: you're just starting your journey too. You can't expect to find a woman who's more mature than you and then have her follow you. You must be ahead of her before she can follow. So, if you want an RP relationship where you're the leader (rather than BP where she leads because she's more mature), you've got to work on yourself first. That's why self-improvement is such a big thing. The 300-series is all about developing your own spiritual maturity. Read, internalize, and apply. Then go find a girl who is attractive and single and, when in a relationship with her, begin disciplining her to become the type of godly woman you want. If you sacrifice your values to have a TRP relationship, you're ironically abandoning TRP principles by dropping your frame to live in the spiritually immature framework that she would set for the relationship. It's an interesting conundrum - but sleeping with the non-Christian hot girl when doing so would violate your own standard of who you want to be (i.e. a godly man) is both non-Christian and a violation of frame, and thus non-RP. Solution? Don't break your frame; find the immature girl and disciple her into maturity.

Please keep in mind that I am not yet in a position to make any major changes to where I live or how much money I can spend on certain things

You're also too young to be thinking about marriage. Your SMV will go up and up and up as you age - probably into your mid-30s before it levels out. If you want to get married young, go for it. I was married at 23. But for my kids, I wish I hadn't. Even if I would have married the same woman again, I would have done it later in life. Right now you're prone to get ONEitis and succumb to sexual temptation when you find your "one," which is really the only reason to marry young. You're better off going into monk mode and working on yourself rather than looking. Hit 25? Sure, start the search. But until you're able to live independent of your family and financially support yourself along with a wife and kids, you shouldn't be thinking about anything long-term. In fact, most people your age don't really understand marriage. You've observed it from your parents, friends' parents, media, etc. but you don't really have a good picture of what it's like - and you can't. Instead, you're drawn to an ideology that culture tells you should be a high priority and desire. In reality, Jesus and Paul both say that if you can avoid marriage, that's the better option (Matthew 13; 1 Cor. 7). Who are you going to listen to, culture or Jesus/Paul? Who do you think had a more accurate understanding of what biblical marriage entails: culture or Jesus/Paul? So who's more informed to give you an opinion on that matter? See how that works? I'm sure /u/Whitified would agree here - and he has a lot more to say on avoiding marriage than even I do. But if you must marry, at least put off thoughts of marriage until you're mature enough to make wise decisions and stable enough for all the nuts and bolts to work out.

Be the Judge

1 upvotes · 20 December 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

What would you do if you end up judge-vs-judge?

What you're saying is, "What if my frame says I'm the judge and her frame says she's the judge?" Now it's frame v. frame and the answer should be more clear, as there's tons of content here already for battling out frames.

Or if it is your own grievance you want addressed?

I.e. "What if I want to change my wife?" There's plenty of content around here to address that question as well. Short story: you state your boundaries (what she shouldn't do) and expectations (what she should do) and follow through with any necessary recourse when those are violated. If you've followed the principle that she needs you more than you need her, then you're golden.

The issue that most people get into is that they develop the mentality of "I need you less" when the factual reality is otherwise. For example, someone might develop a "fake it" abundance mentality, but in the event of a divorce might not be able to pull through on the "make it" because he's so financially strapped. Or put another way: he forgets that even if he doesn't need her he does need to stay married to her to maintain the lifestyle that lets him experience that abundance. That's a much more difficult mental spot to be in ... but I think I'm getting rabbit trailed now, so I'll just move on.

Book Suggestions?

1 upvotes · 18 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Where would you recommend I start?

For what it's worth, I recommend to every man I disciple that until they believe they have mastered fluency with most of Scripture, it's better to ignore man's words and focus on God's Word. I take the view that these other books and writings are about studying what God wanted that guy to know, whereas reading the Scriptures directly opens me up to what God wants me to know.

This, of course, tones down a lot once someone knows the Scriptures thoroughly.

Should Christians Care About Physical Attractiveness?

1 upvotes · 18 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Let's get God's thoughts

Hah! I used to use a saying: "Let's Scripturize this." Great references!

Is speaking harshly to your wife a sin?

1 upvotes · 18 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

The overwhelming majority of uses I hear of when people are using harsh words are not the "would be helpful" moments. You have to have an iron frame before it can ever be helpful - and harsh words don't make the frame iron, as some people seem to think. Your frame should typically involve you being a good-humored, fun-loving guy who's generally relaxed through stress and can smile through torture.

If you're using harsh words or tone, it's usually an indication of a broken frame. But when you do have that iron frame, where you could look her dead in the eye and smile and kiss her and snuggle her because her yelling and screaming tantrum is just so cute to you - that's when you first develop the capacity to use harsh words correctly.

Until then, just don't do it. God always has that attitude toward us, so it's easy to look at him and think we can do it too, but we're also not at the same "above it all" level God is most of the time.

As an example what I'm talking about, my son (6) got mad at me yesterday because I sent him to his room for hitting his sister (4). This was the angriest I've ever seen him. He was yelling, screaming, stomping up the stairs, pounding against the wall with all of his strength. I followed him up there to give him the stink eye, but he kept crying and screaming and yelling - and eventually I accidentally started laughing at him. I didn't mean to do it, but his antics were so obnoxious that I just burst out laughing.

This, of course, upset my son even more, causing him to scream like a banshee. I thought he was going to destroy his throat. After some time, I sat next to him to ask why he was so upset (especially given that he was the one clearly in the wrong and he knew it). His answer? "Because you were laughing at me when I was crying." I had to talk him through that, of course.

Now, with your wife, I don't recommend actually laughing at her. Have more restraint than I did. But that's the attitude you need to take through her antics before you're allowed to have harsh speech. Through that I knew that my harsh speech toward my son was not coming from a bad place, but one where I was perfectly happy and content inside and his obnoxious antics were not phasing me one bit - they actually had a positive impact on my mood with how humorous I saw it.

That's a lot harder to do with our wives because society tells us to treat them as authoritative equals. But even among adults, if an employee were to act like that and the boss is worth his salt, the boss will laugh it off, fire the employee and say, "Can you believe that guy?" as he becomes the laughing stock of the rest of the office. Sans the firing part, that's about the attitude you need to take with your wife. But if a co-worker, being an authoritative equal, were to do that to you, you have no ability to rise above it. You kind of have to take it seriously or ignore it because you have no authority to stop it or address the problem. The fact that people give so much credence to their wives' antics is that we've been so trained by society to see them as authoritative equals, when the Bible tells us that this is actually a rejection of God's design - that we should be able to rise above this emotionalism. When we do, that's when we can know our harsh words are coming from the right place - and we can stop and exercise sound wisdom to know whether those words are calculated to help or if they would best be reserved.

The one with no frame just assumes harsh words will be helpful, never actually challenging this assumption against wisdom.

402 - Impact of the Cross

1 upvotes · 18 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

The one I'm writing :/ Other than that, this is really just a piecemeal of theories that I've heard over the last couple decades. I compiled the list while trying to understand the Gospel one day, then I started noticing consistent personality traits among people who adhered to different theories more strongly than others and went where the rabbit hole took me.

How much to value physical attraction in dating

1 upvotes · 12 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I agree.

How much to value physical attraction in dating

1 upvotes · 12 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That makes a lot of sense too. I'm inclined to agree that things like gluttony, self mutilation, and other uglifying things wouldn't exist. But does that mean there's no merit to the saying "beauty is in the eye of the beholder"? Would everyone have the same taste or different tastes yet be able to appreciate the beauty outside our own tastes anyway?

How much to value physical attraction in dating

1 upvotes · 12 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

The fact that we see ugliness at all, and ugliness in something made in the image of God is very possibly a result of the Fall. Basically it seems to me that we don't hold a Biblical view of beauty anymore.

This is an interesting theory, and something I hadn't thought about before. I'm inclined by my gut reaction to agree! But there are so many variables that I simply can't process it fully in the absence of Scripture on point :p I mean, there's the 2 Peter passage about "your beauty does not come from outward adornment, but from inner character" (paraphrasing), but I'd really have to keep thinking on this.

How can a man not be a beta bux if the woman is traditionally supposed to stay home and raise children, buy groceries, etc.? Doesn't the man have to provide for her to take care of the family?

1 upvotes · 6 December 2017 · /r/askTRP

That might be an easy quote to remember ... but the real point is that women want to feel like a girlfriend who's with the guy who has his life sorted out. That's where the attraction will come from. As soon as they start feeling like a wife, it's game over.

207 - Perseverance, Sin, and Fitness Tests

1 upvotes · 6 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

He did. I think he closed it to open up a cigar shop as a means of engaging more with the community and leveraging the "chat over a cigar" time for the Gospel ... tracking with the principles of the book The Insider by Mike Shamy and Jim Petersen.

How can a man not be a beta bux if the woman is traditionally supposed to stay home and raise children, buy groceries, etc.? Doesn't the man have to provide for her to take care of the family?

1 upvotes · 6 December 2017 · /r/askTRP

Could be.

Working on the Sidebar

1 upvotes · 5 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Good idea. I'll try to process something about that and get it up eventually. I think I'd like to get a little further in the 300-series and start the 400-series before doing much more with 100-level stuff though.

Thanks for the suggestion!

Alpha = Sexual | Beta = Survival

1 upvotes · 29 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This is an interesting read, but I'm having trouble figuring out the point. How can men use this information to further their mission or interests?

It sounds like you're saying that "going beta" can be a good thing in the right circumstances. I don't doubt that. It's bad sexual strategy, but has other positive aspects that a man can utilize. But be cautious in suggesting the "go beta" approach on a sexual strategy sub. This isn't r/interestinglifestrategies.

As a side note, one of those "holes in my scientific accuracy" might revolve around the length of time the survival instincts kick in - and for men, whether they kick in that way at all. The abandonment of the need to procreate is a woman's biological imperative. Physiologically, her libido drops and her hormones change all the way through breast feeding. Once that's done she normalizes again. I'm not aware of this happening in any man throughout history. Male biology (being predominantly polygamous) continues to be interested in sexuality all throughout pregnancy and the child's infancy. That doesn't go away while he chooses to adopt beta traits. That doesn't mean men don't adopt beta traits - but when they do it's usually because of a pressure to conform to their women, not part of a biological/evolutionary reproductive strategy.

She's not your's it's just your turn

1 upvotes · 28 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

My point exactly.

How to respond to a marriage ultimatum?

1 upvotes · 25 November 2017 · /r/askMRP

Right.

FR: Major Event

1 upvotes · 25 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks! I probably wasn't clear though ... I meant I'd prefer if you do it :p If you have time, of course.

FR: Major Event

1 upvotes · 25 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm up for it if you'd like to :) I'm still out for vacation until next Wednesday with only mobile access.

Discerning God's will - emphasized for singles

1 upvotes · 20 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I just get fairly sensitive about the "just do whatever makes you happy in the moment" mentality among Christians. That's the mentality that led to my parents' divorce, so it's somewhat personal for me. It's also one that goes against the grain of genuine saving faith. So, I'm glad that was just a misunderstanding :p

With that said, I do take the view that sin doesn't really matter to the saved. We're already forgiven. "Everything is permissible, but not everything is beneficial," Paul says twice to the Corinthians. It's more about the heart (see also Romans 14:14). But the heart that is oriented toward sin and attempting to justify their sin is on very shaky ground. So, we've got to find a balance between not experiencing judgment or condemnation over ourselves when we do sin, while simultaneously orienting our lives away from sin - and this in the midst of remembering that failing to follow affirmative commands is also sin (i.e. "Go and make disciples" - avoiding sin isn't just about not doing bad things, it's also about actively doing what is right ... see also James 4:17).

209 - Developing and Articulating Your Mission

1 upvotes · 20 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

This was really fun to read. Thanks for sharing how you processed this and your ultimate conclusion!

She's not your's it's just your turn

1 upvotes · 20 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

The assumption has nothing to do with actuality. It's about the frame of mind necessary for oneself.

Think of it like a basketball coach. His team is pretty good and he's about to go up against a team that has a pretty poor record. It's useful for him to assume his team will win and make coaching decisions based on that assumption? Or is it useful to assume the game will be challenging and the opposition is prepared to put up a strong fight? Obviously the latter is the more useful assumption. Now, suppose the opponent is the top ranked team in the league. It is now absolutely critical to follow the useful assumption and reject the non useful one.

So, regardless of the truth about what's going on with the other side, for the team's own betterment only one assumption really makes sense. Are there times when there might be some advantage to assuming your team could beat the opposition without trying or practicing? Sure. But the "this is gonna be tough" assumption will virtually always be more worthwhile anyway.

In the same way, I wasn't commenting on women's aptitude for faithfulness. I was commenting on the frame of mind a man needs to maintain.

FR: Why having a mission is so important

1 upvotes · 17 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'll make a post on that tonight or tomorrow.

The guy you're describing wouldn't happen to be named Joel, was he? I know a guy who fit that description perfectly ... also died too young :/

113 - A History of Feminism

1 upvotes · 17 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed. The left is more intolerant than the right ... but they utilize shame tactics more than the right, so the right still comes off worse.

FR: Why having a mission is so important

1 upvotes · 17 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Maybe I missed it in previous discussion?

Phew, that must be really hard to do - I talk about it pretty much every day :p

What's your mission?

Disciple-making. This starts with evangelism and carries into the follow-up and maturing processes after someone is spiritually "born again."

How do you exude it and live it?

This entire sub is one example - helping men move toward physical, spiritual, and emotional maturity. Of course, actual biblical discipleship requires a lot more than is possible in an online forum, so this is really only a shadow.

More specifically, I meet with guys one-on-one or in small groups and lead them toward Christ. Sometimes these guys are non-Christians and I'm building a relationship and share my faith. When they choose to pursue Christ, or if I am working with someone who had already made that decision before I started meeting with them, I then take them through the 7 basics (see 301) to give them a foundation in spiritual maturity so they can continue growing on their own if something were to happen to me or our relationship (ex. they move away). After that, the direction is really personalized to the unique needs of every person, although certain principles continue to apply, which will be addressed later in the 300 series, which is all about becoming a godly, spiritually mature man (again, I'm still in the basics, so some of it may seem common-sense right now if you've been in the faith for any appreciable length of time).

My life "exudes" this mission toward others in several ways: most notably in that I teach classes at my church on the subject, I model discipleship for others and teach them how to employ it, I lead small groups where I employ somewhat of a group-discipleship path and train the group to become disciple-makers, I talk about it with friends, family, and neighbors constantly, and I even wrote a book on the subject that I hand out freely to those who are looking to become more effective (1) in their own walk with Christ, and (2) in how they lead others toward Jesus. Other than passive acquaintances with whom I have never had longer than a 15 minute conversation, there's not a person in my life who doesn't know what my mission is and how I'm living it out. Of course, I communicate it tactfully so as not to sound obsessive or psychotic, as this self-description would otherwise imply. That's part of why people tend to flock to me rather than running away :p

113 - A History of Feminism

1 upvotes · 17 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Good point on defining the term. I tend to think of the word in a medieval context, like the Knights of the Round Table. It's not directed toward women exclusively; rather, it's the notion that men want a purpose higher than themselves to invest in (see 102's section on Relationship and Impact), which they pursue with traits such as "courage, honor, courtesy, justice, and a readiness to help the weak" (to steal from Google's definition). Or, to put it more simply, it's understanding that some things are more important than ourselves, so we adopt those things as part of our mission and pursue them as a cause beyond our own interests.

Holding a door open for a woman is not "chivalrous" because, as NMMNG points out, it's usually really just virtue-signaling or functioning on a covert contract, not dedication to a higher cause. I suppose if the man truly did believe that women were higher beings worth serving for their own sake, it could be called chivalrous ... but let's face it, 99% of people engage in these types of behaviors not for chivalry sake, but because of covert contracts, so I don't really count that. It's not chivalry if you harbor a secret hope to get something in return. An Arthurian knight would have been free of covert contracts like that.

But stopping to pray with a homeless man, or diving after a kid about to get hit by a car, or helping a battered woman find a shelter from an abusive husband - all of these things can be chivalrous if done without seeking a reward, and most people who do these things aren't interested in anything the homeless man, child, or battered wife have to offer anyway. They do it because (particularly if they are Christian) they believe it is "right," or because it fits within their MAP of the type of person they want to become. This is the Arthurian knight. This is chivalry.

Of course, the Arthurian tales incorporate a lot of Christian principles, as Christians obviously do as well. So, when God tells us things like, "Religion God our Father accepts as pure and faultless is this: to look after orphans and widows in their distress and to keep oneself from being polluted by the world" (James 1:27) - we know that this comes from a higher calling and can be incorporated into our MAP as such. But when the church perverts this into, "Men, you should marry widows and single moms," now they're creating the covert contract, telling the man that they'll get something out of it - that God will reward them for their nobility, or that they will have some prosperous marriage because the woman will see them for the white knight they are, or whatever. But now I'm just babbling and repeating myself.

113 - A History of Feminism

1 upvotes · 17 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Coming from BP I thought woman voting was a good thing but started to question it recently.

For the reasons in my post, I'm not totally against it. Again, the world can do pretty much whatever it wants and I'm not one to try to force political change from the top-down, though I don't reject those who prefer that method.

More to the point, though: If we look throughout Scripture we see that every society, including God's holy people, did not include any voting power at all ... so the concept of a "female vote" simply doesn't make sense. But neither does the concept of a male vote. But God wasn't endorsing a monarchy of kings either - which he actually opposed in 1 Samuel 9. It's always been, "Just follow me. Do you really need anyone else?" And, as with all things, we screwed it up. Even so, I wonder if Israel had been a democracy if God would have allowed a female vote - or if he would have wanted one, but as with many OT interactions God had with his people, he simply withheld his true intentions because humanity wasn't ready for it yet.

question about chivalry

The Bible certainly lends itself to a chivalrous character. That said, there's a strong argument to be made that most of our chivalrous efforts are to be directed toward our brothers and sisters in Christ and that our obligations toward non-believers are quite different. Proponents of this argument note that most of the examples talk about how to treat your "brother," whereas the good Samaritan seems to be a somewhat isolated example that extends this to people outside one's own faith (as would have been the stark contrast between the wounded man and his helper).

All of that said, it's a common RP principle that men actually desire to be chivalrous - that it's in our nature to want to be this way. I don't see it too often, but I've certainly noticed at least 3 endorsed contributors make that comment. More notably, MMSLP makes reference to instinctual male chivalry.

The key thing to remember is that one is being chivalrous out of his strength, not his weakness. Most acts of "chivalry" today are actually based on covert contracts - someone acting a certain way with the expectation that others will respond positively to his actions. The true alpha is chivalrous because he wants to be and he has no care for validation from others in return for his chivalrous behavior. Needless to say, I don't see God praising the former, whereas the latter is exactly what Christ modeled in how he "chivalrously" campaigned across the country helping and healing people wherever he went.

Romans 15:1

"bear with the failings of the weak" = don't look condescendingly on them. I'd have to check the context more, but at a first glance this appears to be more about positive-attitude tolerance and not provision and servitude. But the example of Christ certainly demonstrates, if not by clear command then implicitly by the command to be like Christ, that we should maintain a sense of chivalry. But again: your motive for being chivalrous is what characterizes you as an alpha or a beta.

love others as yourself

Correct - not love others more than yourself. If you don't love yourself or aren't taking care of your own needs, you have no real capacity to take care of others either. After all, if you are God's temple and the Holy Spirit lives in you, and the Holy Spirit working through you is the only good you can really do (for all that we do of our own apart from God is sin), then it makes sense that we should take care of ourselves to make ourselves appealing to God as one who He would desire to work through, just as the alluring femininity of a man's wife causes him to want to work together with and through her rather than in isolation on his own.

The example of a soldier is helpful here. A soldier's job is to protect others both defensively and offensively by combating the enemy, just as the Christian's job is to protect the souls of others both defensively (i.e. for the spiritually young) and offensively (taking ground from the enemy by winning more souls). But a scrawny wimp who can barely fire a gun without the recoil knocking him to the floor, or who can't lift and swing a sword because of his toothpick arms - that guy is worthless on the front lines. He has to take care of himself first. He has to eat properly, exercise, develop his disciplines and strength of character - these things make him a good soldier who is capable of helping others out of his strength. In the same way, we must take care of ourselves first so that the "as yourselves" part actually has substance to it.

113 - A History of Feminism

1 upvotes · 17 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

What you're describing is actually the bottom-up approach, though. It's not like some elected official enacted a law that set the wheels in motion. Some person saw a photo (maybe was even the one who took it), internalized an emotional reaction to a cause because of it, shared that with others who internalized an emotional reaction then shared it with others who did the same, who did the same, who did the same ... until it was big enough that the top had to take notice and do something about it.

The only difference between this type of bottom-up from what I preach is that the "flash awareness model" as a subset of the bottom-up approach doesn't leave a lasting impression. It dies out as people get bored or forget. This is why the church's model of reaching people for Christ fails so darn hard. Without follow up and discipleship people fall away. They never actually internalize the commitment into transformation - they're stuck at inspiration or motivation, like Ruiz described in 202. This is why the media doesn't give a crap about refugees anymore - they lost their profit in it when people became fickle.

113 - A History of Feminism

1 upvotes · 16 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I see the reverse: technology has done more to undermine the narrative coming from the top because it's so easy to hear opposing points of view, challenge the facts, and collect evidence to disprove false claims. For every leader who wants to spin the facts, there are a dozen other people (sometimes eye witnesses) who are ready to offer opposing views, and they have the power to offer those views because of ... technology.

Just look at what the media is doing to Trump every time he speaks. Being a political leader does squat if the media is heavily against you. Where does the media get its power? The people ... not the politicians. Consumers make them money, so they spin the narrative that consumers want to hear. Get enough consumers on the same page and the media will take notice and adapt to appeal to the new movement, as long as they believe that movement can make them money, otherwise they try to crush it.

What is the value of femininity?

1 upvotes · 16 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

As you say, this is a repeated issue/pattern

Repeated, yes. But it's also not frequent enough to really bother me beyond a few minutes when it happens. I think I was more just noting that it does happen, and slightly more often since the baby was born - up from 2x per year to 2x in the last 4 months. On the whole, given how much other men seem to complain about wives nagging over chores, I feel like 2 problematic occurrences in 4 months is actually pretty darn good.

men have a third category, "clean enough," that is not recognized or acknowledged by females, lol

Well stated.

T. Rex mode

That does sound funny!

What is the value of femininity?

1 upvotes · 16 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

it's rare for a man to see running the household as his responsibility -- most want no part of it

True, but we're also on an RP forum where this is one of the underlying principles - that as the captain the man is ultimately responsible for the ship and not just the steering wheel.

it seems the couples who were happiest had clear expectations as far as who would do which tasks

Correct. The failure in my marriage is that my wife likes to change these expectations unilaterally without telling me or getting my approval. That's when she starts getting upset when I haven't done things as often as she likes and I get frustrated when she hasn't fulfilled her end - because she just decided she didn't feel like it one day.

That said, I don't communicate these frustrations through yelling or screaming or emotional withdrawal or passive-aggressiveness or anything. I simply tell her, "Hey, here's what we agreed on. Let's stick to the plan." She doesn't like it at first because she wants me to convert to her way of doing things, which would shift even more of the burden of the workload toward me ... but she gets over it quickly.

resentment that comes when couples silently wonder, "Can't he/she see that something needs to be done, and why doesn't he/she do it?"

Here's the thing - everyone knows and sees what needs to be done. We all just have different standards for when we'll actually step up and do it. 95% of the time the woman has the higher standards. So, if the guy will do the dishes when he sees 50 things in the sink, but the wife's threshold is 35 things in the sink, rather than waiting until his threshold is reached, she'll start getting mad at him once there are 35 things in there and he's done nothing about it.

For the man, doing dishes when there are only 35 things in there doesn't add noticeable value. He doesn't appreciate it until it gets to his threshold. So, he doesn't appreciate the higher standard that she maintains because she is working at a level where he doesn't see the value. If she adopts his standard - lets it get to 50 dishes and then does it, then he values it. He thinks, "Dang, the dishes really needed done and she got it done! What a great woman!"

This is what's at the core of a lot of the "you don't appreciate me" mentality women have - because they're doing things that they see value in, but their husbands don't value, then they get mad because their husbands don't notice or seem to care. And why would they? Why should I thank my wife for something that doesn't add any value to me? It's like if she were to buy her sister a new scarf and she got mad because I didn't thank her for doing that. It makes no sense - someone else experienced the value of the labor, not me, so I have no reason to express gratitude or appreciation.

Now, in some nominal way, doing the dishes when there are only 35 in the sink does add value because it postpones how long it will be until the next time it's at 50 dishes. But it's a value that goes unnoticed because I haven't yet hit the point where I see that the dishes actually need done. So, it doesn't mean the same thing.

I'm not sure if that makes sense, but that's how I view the whole chore interplay and satisfaction levels. When I've learned to make this system work for me - and specifically when my wife has accepted where my value levels are - both of us are much happier. She knows when she does certain things before they reach my threshold that she's doing it for herself and not for my appreciation. But she also knows that if she wants to feel appreciated, she can focus on the areas that I do find value in - and there is always something.

So, if there are 40 dishes in the sink, she's going to get antsy about it, but not me. But suppose the mail has piled up on the table and it's beyond my threshold and not hers (she can put off sorting the mail indefinitely). She knows that either I'm going to sort the mail myself, or she can do it preemptively, even if she is personally fine with leaving it there, in order to get my appreciation. She also knows that if she chooses to do the dishes instead, I'm not going to value that because she chose to do something that I didn't think needed to be done yet in order to avoid doing something that I did see as an immediate need - or if not to avoid it, then to appease her own sense of balance among household obligations. To that end, she's serving her own interests and not mine, functioning in a way that adds value to her perception of the household and not mine. So, my ability to appreciate the contribution is extremely limited.

perhaps you need to have a sit-down and communicate those expectations

We've done this many times. And she agrees with the expectations. And then she unilaterally changes them because on a whim she doesn't feel like following through with the agreement. This is why RP frequently notes that women desire commitment from men but are often incapable of returning it - that women believe they have the freedom to change their minds when their feelings are no longer consistent with the original agreement. Now, I'm not an idiot. I know that some agreements are considerably more powerful than others, which is why many women will stay committed in dead marriages even though their feelings aren't into it. But allocation of household chores is one of those things where my wife feels the freedom to change her mind at will and then get mad at me when I don't read her mind to know it's been changed, or even when the change of position is communicated to me that I don't agree and insist on the original agreement.

I'm not saying we have a bad relationship or that this happens all the time. It might be a couple isolated incidents a year ... there have maybe been 2 times this has happened since the baby was born, more frequently because having a newborn does cause unpredictability in a routine.

Or maybe she's afraid that if she does more of the housework now, she'll be expected to maintain that level of performance after she goes back to work.

I don't think this part is the case. We are usually fairly fluid with our allocation of responsibilities by circumstance. There are 5 months out of the year when she's in busy season, working 80+ hours a week. So, I work my 50-60hr/wk job and do 100% of the housework (literally 100%, I don't mean that figuratively). During the other months, she's either on maternity leave (we've had 4 kids in 5 years, so there was a lot of that) or is only working part-time, and we've found different balances for those times too.

it's probably healthier for you to express your frustration than to bottle it up and be silently resentful

Absolutely. That's why all of this is openly communicated. She knows exactly what I think on these issues and when expectations aren't met I let her know openly - not in a demeaning, condescending way, but as a soft reminder, escalating the degree and tone of my response as the problem continues unanswered.

What is the value of femininity?

1 upvotes · 16 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

men are seldom eager to adopt the traditional feminine one (housework and childcare)

This is why RP teaches men to OYS. It's why I wrote the post on the biological step-mother - because men need to start taking responsibility for all aspects of their domain. She's there to help him, not the other way around. If he sees the housework as her responsibility, he's already lost. It's his responsibility and if she doesn't have the capacity to accept delegation of additional duties, that's his problem to figure out. An over-worked first officer is an ineffective one (ergo my second ever MRP post on dealing with the stressed wife).

Another woman who wants to keep her career might hire household help or a nanny, etc., instead.

This has, in part, been part of the solution. The other part is that I just man up and get done what needs to be done around the house. Does my wife notice or care? Not really. But I don't care that she fails to notice. It's about me giving myself the type of lifestyle I want - and making sure the dirty dishes don't sit around in the sink for a week (noting that my wife is still on maternity leave, thus at home 100% right now) is part of that lifestyle.

Now, what does cross a line is the fact that she is home 100% right now and every now and then seems to want to get ticked at me because the dishes haven't been done in 2 days. My threshold is what the sink looks like after a week. Hers is apparently 2 days. It's her responsibility to get it done (something I have specifically delegated to her), yet she blames me when she fails in her job. That's when clearer boundaries need to be set - and it hasn't been an issue for the past couple months. But the irrational expectations and allocation of responsibilities can be tiresome on the guy every now and then when his wife just wants to play with the kids all day and then get mad when her husband isn't pulling that double-shift to do what she was supposed to get done in the first place.

Because that's only "fair," right?

Who said life is fair? It's not about fairness. It's about efficiency in accomplishing the mission. Most often, if there's any unfairness, it's against the guy's interests.

Hypergamy for the Married Man

1 upvotes · 15 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

It's only a fallacy when made as rhetoric for its own sake without providing any actual support for the claim.

To say, "No true American spits in a woman's face" is a fallacy because there is no actual support for the claim - it's opinion only.

To say, "No true American kills people for sport" is not a fallacy - the nation as a whole has actually taken a stance on murder and this can be supported by reference to the laws. Likewise, to say, "No true Christian ____" is not a fallacy if the Bible actually speaks on the issue and the statement can be supported with Scripture.

Now, if there is controversy over interpretation, that's a different matter. But it doesn't fall under the no true scotsman fallacy.

Preempting the DV charge.

1 upvotes · 15 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Fun times. I will always say: criminal and domestic attorneys have the best stories to tell.

What is the value of femininity?

1 upvotes · 14 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I was going to say the same thing. Because women have stifled men for so long, they're really happy with quite little. If all men were acting like real men, putting dirty socks in the hamper and plates in the dishwasher wouldn't mean squat because that would be a dime a dozen. A guy who OHS is rare nowadays.

What is the value of femininity?

1 upvotes · 13 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

What a beautiful reply.

Greetings! Some information about me and the girl I like, and some questions.

1 upvotes · 13 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

You can't force someone to follow Christ; and you can't make a girl, who isn't willing, to become your ideal bride.

True, but if you can find someone who is faithful, available, and teachable, you can do just about anything with such a person. Not all women meet those requirements, but a lot do. Just avoid those that don't.

Greetings! Some information about me and the girl I like, and some questions.

1 upvotes · 13 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

You dumped her because she was not at your same level of religiosity? That is not one I have heard before.

This is actually a weird trend among spiritually immature guys - particularly those who overestimate their own maturity. They have a lot of biblical knowledge, but they're not actively practicing it in the context of a lifestyle of evangelism and discipleship. They're stuck in the, "I don't sin as much as other people" definition of spiritual maturity, which is a farce.

In reality, as I will forever proclaim: it's so rare to find a woman who is already spiritually mature and walking by the Spirit that if one has really high standards for this, he's better off discipling a woman into becoming like that. Secular RP uses a similar concept: "create/mold your slut." In Christianity it's more: "Disciple her into the ideal bride." That includes sexually, in addition to spiritually (as well as mentally and emotionally).

What is the difference between an "alpha" and a sociopath?

1 upvotes · 10 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'd say it's more that God conforms us to be like him, so what we want is naturally aligned with God's will anyway. So, we're not just mindlessly following someone else's plan (God's); we're following our own plan, which as we mature in Christ is aligned with God's anyway.

Put another way, God wants us to internalize His character, His identity, His plan, etc. as our own, not just doing it out of obligation or because he said so.

Hypergamy for the Married Man

1 upvotes · 10 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

If my life is already on track for exactly where I want it, why would I screw with that? Maybe I'm wrong and I really am purple ... But if purple gets me the sex I want and maintains all my other goals and priorities ... what's so bad about that?

More to the point, though, I don't see any actual advice here. I see generalities and accusations, but nothing practical. There's nothing here where I can walk away saying, "That's something I can try tomorrow."

Hypergamy for the Married Man

1 upvotes · 10 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

No need to get butthurt.

Hypergamy for the Married Man

1 upvotes · 10 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

She follows my theology, not the other way around.

MRP tries to force one threshold for "GTFO" on me and tries to ridicule and shame me when I decline. God proposes another, no shame or condemnation of I reject it ... and I happen to like his threshold better. My wife has tried to convince me to follow her model too, which is bizarre and a huge double standard ... but I've rejected it and she went with my standard instead. That's about where things are.

Red Pill Betas

1 upvotes · 8 November 2017 · /r/TheRedPill

It's also worth noting that they only had posts put up for 3 days then died ... nothing in the last 3 weeks.

Rian Stone Full Video Interview on The 21 Report

1 upvotes · 8 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Solid video all the same. I do a lot of public speaking and the hand motion thing still gets to me periodically. But you carry yourself well enough. More importantly: your content was spot-on. When the meat is filling, minor dings in the package don't really matter. I'll look forward to catching the full talk.

Working on the Sidebar

1 upvotes · 7 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting. I appreciate her comments in the article, but the author of the article him/herself is clearly just dripping wet with feminist froth and didn't like the idea of having to write the article in the first place :p Anyway, thanks for the reference!

Wife addicted to weaponized sex; impending divorce

1 upvotes · 7 November 2017 · /r/askMRP

I wouldn't make her verbalize it in the form of a book report!

Of course, I was just speaking as to my agenda. It was more, "Give it a read and let me know what all the fuss is about." I'll definitely take a read when she's done, though.

Wife addicted to weaponized sex; impending divorce

1 upvotes · 7 November 2017 · /r/askMRP

Funny timing ... I just bought her The Surrendered Wife a couple days ago. It's not in yet, but she's been asking me what it looks like to be submissive ... complaining that the church says wives should be submissive but gives no practical advice on how to do that. So, I took that to be a pretty solid opportunity. I also told her a lot of people talk about the book and I've never read it, so I want a book report to know what everyone is saying.

[FR] Emotions

1 upvotes · 6 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I think this is really an askMRP post. You didn't come out and say it, but you're asking us all if you did a good job, hopefully with a pat on the back.

No, your wife did whatever the hell she wanted to, functioning in her own frame while you did all the work ... then she said thanks to you for being her work mule. I don't like this one bit. I mean ... good on you for dabbling in OYS a bit, but how are you leading and where is this a sign that she's following? All I'm seeing is that you added to her comforts and got nothing in return.

Part of my mission is helping bring out happiness in people

That's not a mission; it's a vague airy concept that sounds cool. Get some concrete and measurable action steps, then carry them out.

Suggestions on how to undermine the crab bucket

1 upvotes · 6 November 2017 · /r/askMRP

If you want more info that makes sense from a Christian context, this post goes into far greater detail on that topic. I also address it toward the end in this post.

[For Singles] Getting Laid Like a Christian (part 2)

1 upvotes · 3 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Bluepill Churches (conservative and liberal) these days routinely tell their men to marry post-wall, former CC-riding reformed slvts, that it's somehow holier to marry single mums... basically asking men to be Captain Save-a-h0e.

To be fair, Paul does note: "But refuse to enroll [in church support] younger widows, for when their passions draw them away from Christ, they desire to marry and so incur condemnation for having abandoned their former faith ... So I would have younger widows marry, bear children, manage their households, and give the adversary no occasion for slander ... Let the church not be burdened, so that it may care for those who are truly widows" (1 Timothy 5:9-15, edited down).

Now, that's not a compulsion that the church should be encouraging the men to marry these women. It's an encouragement for the women to find men to marry them. This is a huge distinction.

the lie that it's somehow your job/privilege to reform a former slvt, that "good wives are not found, but trained".

Haha ... no, I'm more of the mindset that you want to do the opposite - reform the legalistic "good girl" into your own personal slut. I think /u/BluepillProfessor talks a good deal about this and I'm on board. Of course, I'm speaking crassly on a delicate subject, but I'd love nothing more than for my wife to be thinking naughty things about me all day long, waiting for the kids to go to bed. Will she ever be this entirely? Probably not - but steps in that direction are worthwhile, as it makes it easier for me to stay pure (as opposed to the sexually denying "good girl" who avoids every possible inclination of lust, even for her husband, as if it's all sinful) and stay focused on my mission.

Also, the "Save-a-hoe" thing doesn't really apply to what he's saying. Puppies are pure and innocent (per the metaphor, at least), they're just inexperienced. You're not saving anyone from their baggage. You're finding a blank slate and painting on a clean canvas. I think this is what /u/OsmiumZulu means. To that end, they might not need to be broken of anything - just taught.

[For Singles] Getting Laid Like a Christian (part 2)

1 upvotes · 3 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

To use an offensive analogy.

I use the "she's like your dog" analogy a lot too ... but I always preface, "This is going to sound crude, but because humans are the highest form of sentient life, any possible analogy is going to sound offensive, so I'm just going to do it."

As for /u/Whitified's abundance mentality bit, this only applies when actual abundance is possible. This post is about finding someone who can be made into a unicorn. But the point is that actual unicorns don't exist in the wild (or are at least are so rare that I've never seen one or even known someone who has seen one). It's like me trying to have an abundance mentality about rock samples from Mars. If I even try, someone's going to know I'm faking, which undercuts the interpersonal benefits of the mentality. So, while one can have an abundance mentality with regard to their ability to attract 8s and 9s, having abundance about the ability to attract unicorns in the wild is just absurd and counter-productive.

[For Singles] Getting Laid Like a Christian (part 2)

1 upvotes · 3 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

good wives are seldom found and often built

This is actually straight from MRP. The advice is usually, "If you're going to marry find someone who's 18-20, is a virgin or has a really low n-count, and teach her how to be your slut. You're the man, don't expect to find her. Lead her to becoming who you want her to be."

FR: Why having a mission is so important

1 upvotes · 3 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for the insights, brother. I always take your word to heart! Glad to hear from you.

The World vs Faith

1 upvotes · 3 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

On the matter of the divorce rates I would say that it is a problem for all men that want to get married, whether they are of the faith or not

The statistics don't support this, though. For nominal Christians and casual attenders, yes, the divorce rates are the same. But for people who have an active lifestyle of evangelism and discipleship, the actual stats are insanely low.

I think women like that would be extremely rare

Agreed. Go read the posts by /u/OsmiumZulu for single Christian guys.

if you can talk to other women and it not be sexual and it is still considered as spinning plates. Then aren't they technically just acquaintances or friends if you decide to pursue a long lasting relationship with them?

If you read Rollo's content on spinning plates, you'll gather that at its core it's more about how many people you have interested in you at a given time. Some plates spin themselves (orbiters) and others require nominal effort, while others require immense amounts of effort. A Christian should never put an immense amount of effort spinning a plate who he's not married to (which at least in America should only be one woman). And as long as you're not intentionally leading another woman on, making them think you'll leave your wife for them or something, there's also nothing wrong with having a friendly conversation with other women - even if she finds herself attracted to you as a result of that conversation. Remember, you can't negotiate or force your wife to be attracted to you, and you can't negotiate or force other women not to be attracted to you. Whether or not a woman is attracted to you is her own business. As far as plates that spin themselves, if you have orbiters there's nothing sinful in that ... otherwise how could any celebrity ever be a Christian and not sin when people are attracted to them? Just don't give them false hope.

The information itself can cause people to go the wrong way if they don't have a good grip on their faith and can resist the temptation to use all the tools that the redpill has for their own goals.

This is absolutely true. It's also one of the main reasons why I started RPC in the first place - to give Christians a safe outlet for studying and discussing these principles, free of temptation toward sin.

I need to further deepen my relationship with God and reorient myself.

Awesome conclusion, brother. The 300-series should be your home base for a while, then :)

FR: Why having a mission is so important

1 upvotes · 3 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

What's the context for the question?

I need some encouragement about remaining sexually pure.

1 upvotes · 2 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Well said.

FR: Why having a mission is so important

1 upvotes · 2 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

A truly RP man on a mission won't care so much about his interactions with his wife haha

That depends on if you buy into the notion that RP is sexual strategy. I understand that you don't. But 99% of the rest of the reddit RP community does.

As for the rest, I realize that in a vacuum that statement could have come off as placation - just telling me what I want to hear. But in the context of the greater conversation, I'm heavily inclined to believe otherwise.

the "slight 'I'm not really attracted to you' dig" thing makes sense. I contemplated that, and it's probably where the "You drive me crazy sometimes" line comes from. After all, I'm still on my journey - I've made it clear several times that my sex life isn't perfect and exactly where I want it to be right now. But the improvements I've seen and the general direction we're moving in seem to imply that the attraction level is increasing - and far stronger now than it has been in the last 9 years we've been married. Or to put it more clearly: her actions tell me that this statement wasn't about attraction level, however else her words might be interpreted.

And so my journey must begin

1 upvotes · 1 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Meh, I've seen that type of evidence admitted at trial before. They didn't use velcro, but threw a recorder in an open window sneakily as the guy's wife was driving away. The court didn't care.

I need some encouragement about remaining sexually pure.

1 upvotes · 1 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'd love to hear your thoughts as you read :) You'll get a sneak peak at the yet unwritten parts of the 300 series and one of the the 400-level posts as one of the later chapters in the book (assuming I didn't revise it out; I can't remember if it was still in the version I sent you).

found this on facebook

1 upvotes · 31 October 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Good point.

[For Singles] Getting Laid Like a Christian (part 1)

1 upvotes · 31 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Sure thing :)

They are indeed one in a million

Fully agreed. Finding a Christian girl who is already spiritually mature, of appropriate age range, in your locality, and generally relationally compatible with you ... is quite rare. The part that makes it most rare is the "spiritually mature" bit. Sacrifice some of that on the premise that you can lead her into spiritual maturity and options do open up. But most Christian single men don't enter a relationship with that mind-set. They want someone ready-made.

Bae ain't bae if bae don't pray.

Needless to say, prayer is a cornerstone of finding relationship satisfaction - because that's how we find satisfaction in Christ first. Once we are satisfied in Him and know how to make Him our center, he's more likely to expand our horizons with what he thinks we can be trusted with. That is, if we can't be centered on Christ first (including through prayer), and thus we aren't appropriately orienting our own lives, why would God go out of his way to give us someone else's life to be responsible with?

Sorry for saying "bae". She wouldn't put up with that.

I have no idea what you meant by that, but it was kind of funny. At best, I figure you're saying, "Don't be a weirdo who acts in a way that turns off mature Christian women."

Unless you are the kind of guy who already has the answer to this question, you're probably not up to snuff for that woman.

This is really what I was getting at when referencing your comment to /u/OsmiumZulu - that a guy has to be spiritually mature and pursuing a God-given vision first before he's ready to have a spiritually mature woman in his life.

At any point in our relationship, I can point to any time in the past and say this: if I met her then as me today, I would not have married her ... But I would happily marry her again today.

This is simply brilliant - to acknowledge the necessity of growing together in Christ. If my wife from the past were around today, yeah, she's not the kind of girl I'd marry now either - because I'm mature enough to filter through what I didn't know back then. Even today I'd still have that struggle, but when I look at how much she's grown alongside me and where she's at now, I can much more confidently continue in the relationship knowing that she isn't the same immature person I once knew. Now, to some degree, I wish she retained some of her youthful qualities, but I see that there are more important things that have developed in their place - things that other women, if I were to start all over with someone new (if that were even biblical), would sorely lack.

My advice is to stop looking. Heck, after you find her, you'll never be looking again, so why hone that skill?

Excellent point!

Live your life toward Christ and if marriage comes, so be it. It is a huge blessing to be single, just as it is to be married.

This is what I've been preaching around here for a while. This comment from yesterday goes more into it.

Advice to a married recovering beta on initiating

1 upvotes · 31 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I fully shave myself, so no body hair to deal with on my end. She has some, but keeps it somewhat trimmed (she's too nervous to shave that part of her body deeper than she can get with scissors) ... not enough that it would get in the way.

And no, there's no difference in pain either way. I think the pain is that she gets sore really fast from the constant contraction of the muscles inside her vaginal cavity. I've tried to get her to do kegel exercises, but she's generally not interested and thinks that doing anything "down there" by herself is sinful.

[For Singles] Getting Laid Like a Christian (part 1)

1 upvotes · 31 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

There are two angles to this sub:

- Christian information to help RP men grow in.
- RP information to help Christian men grow in.

Between the two, Christ is always the precedence and priority and everything must be filtered through that lens. But where there is nothing inconsistent with Scripture, posts unrelated to Christianity but still helpful in developing people's ability to engage in intergender relational dynamics in a healthy, productive way are still welcome. But even then, he targeted the post to issues that are more common for Christians to struggle through than non-Christians, so it's even more on-point than the minimum.

Broken beta asking for help with RP career advice

1 upvotes · 31 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

It's been a long time since I've read his stuff, but I'd think of him more as being purple, which is about the best you'll get in the existing realm of Christian publication.

More to the point, I seem to recall The Sacred Romance being more about fitting into God's bigger story and having little to do with intergender relational dynamics. To that end, the book itself can't really be blue or red.

Advice to a married recovering beta on initiating

1 upvotes · 31 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I despise condoms. I'm using them right now to keep her off the pill, but I was mostly referencing being bareback, as the condoms are a recent switch until I get my vasec next week (it kept getting pseudo-unintentionally delayed).

I need some encouragement about remaining sexually pure.

1 upvotes · 31 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

With limited exception, on an RP forum I just assume that guys are fairly well unplugged from porn by now. It's so counter-productive to sexual strategy that I'm not sure how most men can expect to have sexual success while placating their libidos like that :p

Broken beta asking for help with RP career advice

1 upvotes · 31 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

my reasons are really just excuses

A reason is a factual statement about why something acts the way it does. An excuse is a rationalization to ease emotional ramifications of doing what you want to do. Sometimes the two overlap, but rarely.

So, if I want to rob a bank, an excuse might be "because my family is starving and I have no money to feed them." The reason is stated in the first sentence: I want to. This is the core of how male and female hamsters operate - we function predominantly on excuses, whereas a trained leader operates primarily on reasons. He doesn't need excuses because the leader doesn't need to justify his actions to anyone else (except God, of course - but even then, it is God who justifies us, not us who justify ourselves to God).

a purpose wear something matters to me so much that it doesn't matter where I live, in what city or country, whether a house or an apartment or a backyard, it doesn't matter what I'm wearing in order to impress someone, I don't care what the well dressed women or men have to say about me, and it doesn't matter how much money I make or where I make it. In fact I kind of want to mission where I can look like a fool and no one will understand me.

Beautifully said! And the key thing here is that the purpose of discipleship that God gave his church (us) is something that can be accomplished no matter what your life context.

But it has to be deep, it has to be really real and really deep, deep enough and real enough so that when the whole world mocks me or doesn't understand what I'm doing, it doesn't matter.

Like the apostles, when they were on a mission to make disciples all over the world?

- For it seems to me that God has put us apostles on display at the end of the procession, like those condemned to die in the arena. We have been made a spectacle to the whole universe, to angels as well as to human beings. We are fools for Christ, but you are so wise in Christ! We are weak, but you are strong! You are honored, we are dishonored! To this very hour we go hungry and thirsty, we are in rags, we are brutally treated, we are homeless. We work hard with our own hands. When we are cursed, we bless; when we are persecuted, we endure it; when we are slandered, we answer kindly. We have become scum of the earth, the garbage of the world - right up to this moment. I am writing this not to shame you but to warn you as my dear children. Even if you had ten thousand guardians in Christ, you do not have many fathers, for in Christ Jesus I became your father through the gospel. Therefore I urge you to imitate me. For this reason I have sent to you Timothy, my son whom I love, who is faithful in the Lord. He will remind you of my way of life in Christ Jesus, which agrees with what I teach everywhere in every church. (1 Cor. 4:9-17)

That's a long passage, I know ... but it emphasizes the point perfectly. Timothy was Paul's disciple. The entire concept of discipleship revolves around (as I said in another post) living your life as an example to others and intentionally training others to follow after your example. The church always misses that "intentionally training" part, which is what Paul is talking about here - both in his he intentionally trained Timothy and is sending him to intentionally train the Corinthians, and also in the way that he modeled his "way of life" and urges them to "imitate me." This is discipleship ... and it's all wrapped up in the package you described - something so important that they don't care if the world thinks they're fools. You literally described exactly what Paul is saying!

Where do I go from here?

I think I just left you another comment to PM me about some things to see if I can get you some initial help.

Broken beta asking for help with RP career advice

1 upvotes · 31 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

look at Link in Ocarina of Time ... Where is the adventure?

Check out the book The Sacred Romance, by John Eldridge. Totally on point here, although he uses lots of movie references rather than video games.

I need some encouragement about remaining sexually pure.

1 upvotes · 31 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Oh, I wasn't talking about porn ... I thought the post was about pre-marital sex. Of course, the two are closely related. Any references I made to pornography were merely demonstrative of a cultural context in a given time period.

I need some encouragement about remaining sexually pure.

1 upvotes · 31 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I can't protect myself from demons. They're too strong and smart

That's just what they want you to think ;)

Seriously, we have been given power and authority that at the name of Jesus, if the Spirit is in us, we command them.

- I have given you authority to trample on snakes and scorpions and to overcome all the power of the enemy; nothing will harm you. However, do not rejoice that the spirits submit to you, but rejoice that your names are written in heaven. ~ Jesus (Luke 10:18-20)

Nobody even at church really talks about this.

There are a few reasons for this:

- Most pastors don't understand it
- There's a lot of debate among scholars as to what some of it really means (the concept is universally agreed upon; the specific are not), so it opens the door to lots of questions
- There's a strong risk that young believers will either (a) get intimidated by the concept and fall away, or (b) get too enveloped in the mysticism of it all that they'll lose their grounding in what God has for us to do in the physical realm.
- Some pastors are just too scared and weak

I am soooooo hungry to learn about this mission stuff, to get a purpose more than money, women, pleasure, and impressing others and being popular.

This is the key to life right here. Literally nothing else matters. When I was in college I devoted my life to learning and growing toward the mission of disciple-making. My mom would complain that I wasn't studying as much as she liked. My response? "Mom, even if I flunk out, I'm sure the homeless man lying next to me on a cold winter's night will need to hear about Jesus - and that's why God would have me there."

The mission is all that matters. "Money, women, pleasure, and impressing others and being popular" are all just different contexts in which we can carry out the mission. There's nothing inherently wrong in having any of these things - they just can't be our ultimate aim or be lived out as a higher priority than our God-given mission to make disciples.

You said that everything derives from the first principle about being a child of God (in another post)

Yeah, I really need to stop being lazy and move on to 400-level content.

I want to learn more but am so ignorant I don't even know what to ask about.

Two things:

- PM me where you live and I'll see if I can connect you with someone who could potentially disciple you. I have a network that spans the country and even some into other countries. I can't guarantee you'll be with someone in my network who has availability, but it's worth a shot and I've been able to help others through this type of connection before.
- PM me your e-mail address and I'll send you a copy of my (unpublished) book on discipleship (free, of course). It will give you all the tools you need to get started (a) growing yourself, and then (b) helping kick-start your path into discipling others.

I hope that helps!

I need some encouragement about remaining sexually pure.

1 upvotes · 31 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'd be interesting in hearing your take on this.

It conditions people to focus on worldly pleasures; it desensitizes people to the impact of sin; it demoralizes a person internally to the point where he loses a sense of right from wrong; it causes people to question salvation; it prevents someone from growing spiritually; it hides deeper, darker sins; it holds people back from making disciples; it opens the door to other forms of spiritual attack; it lets the enemy know your weaknesses; it burns memories into your brain that cannot be forgotten; the desensitization components lead to escalation; it averts one's spiritual orientation from Christ; it bonds your wife (or future wife) to your sin; it disrupts the spiritual unity in marriage; it hinders prayers; it causes male hamsters to begin justifying and rationalizing their actions ... and I'm doing my best to avoid the physical and psychological issue.

At some point you don't care about cheeseburgers, you just want to not feel so hungry.

Indeed ... like Jesus being tempted to turn rocks into bread after 40 days without food, only to reply, "Man does not live on bread alone."

Now, there is no question that men have a biological impulse toward sex. That said, this biological impulse is, in my view, nowhere near as strong as the world makes it out to be. Instead, I'd wager that at least 75% of the sexual urge you feel is coming from cultural influences telling you what you should experience and trying to entice that urge out of you.

Imagine living in biblical times where women were generally much more heavily clothed, internet pornography did not exist, there were no scantily clad women on billboards or in TV shows or movies, no dirty magazines running around, etc. The compulsion to masturbate for the first time would be much lower, and even after that first time, the constant bombardment of pressure toward repeating would be minimized. That's not to say people wouldn't give in ... but there's a reason we don't see the Bible (or historical records, in general) referencing this type of behavior to the mass degree that we have today.

So, in a sense, there's some excuse for men today, who have a harder struggle than existed back then. But at the same time, this excuse causes us to over-estimate the struggle to a degree where we treat it like an absolute necessity, like food ... when in reality it's just an innate desire, much like I have the innate desire to decompress to Netflix at the end of a hard day.

Believe me - I've lived in the midst of a pornography struggle, and I had a nympho girlfriend in college who was constantly trying to get me to engage in premarital sex. I know the struggle is real. But again - there's something so much better in store. I think I talked about this in the Odysseus v. Jason post in 208 (?).

And so my journey must begin

1 upvotes · 30 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

There are good divorce lawyers out there who are women. I'm not denying their existence. They're just much, much rarer.

In my experience, female attorneys have a serious inferiority complex, so they end up being over-zealous to a degree that disadvantages their clients. Think of the feminazi who wants to prove that women are better than men at everything ... and that's most of the female attorney population. The fact that the whole job is about winning arguments heightens the feminist zeal in women - especially when they develop an emotional connection to their client's cause and can't separate their feelings from what's actually best for their client.

A quick anecdote is the guy who hired a woman attorney who bragged to me about being called the "ice queen" (no one actually calls her that; I think she just made up the title herself) - who spent over $50,000 on his case (as compared to my client's $18,000) only to have her drop him when he ran out of money and we steamrolled him into getting our way. Or a similar situation where the guy actually went to trial, only to find out that his woman attorney was being bull-headed just because she didn't like a man telling her she was wrong ... when, in fact, she was wrong and the female judge affirmed it. Or the other guy who hired his woman divorce attorney who pranced around like the boogey-man trying to scare everyone in her way into backing down ... only to give up the case mid-way through trial because she saw it wasn't going her way - and we ended up getting better than what we asked for in our last settlement proposal. I could list at least 3 dozen more stories like this. I can list exactly 2 stories where the woman attorney worked hard to get a great settlement, viewing trial as a last-resort rather than the intended destination - and in both cases they did well enough that their client was better off than if they had gone to trial with what the judge would have given.

Sometimes the hard-ball approach works and is necessary. But, again, I've only ever met 2 female attorneys in my career so far who were willing to play any game other than hard-ball. Given that 95% of cases settle before trial (actual statistic there), if you hire an attorney who's just trying to prove that she can play with the big-boys, you're going to waste a lot of money assuming you're the 5% when there's a far greater chance that you could be in the 95%. Even at that end, the majority of male attorneys are equally capable of working at the 5% of cases that go to trial too ... so by going with a male attorney you're not losing any "skill" or "talent" that the woman has and the man lacks ... you're getting extra skills at settling cases that most women lack. To be fair, there are plenty of "hard-ball only" male attorneys out there too. They're just, proportionately, a much smaller breed.

Now, I've said in other posts/comments before that it is actually better for most men to get a woman judge. A woman attorney is probably also truly great for things like social security, workers' comp, personal injury law, etc. - things where you need someone who has a chip on their shoulder ... who will fight just for the sake of fighting or to prove how "tough" she can be. That attitude flourishes in that type of law. That's not to say they're better than men at these things ... it just means your case won't be disadvantaged in those types of law. In family law, I find the opposite - that people actually have an advantage on the whole if they work with someone who is willing and capable of thinking collaboratively and toward reaching amicable resolutions. Not only is this generally better for everyone (especially the kids) ... even if your case does end up going to trial, the judge will see that one side was trying to play ball and the other side was trying to play daggers and grenades. Who do you think the judge is going to have sympathy for when writing her decision?

And so my journey must begin

1 upvotes · 30 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Much appreciated. Glad to help.

I need some encouragement about remaining sexually pure.

1 upvotes · 30 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

very vague ... What is an example of a mission?

Sorry, I meant to link to this comment, which I wrote at about the same time explaining the whole concept to someone else.

I feel like my life has direction.

The direction you have is attractive to non-Christian women. Christian women (at least those with any modicum of genuineness and appreciation for their faith) want a Christ-centered mission. So, having a great career becomes a quality about you, not a purpose or direction in life. The same thing goes with a hobby - "He has a good hobby" isn't the same as "He's living out the purpose for which God put him here and I want on board!"

low quality christian women

This is a legit frustration. I attribute it to the fact that most people in the church aren't legitimately saved to begin with - and even fewer are actually mature (men included). My guess is that you've got some spiritual maturation to do first, and then the mission will follow as you "seek first His Kingdom and His righteousness."

That said, as you start to grow, you will be able to find a woman who may be "low quality" at the time, but you can disciple her into maturity - lead her spiritually to become the type of woman you want to be with.

You talk about unplugging as if its a physical switch that can be turned You're right, it comes off that way. In reality, it comes through spiritual growth. The more you pursue your faith and begin functioning as a spiritual soldier, the clearer the battlefield becomes.

I just ask that he would show me his plan ... I need physical, actionable steps.

It's in the Bible: "Go therefore and make disciples of all nations" (Matthew 28:19-20). God typically doesn't repeat himself with direct divine revelation when he's made something clear in Scripture already. The frustrating part is that most Christians want to ignore this compulsion because it's uncomfortable to share our faith with others or because it's hard work becoming mature so we can disciple others into maturity. So, we make the great commission a vague, general concept while ignoring the fact that Jesus gave clear guidelines for how this mission should be accomplished. Pretty much everything he did is an example to us. Here's the general pattern:

- Jesus started by telling people what to do and why to do it.
- He then showed them how to do it by doing it himself.
- He then let them try in front of him and gave feedback.
- He then sent them out and had them report back.
- He then commissioned them to go on their own and to show others how to reproduce this process.

These can be summarized in: (1) Tell them what, (2) Show them how, (3) Let them try, (4) Send them out, (5) Pass it on.

I've also written a book on discipleship. The entire thing has a one-page illustrative summary that's a little daunting/confusing on its own, but should give some degree of context: Here (illustration adapted from LeRoy Eims' Lost Art of Discipleship). I'm happy to send the whole book, which gives clear, physical, actionable steps and has chapters that give a fictional account of what it looks like for a person to live this stuff out in practice. It's not an RP book by any means (i.e. has nothing to do with intergender relational dynamics), but is on point nonetheless [if you want a copy send a PM with your e-mail]. Or if you want another, more credible source, the LeRoy Eims book I referenced above is also solid and extremely practical (albeit a bit dated).

The lack of THINGS for me to do to improve my situation drives me nuts.

I totally get this. The problem with Christianity is that it's not about the "THINGS" we do - it's about letting God work through us, which changes shape and variety greatly.

That said, the 300-series (specifically 301) should be very relevant in the foundational things to get you started with your own growth.

I need some encouragement about remaining sexually pure.

1 upvotes · 30 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Almost all the Christian guys I know who got married come back after a year or two, exhausted, and tell me marriage is such a challenge forcing them to grow outside themselves.

Indeed - I mentioned this in 108, where after 6 months to 2 years the honeymoon phase dies and reality sets in. Guys often think, "Oh no! What did I do? I got married on fleeting emotions and sexual desire only to find out that both of those are mostly gone now!"

For women, the reaction is more: "Oh no! I married this guy because I wanted a husband, now I'm discovering I don't actually like him, I just liked the idea of having a husband, and he's not living up to my ideology!"

If you really want a wife (or if 'wife' is your code word for 'sex')

This is important too. I've found a consistent pattern: Most women don't care about their husbands; they care about the idea of having a husband. What you've identified here is the male version: Most men don't actually care about their wives, they care about having sex with someone.

Now, this is an overly broad, sweeping generalization. But I've also found it to be true on a grand scale. Take sex out of the equation and most men stop feeling all those emotional flutters for the girl. And for women, when marriage doesn't turn out to be what she expected, it's that the man isn't being a good husband - not that her expectations were wrong. Result? She feels like she has to change her husband (usually through nagging) to get him back to her ideal of what a husband should be - again, she's more interested in the ideology than the man himself.

The only caveat I'll make to your comment is that marriage legitimately isn't for everyone. Both Jesus and Paul have said that if a person is capable of remaining single, they should - and that this is the better option. Paul even clarifies that it's not just general burning lust that should prompt a guy to marry - it's when a guy and girl have burning passion for one another that they should marry. If the "burning passion" is unilateral, Paul's recommendation is still against marriage. Or to put it another way, the point of marriage is if you're so tempted with one specific person that you can't hold back and failing to get married would result in sexual sin with that person.

I need some encouragement about remaining sexually pure.

1 upvotes · 30 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

You don't want your body to bond with a irresponsible moron.

1 and 2 Corinthians 6 truth right there! More to /u/thoughtproject - those passages literally say that having sex with a non-Christian is like you (being united with Christ) are trying to force God to unite with a demon (the non-Christian being united with "Belial," per the assumption of 2 Cor. 6). It comes off as crude imagery - but it's also a spiritual reality.

You don't want to ...

Excellent string here. As I often tell people, certain sins are like doing meth. I know it must feel amazing. But I'm also not sitting at the edge of my seat wondering all the time how great it must be to do meth - because I see all the negative consequences that come with it and my immediate reaction is: "No thanks. Not for me." I'm content in that.

A legitimate temptation toward a particular type of sin (and sexual sin is no exception) is usually tied to an inability to perceive and/or internalize the negative consequences of that sin. We assume it's just a "God said so" kind of thing. With premarital sex, our hamsters rationalize the harm away: "That made sense in Bible-times when contraception wasn't available today and STDs weren't the same and there were no treatments; but virtually all of the negative consequences of premarital sex are gone now, so the only thing holding me back is 'God said so.'"

Now, you pointed out some of the more crucial negative consequences that go into interpersonal relationships and the impact on one's life beyond just pregnancy and STDs (i.e. emotional, legal, relational entanglement). But there are a list of spiritual ramifications that could be brought up as well - ones that are even more daunting if understood appropriately.

How do you guys handle living with a wife/teenager?

1 upvotes · 30 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

was this Rambo?

Rambo is usually doing the right thing before you're ready or doing the right things in the wrong way or all at once, out of turn. Getting butthurt is not "Rambo" - it's just butthurt.

Was it a healthy boundary?

You decide your own boundaries. Just know that boundaries work either to push people away or to keep people in. Figure out which kind you're trying to set and whether or not your boundary is having the intended effect. If you want her in, but her cold feet out, figure out if there's a way to draw a line that accomplishes both goals (not likely). Otherwise, choose the one that's more important to you and set a clear line.

whiff of commitment

What is this whiff you keep speaking of? Is it that you're living together? Did you threaten to propose to her? Is it just sleepovers? Why do you care that she thinks you're committing in the first place?

Working on the Sidebar

1 upvotes · 27 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'll add it to my list of books to get through :) Thanks!

Advice to a married recovering beta on initiating

1 upvotes · 27 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That height-weight ratio isn't bad, but if your BF% is that high, it means it's all in fat, not muscle. Ideally, you'll want to maintain your weight where it is now (i.e. don't cut your eating), but lift enough that you start gaining muscle and ultimately slim down to a 30-32 waist size. A solid goal might be 190lbs and a 32 waist. If you start gaining weight as a result of lifting, deal with it for a while and do a cut diet once you hit an important lifting mile-marker for you, like being able to bench 250 or squat 300+ or something.

Make this your top priority. I'm sitting at about 15-16% BF, but just started a cut diet, hoping to get down to 12% by Thanksgiving. But I waited to do this until after I could bench over 275 (current max: 285). Why? Because the more you lift, the more calories your body burns while idling, which means (1) you can get away with eating more food, in general; and (2) it's easier to lose weight, so the cut diets go faster. So, get on that lifting.

Around 19yo for me being saved and her shortly after. We were dating for a few years before we were saved. Had some sexual baggage from it.

I'd love to hear more on this story sometime!

[7 basics from 301?] Not too often across the board. Working on changing that as part of the new changes I am making

Other than lifting, this should be your home base for a while. If she's having daily quiet times, regardless of what each of you are getting out of your time in the Word, she's going to assume she's more mature than you because she invests more time in it.

In reality (and I haven't gotten to this post yet), you can't do all 7 basics all the time. They go in cycles. I've had times when I've gone a couple months without a quiet time, but during that time I was spending immense amounts of time in prayer or Scripture memory. Other times I've lacked any meaningful prayer, but my Bible study was through the roof. Other times I've had no time spent studying the Word, but my evangelism efforts were bearing a lot of fruit, so I was investing my time in other people.

So, don't beat yourself up over being weak at a few. What you do need to be mindful of, though, is that you should be proficient in all 7 before trying to develop a healthy rotation - and God should lead the rotation at any given time, rather than our own sinfulness and laziness. So, if I go an entire year without a quiet time and claim it's because I'm doing other stuff ... there's a serious problem there. Likewise, if I go a year without evangelism, but say it's okay because I'm praying, reading and studying all the time ... again, I'm kidding myself and God's not fooled.

Get these basics in order, become extremely proficient, and then live them out - and if your wife is faithful, this will become incredibly alluring to her. Simply put, Christian women are taught to have an emotional craving for God. Although this really ends up being a craving for their perception of God instead of God Himself, the fact remains that if you are presenting yourself as someone like God, she will start to crave you as a middle-man on her way to how to get God and experience God. This is actually biblically ordained that the wife's way to have a relationship with God is ideally meant to be through her husband and not necessarily directly. God relates with her directly when a woman is not married or her husband is a spiritual infant (or not yet born again in the first place), but once you're able to lead her spiritually this is where your relationship will thrive because it will finally be functioning as God intended.

After me being passive so long, it mostly is rebellion in reaction to me taking the reigns from her or making decisions for me instead of covert contracts of me trying to get something from her. All new territory for her.

This is a good sign. She sees the boundaries are changing and wants to know if the new boundaries are for real or just your wishful thinking.

OYS? Non-existent a few weeks ago but now as high as I know how currently

Good. The key here is that you're taking the lead in what needs to get done. My relationship followed this path over a period of years from my extreme beta days to now:

- She created the chore list and assigned me tasks.
- She created the chore list and I picked which tasks I would do.
- She and I just kind of knew our general responsibilities, but she'd tell me when she wanted something done outside the usual pattern. At one point we tried to write all the main stuff down and just assign roles, but this always failed.
- We just kind of did our own thing and she'd get resentful if I wasn't doing the things she thought I should be; she did most of the work.
- We just kind of did our own thing, but both learned to be okay with asking each other for help. We evenly shared the work load. She'd often have to remind me when stuff needed done.
- I started doing my end of the stuff on my own without reminders; she did the same.
- I started doing whatever needed to be done, regardless of whose "job" it was to do it; she filled in the gaps.
- I started doing whatever needed to be done and asked her for help as needed.
- I internalized responsibility for the house and all necessary upkeep and repairs and began delegating to her things that needed to be done and trust her to get done additional things as she has availability; I took responsibility for what wasn't done (either by doing it myself or if I did not have the capacity, delegating it for the next day).

Not that I intended this, but reviewing this path, I see a clear trend in how this was processed over our relationship: She ... she ... she ... we ... we ... I ... I ... I ... I.

It has improved vastly since this post the past few days. Likely in response to some changes I have made. Just hope for it to stay that way but also not putting my full hope there.

Yeah, in the first month of RP it's common to see some immediate changes and assume it's because of your newfound RP-ness. As I commented recently elsewhere, a lot of new MRPers will see some immediate responses and believe that their wives are changing in reaction to their changes. In reality, the wife hasn't changed at all - they're just finally being more assertive to get from her what she was always willing to give in the first place.

My guess is that's where you are. The improvements you've seen are things that she was happy to do already, you just weren't previously engaging with her in a way to get it. If she's out on the proverbial 1,000 foot rope, rather than her just floating at sea doing whatever she wants, you've finally started moving the ship and the rope felt a tug, so she's now moving the same direction as the ship - but is still just as far out there as she ever has been. The key from here is reeling that rope in until she's on board with you and can actually function as your first officer. That's the hard part and is what will take time.

Advice to a married recovering beta on initiating

1 upvotes · 26 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent advice and suggestions. I haven't read all of those yet, but am looking forward to when they're next up on my queue.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepilled to answer)

1 upvotes · 26 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Brigading is when people from one sub invade another sub, causing vote manipulation, spam, trolling, starting arguments, etc. Linking a post from sub 1 onto sub 2 does not constitute brigading of sub 1. Because I didn't see much in the way of vote manipulation and any comments were limited to a nested part of one comment of one thread, it could hardly be called brigading.

We have been brigaded before, but I took care of it fairly swiftly and banned all of the appropriate users.

I don't remove legitimate discussion points, no matter who the source is. So, even if BPP was a girl, it wouldn't make a difference to me as long as the conversation has some merit to it. Usually if a person sees fit to reply, I leave the conversation up anyway because it's beneficial for others to see the reply to the challenge to understand that there is an appropriate basis for maintaining our views in the face of disagreement.

108 - Life-Path of a Relationship

1 upvotes · 24 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed.

Advice to a married recovering beta on initiating

1 upvotes · 24 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

But before that it was a schedule of twice a week only she would decide last minute that something was wrong or any variety of excuses.

Yeah, at one point we had sex two weekends in a row and my wife was set: "Let's just agree to once a week to get started and see how things go." When that next weekend came around, nothing happened. I neglected to initiate and she didn't bring it up. The weekend after that, I did initiate and she turned me down, saying she had a headache and that we should re-schedule. I commented about the "once a week" thing being a commitment that she's fine with ignoring and she threw it back at me, saying it was my fault for not initiating the previous week and that if I had it would only be one missed week, not 2. Then the week after that we had company over, which for her means no sex. Then we were at company's house the weekend after that. At one point in the mix I tried to suggest switching the day from weekends to weekdays because we're out of town or have company over so much on weekends, but she didn't like that idea because of morning obligations the next day and not wanting to be too tired.

All in all, the "let's schedule sex" thing has never worked for me, no matter how many dozens of times I've tried to humor her on that point. She keeps saying it'll work because then she'll know to expect it and get herself in the mood, but it really turned into: I don't have to worry about sex 6 days out of the week, so I only need to come up with an excuse once instead of feeling like I need one ready all the time.

Also, scheduling just kills the fun in it for me. I like the lusty pre-foreplay that gradually builds desire over hours before actually having sex. It adds an element of risk. It feels a bit again like the chase from when we were dating, wondering, "Will she? Won't she? I don't know! Let's find out and see how good I am to close!" When it's scheduled, the end-game is clear and the thrill of the chase is gone. It's just not fun.

To be clear, though ... most of the above was stuff I did/said during beta days. I'm not endorsing my behavior as something other men should mimic - quite the opposite.

She would deliberately lie about things. While it's nothing now she kept me believing she never had an orgasm and being teh BP idiot I was I worked at it ... I just didn't want you to get a big head.

Now that is just cold. Seriously, that's new level garbage. That said, what I hated was when my wife would orgasm, but purely internalize it and give no outward sign of it at all. Watching a woman orgasm is my primary kink, even more important to me than how well I'm being rubbed or what position we're in or whatever. So, it was totally demoralizing when, for over 7 years, she (I think intentionally) avoided giving me any show to enjoy, and I'd be left asking at the end, "Was that it? Did you orgasm?" How pitiful.

Who says that?

A heartless crazy person.

SOMething they call a closet narcissist. I don't know though it's a hard disorder to diagnose to begin with but she has all the traits to be sure.

I see these diagnosed all the time, including in women (though it's less rare than in men). According to the DSM-V she has to show 5 of the following 9 traits to be officially diagnosed as a narcissist:

1. A grandiose logic of self-importance
2. A fixation with fantasies of infinite success, control, brilliance, beauty, or idyllic love
3. A credence that he or she is extraordinary and exceptional and can only be understood by, or should connect with, other extraordinary or important people or institutions
4. A desire for unwarranted admiration
5. A sense of entitlement
6. Interpersonally oppressive behavior
7. No form of empathy
8. Resentment of others or a conviction that others are resentful of him or her [in the absence of factual reality]
9. A display of egotistical and conceited behaviors or attitudes

Virtually every woman meets 4 and 5. Your story demonstrates 6, for sure. I'll let you muse at the other two.

I do find it interesting that secular RP specifically teaches men to adopt:

- 1 - "You're on the awesome train; others can get on or off, but it's their loss if they leave"
- 4 - "You are the prize" - and guys are told to maintain this attitude even if they're noobs and have an objectively low SMV
- 5 - Pretty much everything centers around this in the manosphere; specifically: you're entitled to the sex you want, and if she won't give it to you, you'll get it somewhere else
- 6 - Nuking, negging, treating her like a child, etc.

TRP arguably adds 7 to the list (unless I'm just reading too much from the children with dynamite), making a true TRPer a narcissist by definition. MRP rejects 2, 7, and 8. So, the only things separating MRPs from having narcissistic personality disorder are (a) whether or not they believe only other exceptional people can understand them, or (b) if they come off as egotistical and conceited. RPC compromises 5 (the whole grace/mercy thing), but also specifically rejects 3 (we're to relate and connect with all) and 9 (humility).

Anyway ... that's enough musings. Sorry to hear about your sucky situation. My heart goes out to you.

108 - Life-Path of a Relationship

1 upvotes · 24 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

This makes a lot more sense now. The thing is, though, as with the "AWALT" statements, there's usually a principle of truth behind each of these. It just sounds like the feminist versions of AMALT is much harsher than the RP world means when it says AWALT. I've heard it said several times on MRP, "AWALT isn't mean to be taken literally; it just means all women are capable of acting this way, and don't be surprised if your woman ends up following suit." If that same qualification is added to the statements about men you referenced, I'd probably agree with most of them. Specifically:

Mrs. Smith left his wife and children in poverty for another women.

Men do inherently have polygamous desires. If left unchecked, this is what we'd do every time.

You can never please a man ... never satisfy him

This is true, just as you can never satisfy your hunger indefinitely. You eat one good thing and you're instantly wishing you had room left to try another. Again, this is a desire that is inherent in men that must be intentionally tamed.

use you and toss you aside for the next women. He cannot commit.

Pretty much the same as the first.

Men are controlled by their impulses. They are like children.

We do have impulses that, if left uncontrolled, are quite childish. Many men do act out on these impulses - and if we did not have restraint or higher purposes, we certainly would be controlled by these impulses.

Men are selfish

By default, we are. We must consciously fight against this.

when fatherhood becomes inconvenient he will walk away.

Indeed, without some greater ideology directing our lives, this is what we would do every time. I do find it interesting how secular RP totally rejects developing any commitments to women as an ideal (and I totally understand their viewpoint on that), but even the hard-core ECs will turn around and talk about committing to their children as a goal worth maintaining.

man as aggressor who is prone to violence

Again, these tendencies do exist in all men (though many are psychologically conditioned away from it from a young age).

My point is simply that the AMALT/AWALT statements are based on underriding truths about how each gender's core impulses function and are not to be totally discounted as a myth. What feminists say about men has actual validity and merit, but must be filtered through life context. Similarly, what Vilar says about women has actual validity and merit, but must be filtered through the practical realities of day-to-day life. Theory doesn't exist in a vacuum.

108 - Life-Path of a Relationship

1 upvotes · 24 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

she seems to be angry with women for not being men, IMO.

I got the impression that it was more anger at women for trying to be men - to replace men.

I've heard her type of language used against men. And, I used to buy into it up until about fifteen years or so ago.

Can you explain this? I'm not sure how that fit in the context of what you were saying.

It is really hard to "talk" over forums

Agreed. But I appreciate your efforts anyway :)

It would seem to me that the only way sex could truly be used as a weapon in a marriage was if the rate of premarital sex dropped drastically.

There are two main situations where the rate of premarital sex won't affect the weaponization of sex, though:

- Religious/spiritual compulsion toward faithful monogamy
- A beta mentality boxing someone into an ideology that faithful monogamy is a desirous goal that trumps one's desire for satisfying sex

Because the overwhelming majority of the world falls into one of those two categories, the secular RP mentality that "Sex is like candy now" and you can just go get it whenever you want it is actually the rarity.

108 - Life-Path of a Relationship

1 upvotes · 24 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

What I got out of it was that women generally have an idea in their minds about what their lives should look like and they use sex as one of many currencies to get it. I do get that there are exceptions, and you have demonstrated many times that you very likely are just such an exception. But I also see this close lipped negotiating going on all the time, to a degree I can't ignore, including in much of my own marriage.

I do agree with all you said about the nature of why women get jobs being different today, but that seemed beside the point.

The matter of having comparable education is not to talk shop at home. It's that a more educated person is better able to engage in critical thinking and more stimulating conversation, generally, regardless of the subject.

I hadn't thought about the social class thing. How would you differentiate those more clearly?

112 - Alpha Scripture

1 upvotes · 24 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I don't know that David refused relations with her. It's possible, but I'm inclined toward the view that the statement "she had no children until ..." only makes sense if there's some expectation that she should have. But that's an interesting theory nonetheless! I'll have to think on that some more.

I do agree that there's a lot of laziness, though. Most Christians (or rather, "Christians") would rather let someone else do all the work studying the bible for them, then hear what God told that person rather than what God wants to tell them directly.

Working on the Sidebar

1 upvotes · 23 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Second, you need information on passing Fitness Tests in the sidebar. I don't think there is a Christian source for this but Jesus gave us plenty of examples how he responded to Fitness Tests from the Pharisees and so on.

This one's for you.

Also, although Jesus gave some great examples, I tried to stick to ones in a male-female relationship dynamic, which emphasize things like:

- Withdraw presence/attention
- AA/AM/OI
- Not getting butthurt

108 - Life-Path of a Relationship

1 upvotes · 23 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Well said, indeed.

108 - Life-Path of a Relationship

1 upvotes · 23 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

How did you reach this point?

I made my mission (discipleship) clear and pursued it vigorously as a higher priority than all else in life and showed her that I would never give up no matter how much she had temper tantrums about it. That said, I did this with a soft temper, kind heart, incredible patience, and prolonged prayer. I wasn't trying to beat her over the head with my mission. I was simply living out something that was more important than both of us.

At one point she started to get it. She would whine about some stupid thing - like not getting to go to the movies with our daughter one night. Then she angrily blurted out, "But how can I complain? You're off saving people's souls for all of eternity. It's not fair that your mission trumps everything I want to do in life." It was only within a few months after that when she finally realized that she could work alongside me and have the same eternal impact rather than getting all fussy over missing a movie.

It's as /u/bluepillprofessor says - the vision most women have for life is petty. I suspect it's because as little girls they started planning out their future - to do all the things with their kids someday that their parents were doing with them at that time. Then, when they're older, they're still trying to live out the fantasies they had when they were little girls. That's why it's not "mean" or "being a jerk" to treat your wife like a little girl when she acts out - because most of the time her acting out literally comes from the fact that she wants to fulfill some little girl's fantasy.

Can you explain it more, how do you transition from each having your individual mission to one invested alongside one another?

For a time, my wife and I both had the same mission but were living it side-by-side. We assumed that because it was the same (discipleship) that it must be a joint mission - and we both took turns caring for the kids, doing housework, etc. to enable the other person to carry onward. That went for bust pretty fast - but it was a necessary starting point. Until she personalized my mission for herself, she wouldn't be able to join in on it as my helper.

For the most part, praying for her was the biggest thing - something I was neglectful of doing for years. Once I noticed her heart softening, I started asking her for advice with guys I was discipling. Now, I know that I'm far more skilled at discipleship than her and generally (as a matter of fact, not as an insult or arrogant statement) am more intelligent than she is. She wasn't going to say anything I hadn't already thought of. But I played along and gave her an open ear and implemented the good things in what she said. I didn't mention the fact that I had already thought of those things and planned to implement them - I just did it and when it worked, I would update her, "Hey, good thinking on that. I did just like you described and it really helped." Once she had a handful of successes under her belt in feeling like she had a hand to play, I would up the ante on how difficult the situations were that I'd be bringing to her attention - and eventually she developed the skills to be effective. At that point, she had been so invested in the lives of the men I disciple that she really felt like she was a part of it and started thinking, "I want to disciple someone too" - and now she felt ready for it because she saw what of her suggestions worked with the guys I met with and what didn't (by virtue of the fact that I didn't actually employ those tactics - not that I tried them to prove a point or to let a brother fail due to her bad advice).

Once she started working with other women, she then started asking me for help, realizing that doing it vicariously through me as the real actor in the whole thing wasn't the same as being in the field herself ... and so I became invested in the lives of the women she disciplined. As her skills grew, she actually began having competent, valuable insights to share. It's still fairly lop-sided on the whole, but she does give a fresh perspective and we now value our conversations together on how to further help those we're meeting with.

We're planning on starting another small group soon. The last one I led alone and she just participated. This one we'll co-lead, and it will mostly be made up of people that she knows and will be inviting (the last one was all people that I knew and invited). So, that will help her be more invested and will make it feel more like a team effort because we'll be doing it together under my supervision and guidance.

Working on the Sidebar

1 upvotes · 23 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'll definitely check that out! Thanks for the reference. Good analysis on that passage too. I'll definitely keep looking into this.

Working on the Sidebar

1 upvotes · 23 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Definitely not - another good reason for having removed the book. Again, I had found value in it back in the day, but didn't remember most of what was said and Christian books about sex are pretty darn rare - at least to the degree that they have any value. Good story, though.

Any podcasts similar to this sub?

1 upvotes · 22 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Yes. If you use the main reddit app you go to the sub itself (not your front page), click on the three dots them community info. If you're on the reddit is fun app, go to the sub and press the circle with an i in it.

Failure, not sure why

1 upvotes · 22 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I don't disagree with that hierarchy, but mature believers are also disgusted by sin. Disgust is more powerful than attraction. That's how I see it.

Failure, not sure why

1 upvotes · 22 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Nothing can change that, it's nature

Oh, I wouldn't put that limitation on God. The more accurate way to put it is that there are certain traits that God wants wives to be attracted to because they help maintain his established marital equilibrium, so he won't change those things about what she's attracted to.

But at the same time, disgust overpowers attracting every time. So, if she's attracted to those traits in a non-Christian man, but disgusted at his sin or at a sinful expression of those traits, the attraction will be more than nullified and desire will never have the chance to cultivate in the first place. I've seen this happen repeatedly.

Failure, not sure why

1 upvotes · 22 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That there are circumstances and factors that affect desire and attraction - many of which can be controlled. For example, a woman might not be able to control that she is attracted to muscular men over fat men, but the man can control whether he is muscular or fat. If we deny this then RP ceases to have any value as sexual strategy.

More to the point of my comment in this line: the Holy Spirit can change our hearts, which changes what we desire.

108 - Life-Path of a Relationship

1 upvotes · 22 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'll PM you about the last part and respond to the first bit when I'm not on mobile.

105 - Non-Negotiable Attraction

1 upvotes · 22 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That's all 400 level stuff. I haven't gotten to writing that content yet. I do have 40% of a book written in that particular subject, though, as well as a detailed plan for the 400s ... will probably finish the book commensurate with posting the 400 series.

104 - How to compliment your wife and make her feel sexy

1 upvotes · 22 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Connect the general compliment to a memory. The general compliment should always be true in the first place. Sharing a memory that personalizes the compliment isn't dishonest - you're just stating facts about what you're reminded of. She just likes being reminded that you found her sexy once upon a time - and that she put that feeling fresh in her mind.

From your other comments I gather that your wife, like mine was, has been conditioned by you to be averse to sex with you. It's not just a matter of learning how to turn her on (most of RP), but also a matter of unconditioning the harm you've done. I've found the most success in this by cross referencing present situations with past times when she wasn't as sex-averse - that way she remembers what it used to feel like and can relive/experience that "pre-sex-aversion" state in a present context.

For her this comes off as just a fun memory that makes her feel a little sexier and a bit aroused, but that's okay.

The association must feel natural.

Now, my wife has always been fairly sex-averse, so even this is a little crippled for me and I accept that my sex life may never be 100% perfect/ideal. OI. I'm okay with that. No covert contracts, although I have every reason to believe progress will continue. But there is still value in connecting her to a time before I screwed her up even worse than her parents did.

Failure, not sure why

1 upvotes · 22 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I agree. But it doesn't happen in a vacuum either.

How does this advice change for dating?

1 upvotes · 21 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

completely wiped away every time ...?

Yes, but Matthew 12 also references that it can return if "the house" is found empty - and it's always worse on recurrence at that point. 2 Peter 2:20 is also on point. I usually find that after freedom, serious temptation hits about 1-2 weeks later. If that test is passed it generally remains permanent unless the person falls back in of their own accord (i.e. without external temptation/ pressure from spiritual warfare).

so that she can emotionally pair bond as deeply and tightly as a virgin woman?

Yes, absolutely. But let me be clearer: freedom in the gospel comes first, discipleship is what keeps a person free afterward. Often times these overlap so that discipleship is the catalyst for freedom, but they are still distinct.

interested in delving deeper into effects of things

Me too :) And I know there's stuff that happens beyond what I've personally observed too. I'm only speaking as to my own experience and observation. I don't discount other aspects of what God can do too!

Is it because they aren't F.A.T. enough ...?

Freedom really only requires a receptivity to the gospel, humility, and vulnerability (as opposed to mere transparency). One can get freedom without being FAT, but keeping that freedom indefinitely without those traits will be impossible (or extremely difficult), per Matthew 12 again, so I don't help people find freedom who aren't ready and willing to be discipled. That's dangerous and usually leads to a worse reversion.

Because the discipler isn't good enough?

It just depends on if the discipler has experienced freedom and is equipped to help others prayerfully in the Spirit find it too.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepillied to answer)

1 upvotes · 21 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I am aware, but it's certainly not all - and I was also referencing people in my personal life who I know to be actual women.

How does this advice change for dating?

1 upvotes · 21 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Now these are truly good and fascinating questions! It makes me want to skip ahead to 402. I'm on mobile until Monday, but I'll try my best on this.

50/50 men to women ... sub 10%

The way %ages work assumes an even spread. So, 20% of women + 20% of men = 20% of the whole, not 40%. So you can't say "half are women" to cut 20 down to 10. But because about half of genuine Christians are FAT already, it's still about a 10% number anyway.

spiritual gifting and one being a great discipler

To be clear, discipleship is a skill, not a spiritual gift. Your gifts are the context in which you practice discipleship. Someone gifted at hospitality will invite their disciples to relax in their home. Teachers will orient their time with their disciple around lessons. Those gifted in prophecy may emphasize conviction and vision. But discipleship is a universal skill that everyone can learn and apply no matter their gifting.

both of the aforementioned stipulations

To make sure we're on the same page, I assume were talking about a fully skilled discipler and a very FAT disciple.

consequences of every sin, or negative action ... wiped away?

The gospel is what does the wiping. Assuming the discipler is also trained and skilled with freedom through the gospel in his own life (a distinct thing from discipleship itself), then the negative internal implications will be removed, not the memory or physical consequences - and it is usually one issue at a time, not all at once.

So, if you find freedom in the midst of premarital sex, a girl's hymen will not regrow and she will still remember the act itself, but that past act will no longer have any internalized consequences on her relationship at present or in the future.

I know a couple who had a rocky marriage. The guy was an alcoholic. He had, by general effort, done fairly well avoiding alcohol, but he still felt the internal compulsion. After finding freedom in Christ, that internal compulsion was gone. That same man had also cheated on his wife early in their marriage before they were saved, and she had cheated on him too. This had huge implications on their intimacy. They eventually confessed to each other, hoping it would solve the problem ... it made it far worse, even after significant time and their lives restabilized. After prayerfully applying the gospel in the situation, they both received freedom and now have the best sex of their lives. They remember having cheated - and all their past lovers - but none of it negatively impacts their marriage at all anymore.

I can share the same stories in my life about addictions to video games, porn, food, etc., or about emotional insecurities, or significant past mistakes - single of them having radically altered my personality overnight, like going from extreme introversion as the guy who hid in the corner and thought "that's just how God made me" to realizing the role of sin in causing me to be that way and literally the next day - and everyday since - being an extrovert.

Now, I have heard of miraculous physical transformations too. Last year a couple in our church had a miscarriage - baby pronounced dead in utero by 2 different doctors on 2 different days ... yet God brought the baby back to life (reminds me of David weeping for his child). But these are rare and at God's discretion. The other stuff I've been talking about is universal and available to all. The difference is made clear in 2 Cor. 12 where Paul describes the wonders God has done in and through him - but that God would still not remove his "thorn in the flesh." From this, I take that anyone who claims to have guaranteed powers of healing or miraculous transformation is a phony.

and not working through Scriptural concepts.

I hope that helps clarify.

How does this advice change for dating?

1 upvotes · 21 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Good point. That said, among Christians, God gives us the mission: "Go and make disciples of all nations" (Matthew 28:19). Every Christian man should adopt this as his mission at some point, though I give lots of leniency in letting men fumble around with other missions until they're mature enough to realize this.

Point being: Christian women should know the mission of every Christian man before she marries him - before she even meets him. So, there's never a surprise. The only surprise is if she marries an immature Christian man who never adopts this mission. Then everything you said rings well and true :)

How does this advice change for dating?

1 upvotes · 21 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

This is RP. We can handle harsh. Just make sure it's truth too. That's what this is. Well said.

How does this advice change for dating?

1 upvotes · 21 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

My heart goes out to men who can't seem to find one to work with. They're out there, but are a smaller percentage IMO.

Smaller, certainly. But still very common.

but as you noted in another thread, there's only a small percentage who are truly Christians within the church and even less who are faithful, available and teachable

The percentage of truly Christian is definitely small - again, somewhere just shy of 20%. So, I'll give you that. But I think you misunderstood the second point - it wasn't about F.A.T. people, it was about people who are already mature - who already are living out the great commission through an active lifestyle of evangelism and discipleship - that's the 2.5%.

Things like a very high N count, whether her parents are divorced, childhood/emotional traumas, and many more.

The average discipler cannot address these things, you're right. That said, someone even mildly fluent with Gospel-centered freedom ministry can certainly, through prayer and the help of the Spirit, help someone who is F.A.T. to conquer these issues - sometimes even overnight.

Now, good luck finding many of those people. Myself aside, I've probably only known half a dozen others. But this isn't just a spiritual gifting thing - it's purely a matter of receiving personal freedom from Christ through the Gospel oneself and partnering with the Spirit to repeat that process in someone else. But again, that's where the F.A.T. part comes in - they have to want it and be capable of following through.

Of course, if the n-count issue is a problem for the guy because he has standards (and rightly so, I believe), then that's a different story. You can't undo the past - you can only break its hold on you going forward.

Each of these on their own are correlated to ... and on and on

Among couples who have not found freedom in Christ, absolutely. To be clear, I don't mean general salvation-level freedom. I mean the freedom that comes with spiritual maturity and not mere intellectual/theological understanding even. Someone who walks alongside Christ and lives as he lives.

even finding ones to work with isn't as easy as it may sound

I agree there. Among the 18.65%, I'd wager (and this is not based on actual research) maybe half of them have the F.A.T. qualities. So, about 1 in 10 girls at church can be discipled into marriage-quality. Of course, you can always broaden this pool by finding someone outside the 20% (i.e. someone who thinks she's saved, but really isn't) who is F.A.T. and leverage that both for her salvation and eventual wifedom. This is a much riskier play, but at the end of the day it's really hard to figure out who's actually saved and not until you really get to know them (unless you have context for asking pseudo-invasive questions, like, "Hi, I'm doing a research study"). The ones who are obviously saved are the 3%. but those who are between 3-18.65% are virtually indistinguishable from those who are 18.65%-50%. So, unless you're looking for the pre-made woman, the "raise one up" women are going to come in a much larger pool - and there's no way of knowing which ones are saved and not until you actually spend the effort getting to know them - and by that point you might already have the influence in their lives to lead them to Christ anyway. Of course, I must be abundantly clear here: I DO NOT endorse evangedating.

I should probably also note that the F.A.T. qualities are so important because if you find someone with them you can literally instill any other quality in that person. They will be putty in your hands, if they respect you as a leader. I have proved this with over 25 guys - and I have also shown with 9 guys that if they lack even 1 of these qualities, the effort is doomed to fail. My discipler can cite the exact same pattern, but is probably closer to the triple digits. I also know 2 women who, collectively, have discipled around 30 women and shown the exact same pattern among the female population as well.

I'm not saying this just to contradict you or anything - I'm saying it to get you excited! I have seen more evidence in my own life that discipleship with a F.A.T. person works than the effectiveness of RP.

That said, taking someone without the F.A.T. qualities and trying to instill those in them is ... very difficult, extremely long, and comes with no guarantees.

Now, if a guy has a wife who is F.A.T., he won't need RP to begin with. The problem is that even if a guy married a girl who was F.A.T. at the time, betaness will inevitably kill one of those three:

- Faithful = Not sexually, but in the sense that she's not going to follow through with your instructions because she doesn't believe you're strong enough to enforce your word.
- Available = Because she has better things to do than try to appease a weak husband.
- Teachable = Because someone who can't be secure in his own life can't teach her how to find the security and satisfaction she longs for.

So, to some extent a guy still needs to be RP enough to keep his wife F.A.T. - but RP (and I'm speculating here) cannot make a woman become F.A.T. who is not already - and that's why we say constantly, "Fix the man. The woman may respond or may not; we can't control her, so her response doesn't matter."

That said, I suspect the reason RP works is not because of all the biological imperatives or AWALT stuff (although I don't discount this either); rather, I'd wager a lot of it comes from the fact that you're conditioning her to become F.A.T. again. Once you generate those qualities in a woman you can get her to do anything, if you are skilled (and the same applies for men in a discipleship relationship). But because you can't force someone to acquire these traits (you can only create the conditions where they will be most likely to develop them), the hard reality is that "nexting" does start to make sense at some point.

The good news is that if someone was F.A.T. at one point, you know they can develop those qualities again. But if they've always lacked one of these, then there might be something deeper wrong with their brain chemistry or mental health that will create a much, much deeper long-term problem.

Personally, my wife was F.A.T. at one point while we were dating/early marriage. When I lost my alpha, she lost her teachability. Faithfulness and availability never left, but without being teachable, I hit a wall with her. Through RP I'm starting to gain some of that back. But the older people get, the harder it is to change their ways of thinking ... so it'll be a long process undoing the damage I had done to our relationship. Fortunately, I don't have to wait until the product is finished before the benefits show up - they trickle in gradually over time.

Working on the Sidebar

1 upvotes · 21 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I haven't. Thanks for the reference!

Anyone have experience with NMMNG groups?

1 upvotes · 21 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

Good to know.

How does this advice change for dating?

1 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not gonna argue and justify

Good for you! You are learning ;) Though there is a place for learning by argument. The justifying yourself to others is where the danger is found.

Not sure weather to next or stay

1 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

Not sure what I want to do.

This is your problem right here. You don't have a purpose in life. As a result, you're just aimlessly wandering waiting for a purpose to fall in your lap. When a guy's like that, girls become his default. And when you make girls your default purpose, they become your emotional center. When your girl is your emotional center, your relationship jumps from want to need. When you feel like you need her, that's where you become totally subservient to the feminist imperative.

Now, you're not fully down this path. In fact, you're probably making some nice steps back. But right now you're somewhere between "she's my emotional center" because you're so worked up about whether you should keep her or leave her ... and "I need her" because you're showing clear signs of panic about the whole thing.

Like /u/red-sfpplus said: no ring or kids = demote. I'm not sure why you'd put up with stupid crap like this hoping that women will magically change if you can just hold onto them longer.

The reality is: women do change. But rarely for the better over time. Accept that as a fact (even if it's only a generality) and you'll have a much better perspective on when to continue in a relationship or move on.

How does this advice change for dating?

1 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Check out 108 - the section on the lower-right quadrant, specifically. Also, the 300 series is moving toward individual participation in the mission God gave his church, which must be personalized by all Christians at some point in life.

But I agree with /u/Willos-girl - finding your mission first is crucial. I take it for granted that I've always been pretty clear on that since before I started dating. But this is probably one of the main aspects where most Christian men really struggle the most.

Anyone have experience with NMMNG groups?

1 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

Good point - and well taken.

111 - "As I Say" v. "As I Do" and the Polygamy/Hypergamy Divide

1 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Good point.

Anyone have experience with NMMNG groups?

1 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

Good point. With how I typically lead groups, it's usually more content-driven than therapy. After all, I'm not a mental health professional (yet - will probably be going back to school for that in the next year or two). So, I'd probably have a "spill your guts" session every 5-6 weeks, but most of the time it would be conversations of substantive issues, not just personal life stories.

The life stories would filter in each week, of course, but predominantly in the context of the content. So, per my self-musing reply to /u/BarracudaRP, if I'm on week 4 and we're talking about recognizing fitness tests, I'll have the guys share times they think their wife is testing them and prod them to try to recognize this. But I won't let them just start complaining about an argument they had with their wife or their most recent sexual denial. I'm good at keeping people on-point.

I would also want this to be a limited series - somewhere between 3-6 months. In the comment I referenced, I laid out a potential map for the first 3 months, which could technically be the entire duration of the group. But I know that things come up and when people get seriously sidetracked it adds delays. So, those 12 weeks would probably really end up being more like 16, covering about 4 months.

Anyone have experience with NMMNG groups?

1 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

Per the note in my post, yes. I've asked him about it before, but it was a short conversation and before I had any concrete plans to start something. That's also why I tagged him here.

Failure, not sure why

1 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I think you meant this for me ... randomly stumbled on this when reviewing new comments in this thread.

I have talked to RDW briefly about this, but he's not on much anymore.

For instance with announcing your opposition to divorce or affairs. Why? Was it necessary?

Assuming you're referencing the comment that got me banned on MRP, the reason I said that in my r/deadbedrooms thread was to keep my post from getting deleted by the mods, as some people were calling for it. They have a rule against posting RP content there. Non-RP people truly hate us with a deep and fiery passion. If they smell a whiff of RP, they ignore what's actually being said and just slap a label.

I was trying to demonstrate that although I run an RP sub and the post (in my view) was consistent with RP principles, nothing in that post was unique to RP. I was trying to show that what I posted was not consistent with the (technically false) stereotypes that people have in their minds about the RP communities - stereotypes that I personally reject in my own life. Not sure if that gives more context.

Perhaps one day I'll explain my decision

Please do!

I created so many walls to meeting my goals in life that I needed to start clean

I totally get this. Personally, I believe that the only true fresh starts come from Jesus - when he literally wipes your slate clean. But, there are harder ways to achieve a similar result, just without the eternal benefits ;)

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepilled to answer)

1 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Please address the issue of the minority of women who only need very low level dread

I didn't say "most women want to feel high-level dread" - just some degree of dread. Even my own wife talked about this before my RP days - that she wants to know she got a good catch. But no way in the world would she consciously admit to wanting to be fearful that I might cheat on her. To that end, you're right - this may cause some women to get self-protective and clam up rather than try harder. I've seen this pattern happen repeatedly too. That's why on RPC we have to be careful about how we approach the topic of dread. We can't reject it in its entirety, but we have to be wise with how we're using it. Not every tool is a sledgehammer.

If I am correct this small group of women will experience dread as an issue of trust and it will destabilize her and stunt her emotional, spiritual, and sexual growth.

I wouldn't even call it a "small group of women" - at least not within the church context. It's much larger there. I've seen several examples of men who delved into some of the upper-levels of dread and their wives went totally sexless - they were so mentally scarred thinking about what their husbands might be doing with other women that the lack of trust precluded them from engaging in any intimacy at all. So, I didn't mean to discount these circumstances in anything I said.

IMO they are the ones that crossover into BDSM easily

My wife is one of these women, I'm confident. And as you know from our past conversations, she does tend to have some of these tendencies.

Working on the Sidebar

1 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Cool. I'm a little concerned about endorsing Rollo - not because I disagree with him, but because he speaks from an obviously non-Christian perspective and I'm afraid new believers may have difficulty filtering the truth he shares through a biblical lens. I'll have to ponder that some more. Thanks for the reference on practical female psychology. I'll definitely add it to my reading list for consideration!

Failure, not sure why

1 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Absolutely.

update: how I do approach this throwing up. Legit because I went in and saw it in the toilet.

1 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

Actual victim puke. Interesting.

I see it as I need to stick with my guns and potentially lose her. Or maybe realize some side pussy isn't worth the loss.

You've already screwed yourself here. Think about it - in what circumstance can you take back what you've said and decide to be faithful to her in order to regain her trust without losing frame? We've got some good minds here ... I doubt anyone can come up with a legit way to do this.

Besides, I speak from experience when I say that you don't ever want your girl reassured that you'll never cheat on her. That's just idiotic. (1) Because that's a promise you don't know if you'll actually keep. You might mean it now, but how do you know you'll still be strong on it 2, 5, 10, whatever years down the road? You're still human. As you said, you have "hormones" and all that. (2) Because absolute comfort and security doesn't drop a woman's sexual defenses - it drops her imperative to try to please you. I was actually just talking about this on RPC this morning.

If you want to stick it out with her, pretty much the only thing you can do that will actually work is to pull a George Costanza.

- Boss: Didn't you quit yesterday?
- George: Who? Me? No, why would I do that?
- Boss: Yeah, you insulted me and stormed out.
- George: I have no idea what you're talking about.

Obviously she's going to know better, but if you can just pretend the conversation never happened, that's the only way I can see you staying together while minimizing the impact on your frame. Otherwise, you said you're fine if she leaves. Time to make good.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepillled to answer)

1 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Dang, I had no idea you read so much! I thought I read a lot :p

Failure, not sure why

1 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I have discussed this stuff with BPP quite a bit. I agree that there are countless women in the church who would easily be led astray by an RP guy - but that's because most people in the church aren't spiritually mature. They're still living by the sinful nature and "Christianity" is little more than a name-tag they put on to make them feel like they're headed toward heaven. My heart breaks for when these people will wake up. There was actually a post on this exact topic this morning on r/TrueChristian: here. One of the commenters (here) suggests that less than 20% of church-attenders are actually even saved (4% if you go by all self-identified Christians) and less than 3% are "spiritually mature" (half a percent, if you look at all self-identifiers).

If these statistics are even remotely representative of the whole population, those are tough numbers to abide by. It also means that the "church girl" can probably be pulled away by the RP guy 80-97% of the time. But note my qualifier in my previous comment: "if a Christian girl is even half way living by the Spirit." I'm talking about that 3%. Those are the ones who will be disgusted at the non-Christian RP guy - not because of anything RP-related, but because she has no attraction to someone who is spiritually immature. This is basic hypergamy at work. If she's half-way mature, she's going to be attracted to guys who are more than half-way mature. How else will her husband be able to lead her in her faith? And if she's mature, that's going to be a primary characteristic. It's certainly not the only one - but a significant one nonetheless.

What you find in TRP in general are angry boys

That's why I don't go there anymore. I read when a title sounds interesting, but the comments are mostly worthless.

steadfastly Christian YET so much so that she cannot submit to male leadership even under the best circumstances

This is a maturity issue in her. It certainly is a problem among many Christian women ... and men too, of course.

I might go into that here for others to see and perhaps learn....I many not.

Please do! You have me interested now.

And don't give me that talk about teamwork.

I'm not even sure what talk you're referencing. I thought Jesus once said something about how a kingdom cannot survive with two rulers ... but I can't find it with a quick google search, so maybe I'm crazy. Either way, I agree that someone always has to be in charge.

The thing also to remember about RP before the vilify continues is that, being amoral, it makes no judgement on how a man implements it in his life.

I didn't mean to vilify anything about RP itself, and I fully embrace the amoral aspect of the tools themselves. In fact, I just wrote a post on that a couple nights ago, which is now the top link on our sidebar material - to emphasize that very point. As you say, Christians do have a higher standard in how we use the tools, but I agree that the tool itself is amoral. Romans 14:14 makes that pretty darn clear.

What I do note is that some tools cannot be used in a biblically moral way, absent extreme circumstances. Pornography is a great example. There is nothing inherently sinful about video footage. I mean, if a husband and wife create a sex tape, there's nothing sinful about that. It's what people do with it that becomes sinful. So, if that tape gets uploaded to the internet, in 99.999% of cases it would be sin for anyone who looks at it. In that sense, it's easier to simply say, "Watching porn is sinful," when in reality there are rare exceptions, like the forensic investigator who has to watch a pornographic film because it has clues on a missing person's case or in finding a human trafficking ring.

He approach the other from a position of an equal.

Does this mean that the only masculine displays of bravado that can work must come from police officers or club owners who actually have the authority to stand up to people? Aren't most "defending my wife/family/etc." displays of bravado coming from a position as an equal? The result he describes makes it clear that the other guy backed down by the display of dominance. Does that not demonstrate the authority behind it? I'm confused by this point.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepillled to answer)

1 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Show me a single "scientific" study that even mentions female fitness tests

The response, I'm sure, is, "There aren't any because that's something you all made up. Women don't really do that." Early on, I had that exact same objection when first feeling all this out (i.e. first week). So, I asked my sisters. Both of them affirmed, "Oh yeah, women do this all the time. I love it when my husband tells me no. I often ask him for things not because I want it but because I want to know that he's not just a pushover."

Now, I wouldn't encourage what I did. But when even the women don't deny this (r/redpillwomen, for example), that's quite telling.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepillled to answer)

1 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I get that. It's just interesting when literature is endorsed, but then people are condemned for agreeing with certain aspects of it. The same thing happened when I once tried to reference MMSLP's entire chapter on why it's important to have a balance of beta traits mixed in with the alpha. I get what the objectors were saying now - and I agree. But it's still causing a lot of unnecessary confusion, and a passage like this isn't mere confusion - it's straight objection. And that's fine too. We all pick and choose what we take out of what we read. But it's annoying when you're told, "Read this book," and then when you cite that book for some of your beliefs you're ridiculed with: "Obviously you shouldn't have believed that part of the book," when there's no source telling you which parts to reject and which to keep. Know what I mean?

I don't run into this a ton anymore because I think I have a pretty good grasp about what RP rejects and accepts from each book by now. But I can go through most books on the sidebar and point to things in each of those books that the MRP community (especially the hard cores) would blatantly reject. This tells me that the foundation is less about the sidebar literature and more about the preferences of the endorsed contributors. The sidebar just gets people most of the right information to make the final tweaks easier for the endorsed contributors.

111 - "As I Say" v. "As I Do" and the Polygamy/Hypergamy Divide

1 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

teenaged girls tend to prefer ... teenaged boys

This effect does shrink drastically when people hit 18, though, and they're (1) not going to risk getting a guy jailed for statutory rape, and (2) out in the real world where they have to start thinking about the long-term implications of who they're with on their lives.

If they're going to college, this might delay things for a while because of the sheer inexperience to older men and over-exposure to others of the same age. But once you're out of the education system, that's when we see people really quit the whole "date the same age" thing as a general priority and women really do start looking for older men.

111 - "As I Say" v. "As I Do" and the Polygamy/Hypergamy Divide

1 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I couldn't agree more. Emphasis on the word "generally," though. There are exceptions. It's just impossible to discern the genuine article from the one who's gotten really good at crafting the sob story.

What is going on in the head of Christians that give BP marriage advice?

1 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Well said.

Defining RP for this sub - and understanding the toolbox

1 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I look forward to hearing about it :)

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepilled to answer)

1 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Ah, different person then.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepilled to answer)

1 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

So, why is there an MRP in the first place, then? What distinguishes MRP from TRP?

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepilled to answer)

1 upvotes · 18 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

We've asked them to stay, as a big part of it is the guys fear of divorce

This aspect makes sense.

I still get the impression it ends up being TRP advice, but from what I gather, the hard-core position is that "MRP" doesn't exist anyway - it's all just "RP" and if a person happens to be married, they should live as if they're not. Maybe I'm misunderstanding that, though.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepilled to answer)

1 upvotes · 18 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Three hips and a hoorah for truth here!

Literally only 1 has been divorced after unplugging and that was at the very beginning with a BPD wife.

True, but if he's who I'm thinking of, he hasn't been married since either, and is currently a single guy giving advice on MRP. Not that I have anything against him - I very much enjoy our conversations. But it's TRP advice on MRP, not MRP advice.

Working on the Sidebar

1 upvotes · 18 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Good points on this. Consider it removed. I read the book the week before my wedding, 9+ years ago - and I remember it being very helpful, as someone who had never had sex before. I didn't recall any truly beta stuff when I put it up there, but reading your excerpts, I'm inclined to agree.

Any podcasts similar to this sub?

1 upvotes · 18 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That's not a bad idea. I used to have a youtube video series I posted on Facebook for faith-based issues, including a lot of stuff on dating and marriage. Haven't thought about doing that since joining the manosphere.

Thanks for sharing your podcast too! I know this was a great resource early on. I'll have to add that to the newly updated sidebar.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepilled to answer)

1 upvotes · 17 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, the 12 levels of leadership ... was such a joke that I don't expect any real science to come out of there. That said, I am curious about what the place develops into, and if you or I can have a hand in molding it into something actually mildly productive, I say go for it!

To that end, I planned to cross-post my post on RPC from last night over there as a means of reigning in some of the emotional outburst into an appropriate context of what the whole thing is all about. I just didn't want it to get lost in the flood of posts that popped up yesterday.

Feel free to utilize anything I've said in your post, if it's helpful.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

There has to be a name for this?

Not sure about a name, but it's certainly not a new phenomenon. I was first exposed when reading an article about denominational lifecycles in the church. It goes something like this:

1. Visionary - The process starts with a man with a vision that's deeply true and impactful.
2. Growth - As the man lives his vision, other people flock to it and want to learn, so the vision spreads.
3. Organization - At some point, to keep the vision from being tainted at the fringe edges of that growth (think of playing telephone on a mass scale), leaders must rise up to oversee the growth and expansion of the vision, implementing rules and structure to keep the vision progressing under its original purpose.
4. Institutionalization - Those leaders inevitably always get on a power trip and start caring more about the organization as an institution than they do about the vision itself. The rules become more important than the result. Getting more people in the door becomes a higher priority than staying true to the original purpose.
5. Death and Reincarnation - People get so fed up with the rules, power struggles, bureaucracy, etc. that eventually the institution loses its power over the people. A new man with a vision (whether the same or slightly different) rises up and starts the cycle all over again.

I fear MRP is on the cusp of shifting from organization to institutionalization, if it hasn't fully done so already. If something doesn't change, that will mean death at some point and we'll see the next wave of RPer's will start something else. In fact, I'm pretty sure this is how TRP separated from reddit to birth the RP movement in the first place.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Good question - short answer is no. If I did, we'd be having that conversation too often that it'd just get old or annoying. Shortly after reading some of the comments in that post I had that conversation with my wife and simply said, "You don't want to hear about every woman who gives me a look and I don't want to feel like we have to have some big conversation every time that happens. You're just going to have to trust me." That was the end of it. Of course, the "trust me" line was still a rookie mistake back then. But more recent events having nothing to do with us have shaken that trust anyway. So, props for other people creating dread for me without me having to compromise my own values in the process.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Haha, I totally get the rejection of Christianity - especially coming from a Catholic origin. You do you. This isn't a forum for evangelism of that stuff anyway.

But I do note the similarities in the frustration between religious teaching and dogma and RP teachings and dogma. It'll probably get him banned, but /u/ruizbujc just wrote an interesting piece on point in this comment here - and I couldn't agree more, quite honestly. I think the mods have found a happy comfort-zone with what they've already learned and the notion that someone else other than them could come up with new ideas that are also helpful and useful threatens their security and power, so they have to fight against it. "If it's not within our core, pre-approved dogma, it's anti-RP. No exceptions. Nothing new is allowed."

I'll look forward to reading your post and seeing the replies it gets ;)

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Well, I'm still in the beginning phases of this, but I have noticed that what you did is an effective strategy. In fact, MMSLP even talks about it. Don't reject sexual initiation by your wife (otherwise you're psychologically conditioning her just never to initiate and to see sex as a source of frustration - the very heart behind this post). But if sex is bad, it's perfectly fine to walk away if you're not enjoying it. This affirms your approval of her initiations, but also shows her that she has to start raising the bar to keep you interested.

Like I said, I'm just starting down this road, but I do see some progress already. It's just going to be a long, long haul. I'm okay with that and find enjoyment in the journey. Apparently most everyone else would say I shouldn't enjoy the journey, I should just divorce her and want sex with someone else instead where there is no journey. Screw them.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Level 9 = overcoming tests and LMR.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

What I would like to see is in this post is the change in internal game and frame too

That's a good point - but I already get enough heat for how long I write as-is. Trying to add even more just wouldn't fly. My thought-process, though, is more that things like "internal game and frame" get enough attention here that people should already have that "internal point of origin" and this is more directed toward guys who have a unique situation in their marriages. Remember, I began the post with acknowledging that it isn't for everyone - only a targeted group. So, when people outside that target group complain about the post, screw them.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You have to remember, I was beta as heck when she said that. I didn't know what I know now.

Even if objectively that's not true, it sows doubt in her mind.

This I like, and that makes a lot of sense to me.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

"I want you" is unattractive

SGM seems to say otherwise, as it encourages talking in the bedroom. MMSLP makes the same recommendation as well. The "E" component of the DEVI system really encourages this type of emotional word-play. I do agree that words are not a substitute for action, but they can be a nice supplement in the right context.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Beautiful story. Thanks for sharing!

My problem for most of my marriage was a little different. There has been maybe 5 times in my 9-year marriage where my wife did not cum during sex. I know how to work her body - but I was so beta that I put all my effort into making her happy thinking that she'd return the favor and that return never came. Literally, she'd climax then say, "Okay, now hurry up and get yours done," and there'd be no edging, no experimenting, no trying for multiples. It was just, "I'm done, I don't care about you. Get it over with."

Sadly, like a true "Nice Guy" my solution wasn't to change what I was doing to get what I wanted - it was to try even harder at what I was already doing. So, I experimented with different ways of increasing her pleasure and making her orgasms better and better. It worked ... for her. Squat for me. RP turned that around by introducing me to the concept of "caveman sex" and ignoring her orgasm, which I previously thought was a horrible idea and would never work. Whadda ya know ... it works.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I see what you're saying - but the lack of any suggested "field guide" results in the countless men we see going rambo. They see a general "strategy" and assume they know what that means, but without clear direction they implement it wrong. Then the community beats up on them: "Why did you do it that way? Didn't you know what we mean when we said general things but never explained to you how any of it looks in practice?" This seems counter-productive.

As I often say in other spheres I frequent - I provide templates, not a finished product. Templates are meant to be modified and tweaked, as /u/cistemd suggested would help with a post like this.

this post is 100% in your wife's frame

I can see where this would come off that way - but that's because many men spent most of their marriages inside their wife's frame with hammers, nails, welding tools, and an assortment of wood and metals, bolstering it like crazy. RP's primary strategy is to step out of her frame, bolster your own frame, and then clash your frames against each other repeatedly until one or the other breaks - and hope it's hers. For most women, this works.

When genuine psychological disorders develop, though, no amount of frame-clashing is going to break that. It's impossible because even if she wanted her frame to break, she doesn't know how to. Result = sure path to divorce. RP is simply not designed or effective at curing mental illness. But curing this specific type of mental illness ("targeted sensory defensiveness," which falls under the umbrella of sensory processing disorders) can be addressed within an RP framework. It simply involves deconstructing your wife's frame systematically rather than trying to beat it again and again against your own frame. So, you put up those boards and welded that metal plating on - now it's time to get the hammer and blowtorch to take them off. Once she has a normal frame like everyone else, commence with the frame-clashing the good old fashioned way.

I'm just amazed from past observation as well that MRP tends to deny the existence of psychological disorders affecting female sexuality. Or if they don't deny it, their solution is "Next! Divorce! Start over on easy mode!" rather than figuring out how to win the game on hard mode.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The post isn't about fixing her - it's about undoing the mess that I caused. Early in my relationship, my wife loved my touch. Shortly after marriage that changed and she hated my touch. That wasn't a spontaneous change totally within herself - that was learned behavior that I had caused due to my beta tendencies.

This post is about undoing my own mess - but strategically rather than just plowing ahead with actions that would cause a main event and come off as going rambo. We talk about a 1,000 foot rope for a reason. This is one example of how to reel that rope in gradually rather than giving her whiplash.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I agree that it needs work. But I can only share what's worked for me. I realize that formulas are not universal in relationships and sex.

Let's hear more about how your wife reacted then? I can't imagine you had this all planned out and it all went down perfectly ... Basically I'd like to see more lab notes.

True, I had hovered between levels 1-4 at different times throughout my marriage, testing what worked and what didn't and what caused her to start recoiling again. After a couple years of toying around with those 4 levels and finally figuring out what worked and what didn't and that certain things should be done in proper sequence, that's when I (1) went monk mode for 3 months to do a hard reset on the system so past failures wouldn't affect the new incarnation of the cycle, (2) correctly ordered the 4 levels I had been working on, and then (3) strategically theorized levels 5-10.

My wife's reaction during that "toying around" phase was mixed. I ended up confusing her more than anything. Remember, I wasn't thinking of any of it as a plan - I was just trying different ways of engaging in touching her that would be a positive experience. So, I started with a handsy 10 second kiss and she rejected it and I gave up. Then I would try casual touching and skipping back to the handsy 10 second kiss right away and she'd accept the light touching, but still reject the kiss, often saying so verbally and about how she doesn't like passionate kisses. So I'd keep the light touching and mix separate, then do a no-hands 10-second kiss and she had a more positive response, but still recoiled at that kiss. Over repeated testing like this for 2-ish years I finally figured out that I needed to be intentional about what I was doing and not just trying for the sake of doing whatever I wanted - and I was also overweight during much of this time, which obviously didn't help.

Long story short, after monk-mode and some meditation, that's when I started fitting the pieces together, developed the game-plan for after the first 4 levels, and started losing weight. Level 1 really did take 2 weeks. It helped that for Christmas I bought a calendar-book and on the day I was working through some of this the question of the day pointed me to the fact that she liked laying on the couch with me rubbing her head. So, I started with that and saw quick positive reaction, which opened the door to other light and expected degrees of touching.

Level 2 took 2 weeks predominantly because I didn't want to rush things - the mistake I had made before. Level 3 really took me 1 week before I added peripheral touching, but I probably should have been more cautious. Level 4 was also only 1 week for me, but again, for the sake of others it's safer to be cautious. Level 5 is where I hit the first major bits of backlash (also the first "theory" stage that wasn't based on historical experience) and it confused the heck out of her that I would be overtly sexual at inappropriate times. At first she thought I was initiating and would verbalize that and I'd just respond, "I'm about to leave, do you really think I'm trying to have sex with you right now?" and then finish with a 10-second kiss. Then when I'd get home later, she would initiate that night. I accepted happily, but would initiate without a smile. She initiated 2 times in the week that level 5 went on.

Level 6 was weird. We did have company over once during the 2 weeks this happened, but outside of that I would try to engage a little while out on a walk in an isolated place (but where we could still technically have been caught) or in the mini-hallway to the restrooms at our mall while waiting on our kids to go potty. This may have been a 1-week thing, but I was still working up the courage to initiate actual sex and waiting for a convenient, opportune time when the chances of experiencing LMR or a fitness test were minimal (hadn't discovered RP at that time). Level 7 was probably more nerve-racking for me just because it had been so long since I'd actually initiated sex itself, but for her she was already expecting that initiation. Level 8 was really just filler I added into the post because I realized part-way through writing this that if a guy really is bad at sex, that's going to work against him. This level didn't actually take any time, as I already knew my wife well enough to know what works once the process starts - getting it to start was always the problem. Level 9 was where RP helped the most due to learning how to pass tests and understanding LMR. You could say I'm still in level 9 and never fully graduated to level 10 (I think I even alluded to that in my original post), but it felt weird writing only 9 levels and I've seen enough RP stories to know that level 10 does actually exist - and I've seen small indications of level 10 in my marriage as well (the "hands down her pants ... at a dark theater" thing was a real example).

So, those are my lab notes. Feel free to ask if you want more detail on any particular part.

so I just decided to go monk and shoot for daily cuddle time instead. It's like you're talking about she expected the constant push for sex. So you have to reprogram that. Both her expectations and your own processing of rejection.

Exactly!

I also get the red pill view on this, just go find a woman who doesn't have baggage with you ... TRP will just blow through 10 women to find one that's ready

That just seems like too much of a cop-out to me. It screams, "Not AWALT. RP only works on RP-responsive women. Go find an RP responsive woman if you want RP to work." And if that's the case, then for the non-RP-responsive women, we'd be better off encouraging their men to avoid RP-tactics. Maybe they respond to beta behaviors and we should encourage those men to be more beta, right? See how quickly RP praxeology breaks down when the "Next! Divorce!" prescription is doled out so quickly?

If RP really does work and AW really ALT, then why take the easy way out? After all, what's the point of saying MRP is "hard mode" if we're still just giving the easy "Next! Divorce!" answer? That's the easy answer. It makes me think that the folks over at TRP really aren't truly RP at all - or at least position themselves in such a way that they can't ever prove their RP-ness, whereas the MRPs have the real stories to prove RP works. TRP brags, "My girl wouldn't do this, so I found someone else and it's been great." You haven't proved RP works there, you've only proved that it worked on someone else - and there's no guarantee that RP is what caused it to work with the new girl because maybe the new one is responding to something else unique about you, right? MRP says, "My woman used to hate me, now she can't get enough of me" - and that proves RP works and that the man truly is RP and that RP is what turned things around rather than some other unique factor inherent when changing relationships.

Sometimes I wonder if it would be good if we had more of a wiki type thing where we can develop/edit/workshop and multi-author things.

I would love that. Not sure how that would be feasible, though - or if there'd be enough consensus to make something like that work.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Agreed, and I think I addressed that here.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I agree. Specifically as to the last part, you're right that lifting communicated a lot. But this isn't the first time I've been physically fit in the relationship, and one of those 6 month sexless streaks happened while I was around 10% BF and benching 205 ... When I realized that being in shape wasn't enough to make her want me I gave up on my body and just blamed the problem on her rather than trying to address my other passive beta problems because I didn't know RP back then. I just knew that a tight body alone wasn't enough.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Indeed.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

True, true ... but this sub does say to use your wife as a sparring dummy under the notion that if you can get it to work on her, you're ready for whoever may be next, if you still want to move onto the next at that point.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

at TRP we are very likely to blame the woman at least as much as the man, it takes two to tango

I totally agree. We'd be fools to believe women didn't partially (sometimes even mostly) contribute to the problems. But I think MRP's point, to which I also agree wholeheartedly, is that we can't always fix the woman. So, if a man desires to be with a certain woman - whatever his reason - all he can do is work on himself until that goal becomes attainable, or otherwise give up on the goal. Blaming it on the woman, although often leading to accurate truths, is not necessarily useful. MRP is more about utility than theory, from what I understand. Also, where TRP's focus is exclusively improving one's sex life and nothing else, MRP's focus seems to be more on helping men get what they want out of life with a focus on sexual desires. This is a subtle distinction, but an important one nonetheless. In either regard, I still believe my post is directed at helping men get the sex they want with the woman they want to have that sex with. If someone else wants to come along and tell them to stop wanting sex with her - that he should really want to have sex with someone else, that's legit advice too, as long as each person gets to make up his own mind at the end of the day what he really wants. If he wants his wife, he'd do well to listen to me. If he just wants good sex regardless of who with, he'd probably do better to listen to you and ignore me.

pimp hand approach to relationships (his term, not mine)

Haha, what does that even mean? It has a nice ring to it, I'll admit.

So why the fuck is your wife saying "no" ever?

I think there is some confusion about the timeline of this thread. I started this whole process before discovering RP, but after starting my transformation - and continued the process into RP, which helped me refine some of the later stages and be more intentional about it. At this point, I'm not getting any hard nos, and I'm only getting the soft no about 10-15% of the time. My other post from last week-ish (where I was admittedly hamstering pretty hard) wasn't about her response to my initiation - it was about me wishing she would initiate in stronger ways than she does.

The "saying 'no' ever" thing is probably because she's still out on that 1,000-foot rope and being reigned in. I've been improving for about a year, but only discovered RP in June - so about 4 months ago. /u/BluePillProfessor recommends 1 month for every year of marriage, so I've still got 5 months to go before I can expect that rope to be fully shortened. But in the narrow time-frame that I've been RP-aware, I'm pretty darn impressed at how fast I've seen changes compared to the way other guys talk on here ... so that's a positive. That doesn't mean I won't still need those other 5 months to get things fully in order, though.

Maybe some of this is totally her fault?

Absolutely. And I've droned about that more on RPC than I do here. Why? Because blaming the woman isn't as welcome here (accusations of victim-puking rather than OYS and taking responsibility), but I mod RPC, so I can get away with what I want ;) Her main problem is having been raised in a ridiculously sexually-repressive environment for her entire life. When we've had "the talk" in my pre-RP days she usually refrained: "You have to remember that my parents only ever taught me two things about sex: (1) It's evil before marriage, and (2) It hurts a lot." That was her childhood through early adulthood - and she's quick to note, "Because I was unmarried for 22 years, the 'it's evil' part was the only thing that really applied for most of my life." That's why some of this psychological conditioning and deconditioning is fairly necessary - particularly for other men whose wives were raised in similar bubbles.

maybe she needs a genuine taste of dread but you can't give her that because you have been upfront from day one that divorce is not an option

Heh, a recent situation at our church is helping me out on that. One of the well-known self-righteous church girls who had impressed all the church leadership just came out with some serious, serious garbage. My wife's response was to shift it to me and wonder, "Am I going to find out stuff like this about you sometime soon too?" Maybe. You never know. <Wink, wink>

She knows where I stand on things, but that doesn't mean I have to remind her or reaffirm them all the time. So, if her hamster wants to create dread for me, I'm not going to stop it. Of course, this all just happened within the last 2 days, so let's see how this plays out in the coming weeks.

Unless you are lying about your progress (I do not think you have lied about anything) she should be acting better.

Not lying, and I agree - she should be acting better. As you say, she has her own hangups that affect all this. It's become an entertaining challenge. Amused mastery has made the relationship something of a game that's fun for me rather than the way I used to want to beat my head into a wall - especially now that I'm seeing the game actually can be won.

Maybe it is time for you to put divorce back into your thought processes, even if you just do it as a mental experiment

I have contemplated drafting up legal separation papers and have them ready for when some nasty tests come out ... just to see what she'd do.

Maybe you should start fantasising about plowing hotties, flirt with waitresses, catch and release

I do get IOIs. I typically try to stop conversations just shy of getting the number, although that's happened a couple times as well. But I've only ever found this valuable in developing the abundance mentality, which comes pretty naturally for me anyway. So, I've started to lose interest in that sort of stuff.

Once you get those surges of testosterone, and that legitimate and reasonable desire to have a hottie fuck you because she is overcome with lust and appreciation you will change inside. Your wife will smell it and she will respond.

That happened for about the first 2 months of my RP journey - that urge was there. Somehow I got bored with it. I'll have to revisit that concept, no doubt.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

That he does!

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Great point there too. Sometimes it's hard to remember all the basics once I've moved on to the next idea - hence the need for constantly refreshing. I know I need to do the cut diet at some point ... it's just a matter of when and that's based on the most beneficial time.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

1 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Hmm ... Good point. It was always one of those short term goals in lifting to keep me motivated - get ready for being shirtless all weekend instead of being the embarrassed fat tard. My original goal was actually 275 bench before cutting (see the RPC post I linked to above) and I've passed that ... can't remember when I upped it to 300 or why. It might have had to do with a conversation from a user named chadthundercock or something, but I really can't remember.

More to the point, I hadn't really processed why that trip was a motivator for me other than not wanting to be embarrassed. Now that I'm well past that point, I'll have to think about why I still care. Thanks for the tip!

How would you convince your wife to be a stay at home mother?

1 upvotes · 12 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

OP deleted the account, so I can't reply to him, but when I saw the title question, my brain instantly re-interpreted it as:

- How can I convince my wife to tie me down, steal my clothes, spread my cheeks, and let me submit to divorce rape anytime she wants?

I get that some guys want a wife who doesn't contribute financially to the relationship, but seriously ... if you're begging to get raped, don't complain when it actually happens. A working wife is a woman who doesn't need support. The more she makes, the less she needs. It's literally that easy.

There is only one reason to get married, can you name it?

There are actually three that I know of:

- Tax incentives (which only works if the marriage lasts),
- Giving health insurance benefits to an unemployed person when they're in a bind, and
- Spiritual/religious reasons

Since the first one is a HUGE gamble and the second is really a sham marriage, I'll just go with "spiritual reasons" as the only one. But you have me curious ... what's yours?

I do often tell people:

- Without sex, you're really just roommates; sex defines the marriage
- But it's universally agreed that you can have way better sex outside of marriage, so you better have a darn good reason for getting married beyond fantasies about how great sex-after-marriage is

With this duality in mind, marriage itself makes no sense as a secular institution. I don't know why anyone who isn't a Christian or otherwise religious would buy-in.

102 - Desire and the Curse

1 upvotes · 12 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

How does your church leadership address this?

Right now things aren't bad enough to be considered clear defiance or sin. Again, I've seen a lot of progress, though there's still a long way to go. So, if I described how I have things right now, church leaders would probably say, "You're doing better than most of the rest of us, so what are you complaining about?" But that's because most of the rest of them live in dead bedrooms or sexual frustration but don't have a clue how to get out or what God really intended husbands and wives to be able to experience together.

What if churches instituted a pre-marital program that discussed and outlined male leadership and sexual expectations and have this program be mandatory before all weddings performed? No program completion, no ceremony at the church.

Most churches do this, including the pastor that married us (prior church). He specifically addressed the issue of sexual frequency. My answer was that I'd desire it 1-2 times a day, but would have grace in being realistic about time. Her response was that she thought 3-4 times a week was reasonable. After we were married, it became more like once a week for the first year. Years 2-8 became more like once every month or two with three long stretches of nothing: 7 months, 9 months, and 18 months (during the 18 month streak I had stopped initiating after 12 months). Long story short, 3-4 times a week never happened. In our entire marriage there has been 2 weeks when we hit 3 times and both of those were when we were trying to get pregnant.

So, the premarital counseling did nothing. Reminding her of the premarital counseling was actually more of a setback than a help. For her it's easier to say, "Things have changed" than "I'm at peace with breaking my commitments."

Has any one considered a biblical marriage class for already married couples?

I'm in the process of starting one for men only. There have been seminars done at my church, but they're mostly geared only toward married couples who have special needs children and to address the stresses that puts on the marriage.

During the month of February would be an ideal time

Why's that? Valentines Day? Or because most people do squat during winter? :p

sexual assignments as part of it

Not a bad idea.

This is an area that I think would benefit from female teachers teaching other women.

About a month ago I was talking to my wife about men's conferences at church and how we always end up talking about marriage issues and how to be better husbands and all the issues surrounding that. She was shocked. She said, "I've been a Christian all my life and have gone to women's conferences for as long as I can remember and I've never heard women talk about those things. We never even bring up the concept of marriage or being a godly wife. It's just about dealing with our own lives and issues." I asked, "Have you ever heard a church teaching on how to be a godly wife or how to love your husband?" She said, "Well, it's maybe come up once or twice in Bible studies, but only for one week and then we move on. It's never given much thought or attention. Isn't it weird to talk publicly about your marriage? I don't think women could handle that." I asked, "You mean your sex life?" She said, "That too, but even just your marriage in general."

What I gathered out of that conversation is: (1) Christian women are fairly self-centered, giving little attention to their role in the marriage; (2) Christian women are too embarrassed to seek help from each other when things aren't going well; (3) Christian women assume that every other Christian woman has a great, perfect marriage because nobody talks about marital problems or teaches that they should be doing things they're not.

Even when she has gone to studies specifically directed toward relationship issues, she says they predominantly focus on how to deal internally with the struggles - never on how to externally engage with your spouse in a different way. She's never once (even through Beth Moore or other popular female teacher studies) heard the topic of improving marital sex life come up, and it's extremely rare that even the relational dynamic itself is addressed. She did say that on occasion you'll hear the phrases "respect your husband" or "submit to your husband," but that there is absolutely no explanation or how to on those matters and certainly no application or accountability suggested.

Tossing out some ideas

They're good ideas. But good luck finding a woman with the balls to break the mold and lead something like that ... since women don't have balls and all ;) Seriously, though, even some of the stronger, more empowered women in my church would shy away from that - and usually those are the most denying women anyway. So, the ones who would have the strength to lead the conversation are the same ones who have no business telling other women how to be submissive or run their sex lives. It's a perfect mess from the female vantage point.

That's not to say the male perspective is any better. The advice at men's conferences is 90%: "Do more chores and she'll see what a great guy you are and want to screw you" and 10% "Be a leader, but make sure that whatever her input is you're giving that more weight than your own desires. So, lead, but lead in a way that serves her interests." Result? Men get burned out and end up resenting their wives because they give, give, give, and give and end up never getting their own desires met. This is the life of the church man. I've had 4 conversations in the last week alone with different men where I've found out that this exact pattern is what's going on - and I've seen it countless times before. I call it "fake leadership." You're a figure-head leader, but someone else is really the one calling all the shots; you just have to take responsibility for their decisions both in execution and taking the blame when things go wrong.

102 - Desire and the Curse

1 upvotes · 12 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Not sure what you meant by that. I usually describe myself as a liberal Christian Sorry, I'm confused ... earlier today in the 111 thread you said, "I'm not a Christian and I have given up on it." My only implication in the statement was just that being on a Christian forum implies a baseline presumption that spiritual aspects of life exist.

What I posted about my husband and marriage is the truth

I never doubted it :)

I'm sorry but I don't believe a wife should deny sex. She forfeited her body the very second she said I Do.

You don't have to apologize to me. I agree with you! But that doesn't change the fact that countless women use sex as a manipulative effort in relationships, or otherwise are selfish enough that they don't care about what their spouse wants. Of course, men are this way too, but it's often expressed very, very differently. Due to the biblical circumstances surrounding the curse and the fall, men in marriages, on the whole, tend to be very passive-aggressive, allowing their frustrations and rebellion to fester until it explodes (whether violently or civilly through divorce with no hope of reconciliation, or cheating, etc.). Women are more direct: they just tell you what they want or don't want and expect you to live up to that. For most Christian men, the notion of doing that back to their wives is inconceivable. Literally, they have not conceived of the possibility that they act this way back to their wives, which is ironically what it takes to lead a household.

Long story short, when a woman becomes sexually denying in a marriage, as wrong as that may be (and this is the majority situation), the solution is, as you say: "that marriage works best under male leadership in accordance to Scripture." But men need someone to tell them how to lead. The church isn't going to tell them (at least not any church I've ever attended, except maybe one). RP figured it out on their own apart from the Bible. I figured it out on my own from the Bible about a year before discovering RP (a little less), but it took RP to help pull things together rather than the countless strands that I'd learned, but not yet connected.

If your wife treats you this way when you gain weight, what happens if you have a medical condition that causes weightgain?

In her mind, she would just stop having sex and feel no remorse. It would be my problem to deal with, not hers. Occasionally, for my sake, she might (and I quote) "take care of [my] needs" as quickly as possible just so she can check the "fulfill wifely duties" box off of her list and feel like she's a great spouse for it (this is how things used to be). But she's the type who could go the rest of her life without ever having sex and be happier than if she had to put any effort into having a sex life, even if she enjoyed the sex. In short, I do believe that she greatly enjoys sex, but to her there are a million other things she'd rather spend her time on, and sleep is one of them. The effort it takes to have sex (including overcoming the psychological history she has on the subject) outweighs the benefits.

What happens when you are 60 and she decides her sexual attraction cuts off at 57?

As one of her friends once said, "Isn't there an age where you can just stop having sex? What is that age? Can we look forward to that?" I'm guessing she'd have a similar attitude. Granted, her long-term upbringing notwithstanding, I've also trained her to believe that our sex-life is a source of stress and frustration, as it was pretty horrible for the first 8+ years of our marriage and involved a lot of hurt and pain from denying each other - her denying me because "I just don't feel like it" and me denying her because "If you really feel like you have to, I could be okay with having sex today" is a real boner-killer. Result? 8 years of psychological conditioning that initiating sex = rejection = emotional pain, therefore sex = emotional pain, despite there being physical pleasure. About a year ago I adopted a policy that I'd never reject her again, no matter how horrible the initiation. Hasn't helped yet ...

Sexual denial is an act of abuse, especially in a Christian marriage.

I agree. She sees it as her prerogative to decide what she does and doesn't want to do at any given time, and with my passive, non-existent leadership, I all but enacted that as law in our household. That started changing about a year ago, and I've noticed significant improvements in that time ... but, as you know from much of our previous conversations, there's still a long way to go.

Is she going to stop having sex and deny what was implied in her vows?

To reference an adage: "Women are the gatekeepers of sex, men are the gatekeepers of commitment." In her mind, the marriage vows were only about commitment. They had nothing to do with sex or promises of how much sex there would be or how good it would be. Even so, post-marriage I've reminded her that before I proposed, when I saw that there were potential physical intimacy issues from her upbringing, we had addressed the issue and she promised point blank: "No, it's just that we're not married yet. I have to be reserved because if I let go, we'll end up sinning. But after marriage, I'll be going wild and jumping all over you. I promise. Can you trust me on this?" Like an idiot, I did. Her response a few years ago when I last brought that up: "I thought marriage would change things - make me more free. I was wrong. Oh well. I'm allowed to be wrong."

102 - Desire and the Curse

1 upvotes · 12 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I agree that RP is not a perfect model. More than anything, it can really only account for biological impulses, but fails to address the spiritual truths behind how the world operates. Although you're not a Christian, that's a truth I will hold as self-evident on this forum.

I do agree that there are many examples of people who tend to break the RP mold. The traditional RP response is, "There are always exceptions and outliers. RP is only meant to describe the majority of people under the bell curve." This "outlier" explanation can account for some situations like what you've described, but not all of them. You are right in that some people just have unique tastes and they can go for whatever suits them. The African American community seems to be very interested in big butts - a trait that most middle-class white men don't care for. Some men like petite-chested women, while others large. Some men like the nerdy, casual look and others like the classy, made-up look. RP doesn't demand everyone like the same type of appearance in the opposite gender (which is why RP denies that 10s exist - a person only becomes a 10 by taste). It only says, "Regardless of what you like, here are some principles about how to attract whoever it is you're trying to attract." The woman who prefers an obese man over a physically fit man is truly the outlier. So, RP can only cater toward the majority.

Studies that support its views are valid but other studies casting a shadow on their views are critiqued to death so they can be discounted.

I'm not sure of an organization in the world that doesn't do this ;)

If you look at the majority of people most are average looking. The Brad Pitts and supermodels are the exceptions and not the rule to how attractive most of humanity is. And it really doesn't matter in the scheme of human mating and pair bonding.

I agree as to the average. But in reality, someone like Brad Pitt is only considered good looking because of his celebrity status. Likewise, Angelina really isn't as gorgeous as she's credited for being - it's just because she's a celebrity, so there's social pressure to assume she's desirable. Movies give us social cues to say, "These really high value people are desired by other high-valued people - don't you wish you were high enough value to get them too?" But if they had never become movie stars and you just saw them casually in the bar, you'd think, "Yeah, 8 or 9," but not see them as standing out from the rest of the world.

But in the grand scheme of human mating and pair bonding, I do believe looks play a significant role. The sheer quantity of examples where looks matter is simply overwhelming, and the fact that people tend to pair off in their own SMV range is very telling about this as well.

111 - "As I Say" v. "As I Do" and the Polygamy/Hypergamy Divide

1 upvotes · 12 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

It's an interesting theory, but it only makes sense in modern society where the state actually takes an interest in protecting the underdogs (the liberal agenda). Most other societies throughout history had no problem just letting people die who couldn't support themselves. Throughout most biblical times, the Israelites were one of the few exceptions. There was a 10% tithe to the Levites (i.e. the priests), but another 10% that was expected to be given as alms to the poor, given that there was no form of social security put in place at a governmental level. Apart from a mandate by God, the world throughout most of history has basically said, "Let 'em die."

111 - "As I Say" v. "As I Do" and the Polygamy/Hypergamy Divide

1 upvotes · 12 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

True, true. And I didn't mean God made a mistake. I was implying it may have been intentional.

111 - "As I Say" v. "As I Do" and the Polygamy/Hypergamy Divide

1 upvotes · 11 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That's definitely unique. You're certainly an outlier, if this is true - although the question must be asked if this is all true because you're attracted to him specifically or if it's because of your own independent ability to desire and enjoy sex for its own sake?

I know when I weighed 265 my wife specifically told me, "You're too fat. I'm not attracted to you, so don't expect me to want to have sex with you." This is more consistent with the norm.

Since no one has asked (and even in RP threads the question is often left in limbo for volunteered information rather than requested) ... How is your sex life? Is he physically attracted to you? What's the context? Were you always this way or is it just since you married? How long have you been married? Etc. I'd love to hear your full story.

111 - "As I Say" v. "As I Do" and the Polygamy/Hypergamy Divide

1 upvotes · 11 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I don't believe hypergamy is as prevalent as it seems

I do believe it's a real thing, but there are other factors that influence decision-making processes, so it's not always expressed as actively as the general RP world would have people believe.

I have seen more women "trade down" than up

I get this, but that's usually because a woman sees all the flaws in her husband (lowering her value) while still being enamored by the mental image she has puffed up of the new guy (raising his value), so her perception of the actual situation is skewed ... until a few years into the second marriage when she realizes the "new guy" has lots of flaws as well.

No one really knows what goes on behind the scenes of a marriage. All we have are second-hand accounts, some accurate and others slanted.

Totally agreed here.

Most of my friends from back in the day were never after Chad and are currently long-term married to men most would consider beta. In fact, I believe most people stay within their social class when entering into marriage.

I'm not sure how you're connecting these two statements?

Also, I get the impression that women stay with beta guys because at some point they choose between sexual attraction and life comfort. Within the church, I can say confidently that the overwhelming majority of beta men do not have sexually healthy marriages. I'd limit this to my own observations of the church, but the fact that MRP exists tells me that this extends to the secular realm as well. See 102, the "Man v. Stuff" section for more info here.

Most of the women I know are committed to their marriages and have been through thick and thin with their spouses. Most of the men I know are upright and honest and keep their vows.

Remember that RP is not just a general relationship dynamic, but one specifically focused on sexual strategy and attraction issues. So, I don't deny that these marriages exist, but you've mentioned nothing of the raw sexual passion that these couples are experiencing for one another. In the church realm, I know that passion is conspicuously absent. They eventually give up on sex, exchanging it for some other ideology, claiming a nobler purpose as their driving force in remaining committed. So, while RP acknowledges that these relationships exist, it doesn't care about how long the relationship lasts, but whether the couples are sexually satisfied in these relationships. The answer is usually a resounding no, unless the couple has just given up on sex and chosen to remove its absence as a source of dissatisfaction (i.e. making themselves numb to the issue).

But truthfully, how many good guys and girls have been passed over because they were not worldly enough? Or didn't score a high enough SMV?

That depends on what you mean by "good." I've known guys who are truly wonderful people internally, but are 350lb slobs with mustard stains on their shirts who complain about how girls only care about looks. I've also known obese women who shrill at any man who makes any expectations of her complain, "Where have all the good men gone?" As you noted: "most people stay within their social class when entering into marriage." So, high value men will find high value woman, and the low value will find the low value. Accordingly, if someone "didn't score a high enough SMV," it makes sense that they're going to be passed over by others of higher SMV. Remember, RP is descriptive of how the world works. It makes no claim on how the world should be, it only says how it is.

So now the person dates and marries his/her 8 or 9 and totally ignores the good person or good Christian (since this is a RPC thread) and the marriage blows up. So who's fault is it really when you chose flash over substance?

In the Christian realm, RMV is equally as important as SMV - or possibly even more so. This probably deserves a post of its own soon. Because male-branch RP is focused on the sexual aspects, SMV gets talked about a lot more. But look at the female-branches and you'll see more conversations about RMV, as that whole "relational commitment" thing is a higher priority for the RP woman. Simply put, this sub doesn't have enough women to sustain those conversations as a dominant force - but that doesn't mean they shouldn't be happening. That said, although RMV is highly important to how Christians should vet potential spouses, the lower divorce rates among genuine, active Christians demonstrates that they're already doing a fairly decent job at the RMV evaluation anyway - it's the SMV issue that's holding them back and causing the dissatisfaction.

And, maybe when it comes to marriage it should be acknowledged that both sexes are lacking what it takes for the gold standard of lifetime monogamy.

Secular RP would deny that this is a gold standard in the first place. Even from a Christian vantage point, Jesus and Paul would suggest that permanent, voluntary celibacy is actually the gold standard and that marriage is a sub-par aim. That said, for those who do get married, the Bible is clear that lifetime monogamy is not only the gold standard: it's the only standard.

But this is the Internet and no one gets on a forum to talk about how great things are. All you hear are the bad stories. So everyone walks away a little more jaded than they entered.

Completely agreed! Even when the good stories are shared, I fear they are often exaggerated to impress a community of men who get off on hearing about how great things could be. They'll talk about their one amazing night, but neglect to mention the other several weeks before and after where nothing like that happened. If I talked about all my great moments, I'm sure I could make my sex-life sound uncannily impressive as well. Or if I only talked about the horrors, I'm sure I could justify my negative feelings to a community that desperately wants to feel validated in its common pain.

111 - "As I Say" v. "As I Do" and the Polygamy/Hypergamy Divide

1 upvotes · 11 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

If a woman successfully 'swings' to a higher-ranking male, it's probable her children will continue to be provided for within the family circle, either by her new or former partner.

Looking at it from a purely female-centric perspective, this makes sense. But look at all the stats on children who don't have an active relationship with their father. It's overwhelming how detrimental this is to children. Most women prefer to avoid remarriage so they can continue collecting alimony, and only remarry after the alimony duration ends. In the meantime, they're still getting financially supported by the new guy as well - but the court's can't take this into consideration because "cohabitation" laws have a standard that is incredibly hard to meet (/u/Whitified and /u/BluepillProfessor - this is one set of laws that I will absolutely affirm is 100% screwed up). So, you have a woman who's supported by two different men simultaneously, oftentimes with her own income as well, whereas the birth father simply cannot provide what her 3-incomes can, which affects the relationship, which has a negative impact on the children.

So, yes, in a technical sense, the base needs of the child are being met, but psychological needs are being crippled by the way support functions in these branch-swinging scenarios. Society hasn't picked up on the psychological implications of this yet, although some recent publications are getting more attention.

Allowing men multiple wives (or allowing them to be serially monogamous) is more risky. It is more likely to create 'orphans' and 'widows' (either literally or figuratively) who then become a burden upon the community.

One would think, but (as much as I disagree with everything about them) Mormonism paints a different picture of the viability of polygamy. I'm not endorsing polygamy as something society should permit. Again, as I think I noted in my post, my solution is not to relax marriage standards to meet the male's biological imperative either - which is equally as sinful as branch swinging. Rather, it's to restore the heightened commitment between marital partners that existed in the days of old, like 1867 when there was only a 3% divorce rate. By 1900 it had only risen to 7%.

If society's true aim is the benefit of the children, as you suggest, then the solution is to incentivise people to try to work through marital problems rather than incentivise them to abandon marriages and leave children as the product of broken homes.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 11 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

You may be right. My perspective is limited to my own state, although statistically my state is one of the worst with regard to support allocation numbers (we're one of the few who will actually do a 50/50 split of marital income for alimony purposes).

That said, the swing-back started around 2005, which is about that 10 year mark you were talking about.

- 5,000 BC - 1969 => marriage laws predominantly favored the man
- 1969 - 2005 => marriage laws predominantly favored the woman
- 2005 - present => marriage laws have become more impartial and the primary discrepancies now exist from judicial discretion rather than the actual laws and statutes

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 11 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

You know, or should know, that the State FIERCELY pursues men and puts them in jail for being late on support while the State does NOT pursue women and almost NO woman is EVER put in jail for nonpayment.

That depends on the state. I've certainly had women incarcerated for this. Also, my own father is something like $120,000 behind on support payments from when my parents divorced and he has never gone to jail for this. In reality, the direction of "women get 90% of awards" is predominantly because men generally earn more than women. If men want to have the advantage in the economic arena, there's a price that comes with that. I'm not saying it's right, but from a secular worldview I can't say it's wrong either.

You know this is true and you know that women are almost never denied licenses under the exact same circumstances.

I will readily acknowledge that it is rarer to see women given such harsh treatment under identical circumstances, though it does happen. That said, in my county it's pretty rare for anyone to get to the point of license suspension, much less jail, in the first place. You have to have at least 3 contempts issued against you before they'll even consider suspending your license, and by that point, if a person is really that defiant, I really can't blame the system for escalating measures, although, as you note, it's obviously counter-productive. It's like the parable of the unmerciful servant, where the guy is put in jail until he pays back every penny. Knowing he can't earn any money while in prison, it'll never happen, so he's stuck forever. Jesus is literally describing the guy going to hell, and our legal system puts people in the same conundrum. That said, I've used the fear of jail as a powerful motivator to get both men and women to pay support, so I guess there's some value to it.

Also, I should note that the questions you quoted were not to say that "unfairness" and "sexism" doesn't exist in these things - I was simply asking him to point out with specificity where the law itself is to blame, as opposed to general allegations. I can't have a conversation on generalities based on a few anecdotes when the specifics don't line up. Anecdotes tend to be outliers, not the norm.

Are you even serious with this question or are you just trying to play Devil's Advocate?

See above. I agree that the bias exists - but it's not a bias from the statutes themselves (or case law ... or if it is from those, that's a nominal part of the problem), it's a bias from beta guy judges who are given too much discretion.

NO Red Pill guy who understands what is happening in this culture thinks that marriage is a good idea. The BEST a man with RP knowledge can say about marriage is...well, it can work. If you hold frame for the rest of your life.

Haha, I daresay even Jesus and Paul agree - as do I. I do like to give Whitified a hard time (it makes for stimulating conversation). But I do also see a biblical compulsion toward marriage, given that most people cannot remain pure outside of marriage. That's why Jesus notes in Matthew 19:11, "Not everyone can accept this, but the one who can should."

Women control everything else and the law, society, all your friends, the church, and all her friends will ALL gang up on you if you try to step out of line.

True, but also check out the recent post by Red-Throwaway12. I have no doubt the church is condemning her hypergamous "stepping out of line" as well. Although the standard certainly tilts strongly one way, it's not exclusively one-sided.

So no, men who are aware of this are not signing up to be married in droves----and guess what!!!!!! More and more men are finding out every day. We have passed the Overton Window already.

And I'm excited about this! I hope men do see the challenges of staying in a marriage. Especially among Christians, this is what's going to get them re-dedicated to their mission in Christ, whereas the beta, feminized church mentality has idolized female-worship marriage as a goal in and of itself, as if that is the chief purpose of the Christian life - to have a great marriage where the wife is happy so your life is happy. Screw that. Turning the focus away from marriage and toward discipleship is key. Incidentally, doing so will solve the marriage problem.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 11 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, true, true.

304 - Evangelism

1 upvotes · 11 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Too many times people think of making disciples as just being the initial conversion stage with no guidance or follow-up to make sure the new believer is on solid footing to growth.

I call these people spiritual orphans. How do we view people who have a brand new baby, then toss that baby out on the street and say, "There you go, the good people of the world will now raise you." That's disgusting and the baby will probably die or end up with very distorted views of how the world works. When we do this in a spiritual sense, it's disgusting and leads to people's faith dying or otherwise them getting a very distorted view about how the church is meant to operate.

I don't see Christianity remaining the dominant western religion unless the church comes up with a serious mission plan besides getting people to repeat the Sinners Prayer.

That's not pessimism. It's reality. I thought Islam actually already did overtake Christianity as the dominant religion, although that's more due to population growth numbers (Muslims have 3.1 children per woman, Christians have 2.7 and the Christian number is on the decline, Muslims are on the incline, partially due to lower marriage ages than in Christianity).

most churchgoers are in denial about this but time is running out

My pastor actually preaches about this fairly regularly. He tries to use it as a motivational factor for getting people to start spreading their faith, which is a good thing. But when the entire church is absolutely devoid of any actual training on how to get the job done ... the whole thing hits a wall really fast. I've been working toward changing that, but it's very, very tough steering a huge ship as just one man, although I've made more progress than I expected so far, so that's a good thing.

I am also seeing a disturbing trend of dissecting the Bible and various troublesome parts to appease the general masses.

2 Timothy 4:3 - "For the time will come when people will not put up with sound doctrine. Instead, to suit their own desires, they will gather around them a great number of teachers to say what their itching ears want to hear."

Another threat is coming

1 upvotes · 11 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

What's Sivalinga?

Explain to me the problems of Red Pill

1 upvotes · 11 October 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

That would be an over-simplistic view.

I agree.

but let's remember harems and multiple wives were for the wealthy, not the common field hand of the day.

That was my point exactly :)

Explain to me the problems of Red Pill

1 upvotes · 10 October 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

Just say it's no fault since it's in our (male and female) nature to cheat.

My impression is that most flaired people do take this position.

a large portion of people do not cheat. So biological urges can be overcome Absolutely agreed.

does not take into account that polygamy has been tried throughout the centuries and most of the developed world has abandoned it

True, but RP would say that this abandonment is due to the feminist imperative, not evolutionary development.

a party can't claim higher ground when they are engaging in the same behaviors as the offending party

Unless they believe they're genuinely different from the other party. If monkeys could talk, he could rightly say, "I'm allowed to throw my poop at you, but you're a human. You'd better not do that." And then you'd be hit in the head with dung. Or God might say, "I'm God. I'm allowed to judge everyone. But you all, you'd better not do that."

<https://therationalmale.com/2012/09/10/men-in-love/>

I follow. I don't agree with everything Rollo says, obviously. But I do get that the RP view is that men are capable of love and chivalry in a way that's unique to them. I'll have to take a closer look at this one, not sure if it's one I've read or not.

It seems that as people entered some of the focus and intelligent, in-depth discussions became STFU, side bar and lift.

That's part of the reason I haven't been reading and posting in MRP as much. I get the mantra, but it's old hat and not particularly helpful. Then, if I try to give an in-depth response, it just provokes arguments of, "Who are you to write so much? Get off your high horse. You're not as smart as you think" and all that. No good deed goes unpunished :/

And, no I won't post this on RPC because of Whitfield.

Honestly, that guy frustrates me to no end. I understand his viewpoint, I just think it's extremist and ridiculous and offers no practical solutions. It's certainly not aligned with biblical manliness and gender roles. Oh well. Either way, I understand your reluctance.

Explain to me the problems of Red Pill

1 upvotes · 10 October 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

I agree. As noted in my comment, I'm 100% anti-cheating. That said, from a historical perspective, there really are many cultures that held nothing against it. Granted, those cultures are viewed today as barbaric savages. So, if RP wants to endorse that type of behavior, they can't separate that from modern civility. That is, much of how we define a "civilized" society inherently involves concepts that originated from a feminist imperative and gynocentric tendencies. We cannot uproot all incarnations of gynocentrism without having to uproot everything else that defines a civil culture as well, at which point we'd be starting from scratch. Simply put, that's too much work for a culture to deal with and the number of men who actually would care to do the work doesn't cut it to effectuate any real change.

Explain to me the problems of Red Pill

1 upvotes · 10 October 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

This is a conversation probably more ripe to have in RPC than this forum (read as: make a post about that, as long as you can ignore whatever whitified says, as this would really set him off). That said, my own views notwithstanding, here's my understanding of the RP view ...

FIRST - RP says men and women are different, so they believe it's okay to treat each differently. Specifically, they believe that it's in our biology that men are polygamous and women are hypergamous. They recite phrases like, women would rather share an alpha guy than have a beta to themselves. So, in their minds, it's a biological prerogative that men should be okay with cheating and women should be faithful if they are already in a relationship with the highest value man in their life. Therefore, the notion that men can have multiple partners, but women should stick to one is acceptable to them. Obviously I disagree with this, as well as disagreeing with the premise of cheating in the first place.

SECOND - Most RP men include as an add-on to the hypergamy/polygamy biology divide a biological imperative for gene diversification, which means that even women will become polygamous over time. They use this to explain why relationship excitement tends to die down after a year or two post-ceremony. One user in particular (88Will88) gave the example: if a woman manages to pin down and marry Dwayne Johnson (The Rock), she's still likely to get flutters and possibly cheat if isolated with Channing Tatum, regardless of whether or not Channing Tatum's SMV is nominally higher or lower than Dwayne's. The RP point in this (and as I have seen said repeatedly): "Don't fault a woman for cheating; she's just being a woman" and "She's not your woman, it's just your turn." These types of statements are RP's way of saying, "Yes, women are cheaters. AWALT. But accept and deal with it. Don't condemn them for it." I do believe that this type of behavior is inherent in both men and women, although I believe it comes from our sin nature, not a biological imperative for genetic diversification (maybe that's there too, I make no opinion on that).

THIRD - They would argue that, historically, when any society legalized polygamy (which was most), it was virtually always the men with multiple wives and never the women with multiple husbands. From a purely observational standpoint (not interpretive), even the Bible follows this pattern. To that end, "plate spinning" for men makes sense from a historical perspective, but not for women. They key distinction here (which is another place where I disagree with the traditional RP prescriptive view) is that in polygamous cultures, the men were still obligated for the care of their first wives and there were usually fairly heavy restrictions on a man's ability to avoid that obligation (i.e. divorce was not as easy as it is today). It's also worth noting that in most polygamous societies throughout history, it was only the elite who were actually polygamous. The common man couldn't afford two wives and two sets of children. Only the rich could. So, if RP were to take the historical view (as many inconsistently claim to), they would have to: (1) accept that male polygamy is mostly directed at adding-on women, not substituting them, (2) that they would still have to be financially obligated to women when there is no fault of theirs in the termination of the relationship, and (3) that men should be discouraged from engaging in any polygamous acts if they cannot financially support all of their previous sexual partners plus the additional prospect. The conclusion behind all of this is that in modern society polygamy is fairly untenable for everyone but celebrities, who are pretty much polygamous anyway.

- The interesting thing to note here is that RP complains about no-fault divorce laws as being a horrendous evil that gave women all the power by making divorce easier. Yet at the same time, these same men want to have the ability to divorce their wives easier with fewer/no consequences. This is the true contradiction.

FOURTH - When you say, "RP is a praxeology not religion," there is a deep, deep, deep divide in the RP community. Some do believe it is only a praxeology (i.e. descriptive understanding of human behavior). Others believe it is a prescriptive way of life. Still others believe it's some blend. For example, if someone fully swallows the red pill and buys into all of the praxeology, but chooses for his own independent reasons that he wants to be a lazy fat guy with no purpose in life ... they'll say that guy isn't really "RP" because he hasn't bought into the prescriptive elements. They view this similarly as the way we Christians view faith in Jesus. "If you really believe this, it would compel you to live differently. The faith defines it, but the faith is not genuine if there are no actions to prove it." But back to your point: they would more likely argue that RP is amoral (as opposed to immoral). They'd treat it like a hammer. A hammer is not evil, but a bad person can use it to kill people. In that sense, there are no moral loopholes. They make no judgment on whether or not cheating is wrong - they simply show you how to foster attraction. If you direct that attraction toward someone who is married or who isn't your own spouse, they say that's your own business - and they do extend that same courtesy toward women. "AWALT," they say. But they also endorse AMALT, it just doesn't get talked about as often.

FIFTH - When you say, "do as I say but not as I do," you're right that they say this. But they would chalk it up to men and women being different. It's hard to use a non-degrading example because as humans we believe we are the epitome of sentient life. But it's like a man training a dog - he will tell the dog what to do, but not expect the dog to live like a human man. Therefore, "do as I say, not as I do." Or if mankind created artificial intelligence. Androids would be our superior in most ways, yet everyone would agree that androids would be created for a specific purpose and should function within that purpose, not trying to live as humans or become human. Or if there were aliens that landed on earth. We could say, "Do this to be a better alien of your kind," while still living by human standards themselves. These are all examples where "DAISNAID" makes perfect sense. Because RP truly believes men and women are different (and I agree), "DAISNAID" can be applied in many circumstances, although I don't believe to the degree that they attempt to use it.

- To note on this point, from a Christian perspective, God specifically gave Christian men a dual role here, I believe for the purpose of limiting this "DAISNAID" mentality that would inevitably develop. Specifically, whenever a husband tells his wife to live a certain way, the husband must be prepared to live that exact same way with regard to his relationship with Christ as the bride of Christ. If he tells his wife to be submissive, is he submissive toward Christ? If so, the phrase becomes: "Do as I do." If he tells her not to cheat, does he whore himself out to worldly idols? If not, he's better off saying, "Do as I do." If he wants his wife to engage in frequent reproductive acts, is he engaging in spiritual reproduction with Christ through the Spirit? If so, "Do as I do." To this end, husbands must lead their wives by modeling for them what a good bride looks like. We simply do this in a spiritual sense and not in a physical one. In the physical sense, men should be the dominant leaders, but in a spiritual sense, we must fully embrace the role of the submissive with Christ. This is something that the RP community will never understand - and it is also why there can never be any true argument that the dominant/submissive or leader/helper dynamic makes one gender inferior to the other. Indeed, we are spiritually inferior to God, who never plays the submissive (although Jesus modeled even that, but more as a child than as a spouse), but because men and women both have contexts in which we are meant to be submissive in a spiritual sense, at a spiritual level neither one is superior over the other, there is only a role difference. In a physical sense, that is the only arena where one could claim a genuine equality disparity, but even then, as /u/AstuteBlackMan of this thread noted in his reply to me, both men and women are equally necessary for society to function, including beyond mere reproduction.

Explain to me the problems of Red Pill

1 upvotes · 10 October 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

It sounds to me like you're in the same camp I'm in - you agree with the descriptive elements of RP, but disagree with the prescriptive. That is, RP seems to understand correctly how the world operates, and you find value in that - but when it comes to the advice on what people should do with that knowledge, you pave your own way. Sometimes it makes sense, like lifting, dressing better, flirting with your spouse, being a strong leader, etc. Other times it's stuff that can be rejected, like plating, negging, treating women like they're inferior, etc.

Anytime someone comes on this sub asking questions about why they're against RP, it's always the same response: "What does RP give that you can't get anywhere else?" The same question could be asked about any other mentality. There's nothing new under the sun. All we're doing is rearranging old ideas into more useful patterns. To that end, nothing in RP is "new" - but it does pull together useful ideas in a way that cannot be found anywhere else.

To clarify, if you're having trouble with your wife, you might find a marriage counselor who can explain how to develop an "amused mastery" (a common psychological concept by several different names) so that you don't get so worked up over small problems. But that counselor may not be familiar with developing an abundance mentality (another common psychological concept), although the counselor down the street might know about this one. Counselors are also pretty ignorant about things like personal hygiene, fitness, style, etc., so if you don't happen to bump into a life coach or personal trainer, you're not going to figure out how to do those things. Oh, and none of these people are going to understand the more intellectual backdroppings of socio-political movements, gynocentrism, covert matriarchies, etc., so you'd have to stumble across the right books to figure that stuff out.

In reality, there's even more useful information out there that RP hasn't yet discovered either - and some of what they've discovered is bogus. But that doesn't mean you throw the baby out with the bathwater. Take what's good and leave the rest. If being on RP was the only thing that motivated you to get to the gym in the past 5 years, the fact that someone else in the world might have been able to motivate you doesn't change the fact that in the absence of RP you may never have found that person or realized the importance of finding that person. So, "You can get all the good stuff somewhere else" isn't really helpful when "somewhere else" isn't knocking at your door saying, "Here I am! Now you know where to find me!"

To be clear, I'm in the same boat as you. I reject all the derogatory stuff against women. I reject ideas like "treat women like they're nothing more than sex toys" or "if she's not responding to you, just divorce her" and all that other garbage. I started a sub (r/RPChristians) specifically to invite the moralizing component into the conversation - to get the good stuff without the negative prescriptive aspects. MRP (r/marriedredpill) also has a much, much healthier view (although still has some serious problems).

For more information in the "RP" view of gender equality, This Thread was very, very interesting. It's not the "screw women, they're the scum of the earth" attitude that this sub would have you think RP believes. My guess is that most people on this sub are people who were on RP for a little while, saw a bunch of ignorant surface-level comments without getting into the meat of the material, and then decided to boycott it because they couldn't discern between the non-RP-hater-wannabes and the real deal.

Explain to me the problems of Red Pill

1 upvotes · 10 October 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

It sounds to me like you're in the same camp I'm in - you agree with the descriptive elements of RP, but disagree with the prescriptive. That is, RP seems to understand correctly how the world operates, and you find value in that - but when it comes to the advice on what people should do with that knowledge, you pave your own way. Sometimes it makes sense, like lifting, dressing better, flirting with your spouse, being a strong leader, etc. Other times it's stuff that can be rejected, like plating, negging, treating women like they're inferior, etc.

Anytime someone comes on this sub asking questions about why they're against RP, it's always the same response: "What does RP give that you can't get anywhere else?" The same question could be asked about any other mentality. There's nothing new under the sun. All we're doing is rearranging old ideas into more useful patterns. To that end, nothing in RP is "new" - but it does pull together useful ideas in a way that cannot be found anywhere else.

To clarify, if you're having trouble with your wife, you might find a marriage counselor who can explain how to develop an "amused mastery" (a common psychological concept by several different names) so that you don't get so worked up over small problems. But that counselor may not be familiar with developing an abundance mentality (another common psychological concept), although the counselor down the street might know about this one. Counselors are also pretty ignorant about things like personal hygiene, fitness, style, etc., so if you don't happen to bump into a life coach or personal trainer, you're not going to figure out how to do those things. Oh, and none of these people are going to understand the more intellectual backdroppings of socio-political movements, gynocentrism, covert matriarchies, etc., so you'd have to stumble across the right books to figure that stuff out.

In reality, there's even more useful information out there that RP hasn't yet discovered either - and some of what they've discovered is bogus. But that doesn't mean you throw the baby out with the bathwater. Take what's good and leave the rest. If being on RP was the only thing that motivated you to get to the gym in the past 5 years, the fact that someone else in the world might have been able to motivate you doesn't change the fact that in the absence of RP you may never have found that person or realized the importance of finding that person. So, "You can get all the good stuff somewhere else" isn't really helpful when "somewhere else" isn't knocking at your door saying, "Here I am! Now you know where to find me!"

To be clear, I'm in the same boat as you. I reject all the derogatory stuff against women. I reject ideas like "treat women like they're nothing more than sex toys" or "if she's not responding to you, just divorce her" and all that other garbage. I started a sub (r/RPChristians) specifically to invite the moralizing component into the conversation - to get the good stuff without the negative prescriptive aspects. MRP (r/marriedredpill) also has a much, much healthier view (although still has some serious problems).

For more information in the "RP" view of gender equality, This Thread was very, very interesting. It's not the "screw women, they're the scum of the earth" attitude that this sub would have you think RP believes. My guess is that most people on this sub are people who were on RP for a little while, saw a bunch of ignorant surface-level comments without getting into the meat of the material, and then decided to boycott it because they couldn't discern between the non-RP-hater-wannabes and the real deal.

Explain to me the problems of Red Pill

1 upvotes · 10 October 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

It sounds to me like you're in the same camp I'm in - you agree with the descriptive elements of RP, but disagree with the prescriptive. That is, RP seems to understand correctly how the world operates, and you find value in that - but when it comes to the advice on what people should do with that knowledge, you pave your own way. Sometimes it makes sense, like lifting, dressing better, flirting with your spouse, being a strong leader, etc. Other times it's stuff that can be rejected, like plating, negging, treating women like they're inferior, etc.

Anytime someone comes on this sub asking questions about why they're against RP, it's always the same response: "What does RP give that you can't get anywhere else?" The same question could be asked about any other mentality. There's nothing new under the sun. All we're doing is rearranging old ideas into more useful patterns. To that end, nothing in RP is "new" - but it does pull together useful ideas in a way that cannot be found anywhere else.

To clarify, if you're having trouble with your wife, you might find a marriage counselor who can explain how to develop an "amused mastery" (a common psychological concept by several different names) so that you don't get so worked up over small problems. But that counselor may not be familiar with developing an abundance mentality (another common psychological concept), although the counselor down the street might know about this one. Counselors are also pretty ignorant about things like personal hygiene, fitness, style, etc., so if you don't happen to bump into a life coach or personal trainer, you're not going to figure out how to do those things. Oh, and none of these people are going to understand the more intellectual backdroppings of socio-political movements, gynocentrism, covert matriarchies, etc., so you'd have to stumble across the right books to figure that stuff out.

In reality, there's even more useful information out there that RP hasn't yet discovered either - and some of what they've discovered is bogus. But that doesn't mean you throw the baby out with the bathwater. Take what's good and leave the rest. If being on RP was the only thing that motivated you to get to the gym in the past 5 years, the fact that someone else in the world might have been able to motivate you doesn't change the fact that in the absence of RP you may never have found that person or realized the importance of finding that person. So, "You can get all the good stuff somewhere else" isn't really helpful when "somewhere else" isn't knocking at your door saying, "Here I am! Now you know where to find me!"

To be clear, I'm in the same boat as you. I reject all the derogatory stuff against women. I reject ideas like "treat women like they're nothing more than sex toys" or "if she's not responding to you, just divorce her" and all that other garbage. I started a sub (r/RPChristians) specifically to invite the moralizing component into the conversation - to get the good stuff without the negative prescriptive aspects. MRP (r/marriedredpill) also has a much, much healthier view (although still has some serious problems).

For more information in the "RP" view of gender equality, This Thread was very, very interesting. It's not the "screw women, they're the scum of the earth" attitude that this sub would have you think RP believes. My guess is that most people on this sub are people who were on RP for a little while, saw a bunch of ignorant surface-level comments without getting into the meat of the material, and then decided to boycott it because they couldn't discern between the non-RP-hater-wannabes and the real deal.

Sleeping Naked

1 upvotes · 7 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I do that too. And every now and then I'll overhead my wife too ;)

We now have flair!

1 upvotes · 6 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Just changed it to green. See if that's better.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

She wasn't lying - just reporting what the kids told her. I agree the true overhaul isn't likely to happen anytime soon.

Sleeping Naked

1 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

haha

Sleeping Naked

1 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The sexually repressed religious types certainly do. If her mind has been blown, though, she sometimes will lay around for 15 minutes before washing up.

Sleeping Naked

1 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Touche ... totally missed that.

Wife hates that I push intimacy at random times

1 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

Am I still too newbie to do this?

Yes, but (contrary to popular opinion here, I'll give you the benefit of the doubt) I get the impression that although your game needs improvement her saying she's "uncomfortable" is a good sign. It means she's recognizing the changes without you having to tell her, "Hey, did you notice all the things I'm doing differently?"

The fact that she's still denying you, despite these verbal interactions, is a test. You're asking, not telling. You're talking, not doing. She wants to see how bad you want it. Despite what feminism will tell you, wives (specifically, not necessarily women, generally) want you to overcome their LMR. They want to know that they're so freaking desirable that you'll plow through any obstacle because you have to have them right then and there. When she says, "You're making me uncomfortable" and you back down, she's thinking (maybe even subconsciously), "Okay, I can still tame him," and then she gets slightly disappointed that you're not so consumed with lust for her that you screw her on the couch right then and there anyway.

I can't tell if I'm losing my frame, since I'm not sure if my responses are good enough.

They're not, and yes - you're losing frame. You're letting her control when you have sex with her. You're letting her be the judge of whether or not your lines are working - and if they're not working, you give up and walk away.

Notice she hasn't given you a hard no yet. If she does, then stop. But, "You're making me uncomfortable" isn't the same as, "Stop. I'm serious, this is not the time." If you walk away to a soft no, that tells her you can be beaten by soft things. Do you want to be the guy who whimpers at pillows or who can stand toe to toe with a brick wall? Don't be an idiot. Don't punch a brick wall. But make her become a brick before teaching her that you're scared of pillows.

Should I keep this rate of sexual tension/suggestion up?

Once you've started, don't backtrack unless you see it start to cripple the relationship itself. Just don't increase or escalate it until you've got the game, frame, and physique to back it up.

She hates it (at least verbally)

Haha, those are all tests. She wants to feel uncomfortable. Comfortable is boring. Women hate boring. Trust me - I was the most comfortable, boring person you could imagine for a long, long time. There's a whole class of personality disorder dedicated solely to women who take this basic impulse to the extreme: histrionic. These girls will literally stab you with a knife just to start some drama and get you to yell at them - because discomfort and negative emotion are better than comfort and/or no emotion. Now, your wife doesn't strike me as histrionic, but AWALT to some extent. My wife scores insanely low on histrionic scales, but when I come home and say, "I had some office drama today" or "I have a bit of gossip for you," her head turns like a dog smelling the postman. Literally, it's funny to watch her physical reaction to those words. And although she doesn't do it intentionally, she's starting drama all the time over stupid things with other people - just because she needs something uncomfortable to make her feel like she's living her life. Comfort = going through the motions. Stability = boring. Women say they want this, but they really don't. Don't trust her.

Part of me feels like I need to continue to DGAF, and go after what I want when I want it.

I think you mean DNGAF, but I wouldn't escalate any further until you're ready.

Is this something worth addressing?

1 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

This.

The infamous MIL ...

1 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

True, true. I'm convinced.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Which of the above is of the least importance?

If you're the prize, why settle?

Calling men who doesn't wanna lose money through divorce as "that into money" is disingenuous btw.

It's not disingenuous. I've had countless men tell me that minimizing their monetary losses is their highest priority, even over child-related issues. But I agree I was probably over-generalizing.

How "fool-proof" exactly can it be then? In the US?

It depends on what you're trying to accomplish. You can never pre-nup custody or visitation issues or child support. Everything else is fair game. Spousal support is harder to pre-nup away if the attorney isn't competent with how to do it. He'll just put in some clause, "Neither party shall ever have to pay support to the other" or something like that and it's too broad and will be struck down. But on the whole, everything apart from custody and child support can be addressed.

rendering all pre-nups invalid

Dang, that sucks. I accept that this could happen. But again, we can't be living our lives in fear of what might one day occur. Jesus promised the world would spiral down into chaos. Let's accept that and do the best with today.

Don't you think you telling these men to get a legal marriage is dangerous, under these circumstances?

Absolutely. I never tell people, "Just get married. Screw planning for the future. You can worry about that later." I give them information on how to do it correctly to mitigate most of those circumstances. Again, that's literally my job to do that.

more likely to meet legal professionals/etc who disagree with you there. And isn't that what you're looking for? ;)

Nah, I'm not really looking for a debate, but I don't shy away when one finds me. I respond when people ask questions. If a conversation starts, I engage :)

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting, I usually say TRP doesn't count. That place is usually full of wannabes who give garbage advice that sounds alpha but is really, as MRP would call it, "autistic." The mentality there is also one that lends itself to the belief that RP strategy only works on RP receptive women. If the woman isn't receptive, you just next her - divorce or otherwise. Although MRP has this issue too, it at least understands that nexting is only going to get you in the same mess again if you don't fix yourself first - and if you fix yourself you might save the relationship as a byproduct. In that sense, TRP is counterproductive toward creating RP men, whereas MRP only works if that's the aim. Playing the game on easy mode isn't going to toughen anyone up.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

the only way a man can be safe from divorce rape, is if he marries a woman with similar earnings

No, there are other ways too, like a well-crafted prenup. But this is the easiest and most fool-proof one. And if the guy is that into money in the first place, wouldn't he be happier with a money-producing woman than a non-money-producing one?

and that if any couple insists on the wife being a homemaker then the guy will have no choice but to pay all sorts of $$$ under different labels to his ex-wife in the event of divorce

It really depends on a variety of factors. If they get divorced after only 4 or 5 years, he probably won't owe her any alimony. If it's more like 9 or 10 years, he'll pay alimony for a couple years, but still have his whole life if alimony-free earnings ahead of him. If it's 14-15 years, he might pay 5 years of support. It really doesn't get bad until he hits 23+ years, when indefinite support gets put on the table. Most guys can get past 5 years of support and not be financially crippled, especially compared to how she'll be at the end of those 5 years. So, as long as the relationship is 15 years or less, you're fine - and if she's going to divorce you, it usually happens by then. Most of the longer marriages I see dissolving are the ones that are initiated by the men - not necessarily that the men are technically the first ones to file, but because they'll move out, they'll cheat, they'll stop paying to meet basic living needs for their wives, etc.

Women are, indeed, branch swingers. But if you can manage to get her to stop branch swinging for 15 years, the odds of her swinging go way, way, way down.

But my point of this comment is to highlight the fact that when RP and the MRA talk about spousal support as some crippling thing, they're often leaving the duration aspect of it out. I've had people (IRL) complain to me, "The Judge is making me pay $3,000/mo in spousal support! Isn't that ridiculous? I only earn $150,000/yr." I ask for how long. "1 year." Dude, you got of easy.

We now have flair!

1 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Red = Married Man

Purple = Married Woman

Blue = Single Man

Pink = Single Woman

Other than that color coding, you can write in whatever text you want, but preferably an identification of your faith, age, and number of years married. This gives immediate context for responding to people.

If people start lying or abusing self-created flair, I'll have to remove the ability to self-create and just start assigning flair to people.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

What is spiritual marriage?

A biblical oneness bond before God that cannot be broken by any human act, which only terminates upon death of one or the other. Divorce before a human governing court has no impact on God's perception of the spiritual union and does nothing to sever the spiritual union.

Can you link me to resources on reading about that, what states it is valid in, and what the differences are from legal marriage?

It's not a legal concept, which would invoke the laws of the state. It's a spiritual/theological concept that invokes God's laws. As Christians, we're free from the constraints of the law. So, despite the Catholic view that remarriage after divorce is a mortal sin that condemns people to hell, the majority of Protestants who do accept the theological concept of spiritual marriages as distinct from civil marriages agree that if you do get remarried after divorce, it's technically sin - but a sin that can be forgiven. The primary purpose of engaging in such sin is if the sins you would commit by remaining single would outweigh the harm done by remarriage. In such a case, both options are sin, but because the Christian is weak in faith and lacks self-control, he is better off choosing the lesser of the two sins, which is often to remarry. But to do so disqualifies the Christian from serving in positions of leadership because he can no longer meet the "husband of one wife" requirement in 1 Timothy 3:2, given that he is spiritually married to both his ex-wife and his second wife, despite only being governmentally/civily married to the second wife.

If that is a real option I want to look into it more and be more well-grounded in my understanding of it

I think the idea you're looking for is simply to get a pastor to declare you and your girl "married" without ever actually filing anything with the state. If you take advantage of governmental benefits of being married (i.e. file your taxes jointly), then the law will consider your failure to file a marriage certificate as a mistake and still deem you married, or some states may still deem you to be common-law married simply for calling yourselves husband and wife and living together. So, don't think you can ever fully avoid state laws. But by engaging in a spiritual union while ignoring legal, civil marriage is probably your best bet for what you want to accomplish. But good luck finding a woman who is willing to bear the risks associated with that - unless she's the higher-earner, in which case you're the one bearing the risk. What you're essentially telling her when you propose something like this is: "I want to marry you right now, but I also want to be able to divorce you on a whim without any negative consequences if I change my mind about it later" or "I want to have so much power and control over you that if you ever leave me I can leave you destitute with nothing to your name." From a legal perspective, that's what "legally single, spiritually married" translates to for lesser-earning women.

You're better off entering into traditional marriage with a prenup that protects as many of your rights as possible. Just make sure you get a good attorney because 90% of prenups I review for people are garbage and really don't protect any rights at all - attorneys just use a form template and tell their clients it helps when it's only solidifying the rights the state would give each of you anyway.

Sidenote: thank you for explaining things through the eyes of a real attorney - it is providing me more hope for the future and I know that it isn't wise to live in fear of a hypothetical boogeyman that may never come.

In my personal experience, I have only ever had 2 cases where a judge made a really horrendous decision against my client's interests, and both cases were when I was representing the woman and the man won. The only times I have had men who really got screwed by the system were during ex parte or temporary order issues, which were cleared up at the final hearing and my client ended up getting his goals met anyway. This has happened probably 7 or 8 times in the 7 years I've been practicing predominantly in divorce/family/custody law. I will admit, for the 6-9 months that those temporary orders are in place, life truly sucks.

I'll also acknowledge that I've heard several horror stories of anti-men cases from other attorneys, where the guys just seem to get screwed - so I'm not saying this doesn't happen. But I'm more inclined to see this as an attorney issue, not a "the system is out to get men" issue. Why? Because if I can have such a great success rate representing men, it's not the law that's screwed up - it's that these men are hiring garbage attorneys who don't know how to represent their cases. Incidentally, most of the attorneys I hear these horror stories from are attorneys who have a reputation for being sleaze balls. I'd love to share names and websites to show you what I mean, but that would probably get me (1) doxxed and (2) sued for libel and defamation. Simply put: NEVER ever trust an attorney that claims to be a "men's rights advocate."

Also remember that when you read about horror stories, don't warp your mind into thinking that's the norm. Nobody goes online and says, "I had a pretty normal situation. I think everyone in this online community should know exactly how normal situations play out." They only have that attitude about extreme situations, so you only hear the extreme stories.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I haven't read any of his stuff yet, but I believe dalrock's blog is going to be very affirming of your present views. As noted throughout this thread, I suspect dalrock and his contemporaries are exaggerating the seriousness of the problem (not to say the problem doesn't exist at all - it does), but I'll let you decide that for yourself.

If you want a place to live out a male-centric view of marriage, move to a country in the middle-east. If first world comforts are a priority to you more than marriage laws, then weigh your cost-benefit analysis appropriately in deciding where to live.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Like any church-going faithful Christian, mostly affected by the Evangelical and the Pietist movements, you do not have the best interests of other parties as your priority

Heh, I assumed God's imperative was the priority of every genuine Christian.

sell marriage and abstinence before marriage at all costs

Nah, I've made it pretty clear that marriage isn't a goal unto itself. I actually usually advise men to remain single if at all humanly possible. But in my understanding of Scripture, there's no middle ground. There's no getting the benefits of being single without the spiritual commitment that comes with it. You're either moving toward marriage or you're committing to avoid intersex physical relationships altogether. Both Jesus and Paul (and myself) recommend the latter as the better option for those who can handle it. But the reality is that in an oversexualized country, very, very, very, very, very, very few men can handle an asexual lifestyle.

for someone who calls himself RP, you sure have a great way of blaming the fruits of feminism on men

RP is about seeing the world for what it is. It's not about hating on women or trying to reinstate the patriarchy - it's about knowing and understanding the truth and living in light of that truth. To deny the role that men have had in giving the women power is to deny the facts. Go ask anyone on TRP or MRP who is to blame for the FI taking over. As everyone refrains: women will always be women, no sense trying to change that; instead, men need to take responsibility for their own failure to lead. This applies not only in individual relationships, but on a societal level. This is the RP view - not to blame women for taking advantage of men's weaknesses, but to show men how to deal with their failures to take the lead once again.

The laymen just want to know, generally speaking, are the judges biased towards women? Yes or no?

Are cops racist? You can't give a straight "yes" without qualifying your answer and explaining all the circumstances behind it because just saying, "Yes, cops are racist" will inevitably affirm all kinds of false impressions of what that means and how they express their racism or their authority to do so and whether or not there are repercussions or safeguards.

The answer is: yes, on the whole, most cops have a racial bias in how they act, but that this bias does not function the way most people think it does or how the media portrays it. If you just say, "Cops are racist," that statement carries way more baggage than is actually true.

Quoting numbers is an interpretation now?

You didn't just quote them, you use those numbers to create an interpretation of how you think marriage and divorce laws function and then make conclusions about whether or not men should get married.

In fact, I am a FOREIGNER

Haha, yeah, this probably explains a lot of the viewpoint differences.

local law here if u want, and they are blatantly sexist on paper

And to that I would readily cede to your points - you are a greater authority as to your own country's laws than I am, and I know that many countries don't even try to hide the gender bias - some for women and some against. Go live in Jordan or Afghanistan, for example. Men always get custody and women have no property rights beyond the initial dowry paid her prior to the marriage. I had a guy from Jordan actually try to argue in an Ohio court that Ohio had to apply Jordan law because that's where they were married, and therefore, despite his history of drug abuse, domestic violence against both his wife and kids, and despite his wrongful imprisonment of his children (think Harry Potter at the Dursleys, but worse) ... that the court should just bow down to him, give him custody, give him 100% of the property, and only let his wife walk away with the $5,000 in gold coins he paid to her as a dowry to secure the marriage. If you want laws like that and you don't like your own country's laws, go move to Jordan :) There's a cost to living in a first world country. It's one I'm willing to bear - although I won't stop trying to fight to fix it.

I invite you to share your opinions at Dalrock's or ReturnofKings (ROK). Preferably Dalrock's

I very well might take you up on that :)

As for the spiral of depravity in how our countries are handling things - Jesus only promised things would get worse and worse until the end of days. So, it's hardly unexpected. Perhaps I should take less of a fighting stance and "throw in the towel" as well. Who knows. I do know that things aren't perfect. They're not hell on earth, but they aren't perfect either. Paul tells us that God commissioned the church with the ministry of reconciliation of all things to God. In my sphere of influence, that includes the state of divorce laws in my area. For you it might make more sense to throw in the towel because you're not necessarily someone with any influence to change things ... I don't quite have that luxury. So, I have to be exceptionally knowledgeable and diligent in understanding my local legal culture. If I'm going to make a change, I have to know things as they are, not as people are afraid it might be. That's all I got :p

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 4 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Fathers apparently abandon their children until women get 82% of custody?

No, you're missing the part about the data not accounting for shared parenting arrangements, which make up, at a bare minimum, half of all custody decrees. Here's a fun pamphlet that simultaneously shows the fiction behind paternal involvement in children's lives through divorce - and demonstrates that 55% of cases end in shared parenting. 5% end with neither parent getting the kid. 36.5% are when mom gets the kid (10.5% of that are situations where mom was never married, so she has custody by default if dad does not request custody), and the 3.5% where men are granted custody.

When comparing the 36.5% to 3.5% number, it's worth noting that 33% of all children in the US live without their biological fathers (source). So, yes, I do believe that's a pretty darn significant explanation for the difference. You can't fault the system for failing to give fathers rights who never wanted those rights in the first place. There is certainly fault in the system, but it must be seen in its appropriate context and to the appropriate degree. "82% of the time women get custody" is an inaccurate representation of the actual statistics.

"Male Pride" is apparently so strong that men only get awarded alimony 3% of the time?

I said it's the biggest factor. In the absence of that factor, my personal experience is 100% success in getting alimony for lesser-earning men when there is greater than a 60/40 income differential. Other jurisdictions might be different. I can only speak from personal experience on this one.

We're Christians, so apparently we should ignore the fact that 50 percent of marriages in the United States end in divorce, and about 80 percent of the divorces are initiated by women? Because somehow these don't apply to us?

To the general population of people who self-identify as Christians, the numbers are starkly similar. The reason is because something like 85% of people who self-identify as Christian aren't even genuine Christians (reference our past conversations for that number), and something like 65% of regular church attenders (I'm going from memory here). Only about 2.5% of self-identified Christians are actively involved in a lifestyle of evangelism and discipleship. When you compare the divorce rate of that 2.5% to the divorce rate of the rest of the world, yes, I very emphatically say that the general population divorce rates don't apply to that 2.5%.

You admit that judges are indeed biased towards women... but then apparently the younger, newer generation of legal professionals in the US are slightly better. Therefore suddenly all these numbers won't apply to us in the future anymore? So therefore men should marry anyway, cross their fingers and hope for the best legal professionals?

The reason men should marry has nothing to do with the status of the legal system. You're trying to force a connection in two ideas I kept separate. The reason we should be inclined toward marriage is faith-based, not having anything to do with being hopeful about the future status of the law. And although bias does exist, the wiggle-room that bias has for affecting a final decision is sharply decreasing over time. In the old days, when "no fault divorce" was brand new there was no case law to interpret and refine how things were to be handled, so the individual judges had free reign to do whatever they wanted.

Now that the law is honed in by the appellate and individual state supreme courts (as well as the SCOTUS), individual judges have a lot less discretion than they used to, so their biases play a smaller and smaller role. You'll note that I acknowledged that the biases exist, but I also characterized them as only really impacting cases where the decision is on the fence. By saying "You admit that judges are indeed biased towards women" you are taking my statement out of the context in which it was given, most likely in an effort to mislead /u/GrowBear.

Really? "Male Pride"? 3%?

Again, you're looking at one thing without giving all of the context behind it. I'll defer to my past comment.

I don't see how its "propaganda", I see numbers presented for what they are, without any interpretation nor conclusions whatsoever. I sure did not include any.

Every single one of your comments here has been an interpretation and conclusion on how you're viewing these numbers - and you're considering the numbers in a vacuum, assuming that no other factors exist than the boogeyman's statistics that pique your interest.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 4 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

No fault divorce is a thing

Agreed - a horrible thing.

As of 2009, in the US, women are granted custody of the child 82% of the time

That's a pretty ridiculous interpretation of the data. The data only accounted for situations in which sole custody was awarded, not shared parenting. It also doesn't explain the reasons why sole custody was awarded, much of which I would wager is due to the fact that fathers may legally abandon their children, whereas mothers do not have that legal right (they have to jump through adoption hoops to do this). Countless fathers abandon their children, and thus custody defaults to the mother in the absence of a father seeking any rights.

As of 2010, only 3% of all divorce spousal maintenance/alimony recipients the US are men

Again, you have to look at the stats in their appropriate context. First, these states only account for cases when support is actually awarded - it doesn't account for the numerous times the court determines that the husband (or wife) shouldn't have to pay support to the lesser-earning spouse.

Additionally, as noted in the forbes article, only 40% of relationships have women as the primary breadwinner. So, 60% of relationships should naturally result in the man not getting support - and no one can rightly contest that. Of the 40% where women are the primary breadwinner, those stats are based on the woman having 50% or more of the marital income (yes, earning as much as her husband is defined as "primary breadwinner" status). But support doesn't actually kick in until the parties are at a 60/40 income differential (other states use 65/35 or 70/30 or 80/20 - mine is pretty liberal in favor of support recipients) - and I can't find any data on how many families have women who out-earn their husbands to this degree. My guess is that of the 40%, at least half of those cases involve the woman's earnings being within the range that a support award would be inappropriate generally. Of those where support is appropriate and the man has a valid claim, I've found that male pride is usually the primary factor in why it doesn't get awarded. But when I have had situations where the wife earns more than 60% of the marital income and my client is willing to let me pursue support on his behalf - I have a 100% success rate of getting support awarded for the man, regardless of which county I'm in or how hard the wife fights it. Of course, I can't speak for other attorneys or states, but the male pride thing (mentioned in the forbes article) is a significant influencing factor on those statistics.

As of 2016, about 50 percent of marriages in the United States end in divorce, and about 80 percent of the divorces are initiated by women.

That's legit. Hypergamy proven. Doesn't say much about the results of those cases, though. Also, if you scour pewresearch.com you'll note that when couples have a lifestyle that incorporates evangelism and discipleship, the divorce rate drops to something below 5% (can't remember the actual numbers off the top of my head). We're on a Christian forum, so we can't be looking at rote secular numbers - even when accounting for the secular people within the church. We must assume that people here actually take their faith seriously and have an intent to live it out, in which case that 50% divorce rate is nowhere near as scary as it is if you're out in the general world.

In both UK and US, of these divorces, as of 2009 the most common age of the divorces occurred when the women is below 24 years old, followed by age 25-34 years old, followed by age 35-44, and gradually dropping as the woman ages.

Interesting, but not surprising - as a woman's SMV goes down, she's less likely to file for divorce. Is there a similar or different pattern for male-initiated divorces?

The laws don't give you the option of casting blame. "The States of Wisconsin, Oregon, Washington, Nevada, Nebraska, Montana, Missouri, Minnesota, Michigan, Kentucky, Kansas, Iowa, Indiana, Hawaii, Florida, Colorado and California offer no grounds such as adultery, abandonment or cruelty."

True, but the courts don't generally care who's to blame. My state isn't on that list - we do allow adultery, abandonment, and cruelty (even "gross neglect of duty") as grounds for divorce. But the grounds have absolutely zero implications on the outcome of the case - they only exist to let the court know that you're allowed to file. They have about the same role in directing the course of the proceedings as the queen of England has in directing what parliament does. You get a, "That's nice, good of you for expressing yourself ... now we're going to do what we wanted to do regardless of anything you had to say."

The entire RP world believes that judges in the West have a reputation for being biased towards women, something you consider not reliable because no one can quote you law or statute.

Now, you have to read my words carefully here - I didn't say judges weren't biased. Judicial bias absolutely exists. But the laws themselves are relatively impartial today. The biased judges are usually older guys who were practicing attorneys during the days of "women get custody all the time every time." Once the laws changed so that shared parenting, 50/50 time became the default, the new, younger judges are on board and the older ones still struggle with applying these laws against their preconceived notions - and they usually fail. If there's a discretionary issue, they'll fin in favor of the woman because their memories told them that's how it was done for too long. Even among younger judges, there is still a beta mentality that is subservient to women. So, they're more likely to follow the shared parenting, 50/50 default, but if there's a legit close call and that default isn't possible, they'll probably still lean toward the woman. Female judges, on the other hand, are an anomaly - you'd expect them to side with women, but because they themselves are "empowered women," they tend to show contempt for other women who don't empower themselves, so they tend to side with the men more often than not. They're less interested in gender wars than they are in proving their own individual superiority. As a side note: 5 of the 6 domestic judges in my county are women - and this usually bodes well for my male clients, so perhaps my personal observations are skewed by the fact that many other jurisdictions have men who run the show and these men are the ones to blame for the gender bias.

Despite all these, you claim that there is no sexism in the divorce procedures of alimony, child support, and custody

My questions were not meant to lead to this conclusion. They were meant to hone in on where, exactly, the sexism and bias is. Most of your points have nothing to do with the outcomes of the case - they only reference how they're initiated. For the ones that do reference the outcomes, the interpretation of the statistics is dubious, at best. I could take a few statistics out of context, hiding relevant explanatory information, and scare people into believing in some boogeyman too. The way you (and the rest of the manosphere) present the facts looks a lot like these types of memes. All of those facts are technically accurate, but they do absolutely nothing to portray the reality of the situation.

your agenda will still be pro-marriage regardless, even this version

Sure, but why should I fight against God on that topic? To be clear, I'm pro spiritual marriage. If a couple wants to avoid legal marriage in favor of a spiritual one, I'm not against that. For various reasons, it may be unwise for one person or the other, but that's a result I'm at peace with, as long as the couple goes into the relationship with full knowledge of what they're doing and the potential consequences. But given that 99.999% of marriages in the country are civil marriages, I have to talk in the context of the reality set before us, not some unrealistic hypothetical.

I, on the other hand, think the above is absolutely terrifying and will not touch it with a 100 feet pole.

Understandable, if you're reading propaganda-related interpretations of the facts and not the facts as they are. To that end, I wouldn't encourage anyway toward any situation that is likely to lead to divorce. But that doesn't mean marriage as a spiritual institution created by God for his purposes which are higher than our purposes should all of a sudden be abandoned.

More to the point, though - what is so "absolutely terrifying" about women being more likely to initiate divorce? Or the fact that young women are more likely than older women to initiate divorce? Or the fact that you're not allowed to play the blame-game? Or the fact that the RP world believes something? I can see cause for fright in your first 3 points and the last one if one doesn't have all of the information and you're just seeing the "dihydrogen monoxide will kill you!" version of the facts.

let the OP /u/GrowBear see the facts and make up his own mind Facts in their proper context, sure.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 4 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

So what if the law is pro-underdog, or pro-dogs, or pro-whatever? The fact remains that a 97-3 split still means that in a majority of cases, men are worst off after the divorce.

You can't make that blanket statement based on one individual factor. What if he has to pay $10,000/yr in spousal support, but because of his wife's help and support he managed to increase his income during the course of the marriage by $20,000? Even after alimony, he is still better off than he was before.

modern marriage is a joke

I don't deny that. But that doesn't mean it's without a purpose - particularly from a biblical perspective.

Hey if you're happy with with the fact you can get divorced anytime and lose your stuff and pay alimony/support for the rest of your life, something you agree is a possibility, go ahead, no one's stopping you.

Remember: I've oriented my marriage in a way where I wouldn't have to pay alimony/support. Regardless of which judge I end up getting, I'm 99% confident of this conclusion. It's guys who insist that their wives limit their income-earning potential in order to take care of their husbands - those are the men who must eat the fruit of their decisions.

Why don't you lay the facts on the table for people like OP to decide, instead of asking him "Why is X unfair?" or "Why is Y unfair?" That's called gaslighting by the way

Nah, it's called "Negative Inquiry," as defined in WISNIFG. And I have laid out many facts about how the statutes work and how judges interpret the statutes. These are facts.

whether or not its a good or bad deal to enter is his right to decide for himself Agreed, except to the extent that God may intervene and communicate an intent in the matter.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 4 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

It's an interesting concept, but doomed to fail. All it's really doing is forcing people to have a 1 year waiting period before getting divorced instead of 1 month - and the 1 year thing is the most commonly used grounds for divorce under normal circumstances anyway. Although well-intentioned, it doesn't really change things very much.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 4 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not sure what you're asking for on the history of marriage. That's really a book. Long story short, in Eden and for a while thereafter there was no ceremony or certificate or judge. Divorce didn't even exist. You have consensual sex: you're married. Marriage was always a religious institution that didn't exist apart from a belief in the divine. At some point the state decided to step in and religious institutions ceded power to the state because they were both operating on the same (or substantially similar) terms. The state having the power for so long led the way for the state to start deviating from the spiritual aspects of it. Religion by that point had lost the ability to take the power back, so now it's almost exclusively controlled by the state. So, now we have a distinction between civil unions (i.e. secular marriage) and spiritual unions (i.e. spiritual marriage).

As for approaching a father, just be flat out honest. Your goal isn't to trick him into giving you permission. It's to let him make an informed decision about what's best for his daughter. If he's an RP man, he'll respect your viewpoint and approve. If he's a beta BP man, he's probably going to be too weak and passive to say no to his daughter if she wants to marry you, so he'll say yes anyway. So, the only way you really get a no is if he's alpha and you're a weak beta.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 4 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Isn't that simply an argument that marriage is not worth it for BOTH men and women?

Maybe, but it goes against the grain of "the laws are pro-female, anti-man."

No fault divorce + state-enforced alimony/child support + sexism in custody allocation + sexism in asset allocation is what creates the perfect storm that ultimately results in divorce rape.

What is unfair about state-enforced alimony/child support?

Where are you finding sexism in custody allocations?

Where is there sexism in asset allocation?

You're making these claims generally, but I don't think the evidence is there to support your hypothetical fears.

AND WHY DO YOU THINK THAT IS THE CASE????

Liberals.

which law specifically states the Queen of England is merely a figurehead, and that it is the Constitution of the UK that gets to decide on all matters, politics and legal affairs, represented by the PM?

Meh, I don't live in the UK. I'm only speaking as to American law.

Now imagine this figurehead has no power but still has to feed all his subjects. Are you still surprised that no one wants be husbands?

I think it's a huge stretch to say "no one wants to be husbands." There are droves upon droves upon droves of guys who want to be husbands. I'd wager it's 99%. As you've noted before, RP is the 1% - and even among RP, a vast number of guys are still wanting to pursue marriage.

Plus, a husband in a proper marriage is not merely a figurehead. If he doesn't like how his wife is acting, he has the power to divorce her at any point. He only has a risk if she manages to fake it for 20+ years ... at which point, more power to her for managing to keep up a facade for so long without losing her identity in it.

So what if new legal professionals are completely red-pill people? The world is still a feminist one. Lawyers/judges are but pawns of greater forces

Nah, because the lawyers are the ones who become legislators who make the laws and judges who interpret the laws. They are the more powerful forces. Of course, the media has an impact too - but only to the degree that they're able to influence the legislators and judges. So, if the legislators and judges are truly RP, they won't be subservient to media influences. Game over for the FI as to divorce laws.

But for the married man: you will still be married 10 years later. You are effectively heading into a deal that can change anytime this feminist world decides its going to change

This I agree with.

Not legally. You do not possess any more authority than your wife.

Of course.

As long as this is the case, men will continue boycotting marriage

I don't see this boycott in practice. I see a select few RP or MGTOW individuals, but they're the extreme rarity in society - and they're usually the men who wouldn't make good (read: godly) husbands in the first place.

the really controversial part of a Patriarchy: wives and children are the property/subjects

I am not aware of any definition of "patriarchy" that requires that wives and children be treated as such. As a historical matter, there are several patriarchal societies that have exercised a patriarchy this way, but it's not a mandate. You're implying more in the word than any sociologist would.

Or do you wish to relegate that to honorary status as well?

Not sure what you're asking here.

This entire thread is basically you defending Marriage 2.0 the single biggest proof that Patriarchy is dead.

I'm not defending Marriage 2.0 as a good thing. I'm saying it's not as ridiculous as people think it is - particularly not as bad as it was 25+ years ago. Or to put it another way: while I believe it's bad, I will fight against someone who treats it like it's hell on earth - particularly when that perception is based on false information. I will always rely on the facts as they are, not tall tales that people share for sympathy.

So your solution to men potentially losing his assets, is for him to STOP CARING about losing his assets? Wow. And you're an attorney?

No, my solution, as noted in other conversations, is discipleship to start a movement from the bottom up. My "stop caring" line of thought is more a Christian perspective on materialism. If your desire to cling to material things is controlling your life, that's not spiritually healthy.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 3 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I do believe that the families are involved, especially in giving their blessing,

This aspect of marriage has baffled me for quite some time. The "giving their blessing" part is certainly something that was a product of culture and is not a biblical mandate. It was born out of the idea that women were viewed as property. So, a father owned his daughter and if a suitor wanted her, he had to buy her (hence the dowry) and ownership literally changed hands. In a society where women are not property, there is no biblical mandate that this procedure continue, although we maintain the "get the father's blessing" or "daddy walks her down the aisle" stuff as remnants of these past cultural traditions.

That said, when Genesis 2:24 first professes that two people becoming one flesh defines the marriage, it is preceded immediately by: "That is why a man leaves his father and mother and is united to his wife" - implying that there certainly is a familial component to it beyond just rote eloping and having sex.

I do believe the local church should be involved as witnesses in the moment and afterwards to encourage the two of you, support the two of you, and help hold the two of you accountable

These are noble intentions, but not biblically required for the formation of a marriage. That said, remaining part of the fellowship of believers and submitting to one another within that fellowship is a biblical mandate. So, a couple that steals away from the world to be on their own could not be said to be following Christ or living in godliness. Of course, it's not just submissiveness to the body with no return - they submit themselves to your needs as well, allowing for the encouragement and support that you reference. So, although these things are highly beneficial and biblically mandated in a general sense, they aren't a prerequisite to having a biblical marriage before God. I'm not sure if that makes sense.

We now have flair!

1 upvotes · 3 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed - and I thought about that too. But I'm not sure how to pull that off while also having user-editable flair. Specifically, if I assign a cautionary flair, someone would simply be able to remove it at their discretion. Of course, for endorsed people, they wouldn't want to remove that endorsement. Or maybe this is all just based on my ignorance of CSS coding and what's possible and not. I'll have to contemplate this some more either way. Thanks for the suggestion!

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 3 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians men not wanting to be fathers. When that happens, the result is a net loss for society.

Not if you live in China :p

You wouldn't be saying this if we were stil living in patriarchal times

Perhaps, but only because it wouldn't be safe for me to say so - not for lack of desire to express these thoughts. Do you really think that an abusive alcoholic father who regularly sends his kids to the ER should have unsupervised custody rights just because "he's a man and men should get whatever they want"?

Anti-feminism is not the same as "men get everything, women get nothing." From my readings and conversations on MRP, one does not need to be a male extremist to be RP - he only needs to recognize and oppose the feminist imperative - to be his own man independent of societal conditioning. This doesn't mean he has to insist that everyone in his sphere of influence bow down to him for being a man.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 3 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I get that, but under the system he's describing the state would have no basis for saying she can't touch joint funds. Plus, mothers have default custody rights, so if there's no divorce/juvenile court telling the parties how to allocate parenting time, he gets no parenting time and she can do whatever she wants with the kids. These things wouldn't be illegal under the circumstances proposed.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 3 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 2 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I can see why 8.2 would seem troublesome ... but I also believe in the "lesser of two evils" option that many people force themselves into. Basically, there are situations that we, as humans, entangle ourselves in whereby no matter what we do any course of action would be sin. In that scenario, although it is still sin and condemnable as such, a person should pursue the course of action that minimizes the impact of his sin on an eternal scale. This may mean remaining married to a second spouse rather than pursuing reconciliation ... or it could go the other way. It may be situation-specific.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 2 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

If Protestants trust that the canon as assembled is accurate (that is, there's nothing there that shouldn't be and there's nothing missing that should be there) then why do you not accept the authority of the Church who compiled it?

Most Protestants don't have a good answer to this question. But the only real answer is that I trust the canon I have on the authority of the Spirit, who is at work in me. Now, I mentioned in another comment that this is a somewhat loose concept in Catholicism because, other than the pope, one can never have any real certainty about what is from themselves or from the Holy Spirit. As a Protestant, though, I do believe that the Holy Spirit can give me individual and personal revelation that can be relied upon - particularly if this revelation is consistent with what other people who are bearing good fruit have attested as true (the test Jesus gives in Matthew 7).

To that end, I do feel a strong conviction that the 66 books in my Bible are true and authentic as the inspired Word of God. I believe this not on the authority of the counsel that compiled them, but on the authority of the Spirit within me. If that same Spirit later affirms that the deuterocanonical books are also true, authentic, and inspired, then I will accept those as well - and the same thing would apply if the Holy Spirit wanted to affirm any other writing. Maybe the Holy Spirit someday affirms the book Crazy Love by Francis Chan (random pic; I haven't actually read it) by saying, "Yes, I inspired him to write every word of that," then as to me, that becomes Scripture as well. But we cannot impose our own personal affirmations on someone else because until the Holy Spirit speaks to a person, they have no direct affirmation. Instead, when someone lacks the gift of discernment of spirits, the best they can do is trust those who bear good fruit (again, the test Jesus gives in Matthew 7) by the disciples they make (the test isn't merely good works, as the immediately following passage proves).

I get that this sounds very mystical and opens wide the door for people to abuse the whole "God said so" concept to start cults and cause all kinds of problems - as has actually happened repeatedly throughout history. But at the same time, the way the Catholic (and Orthodox) church approaches tradition and authority, particularly in the context of validating the authority of Scripture, seems too much like human wisdom to me. It relies on hierarchies and institutional structure rather than a demonstration of the Spirit in power. This seems to run afoul of Paul's profession in 1 Cor. 2, "My speech and my message were not in plausible words of wisdom, but in demonstration of the Spirit and of power, so that your faith might not rest in the wisdom of men but in the power of God." Relying on the authority of a church council without directly seeing the power of the Spirit at work in them during that counsel ... that just feels like relying on the wisdom of men.

why I mentioned flairs in my post

Good idea. I'll have to figure out how to do this :p

Tag: /u/OsmiumZulu

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 2 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

The auto-mod picked up your use of the f-word. Just a heads up to keep the profanity out in future comments to avoid it being removed.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

1 upvotes · 2 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

So you're quite happy to get the state involved if you divorce but don't want the state "involved" in your marriage?

As far as I'm aware, the state doesn't get involved in marriages in the first place - only divorces. That said, the way a marriage functions is heavily dependent upon the expectations of what would happen if it ceased to function. So, "control of marriage" and "control of divorce" are fairly inextricably linked.

But I think the point you're really making is this: /u/GrowBear does want state divorce protections, but he wants those laws to be protected on his terms instead of the present terms. This is a good point to make.

Realistically, if you take the state out of it, she could run off with the kids and he couldn't do anything about it. She could drain the bank accounts and hide the money where he'll never find it and he could never do a thing about it. Without court oversight, his income is the only thing she couldn't take from him. So, for everything else he wants state protections, but on his terms and not the state's terms.

This is all about finding the right woman, and not so much about whether or not you affect civil marriage

Spot on.

Scripture and the Tradition of the early Church is such that a valid sacramental marriage cannot be broken by humans at all. Bit odd.

Although not Catholic, I tend to take a similar view, although possibly even more extreme than the Catholic church would go. John Piper, a Protestant pastor, did a decent job writing up most of the arguments here.

303 - Fellowship

1 upvotes · 29 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

as long as "informal discipleship" involves some level of "covertess" (and by that I mean most, if not all, your beliefs has to be hidden, depending on how receptive the other party is)

In an evangelism relationship (which is pre-discipleship) there is certainly a need to be covert in many situations, particularly when your beliefs are in hostile conflict with the people you're engaging with. See my most recent 304 post on evangelism. With informal discipleship, there's nothing intentionally hidden; it's more intentionally withholding information because the disciples isn't ready to receive certain information yet - but if he asks, I would tactfully answer with honesty. I wouldn't try to skirt around the issue or question.

So unless God specifically asked you to be lynched, we shouldn't be looking at post-age-30 Jesus as an example on how to go about our mission.

I disagree there. With that logic, because 95% of the Gospels are about Jesus' post-age-30 ministry, we could never look to Jesus as an example for anything because there would be no way to discern whether he did/said something as a model to us or as a means of getting himself killed.

Instead, I get the impression that Jesus knew he would die, but was constantly trying to postpone the inevitable, until God made it clear to him: "Now is the time." This is clear from the way he withdrew from dangerous situations, the way he talked about his eventual death, the way he talked about his mission on earth, and most notably the way he prayed in Gethsemane. Jesus' primary focus during his ministry was building a kingdom by changing a culture. He was immensely successful at this - and I do think we can take this as a model for how we can do the same: building God's Kingdom and changing our cultures at both a congregational and community level.

But our God is pleased by results too

I agree completely - a point that virtually all of the modern western church misses.

if the RP movement ever get to a point where having martyrs will inspire the RP community exponentially, SURE i would wanna be a martyr too!

Haha, I don't think I'd ever desire that.

Who even remembers ...

If there was no heaven, then being a martyr would have no earthly value. So, I agree.

All I see is denominational wars

I mean the conversation on Constantine and his influence. I agree that he made it "mainstream" - my point in the reference was that he actually caused more harm than good. He did a phenomenal job making the institution of the Christian church mainstream, but did great harm toward the cause of actually causing people to follow Jesus. If anything, he did more harm to the purpose of the church (many speculate that this was actually his intent all along).

303 - Fellowship

1 upvotes · 29 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I don't see how discipleship is possible without the potential disciple first "selling everything he has".

Understandable, but nobody "sells everything" to go follow a total stranger. Jesus knew his 12 and had been with them before he called them out by name. The process started long before it became official. I treat this as the conversion from informal to formal discipleship.

Actually He did. He just made them look like fools.

That's my point - his method was to work against the leadership, not to work alongside them. He worked alongside individuals from the bottom-up, not against them. The bottom-up method presumes that leadership is "doing it wrong," so the people have to start a movement of their own to get it right. The top-down approach is focused more on fixing the leadership first, then working through them to steer the people.

martyrs achieved nothing by dying

On earth, perhaps not much - other than that their story would be an example, and therefore they are glorified in man's eyes. But in heaven, that is where they reap their reward.

It was ultimately Emperor Constantine that converted the Empire

I would contest that to the moon and back ... but that issue is beside the point :p Check out what /u/1Timothy47 and /u/ruizbujc wrote in this thread last month for more reading on that subject.

College Kid... Relationships are hard

1 upvotes · 29 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Good connect with the co-dependency reference. I totally forgot to bring that up :p

303 - Fellowship

1 upvotes · 29 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I think you're looking at a false dichotomy. It's not a "there are two kinds of people in the world" kind of thing. It's more that there are an elite few in high positions of power (maybe 1%) who are the true feminists, and an elite few who are truly RP who are kind of scattered randomly - some in high power, others not ... and the other 98% are sheep who are influenced more by this in high power than those who aren't.

Don't you think some level of covertness is required to survive as the 1%?

Absolutely. That's why one must employ tact rather than being "loud and brash." But completely hiding without an end-game just ensures your kind will die out.

My point is simply that they have to stop being drones (take the red pill) before you can share your ideas, or disciple them.

Discipleship is how you get them to take the pill.

All I'm saying is that its suicidal to engage someone who is still being indoctrinated.

If that's the case, no one would ever become RP in the first place. RP doesn't spontaneously generate in some people. I'm reminded of MMSLP's instigate, isolate, escalate path ... one which probably applies here. Instigate a conversation with someone, put feelers out, see what the reaction is, and if it's positive, isolate that person to have private conversations without other women or BP guys around, then escalate the conversation to RP topics.

Why can't we just get into power first, and THEN indoctrinate the masses?

That's a legitimate model, but the top-down approach is a lot harder than the bottom-up one. I encounter this in ministry all the time and am in conversation with leaders in a parachurch ministry right now about how to change a culture. Their current model is the top-down approach: It'll never work if the leadership isn't on board first.

But I'm showing them through Scripture that Jesus didn't go to the political leaders and religious leaders to persuade them so that everyone would follow. He went to the people - 12 ordinary nobodies, and used them to start a movement from the ground up. If this is what Jesus modeled, we should be following. The top-down approach makes sense from a worldly vantage point, but the Bible constantly says that spiritual wisdom and worldly wisdom are in conflict. So, at some point we have to defy conventional thinking and trust that God will fulfill if we will follow. This gives him glory - to defy logic. If RP truths are a spiritual matter and not a socio-political one (and I believe this is the case), then spiritual wisdom is how growth and change will happen, not worldly wisdom. So, my plan has to be to do it like Jesus did, even if it doesn't make sense to the rest of the world.

303 - Fellowship

1 upvotes · 29 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Like you said, sin makes women want to rule over men. Why would these sleeper agents want to join our side?

Because God created them with that inherent desire. The sin nature simply causes them to fight against their God-given directives. If this isn't true, the none of RP makes sense in a biblical framework.

Unless of course you "believe in the good of mankind"

Heh, not a chance.

If anything we Christians should always expect mankind to choose bad over good if presented a choice.

It's more that everything we do comes from bad motives. As Paul talks about in Romans 14, nothing is inherently bad or evil or unclean; it's our heart that makes it so. Likewise, Jesus says the same thing in the whole "It's not what goes into a man that makes him unclean; but what comes out of him" thing.

As has been said repeatedly: RP itself is amoral. It's a set of descriptive principles. Some people can choose to use that understanding for good, others for evil - but RP itself is neither good nor evil. It's just the facts as they are. So, for someone to choose between the FI and RP isn't a choice between good and evil - it's the choice between reality and fantasy. Yes, there's an innate desire to believe a fantasy over reality, hence the default position of the FI in the absence of tactful communication of the truth. But the truth itself can still prevail with appropriate tact.

You can't red pill someone if they don't first give up everything they have.

As has been noted before, a lot of RP stuff isn't unique to RP. It's more an amalgam of ideas from countless other areas pulled into one packaging that makes sense. Abundance mentality is a huge psychological fad. Fitness testing has been talked about in social dynamics for ages. The alpha/beta dynamic has been the subject of books since decades before modern feminism. These are not new things - but no one has pulled them together the same way until RP.

Chances are, most BP people have bits and pieces of red pill knowledge already ingrained in them and that they already accept as fact - so they wouldn't have to give up everything. Just most of the core identity-creating concepts.

not sure if sleeper agents in Battlestar could turn 100% machine overnight

In seconds, yes. But this instantaneous transformation is also unrealistic in the real world. Although most of the country are mindless drones, unlike Agent Smith, there's no feminist leader who has such power over them that one word will cause them to go psycho fem-nazi on humanity.

I don't know mate. Feminism achieved their goals within 2 centuries purely by politics alone.

Oh, you can destroy the spiritual with the worldly. But you can't cure the spiritual with the worldly. It's a one-way direction.

303 - Fellowship

1 upvotes · 28 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

tact: adroitness and sensitivity in dealing with others or with difficult issues

Just google "tact" and that's what comes up. That's the definition I use.

"Engaging the World" is like Morpheus standing on a hill and sh outing to the Machines: "Hey M achien!
Over here!! Lets talk tactfully, like civilized men!!"

Yeah, he'd be shot down because that's not tactful. That's "loud and brash." Instead, what Morpheus did was grab one or two people at a time ... and then taught them to grab one or two others. This is discipleship. If carried to its natural conclusion (and if the crew had enough equipment and prophecy about "the one" wasn't controlling their mission, etc.), then their victory would be won over by multiplication, not mass preaching.

As I'm sure you can tell, I'm probably more with how you describe the MRA community (I've never looked into it; my only exposure is what's said on TRP/MRP). It sounds to me like TRP has a more defeatist attitude about the matter. Although I love The Matrix, Battlestar Galactica might be a better analogy. There are several machines covertly hiding among the humans, manipulating the ship's every course and direction for their own advantage. The thing is ... none of the machines on the ship know they're machines (unless they are "awoken" by the other machines for a bold purpose). Their actions are more generally and subtly guided over time. So, they all think they're part of one big all-human community, despite the covert "us v. them" dynamic.

If I know the truth about there being a "machine imperative" controlling the way the ship is being run, I might be able to go to individuals on the ship and tactfully convince them of the machine-infiltration - and in the show when certain sleeper-agents (i.e. machines) became aware of their status as being part of "the enemy," they revolted against their makers and sided with the humans.

Because most people in the US are ignorant of the fact that they're sheep controlled by a feminist agenda, they are not loyal to the feminist institution; they are simply ignorant of the alternatives. As BPP often says, "They've been taught this all their lives; they know nothing else." So, tactful communication does have an awakening power. As you note, the actual "machines" in The Matrix will never convert to help humanity, so it'd be idiotic for Morpheus to waste his time trying to persuade them. But he can certainly do something about the people who live and work within the framework created by the machines - and that's what he did.

Let me be clear about this: The few who lead only have power if the masses will follow. Expose the masses to a better way and, if they truly believe it is better, they will follow the better way instead. Because God ingrained RP in all of us through creation (which, again, is hindered by the fall), there is some part of us that wants to accept and follow RP praxeology in our own lives.

And look how much they have achieved over the past 50 years?

Because they're taking the "shout it from a public mountaintop" approach. Again, discipleship is the answer, not politics. You can't cure a spiritual problem with a political solution. The curse (Genesis 3) is a spiritual problem - that women would want to rule over men.

Hide from the machines, play hide and seek in the Matrix (in this World but not of it) and yet never failing to offer the Red Pill to those who are truly willing to go down the rabbit hole.

But he didn't wait for people to be ready - he actively sought these people. And the goal shouldn't be just one or two for their own sake; it should be one or two for the sake of multiplication over time into the thousands and millions. The TRP approach seems more interested in individuals for their own sake. I agree with the practice of focusing on the individual, but think this should plug into a larger plan.

Personally, I ask any Christian who approach me asking me to disciple them to quit their church.

I understand your reasoning, but do believe that this is so contrary to Scripture that one can't legitimately claim to be leading someone into godliness with that instruction. You can be leading someone into manliness more effectively, yes ... but biblical manliness is not the only aspect of godliness or being a Christian or Christ-like. Note that although Jesus often withdrew from the crowd to be alone or with his disciples, he never neglected the needs of the crowd either. We must always be willing to engage with the crowd for their benefit.

That said, when I encounter new believers who are not already plugged into a church, I do not encourage them to start attending a church immediately - that comes in time.

I thought about making a thread ... but ... I knew you guys would

It might be a conversation worth having anyway :)

inevitably compromised on their positions

I agree with this fatal flaw in how the church approached the situation. That's how the church got blue-pillled in the first place. No to compromises. Yes to being intelligent about how we communicate.

303 - Fellowship

1 upvotes · 28 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Specifically, the limit is when you start to challenge people's worldview, and how people perceive themselves.

In some circumstances, I agree. But I don't think revealing red pill truths to someone is past that limit. Although you may be right that this may be "an attack on a bluepill person's worldview and [how] he sees himself," it's only perceived as an "attack" if it isn't broached tactfully. More to the point, deep down everyone wants to believe in the red pill because God has ingrained us with these truths in our very souls. The red pill is the order of how God created humanity, and although the fall has clouded our judgment on these issues, we still bear a reflection of God and what he created us to be (albeit a shattered one).

This is why I believe I have had very little difficulty persuading men in my church, my brothers, and even my own sister of red pill truths - because they all innately want to believe it is true, even if it offends their conscious intellect. God designed them to accept these things.

The reason sites like Dalrock's and ReturnofKings (ROK) is not tolerated by the World is not because of a lack of "tact", its because they break down the feminist scam, step-by-step, and present to the audience exactly what's going on.

Possibly, but I still believe greater tact in how I expect they are presenting this information would yield a different result in the public's eye and their receptivity toward what is being said. When I say I haven't read Dalrock, I have read 3 or 4 posts ... just not enough to say I'm fluent with anything of his. In those 3 or 4 posts, I get the same impression from him that I do of someone like Rollo Tomassi - they're more out for "loud and brash" communication about the subject to get the easy fruit following their sites.

The "loud and brash" approach does have merit with certain crowds, but it only works for those who are already intellectually inclined toward what you're saying. Even someone who is intellectually "open" to the ideas will reject it for the lack of tact in how it is presented. Virtually everything I've read from Rollo strikes me as this way - he has a clear target audience and he presents only to that audience without shame. Result? People not in his target audience don't like him.

If you, instead, target people who are not so much the "easy fruit" - people who are "open, but not inclined" or even people who intellectually oppose certain ideas, a different approach from the "loud and brash" one must be employed. This different approach involves tact in how information is presented. I'd wager that if TRP employed some of this tact it wouldn't garner the hate it does now. But it is more interested in being internally expressive than externally communicative and persuasive. That's a legitimate choice they have made, and there are consequences to that, which they have appropriately accepted. I'm choosing to take this sub in a different path.

I do have a solution for you, one that is simple and has been successful for at least 6,000 years of human history. Reinstitute the Patriarchy.

This is not a solution, this is a proposed end goal/destination. The solution is how to get there. If people are dying of thirst, "give them water" isn't the solution - that's the goal. The solution must account for the challenges of getting from point A to point B. If, for example, they lack water simply because they are too lazy to walk to their faucets, then the problem is a psychological one that demands a psychological solution. If it's because the water filtration plant broke, then it's an engineering problem with an engineering solution.

MRP suggests that humanity is dealing with a socio-political problem that requires a socio-political solution. I suggest it's a spiritual problem that demands a spiritual solution, although I accept that, as with many other spiritual issues, a proper socio-political environment can be facilitative of spiritual change.

More to the point, I don't have the power to resintitute the patriarchy, nor would it be sufficient if everyone on RPC banded together to try to do this. So, making such a suggestion is not a solution. The solution is found in the small steps we take along the way that actually are within our power to change things. In my view, discipleship is the solution. In its physical parallel (physical lineage), it's how God turned one man (Adam/Noah) into all nations, or one man into a mighty nation (Abraham), and in its spiritual reality, it's how God took Jesus as one man and founded the entire global church. Every new religious movement or denomination does the same thing - it begins with one man with a vision for how things ought to be, who inspires others through individual mentoring. It's only when we get on big platforms and rely on institutionalization of the vision that we start to lose the battle - because then it becomes more about the institution than the mission itself.

I'm rambling now. My point is that my goal is to help a few men through personal and direct interactions, to inspire them to help other men, and to teach them how to help those men they have inspired to help and inspire others, and so on. The reach of RPC is not intended to be limited to those who subscribe to our sub, but to everyone relationally connected to these individuals. To that end, I have men I'm discipling now to whom I am teaching these very things, and they will soon be doing the same with others (one already is). That's how this will get done - the way Jesus modeled it for us :)

Reinstitute the Patriarchy. Which implies that women are once again to be property of their husbands/fathers. Would you dare endorse this opinion?

Not every patriarchy held this view, nor do we see this demanded when God created men and women, so I disagree with how you're defining patriarchy. More to the point: This is the exact opposite of the tactful approach. So no, I would not endorse that opinion, if nothing else because the way it is phrased carries a lot of baggage that I would not endorse. The concept, possibly, but the wording, absolutely not. That is where tact comes in.

How do you "tactfully" tell a Bluepill that the entire World has been scammed for the last 200 years?

That depends on each BPer. Check out the 205 post on "How to Lead," as well as the conversation in that thread between /u/What_is_real_anymore and /u/ruizbujc and you'll get an idea about how the "loud and brash" (i.e. lecturer) approach may not be the most tactful, but that information can be communicated effectively through other methods, dependent on each person.

the guy on the plane didn't consider your view because of your tact or your charisma: he was rationally persuaded into your POV

Rationally persuaded because of the intellectual tactics I employed (i.e. "tact"). I think you made this misperception clear when you noted that you see "tact" and "charm" as the same thing, and now link it with "charisma." Tact has nothing to do with charm or charisma. It's all about developing a plan and strategy based on what information you have about a person or people group so as to minimize the odds of the message being rejected and working within concepts that you know they'll be more likely to accept and agree with. This is tactful communication.

try this social experiment again, but this time not with one, but several Jewish individuals

I agree that there is a limit to tact. No amount of tact will persuade me away from Jesus, nor will any amount of tact persuade a Jewish Community to embrace Naziism. But I do not believe any red pill truths (at least that I have seen so far) are so offensive that they cross this line with anyone - that everyone has the capacity to be persuaded through appropriately tactful communication.

303 - Fellowship

1 upvotes · 28 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Maybe one of the issues is that I still haven't read any Dalrock. I can't say I "endorse the beliefs expressed in that blog 100%" because I don't know what they are in the first place :p But I would be shocked if the reason one is tolerable and the other is not doesn't have something to do with tact as one of the factors.

Similarly, I can't say if I'm evangelical or not ... everyone I talk to (including people who call themselves "evangelical") seems to have a different definition of what that term means.

But tact in communication patterns is enough to overcome almost anything. It's how Mormons and Scientology manage to get so many people in the door and how liberals manage to convince people that 90% of their policies make sense (I'll admit: a select few actually do).

I once ran a test on this very concept. I was sitting next to a guy on a plane and decided I was going to convince him that the Nazis were actually the good guys in WW2. I wasn't dumb enough to broach the concept directly. Instead, I talked about policies and used what I know about social agendas to convince him that equality is this great thing and eventually pressed some hard concepts about sacrifice and making the "tough calls" and "if you had to, wouldn't you make this choice?" and tied that into, "What if people 'had to' do things on a national level at one point?" and gradually phased that into explaining Nazi ideals without actually using the term "Nazi." Although I never brought up anything to do with WW2, he connected the dots on his own, saying, "When you think about it real close like this, I guess I can really understand why so many people were willing to die for things that the rest of the world calls crazy or evil, like the Nazis" and "I have a new appreciation for what the Nazis were trying to do" and "I guess you can't just take history's word for it that the allies were the good guys" (actual quotes). No joke ... enough tact can persuade anyone of virtually anything, in the absence of a conviction from the Holy Spirit.

Since so few people ever end these stories once their point is made, I did eventually fess up that I was just running a social experiment on him. He was embarrassed, but laughed it off. He asked if I had hidden cameras somewhere, and I said it was more for my own personal examination of the human nature. He said he could understand and appreciate that, but I think he secretly hated my guts. Nevertheless, the rest of the conversation was friendly.

303 - Fellowship

1 upvotes · 27 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Personally, I don't hide any of my beliefs. In fact, in the last 2 weeks, I've had conversations with 4 other Christian men in my church, all of whom are fairly blue pillled (one's naturally more alpha, but still intellectualizes things within a BP framework).

I simply communicate everything in its natural Scriptural context. I have even showed some of my posts on this sub to one of these men. In personal conversation, I simply avoid the use of RP lingo in favor of the terminology the Bible uses it. So, instead of "captain/first mate" I say "leader/helper." When communicating concepts like "women would rather share a high quality man than have a low quality man to themselves" I simply highlight people like David, Solomon, Nebuchadnezzar, Jacob, etc. who demonstrate these truths.

When I use Scripture as the foundation of how I speak about these topics rather than RP lingo or the authority of "men swapping notes and seeing what works" I find that people agree with pretty much 100% of what I say. I like to use the video in this post as a starting point with some guys, as it is a straight-forward, no-nonsense, yet humorous way to broach the subjects while showing how common-sense it is in the Bible. Even my own sister was a fan of that video and said she wished all men took that view of their marriages and relationships. Although she's never heard of the "red pill," she just sees it in the Bible naturally and lives as a red pill woman anyway. I even started talking about fitness tests and she said, "Absolutely, I very frequently ask my husband for things, hoping he'll tell me no."

I'm on the verge of starting an NMMNG group with some of the men in my church. As I talk about these things, it is developing a following and people are hungry to see the truth behind what the Bible says rather than what the church teaches. Because all we're doing is interpreting Scripture, no pastor is against it.

Now, your views, from what I can tell of other conversations, extend beyond biblical principles alone ... not to say they're anti-biblical; just that the Bible doesn't actually address the issue. Wrong or right, you couldn't be as extreme as you are in how you communicate things and get away with it in a church setting. So, you'd just have to learn to be tactful about how you communicate truth rather than doing it brashly, as the internet invites people to do :p

Someone help me understand what just happened?

1 upvotes · 27 September 2017 · /r/askTRP

This is the most likely answer. I concur.

College Kid... Relationships are hard

1 upvotes · 27 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Good response.

110 - Stay Plan is the Go Plan

1 upvotes · 26 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Oh, my wife is taking a break from maternity leave. She's a tax accountant and October 15 is a huge deadline for her - biggest of the year (she works the week after too). So she's working 7 days a week, 70-100 hours/week, depending on how close it gets to the deadline. So, I'm working full time and handling the kids, house, shopping, etc. for the next month until my wife's deadline is over and she's back on maternity leave.

110 - Stay Plan is the Go Plan

1 upvotes · 26 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

i can image you subtly trying to help people reconcile, but most people are unwilling Nothing subtle about it. I'm pretty overt. Managed to get several couples to reconcile too :) Problem is finding a decent marriage counselor who can help them.

House-wife v. SAHM

1 upvotes · 24 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Well said.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 22 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Good to know. Yeah, I don't think I'll ever give her the reigns back entirely. But I'm debating whether or not, "You pick the positions" is giving her the reigns.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 22 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

The RP position is that men should initiate, lead, and dominate the bedroom. Giving my wife the reigns to take the lead in how we have sex is a beta move. That said, it could still be implemented not as, "I'm handing you the reigns," but as me having researched the issue in advance, taking the lead in deciding to implement something from the research, and then instructing her to spend time considering what of the options I'm giving her (and most everything on there would be a legitimate option) would be a comfortable place to start. So, while it's still coming from an alpha/take-the-lead position, there's that subtle: "I'm letting you choose" attitude that can come off as highly beta.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 22 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Great advice ... and cool website. I can see at some point simply giving my wife that link and letting her have fun picking something new to try. It's about the most non-RP thing in the world, but perhaps giving her freedom to choose how we have sex will help her be more comfortable opening up to try new things. Someone else also mentioned a mojo quiz ... I might try that with her too.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 22 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Sorry for the automod there ... I really need to figure out how to let certain words through.

Thanks for the heads up on this. I do find that if edged appropriately (especially while covering the tip), enough builds up that it's more than sufficient lubrication on its own. It just doesn't naturally spread itself, so you have to get creative.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 22 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

rape fantasy is never about rape but the freedom from sexual responsibility and the enjoyment of "forced" pleasure

I totally understand that. I can't say I've never been turned on by that thought either.

As far as the full cowgirl not lasting

Oh, I was being somewhat facetious there. I can last longer if I choose to ... it's just one of those things where the cowgirl/kissing combo is a huge turn-on for me.

cockring

Hmm ... an area where I'm totally ignorant. What exactly is that? I've heard of male chastity gear before, or "torture cages" or something. Are you talking about getting pierced?

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 22 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

keep having sex but set aside training and teaching days

This is what I was missing. Thanks for clarifying that!

Dig in and find the reasons why

Bondage is one of the subtle kinks she reveals every now and then. She likes when I put weight on her because she can't get out. She likes when I hold her hands together above her head so she can't move. For some reason handcuffs didn't go over as well as I thought they would ... so still trying to figure that one out. Probably was just further than she was willing to go at the time. After all the things I'd tried in the past, rope was the one thing that she was first to initiate (and pretty much the only one she's initiated).

full cowgirl with your arms wrapped around her back

One of my favorite positions she's been willing to do. If I can get her riding me while kissing at the same time ... hard to last long at that point.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 22 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

This is good stuff. I'll try to get to the full article soon. Thanks for sharing this!

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 22 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I was under the impression that your wife actually submits to your authority (actual "walks the walk" and not just "talk the talk")

When I lead, she does. When I'm silent, she's mostly selfish. So, if I tell her, "This is what we're doing today," she goes along with it even if it's not what she had planned. If I say, "This is how we're going to handle this issue with the kids," she goes along with it, even if she disagrees. But her heart is still internally rebellious, and there are a select few things (sex being one of them) where she sets her own boundaries and has not been completely submissive. I'm not sure if that clarifies much.

ONE - Great idea. Nothing turns me on more than a passionate, "tongue sucking" kiss. The wife hates anything with tongues, but will play along in rare circumstances. It goes into the "ew, gross" mentality of bodily fluids.

TWO - "guide her hand over her lips and her own breasts" - also a great idea. Although she eventually gets into it with time, starfish is mostly her favorite position ... let me do all the work while she does nothing. She doesn't realize that our whole bodies are sexual. So, when it comes to satisfying me, she pretty much goes straight for my penis and that's about it.

THREE - As above, going for the groin is her default. She's cool with that part.

FOUR - "have her repeat the terms" - this is a good idea to start bringing it all down to earth rather than "that stuff we don't talk about." "Solo" in her mind is sin ... going to be a tough one. I don't think she's ever touched herself other than to wipe after going to the bathroom. Getting her to orgasm isn't very hard. She's climaxed all but maybe 5 or 6 times whenever we've had sex. She does think sperm is "icky" and gross, though, so "learns how to handle semen" is something she'll have to figure out.

FIVE - "take her hand and have her finger herself" - phew, that's going to be difficult. "have her smear her juice onto her (mouth) lips" - sounds insanely hot, but like an impossible fantasy. This whole step just seems virtually impossible right now - not that I won't try in due time. But I feel like that's going to take months.

SIX - "Don't rush this" - and that's where her selfishness rings in. So far (and I accept this may change) when it's my turn, she just wants to get it over with. We've had exactly one time (about a year ago) in our entire marriage where she was willing to edge me.

SEVEN - Makes sense.

EIGHT - Hmm ... sounds fun. Maybe someday. This actually seems more probable in the distant future than step 5.

Thanks for this breakdown! To make sure I understand: are you suggesting starting from scratch with sex rather than building on whatever progress we've made in the past?

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Interesting ... this is great information. I've already read a lot from thedirtynormal.com ... will have to check the other stuff out.

My wife has been highly anti-toys from the start (including vibrators) ... she was taught early on that (1) sex toys are bad and (2) if you have orgasms by a sex toy you'll lose your ability to orgasm to normal stimulus from your husband. Obviously I don't agree with those conclusions, but I can see how at least for the first couple months of marriage #2 would make sense.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

I always wondered about the push/pull dynamic. I read about it a lot, but it's never been succinctly explained - only suggested without explanation. Thanks for that!

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Good point.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

I wish I had a rack. I do have a home bench, but I took it apart a couple years back when the kid stuff started overrunning the house. I also didn't have a bar ... just used it with freeweights, and I only have 25s and 45s at home, so I can't get much of a bench at home anyway. The 45s aren't terrible for an overhead press or curls, though ... but I probably need to invest in some 60s soon. Not sure I can curl a 60 yet (haven't tried), but maybe that would motivate me :p

assistance lifts

I probably need to look into this more. I'm totally anti-machine (too focused, don't hit stabilizers, etc.), but I also haven't deviated much from the main 5 (bench, overhead, squat, deadlift, standing row) other than to do curls and situps.

Can't believe you run before lifting...

That's the best part. I feel like it makes the lifting easier because my body's already loose and back into processing lactic acids faster, so I don't have to take as long of a rest between sets. I seem to recall that you get the most out of lifting if your rest between sets lets most/all of the lactic acid build-up to die out because then you can lift more (weight and/or reps) in each set, which leads to greater muscle tear. The lactic acid is your body's defense mechanism to prevent you from tearing additional muscle, causing the feeling of fatigue to force you to stop, thereby reducing potential gains as well. I might be crazy, but I feel like the running does help with this. Or maybe I just like running :p

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

No kidding ... I just commented to someone else I hadn't even thought about that possibility because I always think of the MWC as something to do with guys viewing their wives in that framework, never the wives viewing themselves. I'll look into it.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Correct - that's how she initiates sometimes. I tried to qualify that in my other comments. She does do good initiations at times too ... it's just extremely rare. The fact that I've only been self-improving for a year and she was pregnant for 9 months of the last year and is still breast feeding probably has a lot to do with that too ... probably should have mentioned that a lot more here. I haven't seen what she's like with improved-me under normal hormonal conditions yet. That's still another 6-9 months away while she's still breastfeeding/pumping.

Have you told her that the ways she says that is a problem for you?

Yes, that's when I get the response from my previous comment: "I'm a girl, you can't expect me to want to initiate."

Asked her to say something differently?

Yes. I've given her a script, I've told her what she could do to show me she's interested in a low-risk way, and we've talked about these things at length. Then the moment comes and she forgets it all and it's back to ASD or general defensiveness.

does it anyway to be cruel?

It certainly feels cruel, but I don't think she's trying to be cruel.

hoping benching 300 will make her magically have an epiphany about?

No, that's just my mark for when I'll start cutting to get 12% BF or less.

How do you respond? Something accepting and playful like ...

- In the past I had simply rejected her negatively: "If you don't want me, I don't want you. I'm not putting up with this garbage 'I'm okay with it' stuff."
- After I quit that it went to positive rejection: "Hey, it's cool if you're not into it, we'll do it another time." Then she'll get huffy and say, "But you're probably mad at me for not being into it." I'd say, "If I was mad, would I do this?" Then I'd make out with her for about 30 seconds and stop. Rather than any escalation, she'd just say, "Okay, I believe you" and that'd be the end of it (i.e. 30 seconds wasn't enough to get her into it). The most recent this happened was about 2 months ago.

- I've also used the exact line you cited a handful of times since then.
- More recently, I take the MMSLP advice of never turning down an initiation no matter how bad it is. So, I'll AA: "I know you're not interested ... but I think your hole is aching for it." This (or some other AA depending on her exact word choice) has been my default the last few times.

rejection of her and not her initiation method

That very well could be.

But you may also want to really think about why she says those words that way in the first place

Yeah, I think I addressed my thoughts on that in another comment, then someone complained that I need to stop worrying about what's in her head and just do whatever I want and if she doesn't respond, oh well. Not very helpful :p

fall into the same Madonna/whore mentalities

Interesting, I've only ever thought about this in the context of the man viewing his wife in that context - never about her viewing herself that way, although it seems identical to the ASD concepts RP talks about.

Thinking that you'll lose respect for her if she's "slutty" or enjoys the wrong sorts of sex too much or doesn't enjoy the approved sorts of sex

This is very, very probable. Now that you mention it, she was the first one to introduce rope in the bedroom, and she was very nervous about it. I got the impression it wasn't something she wanted; she was doing it just to try to appease me with trying something new ... but maybe I misread that situation (it was just under a year ago, so I don't remember it well enough to re-evaluate). There was also a time when she used whipped cream on herself, not realizing I was sick at the time and felt like puking. Although I was turned on and we did have sex, it clearly wasn't good sex ... she misread it as me being disgusted at her for wanting to do something kinky (this was a few years ago) and that ushered in our 18-month no-sex streak spanning the end of 2014 to February 2016. At the end of those 18 months she finally brought up that the reason she kept rejecting me was because she was so hurt by feeling like I was disgusted with her for bringing whipped cream in the bedroom ... I just about laughed at how ridiculous that interpretation was because she knew (after the fact) that I was sick because I was vomiting most of the next day (magically she didn't get sick - I was cautious on where I kissed her or breathed, which probably only added to her belief that I was grossed out by her).

BJs and cunni are slutty sex, and not for respectable women

She definitely harbors that view, but it also disgusted by the physical "ickiness" of genitalia. The thought of getting any cum in her mouth (even precum) is so disgusting to her that she won't take that risk. If I could guarantee there'd be no precum, she might be more open to it, but she'd probably make me wash myself right in front of her to prove there's no sweat or anything either.

There are literally books upon books for helping women reprogram

I googled "overcome sexual repression" for half an hour last night and was extremely underwhelmed with the lack of meaningful information. Any recommendations on good books? Particularly ones that don't involve actually disowning one's faith :p

The only helpful tip I've found was "learn to masturbate." This is something I've wanted to push her into for a long, long time, but it's walking a fine line. I've almost told her a few times, "I don't care if you watch porn or think about other guys - just do something to get yourself excited and thinking about sex more often," but that would be against our faith, so I won't cross that line. That said, despite my past efforts (mind you, all while I was still beta - I haven't tried recently), I couldn't even get her to touch herself while we're in the middle of having sex together. The closest she ever got was she grabbed my hand and moved it where she wanted - and that's only ever happened once in our entire marriage. Usually I tell her: "Let me know what you want and what feels good - even if you have to interrupt the moment, just start communicating." Her response has always been, "But you're so amazing on your own, I don't have to do that." And I answer, "But then I'll never learn how to take things to the next level," and she says, "What's wrong with the level we're at? Can't we just stay here?"

type of sex you're having just sucks for her

Her reactions (not just words) tell me otherwise. She has always complimented me about how good I am in bed. Of course, that's mostly because I was the epitome of the "Nice Guy" in trying to meet all of her desires while neglecting my own. I studied and researched everything I could about technique and got really good at it - keep her edging for hours sometimes, to the point where she's writhing around trying to rub against my finger or penis, even to the degree that she'll try to find the edge of a bed sheet to brush against her to finally get off - and then she internally cascades while moaning that she doesn't think anyone in the world could do her better.

My theory at the time was: If I can make sex as good for her as humanly possible - god-like levels - then she'll want it more. I've evenly overtly communicated this theory to her and it just does not work. Period.

/u/BluepillProfessor notes this constantly - that type of supplicating behavior doesn't foster attraction. That's not to say I give up all my great techniques - it just means that making sex great for her isn't going to make her want to make sex great for me. She's too selfish. 99% - after she finally finishes (which again, might be hours of edging without her ever touching me), she just wants me to be in, out, and done in about 30 seconds. By that point, it's not hard for her to make me finish, even if I intentionally try to slow her down or keep her from setting me off.

Or maybe you focus waaaaay too much on her and she's trying to blow steam off the "I need my wife to cum" quest.

I definitely have this issue ... but getting her to cum has never been hard. In our 9 years of marriage, I think we've only ever had sex 5 or so times where I couldn't get her to finish, and there was good reason for 4 of them.

Sorry, that's probably a lot of TMI ... but it's nice to externally process this stuff sometimes rather than internalize it every time.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Agreed.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Interesting. I haven't heard it characterized that way, but it makes sense. From what I recall, the spontaneous desire comes from testosterone, which is a predominantly male hormone. Although women have testosterone, it's in lower quantities and can only operate in the woman when working in tandem with estrogen. So, it makes sense to say that the "take initiative" concept comes from "masculine energy" - that energy literally being testosterone, whereas "masculine energy" (testosterone) only increases a woman's sexual desire when there is estrogen to "receive" it (as you say "Feminine energy is receptive"). Studies show that excess testosterone without sufficient estrogen to receive and process it will actually lower a woman's sex drive ... interesting (sorry if this is a weird comment: reporting results as I research it).

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Psychological conversation in mind ... as a curious idea, what would be your thought on getting a bottle of placebo pills, telling her it's some KY-type product and seeing what the placebo effect does? I've never been much into the "fix her" mentality in the first place (as you say, it's more about "lead her"), but I've always been an experimenter of people.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Good stuff. Thanks for the input! I've thought about making sex talk a more common, casual thing in the hope that it would drop her defenses a bit, but my efforts have mostly been in the form of AA, flirtatious stuff directed at her rather than conversation with her. That's probably a psychological defense mechanism in me, but I'll work on it.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Then so be it.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

No worries, I understand your boundaries.

ONE - Agreed

TWO - That talk has happened a dozen times in the last year alone ... probably in triple digits over the course of our 9 year marriage. I don't withdraw affection (maybe that's a mistake), but I do withdraw time, if that makes sense. I have never threatened divorce or legal separation, and I don't expect that will produce the intended result, but I agree she probably doesn't realize how important this issue is to me.

THREE - You're right. I have definitely been seeking that validation. I thought I had given it up years ago in favor of getting my validation from God. But when I started getting in shape and receiving that validation from other people, I saw a psychological disconnect between: "Why does everyone else see all of these changes and improvements and give me validation and show signs of interest - yet my wife seems to be unphased?" That brought back my interest in seeking her validation. It's really silly, but I see that pretty clearly now.

FOUR - I said that each position is biblically defensible. I wouldn't say "bad sex is grounds for divorce." The divorce is still sin, but the reason God/Moses allowed divorce in the first place (even in the absence of justifying grounds) was because it was the preferable course of action over what would have occurred if the parties did not divorce. To put it another way, it's the lesser of two evils. To resort to divorce under that position would be an acknowledgment that I am too spiritually weak to proceed in my marriage in a godly manner without a healthy sex life. I don't believe that is true of me now and I don't expect it to get there, so I don't anticipate divorce (or even legal separation) in my future. To some degree, I included those things on the list (1) because in an extreme scenario they are viable options, and (2) because if I didn't include them, every response from then on would be: "You're so beta because you're too committed to the idea of marriage" and I wouldn't get any serious answers. So, you could say I was posturing for the crowd without technically lying. I hope that makes sense. Also, each step along that path would involve a clear, unambiguous conversation with my wife. I wouldn't just start withdraw without telling her why.

FIVE - See above. But otherwise, what do you mean by, "You did pull back the resentment as the replies came in, but it is there simmering" - I get the second part, but not so much the first.

SIX - Agreed. However, there is a huge disconnect between what she knows and wants from what she actually does. My wife likes to put on the appearance of being the Proverbs 31 woman externally, but harbors an extreme selfishness that comes out in private interactions that aren't public. My mom was just with us for a week at the beginning of the month and said she noticed this and that it really shocked her because my wife otherwise seems so sweet, caring, kind, compassionate, etc. when you're only around her for a short while. I don't think my wife even realizes her own selfishness (just as I'm sure I don't even realize the degree of my own sins until others point them out to me or the Spirit convicts me).

SEVEN - When you say "one day a week for you and your wife to be alone" - do you mean for the purpose of exploring sex or just as a date night? Do you have any recommendations on how to "work on freeing her of her sexual hangups"? I googled "overcome sexual repression" and variants for about 30 minutes, but the results were very underwhelming or things I've already tried that didn't work ... mostly buzzfeed type articles that simply say: "Just have lots of sex and eventually she'll get over it" or "learn to masturbate" or "screw your faith, religion is just trying to manipulate you for control." To be clear, I'm pretty confident that the "learn to masturbate" thing might actually help (she won't even touch herself while we're together having sex) - to the point where I've almost told my wife: "I don't care if you watch porn or think about other guys or whatever ... just doing something to get yourself thinking about sex more often is an improvement." But I don't want to encourage her to sin either ... it's a weird spot.

No worries on the "post hijack" - I'm good with it :)

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

What's LSE?

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

I'll check it out. It's it just a knowledge/understanding book or does it offer solutions too?

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

I'll definitely check it out.

Wife's traditional response has been some hamster variant of: "I'm a girl. Girls aren't interest in sex like men. My vag should give me a free pass, so don't act like I should ever just feel like having sex sometimes."

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Thanks for all the info. I'll definitely check it out. As I said, I'm not on DB much since I don't technically have a DB. We have regular sex that's pretty good ... It's mostly the first 5 minutes of trying to get her revved up that I'm sick of dealing with. Going to DB has more been about practicing spotting RP issues and how to answer them so I'm ready if/when the time comes.

Wife does sleep through the night though, I make sure of that. I keep the baby with me until about 3am every night and she doesn't wake up again for another feeding until 730 or so. Wife goes to bed at 9 or 10, so she gets about 9-10 hours of uninterrupted sleep a night. She has her own other issues though.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Good word. Thanks!

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Yeah, getting from crap to 2 plates goes pretty fast ... after that it really takes a lot to make small gains. If it helps, I posted my routine over here. My benchmarks on that post are from a month ago, so a bit lower. 2 plates is when I started getting a lot of respect from other guys in the gym and IOIs from other women working out, so that's probably a pretty solid place to be regardless :)

That said, although it had been years since I'd lifted, I'm pretty sure muscle-memory kicks in and helps get back up to "the old days" faster. I notice this with running too. People who are brand new to lifting are training their muscles for the first time, which is much harder. That's also why cracking the 275 barrier is going to be hell ... because I've never done it before, so I won't have muscle-memory working in my favor.

EDIT: Then I immediately read this on TRP:

https://www.reddit.com/r/TheRedPill/comments/71e8df/medical_issue_kept_me_out_of_the_gym_for_nearly_2/dna383l/

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Aaaah. That totally went over my head. I thought you meant "do this, do that, create perfect conditions for sex, then I'll think about it."

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

She does want it. Her brain is telling her she shouldn't and she needs you to help break that down.

This is a good insight. When I tried going down on her, it was before I started most of my self-improvement. I was still pretty beta, so when she said no I listened. She did say as part of the reason for her hard no: "I would never return the favor and it would make me feel guilty letting you do that knowing I'd never do it back." Wrong time to STFU, but alas ... I was an idiot a year ago.

First month ... Next month ... The month after

Hah! This is exactly the way I approached it to get to the "brief lick" phase in the first place ... that's where she cut it off, so I never go to the "go to town" part. But again, I was also pretty unattractive at that point, so things might be different now.

She will test you like crazy afterwards once she's climaxed

Why and what would the tests look like? Usually after sex she's just in a silent glow and doesn't talk at all.

moral or not (which it is by the way biblically speaking)

Completely agreed.

Good approach and mindset, but just realize that you can likely be getting more here

Good point.

She just has some hurdles to jump through and needs the right man to lead her.

I'm trying to be that man :)

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

The fantasies are there even if they're buried

I totally believe this. I'm contemplating going for a PhD in psychology to complement my law degree (do court forensic work that way), at which point I'd love to concentrate on marriage counseling and sex therapy - primarily for my own benefit, but also to nudge others along in a direction that 99% of other counselors would reject. I'd have a nice niche among men that doesn't exist in very many places.

probably never feel her "get into it."

That's the thing, though. Once she's revved up she's begging for my touch, saying things like, "How do you get me to feel that way? I didn't even know that was possible." Of course, this is also some of my problem, which I noticed when first reading NMMNG: Nice Guys are so giving/others-centered in the sack that it trains their wives to ignore the need to rev up their husbands, so the man ends up being less than satisfied. Even so, my biggest fetish is watching a woman orgasm, so when she climaxes that about does it for me, hence my still enjoying it even if most of the work is by me on her ... but her trying to please/edge me every now and then would be nice too. Sorry, that might be too much TMI, but them's be the facts.

something going on there

Completely agreed - and I'm not yet equipped to handle it myself. I've tried encouraging her to counseling, but I'm also very skeptical about the feminism that runs rampant among most counselors, and I doubt she's be willing to talk to a male counselor about her sexual issues (nor would I want her to - that's just spelling "cheat on me!" with my own blood).

open environment

What are your suggestions for cultivating this? I've tried to be playful/direct in the past. I'd make a game out of it, where we'd ask each other personal questions and I'd wait until the 4th or 5th round of questions to ask about sexual stuff. That has not worked. I've tried pulling out a naughty board game we got for our wedding years ago. Didn't work. I thought about blindfolding her and taking her to an adult store just to show her: "Nothing you have to say is going to scare me off," but I'm guessing that'd be way too much too fast.

I don't have any direct recommendations I could make

Heh, should have read ahead :p

looking for resources about battling repressed sexuality may be beneficial

I actually never thought about this. I was always so focused on improving myself (especially since finding RP - and before that I was too beta to think that the almighty woman needed to improve) that I hadn't really thought to look into psychological resources on sexual repression. Thanks for the tip :)

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

chore zoned

Hah, I like that. I'm pretty good at rejecting this. I do the chores I want to do. She knows quite well that if she asks me to do a chore, my response is something like, "Hey, that's a great idea - you're right, that does need to get done. Mind handling that for me? Thanks, babe. You're the best!" Then I go off and do something else. She stopped asking me to do chores a while back, but mostly because I just get stuff done now and she knows I'm not going to put up with her nagging.

My wife needs no foreplay She demands I get in her, like right f-ing now

Heh, that'd be nice. For a long time my wife didn't like foreplay either. She demanded I get it over with right away. Haha. Seriously, though - sex is great now once we get started. I just have to tough it out for the first 5 minutes. The point of this post is that I now hate initiating because those first 5 minutes suck about 80% of the time (100% of the time she initiates and about 90% of the time I initiate).

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

the improvement also has to be for you

I feel you on that! That was the first legit post I made on r/RPChristians - developing the internal sense of motivation, particularly to stay fit (but it applies to all areas).

I got lazy. Because my goal was more sex

Been there, done that about 5 or 6 times in my 9 year marriage. It's why I definitively know (despite what my wife says verbally) that me being in great physical shape is not going to make her want sex - although I perfectly agree that when I was fat it was definitely a hindrance.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

I appreciate that!

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

That's only a one-rep max ... finally tied my high since high school, though! Just wish I was as thin as I was back then :p Honestly, the way guys talk here, I assumed 300+ was kind of the norm/standard.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

I've just never seen even bandaid solutions there ... only divorce. The closest to a suggestion has been: "Say something mean and snarky back to show them how mad you are anger maybe they'll get it."

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Does db even offer solutions at all? I get the impression their only solution is divorce.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

I've tried ... haven't gotten very far. Her usual response is, "I don't know what I want" and that's pretty darn believable coming from a girl. It's usually followed by, "What's wrong with what we've been doing?" Over time I've gotten her to be open to whipped cream, handcuffs, blindfold, rope ... She hasn't cared for any of that yet, but she does like when I'm physically laying on top of her in missionary ("I like the pressure") and when I lick her thighs, but oral on her is a hard no.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Thanks for being willing to give the hard realities. It's tough to swallow, but I've still got some time before making that judgment :)

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

9 years of marriage and never once, although I can't say I've pushed the issue. She made it clear early on: "I will never."

That said, I do get turned on by the thought of giving her oral ... but that's a hard no for her too. I discovered that hard no when I tried it for the first time last year. I was shocked because licking her inner thigh makes her go bonkers. She has a clear and openly communicated mental block of viewing genitalia as always dirty, both physically (i.e. slimy, gross) and morally.

She can't even say the word vagina. Instead she says "my butt hole" and hopes I know which hole she's taking about at any given time. This does make for some good flirtatious banter, of course ... but that's beside the point.

Either way, thanks for the insights. If it happens, it happens, but not getting BJs isn't a hard next issue for me.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Being high SMV is indirect, which appears to be spontaneous. So you are wanting your wife to validate your SMV, which obviously isn't high enough. Raise it.

This makes sense. I'm just not sure where to go from here.

I'm 6'0, 15% BF, bench 275 (1-rep max), squat about 340, earn over $125k/yr, am generally good looking, witty, flirty, pull attention from other people, high social status (usually the default 'group leader' in whatever I do), primary caregiver to my kids, OYS all over the house (at least for the last 3 months). I could probably do with adding some male hobbies (other than lifting, racquetball and writing are my primary right now). I've read through all the levels of dread and don't see many weak spots other than my refusal actually to cheat on my wife. I feel like I'm tweaking strengths more than fixing weaknesses, and those small tweaks just aren't doing much. Someone else suggested getting to 12% BF, which I've been defraying for the purpose of gaining muscle mass ... otherwise, where would you recommend improving to get the most results?

Eh ... now that I think about it, fashion sense is probably one area I know I'm lacking. I wear suits and ties everyday to work, so when I'm home I usually just want to toss on something comfy. But is wearing nicer clothes really going to make that big of a difference?

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

If you're looking onto responsive desire, you better be reading "Come As You Are" which covers that in depth

Heh, another guy just said not to waste my time - that it's good, but nothing useful for men.

You're trying to overpower turn offs and that's why you're killing yourself with effort.

It's not so much effort in life - I've got a happy balance there. I'm just not interested in initiating anymore. I suppose that's just a fact of life I'll have to accept and deal with, though.

You're here from DB right?

Nah, didn't head over there until after discovering RP and getting sex back on track. I mostly go there to practice identifying problems and figuring out which solutions apply so that when my wife inevitably pulls something on me, it's nothing I haven't seen before.

"Extraordinary Passion" blogspot? You need to get that entire thing in your head.

Haven't heard of it. Will check it out :)

your bedroom sucks because your mentality is f-ed up

The bedroom is fine as long as I'm willing to do all of the initiation and ignore her weak, libido-killing attempts at initiating. We have sex regularly, and 5 minutes into sex it's pretty darn great - mutually (and I have good reason to trust her on that). It's the initiation of sex that's the problem. As I realized through some of these comments, it's most likely that I'm looking for validation from her and if I have to do all the initiating or her initiation is weak, I don't get that.

Have you at least read SGM?

That one is next on my list. I originally understood that it was more about technique in the bed itself, which has never been a problem for us (again, the first 5 minutes being the exception). So, I left it alone and went for all the other stuff on the list. That may actually be the only thing on the sidebar I haven't read yet :p

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Originally, it was a purely theoretical question based on an excuse I see made on r/deadbedrooms a lot. Although my bedroom is far from dead, the things I read there still intrigue me.

Your response presumed I was having trouble getting my wife to have sex with me, as is the normal problem on here. This isn't a problem I have anymore.

What I did realize as a result of this post, though, is that I had a subconscious problem of wanting validation from my wife through her initiation of sex - desiring me enough that she would be more spontaneous and not be so heavily responsive. This is probably why those particular conversions in r/db sparked my interest.

That said, I think the answer to my original question is clear: the responsive/spontaneous dichotomy is legit and should be embraced to some degree. I just happened to get more than I bargained for when making this post.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Thanks. This is helpful.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

I understand this mentality, but that's not what I was asking about and that doesn't address the reason for my question.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

I'm not sure where you're picking up the M-H complex or a "super judgy holy attitude about sex." What did I say that led you to see this?

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Never heard of the book, but I appreciate your brief review.

I think this is a scientific valid premise that does not conflict with RP teachings.

Good to know.

So, is it okay if a wife says, "Sorry honey, but I guess I'm just a responsively sexual person, so don't ever expect me to initiate"?

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Good to know. I've been hovering at about 15% for the last month. One good cut diet and I'm sure I could be there, but I've been following the fitness advice not to cut calories while I continue to gain muscle mass. I was told to keep bulking until my bench was at least 300 ... I'm only at about 275 so far.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Good point. Given that my wife is still breastfeeding, so her body agenda is working against me (i.e. hormones are trying to avoid getting pregnant again), I'd be idiotic to accept it now. But I'll certainly re-evaluate 3 months after breastfeeding ends.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

This makes a lot of sense.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with pretty much everything you've said here. But it sounds like either you've changed what you originally said or your original comment simply could not stand alone without this clarification.

better method for persuading women and children (aka Charm) ... would you not use it 10 times out of 10?

I'm not convinced that "charm" is a great persuasive mechanism for a girl. Attractive, absolutely. I'm sure it's persuasive for some, but if it was as simple as you make it sound, the world would be a very different place. I'm more with the post on leadership styles as being a better way to get through to women - if what you're trying to do (i.e. logic/lecturer) isn't working, try something new (like life-sharing, delegating, etc.).

How is the lure to argue/convince them (intellectually) not also at est women use to test men?

Not sure what you're getting at here.

Is this what boys want to think about?

When I was that age, yes. Absolutely. But I get your point on the whole. The difference is when the little boy initiates the wall of text. You're assuming the dad is the initiator, inviting the boy to engage.

do you not secretly lose a little respect for him?

Not if he's responding to the boy's initiation.

Would you not find the fish... insecure?

No, I'd assume the fish enjoys it.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

wow. boner killer right there

No kidding. Nevertheless, I take the MMSLP advice of accepting it anyway, otherwise I'm affirming her fear of getting rejected and training her not to initiate.

I used to take your approach and say, "Screw it, if you're not interested, I don't want it." The whole walk away from bad sex thing, but that is the reason I'm in this hole in the first place. From reading post after post, I'm seeing that rejecting the initiation is bad, rejecting her in the middle of bad sex is helpful. What I've found is that even with her crappy initiations, 5 minutes later she's as horny as I wish she had been 5 minutes ago. I'm just getting somewhat sick of the way sex starts - either I do all the heavy lifting or put up with her garbage initiation style.

drop that expectation

Yeah, I've dropped any expectation of oral years ago. Not sure if you were there for my first ever MRP post, but reading RP for the first few days brought that expectation back. Then I quickly learned that (1) I can't make it happen and (2) if it is going to happen, it's not going to happen if I'm pining over it like a beta. So, I went back into DNGAF mode about it.

every one of those me ... will tell you about the significant amount of work it took ... Look, what are you ok with having?

I think I'm just really trying to figure out if a day will come when having a healthy sex life isn't so much work.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

1 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Gotcha. So, in your view, responsive sexuality is a perfectly legitimate thing even in an RP framework, and thus it's okay if a woman never initiates or shows spontaneous desire for her husband. Or am I taking this conclusion further than you would?

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians blatant attempt to misrepresent my points, or ...

Meh, I took your post the same way. I don't think he was off base.

Would it be wise for a grown man to argue with a 7 year old? What good could come out of that? What good EVER comes out of that?

Well, the child could learn something. Or the grown man could learn something about how 7 year old kids process information. But you're still being pretty ridiculous if you're suggesting a woman's capacity for logic and reason is no better than that of a male 7 year old. My son's 5 ... I guess I'll find out in 2 years.

I will say without question that at least in the legal profession, a woman's capacity for logic and reason is significantly above a 7-year-old's level and probably above 90% of men I've ever met. I'll also note that male attorneys still tend to have the advantage. My point is, there are hundreds of thousands of women attorneys in the US, virtually all of whom are better at logic and reason than most grown men. So, even if this is a minority position, it's one that cannot be discounted.

Although a woman's ultimate capacity for logic and reason might be lower than men's on the whole, there are countless women who are practically living at a higher threshold than countless men. Capacity and application are two different things.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Okay, this comment is borderline inappropriate. I'm not going to remove it, but be careful how you tread.

First thing's first: I don't engage in these conversations to try to convince anyone of anything. So the premise of your post and accusation is totally off-base in the first place. I've long since given up the notion of being able to persuade anyone of anything on the internet. I engage in these discussions because it's helpful for me to flesh out my own thinking and understanding.

For everything else, I agree with ruiz on this one. What you're saying is inconsistent with observable, provable evidence. It's easy to say "women can't logic" or "women think like children" when you're in a crowd of men who get off on hearing rhetoric about male superiority. But if the evidence proves otherwise, I'm going to choose the evidence over the propaganda every time. After all, isn't this the heart of logic and reason? Your insistence on following propaganda that makes you feel good about being a man is actually lumping you into the same category as women.

If allegedly RP men are really that easy to sway away from observable fact, I'm going to have to go back and re-test every single RP theory myself to discern what, as /u/BluepillProfessor says, is "men swapping notes" or "the evidence is in" ... from what is just propaganda that appeals to the RP man's ego, but is otherwise false. I don't want to do that. That's a lot of work. How do you propose I go about testing things like hypergamy and "crabs in a bucket" and all that on a mass scale? It's an impossible task - but if you convince me that RP rhetoric is not to be taken for its word, what other option do I have? Don't do that and bring discredit to the whole community. I was accused of this with some of my early posts and learned to back off of theory and stick to what I know to be true from personal observation and testing. Please do the same.

tried her best to make sense in what she knew is a male space

I have specifically allowed women to participate on this sub and do not consider it an exclusively "male space." RP is not a male-only thing, as BPP also pointed out that there are 3 other RP subs definitively directed toward women. I know it's a bit of an experiment, but Christianity includes both men and women, so I'm testing the waters to see how well people can engage in RP discussion in a mixed-gender setting (acknowledging that an overwhelming majority are going to be men anyway, simply by virtue of the fact that most people are coming from male-only spaces).

To that end, I'm also aware that /u/Willow-girl is openly not RP and opposes many RP viewpoints. Even so, there's still value in engaging in these conversations, if for no other reason than to gain a better appreciation for what we believe and why. And if there happens to be an actual hole in our thinking, why shy away from that conversation? What are you afraid will happen if you converse with "the enemy"?

Your suggestion to "charm her" only makes sense if I'm trying to screw her. If I have other purposes, I engage in other conversational styles that suit my purposes. I think you need to learn the context in which RP principles are meant to be applied.

Rule #1 Never argue/debate a woman. Ever!

I'm pretty sure Rule 0 is "stay on topic" and Rule 1 is "no moralizing" and sometimes "no talking about fight club" is filtered in there somewhere. I'm also pretty sure that if arguing/debating with a woman suits my purposes, the manosphere would agree: do what advances your goals. That's not to say I'll debate every woman I come across - but I will engage when I have a reason for doing so other than "trying to convince someone on the internet" which is pretty well a futile goal.

I know the redpill advice, want to hear yours.

1 upvotes · 16 September 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

Yeah, TRP/MRP rejects MGTOW as failed red-pillers. I figured that was the stuff you already knew :/ But as the other guy said, some of those things aren't exclusive to RP in the first place. RP doesn't corner the market on "improve yourself." I will say first-hand: "lie to get in her pants" and "pump and dump" are not necessarily red pill things, they're just things that red pill guys are often idiotic enough to suggest.

beginning of the end?

1 upvotes · 15 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Look, you're not married and I think your original post said you'd be okay if this was over. So do whatever you want to do. If it's not worth the trouble, let her go.

If she really is worth it, the only real way to salvage these things is to do a grand gesture, beta up for a few months, feed into her blue pill fantasies, then reintroduce your alpha the way you should have done it the first time. In essence: take a mulligan.

Without kids or the prospect of divorce rape, I don't know why you'd go through all that effort. The only explanation is that you have bad oneitis and still buy into the blue pill fantasy yourself. Cut that crap out.

I know the redpill advice, want to hear yours.

1 upvotes · 15 September 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

What do you mean by "MeRPs"?

beginning of the end?

1 upvotes · 15 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

I don't know that you're mentally capable of rewarding her for alpha reasons right now. Any reward you give her for the next couple months will probably come from a motivation of not wanting to lose her.

But that's okay. It's often said here to guys who aren't RP-ready: "Until you are ready, keep doing the same beta crap you've been doing. Filter in the alpha gradually." You went Rambo. It's okay. Most guys here do. If you need to be a little supplicating, so be it. You failed, you'll learn, you'll figure it out better next time.

In short, if you want to reward her for her past good behavior because you now suddenly see that you've been an insensitive prick to her, go do it. Ideally this will come from an alpha mindset, but accept the fact that you're not ready to be full-alpha yet and if there's some beta motivation of "I'm afraid I'll lose her if I don't," you plow through it and keep improving until you can be a true alpha, not just a "jerk qualities only" alpha.

A couple weeks back I wrote this comment to a guy in a far more extreme version of what you're in. Go read the "save the marriage" section. The first point on burning your frame to the ground and starting from scratch is about what you need if she's got the impression that your frame is a jagged mess of broken glass and barbed wire. Go read some /u/jacktenofhearts - he talks about this periodically: needing to create a titanium frame, but putting cushions and pillows inside so it's comfortable for someone to live in there.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 14 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I always joke that that marriage probably could have been saved if one of us had had the wisdom to hire a housecleaner, lol.

Hah, we do have one. She comes all year round, even when my wife isn't working. In fact, she's at the house right now :p

I have a little cleaning business on the side

My mom did that for a few years after her divorce. If you can build the right clientele and get a few employees under you, there's pretty decent money in it.

Not saying she doesn't love the kids; I'm sure she does; but maybe the nuts-and-bolts, day-in-and-day-out aspects of parenting were not her cup of tea?

Exactly. Nevertheless, the Christian culture pushes women toward motherhood and staying at home, and her mom hammers this as an ideal on her, and my wife succumbs to cultural pressures incredibly easily. The only time she can avoid doing so is when she steps into my frame and I battle off social conventions for her. She likes this.

with family sizes being smaller today, many kids grow up without having a lot of hands-on time with babies and infants until they have one of their own (yikes!)

Yeah, it is scary, but it's more about how far apart the kids are spaced than how many kids there are. Even then, the last kid or two will always go without.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 14 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I do know what you mean.

Nowadays, most men are expected to pull a "second shift" at home alongside their working wives.

Even when my wife isn't working, the general course of the day goes something like this:

- 7am - Kids get up, wife and I keep sleeping while they watch Netflix
- 7:45am to 8am - Wife gets up and feeds them breakfast
- 8am to 9am - I get up, get them dressed and (for those to whom it applies) get them off to school, then come home and get myself ready
- 9am to 6pm - I'm at work, wife watches kids
- 6pm to 8pm - Wife leaves the house (usually to read a book at starbucks, sometimes shopping, or some other hobby); I cook the kids dinner, play with them for a bit, then put them to bed.
- 8pm to 9pm - Wife and I get an hour to ourselves.
- 9pm to 2am - Wife goes to bed; I stay up
- 2am to 8am - I sleep.

So, pretty much whenever I'm home I'm exclusively responsible for the kids, except for the 15 minutes they're eating breakfast (I don't eat breakfast, hence the extra 15 minutes of sleep). On weekends I do sleep in until around 9:30 or 10, so she takes them then, but she also steals away for a couple hours every weekend, and that's also when we do stuff together with the kids as a family.

As I've noted a few times before, I'm not bitter about this arrangement. She gets bitter because she only gets 2 hours to herself everyday (6-8pm) and I get 4 (10pm-2am), failing to realize that I'm sacrificing sleep to do that ("That's your own fault!"), as I get 6 hours a night and she gets around 10 (accounting for the fact that she watches a 45 minute show when she goes to bed every night). Nevertheless, my kids see me as the primary caregiver and have a closer bond with me. She knows this, but accepts it. Instead of blaming it on the fact that I have more intentional/responsibility time with them or the fact that she's usually eager to get away from them, she chalks it up to "Dad's are just always more fun."

Contrary to the impression I get from the rest of the RP community, I really do wish my wife had a better, more intentional relationship with the kids. She's just so focused on "get stuff done around the house" whenever she's home with them that her ability to just enjoy them being kids is shattered ... which is ironic, given that the whole reason she's staying home 6 months out of the year is so she would be able to enjoy quality time with the kids while they're young.

Anyway, despite what other RPer's might say, I don't see any of this as me making some grand sacrifice for the sake of my wife. I see it as me getting the time with my kids that I want with the added bonus that she gets the time away from them that she wants :p It's kind of a weird attitude for someone who begged and pleaded when we got married to let her be a SAHM once we had kids. Then she got what she wished for and immediately wanted to go right back to work (for at least 1/2 the year anyway).

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 13 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Meh, she only works 6 months out of the year. Those are 6 busy months, yes, but the rest of the time she has no good excuse.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepillled to answer)

1 upvotes · 12 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I think you know what I'm asking and why

I really don't.

I guess that's where our opinions differ.

Indeed. Although I don't deny that gynocentrism and the feminist imperative exist (not only in America, but in most of the world), pondering it for too long doesn't seem to have much value unless you're in politics and have the power to battle against the change from the top. Battling against the change from the bottom depends more on being practical. So, my hope is that this sub is more practical.

As for coming in with assumptions, I don't think the red pill does this. It's more about testing and discovering and sharing reports/results. There are descriptive aspects that will get into the "why" behind the "how," but that certainly seems to be a minority of posts - at least on MRP. To be fair, I don't spend much time on TRP. TRP is flooded with too many wannabes and half-hearted people who just want a quick fix to their sex problems, then get in a mental circle jerk over theory. MRP is better because it stays practical: Here's what you need to do, here's how to get it done, and let's be real about how long it's going to take. Some of the "how to" exists there, but it's more for men who want to do rather than those who are only interested in thinking about concepts.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 12 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Well said. I must have missed this as a main post on TRP/MRP ... I've been offline a lot this last week.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepilled to answer)

1 upvotes · 12 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

is there a separate set of cultural values, comparable to "honor" in say Norse/East Asian cultures, reserved only for those who display exceptional courage or fortitude in battle and adversity?

How would "Norse/East Asian cultures" decision to employ an "honor" system have any bearing on whether or not circumcision is gynocentric? That makes no sense to me.

though something else must take its place

And there confirms my suspicion: You came here with the conclusion already solidified in your mind that every culture is gynocentric in some way. Whether it's true or not, this destroys anyone's ability to have a fair, truth-seeking conversation with you.

I could just as easily look throughout history and conclude that every single culture throughout all of time has had a male bias. Modern America still has countless social structures in place that are more advantageous to men than women. Does that mean America is male-centric? It's not an "either/or" - it's an "and." No matter where you go, you'll find things that are good for women and you'll find things that are good for men. This is going to be particularly true in any culture that follows a complementarian model, as the Bible does (and so does RP). Even if everyone in the world were RP, women would have certain advantages that men do not. Why? Because RP acknowledges that men and women are different. Those differences cause general inequalities in different areas. Those inequalities mean that women have advantages over men in certain areas. Accept that as a reality of life and move on. Complaining about "gynocentrism" only makes sense if it's so overwhelmingly dominant that any semblance of gender equity is removed from society. Although America may get there someday, it's certainly impossible to find this to be the case in ancient Israel.

VerseBot

1 upvotes · 12 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

According to the VerseBot FAQ, it's already active throughout all of reddit unless a mod bans it. I have not banned it, so it should already be active. The FAQ does say you have to tag it in the comment too, or else it won't work with brackets alone.

Test: /u/versebot [Malachi 2:15]

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepilled to answer)

1 upvotes · 12 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

a better question would be, what dirty work is "honor" ...

But that's not the question I asked. Circumcision isn't a badge of "honor." It's not a knighthood. It's not a requirement to fight in a war. It's not something that gives extra respect in the community. After all, literally every single male has it. It doesn't mean anything special on a societal level - it only has an implication between the individual and God. The chivalrous guys among the Israelites would be circumcised right alongside the criminals.

You're also not accounting for the fact that some people are simply better suited for some roles than others. If the men sent the women off to war and to protect the country, in those days (specifically: before guns), that would put the nation at extreme risk. Men are more suited to that job, so men did the job. "Honor" wasn't a system used to get men to do the job; it was a system used to reward men for the fact that they're fulfilling a role that no one else could accomplish as effectively. Men were not "honored" until after the job was done, unlike modern patriotism, where just being a "man in uniform" comes with an expectation of honor and respect from society, even if you just sit in base and play video games all day, never actually participating in war.

Women weren't sent to fight wars

You could say that both could go off to war (i.e. increase army size, even if your added size comes from a class-B soldier). But the fact is that someone has to stay behind and get stuff done while the battles are being fought. So, are you going to keep your best soldiers behind for that purpose or the weak/non-soldierly people? This isn't gynocentrism, it's just common sense.

By "violence against men", I meant thousands and thousands of sons coming home in body bags. The fact you don't see that and can somehow relate it to "violence against women" is pretty alarming.

Circumcision has nothing to do with sending men off to war, and it's not the cause of men coming home in body bags. I still don't see even remotely how you're connecting these two ideas. If another country decides to attack, that's a force of violence from outside a nation. Other than circumcision (which I'd hardly call violence in any modern concept of that word), violence against men was strictly prohibited: "an eye for an eye" and all. But the culture at the time specifically authorized violence against women. Men were allowed to beat their wives for not living up to certain standards. There was no law against this. So, when a society condones violence against women, but forbids violence against men, and the only actual violence against men comes from those outside the country - I'm not sure how you're still arguing this point. It just seems like you need to read more history books on ancient Israel culture.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 12 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, my wife is about as far from "high libido" as I could imagine is possible. I've long since given up on us being "in the mood" at the same time - literally ever. Oh well. I'm over it.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 12 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

True. I would just enjoy every now and then when I come home from the gym or a late night at work that she's dressed up, candles, lit, or something like that. And that does happen sporadically ... maybe twice since the baby was born (i.e. in the last 2 months since her recovery period ended). But before the baby was born, that had happened maybe once in the last 6 years.

Her usual way of initiating was: "I'm kind of tired, but if you really need to I could deal with it today. Up to you." That's a total mood killer. I get that it's coming from an insecurity from the fact that I had rejected her shallow advances like this in the past, so she makes them even more shallow to avoid getting hurt from further rejection. But she should also know I've never once rejected a hard advance. Anyway ... there simply hasn't been enough time since baby-birth to re-establish a new norm and make any comments about her current state. I just know it's better now than it has been in the past.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 12 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed on all counts :)

Responsive-only is an annoying copout. But pretending to be spontaneous when you're not really wanting it (i.e. initiating only because you know he wants you to) is about as shallow as a man faking his way through an intimate conversation just to get sex afterward. As she can usually see through his faking, he can usually see through hers (though if she's good enough he won't care).

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 11 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

My understanding comes from the spontaneous/reactive desire spectrum. Some people spontaneously want sex for no reason at all. Other people only start to get aroused half way through intercourse. Others are in between.

Statistically, guys tend closer to the first. Instead of total spontaneity, maybe it's something small like seeing his wife's cleavage unexpectedly. He's responding to very small stimuli, so it really comes off as more spontaneous. Most women would not get aroused by her husband's waist line dropping a couple inches for a brief moment. Instead, when he starts kino on her, at some point her engines are going to get revved up - she's responding to clear sexual intent.

I used to believe that if my wife wasn't into sex before we started, then it was just duty sex, thus no fun. Even if she became physically aroused during sex, I had created a psychological barrier telling me it wasn't real and shouldn't mean anything to me. I assumed she had to be more spontaneously sexual like I was. So, if she rarely ever initiated, that meant to me that she had no desire or attraction for me, which caused me to resent her. It also conditioned me to avoid initiating because in my mind good sex could only happen when she initiated - because I knew she'd be into it. The result? I never initiated and then resented her when she never initiated either.

This resentment actually turned off my spontaneous desire. I had conditioned myself to have a negative psychological reaction to sex. If she bent over and her shirt opened up, rather than enjoying my wife's cleavage, I would then think, "I don't want to see that shrew's boobs. It's like she's trying to taunt me by flaunting sexuality just to deny me when I try. I'll show her!" and then I'd up and leave in a butthurt huff. This really put my wife in an impossible predicament because failing to initiate increased my resentment; subtle initiation (like showing off her body) would cause my resentment to fester; and the only thing that would pull me out (overt jumping all over me, wild and crazy sexual advances) were something I had conditioned her not to do ... why would she? I was acting all butthurt at small advances, so how much worse would I be at a grand gesture! I once went over 9 months without initiating just to see how long it would take before she wanted it enough to initiate. It never happened. That was during a total 18 month span where we didn't have any sex at all.

In reality, I now understand that as the man it's my job to initiate. When I initiate, that's when her responsive desire has an ability to kick into gear. I can now value this as genuine responsive desire rather than viewing it as illegitimate for its failure to be spontaneous. Incidentally, the more I initiate and trigger her responsive desire, the more sensitive her responsive desire becomes - thus she is shifting to become more spontaneous (although still far from the fulcrum).

So, if she says things like, "I have a headache" or "I'm tired" or "I've got an early appointment tomorrow," instead of just assuming those mean, "Don't bother initiating today," I take them at face value: she has a headache, is tired, or has an appointment. I initiate anyway, even if she doesn't show any signs of being horny at all. Result? She gets horny, and over time it's easier to get her horny.

302 - Bible Study

1 upvotes · 11 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Great idea!

50/50 v. OYS/Value

1 upvotes · 8 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I don't know that there are any clear RP lawyers. I do know to stay away from any attorney who claims to be a "men's rights advocate" or who advertises that they specialize in representing men in custody cases. This is idiotic because we all play with the same statutes. People who represent women know the same tricks as the ones who represent men. They have no distinct advantage and they're not fighting any harder than any other attorney. What they do have different is that they're more into using marketing gimmicks to get your money, which means they're usually more interested in the money than anything else. These firms often charge way more than their competitors. Why? Because they're intentionally marketing to the demographic that they know has more money to spend. Screw those firms.

A good attorney should be able to communicate two clear things in the initial consult:

- I will be utterly and honestly real with you about case expectations and what the likely outcome will be.
- No matter how improbable the result may be, I will fight hard through trial and appeal to pursue your goals.

Some attorneys lack the second and are just pushovers. They want a quick buck, to settle the case, and then churn the mill over to the next sad sap who hires them.

Reverse attorneys will promise you custody, support, extra parenting time, that they'll make her pay your legal fees, and that they'll even convince the judge to make her buy the moon and hand it over to you in the final entry. Then, when they obviously can't deliver, instead of owning up to the fact that they're lying scumbags only after your money, they actually blame you for why you didn't get everything they promised. "Hey, you didn't tell me about ____ at the first meeting. If I had known about that I never would have said those things. It's your fault for doing that or not telling me about it up front."

If an attorney is both honest about the realistic outcome, but vigorous in his pursuit of your goals, that's an attorney I would trust. When an attorney has both, you almost always get a solid stream of cost-benefit analysis every step of the process.

50/50 v. OYS/Value

1 upvotes · 8 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Oooh.

50/50 v. OYS/Value

1 upvotes · 8 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Yes, even with those.

50/50 v. OYS/Value

1 upvotes · 8 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'll look forward to reading it :) Thanks for sharing your thoughts.

50/50 v. OYS/Value

1 upvotes · 8 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Haha ... Yeah, I tried to keep it out of my main post, but I'm gonna be real in the comments.

50/50 v. OYS/Value

1 upvotes · 7 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Yeah, I didn't have time to proof read initially like I normally do. Hope I got them all.

109 - Pursuit, Seduce, Initiate

1 upvotes · 7 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Haha.

Calling out your partner's bullshit?

1 upvotes · 7 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Direct confrontation is only to be handled by those with an iron frame. If you don't have that, don't do it because you're probably going to come off as butthurt. You're better off with STFU/AA/AM/WISNIFG stuff, etc.

If you do want to call her out on it, be prepared for her to DEER, which is going to make her defensive, raising her ASD and LMR and ultimately make it harder for you in the future if you don't have the frame to plow through in the present. You're probably also likely to come off as a jerk rather than an arrogant tease with an unwavering drive to get what he wants. The former is bad, the latter is good (although sometimes you have to be the former for a while to get to the latter).

Mitch's Red Pill

1 upvotes · 7 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

In Christianity, "free will" is more elusive than a non-Christian understanding. About 1/3 of Christians don't believe free will exists with regard to major concepts and about 10% don't believe it exists at all (my wife used to be one of them).

What all Christians agree on is that without Jesus, we are only free to do evil (defined by anything that displeases God, not our own internally subjective views of morality). In order to acquire the freedom to do good, Jesus has to change a person's heart.

- Hebrews 11:6 - "And without faith it is impossible to please God."
- Romans 14:23 - "Everything that does not come from faith is sin."
- Isaiah 64:6 - "All our righteous acts are like filthy rags."

you can literally stop at any time

Totally agreed, but in Christianity sin begins in the heart. So, even if you never technically penetrate, "whoever looks lustfully at a woman has already committed adultery with her in his heart" (Matthew 5:28).

As to that last bit, you're right - I'd still retain the ability to stop. But I also have to weigh that ability with my own maturity. I can tell my 3 year old daughter to stop yelling and screaming all day, and even if she genuinely wants to stop crying, she keeps on doing it anyway because she can't control herself. Spiritually, a person's age or mental acuity doesn't change the fact that one may be weak in the exercise and application of their faith. I don't believe I'm in this camp, but the Bible also tells me to flee from temptation, not to run toward it. And I know where my triggers are. A heroine addict technically has the ability to choose free heroine sitting in front of him, but is he really mature enough to do so? He's still responsible for his choice, but we'd be fools to think that choice can be made in a vacuum. So, there's some balance that has to be made.

To be clear, I'm not trying to convince you to adopt my faith or trying to suggest anyone else here is evil. The Bible is pretty darn clear that we're not to judge non-Christians. You all can do what you want because you haven't subscribed to what it means to be a disciple of Jesus. But because I have, I have to reconcile what I do with what I believe.

Mitch's Red Pill

1 upvotes · 7 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The only thing I've down voted in this thread is the other comment where you falsely accused me of down voting you. And now this one, of course. Getting huffy about down votes is a pretty beta attitude. Why do you care so much? Maybe someone else did it. Maybe it's just normal vote fuzzing created by reddit's algorithms.

As for responding, I have no need to explain myself to him. And it's pretty clear nothing I say would change his mind anyway. So why would I engage in a pointless endeavor? It's not worth my time trying to DEER to everyone who accuses me of something, which it appears you're asking me to do. The only reason I'm engaging with this comment is because I'm hopeful you'll stop making idiotic assumptions and maybe you'll stop caring about what internet strangers think of you and your friends. I get my fair share of down votes but you don't see me huffing about it.

As to his reply to you - he didn't give any actual advice. He suggested a way I could change my behaviors to suit his frame. Screw that.

Just realized my best friend is dating a sociopath. Is there any way I can possibly open his eyes or is he a lost cause?

1 upvotes · 5 September 2017 · /r/askTRP

She may not have a personality disorder at all. She may suffer from alexithymia (not officially a part of the DSM-V). From a quick wiki read:

The core characteristics of alexithymia are marked dysfunction in emotional awareness, social attachment, and interpersonal relating. Furthermore, people with alexithymia have difficulty distinguishing and appreciating the emotions of others, which is thought to lead to unempathetic and ineffective emotional responding.

And ...

Alexithymia is defined by:

difficulty identifying feelings and distinguishing between feelings and the bodily sensations of emotional arousal difficulty describing feelings to other people constricted imaginal processes, as evidenced by a scarcity of fantasies a stimulus-bound, externally oriented cognitive style.

And ...

contributes to poorer mental health, poorer relational well-being, and lowered relationship quality.

Individuals high on the alexithymia spectrum also report less distress at seeing others in pain and behave less altruistically toward others.

True sociopathy is a tough scale to hit. Even normal people (especially introverts) might show indications of sociopathy while not being remotely sociopathic, simply because of the way their external behaviors are a poor indication of their internal thought processes. Alexithymia, however, seems much closer to what you're describing.

Just realized my best friend is dating a sociopath. Is there any way I can possibly open his eyes or is he a lost cause?

1 upvotes · 5 September 2017 · /r/askTRP

To /u/dr_warlock's credit, your original post gives absolutely zero indications of sociopathy in her - only problems with him. My guess is that he has Dependent Personality Disorder with Avoidant (APD) features. With the information you've given, the best I could conclude is that she has certain narcissistic tendencies (primarily considering her own interests as being more important than his sacrifices), but nowhere near enough to have any confidence in that.

I wrote more about PDs in this post over on MRP/RPC.

Can RPChristians use real dread?

1 upvotes · 5 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

If anything, pride is a contributing factor in keeping me from falling. But more to the point: humility is thinking accurately of yourself, not thinking less of yourself. I believe I have made a perfectly accurate statement about my capacity to withstand that particular sin. There are other contexts where I wouldn't have said the same.

Can RPChristians use real dread?

1 upvotes · 5 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, "serious" probably wasn't the right word there. I really meant "any," but was trying to buffer it against the possibility that a spiritually immature person reads that and considers it a license to do stuff that he'll get in trouble with.

I don't recommend flirting with other women, but striking up a conversation is perfectly fine. I don't do it to seek IOIs, but it's nice to know when they're given. My wife says the same thing - she enjoys it when other guys notice her. I'm glad she enjoys that. I'm not the type of guy who wants to put her in a box so that no one else ever sees her (though she tends to do this to herself anyway).

The quest for sexual purity has done more to stifle God's design for sexual maturity between spouses than it has helped. People tend to go overboard with, as Jesus calls it, "rules taught by men" by adding to Scripture and expecting everyone else to follow the new rule because it logically makes sense.

Nowhere in the Bible does it say, "Thou shalt not look at or talk to someone other than your spouse," nor does it say, "Thou shalt not enjoy it when someone other than your spouse desires you." These things can lead a person into temptation, which can lead a person into sin. So, the spiritually immature must beware - they might, as you say, "take a bite." But for those who aren't sex-starved maniacs, simply saying hi to a girl at the gym or asking a cute secretary how her weekend was shouldn't be a problem.

For high value men, they don't need to flirt to get IOIs. Just introducing yourself to someone is enough. Culture is going to have a really hard time convincing me that it's sinful to introduce myself to someone simply because it might lead to sin. If we were instructed to avoid everything that could possibly lead to sin, we'd have to leave the planet, as Paul suggests in 1 Cor. 5. And if it's not sinful, why are we treating it like it's sin? This all comes from the feminist imperative that's been trying to betaize men in the church for at least a couple centuries.

Mitch's Red Pill

1 upvotes · 5 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This makes too much sense. Thanks for the explanation.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 5 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

You're right, I was thinking of MRP, where it's pretty much exclusively for men. RPW has some good stuff, although I get the impression that they tend to reject even some of the descriptive aspects of RP that are less friendly toward women. Otherwise, good write-up :)

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

1 upvotes · 5 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

True dat.

Filed today.

1 upvotes · 3 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

True. But I once had to explain to a guy: "It's going to cost you $30,000 to go through with this trial. On my best day in court, if a miracle happens, I can get you $3,000 extra beyond what they've already offered. You choose. $3k or $30k hit." Those are the extremes where they settle.

Information too late ...

1 upvotes · 3 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

True statement.

Filed today.

1 upvotes · 3 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

As soon as I realize it. I just had that conversation with a client on Friday. About 75% say, "Fine by me, I'd rather give you the money than her." When the amount the amount is grossly disproportionate, that's when they start saying they'll be more willing to settle.

Filed today.

1 upvotes · 2 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Two situations: (1) if what he wants is impossible, or (2) when the cost outweighs the benefit. Of course, the cost-benefit analysis is his to discern, not mine to dictate.

Information too late ...

1 upvotes · 2 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Good point. Some other people helped me realize that - "what she does" not "what she says" and all.

Information too late ...

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Haha, I can affirm this.

Information too late ...

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Yeah, I handle the MIL quite well most of the time - usually just calling her out on her crap to her face. She's so conflict-avoidant that it shuts her up right away.

I'm just not in the mood to deal with the backlash that my wife will experience if I do that to her mom on this issue right now. I've tried to pace out my RP changes healthily over the last several months/year, but I can tell my wife is still trying to figure out what's going on, as I'm not as predictable as she once found beta me to be. She feels the effect of the changing relational dynamic between the two of us. She likes it, but that doesn't magically make the stress of "change" go away. So, when outside sources stand to threaten her well-being, I tend to be a little more protective of her with that kind of stuff for now.

Telling her what i'm doing

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

I went through about 3 days in my journey where I was emotionally cold, very direct and decisive, and highly efficient. I became robotic and my wife immediately picked up on the relational distance this created. This was a gross misunderstanding of stoicism and frame.

If your wife wanted to screw a machine, there are plenty she could buy instead of having married you.

Amused mastery is most often brought up in contexts that make it look like little more than a responsive tactic to specific situations, or a mentality to keep you from getting butthurt when she's throwing a fit. But it should really just be on all the time. Enjoy life. Have fun with the little things. Before giving your wife an instruction, ask yourself, "How can I word this to make her roll her eyes with a hidden smile?"

Hey, I know you've gotta pick up your sister, but I need to drop a massive deuce before she gets home ... don't want the house stunk up when she gets there, right? <wink emoji> So, let's head out at ____ to drop me off first.

or

I know Princess Wannabe will be getting in at ____, but I've got to get some stuff done, so let's leave today at [a ridiculously early time]. Her: [responding to the setup] "Why so early?" Well doing ____ will probably take 15 minutes, doing ____ another 10, and ____ another 20, and screwing your brains out before she gets here will take a couple hours.

Bonus: If she ignores you or responds with sarcasm (even though she secretly likes it), you say, I suppose if we can't leave that early, there's about 45 minutes of stuff I can cut out.

Information too late ...

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

True, there are other ways, and I utilized that for different conversations. But my wife can be a chatter-mouth and would blab to her mother if her mother happened to be around, even if the conversation itself was private.

I did tell my wife this morning and she's fine with it (at least consciously - her body agenda might tell a different story).

Information too late ...

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Well, even MRP itself is all about long-term strategy over short-term wins.

Information too late ...

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

(lol, dread)

Haha. What's even funnier is the context of this statement with the "lizard brain rationalization" stuff - as if counting the condoms would prevent you from cheating anyway.

But yeah, just as abstaining for 3 weeks is off the table for you, using condoms is for me, otherwise none of this would have come up in the first place :p Good on you for being willing, though.

Information too late ...

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Fully agreed. The relevance of her final question that night totally flew over my head until I read /u/GargantuaBlarg29 and /u/anythinginc's comments.

After we got dressed and she's back in bed, I kiss her goodnight. While I'm walking away she asks, "Would you still love me if I did end up getting pregnant after tonight?" This should have been a dead give-away for me, and now I feel like an idiot.

I responed, "Of course. If you get pregnant, that's on me, not you. Don't worry about it." And then I left. I also told her about the vasc appointment today. She's fine with it (at least verbally - her body agenda is clearly telling her something different without her realizing, which is what I took as a crucial point of what garg and anythinginc said).

Information too late ...

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Perhaps, but I'm not convinced yet. My MIL is the epitome of the female hamster with a "warp drive" setting. We're talking legit mental health problems. I've fought battles against her, and a DNGAF/amused mastery mentality truly wins the day every time (she hates that she can't get to me), but I've also learned to pick my fights because even if I win, my MIL takes it out on my wife. Screw her for doing that, but my wife doesn't know how to seek protection within my frame during those times and often ventures out just long enough to get hurt and come crawling back in.

I suppose this is a good thing because it often rebolsters my wife's attraction to me - she totally loves that I'm strong for her when her mother is mentally raping her. But I'm not always in the "pick up the pieces" mood.

Information too late ...

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

This is exactly what I needed to hear. I totally forgot trickle truth was a thing - and it's the only thing that fully explains the situation. And I'm now confident you're right about her second guessing having another kid. Specifically, I also forgot the "what she does" v. "what she says" split. I was giving too much weight to what she says because I'm confident she believes what she says. But as is often the case with her, she doesn't actually know what she wants, and what she says she wants is often wrong.

These are my action steps. Thanks!

Information too late ...

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

The only time she made an excuse not to within the past several weeks was when I told her no to buying a house we obviously could not afford. She was clearly very upset and when I offered a hug she said she didn't want me touching her. So, I STFU and left for the gym. When I got home she ended up initiating with me that night anyway.

I hadn't thought about the birth control reminders as LMR before, but she knows it hasn't stopped us from having sex the other times she brought it up. I just take it as her shifting blame to me in the event we did get pregnant again - setting herself up for an "I warned you" mentality.

Your wife is a whore and you should divorce her

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I get that, but remember that they all talked constantly about what Jesus said while he was alive. He may not have been quoting the written text, but I do believe he was quoting something he knew Jesus said all the same.

Information too late ...

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

True. Good point.

Information too late ...

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Hah - fair point!

Information too late ...

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Touche. So ... just let it go and keep doing my thing. That was my intended plan - just didn't want to do that because it's the easy thing, I prefer an actual reason.

Information too late ...

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Could be, but as I just commented you someone else, she hasn't seemed like she has been trying to get out of sex lately, and she initiates with me frequently. If she really wanted out of sex wouldn't she have told me about missing a pill and ovulation before we started and not after?

So, I'm not sure how to reconcile that with the "she's not attracted" responses. Instead, I took her initial comments as her reminding me so she could absolve herself of guilt if she did get pregnant, blaming it on me with a "don't say I didn't warn you" attitude.

Information too late ...

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Thanks for the info. I haven't gotten the impression she's trying to avoid sex recently - and she initiates frequently too. But this is a good word to remember and apply all the same.

Information too late ...

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

True. That's why I'm not worried about her being pregnant. It's more the careless flow of information that I was asking about.

302 Challenge - Philippians 1:1-2

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I remember it all too well ...

302 - Bible Study

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

My spiritual growth is not at risk and my pastor is making huge strides. I'll take a guy who is faithful, available, and teachable over a close-minded guy who's "further along" every time. I probably should have mentioned some of his more positive qualities earlier as well :p

302 - Bible Study

1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

This is a sad reality. When discipling my pastor I tried to teach him these things as an important thing that every Christian should know how to do. His response: "No, Christians don't need to know how to study the bible, as long as they're reading it. That's what Sunday mornings are for." Note that my pastor never does biblical exegesis on Sunday mornings - it's always a topic with a pop psychology solution and a couple verses kind of related.

Dread-game may be the most important aspect of a Redpill LTR or marriage.

1 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Christ is perfect, and so my impression was that men were held to a higher standard than women

Nah, Jesus imputed the same standard of perfection on his church too: "Be perfect, therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect" (Matthew 5:48).

You standing up for your religion because I'm saying things you know aren't true?

Touche. That got a bit meta.

Dread-game may be the most important aspect of a Redpill LTR or marriage.

1 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You ever read the verse immediately before that?

Ephesians 5:24 - "Now as the church submits to Christ, so also wives should submit in everything to their husbands."

I agree that most pastors emphasize 25 and downplay 24. But if your reason for abandoning Jesus was because you didn't agree with what his so-called-followers were saying about him, then my guess is that you were never a "Christian" to begin with - you only self-identified as one. That's pretty darn common, and explains the first 17 years of my life, where I self-identified but later realized I was never really "saved" to begin with.

How would you respond your wife's co-workers started bad-mouthing her in front of you, saying things that you know aren't true? Would you abandon your wife or would you stand up for her and give them some hard truth to chew on?

I'm dating two MGTOW.

1 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Do you have any examples?? Just curious.

Read the book Blink by Malcolm Gladwell. The entire book is about this concept and is filled with example after example - including studies performed in controlled environments to prove this concept :)

Clearly he saw me being strict with myself.

There you go! Great example :)

What RPW "idea" DON'T you subscribe too?

1 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

That's the right response.

Mitch's Red Pill

1 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

And yet that's still one of the sidebar books. So, if that book is to be viewed negatively, why are we all reading it?

I'm dating two MGTOW.

1 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Well, that's deciding what to do going forward. I think what the other guy was saying was simply that you should own up to the fact that you decided to enter into two separate relationships with men who have a similar history - that it was your choice to do this, your choice to interact in a way that makes the relationship work, and accept that. You could have turned either of them down and been in a different situation, but your choices are what caused you to get along with both of them and what led you here. Not that being "here" or getting along with two guys is a bad thing. Having options is really good :) But, personally, before hopping in deeper with either of these guys, if I were you I'd be vetting them far more carefully than they're vetting you. Both of these guys seem like short-term fun, long-term trouble.

Mitch's Red Pill

1 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

So the 2011 edition I read is a heavily modified re-write? I can't see any evidence that there was an edition before this.

Or has the manosphere changed to reject even the original MMSLP, but the sidebar just hasn't been updated yet? That would be good information to know.

Beyond this discrepancy, I agree that Athol went off the deep end with what I've heard of his blog/discussion board. I just wasn't aware of him ever being a "pure alpha, no beta" guy. Although the comment by W&S also clarified that what I was calling "beta" may really have been a different aspect of alpha, depending on the motive (want v. need, etc.).

Mitch's Red Pill

1 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Well, I am a lawyer and I was 6 engineering/science credit hours shy of qualifying to take the patent bar, which is a predominantly engineering field. So, there's that.

I do absorb and reflect, but I do this at a much faster rate than the average person. I've also been studying these concepts intentionally for the last year and a half and applying them for the last 8 months - I just knew them by different terms before discovering RP about 2-3 months ago.

As for verbosity, I've done a lot of meditating on that over the years. It stems from non-diagnosed mild Obsessive or Compulsive Disorder (not to be confused with OCD itself). I feel a compulsion to explain everything I say with every caveat and nuance lest someone accuse me of saying something other than what I meant. The guy who trained me in law was the same way and often says it's impossible to be a good attorney if that compulsion isn't in your blood. Unfortunately, it carries over to other areas of life too frequently.

Mitch's Red Pill

1 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This is a fair assessment and I better understand your beef with me now. I could say something about each point, but it'd probably be pointless. All of them were certainly true of me at one point, and at least one of them probably still is.

What I notice, though, is that these predominantly focus not on embracing the descriptive aspects of RP; rather they address the prescriptive. I do believe I see the matrix for what it is. But because my goals in life are not the same as most other men (great sex is not my highest priority), how I use that truth is different.

I just find all dogma ... or any other limiting doctrine to be incompatible with free thought and an open mind

Interestingly, Christian theology says the opposite - that everyone is a slave to their baser traits (their "body agenda" as many here call it; add the "sinful nature") without Jesus; and when they have faith then they are finally free to think for themselves. Whereas evil was the only option before Christ, those who have Christ now have a whole new world of good opened to them. In this way, rejecting Christ is submitting to slavery and a closed mind. But ... from a non-Christian's perspective I can see how one would reject this thought.

LTR had nudes in her laptop from her phone dated June/July. Pussy and ass pics. She has never sent me nudes in our 9 month relationship.

1 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/askTRP

Plan B works either way.

Dread-game may be the most important aspect of a Redpill LTR or marriage.

1 upvotes · 29 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Agreed on all counts.

Dread-game may be the most important aspect of a Redpill LTR or marriage.

1 upvotes · 29 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I had the same thought. Applying dread without OYS just makes her think, "If only those girls knew about him what I know ..." and then she looks on with contempt.

Communication questions

1 upvotes · 29 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

The key is to minimize the negative and increase the positive.

I was with you up to this point. Sometimes you want to give negatives to types of communication you don't like and positives to reinforce the communication you do like. Not all communication is good communication.

Mitch's Red Pill

1 upvotes · 29 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This makes sense and is a fair point. It reminds me of this set of graphs I made a while back.

With churches, for example, they want to be in the upper-right corner. 99% are in the upper-left peak because they're culture-appeasing. They think they can just draw a straight line over by sprinkling in challenging messages without reducing their culture-appeasing attitude. In practice it doesn't actually work like that. Challenge and culture-appeasement are fundamentally at odds, so the warm fuzzies must inherently go away for a new foundation to be laid. Cultural-appeasement is inherently self-limiting in how productive a church can be; but making purpose one's foundation removes that cap.

If I were to make a similar graph for what you're talking about, it would probably show that for a guy to get the full measure of benefits of the red pill, he's going to have to dip into "jerk" territory for a while to create a new foundation for the relationship - one that's not self-limiting. BP ideologies and appeasing the feminist imperative are inherently self-limiting. A person can be minutely happy in that framework up to a point, but he hits a glass ceiling far sooner than he'd expect and just accepts it as his lot in life. Understanding and applying RP concepts removes that limiter, often initially causing men to dip into the rage stage and/or jerk mode, often decreasing his happiness in the short term while he undergoes the hard work of swapping out the foundation so he can rise higher than his previous BP ideologies would allow. In this sense, what I call "the infinite application graph" has just proved its ongoing application in yet another context.

Mitch's Red Pill

1 upvotes · 29 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Here's a fundamental philosophical difference we may have: you probably assume that you're naturally good but you've learned to have "the strength or ability to do evil" so you're not helpless. I'm the inverse. I see myself as coming from a Genesis 6:5 place: "every inclination of the thoughts of man's heart was only evil all of the time." That's me.

It was also said of Brother Lawrence centuries ago: "When he had failed in his duty [i.e. did something bad], he only confessed his fault saying to God, 'I shall never do otherwise, if you leave me to myself. It is you who must hinder my falling and mend what is amiss.' Then, after this, he gave himself no further uneasiness about it."

This is the misperception many people have about Christians - that we're some obsessive rule-followers. In reality, Paul says two times (1 Cor. 6:12 and 10:23), "Everything is permissible, but not everything is beneficial." I don't care what's "right or wrong" for the sake of doing the "right thing" or avoiding the "wrong thing." I do what's beneficial because at the end of the day that's all that matters. I simply have a longer-term perspective on what's beneficial than most.

Mitch's Red Pill

1 upvotes · 29 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I get that this is what was said. I'm asking for an explanation of where those blue traits are so I know where to start re-evaluating. Telling a guy he's still blue pill doesn't help if there's no identification of which qualities are blue.

Mitch's Red Pill

1 upvotes · 29 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Labels aside, we're clearly saying the same thing. Thanks for the clarification on misused labels. That said, I do think MMSLP goes beyond this in his chapter on beta traits, like where he talk about having a high paying job as being a beta trait.

How long should I wait to be "official"?

1 upvotes · 29 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

It isn't necessarily fair that I can have my emotional needs met while his physical needs are only met on a limited basis.

I wouldn't even characterize it that way. Again, I'm a proponent of waiting until marriage anyway. It's more about his ability to vet you for your physical interest in him and whether or not that interest can hold up over time, whereas the short bursts give a natural relational excitement that overflows into physical affection. When you're in the same city for a long period of time together, seeing each other often, that's when the "honeymoon" emotions tend to die down a lot and you can really figure out what you're doing together.

I talk a lot more about that in this post. On the graph, you both are going to want to figure out what that life on the downhill slope will be like. From a distance, you're so stuck in the ideology of what it might be like to be together that you simply can't get the practical knowledge. So, emotions run high and you can do a lot of fact-finding, but you get no sense of reality for what life will be like when the emotions simmer down, or even invert to the hard negatives that most all people experience at some point during the marriage - and that "some point" isn't just a fight or two ... it's usually months to years of thinking, "Why did I marry this person?!" before you finally figure out how to progress from the "divorce or turning point" circle. You need to find out if he's the kind of guy who will stick with you through that, even when he no longer has any emotional interest in you, and he needs to know if you have that character as a woman. That's how you'll make a marriage last long-term - by being prepared for these things in advance and vetting someone to see if they can stay committed during those hard times and have the wherewithal to know how to trudge forward rather than quitting or backtracking.

How do I get better at AA

1 upvotes · 28 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

I'm just going off of stuff I've read in other posts and sidebar material. I can't count the number of times I've read flaired people say, "You have to mean it when you say it" and "Don't laugh it off."

What you're describing sounds more like the C/F (cocky/funny) tactic that appears in a lot of Rollo's stuff, which gets talked about here a lot less.

Or maybe it's both. I've just never run across a description of AA that described it as a joke for a joke's sake.

LTR had nudes in her laptop from her phone dated June/July. Pussy and ass pics. She has never sent me nudes in our 9 month relationship.

1 upvotes · 28 August 2017 · /r/askTRP

What's 4d chess and why is that "wtf"?

109 - Pursuit, Seduce, Initiate

1 upvotes · 28 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Exactly!

109 - Pursuit, Seduce, Initiate

1 upvotes · 28 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That's a fair point and a view I won't definitively say is wrong, as you could be very right. I'm fine with those who wish to take that conclusion.

That said, I've heard all the theories about it being a cultural gesture and having nothing to do with seduction, but I can't say that I agree. The context of the book seems too strong otherwise and there were other culturally appropriate ways she could have sought him out as a kinsman redeemer. Yes, he noticed her character, but isn't that what passages like Proverbs 31 and 1 Peter 3:3-4 say is one of the more important attractive qualities? As opposed to Proverbs 11:22, for example, where it points out that men should not be attracted to beauty without character. Rather than flaunting her body like a prostitute, Ruth took the high road and began with the more godly way of making herself appealing to Boaz.

I do agree that the threshing floor scene was not a sexual encounter; but it's certainly one that would have made him think of a sexual encounter. It reminds me of David in 1 Kings 1, where he was extremely old and couldn't keep warm by blankets alone (presumably older than Boaz, then) so the solution was to find a hot young girl to lay in bed with him to get his blood to boil. Even though David didn't sleep with her, the sexual attraction kept him warm. I see Ruth as doing something similar here and I have no doubt that even in the absence of them having sex that night, Boaz almost certainly thought of it, and I'm confident she wanted him to.

109 - Pursuit, Seduce, Initiate

1 upvotes · 28 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That whole book is about gaming Tizrah, seducing her, foreplay, and having sex with her.

And her doing it right back. Again, not to say that we develop a covert contract over this, but we do have women readers here sometimes too ;)

How do I get better at AA

1 upvotes · 28 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

Read and replied to your response to the other guy, so check my comment there, since you just copied and pasted and I'm not going to keep two threads going.

How do I get better at AA

1 upvotes · 28 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

she asked who "Alice" was ... A girl I met at a bar a while ago.

Decent starter, but you need to recognize what she's really looking for her. She suspects you of hooking up with her. So, agree with her suspicion and amplify: "A girl I met at a bar a while ago. I was trying to scope out options for a threesome."

My wife just did this to me on Thursday. We're both Christians, so the idea of a threesome or even a joke about it is somewhat laughable on its own. But she said she had a few things she wanted to talk about. I listened through the first couple and really didn't want to talk anymore, so for the third she's getting all caught up in herself: "I'm not sure how to ask this. I ... uh ... I wanted to know if you'd be interested in ... uh ..."

Me: "Absolutely I'd be interested in a threesome." At first she laughed hysterically (which knowing her usual response to sex stuff was quite shocking; she even joked back about how it better be MMF instead of MFF). Then I started going very briefly into details about finding someone and how to convince them - and I held a straight face. Her laugh went away and she got into a confusion over whether or not I was actually being serious. At that point her mind was sufficiently removed from whatever it was she wanted to ask me and I just said, "Anyway, I've got to get some stuff done. I'll see you in the morning," then I went to the basement and got to work. She's left lingering with the thought that I might have been serious.

Faith issues aside, I amplified and I owned it. Will I ever actually have a threesome? No. But she doesn't need to know that. She just needs to believe my amplifications when I deliver them. The easiest way to pull this off is if I actually mean it when I deliver it, but once you get good you don't need that component anymore.

She was all mad after that. I ignored it completely and kept talking normal when I wanted to say something.

Be careful in your self-assessment here. At one point I thought that me talking normal while she was acting all emotional was the same thing as stoicism and amused mastery. It's not. Often-times she interprets it as you being cold and heartless and "emotionally shutting down" in response to her antics. If she views you that way, that's worse than if you yelled and screamed back - because at least then she knows that you feel something, anything, in the situation.

Instead of simply being calm and talking normally, act the same way you would as if your kid were throwing a temper tantrum. My wife and I often laugh when our kids throw outrageous temper tantrums. It's cute. So, sometimes I laugh at her when she does the same. Other times I scold my kids, so sometimes I scold my wife. Sometimes my kids really just need a hug-and-cuddle session to calm them down, so I hug-and-cuddle. Figure out what's appropriate in the moment and go with it. But just talking normal and engaging in the conversation (1) might make her think you're just shutting down, and (2) legitimizes what she's saying, which is going to lead to you DEERING more and more.

Starting to recognize and pass Fitness Tests. Am I doing this right?

1 upvotes · 28 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That's hard core. There are some lines I haven't crossed, and thankfully haven't needed to. Usually if I'm thrashing a person, making them look like an idiot, it's because they deserve it. I've had a couple cases settle out this way. We'll get to trial, they go first, I cross-examine them so hard that by lunch break they're offering me a better deal than the last one I offered them. But, again, it's usually when the other side is the one trying to screw with us first.

I've been at it for 7 years now, so I've got a lot more time for this other stuff to get to me. But I do think my current firm placement (dealing with people who come to us because their spouse has psychological issues) buffers me from some of that, as I'm mostly representing the sane person and the other side is legit crazy. When going against abusive narcissists or borderlines who endanger their children just to get an emotional reaction out of the husband ... I don't feel bad destroying those people.

At my previous firm, I did have a couple cases I turned down due to moral issues, but that was a Christian owned and operated firm, so I had more flexibility there. To avoid discrimination claims, I told the potential clients in advance, "If you hire me, here's how I will approach your case, and I will not budge on these issues ..." A couple stuck around and we did just fine even without pushing the buttons they wanted me to, and a couple went somewhere else. Interestingly, for the couples who stuck around, I ended up getting more referrals from them down the road than most other clients - they appreciated the moral integrity while simultaneously getting the results I cited up-front.

Starting to recognize and pass Fitness Tests. Am I doing this right?

1 upvotes · 27 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That thought never crossed my mind, but props to you for the positive attitude :p That said, I hold no guilt over what I do, so I proceed with a clear conscience.

The alternatives

1 upvotes · 27 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

True that many people apply it that way, but to quote rational male, year one, plate theory 2: "Spinning Plates doesn't necessarily mean you're f-ing all of your plates. It's more of a spreading out of your efforts across a wider pool of subjects."

6 Questions for Christian Merps

1 upvotes · 26 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I totally get what you're saying, but I think all of this is predicated on a misunderstanding of what I said. When I said "grace through faith will always be a non-negotiable" I didn't mean that this had to be the exclusive aspect of a soteriological model.

From what I understand, Catholics and Orthodox alike also affirm that salvation cannot happen without (1) grace and (2) faith - that these are integral to salvation. So, I count them as Christian, despite the fact that they add other things into their soteriological mode.

However, if someone argued, "You can be saved without God's grace" or "You don't need faith to get to heaven," that's where I'd have true beef and would probably reject such a person as "Christian" for the purposes of this sub.

I think this distinction should clear up pretty much the rest of your comment.

6 Questions for Christian Merps

1 upvotes · 26 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians can you clarify what you mean? Especially the 1600s paragraph ... screams blue pill

The context of this section was explaining the gender balance within the church at differing time periods, pointing toward why the church started watering down its men.

The point of the 1600s was to say that women were treated pretty cruelly, for the most part. Puritanism really was more male-dominant than the church is female-dominant today, which paved the way for the Salem witch trials at the end of the 1600s. When religious freedom arose post-revolution in the 1800s (i.e. as the government started figuring out how to run itself), that's when women realized they could hop on the new "freedom" bandwagon and start getting power for themselves, much of it being a retaliation of the female-oppressive systems that were in place before then.

By that point the church was struggling to regain power that it had lost when all the men were off exploring the country and fighting the civil war, leaving the women and children to run the show and pray for their husbands' lives and safe return. So, the church was bringing these women in who had nowhere else to turn. Given the increased (and almost exclusive) presence of women in the church during the civil war, the church saw women as its main gateway to power, and has been riding that bandwagon ever since. That's the same time when you see methodists and other denominations really start allowing female preachers.

So, I wasn't trying to be "blue pill" in regard to how the world functions today; rather, I was giving a historical context for how the past oppression of women paved the way for their eventual dominance over the church.

Non-first world countries are routinely pressured into implementing first world laws and standards, even if their people didn't ask for them.

For many, that may be the case. But from what I hear from missionaries who I know personally who have spent over a year in places like China, Thailand, Djibouti, Egypt, Nigeria, Iraq, Iran, Turkey, Morocco, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Korea, and a few other places I can't think of off the top of my head - these people all say that they're still heavily male-dominant cultures who stick to more traditional male-headship roles. Basically, the strong run the place. The missionaries I know don't bring female-worship with them; rather, they accept that trying to change that aspect of the culture is a low/non-existent priority in comparison to other aspects of advancing the Gospel and that working too much against the grain of culture, especially when there's no inherent biblical conflict to a particular cultural norm, actually hurts the mission rather than helping it.

is it any surprise that people in power will try and force their moral values on people without power, against the latter's will, and/or try to influence the less powerful people into thinking like them?

This makes sense from a worldly perspective, but it is not the mindset I have seen from the missionaries I've known.

I hope that gives some clarity :)

Starting to recognize and pass Fitness Tests. Am I doing this right?

1 upvotes · 26 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Good point. My job kind of sets up a fence to keep that mentality away. Doing divorce work, I'm trained to handle the worst of the worst of the worst situations people go through and I'm the one who has to help them through it. Abuse? Addiction? Mental health? Child molestation? I don't get much of an option to say "screw that case, you're on your own" (unless I went self-employed, but my boss is over 80 years old, so I'm just kind of waiting for him to move on and I can take over the firm).

Starting to recognize and pass Fitness Tests. Am I doing this right?

1 upvotes · 26 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Sums it up nicely.

Weekend Challenge

1 upvotes · 25 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

/u/OsmiumZulu gave a good description. I wrote more about this in my post on abundance mentality - check about half way down for the word "Scarcity" in bold.

Your wife is a whore and you should divorce her

1 upvotes · 25 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Yes

Business Partner Getting Married; How Do I Protect Our Assets?

1 upvotes · 25 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

There are lots of things that can be done. The key thing is the prenup, which is sad because only the partner getting married can really enforce this unless the partners agreed in advance in the OA that a prenup would be required if either party were to marry.

The first and most important thing is to keep all of your documents - never delete anything. If you can't prove what the business was worth when you got married, the whole thing might end up being marital.

Don't ever let your partner's spouse work for the company unless you're willing to just hand her 50% of your partner's share.

Set up the OA to have different grades of stock - ownership interest and managing interest. Of course you'll need the buy-sell provision, but also make sure that even if a third party obtains an interest, that it's only a Class B (ownership-only) type.

Have a business valuation done every time stock ownership changes hands so that there's a clear record of value transfer. Also do this at the time of the marriage so that your partner's spouse can't later claim in the pre-nup, "I didn't know what I was giving up."

The pre-nup needs to include a provision that active appreciation is not divisible with respect to the company (and here's the key) unless it exceeds $X or Y% growth in Z years. If you just say "never ever" no court will honor that. Give some clearer boundaries and the court says, "Okay, now it's clear you actually thought about this" and they're more likely to honor it.

All of that in mind, when it comes to the actual divorce, if you can plan a few years in advance (assuming you're the one to initiate), I wrote up one potential strategy here for decreasing the value of the business and your income for divorce purposes while actually growing the business for all other purposes at the same time.

Lots more to say, but that's the gist of the important stuff that doesn't always get talked about. I didn't want to repeat too much of what was already said here. Sepean covered a good chunk of things.

Tag: /u/GCOW30

What's the big deal about this RP stuff?

1 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That's a good point - and one I tend to agree with. But I just got reamed for making this exact point on MRP, where one of the flaired people hammered that RP is about nothing more than sexual strategy and trying to make it something more is wrong, or something like that.

I usually describe it that RP is a descriptive praxeology of how the world works, but TRP/MRP delve into prescriptive principles about how to use that descriptive understanding for the benefit of oneself (TRP and MRP) or one's marriage (MRP to some degree). To that end, the "sexual strategy" is not "RP" in a pure sense - it's only TRP/MRP/RPWo/RPWi/etc., and to some extent RPC. RPC (or at least my vision for it) prefers to embrace the praxeology in its descriptive form as having value in and of itself, while still working within a pragmatic application toward prescribed goals.

What I mean by that is something unique that TRP/MRP could never understand. They have concluded that a man sets his own goals and determines his own measure for success (unless you're 88Will88, in which case he decides the measure of success for everyone else). In RPC we, by virtue of our faith, accept that God, the author of RP descriptive praxeology, intended the order of those things for a particular purpose that we play a part in, and that our fulfillment of that purpose is the measure of our success. That isn't to say we can't have lesser goals. My marital sex life satisfaction might not be the overarching purpose for why God created the world the way he did or what he wants me to pursue in life, but as a sub-goal it is a worthy cause and one appropriate for conversation here. But if that is my only measure of success apart from God's intentions for his people, then I have lost sight of pseudo-objective reality in what Scripture dictates.

Your wife is a whore and you should divorce her

1 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I've read the art of war. Will have to check out this one.

Your wife is a whore and you should divorce her

1 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Haha, touche.

Your wife is a whore and you should divorce her

1 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

if that were true, they'd treat the whore wife as a "cost of doing business" and be done with it.

Nah, that's not how people think. If you have a guy who loves his job, makes good money, has flexible hours, etc. - but there's that one person in the office who just gets on his nerves ... he may well prefer to keep the benefits of the job and deal with that guy rather than changing jobs. But he'd be a fool to stay and not try to work on improving that one negative aspect. You don't say, "Oh well, it's the cost of doing business. I'll just let him keep being an idiot and annoy me all the time." No, you set boundaries with the guy, try to make friends, try to get your boss in on the situation, etc. - all to fix the problem.

So, if a guy likes his marriage but the sex life isn't quite satisfying, he may do well to stay, but that doesn't mean he's "desperate" just because he goes to an internet forum to ask for help, nor does it mean that sex has all of a sudden become the most important thing to him. It simply means he'd like to work on his weak areas to take a good thing and make it better. This isn't true of all guys, but I'm confident it's true of some.

I had an epiphany this week

1 upvotes · 22 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Acting like a doormat is not a show of love. Or if it is, it's a show of just how cheap your love is.

How not to show butthurt when turned down

1 upvotes · 22 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

Good point.

Starting to recognize and pass Fitness Tests. Am I doing this right?

1 upvotes · 21 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed.

Based discussion on sex with my middle-school daughter

1 upvotes · 21 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

As with most things in life, discipleship is the answer. Disciple your daughter, or if your wife is mature enough and fluent with discipleship as a process, have her do it. Either way is fine (I usually oppose cross-gender discipleship, but parent-child is fine).

/u/ruizbujc disciplined me and wrote a book on the process. I'm sure he'd give it to you for free. If you can set her sights on God's Kingdom first, all the rest will follow. Matthew 6:33 all the way!

Starting to recognize and pass Fitness Tests. Am I doing this right?

1 upvotes · 21 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I probably wasn't clear on that. I meant that as a metaphor for the situation at hand. If you can get to a point where you can still be content in your relationship with your wife even if your marriage totally blew up in your face (not arrogant playful jerkiness, but calm peace), that's when you're most likely to be able to save your marriage and improve upon what it ever was before.

Do you believe that women hate each other?

1 upvotes · 18 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Thanks :)

What we can learn from the feast-day of the Dormition of the Theotokos.

1 upvotes · 18 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting. I'm all for confession - but I tend to promote it as being slightly more public (discuss things openly in small groups and not just to a priest).

Episcopalian? Eek. There are two denominations in mainline Protestantism (maybe three) that I technically can't reject as "non-Christian," but I really want to ... and that's one of them :/ Sorry. That said, his attraction to RC gives me more confidence, even with my concerns about RC ;)

How marriage changes things

1 upvotes · 18 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWives started plotting different points from our relationship on there

I've done the same thing! Very helpful to me.

"discipleship", do you not find that it's a fairly vague goal to have?

The way the western church defines discipleship, yes - it's incredibly vague. In a blog post from the guy who discipled me: "It means everything and nothing at the same time." (he would actually advocate I use the phrase "disciplemaking" instead of "discipleship," but old habits die hard). But Jesus teaches disciplemaking with a clear process - another path to follow. If you look back at that relationship graph, switch to the upper-right corner and you'll see a similar pattern for a discipleship culture.

Do you have more specific tasks within discipleship, or is it simply a way of conducting your life?

This is actually one of three full-length books I've written (the other two are fiction). It can probably be really overwhelming without the book to walk you through it, but this is a one-page illustration of the entire book. You'll note that the 4 distinct phases match the 4 circles in the upper-right graph (link again for reference).

Discipleship in a Christian sense is designed by God to be the spiritual truth that the family structure was meant to point toward. That's why there are a lot of parallels between the two graphs. If I were to re-make the upper-right "discipleship culture" graph, I'd replace "relationship" with "spiritual joy," but because that's derived from the relationship itself I figure it's close enough :D

Do you often discuss openly with your life how you're both engaging in discipleship together?

It goes in phases. Sometimes we're just so in sync that we don't need to talk about it - we're fluent just by virtue of doing things together and being around one another. Other times, especially when it becomes a challenge to keep up, we'll have an intentional heart-to-heart.

Here's the fun part (and women on this sub should appreciate this), a good friend of mine once commented: A good marriage IS discipleship. That is, husbands must disciple their wives. This is the essence of godly leadership in a home. Of course, this comes with what I originally said about discipleship - it's not about rote teaching; it's about purposeful, loving, intentional relationships.

As with men I disciple, I set the agenda. I have a purpose for the relationship and what I want to see happen as a result. Love is the medium through which I accomplish that purpose. Every interaction is born of love - not just a gooey emotional love (which leads to beta-dom, which is not love), but one of clean and decisive action designed for the best interests of the relationship and my wife. I execute on decisions toward the purpose with intention. There's no being lackadaisical about it - every action is designed to take us one step closer to that purpose, even deciding when to rest or just goof off.

In fact, if you go back to my one-page book summary, you'll note in the "equipping" phase (which is the meat of discipleship), I list three things that must be kept in perfect balance:

- fun and games
- personal issues addressed
- life and ministry skills training

The same three apply to marriage. If you can't just relax and have fun, the "loving" aspect of the relationship will die. If you don't address personal issues ("my mom just died," "I'm lonely," "the kids are stressing me out!") you will never be able to take any steps toward your purpose. If you're not helping your spouse develop the life/ministry skills necessary to fulfill the purpose/mission, then you lack intentionality in the relationship.

The way God designed these processes (marriage and discipleship) to parallel one another so perfectly astounds me everyday. But it makes sense. After all, Jesus calls himself the "bridegroom" and the church is known as "the bride of Christ" (kind of weird that I have to be both a husband and a bride, but it works and I understand my wife better because of it!); and God even calls himself his people's "husband." Anyway ... sorry if I'm boring you, but this is really my life passion. So, get me started talking about discipleship and I won't stop! Haha.

What we can learn from the feast-day of the Dormition of the Theotokos.

1 upvotes · 18 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I've been pretty much everywhere too ... except Catholic :p Not that I have anything against Catholic people; I just have too many fundamental disagreements with their theology that every time I try to give it a chance, I just can't get over too many hurdles. It doesn't help that 35% of my church is ex-Catholic.

What we can learn from the feast-day of the Dormition of the Theotokos.

1 upvotes · 17 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

but I also think RP and Christian Masculinity can be a bit forced too

I can certainly see that.

selfless giving without expecting anything in return

Here's the thing, though - Jesus does expect something in return, just as RP does. RP says, "If she doesn't respond, next her." Jesus says, "If people don't respond to the grace I offer ... next." I'm not going to make a theological declaration that the Holy Spirit ever stops working on someone, but we certainly have the ability to callous our hearts. God won't force it; he just goes on about his business, building his kingdom through those who actually will accept his grace.

fulfillment of God's promise. She is called the New Eve and has chosen the abundance of God's love.

Help me understand this better. I've heard people say this before, but I've never understood the Scriptural backing for it. I won't argue with whatever answer you give, I just want to know.

When you're a beta male who cannot give her the comfort, structure, and masculinity she needs, you are, in effect, pushing her to Hell.

This flows well with the parallels I've seen between husband-wife and Christ-church. Well said.

When you have become the Alpha, she now has a choice whether to accept Heaven, or Hell.

Well, I'd say "the perfect Alpha/Beta blend." Again, even MRP acknowledges that we have to have some beta traits. Pure alpha might be sexual heaven, but it would be a total nightmare for the wife everywhere else if beta comforts were entirely absent.

What we can learn from the feast-day of the Dormition of the Theotokos.

1 upvotes · 17 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I have trouble seeing the connection here, or maybe it just seems forced. Either way, I'm always intrigued at the practices of other sects. I considered switching to orthodoxy at one point a couple years ago. I really do value the sense of tradition you all have. It is something that many protestants often inappropriately ignore. Thanks for sharing!

Supportive Relationships Linked To Willingness To Pursue Opportunities

1 upvotes · 17 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWives

Cool framework for the study they did, but isn't the result something common sense would have shown anyway? It boils down to this: "If someone's encouraging you, you're more likely to do something risky/rewarding than if you're not getting encouragement or being discouraged."

Ok ASKMRP, riddle me THIS!!!

1 upvotes · 17 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

This makes a lot of sense.

That led to her being disgusted at my touch because she knew what it meant.

Yeah, I was there. Conditioning her to accept physical touch without thinking I had an expectation of sex was a very difficult task, but also a very crucial one. If she thought it meant sex, she'd cringe because she didn't want sex most of the time. But, once she knew it was just about touch and not sex, her LMR shield dropped (or more accurately: never came up) in response to my touch. Result? The touch would actually make her horny sometimes (not every time). So, where previously she'd reject the touch because she didn't want sex, accepting the touch turned her attitude around so that she actually did want sex in a large minority of incidences (maybe 40%).

How marriage changes things

1 upvotes · 17 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWives

What exactly is discipleship for a Christian?

The short definition: Developing purposeful, loving, intentional relationships with others to model Christ-likeness in your own life, then help them do the same.

Or maybe to reword it better, it's teaching others how to follow Jesus and be more like him, but accomplishing this through living life alongside one another so that your life rubs off on them (intentionally, not passively) and not just rote classroom-type teachings.

If your wife had not have come on board with it, would you have pursued a different purpose with her?

I would not have given up the mission of discipleship in my own life, but for the sake of my marriage I would have pursued something she could have gotten on board with - it just couldn't have been my highest priority. That said, I have the capacity to be 100% all-in on multiple things. She's more of a one-at-a-time person, so I could make that work legitimately, but if she had already committed to another purpose, that would have been really hard to pull her away from. But for her, she has trouble figuring out what she actually wants out of life, usually just going through the motions. That's where it's my job as her husband to lead her in finding a purpose, which is what I did :D

Just for fun: What's the dumbest thing you've ever said to your spouse?

1 upvotes · 17 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Nice.

Just for fun: What's the dumbest thing you've ever said to your spouse?

1 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Hahaha - I would have loved to see that reaction! Glad you didn't say it, though :p

205 - How to Lead

1 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm definitely an investigator/delegator. I'm probably weakest at coaching or life-sharing, though. I tend to inherently reject coaching because I naturally analyze things and formulate conclusions very quickly, so the open-ended nature of coaching, where I don't have a preset destination I'm leading someone toward ... that's hard for me.

Just for fun: What's the dumbest thing you've ever said to your spouse?

1 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Oh my! That's hilarious.

The Dangers of so-called "Biblical Counseling"

1 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Well said. To be clear, though, the 99% was a reference to so-called "biblical" counselors who don't approach counseling from a Gospel-centered standpoint. Even so, the % of Wk, BP marriage counselors is probably also pretty high.

As noted, there's only 1 out of 30 that I've known who I would trust as a marriage counselor - and she is very highly respected among the male clients I refer to her. Of course, I may be a little biased because she (after I started utilizing her for referral purposes in exclusivity) has adopted everything I wrote here and utilizes it as the foundation for all of her marriage counseling. So, it's hard to go against someone who is using a model that I employ myself (originally created by ruizbuja).

Just for fun: What's the dumbest thing you've ever said to your spouse?

1 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Haha ... both good ones.

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

1 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This is a very intriguing idea I hadn't considered. Excellent point!

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

1 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Yeah, our Sienna has the doors, but not the tailgate. But my wife is also relatively tall. The doors really help when you have 4 kids.

WISNIFG TL;DR Edition!

1 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Was about to say the same thing. I concur.

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

1 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Actually, I just had a case a few months back where we included interest income from a guy's IRA. But you're right, that's pretty rare. It's rare because it's passive income when usually only active income is included in support calculations. Your K1 income is active. Sorry :/

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

1 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Exactly.

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

1 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Ah, I've gotten my impala and malibu both past 200k (i think they were around 220k each when I traded them in). But you're right, Toyotas will always last much longer. But there's also a decent price hike to get there. ~50% price increase for ~50% longevity increase.

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

1 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Nah, every car I've owned (and my wife too, before the Sienna) has been a Chevy. So, I may be biased there.

Job 31 - Prime example of an RP conversation

1 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Well said!

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

1 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

That's what my wife drives ;) I opted for a Chevy Traverse and I love it!

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

1 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I don't think there was a potential new guy. If there had been, she likely would have filed to get out. But remember: the guy initiated this process both times, so it's not like she saw it coming. As a result, she hadn't been intending to leave in the first place.

Why your wife should work at a real job

1 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Nah, if she's going to make a negative assertion, she's the one who needs more than her word to back it up. The bias exists, but it doesn't typically swing that far. If it's he-said/she-said, the court will assume 50/50 without some evidence beyond testimony alone to pull things out of that gravitational center.

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

1 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

our income is 60/40

My particular county does a 50/50 to 55/45 split of income, so you might still end up paying some support if you were here. That said, it wouldn't be much. More to the point, my county is probably the most disadvantageous in the country for support purposes toward men. The neighboring counties all use a 60/40 split like you have, so guaranteed no support there. I've even seen some use a 70/30. I've heard of other states using a 20% cap as well (I think it may have been Texas).

But yes, "earning potential" is huge.

Why your wife should work at a real job

1 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

what are some key strategies to setting yourself up the best to at least share 50/50 custody of the children?

Yep, the other post will address this in more detail. I also made a post about "the merits of shared parenting" a couple weeks back, addressing many crummy arguments and why they don't hold weight if you know how to argue against them (i.e. simply by challenging the false assumptions inherent in them), so check my post history for that one too.

are there some other key points that may not be so obvious that can help ensure equal parenting and custody rights in the event of divorce?

Yeah, shared parenting assumes you can communicate freely and openly with your spouse in a civil manner. So, it's not just about how involved you are with the kids - it's about showing you can be civil with their mom too. No cussing her out, no manipulation games, etc. Also, make sure you're internally whole as well - no drug abuse, no bringing other women home every other night, etc.

Welcome to Red Pill Christians

1 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Great to have you along :)

Personally, I'd wager I agree with most of what you'd have to say on the subjects of marriage and desire. Although I've usually gone against the Catholic view of contraception, I believe it's a noble view that shouldn't be dismissed readily. Just make sure when discussing disputable matters that it's not in a condemning, condescending way and we should be good ;)

The idea of a discord channel (I've never used IRC) is a good one, but I'm not sure how much participation there would be. Maybe when we get over 1,000 subscriptions here first? I don't know. I'll chat with my buddy who's an expert on discord stuff to see what all would be involved in running something like that :)

WISNIFG, NMMNG, 48 laws, and rational male conflicting topics

1 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

You'll never find perfect overlap. That said, many people over-identify things as manipulative or otherwise try to over-moralize manipulation.

- Over-Identify: Calling things "manipulation" that aren't. People who use "manipulate" in an accusatory manner do so in one of two contexts: (1) when deceit is involved to coerce behavior, or (2) when it's honest, but one side is advantaged and the manipulated party is harmed. If the other person suffers no harm and you're not being deceitful about it, there's no problem and it's not the type of manipulation that warrants shaming. In this sense, rewarding good behavior and punishing bad behavior is not manipulative. Nobody accuses parents of "manipulating" their children when we do this. We call it teaching. Your spouse needs to know healthy boundaries for how to interact with you and when you do these things you're not manipulating her, you're teaching her.
- Over-Moralize: Condemning some types of manipulation that are perfectly appropriate. The dictionary definition defines manipulation with the words: "cleverly, unfairly, or unscrupulously." The latter two were addressed above, but someone could say "cleverly" could still apply to all kinds of other things. In this sense, it would be idiotic to condemn parents for employing "clever" tactics to teach their children to function well in society. Technically they are controlling and influencing behavior in a clever way (dictionary definition of manipulation), but everyone would agree that they are probably doing right by their children, so it's idiotic to condemn all manipulation as immoral.

Don't get caught in either of those traps.

Need some advice to see what I did wrong today

1 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/askTRP

WISNIFG. I'm not sure what else there is to say. Read it.

Career beta...just took TRP.

1 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

Wife says "okay" in a tone of voice that let's me know she's disappointed and thinks I'm being unreasonable.

How often do you think your wife does things that are unreasonable, or treats you in an unreasonable manner? Like only giving starfish sex or limiting it to once every couple months? Why do you care if she thinks you're being unreasonable?

Am I being a dick?

Not to be too childish, but: "She started it!" Don't be that way just to get revenge, but sometimes you have to go into "jerk territory" for a while to figure that side of things out so you can establish a better balance after you've mastered both sides.

Why don't I just take the few seconds to make the order then she's happy and I'm a nice guy?

Because it shows that you can't enforce your boundaries, so she'll walk all over you in more important areas too. Start small and work your way up, not the other way around. This is a perfect small thing to start with.

Is this a test or a reasonable request?

If she's equally capable, it's a test.

I'm thinking I should have been more playful. Maybe texted her back something like "I'd be much more interested in ordering you a satin teddy." That kind of text isn't something I've ever sent before and would be totally out of character for me. What do you guys think...suggestions?

Playful is good, but if you do too much too fast she'll get a jarring sensation with your character. Going Rambo can result even from positive aspects of your change and not just saying "no" all the time. It's the whole 1,000 foot rope thing - move too fast and the rope will snap and she'll be left stranded. Reel her in gently. Save being playful for when she's adapted to the smaller changes you're making first, adding it in when you feel like the "out of character" feel of it would be more in-character because you're more fit and confident at the time you try to pull it off. Try to be sexy/funny before you have reason to express that kind of confidence and she might actually lose respect for you because it shows you don't know your actual value on the SMP, especially within the marriage.

Welcome to Red Pill Christians

1 upvotes · 14 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Glad to have you :)

Thank you from a SF Bay Area Christian

1 upvotes · 14 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I should have clarified "sinful lust." Desire itself is okay to foster and cultivate with someone you're dating.

CMV: Can anyone break my fall? I feel like on my current trajectory I'm gonna end up redpill.

1 upvotes · 12 August 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

I agree. To quote myself:

both genders experience each of these

What you're describing is really an "ideal world" scenario that doesn't exist yet (huge emphasis on that "yet").

The reality is that, at least as of human biology today, the evidence is that there really are genuine differences. Sexual desire is triggered by chemicals like adrenaline and testosterone, which are undeniably found in higher quantities in men than in women. Is this purely biological/evolutionary or a product of culture conditioning men toward activities that increase these levels? Doesn't matter. The facts are the facts. Also, women have more serotonin receptors than men, meaning they can process more of it - and higher serotonin levels has been repeatedly linked with a decreased desire for sex. Also, men have higher dopamine levels, and dopamine is released in response to the anticipation of a pleasurable experience (in this case: sex). All of these chemicals are found in both genders, as you say, but their levels are very different.

Then there are the more emotionally connective chemicals: vasopressin and oxytocin. The levels in both genders are fairly close, but vasopressin synergizes with testosterone, making its effects far stronger in men, whereas oxytocin synergizes with estrogen, making its effects far stronger in women. Vasopressin has some pair-bonding effects that develop emotional connectivity, but it also distinctly creates a feeling of separation and dampening of emotional responses toward more rational behaviors. Oxytocin, on the other hand, actually inhibits cognitive function and encourages emotional extremes, with primary effects of promoting pair-bonding, connectivity to offspring, the "emotional connectivity" women feel in relationships, etc.

These biochemical differences are not things we "teach men ... and women" - they are the current state of our physical makeup. Yes, both genders have all of these chemicals - but the levels are not the same for each. As a result, each gender has naturally different biological inclinations. Are there exceptions? Absolutely. When RP guys say things like "AWALT" they're idiots if they take it to be a blanket statement. In fact, a recent post on r/askmrp revealed (from one of the mods of r/marriedredpill) that this really means "All women can be like that, don't be surprised." A distinct trait about humans from virtually all other animals is that we have the ability to deny our biological makeup to function as we choose. But, on the whole, our biological makeup is going to influence things more often than not.

So, I get really frustrated when someone says, "Well, I have some friends where the girl has a super high libido and the guy just wants to cuddle all the time." Great. But a few examples of outliers doesn't change the nature of the bell curve itself. In fact, any population distribution model assumes that there will be outliers. Everything I said above is based on general trends and population distributions - not as a fanatical "EVERYONE IS LIKE THIS!!!!!!!!!" viewpoint.

Thank you, and advice please

1 upvotes · 12 August 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

Do you have any advice on how to do this/whether to do this?

On TRP it's not worth it at all. You'd be wasting your time. On r/marriedredpill you'll have a voice if your ideas stand on their own merit, but if you think you'll get any credit just because you're a girl, think again.

r/redpillwomen will probably allow your thoughts and suggestions, and numerous guys from other RP subs tend to participate there, though they're usually the type who might actually agree with you.

r/RPChristians goes another level into directly encouraging conversations about the morality of red pill thinking and what's appropriate and not - and it actively rejects things that don't stand muster against the Bible, while accepting all else. So, that might be a good place to have that discussion too. A buddy of mine recently made this post, titled: What's the big deal about this RP stuff?, and it got some good conversation going.

How to get my wife into RPW?

1 upvotes · 11 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

it may be impossible for me to influence this.

As previously noted, finding someone else she trusts to recommend the book to her is the way to go. I've used this tactic on my wife on the past (pre-RP days) and it's worked quite well. That said, this is easier for those of us in Christian circles because there's usually a small group leader, pastor, discipler, etc. you can work through. Outside of a church context, it's a lot harder to find someone like that.

to the claim I'm "trying to fix her" - I'm not

Ah, but you are. You're just trying to give a different perspective on the same behavior. Whether I look at a moose from the front or the back, it's still a moose.

The fact that you want to change something about her means you're trying to "fix" something about her. She's happy ... but not happy enough. You want to "fix" that so that she's living within the bounds of what you expect - even if you're satisfied with her current happiness level.

But fine, let's get technical with language. In this sense, on the scale from "falling apart" < neutral < "best ever" ... fixing is technically the "falling apart < neutral" phase and improving is the "neutral < best ever" phase. You're trying to improve her.

Regardless, it's all on the same spectrum. The fact that she's already somewhere between "neutral" and "best ever" doesn't change the fact that you're still trying to slide her up the same scale.

Use red pill to get out of a dead bedroom

1 upvotes · 11 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This is some good insight. I'll digest this and maybe plan to start up something similar in a while.

How did you go about finding people for the initial group outside the church? Or do you mean you took people from your church but just didn't meet in the church building itself?

What's the big deal about this RP stuff?

1 upvotes · 11 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

The explanation given is the best I've got :/ I've read a ton of Rollo, but haven't started any of Dalrock yet.

Sticking to MRP sidebar material first and although he's linked somewhere, I don't think he's on the mandatory list.

What's the big deal about this RP stuff?

1 upvotes · 11 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, fair enough.

106 - What doesn't work

1 upvotes · 11 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Haha

What's the big deal about this RP stuff?

1 upvotes · 11 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm confused. Fixed what? Noticed what?

Either way, cuss word or not, I approved the comment :p I'll probably approve most of them, but when cuss words are used I'll probably still have it filtered so I can see the context and manually approve them, as there have been some blatant trolls who have cussed around just for the sake of it, and an auto-mod with manual approval is easier than me scouring every post every day. I should update the rules to reflect this.

What's the big deal about this RP stuff?

1 upvotes · 11 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Very true.

What's the big deal about this RP stuff?

1 upvotes · 11 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting. I keep meaning to get around to reading some Dalrock, but I've been focusing so heavily on other sidebar material that I haven't gotten around to any of his stuff yet. Is it worth skipping ahead or should I stick to primary sidebar stuff first?

It's too bad he and Rollo didn't get that book together. It certainly would have ruffled some feathers. But, again, I'm still curious how a mainline Christian community would accept it. I think the political climate has changed enough after the election that the church might just be willing to take a drastically different look at all this - but if we wait another 5 years, that small window might be gone.

Use red pill to get out of a dead bedroom

1 upvotes · 11 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I also enjoy running cultural marxists and other kinds of communists out of my church. It's like a sport to me.

Haha, that's a very interesting goal. How do you spot them, and what do you do to run them out?

Also, I saw in one of your old posts that you were running NMMNG groups or something. What did you do to start these up? Were they online or in person? Mostly people in the church or in your community? Did your pastor sanction this, or was it on the side? What types of things did you talk through? I've thought about doing something similar, as there is a huge need for this in my church and I have enough of a voice with my pastor that if I said I wanted to do it, he'd endorse it and help me get the ball rolling.

What's the big deal about this RP stuff?

1 upvotes · 11 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm sorry to hear all this. Unfortunately, I see very domineering men cause women to file for divorce frequently. What I can say is that while TRP might prompt men to be this way, MRP does not. As I noted in 103, TRP focuses solely on physical intimacy, which comes almost entirely from domineering, alpha traits. MRP acknowledges the additional need for emotional intimacy, where certain beta traits are required in order to keep a lasting relationship.

As cholomite says: Tingles without fuzzies won't last; fuzzies without tingles are worthless. It sounds like your dad was terrible with fostering warm fuzzy feelings, so his first marriage to your mom didn't last. My parents were the opposite, having divorced because my dad was too beta (and admittedly so). But with my job, I now see both ends of the spectrum quite regularly.

Anyway, jacktenofhearts once wrote a post chewing a guy out for building an impenetrable iron frame. The fact that it was impenetrable meant he couldn't let anyone in. And even if they did get in, it was decorated with broken glass and pointy nails. Nobody wants to live in someone's frame if that's what it feels like - so they just leave.

I don't know what /u/BluepillProfessor would have to say about it - but my current theory is that the man creates the frame, the wife gets to live in it and decorate it however she likes. That is, his boundaries are not to be broken, but he needs to know the unique ways that she needs to feel loved in order to be comfortable within his frame. If he tries to choose exclusively how he will express love without concern for how she needs to receive it (of course, based on how she reacts, not necessarily what she says), he's creating a frame for the partner he wants to have, not necessarily the one he actually has. This is where there might be room for compromise. For example, someone on MRP just made a post about how his wife likes Robert Downey Jr., so he sent her a gif of him saying something - he's working within his frame, but also making use of what he knows she likes, decorating the area inside his frame with what he know works for her uniquely. I think this is healthy.

How do you not care?

1 upvotes · 10 August 2017 · /r/askTRP

To "feel abundant" you have to be abundant (at least at first). You have a scarcity mentality. You're not getting enough sex, you don't have enough time, you probably don't have enough money ... as long as you're focusing on what you don't have enough of, you'll never feel abundant.

Boss offers you overtime? "Nah, I'm good. Don't need the extra hours." Maybe you think you do, but learn to budget without it. As soon as you don't need your boss's freebies anymore and you're cool with your budget, go ahead and take those extra hours - not because you don't have enough money, but because you can utilize that extra money in some other way to cultivate abundance in a different area of life.

Like time. Use some of that extra cash to have groceries delivered to your door after you click a few buttons online. Pay someone to clean your house for you. Give the neighbor kid $20 to mow your lawn every couple weeks. Then you'll have not a scarcity of time, but an abundance of it.

An abundance of time lets you read sidebar, lift, develop confidence - go into monk mode. Then, when you come out, you'll finally be able to ask out that girl you've been pining over for the last 3 years - and she'll probably actually talk to you because you've had the time to talk to other girls too, now that you've got an abundance of muscle, abundance of time, abundance of money, abundance of game, etc.

You don't actually have to be rich to start this process. You just have to learn to accept what you're at and realize how blessed you actually are. I hate to pull this card ... but go to some African third world country and go see what actual scarcity is like. You have abundance right now. But culture tells you you don't have enough and you need more. Screw culture. Learn to be content with what you've got and even less - then rework your budget to live on even less - and your mentality will be one of abundance with what you've got, while freeing up cash that will actually lead to the things you want, not the things that placate you (like chipotle or video games or netflix).

What's the big deal about this RP stuff?

1 upvotes · 10 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I would love to write a book on all this someday :p I seriously doubt there exists anything along these lines on Christian bookshelves right now. The question is - would an agent or publisher be willing to accept something so heavily against the grain of mainline Christian culture?

Need help pulling my life together after rape charge

1 upvotes · 10 August 2017 · /r/askTRP

Correct.

203 - Lifting and Diet

1 upvotes · 10 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I think that's a great idea for a post ;) Now go start writing!

Is Red Pill truly congruent with Holiness?

1 upvotes · 10 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Well said :) I think this is about how I sum it up now.

203 - Lifting and Diet

1 upvotes · 10 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

You may well be right ;)

203 - Lifting and Diet

1 upvotes · 9 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks :) This is great information.

203 - Lifting and Diet

1 upvotes · 9 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Good points :) I'll check in on those articles! Thanks for sharing.

203 - Lifting and Diet

1 upvotes · 9 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for sharing - do you recall what that paper was or where a copy could be found?

As far as a quick workout goes, I've had a few times where I've only had half an hour as well. In these instances, if I happen to be at the gym (usually because I got there late but my kids want to swim), I'll do a 3x5x5 focusing on bench, squat, shoulder press, and sit-ups. It goes something like this:

- Bench: 5 reps = ~30 seconds
- Situps: 10 second transition, 30 seconds to complete (20-25 reps)
- 20 second rest after the sit-ups (also gives time to change weights if necessary)
 - Total Time: 1:30/set ... 5 sets = 7.5 minutes. Rest for 2.5 minutes to the 10 minute mark (this also gives time to set up the next exercise with appropriate weights).
- Squat: 5 reps = ~30 seconds
- Calf raises: 10 second rest first, then 30 seconds (40-50 reps)
- 20 second rest after the calf raises (also gives time to change weights if necessary)
 - Total Time: 1:30/set ... 5 sets = 7.5 minutes. Rest for 2.5 minutes to the 20 minute mark (this also gives time to set up the next exercise with appropriate weights).
- Shoulder press: 5 reps = ~30 seconds
- Rest/stretch for about 30 seconds (also gives time to change weights if necessary)
 - Total Time: 1:00/set ... 5 sets = 5 minutes, taking you to the 25 minute mark - you've still got 5 minutes to grab your bag and head out, or that gives you more buffer for resting, if you need it somewhere :)

This is, of course, a HIIT routine. HIIT is pretty much the best way to deal with time conscious lifting/cardio. Ideally, with more time you can get better muscle tear (which is what causes strength-gain and the bulky look) if you allow for longer rests, as that allows the lactic acids to subside, giving you the ability to maintain higher weights for each set. But, when I do this type of routine, I'm usually working at about 85-90% of the weight I'd do on any other day because I know with the much shorter rest periods my muscle fatigue will necessitate a faster drop (although my first set is always a max set, even with this - I just lower it quicker).

203 - Lifting and Diet

1 upvotes · 9 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Good thoughts! Just as a quick thought - I seem to recall you're a woman. Do you think there should be any differences in how women v. men should focus their exercise/lifting/diet?

For example, many men want to bulk up to get huge muscles. This means power weights with a higher caloric intake than a normal cut diet would allow for. However, most body-building women are relatively unattractive to the majority of men, as many guys prefer a woman with a toned body rather than a bulky one. What's your take on this distinction? Which do you pursue?

Obviously, as a man I can only talk about what I know works for me as a man. As it seems you know well what you're talking about, would you be interested in writing a post on what lifting, cardio, and diet should look like to hit more feminine goals for what a body should look like?

Can you divorce a woman if she lied about her number of sexual partners? (within biblical rules)

1 upvotes · 9 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Catholics absolutely do not believe that Mary was sinless

Interesting. I've heard this from at least a dozen Catholics over the years. So, I googled the question and one of the top results was www.catholic.com affirming this notion that Mary was born and lived her entire life without sin.

I fully believe that many Catholic churches don't preach this, but one also can't say Catholics "absolutely do not believe" this when catholic.com itself is professing this view :/

I never fail to be surprised at what Protestants believe about Catholics.

I fully agree with you there. Many people are really deceived about what Catholics actually believe. But I, personally, try not to make a claim about Catholics that I haven't researched or heard professed from a priest directly.

How come RP is never about trying to make a relationship work?

1 upvotes · 8 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

things have been good. We don't argue. I get sex. Blowjobs all the time Etc.

So ... what's the problem? If what you're doing is working, keep doing it. It's often said here, "If you always do what you've always done, you'll always get what you've always got." If you're one of the rare people where this can be applied positively, then apply it.

But I'd like to better myself as a man.

To what end? And whose definition of "man"? If you want acceptance in this community because you're a true "RP Man," go for it - if that's a higher priority to you than getting what you want in your relationship. But if you're trying to be the type of man who gets everything he wants from his girl ... then go be that. If you find what you're doing isn't working, then come back here and get some things straightened out. But if there's no actual problem, I wouldn't mess with what works (unless you can see an inevitable breakdown in the future due to unsustainability, or any number of other issues).

Being Christlike vs. Being Used

1 upvotes · 7 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

1. Totally understood.
2. I'm not going to deny your experience for what it was. But the literature I remember reading a few years back was also fairly persuasive. To be clear, Christianity has similar commands and expectations, and when I mention "body shaming," it's subconscious and psychological, never overt. Nobody will ever say, "You should be ashamed of your body!" It's the fact that it must remain concealed that makes people develop subconscious thought-processes about it being "bad" to reveal their bodies, which can be difficult to overcome later.

In fact, it bothers me that I have no good explanation as to how Christian women dress so worldly that they can't be told apart.

And right you are to be bothered by this!

but I can't distinguish the average Christian woman from the masses

Well, you have to remember that the "average" self-identified Christian is not actually Christian.

/u/ruizbujc did a research study on this once, doing in-person interviews with a few hundred people to try to figure out what % of the church would meet a basic standard of "saved." You'll have to ask him about his criteria, but it was fairly low-level basic stuff that most people would agree with.

His conclusion? 18.65% of church-goers/3.8% of self-identifiers would meet the criteria of "saved."

Okay, I was curious, so I looked up his comment. Here's his criteria:

- Can "articulate what they believe and why"
- "Their beliefs affect their daily life."
- "Can give specific examples of how Jesus had impacted the way they live" (as opposed to general examples).

Even if we ignore the "saved" language (if you disagree with his standard, which is fine), the bottom line is still that 81.35% of church-goers can't articulate a way that Jesus changed their life. This means that 81.35% of church-goers can't acknowledge their attire as something that has been affected by Jesus. This number rises to 96.2% when dealing with all self-identifiers (i.e. including those who call themselves Christians, but don't actually attend church regularly).

Bottom line: your point is well-taken and statistically verified :p

Why don't we look more like out nuns who dress like Mary?

Is that why nuns dress that way? I've never really thought about it :p How would they know what clothes Mary wore?

201 - Healthy Sexual Desire v. Lust/Coveting

1 upvotes · 7 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

This is a common misperception - that Jesus is "adding" to the law. Jesus is referencing the law that the Pharisees love to quote, then saying, "But you forgot about this other law over here."

To put it more formulaic:

- "You have heard that it was said" = the law the Pharisees love to quote
- "But I tell you" = he's referencing other parts of the OT that the Pharisees were ignoring, not just making up some new standard.

In the case of "murder/anger" he's quoting a psalm that has highly paralleled language. In the case of "adultery/lust" he's quoting another of the 10 commandments that the Pharisees had ignored in favor of using the easy "adultery" standard instead of "coveting."

If it was any or every woman (as some believe), that would contradict "marry, and fill the earth".

I'm not sure how that follows. Clearly someone can lust after his own wife. But for someone not his wife, the lust itself would be wrong, but more general desire, appreciation of beauty, etc. are perfectly appropriate. That desire and appreciation can still lead people toward marriage and, thereafter, procreation. But, to be clear, the command isn't to "marry and fill the earth" it's "multiply and fill the earth." There is no command that we must marry.

Quote the opposite - Paul says in 1 Cor. 7 that it's better not to marry, and Jesus says in Matthew 19:11-12 that if someone is capable of remaining unmarried, he should.

I had an epiphany this week

1 upvotes · 7 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

My recommendation on showing gratitude is simple: Don't talk. Do.

/u/ginlady mentioned a few good thoughts - strong eye contact and a little smile. Sometimes just a twinkle in your eye, expressing a deep longing for him is affirmation that he's doing things that make you desire him. Sometimes something a little more overt, like a hug or a kiss can work. Rub his back, massage his shoulders.

Although I'm not the biggest fan of the book, The 5 Love Languages addresses some ideas:

- Words of Affirmation - this is actually verbalizing your thanks.
- Physical Touch - I've already mentioned some of that. This is a big one for most guys.
- Acts of Service - Return the favor, simple enough.
- Quality Time - When he helps you, stop what you're doing, put your phone down, and just put your attention on him.
- Gift Giving - Depending on how big of a help he was, buy/make him something meaningful and note: "I just wanted to express my gratitude" or some sappier way to say that.

Just a few ideas :) But bear in mind that the world is so flooded with "talk without action" that words of affirmation tend to mean very little nowadays. If you are going to go with words, you've really got to ham it up or do something to show your seriousness, like /u/ginlady suggested.

Being Christlike vs. Being Used

1 upvotes · 7 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I just so happen to feel that modesty requires not showing cleavage and curves.

As to the conversation with you and /u/OsmiumZulu, this is what Romans 14 would call a disputable matter. Each one has their own convictions. Sometimes the Spirit legitimately leads people into believing two different things based on what He knows each can handle. Other times, it's a timing thing about when God reveals a new truth (such as a person not yet mature enough to understand something). Still other times there is just legitimately no one right answer, and it's okay to embrace that.

To that end, the message of Romans 14 is to bear with one another in our disagreements on disputable matters, not arguing over them.

All I ask is that you show me the same courtesy by accepting that what I expressed was an opinion and my ideas.

That's a fair request. If I had to guess, OZ is used to travelling in more intellectual Christian circles, where appropriate Scriptural support and terminology must accompany statements of belief, especially when those statements are made as a recommendation to others. To this end, including terminology like, "This is what the Spirit has convicted me; he may not have convicted you likewise," often abates these types of conversations into the Romans 14 framework :) I hope that helps. Otherwise, if you're having a good discussion, don't let me stand in the way :p

Being Christlike vs. Being Used

1 upvotes · 7 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

The concept behind what you're describing is a noble one. In an ideal world, everyone would be able to do this without two (off the top of my head) pitfalls coming up:

1. Falling into the same trap that Jesus ragged on the pharisees for doing: creating too many rules that went beyond the direct requirements of the law (Matthew 15/Mark 7).
 2. The psychological implications of body-shaming women. Although it could be argued that you're really exalting the value of her body by concealing it and making it something that only a prized husband gets to see ... from what I recall reading in several Muslim sources back in the day, the reverse is actually true: women get so used to hiding their bodies in public and that it's "bad" for a man to see her skin that when she gets married she has great difficulty overcoming that psychological perception that has been ingrained in her for so long that she still can't be fully open with her husband, leading to many sexual problems.
- This is virtually identical to the way the western church over-emphasizes the "sex before marriage is sin" aspect, without actually teaching on the fun of it in marriage. Because most people hear this message repeatedly during their teenage years, and even long before, they spend a very, very long time in that phase. Because they're not married for, say, a decade of hearing that, and our brains filter out inapplicable information, that's 10 years straight of hearing "sex is sin" (because "before marriage" doesn't mean anything when you know you're not married - they just think, "For me right now, sex is sin" and "right now" gets really hard to change).

Anyway, good thoughts and discussion :) Thanks for sharing your views on this! I wish more people processed information on this topic like you do. I would definitely prefer Christian women to err on the side of modesty than sluttiness. Unfortunately, outside of church itself, we're too far into slut territory and there needs to be a swing in the pendulum back a little ways.

Tag: /u/RedPillWonder (since I'm really piggy-backing on your conversation)

Also, as RPWonder noted, I'm happy to see some of your suggestions get put up on the front page for discussion :D You're always welcome to make a post. At the same time, some of those things will naturally be addressed as we continue in the series I've been doing and hearing from others, although it may take time. Due to time constraints and the mass amount of reading I do (presently on RP stuff), my free time is mostly limited to about 2 primary posts per week, which I think isn't too bad of a pace.

201 - Healthy Sexual Desire v. Lust/Coveting

1 upvotes · 7 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Well said. I like the steak example :)

The Sandbox and the Swingset, Introducing MRPW

1 upvotes · 6 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

What you're describing is attitude. I'm describing behavior. Although I agree my wife may not have had the best attitude in all of this, she did maintain a positive attitude for most of it. It is perfectly possible to engage in negative behavior with positive attitude. When my wife's attitude is positive, despite doing things I disagree with I will still interpret her intentions as noble and will not see her as a shrew. As a result, rather than blaming her negative actions on her ("She's just a shrew" mentality), I see it as a mistake or oversight that requires me to step in and solve the problem, which I'm happy and expectant to do for the good of the family (bearing in mind that most of this happened before I discovered RP).

As someone else commented, there could be a correlation with Christian couples benefiting from this, but not for the reasons noted. The "I'm stuck" mentality really isn't as present as most would think. In reality, although the church message is over-feminized as a whole, leading to an encouragement of too much beta in men, there is still the underriding baseline theology that Christian women are raised to do things with positive loving attitudes and men are told to be leaders. So, a Christian man is more prone to see these things as opportunities to lead as long as the wife does them with positive attitude. They may actually increase his attraction to her because the fail behavior mixed with positive attitude gives the occasionally attractive "ditz effect" where she's cute and needy, making him feel like he has something to contribute.

Being Christlike vs. Being Used

1 upvotes · 5 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

This is exactly what I was going to suggest.

Can you divorce a woman if she lied about her number of sexual partners? (within biblical rules)

1 upvotes · 5 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Oh, and I just checked again, but I still have no idea how to change the timer on that spam filter.

Can you divorce a woman if she lied about her number of sexual partners? (within biblical rules)

1 upvotes · 5 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

We're not ancient Hebrews, nor do we follow Jewish laws or the culture of those times.

That is, in fact, my thought on the matter. That said, there is some value in knowing the history of what we believe. As an attorney, I can't tell you how often it comes up in law that we cite outdated and overruled laws because the historical context matters.

The Taming of the Shrew: A Red Pill Analysis (X-Post from TRP)

1 upvotes · 5 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Good point.

Can you divorce a woman if she lied about her number of sexual partners? (within biblical rules)

1 upvotes · 4 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Would I practice it that way? No. Did the ancient Hebrews? Yes. If we're talking about Jewish law, we shouldn't be imputing our own views and biases on the matter - it's strictly a question of what the law meant in that culture at that time. So, "Would you ...?" is irrelevant to the academic component of the conversation that /u/RedPillWonder is trying to create.

Can you divorce a woman if she lied about her number of sexual partners? (within biblical rules)

1 upvotes · 4 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

This has been my suspicion too. That is not the case with /u/RedPillWonder, as has been made clear now :)

Can you divorce a woman if she lied about her number of sexual partners? (within biblical rules)

1 upvotes · 4 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Gotcha.

The Taming of the Shrew: A Red Pill Analysis (X-Post from TRP)

1 upvotes · 4 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

It's a great read - definitely put it up there if you're done with the rest of the sidebar.

Can you divorce a woman if she lied about her number of sexual partners? (within biblical rules)

1 upvotes · 4 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Why doesn't she have a valid reason to divorce him? Or does this thing only flow one way?

Ancient Hebrew culture legitimately didn't work both ways. So, without question about the appropriateness of how the laws worked back then (which is a much longer discussion), this questions is purely a technical matter about how the laws actually functioned in that time. Because it was a one-way law, we must discuss it in that context - unless someone disagrees about this interpretation of it being one-way.

Can you divorce a woman if she lied about her number of sexual partners? (within biblical rules)

1 upvotes · 4 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

From a purely sociological viewpoint, this is a brilliant explanation. In that light, I agree with everything you have said. But what did you mean when you said, "It is not the sex act that precludes and a no-man's, but the knowledge you gain from having sex"? I get the fingers and toes bit, but what if the misrepresentation is not something that sex would cause you to discover?

The Taming of the Shrew: A Red Pill Analysis (X-Post from TRP)

1 upvotes · 4 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Well, I'm glad they did. I was an English lit major in college, and took about every Shakespeare class that my University had to offer. I loved every second of this post. Maybe when I have some time I'll write a more full response.

The Taming of the Shrew: A Red Pill Analysis (X-Post from TRP)

1 upvotes · 3 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I was literally contemplating this exact post almost a month ago. However, I thought I read in the rules somewhere that we're not supposed to analyze fiction, and we're supposed to stick to real life examples. Maybe that was just a TRP rule?

Custody theories that could ruin you ... and the merits of shared parental rights

1 upvotes · 3 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

credit based on how many overnights the non-custodial parent has a year.

That's a stupid system. You don't pay for overnights. You pay for what happens before they go to bed.

So when you can argue the true 50/50 arrangement is happening, is that usually a deduction in the support or does the support go away?

If the income levels are relatively close, support goes away. If there's a disparity, it's a deviation of up to half the support amount, depending on the degree of the disparity.

Please don't read this as me getting out of my responsibilities.

No need to DEER. I get it.

Can you divorce a woman if she lied about her number of sexual partners? (within biblical rules)

1 upvotes · 3 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Good thoughts here! Question, though:

However, I think this could be grounds for an annulment.

At least in the US, most states cut off annulment once the couple has sex or have remained together for a certain number of years (in my state: 3). So, if the couple sleeps together on their wedding night, annulment is no longer an option. Likewise (and I actually had a case like this), if they've been "married" for 5 years but never had sex, you still can't get an annulment - must be divorce.

That said, I don't recall seeing any biblical "annulment" principles that would say whether or not this same principle would apply. What are your thoughts on the requirements of an annulment?

Can you divorce a woman if she lied about her number of sexual partners? (within biblical rules)

1 upvotes · 3 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Sorry for the automoderator. This post is approved.

That said, this is very insightful. Thanks for sharing all this! I'm not too keen on relying on Jewish resources outside the Bible or even non-biblical writings of early church fathers (other than for word-studies), but there's definitely good context there to help us understand how these things have been addressed by the church over the years, rather than automatically assuming that every generation before us handled them the same way.

He said specifically that if a man were addicted to pornography he has no right to issue a bill of divorce to his woman texting another man. I claim otherwise, on grounds that this is not a realistic foil upon which to argue. If she were committing adultery the man has every right to divorce.

Assuming you're referencing ruizbujc, I think he was saying simply that the husband had no proof that his wife actually was cheating on him. From what I know of the story he's referencing, the texts were not of a sexual nature at all - they were casual conversation. So, the man was jealous, but had no actual basis in fact for the belief that his wife was cheating on him, whereas he did know for a fact that he was committing sexual sin against his wife vis a vis the pornography. That's why it was an imbalance.

Some have commented upon the broad nature of the word "porneia" and "fornication". Etymologically these referred to specific instances. The words weren't broad. At least "fornication" isn't. It comes from a Latin word for a specific type of roof under which brothels and sluts invited men.

Interesting, I didn't know the Latin origin there. That said, porneia is the Greek word in the original text, which I do believe predates the Latin and has a significantly different meaning than the English translation "fornication." There is a lot of debate over what, exactly, porneia actually means, and the main problem is that in extrabiblical texts the word is used in so many contexts, that it's impossible to discern if Jesus meant one specific context or to incorporate all ways the word was ever used. So, we get people arguing both ways :p

And porneia is not clear about excluding premarital sex. In fact it appears the Bible permits premarital intercourse as long as it leads to marriage.

I have long held the view that biblical marriage requires two things: (1) sex and (2) mutual consent. We see that in early days, marriage ceremonies didn't even exist. Adam and Eve were "married" because they were one flesh - they had sex - and both intended to have a relational connection when they had sex.

So, if a man today rapes a woman, the sex part is there, but there's no mutual intent to create a relational connection. This is not "marriage" - it is criminal. Interestingly, though, in OT law if a man raped a woman, he was obligated to offer to marry her. So, even then the "sex even without commitment" implies that the commitment must be offered, which would culminate in marriage if accepted.

In reverse, if two people intend a relational connection, but never solidify it with sex, they are not one flesh and it is not marriage no matter how long they hold themselves out as being in a relationship.

When it comes to "casual sex," most of these encounters actually do involve some kind of a relational connection. Even if it is a one-night-stand, at least in that moment there's mutual consent and you're both saying, "I want this connection with you right now." The fact that you both decide later that you no longer care for the connection or that this decision is agreed on before having sex doesn't change anything - at the time of becoming one flesh there was a mutual intent to engage in that relational connection. So, I interpret this as a marriage being created in God's eyes. So, when someone after a ONS then goes and marries someone else through a ceremony, it is really viewed as his second wife by God, although the act of engaging in a vow makes it binding, so he cannot then leave his legal spouse in order to return to his first wife/spiritual spouse later - and when he has his wedding night sex, the deal is sealed and the new wife becomes a spiritual spouse as well.

That last paragraph is something I'm more lenient on because Scripture isn't totally clear on the point, but it seems to make sense to me. "One flesh" = marriage, as long as it was mutual.

Looking at Deuteronomy 22 and Exodus 22 rape is even permitted if the man is honorable and marries her.

Well, Deuteronomy 22:25-27 says that if she's betrothed (implying she wouldn't have consented), then the man is to be put to death. In 28-29, it's not clear that he's talking about rape. She may well have decided to go along with it, just as in the situation in 23-24, where he sleeps with her, but she didn't cry for help, so she's put to death too (again, because she's betrothed, thus the implication is that she consented to cheating on her would-be husband). When it says "he has violated her," this doesn't mean "he raped her" - it means he took her virginity without them being married, which was considered "violation" in that culture.

The Exodus 22 passage actually clarifies that the father has the right to turn down the offer of marriage, while still accepting the marriage price. If the woman was truly raped, the father would simply have to turn down the offer, accept his money, and his daughter wouldn't have to be traumatized by being forced into marriage with a rapist. Her obligation isn't to the rapist - it is to her father.

Interestingly, though, in the story of Amnon and Tamar, Amnon raped Tamar and there was no forced marriage. Even so, Tamar wanted to marry Amnon. Why? Because she wasn't a virgin anymore, so she knew that finding another husband would be nearly impossible, and lying about it would get her killed. So, by her own choice she preferred to marry her rapist over being alone for the rest of her life. Since he wouldn't marry her, she ended up alone for life anyway. It's a sad story, but that's how culture was back then.

she could refuse but this is rare: she would then on have no virginity to offer and live under shame

We don't actually have any recorded stories where a father forced his daughter to marry a rapist. The only recorded story was where Tamar wanted to, but even then they didn't end up married. So, I don't think we can speculate on the rarity of refusal when we don't even have one example of consent. But I do agree that the choice naturally implies a particular conclusion - better to marry your rapist than be alone and under shame.

If we say porneia is a catch-all condemnation of sex outside of or antecedent to marriage, we condemn our father Abraham.

True enough, but I think most people do condemn his act of sleeping with Hagar as sinful. The message of Christ is that the person may be saved, although he may commit condemnable acts. It would be far more controversial if someone were to try to argue that Abraham was without sin and that's what saved him - which would clearly be wrong conclusion. So, accepting that he sinned is of no consequence, as we accept this of all people (unless you're Catholic, in which case you probably believe Mary was also sinless ... which is just weird to me).

I have no intention of white knightting or trying to look like the law can't condemn me. I'm screwed either way if I turn to the law.

This is well said. But it only makes sense in the context of:

I must consult God and do what is right. He knows context and what to do in every situation.

... instead of

Personally, if i were married to a contentious shrew who treated me like a menstrual rag, I would divorce.

The reconciliation I'm seeing here is the same one Jesus explains for why Moses gave a certificate of divorce. "If you're married to a contentious shrew, you're probably going to end up sinning in your relationship with her in one way or another. Could you avoid it? Probably. But as a practical matter, it's not likely. This is what Jesus meant when he said, "Because of the hardness of your hearts" - you should be able to avoid sin, but you can't, so here's another option to mitigate the sin. In that situation, the option is divorce. That divorce is not justified. That is, it's still sin. But it's viewed as the lesser of the sin options if you know you are practically incapable of the righteous decision due to a hardened heart, weak/newness of faith, etc. So, I will never tell someone, "Yes, you are right to divorce under these circumstances," I have no qualms in telling them, "It's wrong to divorce under those circumstances, but it might still be the practical best conclusion for you."

As for me, I often feel stuck just beyond the bounds of this dilemma. I feel empowered enough by Christ to be able to choose righteousness by His Spirit's enabling power, even when it is a difficult choice that many others could make. As a result, if I were to try to take this course of action and divorce my wife without biblical grounds, I would be doing it with knowledge that my heart was not so hard as to be incapable of righteousness in the situation, and thus I don't know that I could choose that option. That's all stuff I haven't really spent much time dwelling on, though, so I won't ponder much further.

Can you divorce a woman if she lied about her number of sexual partners? (within biblical rules)

1 upvotes · 3 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm going to have to summon /u/ruizbujc on this one. I know he has thoughts on this and I fully endorse them.

Single Father v. Single Mother Stats

1 upvotes · 3 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Indeed.

Single Father v. Single Mother Stats

1 upvotes · 2 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

If you want to go into statistical methodology theory, technically the sample size only needs to be 30 to create a normalized distribution representative of an entire population that most statisticians will give great weight and accuracy to.

Single Father v. Single Mother Stats

1 upvotes · 2 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Good question. The answer is: I don't know. I'm not aware of any meta studies that have been done on that.

Divorce Incorporated

1 upvotes · 2 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You're right, it would be more accurate to say most states abolished. I can't speak to the laws of other states as an attorney, but as someone who's looked into it, my recollection is that the states that have retained common-law-marriage have greatly dimmed its meaning. For example, I think in CO you have to have some kind of agreement to be considered married, even if it doesn't meet the technical requirements of marriage licensing. Similarly, in New Hampshire, both parties have to represent themselves as "husband and wife" and there must be evidence of this or it doesn't count. In Iowa, common law marriage exists only for support for dependents, but won't protect other rights. Many other states, like Kansas, Montana, South Carolina, and some others will treat common law marriage as a presumption, where if you can present any evidence that it was not a mutual intent to function as a marital unit, then the burden goes on the other side to prove that you actually did have that intention.

So, the whole "shack up for a few years and you're automatically deemed married" thing is abolished in every state. But some states have retained a remnant of the old laws, but it's much easier to get out of it, as the requirements to prove it have gone way up. In my state it's abolished entirely, except to people where it's grandfathered in because they were deemed common-law-married before that law was abolished.

Mini-FR - The vasectomy conversation

1 upvotes · 1 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, that would produce an interesting reaction indeed. I'm fully with the "own it" mentality now.

106 - What doesn't work

1 upvotes · 31 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

it's still worth making sure there aren't any biological impediments

Exactly, this is why I try to minimize any time periods my wife is on the pill. It's also why I won't use condoms anymore ... my desire for condom sex is lower than my desire just to get some sleep. If there's an extenuating circumstance beyond raw desire issues, it's got to be addressed.

106 - What doesn't work

1 upvotes · 31 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I think there are plenty of situations where this happens

Very true. That said, I think these situations are rarer than married couples in a dead bedroom would like to think. It's easier just to assume "he/she is just LL" rather than the pain of realizing, "he/she is only LL for me."

Athol Kay cites SSRIs as impairing libido. My husband just got diagnosed with severe sleep apnea, which definitely dampens his libido. In those types of cases, you've got to get the medical situation dealt with.

Absolutely, you should. But remember that it's a scale, not an on/off switch. Most libido-impairing substances aren't all-or-nothing, they simply change the threshold at which your libido kicks in.

So, someone on an SSRI or with sleep apnea might have a lower libido than someone else, but if approached by their celebrity of choice, who's doing all the right things to seduce them ... they'll probably be inflamed with desire anyway. They won't, however, feel that desire for their spouse wearing day-to-day clothes, talking in the typical manner, and going about their ordinary business.

So, between "typical spouse" and "seductive all-star celebrity," somewhere in that spectrum is a line where, once crossed, their libido will be activated. For most people, just "someone else" other than their spouse at all is all it takes. This tells me they're not really "LL," they're just not interested in someone who isn't willing to put forth common effort that applies in the dating realm.

If your husband does have legit LL issues from his sleep apnea, maybe he legitimately wouldn't naturally notice the scantily clad girl at the bar ... but maybe if she was actively trying to seduce him his response might be different ... if it didn't work, maybe if she knew exactly his buttons and which ones to push, she'd be even more likely to turn him on. Right? So, where's that line for your spouse? The sleep apnea may have changed where its located on the spectrum, but it hasn't thrown out the line altogether.

The RP Can Only Do So Much Married To An Alcoholic

1 upvotes · 31 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

if we just don't talk about it, then they won't want to do it

A more proper assessment would be: If we talk about what the Bible has to say on hard issues, culture will reject us. That's counter-productive to filling seats <ahem> ... I mean, sharing the Gospel with new people. So, let's just not say anything that people might not want to hear.

The notion of romantic "love" often means doing whatever it takes to be peaceful and that usually means no conflict. I have never read this in scripture

That's because it's not there. The very idea of marrying for "love" didn't even exist on a widespread level until the late 1800s. Really, in the mid-1700s philosophers of the "enlightenment" era started proposing the idea, but parents still controlled marriage because they controlled the wealth. In the 1800s, that's when the industrial era started to boom and young men could afford to marry who they wanted, rather than who their parents told them to. As a result, they started rushing into relationships, and it didn't take long before they realized how fleeting "love" could be, and started wanting out of those relationships. The divorce rate has been on the rise ever since then, especially as the laws made it easier and easier.

So, when you talk about "love" in the context of marriage, it's important to remember that most people for virtually all of human history did not believe that "love" was even a part of marriage; rather, if someone happened to develop a love for their spouse, that was a fortunate man.

Since she has no job and stays locked in the room much of the afternoon, no one outside our home has to interact with her.

Document this. Set up a camera watching her door (inconspicuously, of course) to show that she can go 4+ hours without leaving her room. This shows that she's inattentive to the kids. Get 4-5 videos like this and you can easily explain that this is a recurring thing and the court will buy into it (as opposed to one video, which could be a one-time phenomenon). Although the court won't watch the video as evidence, a GAL might be more interested.

I cannot prove what her blood alcohol level was at the time

Go to a police or fire department and ask them how much it would cost to get a mechanism that will prevent you from starting your car if you can't blow clean. It's not fool-proof (she can have someone else blow for her), but it's certainly inconvenient and will make her think twice before driving with the kids while intoxicated. Right now, she thinks it's okay because she doesn't realize when she's drunk. If the machine tells her she's drunk and she has the kids, she's not going to fake it to put the kids in harm's way - she'll have to face the reality of her situation at that point. In getting a divorce, this won't necessarily help much, but it can be a huge step in rebuilding trust and saving your marriage.

I almost feel like my absolute evidence (courtwise) would need to come from a DUI, but how can I take that chance and expose my kids or anyone else?

I always advise to do what's best for your kids. Don't let her drive drunk with them. Period. That said, even a DUI isn't going to convince the court if she is good enough at explaining herself away. Again, this is where video footage really helps. Sometimes audio can even work. I had a case where the husband would tape an audio recorder under his wife's seat when he knew she'd be driving somewhere, hoping to pick up slurred speech and drunken ramblings while she's driving.

The money issues scares me as I don't have much.

You're about to have even less. In my view, $3,000 seems expensive, but in the grand scheme of things, it's a small price to set yourself up for the long-term. If you can get custody and she's ordered to pay you even a pittance of $250/mo in child support (a typical order in my state when the obligor isn't working), that's $3,000/yr. Add to that the fact that if she got custody or you did shared parenting, you'd probably end up owing her closer to $500/mo (assuming you make around $35,000/yr), which is $6,000/yr ... your net per year goes from owing $6k to receiving $3k. That's a $9,000 annual difference. If the psych eval costs you $5,000, you'll make that up in 6 months of child support figures alone (assuming the eval does end up getting you custody, which is the strongest evidence in any case like this - even better than a DUI).

When clients have trouble coming up with these funds, they usually borrow from family, sell off assets (preferably before the divorce is filed), or pay on credit cards.

I'm told this is due to ADHD and needed to be away from everybody

As I'm sure you're aware, this is obviously a joke. No ADHD person has to withdraw from society to control their "problem."

I now know she is upstairs getting hammered and quite often zonks out and never comes back down.

Better than a camera watching the door is a secret camera in the room. Get a nanny cam.

how bad would it need to get for the court to care?

To the point where the court believes she will neglect the kids' needs or put them in harm's way. Spending 6 hours in her room crying and sleeping is fine as long as she gets out to make them dinner when the time comes, or she can attend to a scraped leg when they knock on the door. If they're young kids (4 and under), the standard goes up because they require more supervision, so she is expected to supervise them and periods longer than an hour of isolation will probably reflect poorly.

If we split, I'm definitely sure she would go back to our home state as that's where her financial support (in-laws) would be found.

Courts hate relocating the children. If she moves, she loses the kids. She'll know this and will stay so as to avoid losing the custody battle. She'll probably try to convince you to let her take the kids, just don't give in. She'll back down and stay before she gives up custody.

The RP Can Only Do So Much Married To An Alcoholic

1 upvotes · 31 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

You almost nailed it. The exception is the finding someone new part. Right now in my current state, I'm feeling like I understand those MGTOW guys now.

I haven't looked into MGTOW at all, so I can't speak there, but the option of remaining single really might not be all that bad. This will probably totally destroy any respect in an RP community, but I tend to lean toward the theological viewpoint that remarriage after divorce for any reason while your ex is still alive is sin. As a result, even if I accept divorce as an option, remarriage is something I don't - at least not right now.

That said, the Scripture on point is ambiguous enough that, even though I think the stronger interpretation is what I mentioned, it's a perfectly valid and legitimate belief to go the other way on point also. So, I'll never criticize or condemn anyone who does think it's okay to get remarried after divorce and it's a subject where I'll openly admit that my current leaning (I won't even call it my "view" or "position") may very well be wrong.

Yes, i was waiting for Part 2!

Maybe I'll write it up for this sub at some point.

I have no idea how to even reach out to a divorce judge.

Literally: google the courthouse, walk in randomly, ask to talk to the judge's court officer, then pop the question. If the court officer has your answer, there you go. If she doesn't, she'll ask the judge for you.

I cried infront of a potential plate. She fucked me everyday for the next week.

1 upvotes · 31 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

Glad I could help a little.

edit: why are they talking about video games on RPChristians?

Because there's a sub made up of SJWs who like to troll anyone who holds to conservative values - especially Christians. So, when they discovered "RPChristians" they decided to brigade the sub and play off "RP" as "Role Playing" instead of "Red Pill" to make a joke of us. I've promptly removed all that garbage and banned the trolls.

Mini-FR - The vasectomy conversation

1 upvotes · 31 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

More likely she's consciously or subconsciously lost and confused.

As things are now, you're probably quite right. I think I was talking about a future-point, once I'm further along in my journey. I still have some weight to lose and tactics I've been withholding and have yet to employ (trying not to go Rambo).

That said, I was just watching the first Captain American movie with my wife and son today and when he first gets the super-soldier serum and erupts from the chamber, my son blurts out: "Daddy, he looks just like you with your shirt off!" It made me smile! In no way am I close to movie-touched-up Chris Evans body, but the fact that he said that and my wife smiled with a blush made me happy :)

Your wife's dialog reveals that she's very much into using children as the means to securing commitment from you - your connection to her - not sex.

That very well could be. I doubt she's doing it consciously, but you're probably right that some element of that is there. She once even pointed out that the only reason she believes her parents stayed together as long as they did was because of the kids - i.e. kids = forced commitment. As you say, I'm changing the rules (and for the record, her parents are still together, despite that both of their kids have been moved out for a decade-ish).

You can bet that she will maintain her "LL" until it becomes very clear to her that she must unleash her inner slut to attract and hold the Man that she by her own observation and deduction (not by discussion with you) has determined is The Prize that she wants no other woman to have. Be that Man.

I'm counting on this. I've already seen shifts in the balance and am confident in the direction I'm moving.

201 - Healthy Sexual Desire v. Lust/Coveting

1 upvotes · 31 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, fair enough. I suppose that was my way of appreciating the beauty in what was written without weighing it down with disagreement. As I'm sure you're aware, I'm not Catholic. So, although I have a healthy respect for early church fathers, I believe the same Spirit that was at work in them is also at work in us today. So, beyond the apostles themselves (and maybe the immediate next generation after them, like Timothy, for example), I don't make the assumption that they have some special knowledge that the Holy Spirit can't communicate directly to us all the same. As a result, I give them great respect, but will not just assume they're correct.

What I notice from this passage, as is true of most of what I've read from the early church fathers, is that he's not really interpreting a passage. Instead, he's dictating a stream of conscious exercise where he begins with a passage and then starts talking about everything that it reminds him of. As a result, most of what he says is way off point of actually understanding the passage itself and goes into human ideas about what he, personally, thinks on the subject matter. To that end, he may be very wise and many would do well to listen to him, but I'd be cautious about giving his words weight as an authority over how Scripture must be interpreted.

From what I can tell, the core of his argument is here:

"What then," one may say, "if I should look, and desire indeed, but do no evil?" Even so you are set among the adulterers. For the Lawgiver has pronounced it, and you must not ask any more questions. For thus looking once, twice, or thrice, you will perhaps have power to refrain; but if you are continually doing this, and kindling the furnace, you will assuredly be taken; for your station is not beyond that nature which is common to men.

I understand the wisdom in what he's saying. Don't let desire take control of you. But the assumption that desire inevitably leads to sin is a conclusion I cannot share. To be fair, James 1:14-15 says, "Each one is tempted when by his own evil desires he is dragged away and enticed. Then, after desire has conceived, it gives birth to sin; and sin, when it is full-grown gives birth to death." But what I notice here is that the desire itself is not sin - it only leads to sin. I think that's what he's trying to say, but he makes the assumption that all desire will lead there. Are we to say that we should abandon our desire for food because it will inevitably make everyone become a glutton?

Instead, I see Paul preaching: "I discipline my body and make it my slave" (1 Cor. 9:27). That is, he acknowledged that desire can lead to sin (see Romans 7), but also saw that this could be controlled and utilized. Nowhere do we see an apostle preaching: "Stop desiring things; you must become emotionally numb." Instead, we constantly see throughout Scripture the value of appreciating the wonderful things God has given us and that it is good to desire what God has made available. In Eden, Adam saw that all the plants were good for eating and he desired them. God told David, "I gave you all of Saul's wives and concubines, and if you desired more, I would have given you more." In the Psalms, we are instructed: "Delight yourselves in the Lord and I will give you the desires of your heart." In the NT we are constantly reminded to desire things like righteousness, mercy, and to save the lost - all things which have earthly parallels that help us cultivate and understand these spiritual drives we're meant to have - even to the degree that Paul instructs us: "Run as one trying to win the prize," which presumes we must desire the prize.

Now, per 1 John 2:15-17, we're not to make those earthly desires an end of themselves, nor are we to humor them to the extent of sin itself. But I do believe desire can be controlled. I can have a healthy sexual desire for my wife, while not letting that desire consume me into looking beyond my wife (i.e. pornography, adultery, etc.). Likewise, I can desire a cup of ice cream, yet not be consumed by it to the point of gluttony.

All of that said, if this means what I think it means:

Since, although you have not touched her with the hand, yet have you caressed her with your eyes; for which cause this also is accounted adultery

Then I agree with him - that it becomes adultery when you start to play out your fantasy in your mind. So, while I may be able to let a woman walk in front of me, and I may even notice and appreciate her beauty, it is not sin until I start fantasizing. Once it gets there, that's when the "coveting" takes hold - the fact that I really wish I could act on it, but am only unable to do so because of humanistic motives, as my post describes.

201 - Healthy Sexual Desire v. Lust/Coveting

1 upvotes · 31 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Some have taken this to mean that a man should avert his eyes from every woman not his wife, under pain of hellfire.

Yeah, when the Pharisees tried to call out Jesus for not following their "stricter than the law" man-made commandments, Jesus called them out on it and rebuked them pretty harshly. In Matthew 15:9 he says plainly, "These people honor me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me. They worship me in vain; their teachings are merely human rules." That "hearts are far from me" line reminds me of Matthew 7 where Jesus casts these people away. I'd rather not wind up in that spot :p

Great thoughts :)

201 - Healthy Sexual Desire v. Lust/Coveting

1 upvotes · 29 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Very interesting. Thanks for sharing.

201 - Healthy Sexual Desire v. Lust/Coveting

1 upvotes · 27 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

My pleasure :)

Own Your Slice: 7/26

1 upvotes · 27 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Any advice ...

Find someone to disciple you. I cannot possibly overestimate the importance of personal one-on-one discipleship to your faith. Imagine if Athol or Rollo lived near you and agreed that they'd meet with you every week for an hour for free! not only to teach you everything they know about being RP, but also to help you implement it, invite you into their homes so you can watch them how they implement it, etc. Wouldn't that be amazing?

99% likely you have someone in your immediate sphere of connections who is the spiritual equivalent of Athol or Rollo. Go find that person. The great news is that these guys are so passionate about helping others grow for Christ and lead faith-based relationships that they don't only consider it their duty in Christ to do this for free - it is where they find their greatest joy! (3 John 1:4 and all).

The hard part is finding someone who's going to be intentional and proactive with you about discipleship and not reactive, letting you run the show on how you want to be discipled (compare that to your wife trying to run the show on how she wants you to lead her). But I've found that most men can actually overcome this trait if they are godly enough and you're forward enough.

Own Your Slice: 7/26

1 upvotes · 27 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

FITNESS/DIET*Grade: A*

I'm around 17% BF, but have come down from 27% in the last 5 months (lost over 40lbs so far). I'm lifting 5 days/wk and cardio 6/wk (only for 20 minutes on days I also lift). I take one Sabbath per week. I've jacked up my protein intake and simplified my meals. I probably still eat out a little too much, but have cut virtually all of my snacks down to Whole30 approved (i.e. fruits/veggies, unflavored meats/jerky ... that's about it). Portion control has been insanely better than in the past too.

SPIRITUAL*Grade: A-*

I usually gauge my spiritual health by the 7 basics. This deserves a post of its own, but the basic concept is that there's always 2-3 that should be really strong; 2-3 that should be fairly weak, and 2-3 that are just in flux at any given time - and which falls where should be rotating as God leads (for most men I've discipled, that ends up being around every 6-12 months):

- Gospel Engagement: 5/10 - I tend to make big breakthroughs, then taper off in how I understand the application of the Gospel to daily living. My last "breakthrough" was about 3 weeks ago and I haven't revisited this aspect of my faith recently, still coasting off the revelation from the last time.
- Quiet Time: 10/10 - I'm loving my daily time with God. It usually involves Scripture and prayer, but mostly just enjoying God's company.
- Bible Study: 10/10 - I'm one of the volunteer writers for gotquestions.org, so I'm constantly getting interesting questions that stem further study. I'm also constantly being asked to produce new content for my church, which really engages me in the Word. I've scaled my involvement in other Christian subs here back quite a bit since discovering RP and creating this account, but still participate in that angle of Scriptural study and discussion periodically as well.
- Scripture Memory: 1/10 - 2 months ago this would have been 10/10. Last month was mostly a review month.

Now I'm in an off month, although I still keep fluent with my mastery of Scripture in my heart by frequently testing myself with passages that would apply to daily life situations (even if I never announce verbally in the conversation what I'm doing).

- Prayer: 7/10 - Praying with each of my kids individually (as well as collectively) has really prompted me to engage with God in different ways and has revitalized my own personal prayer life. That said, frequency of my personal prayer life could use improvement, although quality has gone up as I've learned to spend more time just listening, as my kids have taught me this through their incessant: "I just want to hear Jesus talk!"
- Evangelism: 2/10 - I've still got some non-Christians I'm engaging with periodically, but a lot of these relationships have slowed down due to the business of summer. I tend to have a much easier time connecting with neighbors and co-workers outside of work during fall/winter. That said, I'm starting to build relationships at the gym, now that I'm there frequently. So, maybe this is a new avenue, nixing the "where you work, where you live" for "where you play" (the WLP trifecta).
- Fellowship: 4/10 - I cancelled my small group back in February because everyone was ready to start leading their own small groups (3 of the 4 couples actively are now). Instead, I'm helping run a new "planning committee" for a 2-day seminar on internal healing, but this "committee" has turned out to be more of a fellowship group than anything (I'm usually the one who has to keep us on task). I'm still meeting with other believers periodically, but nowhere near as often as when I was leading a small group. Also, I used to disciple my pastor, but haven't seen him for a few months since he went on a sabbatical, so that's still kind of weak.

CAREER/FINANCES

Grade: C-

I'm getting apathetic. I go in cycles. I recently finished a major trial that my boss threw on me at the last minute without giving me any real prep time. Once that finished, I needed to take a break, but had a bunch of other stuff slam me that I had been putting off (having a new baby just before all this didn't help either). So, now I'm in "I don't want to do anything" mode. I control my own hours, so instead of a 9am start time, I'm hopping in at 10:30 or 11, rationalizing that I just got over a huge hump and caught up on most of my stuff, so I don't have as much to keep me busy now. Sure, there are a few things that could get done, but they're not time-pressing, so I'm starting to feel lazy. I have another trial next month that'll kick me out of this lull in about a week, but I should probably start now. Nevertheless, the paychecks are still great ... just got a client to pay on her back bill, which was pretty large, so that's going to be a sizeable paycheck in a couple weeks.

FRAME

Grade: B

My wife is testing me much less often, which is a positive. I feel like I'm passing the tests. My biggest need for growth here is in learning to delegate and making my wants/needs clearer. I'm effectively standing my ground (playfully) against her efforts to take charge, but I'm still reluctant to tell her to do things that matter to me. I've rationalized this as OYS - if I want it done, it's my responsibility; it's not her responsibility to make me happy or cut up a melon that I'm going to eat and she won't. I need to get over that mentality without being demanding. My go-to techniques are A&A and fogging/broken record, both which work perfectly for my wife.

SEX

Grade: B-

Coming up from an F as recently as 3 months ago, this B- is actually something I'm pretty proud of. For the first time in years, she's responsive to physical touch and actually engaging back. She still has very strong boundary issues, and there are physical limitations right now due to her post-op recovery from giving birth, but as of lately the bad streak is over. We're also talking more openly about sex, which helps a lot. She still comments that she's worried my expectations will be too high come Monday, when PIV is back on the table, and brings up excuses about going back on the pill and breast feeding messing with her hormones, mostly trying to buffer the increased energy we're both experiencing with her expectations that returning to our prior DB ways feels inevitable to her (we've had small good patches before that didn't last) ... but I accept there is a real truth to a lot of it as well, especially the birth control part - that usually just kills her libido. I didn't even know she was planning on going back on birth control until she mentioned it in passing today ... will have to talk to her about this soon. The vasectomy consult today also raised some interesting conversation (including the passive comment about birth control).

TIME MANAGEMENT/DISTRACTIONS

Grade: A-

But for the stuff I put in my work section, I'd give myself an A+. I've never been so productive outside of work than I have been in the last few months. My home is improving and I've been reading and re-reading so much it's been insane. Rather than tiring out, like I expected, all the lifting has actually motivated me. I used to be a TV junkie, but noticed that after a few weeks of abandoning almost all TV, I don't even care anymore (to my chagrin, I still watch Big Brother with my wife - it's her "thing").

What's the best way to play this out?

1 upvotes · 26 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

Started planning a few days ago, just didn't post on it until this morning.

Princeton's new 'men's engagement manager' to combat aggressive masculinity on campus

1 upvotes · 26 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWives

Haha, no kidding. Well said.

What's the best way to play this out?

1 upvotes · 26 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

I track with what you're saying. My point wasn't to make it a game as much as to incentivise her to step up her attire. Under normal circumstances, she's fairly conservative, almost prude-ish with how she dresses when we go on dates. So, I was thinking of dangling a carrot to see what impact that might have. This is a tactic that I've seen elsewhere on RP threads, I just haven't seen it implemented in this context. In short, it boils down to: "Reward good behavior, not bad behavior." The only add-on is that I'm telling her in advance that there will be a reward for that good behavior. If she still decides to ignore the advice and wears jean/t-shirt, then I let her know she's missing out on other opportunities we had planned, but that she'll get that chance later - with the understanding that this is a way to set a clear boundary and stick to it so she sees that I'm not going to buckle and give her the good date anyway, despite her bad behavior. I'm probably just over-thinking that, though.

What's the best way to play this out?

1 upvotes · 26 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

It's possible to be great at one area but still have questions about another. When I teach seminars about divorce law, nobody heckles me, "You have no business teaching law when I just saw you ask another attorney about the requirements to file an ERISA claim!" ERISA isn't my specialty. I can be good at one thing and ignorant about another. There's nothing wrong with that.

What's the best way to play this out?

1 upvotes · 26 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

Yeah, I wouldn't intend it as validation seeking, but I see how it would come off that way. You're right and I opted not to take that direction.

What's the best way to play this out?

1 upvotes · 26 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

Not sure ... my state is just that way sometimes.

What's the best way to play this out?

1 upvotes · 26 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

Good call. Thanks for the insights.

What's the best way to play this out?

1 upvotes · 26 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

All of the three options are fairly equal to me. My preference changes by the hour and I'm guessing I'll just wing it once we get in the car and start driving as to which plan I'll go with.

I'm not fluent with what she can/can't wear in her wardrobe because being post-pregnancy changed a lot. But I can probably keep it categorical: "skirt and a tank top," for example. I just have to be prepared that she legit might not have a combo like that that fits.

What's the best way to play this out?

1 upvotes · 26 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

Great link. Thanks for the reference and tips! I think I have all of that down pat.

Wanted: Op-Sec Tips for MRPers out there getting numbers

1 upvotes · 25 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

I understand where you're coming from, although I think you're reading subtext where there is none because most people like to feel affirmed in their misperception that all Christians are judgmental pricks. I made no comment about anyone's personal character (unlike your proposed parallel), and RP condemns certain choices all the time due to their natural result. I fail to see how this is any different. Nevertheless, if other people or mods read this differently, I'm fine with accepting that I have blind spots every now and then.

Wanted: Op-Sec Tips for MRPers out there getting numbers

1 upvotes · 25 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

It wasn't my intention to moralize, which is why I stated directly: "That's his business to decide." My point was simply that if you take someone else's advice, it's wise to see where that advice got them before acting on it.

If I'm asking how to build a deck on my house and I get advice from a guy who has built 10 decks and all of them fell apart after 3 months of people walking on them, I'd want to know that before taking his advice.

If /u/BarracudaRP is okay with the result, then he's fine taking the advice. I'm not saying that result is bad or wrong; jut that it's a fact of where a lifestyle will lead you. I don't see how this is moralizing.

Use red pill to get out of a dead bedroom

1 upvotes · 25 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I've never hard of him. I'd love to hear his story, though :) /u/RedDreadWolverine - what's your story? Let me learn!

Need advice from others

1 upvotes · 25 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

I did the Whole30 diet. That's a great place to start for recipes and tips on what to look for. It'll be a lot more serious than just no wheat or grains, but that's certainly part of it. The point of the Whole30 diet is to cut virtually anything that's likely to cause a health problem, then after the Whole30 (which is 30 days) to start adding things back slowly so that you can get a feel for what your body responds negatively to. Check out r/whole30.

Wanted: Op-Sec Tips for MRPer's out there getting numbers

1 upvotes · 25 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

The tips are good, but bear in mind from this other guy's thread, he's actually cheating and has a somewhat self-destructive attitude about his marriage. That's his business to decide, but make sure you know the likely result of mimicking someone else's lifestyle before making it your business too.

Half assed mrp?

1 upvotes · 25 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

Indeed.

SO is bitchy and disrespectful too often, should I leave?

1 upvotes · 24 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

I'm confused. What episode of what?

Mini-FR - The vasectomy conversation

1 upvotes · 24 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for the follow-up. I'll try to check out that sermon soon.

Losing My Inner Fire

1 upvotes · 24 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

I'm guessing you're not religious, but there's still wisdom to be found in spiritual texts. Try this one on for size:

I became great and surpassed all who were before me in Jerusalem.

Also my wisdom remained with me.

And whatever my eyes desired I did not keep from them.

I kept my heart from no pleasure, for my heart found pleasure in all my toil, and this was the reward for my toil.

Then I considered all that my hands had done and the toil I had expended in doing it, and behold

All was vanity and a striving after wind, and there was nothing to be gained under the sun.

Like /u/bertansd said, "you're ready to move on to spirituality." That quote comes from Ecclesiastes 2. The very next chapter says, "He has made everything beautiful in its time. Also, he has put eternity into man's heart, yet he cannot fathom what God has done from beginning to end."

To reword that, you're designed for more than just reaching "the top of the mountain." Hebrews chapters 8 and 9 talk about how the things you've been pursuing (i.e. physical stuff) is just a "copy" or "shadow" of the real

"heavenly things." We're meant for the real thing, not the silhouette that you've been settling for. Re-post this in r/RPChristians, if you'd like to travel more down this particular rabbit hole.

Good Enough?

1 upvotes · 24 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I think you meant to respond to /u/innominating, as you quoted his text. But, as I'm sure you're aware, I agree with this whole-heartedly!

Good Enough?

1 upvotes · 24 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Hmm ... I'll have to think about that. I get what you're saying in this comment and what the dread threads say. But if practicing dread gets a guy to the point where he finds sex worthless and a pointless end in life, it seems to me it's stealing something away from him, not enhancing his life ... hence a "backfire." Most of this guy's comments beyond just the original post show that he was getting the sex he wanted, but he still wasn't satisfied, even outside the marriage.

Of course, as I'm sure you're well aware, my position on that is going to be that it's a spiritual emptiness, not a physical/emotional one ... but this wasn't the time or place to get into that conversation.

Mini-FR - The vasectomy conversation

1 upvotes · 24 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I really appreciate this feedback.

The biggest concern I have for you is making a big move (financial, sexual, familial, whatever) in the first six months without going through the crucible of reading, lifting, and reflecting.

What would this look like and when would appropriate progress markers look like for moving forward? I do feel like I've been gradually implementing RP for the last 6 months already. I started February 1 with 90% cardio, plus started taking responsibility for my house (fix deck, remodel bathroom, stain baseboards, etc.). Beginning in April, I added some assertiveness tactics and passing tests. In May, I added dieting to the list (I had lost 20 lbs before; another 15 during May). In June I switched from 90% cardio to 80% lifting and added gaming my wife. July 1 or so I discovered RP, which gave context to what I had started and helped me focus my efforts with a more laser precision. We had a new baby on June 19, but starting in July, after my wife had a couple weeks of recovery, she started responding sexually (just no PIV). Financially, we're better than we've ever been. Family life is solid, and I'm even getting my unruly 3yo under control. Sex is back on the table, although I'm hoping to start gradually pushing boundaries in mid-August. Because of how she has responded to my being more dominant in other areas around the home, and because of hints that she used to give that beta-me was too dumb to pick up on (which I now see quite clearly with RP lenses), I'm confident she's going to like rough sex once she gets over the moral dilemma ... but I'm planning on holding off until mid-August because I don't want it to be like, "The doctor gave you the 6-week all clear to have sex again, so let's hop in and hammer hard!" That'll probably scare her away if we don't ease into it.

With all of that in mind ... where are my weak spots? From my perspective, everything is going great and I'm seeing the responses I wanted. But outsiders usually have a more accurate perception of these things.

I was working through your logic. Birth control = LL. No BC = HL? I didn't read that anywhere in your writeup.

I'd never put her in an "HL" category. It's more like "Birth Control = no libido at all; no BC = 'not attracted to fat, beta ruizbujc, but still willing and will get horny on rare occasions.'" The idea of my wife ever being HL was something I didn't consider possible until coming across RP, which doubled my motivation and focused my plan - not to say that I'm depending on it or making a covert contract of it. I long ago learned to accept as fact that my wife will never be HL. Although RP has given me hope of this happening, my expectation is unphased, as I often say in most areas of life: Hope for the best, expect and prepare for the worst.

If you go get a vasectomy, and she goes to no BC, are you sure her sex drive will increase?

She stopped taking BC about 4 years ago. She went on briefly between our 2nd and 3rd kids, but again, the libido dive was so sharp that we switched to natural family planning. That's when we became pregnant with our 3rd kid. We are extremely fertile to the degree that our 2nd, 3rd and 4th kids all happened with only having sex one time without contraception, two of those happening when I know for sure she wasn't ovulating (they were the day after her period ended). So, I don't trust NFP for my life :/ But to answer the question, yes, her sex-drive re-normalized to the degree of our relationship at the time (i.e. still low, but at least present). I talk a bit more about that in this post here, specifically telling a story of when she confessed, extremely guilty, that she had looked up the 50 Shades of Grey trailer on youtube (for her, that's the same thing as me confessing to watching porn years ago). She was ashamed that she actually wanted sex - and even more troubled that she preferred to go there (although she stopped herself half way through the trailer) rather than coming to me. So, that's where I get hope that she might be HL, just not for who I was back then.

Have you tried sex where you are responsible for the BC? I think you wrote she made a comment about you not liking to wrap it up.

I despise condoms. People write about: "Turn down vanilla sex. Bad sex is worse than no sex." That's how condom sex is for me. I gave it a shot for an entire year once (before we had kids, as an effort to keep her off the BC pills), including trying many brands and sizes, and it never worked. I think that's a lot of what started a bad precedent in our sex-life early on in the marriage. I'd rather have no sex than condom sex.

The fathers teach that it is God's design to come together periodically as a man and woman, and then to abstain periodically as well - so that we don't give in to our lusts and passions - and we struggle against the flesh.

I can see the logic in this, but Paul says quite plainly in 1 Cor. 7:5 that sex should be a pretty much all-the-time thing and that any pauses are only to be short in nature and for the purpose of prayer. Deriving other purposes from it should be fine too, but I'm more inclined to take Paul's instruction as the guidepost than early church fathers, who I don't know whether or not their recommendation is inspired.

So what are you trying to achieve? Are you choosing to permanently alter God's design and the body He has given you to enflame your lusts? And to what extent?

I'm trying to avoid having more kids. Although I get the naturalism approach (i.e. no body modifications), I don't see this as a Scriptural mandate; rather, it's an implied philosophy that people have developed which is consistent with Scripture and not compelled by it. The consistent v. compelled distinction is a significant one. To that end, I would never tell a Catholic that their view is wrong - they may very well be right; but I'm also not going to tell anyone there is no other alternative philosophy on the matter that is also Scripturally permissible.

To revisit one thing ...

crucible of reading

Isolating out that one part, I've been through NMMNG, WISNIFG, MMSLP, Rational Male Year One, and virtually all of the top all-time threads on all four subs (TRP/MRP, ask TRP/askMRP). I've got a few more top threads to read, then I'm planning on switching to SGM, given that PIV will be back on the table again next Monday. I've also re-read relevant portions from the books, as necessary. Any thoughts on where I should focus next, given what you know about my situation?

Mini-FR - The vasectomy conversation

1 upvotes · 24 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

threat that the female cannot claim exclusivity to our commitment

If anything, I see the reverse. The vasectomy increases dread (at least for my wife, per her comments) because she knows that I'll be free to have sex with others without risk of impregnating them, making me have less fear of cheating and less likely I'll get caught (especially given that she knows my profession and that I could hide it if I wanted to).

If you make this change and she still hasn't responded (despite not being on BC) What then? Remember, she'll have a high libido for the right alpha. You can be that man.

I'm not sure what you're asking. If she goes on birth control, pretty much any form (we've tested many), it kills her libido, making me have to jump through extraordinary hoops to get back to her libido. It's always been true of her because despite being fairly tall for a woman (5'10"), she's fairly small/thin so medication always has a huge impact on her, and if it says there's a side-effect, it almost always hits her hard. Even with RP theory, many people on MRP have said plainly, "If she's just a naturally LL person, there may be no hope. You either accept it or next her." Putting her on indefinite birth control would be the same as making her LL indefinitely as well - to a degree that even hardcore RP vets, I believe, would agree is impossible to overcome, even if I were Brad Pitt or the real Brad Pitt showed up in her life.

As for the "what then" line ... I'm already seeing the improvements I had hoped to find from RP. So, from what you've told me, the primary risk to me having a vasectomy is that I'll care less about those improvements. I'm not sure where the danger is :/ what is the Godly thing to do? The Roman Catholic views against contraception ...

I agree that they have a Scriptural basis for their position, but I believe it is extremely weak compared to alternate views on the matter and I do not personally hold to the "no contraception" view, which treats sex as an end in and of itself. This is something I've done an immense amount of studying and meditating on, but the conclusion goes into discipleship theory, which would probably get too far off topic to address here.

Either way, I greatly appreciate your concerns! You've given me some good things to think about. Although I may not agree, it's good to know that you care enough to be as blunt as you are. Thank you :)

[Update] How do I catch her cheating. Looking back what a wast of fucking time !

1 upvotes · 23 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This is a great response. Thanks!

Prenuptials

1 upvotes · 23 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

We usually push it to trial. The court won't budge on these types of issues, and if they do it's clearly reversible error, so you just appeal and get them overturned.

Most often, the quick answer is to give a time-frame. For example, if the youngest kid is 15, you let so and so stay in the house until the kid graduates, then sell it and split the proceeds. Alternatively, you get a close approximation of offsets of dissimilar assets and hope to convince the other side to go along with it, and they do the same back (i.e. accounting for agents' fees, brokerage fees, transfer tax, closing costs, taxation on retirement accounts, etc.). In some cases (including one I'm doing right now), the husband is offering to give my client the house in exchange for a reduction in spousal support for the next 10 years. In that type of a situation, I advise my client to consider the present v. future value of dollars and make sure she's not doing something stupid, especially in light of the fact that we don't know what inflation will look like down the road.

Mini-FR - The vasectomy conversation

1 upvotes · 23 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I've read MMSLP and a lot of the rational male articles. I've also done a ton of research on the subject, including all the horror stories. I have no doubt that there are psychosomatic effects that many men experience as a result of the procedure, but the actual cases of a physical problem are rare enough that it's worth the risk to me. It's much better than the alternative of putting the burden on my wife for contraception, effectively giving her a blanket excuse to explain away a LL without even trying.

Mini-FR - The vasectomy conversation

1 upvotes · 23 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

the first paragraph has been reduced ... has been added

I think I did all that within the first 5 minutes of putting the post up. My normal pattern is to draft something (comments and posts alike), click "submit," then re-read it and re-format it once I see the final product, and make edits as necessary. I don't count that as changing it after-the-fact, as it's still part of my original submission process in the first place. Sorry if that caused you confusion if you happened to be there right when it was first put up.

I have other replies on this sub that I have deleted (days ago) but your responses to me are still there

I didn't know you deleted them. I don't normally go back to old posts to see if people have deleted something. Either way, it's not a big deal. I just don't get what you're trying to imply in all this.

Mini-FR - The vasectomy conversation

1 upvotes · 22 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I haven't made any edits to the post and I removed my comments because the other user deleted hers and my comments made no sense without that context.

My wife and I had already discussed the ins and outs of the matter before, she was just not in a place of mind to recall those conversations and I was not in a position to have them all over again right then and there. I think you're fishing to find fault.

Married to a Beta Husband - How Can I Ask For More Leadership and RP Attitude?

1 upvotes · 22 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

Haha, good point

How does biblical submission benefit wives?

1 upvotes · 21 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Do you give your wife a list of things to do?

Only when I need something done I know she wouldn't ordinarily do already.

so serious that they can be settled only by one person asserting Biblical authority over the other?

If a guy has to wave the Bible around he's already lost. That is a plea for obedience and will not foster submission.

We're generally in agreement on most things

Early-marriage, this is true of almost all couples, but people change over time and they learn on a subconscious level to improve their own life experience at the expense of their partner. If you haven't gotten there yet, that's awesome! I hope you never do. But this does happen in most marriages.

Consider the Prisoner's Dilemma. In a marriage context it works something like this: everyone gets a "nice" card and a "mean/lazy" card. Scores are kept individually and as a team. Both spouses play the nice card a lot at first. Over time, the wife (for example) realizes that she could get a day off by being mean/lazy, knowing that her husband will play the nice card anyway. Instead of retaliating, the husband continues playing "nice" cards because he knows that's the best way to get the highest overall team-score, even if he's losing individually on it. As he continues to do this, his wife is reaffirmed that he will always play the nice card no matter which card she plays. So, she eventually just plays whichever card she happens to feel like that day, knowing that it won't impact which card he plays. When she drops nice cards back to him, he assumes it's because he played a nice card and she's returning the favor. When she drops a mean/lazy card, he assumes it's because his nice card wasn't nice enough, so he keeps playing more nice cards, trying to up his strategy rather than change it. Because her "niceness" is spaced out the drought gives him a stronger rush when the nice card is actually played, keeping him motivated to stay in the "nice guy" strategy. Eventually, when he realizes that his strategy isn't working, he becomes consciously aware of the resentment that has been festering for some time.

Now, nobody is capable of playing nice cars 100% of the time. So, a perfect 10 is impossible. But suppose a husband and wife figure out how to play the nice card more often than not and in relatively equal proportions. Couple 1 might then have individual scores of 6/10 and a team score of 6/10. But the wife in couple 2 has figured out how to strategize this game, so her score might be a 9, whereas her husband's score is a 4. Their joint score is, then, a 6.5. So, their marriage for all practical purposes seems to function in society better than couple 1's marriage because they get more stuff done and are progressing by societal standards better, but within the marriage walls the husband is actually plotting divorce. Strategization is inevitable in every marriage; some people are just smarter about it.

Marriages with lower responsibilities and higher excitement levels (i.e. no kids, haven't hit the 7-year itch yet, etc.) are much more prone to be nice-nice because they haven't had enough time to subconsciously internalize their partner's strategy and have enough energy that the mean/lazy card isn't mandatory as often. As stress increases, the mean/lazy card becomes insanely more tempting to play, especially if you know your partner is likely to respond with another nice card. Who can blame someone for taking advantage of that every now and then? Then, you are appreciative for having gotten a free day, so you play a nice card the next day as a "thank you" for the previous day ... but it's not really a "thank you" because now your spouse is at 2 consecutive nice cards compared to your one. So, the husband doesn't perceive the appreciation that the wife is trying to give because all he sees is the imbalance. She feels guilty and plays a couple more nice cards, but then the guilt burns her out, so she plays a mean/lazy card and the cycle repeats and constricts.

I mean, most people are decent human beings, for the most part, right?

I disagree. People are inherently selfish at their core. A distinct quality of humans is that we have the ability to overcome these impulses with conscious effort, but the drive to pursue our own satisfaction as a primary priority is never gone. This is why the divorce rate is so insanely high.

Women generally don't marry men because they hate them and want to make their lives miserable.

Of course not. But as the card game shows, selfishness becomes a strong motivator when there's no immediately perceivable negative consequence for it. After a few times of thinking, "I was a jerk to him and he kept being nice anyway," her short-term appreciation may go up, but her long-term comfort level with playing that mean/lazy card will go up as well. When it reaches a certain point she becomes altogether desensitized to the things that were previously holding her back from playing it and just ends up playing cards based on however she feels that day (i.e. for her own individual score) rather than what's in the best interests of the marriage as a whole (i.e. the team score).

To be clear, I use the common example, but it is also possible (just less common) for this game to play out in the reverse or with other strategies.

you want to find a partner capable of giving as good as they get. It shouldn't be all one-sided.

Agreed. What you're saying is: "Find someone who agrees with the nice-nice strategy before you get married and make sure that their resolve is strong enough that they're not going to back down from that strategy when they realize there's a loop hole." The 7-year itch occurs because it takes about that long to notice loop-holes in the others' strategy and exploit them until enough resentment fosters that divorce becomes an imperative.

When someone treats you well, the natural inclination for a normal person is to reciprocate, I think.

You're absolutely right. But this inclination is also in competition with the selfishness inclination we all share. What happens when one spouse realizes they get the good treatment even when they don't reciprocate? That's when one tends to take advantage of the other. Some base internal sense of morality kicks in making you place the "nice" card periodically to reward all his nice cards, but the innate selfishness we all have buffers this and it's a constant internal struggle that finds different balances with different couples.

Ultimately, biblical submissiveness is an internal abandonment of selfishness. If mutual submission plays out as it's meant to, both partners will always play the nice card whenever they are physical/mentally/emotionally capable of doing so. The concept of husband-headship is simply to say that the husband is the one who sets the strategy and must work for the team score regardless of his wife's strategy, and that his strategy should be uniquely designed to mold his wife's strategy for the common good rather than her own gain. The tit for tat strategy is a prime example of this. The husband is not to play for his own personal score and the "tit for tat" strategy only works if he abandons the concept of wanting his score to beat hers - at best he can tie her and no more. That is part of the sacrifice he must make as a man for the good of the family.

Can the wife apply the same strategy to mold her husband to appropriate behavior? Possibly, but in most marriages it simply does not work that way, and most often the husbands are trained to be "nice guys," so the wife's only strategy is really just to be nicer to her husband. If she was truly intelligent, she might try to find a way to convince him to punish her with mean/lazy cards every now and then to disincentivize her from taking advantage of his "nice guy" strategy. But most wives won't do this - they will trust their own will-power to be nice as often as possible because then they maintain control over the marriage, strategy, circumstances, and can get the personal score they want. She rationalizes: "But he's so nice, I'll just want to be nice to him all the time too! And if I do have a bad day, it's okay to be lazy every now and then, and I'll need him to pamper me during those times too, and I can make it up to him the next day with more nice cards." ... and we already saw where that mentality ends up. If she teaches her husband to disincentivize her bad behavior, the overall team score will actually improve and there will be a significantly reduced imbalance in the individual marital satisfaction levels, reducing resentment-growth.

But if a husband believes that his wife has a God-given mandate to be submissive, maybe he assumes he doesn't have to do any of the nice things that would naturally bring out a loving response in return?

That would be a husband who abuses the Bible rather than applying it. The Bible does not teach this attitude even remotely. It actually puts a much higher burden on the man than on the woman.

"She should just do it," he might say ... "Well, if he were a little more considerate toward me, I might be nicer to him!"

I have yet to see a biblical leader-submissive marriage function this way. This usually only happens when men are passive and refuse to lead.

each is waiting for the other person to make the first move

Yes - when you hit the devastating pattern of mean/lazy-mean/lazy strategy, each waiting for the other to play a nice card. You're right, this is a sad, sad shame. It usually comes because one person sees a hole in the other's strategy and takes advantage of it, putting in a mean card where it wasn't rightly played. Things slowly spiral down from there.

How does biblical submission benefit wives?

1 upvotes · 21 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm still not sure from it how this obedience thing plays out in practice

That might be the first disconnect - submission and obedience are two different things. Submissiveness is an attitude/character of the heart. Obedience is an action. A wife can be 100% obedient and yet entirely unsubmitive. I've seen this many times. That said, a submissive wife will be obedient most of the time, but not necessarily 100%. In MMSLP, Athol Kay talks about how there are some times he makes a decision and his wife does something different because she has information he doesn't know about and there's no time to talk about it, so he just runs with it. That's not her being "unsubmitive" because she didn't obey - that's her trying to do what's best for her family in a snap-judgment that if he had all the facts he would have agreed and made the same choice. Where this deviates from submission is when the wife just always assumes this and therefore chooses not to give the facts because (1) she assumes she knows what her husband would want, and (2) usually subconsciously, she doesn't want to risk hearing that he might want something different.

That has not been my experience!

Your description of your experience is good, if it's actually working the way you think it does. If this works for you with a healthy emotional bond and a frequent, intense sex-life, more power to you. But at the same time, don't be too caught off guard if in a few years you're in marriage counseling and he's complaining that his needs never get met and he feels like you walk all over him. I'm not saying this will happen to you, but 9 times out of 10 it will, you might be that 1 where it's not like that and there genuinely is no resentment. Yay! for you and him if that's the case!

He always takes out the dogs, so if they're barking to be let out, I can go on reading or whatever

Two things here: this system obviously works for you because the list of stuff that needs to get done is small enough that you actually have time to read. Also, it doesn't sound like you have kids, so when something's cleaned up it probably stays clean for longer than 10 minutes.

When my wife and I were newlyweds everything was about as easy as you describe. Even with one kid, it was tolerable and efficient. When we had our second kid, that's when things started shifting ... and then the third and now fourth kid have expounded on this.

having some kind of a system in place is probably better than ... when they don't read your mind, lol.

Sadly, most marriages don't work this way by default - mine included. You heard my melon story as one of many, many examples of when I struggled with telling my wife what she could do to help me.

On my wife's end, it was literally everything. "I shouldn't have to tell you to do the dishes! You should just know that I want them done and then do it because you love me!" Then I'd respond, "I've got a million other things to get done. I do ___ and ___ and ___ and ___ [and keep listing]. I don't have time for the dishes today." Her response: "Then you should prioritize and start thinking about what would make me happy every now and then." About 75% of the time this conversation would happen while she's watching TV and I'm getting the kids ready for bed. I have yet to meet a man who hasn't identified with this conversation. Of course, I haven't met your husband either.

Well, whose fault is that?!

The man's, of course. That's why RP law says to fix the man to fix the home. If a man's not happy, it's his responsibility to take steps to move toward his happiness. I think I was more getting at the point that when a husband is not leading and/or his wife is not submissive, that's the mentality that husbands develop, which is detrimental to the relationship as a whole, even if it's beneficial to the wife in the short-term.

You don't need the blanket authority of "Biblical submission" to do this

I agree - you don't need biblical principles to do that. But at that point I was only explaining what the dynamic actually looks like and some of the factors that cause the poor dynamic. A straight 50/50 dynamic looks differently and has its own issues, but these are extremely rare.

I'm happy to be of service because he is so good to me ... This isn't because I feel some sort of obligation to "obey" him ... he's my man; I want him to be happy.

That's biblical submission.

It's probably important to remember that when Ephesians 5:22 says, "Wives, submit to your own husbands, as to the Lord," if we add the immediate context, backing up to 5:21 it says, "submitting to one another out of reverence for Christ. Wives, submit to your own husbands, as to the Lord." So, there is an element where there should be mutual submission. Your husband should help and serve you because he loves you, just as you help and serve him because you love him - neither of you doing this out of "duty" or rote obedience.

If you did things just to "obey" your husband and he did things for you because he has to rather than because he wants to, that's the same thing as going into the bedroom and giving starfish duty sex. It's just not fun or enjoyable and it breeds resentment. Submissiveness comes from the heart. If you already have that attitude toward your husband, that's great. Most wives don't. I don't say that to be mean or mysoginistic, it's just a fact proven not only by biblical text, but repeated observation, study and research from secular scientists, sociologists, psychologists, etc. It doesn't take the Bible to point out that most women like being the dominant ones to run the home and most husbands are passive and get walked all over. If you've already gotten past that, then good on you :)

How does biblical submission benefit wives?

1 upvotes · 21 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

2/2

how this 'submission' thing plays out in real life

I can't count the number of guys who I've told that melon story to and I'm getting all kinds of "Amen, brother!" It's in the high 90% range. Most of them will affirm, "My wife thinks everything's just fine and I'm stupidly reaffirming to her how great things are." Or even worse, "My wife thinks things are falling apart and I can't bear to tell her it's worse than she knows because I'm not happy either! At least right now she thinks I'm happy, so that's some small consolation for her. God only knows what would happen if she found out how I really feel!"

As a result, especially in most marriages, "this 'submission' thing" plays out with the guy submitting to his wife.

When the husband actually does step up and start leading the relationship all of those, "What do you want for dinner?" "I don't know, you decide!" conversations go out the door. The husband isn't bossing around his wife like a slave driver, but he's telling her what will actually help him as opposed to what she perceives will help him. The balance of responsibilities then shifts drastically. Wives are extremely good at communicating what's important to them and what they want done. Husbands already know most of these things because he has observed her prioritization in what she's been doing when she's running the show. Wives, on the other hand, are almost unanimously ignorant of what their husbands want, other than the common trope: "men only want sex!" That's a lie, but sex is high enough of a priority for most men that if they're getting it, that'll placate them from bothering their wives with the other stuff they really care about.

I should also clarify that when most husbands do speak up about things that they want their wives doing, it's not what they want their wives to do, it's either (1) stuff they think their wife will want them to want, so they're trying to impress their wives by identifying it as a want, even if they don't really care about it, or (2) stuff that needs to get done, regardless of whether or not they have an affirmative desire for it to get done. For example, I don't care if the weeds get pulled or not, but I know it needs to get done at some point or the neighbors will call the city prosecutor on us. Cutting that melon doesn't need to get done, but I want it to get done.

So, the effect of a leader-submissive relationship ends up looking on the surface as almost identical to every other relationship, but the difference is that the actual allocation of responsibilities is different from when the wife just does her own thing or runs the show, and the new allocation accounts for the husband's desires and wishes. If the husband doesn't experience the internal sense of authority in the household or the wife refuses to submit to that sense of authority, the husband will always clam up and become internally, secretly resentful. The alternative is that the husband does lead and the wife is not submissive, so you're just butting heads all the time and can't stop fighting over stupid stuff, in which case the husband still becomes resentful. Resentful husbands resort to things like pornography, getting a mistress, alcohol, drugs, video games, TV/movie addiction, and all kinds of other things to numb the resentment: "I can deal with it as long as I have my release."

How does biblical submission benefit wives?

1 upvotes · 21 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

1/2

The bottom line is that God told us to do it that way, so we have an obligation to do it that way. But that doesn't do much to answer the "why" question.

don't you just sort of hash things out as you go along?

Of course, everyone does. The problem is that these "hash things out" sessions are never an exactly equal dynamic with regard to internal stability. As a result, regardless of the outcome, the partner who perceives him/herself as being the needier/less assertive of the two will always walk away from those conversations feeling like he/she got the raw end of the deal. If they are, in fact, equal, it's still possible that they both feel like they're lesser, so they're both going to feel like they caved too much and that they're getting screwed. Even if they don't feel like this initially, over time the minor imbalances cause resentment to build.

They key thing to remember here is that a person's perception of a 'good marriage' is not defined by how well the ship runs, but by how happy the crew is running the ship. So, even though everything gets done when you "has things out as you go along," 9 times out of 10 one side or the other will feel resentment about how things are getting done, and out of those 9, much of the time it's both.

Now, I keep saying "perception" because that's usually all that matters to us. We, as humans, rarely care about objective reality. For example, God's primary purpose for marriages is to make disciples. A marriage that's accomplishing this goal is objectively a "good marriage" because it is fulfilling its primary purpose, even if the couple isn't happy along the way (although I've never seen a disciple-making marriage that's truly unhappy - the exceptions come when people don't understand discipleship and assume they're fulfilling that purpose when they're not). But even though this objective goal may be accomplished, the couple may still feel like it's a failing marriage because they are harboring resentment at how the primary goal is accomplished, thereby failing the secondary goal of marriage: mutual joy in one another. Most people perceive this secondary goal as primary and the primary goal as non-existent (i.e. they individualize it rather than considering it a joint endeavor), which changes the experienced dynamic.

Do you guys really tell your wives in the morning, "Today I expect you to wash my car and while you're at it, make me a sammich!"

No, that's called being a jerk.

I know what I need to do in day-to-day life ... I don't really need a husband to instruct me

You might be surprised by how many marriages there are where the wife feels this way, but the husband is completely resentful against him/her. When wives feel this way, it's usually because they're the dominant ones and they're blind to the fact that their husbands are unhappy with the arrangement. These wives are also often blind to their husbands actual wants, needs, and desire because he rarely ever communicates them or they assume it always revolves around sex and nothing else. The husband will also often deny his unhappiness because the church tells him it's a good thing to bend over to his wife's every whim, so he has a spiritual misperception that he should be happy in circumstances where he's not. In order to reconcile this, he simply puts on his happy face and tries his hardest to convince himself and everyone else he's happy. It might even work for a short while, but he's really just repressing the unhappiness rather than dealing with it, so a few months down the road he explodes at his wife when she does something small to set him off.

Here's a simple case study: I love eating golden honeydew melon. I could eat a whole one every day. But I hate cutting them. My wife doesn't mind cutting them and she's home all day and has the time to do it. I know that she's okay with it. But for some reason I have this internal inclination that it's not okay to tell my wife to do something that's helpful to me (anti-submissive feminist agenda, nice guy syndrome, pedestalizing my wife's happiness, etc. all play in). I make a subconscious assumption that my wife will be happier if she doesn't have to worry about doing things I want her to do on top of the stuff she wants herself to do. This is expounded by the fact that she puts a ton of stuff on herself that doesn't matter to me. So, she fills up her time with stuff that I perceive as useless, but because I know it matters to her I accept the fact that her responsibility list is really high, so I am dissuaded from asking her to cut that stupid melon for me. I do it myself or let it sit for so long that it goes bad. One way or another, the end result is that my wife sees no problems because she never knew that I really wanted her to cut that melon, and I'm stuck doing something I hate doing or just not getting my melon at all. Although this might not register at a conscious level immediately, over time with several of these types of situations (and there are dozens for every couple every day) I develop a subconscious pattern of feeling like she only cares about her needs and not mine, whereas I'm also contributing to helping her needs, so I feel like it's a one-sided relationship ... yet if I show her I have needs, I'm afraid that adding the stress to her will break the relationship even more than suffering a one-sided feeling. Because I believe these are the only two options (one-sided v. breaking the marriage by having needs) one-sidedness is better for us in the long-run. Because I've chosen the "better" option, I must express myself as being happy and content because if I can't be happy and content in the best option, then I must admit that I can never be happy and content in my marriage and we're doomed to fail - and I will avoid that conclusion at any cost. The possibility of alternative options doesn't register because I've been conditioned to see things in a bi-modal way: it's going to be one-sided against her or against me, and because I know my limits and don't know/trust hers, I have to be happy with it being one-sided against me for fear of what the reverse might cause.

I know this is stupid, but that's legit how most men process life, especially within churches. Nowadays, I just say, "Hey Babe, can you cut that melon for me while I'm out at the gym? I'd love to have it as a snack when I get back." At first she would resist because it's more work for her, but she'd do it resentfully. After a couple weeks, that resentment turned to affection. Why? Because I was actually inviting her into my heart to help me in areas that actually matter to me. I don't give a crap if she dusts the house, vacuums the living room, redecorates the bathroom, or cooks me dinner. I don't value those things from her in and of themselves, although I express appreciation anyway because it does take work off of my plate. But cutting that stupid melon ... even though it's a much easier, stupider, simpler task, it matters to me and she gets to partake in that and know that my appreciation is genuine and not obligatory.

[Update] How do I catch her cheating. Looking back what a waste of fucking time !

1 upvotes · 21 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Oops ... now I remember the context of this conversation :p haha.

No, the reconciliations usually [nix that: have always] happen[ed] before psych evals are ever performed, although sometimes the people come in with a suspicion and it just never gets confirmed.

[Update] How do I catch her cheating. Looking back what a waste of fucking time !

1 upvotes · 21 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'm sure there's something there, but I feel like I'd be working more off of assumptive interpretation rather than observational deduction :/ I try to avoid mixing assumption and statistics as much as possible (although it's kind of inherent in every probabilistic conclusion). Thanks for the recommendation, though.

[Update] How do I catch her cheating. Looking back what a waste of fucking time !

1 upvotes · 21 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Good question. Usually our client is unaware of his or her own issues and suspects the other side of having a mental health problem (we deal with all mental health cases, PDs are just the most common). People also come to us when the other side has filed a motion for a psych eval against them and they want someone experienced in helping them through that aspect of their case. They also come to us after psych evals are already done because of our knowledge and ability to discredit crappy evaluations. Some people come to us because they were referred by their mental health specialist (psychiatrist, therapist, marriage counselor, etc.) because we have a broad network of those. Others just find us online and don't even know we address psych issues, but it ends up conning up in their case anyway (or not sometimes). So, I can't peg it to just one thing or make broad, sweeping generalizations about why our clients come to see I'd and I've never tried to correlate the intake source with the issues that come up in the case.

[Update] How do I catch her cheating. Looking back what a waste of fucking time !

1 upvotes · 21 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Well, we haven't had a case for homosexual divorce yet, so every case we deal with has had one guy and one girl. Sometimes we have the girl, sometimes not. Sometimes our client has the PD, sometimes it's the other side, sometimes it's both.

My stats come from our cases, not just our clients (i.e. I include what I know of the other side too). One of our past psycho clients was actually just stalking us today ... She was being really creepy, hanging around outside our door talking to other clients even though she's not our client anymore.

[Update] How do I catch her cheating. Looking back what a wast of fucking time !

1 upvotes · 21 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

About 50/50 ... Maybe 55/45 with a tad few more women.

103 - Desire Cultivates Intimacy

1 upvotes · 20 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Weird. I've never had that problem. Maybe reddit does that to prevent spam?

103 - Desire Cultivates Intimacy

1 upvotes · 20 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I was agreeing that people tend to overthink and complicate things. I have no idea what you mean by "7-10 minutes between posts blocker."

[Update] How do I catch her cheating. Looking back what a wast of fucking time !

1 upvotes · 20 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Thank you for this. I understand much better now.

even if you think you want it to work out, file for divorce. This triggers her respect and genuine loss aversion.

I will note, of the couples I have helped toward reconciling (9 to date), 7 of them had filed first. Of those 7, only 1 was the woman filing first. Interestingly, of divorces that actually go through, it's closer to 75% where the woman files first (although our firm's strategy may play slightly into that).

How does biblical submission benefit wives?

1 upvotes · 20 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Because god is Red Pill. He knows that women ...

This is a good point and one worth remembering. God knows exactly how he created men and women and the inherent tendencies he placed in each. So, when women want to argue against why God didn't put them in charge, the only alternative to arguing against his given plan is to argue against how he created men and women in the first place, in which case their argument is, essentially: Why couldn't God have give women all those male instincts and men all the women instincts instead? Why didn't he create women to be men and men to be women? Of course, if he did then we'd be dealing with the exact same issue in reverse.

He did not leave them without a voice and with no power. He gave them power that BALANCED and blended with the power of men to create a good society.

This is where the feminist agenda misses the point. To them, there is no balance. It's all or nothing. If they preached anything else, they would lose so many people to the middle that the hard-corers no longer have a platform to stand on.

given women more and more power and taken it from men since the 1950's.

This hit a major head with the first "no fault" divorce laws in CA in 1969. That's when everything really changed. That said, you're right that it started in the 50s, post-war, because PTSD ruined the vets' ability to lead their home, yet they were the poster-boys of "masculine men" that everyone was to aspire to be like. At the same time, while they were off to war, the women got comfortable having all the power at home and weren't willing to give it up. "You haven't been here for the last 5 years. You can't just come back [from risking your life for our family and country and the greater good?!?] and start telling me what to do after all this time."

Really, men were crippled post-war for having a mission outside the home. Is it any wonder, then, that it's this wave of men who started idolizing their wives, whom they had longed for as their only hope and motivation to keep fighting while overseas? It reminds me of the song, "A girl worth fighting for," from Mulan, which my kids love watching. It's a beautiful song full of RP concepts, but shows how even though the men have that attitude, the overall theme still ends up being feminine empowerment.

marriage is not even a viable institution any longer

From a purely secular standpoint, I'm absolutely shocked when couples get married but still file taxes separately. You're giving up pretty much the only social advantage non-Christian marriage has to offer. Christian marriage, on the other hand, does have many additional benefits to our spiritual lives that I don't expect the non-Christian to appreciate or partake in.

Sure it CAN work for a select few

I'm sure you'd agree: the fact that it CAN work doesn't make it a good idea. A select few individuals might be able to shoot an apple off of a person's head while blindfolded ... but this is still a pretty dumb thing to do if both parties aren't being grossly compensated for the risk of dying or being charged with reckless homicide. That compensation simply doesn't exist in our society as to non-Christian marriage.

it is the children who will lead us

I give the institution of "marriage" no more than 10 generations down the line before it's either entirely overhauled or abolished altogether. I won't live to see the day, but the wheels are in motion and have been for the past 60-70 years. When that gets to an even 200, that's when I'm calling it. The only reason I say so long and not sooner is because the "everyone else is doing it" mentality is really hard to break, even when logic doesn't support it.

6 Questions for Christian Merps

1 upvotes · 20 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

What part of the Creed to Mormons reject

That's a very long question to answer, but suffice it to say that most Mormons point to the Nicene Creed as the shining example of why "God" had to send the BOM to fix all the misperceptions in the church. Denial of the trinity is the biggest rejection of the creed. This old thread might provide some answers (I only skimmed it). CARM also has a very good overview of some of the more interesting and distinctive Mormon beliefs.

I think we need to be very careful in issuing decrees on who and who is not a Christian.

I completely agree with this. But at the same time, it's not wise just to let anyone who self-identifies as a Christian to be "in." 1 Corinthians 5 sets clear boundaries for who should not be able to associate with the name of Christ. Without some kind of standard you get people like this and articles like this, which are consistent with things I've heard of in American branches of the Episcopal and Anglican churches, to name a couple.

Many in my denomination argue that Roman Catholicism ... Apostolic Succession ... Papal Infallibility ... Transubstantiation ... rank heresy

Totally agreed, and a lot of those arguments are idiotic, even when they do strike on important issues. The soteriological distinctions are what concern me most. For example, if one teaches that you can't be saved without accepting Joseph Smith as a true prophet, that's a salvation issue and is drawing a clear line.

Salvation by grace through faith will always be a non-negotiable for identification as "Christian" for any sub that I run. If someone wants to append to that some understanding of how works fit into a soteriological model, I may have some room for leniency as long as they're not trying to remove "grace through faith" from the soteriological model they propose.

[Update] How do I catch her cheating. Looking back what a wast of fucking time !

1 upvotes · 20 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Good point.

[Update] How do I catch her cheating. Looking back what a wast of fucking time !

1 upvotes · 20 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

That is patently not how it works

I know that's not how it works, but I've heard at least 3 women say this with my own ears.

That said, I totally get what you're saying about it not being the "sex we want." This makes a lot of sense.

Are you really trying to have the "no secular morality or standards" argument? Is Jesus really the only thing preventing you from hotwifing and an open marriage? Ridiculous.

Not at all. I just wanted to understand others' perspectives better, as I deal with non-Christian men with marital difficulties every day as part of my profession.

[Update] How do I catch her cheating. Looking back what a wast of fucking time !

1 upvotes · 20 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Great article. Thanks for the reference.

Was this the an RP move? Need advice/input.

1 upvotes · 20 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks!

The Importance of Qualified Pastors

1 upvotes · 20 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

If a man's chief mission is his wife's happiness/glory/benefit, her helping him becomes helping herself

Brilliant.

103 - Desire Cultivates Intimacy

1 upvotes · 20 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with your premise here. Thanks for clarifying.

[META] Field Reports, OYS, etc?

1 upvotes · 20 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent points :)

What if we set up a challenge for every 100 marker of subs we get? That'll give some time to come up with content for the first one.

BPP on Divorce in a Christian Marriage

1 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I follow now, thanks!

Reacting v. Responding v. STFU

1 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Dang, yeah, that's a rough situation. I've been there before and there are a few strategies:

IGNORE - This was already recommended and it's a lot harder than the title would imply. It also takes a lot of time. The key is to remember that the goal of the "ignore" strategy isn't to get her to stop (she won't with this strategy); it's to get yourself to stop caring.

COALS OF KINDNESS - The Bible has this phrase: "If your enemy is hungry, feed him; if he is thirsty, give him something to drink. In doing this, you will heap burning coals on his head. Do not be overcome by evil, but overcome evil with good." (Romans 12:20-21). When she realizes that not only can't she get to you, but that you're trudging forward in happy land her frame will buckle to yours instead of the other way around.

Really, that's all this tactic is: fogging mixed with frame refortification. The fogging is the be good to her part. If she says something dumb, don't DEER as to why your way is better or how you really do know more than her. Just agree with her in some way, even if she's wrong.

HER: If you touch that machine with a latex glove you're going to cause a meltdown in the hospital and maybe blow up the whole planet, you friggin idiot ... shows you how much you know after only 1 year compared to my 26!

YOU: I understand where you're coming from and I see how you would think that [fogging]. I respect your experience in this situation [self-disclosure, even if exaggerated]. I'm sure under some circumstances that might actually happen [fogging some more]. But I'm going to do it anyway [then broken record this].

As you continue to respond with kindness and a refusal to entertain her lunacy with arguments, she will come to value the fact that you at least respect and understand her, even if it doesn't result in her controlling you. Then, as you broken-record your way into assertively pursuing your way of doing things, she will realize it's a futile effort to keep pushing on you when (from her perspective a few months down the road) you fully grasp her point of view and understand her, but have your own system of doing things anyway.

MENTAL PATIENT - If that doesn't work, she probably has a mental disorder. In fact, I'm confident from what you've described that this is probably the case. Go check my post on identifying mental disorders, see what you think fits her best and report back so I can give clearer feedback. That said, my best guess is she has a predominant Narcissistic Personality Disorder with Antisocial and Borderline features. She might even have a touch of Schizotypal elements in there. It's not common for this type of blending. In fact, the diagnosis for one of the parties in the last case I just had a trial on (last week) was: "Other Specified Personality Disorder (with Borderline, Antisocial, Histrionic, Schizoid, Dependent and Obsessive-Compulsive Features); Disruptive Mood Dysregulation Disorder; Major Depressive Disorder, Recurrent Episode, Severe; Unspecified Disruptive, Impulse-Control, and Conduct Disorder." Geeze ... and this stuff is more common than you'd think, especially when people act the way you've described. But usually I only see one primary with 1-2 secondary "features," if that.

Either way, I don't want to speak more as to how to interact with someone with a PD until I actually have a good feel for what the PD is, and which features are present. "All of them! She's the most psycho person you've ever met!" is not helpful, if that's where you would go :p

DEFER TO AUTHORITY - I've also found it effective in many situations to be assertive about deferring to the authority structure as a workable compromise. I don't know if she's on par with you or beneath you in level, or perhaps even above, but my guess is that there's a higher authority than both of you. As long as she's not your immediate supervisor, just implement fogging and broken record in the direction of deferring responsibility for your actions to your actual supervisor.

HER: You idiot, don't you know you're going to kill everyone in here if you blink 7 times like that? Geeze, my 26 years of experience sure knows more than your stupid 1.

YOU: I can see how you'd think that [fogging]. I certainly don't want to kill people [self-disclosure]. But I'm going to do things the way I was trained to do them [and broken record this]. If you think this will be a problem, I'm happy to give you the contact information for my supervisor so he can address the issue and any additional training I may need [workable compromise].

The key is to remain fairly robotic in tone through all of these conversations. Any hint of emotion is a string she's going to start tugging at until you unravel. I often like to imagine myself as one of those pre-recorded phone answering services that has default responses for everything. Built up your repertoire of default responses and practice being monotone. This truly works.

Reacting v. Responding v. STFU

1 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

What's your occupation? Frame came naturally to me by virtue of being an attorney. All I had to do was convert what I was doing in my profession to my home life, which was insanely fast. Maybe you could try developing frame in your workplace there, as people will expect you to be more rigid, and then it's just a conversion game and not trying to reinvent the wheel with your SO.

BPP on Divorce in a Christian Marriage

1 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm confused ... is M102 getting a second wife after divorce or is it more like the husband/wife 2.0 concept? I can't tell from the context here.

Was this the an RP move? Need advice/input.

1 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That totally makes sense. Good explanation.

BPP on Divorce in a Christian Marriage

1 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I understand now :)

BPP on Divorce in a Christian Marriage

1 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Well, wives should get their butt in gear and be more loveable, and make it easier for him to make you happy, etc.

Two things to note on this. First, I have often refrained IRL that this notion of "my husband must be my prince who pursues me - it's not my job to spark things up" is not found in the Bible. What we constantly see is women seducing the man until his boner can't take it anymore and he'll fight through any obstacle to have his way with her. Look at Boaz, who was so turned on by Ruth literally sleeping in his bedroom before they were married that he was willing to pay a hefty price as the kinsman redeemer just to have her. This isn't a story about the noble savior-man rescuing the damsel in distress. 90% of the story is about the girl's need, effort, and success at being seductive to ignite the man. Most of the book of Song of Solomon is the same way.

Second, you're assuming that women know what will make them happy. This is a very, very long-shot, in my experience. I can't count the number of times where I have talked to my wife when she's not "in the zone," asking her what would help or make her happy and she admits: "I have no idea." I make all kinds of suggestions and they're all rejected. Eventually I would give up, take charge of the situation, and just start doing rather than talking. Guess what? She'd be happy within minutes. That's not to say I had performed psychological voodoo to figure out what she needed in that moment. She just needed to go from thinking and talking to doing, but she didn't know how to do that and it took me being a leader in LITERALLY ANYTHING to send her emotions running in the right direction.

House-wife v. SAHM

1 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Haha. Nice.

Was this the an RP move? Need advice/input.

1 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm pretty sure most hard-core RPer would recommend ghosting. As a Christian, I don't think this is the best approach.

The bigger issue isn't necessarily in what you said, but the probable reason why you said it and how that reason was likely expressed, given the context of the rest of the conversation. The words communicate a clear boundary, which is good; but the context proves that she got to you, which is bad.

If the whole of the conversation were RP, you simply would have started like this, "Hey, I'd love to have a relationship with you. I get that you're seeing someone else, but I'm not going to wait my turn and I'm not okay with being 'just friends.' So, can I pick you up for dinner tomorrow?" When she rejects you, you respond, "No biggie. I'm not here to force you. But like I said, I don't think this friends thing is going to work. I hope you understand." If she tries to stalk you after that, just put this conversation on loop until she goes away. If it gets stalker-ish, you may actually have won her over. If stalker-ish without winning her over, then ghosting is appropriate, as you'd have done everything you could at that point to separate in peace with grace.

How does biblical submission benefit wives?

1 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

and I thought some women had asked those questions of you irl as well

Yes, they have. They usually come from closet feminists in the church, though. They're just bitter at what God said, so they prefer to imagine a "better way" than the way God did it. My usual response is that it's pointless imagining what God could have done when we only have to concern ourselves with what he actually did.

No. We disagree on this one. If He indeed mirrors who He is

That's the thing, though. Who put the restriction on God to say: "You're only allowed to create a universe that mirrors you!"? Sure, that's what he actually did, but who is preventing him from doing it a different way?

I think you and I are "challenged" to write short responses lol

It's always been a problem. That's the lawyer in me - always wanting to over-explain.

BPP on Divorce in a Christian Marriage

1 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I thought the idea was to "save the marriage" and that is why I wrote my book. They have clearly and unanimously agreed that the purpose of MRP is to save the man and saving the marriage is merely a byproduct.

It took me a while to realize this.

It is clear the man must save himself first or the marriage stays in the crapper.

I agree with this as well. That said, I don't think the concepts are mutually exclusive. One can have an intention to save his marriage while still himself being saved. The idea that one must abandon commitment to his wife in order to restore that commitment is something I haven't seen yet. But I'll chalk that up to inexperience on good faith for now.

BPP on Divorce in a Christian Marriage

1 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

some men might say, it's been 3 days! I want a divorce." And honestly, my heart might be with em, but God commands husbands to love their wives and to forgive

There's also 2 Timothy 2, "If we are faithless, he remains faithful." Preceding this is: "If we disown him, he will disown us." In other words, the way God interacts with us is that He lets us walk away by our own intentional, conscious choice; but our faithlessness to the covenant will not prevent him from holding up his end. If this is to be modeled in marriages (due to the parallel established by Ephesians 5 and many other like-passages), the implication is that simple laziness is not enough to warrant a divorce. It has to be a willful, conscious rejection.

Now, if a wife gets to that point where she's constantly making that choice, a passage like Hebrews 10:26-27 would apply: "For if we go on sinning deliberately after receiving the knowledge of the truth, there no longer remains a sacrifice for sins, but a fearful expectation of judgment and a fury of fire that will consume the adversaries."

Let me translate to this context: "For if she goes on withholding sex from her husband deliberately after having been confronted about her sin, there no longer remains anything for the husband to do, only a fearful expectation of sacking the judge on her with the most hard-hitting attorney money can buy."

Tag: /u/BluePillProfessor - you might want to add that Hebrews reference to your repertoire ;)

Lastly ... how do you distinguish between a wife who "withholds sex" and a husband who thinks she does because he's really bad at initiating and misinterprets cues like, "I'm tired" or "I have a headache" as "Don't even try to have sex with me tonight" when she really just means she's tired or has a headache? What about when a woman likes to play hard-to-get or give fitness tests because that's how she turns herself on and the guy's just not passing it? Is that withholding because the guy's too dumb to know how to rev up her engines? The questions abound from here.

BPP on Divorce in a Christian Marriage

1 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

You may also be interested in this from a guy I know on Facebook:

—

Interesting little thing I was reminded of when discussing Matthew 5:27-28 with someone last night.

Jesus says, "You have heard that it was said, 'Do not commit adultery.' But I tell you, everyone who looks at a woman lustfully has committed adultery with her in his heart." Most Christians think that Jesus is re-defining the nature of the law here (I once thought this too) away from physical expression to a condition of the heart. In reality, he's pointing out the fact that their culture was changing the law with their word choice when, in fact, the law was always about a heart orientation.

For context, in the verses right before this he says, "Not an iota, not a dot, will pass from the law until all is accomplished. Therefore, whoever relaxes one of the least of these commandments and teaches others to do the same will be called least in the kingdom of heaven."

He then immediately goes into referencing the command, "Do not murder." He properly quotes the commandment, but then adds, "But I tell you if you are angry at your brother ... you are subject to judgment and hell fire" (slight paraphrase). Despite popular belief, he doesn't say, "If you're angry, that's the same as murder." I believe he's referencing various passages, the most notable of which is Psalm 37:8-9. The Septuagint is a Greek translation of the OT (which was originally in Hebrew). The word Jesus uses for "angry" is a different conjugation of the same word used in Psalm 37:8-9, which essentially says, "If you're angry, that leads to evil, which will lead to your destruction." Sound familiar? Jesus just said the same thing: "Anger leads to judgment and hell fire" [we're talking about unrighteous anger, of course].

In short, what Jesus did there is showed that they were doing what they accused him of doing: skirting around the law. They focus on the commandment, "Do not murder," while ignoring the psalm, "Refrain from anger," the consequence of which leads to destruction. They were removing pen strokes from the law, whereas Jesus had kept the whole of the law the entire time.

Then Jesus gets into the adultery section and says, essentially, "And even when you quote the 10 commandments, you're still doing this!" To re-quote it with the Septuagint's Greek words added where they go:

"You have heard that it was said, 'You shall not commit adultery' [moicheuseis]. But I say to you that everyone who looks at a woman with lustful intent [epithumesai] has already committed adultery [emoicheusen] with her in his heart" (Matthew 5:27-28).

Why do I include those words? Because in the Septuagint Exodus 20:14 references moicheia for "do not commit adultery," but they were failing to teach Exodus 20:17, referencing epithymeseis, which Jesus had to add back in.

Why does that matter? Because Jesus isn't re-defining the law here. He's telling them that their common vernacular was trying to change the meaning of the law when God intended the law to be fulfilled from our hearts and not merely our actions from the time he first gave the 10 commandments.

So, who was actually the one abolishing the law and removing not only "iotas and dots" but whole words? The teachers of the law were the ones doing that! And Jesus just proved that his teachings are actually more aligned with the OT Scriptures than what was being taught to the Jewish people at that time, despite that people accused him of abandoning the law.

To be clear, at first they were looking only at the 10 commandments (don't murder) while ignoring the "lesser" commands from other places in Scripture (the Psalm passage). Then he shows them that even their understanding of the 10 commandments themselves - the most fundamental part of Jewish culture at the time - was wrong or cherry-picking.

This might seem like unnecessary technicalities, but to me it is beautiful to see what Jesus was doing and how it fits together. A plain reading in the English translations not only leads to incomplete (although not harmful) interpretations, but it misses the entire beauty behind the flow of what Jesus is doing in this passage.

I am constantly impressed by the way Jesus taught, lived, and passed on truth to us.

BPP on Divorce in a Christian Marriage

1 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

most Christian denominations today interpret the Mathew Divorce exception as only for adultery when that is not even the word that was used!

Indeed, this frustrates me to no end.

Each Greek interpreter uses the word "Porneo" to interpret what Jesus had said in Aramaic

This is another issue I often harp on. People try to use cross-references to other NT uses of porneia to try to define the word, all the while forgetting that their use of the word in the epistles is based on Jesus' use of the Aramaic, not the other way around.

all the earliest translators of Mathew specifically ruled out that "adultery" was the "only" valid grounds for divorce.

Agreed. This is a misconception based on people who don't look past the English translations.

"porneo" which includes any sin and certainly any sexual sin

Here's where we may start to differ. I don't recall my studies of porneia referencing just any sexual sin, although it is certainly more broad than moicheia. If we go with the broad definition, then Jesus is essentially saying that any guy who ever lusts after a woman, then masturbates has committed porneia and his wife is allowed to divorce him. This would mean that, essentially, 99% of women can divorce their husbands with no sin. Looking at the context of the passage, I don't get the impression that Jesus was trying to open up the grounds for divorce; rather, he was trying to: (1) point out that the Jews were picking and choosing which laws to follow and how they wanted to follow them; and (2) show that these issues all begin in the heart in the first place, not necessarily our physical actions.

I am confident from my research that the divorce exception includes a sexually withdrawing spouse and not merely a person who commits adultery

I'll have to contemplate this one.

I don't know how I can reconcile that with the greater context that Jesus seems to be broadening the scope in which certain sins are actually sinful (i.e. murder is broadened to anger; adultery is broadened to lust; oaths are broadened to any verbal affirmation), and not relaxing them (see Matthew 5:26 - the verse immediately preceding all of this, for context). If the pattern is followed, Jesus is increasing the contexts in which divorce is sinful, not increasing the number of circumstances in which divorce is acceptable.

To put it another way: it wouldn't make sense in his list of sins to say, "You're actually doing this sin when you don't think you are; same with that one; same with that one; oh, but not divorce - you're actually better off on that one than you thought; but oaths, yeah, that one too."

Alternative Route to a Similar Conclusion

As you noted, withholding sex is certainly a sin. Matthew 18 says that if your brother (presumably applying to any believer, per Matthew 12:49) sins against you, you're to confront him about it. In this case, I take that to apply to the wife as well.

If she won't repent, you bring witnesses to talk about the issue together (ex. Christian marriage counseling). If she still won't repent, then you get the church leader involved. If she still won't repent, you're to treat her as a pagan or tax collector (read: non-Christian), remembering that Jesus spent most of his time loving on pagans and tax collectors, who would then follow him - including Matthew himself! (the guy who wrote those words).

Now, in 1 Corinthians 7 Paul says quite plainly, "If you're married to an unbeliever and they want out, let them go." So, if your withholding spouse wants to divorce you, you're free to say, "Adios and farewell" - AFTER having first done everything you can to reconcile per the Matthew 18 process. To that end, if they won't work with you, let them file for divorce.

Going one step further, if you want to be the one to initiate the divorce (perhaps they like the beta comforts you're giving them), if they are stuck in unrepentant sin and yet still call themselves Christians, 1 Corinthians 5 (specifically v. 11) says we shouldn't even eat with these people and we should expel them from the church. Granted, the context could easily be read that he's talking about situations where their sin will degrade the name of Christ to outsiders (reading a more broad context would be very hard to reconcile with other contexts), so a private sin issue between spouses that isn't being publicized to outsiders might not work here, but it's certainly another option to think about if she's pretty open with her friends about her withholding nature.

The one situation this doesn't cover is if your spouse openly acknowledges she's an unbeliever and yet refuses to divorce you. This can suck for guys who got married believing she was a believer, but later discovered she was not or that she fell from the faith (depending on your stance on eternal security).

Was this the an RP move? Need advice/input.

1 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

The hamster is a metaphor for how people's brains try to rationalize stupid things. The hamster hops on the wheel and cogs start spinning and spinning and spinning in the brain until some form of idiocy poops out. Here's the iconic example:

- Girl cheats on her boyfriend.
- Girl feels guilty and needs to feel right about what she did.
- Girl thinks to herself: My boyfriend has been pretty mean to me lately. He kind of deserved it.
- I haven't been getting enough sex from him. How else does he expect me to get my needs met?
- After seeing how that other guy ghosted after sleeping with me, I now see that other men are jerks. That makes me love my boyfriend even more - he's always there for me.
- Therefore it was actually a good thing that I cheated on him and he should be happy about it.
- But I shouldn't tell him because then he'd get mad because he wouldn't understand why it's such a blessing in disguise.

That's the female hamster in all its glory. In your story, she rationalized using you as being acceptable behavior. She also rationalized dating a non-Christian based on emotion, bad theology, and stupid logic. That was her hamster. Your hamster was the way you justified pining over her for so long without taking action much sooner.

We all have hamsters. Women's hamsters just spin the wheels a lot faster, so their cogs can rationalize a lot more stupid stuff than men can. My wife has actually gotten so fluent with this that she'll finally end arguments, "I know it doesn't make any sense at all. I can't explain to you why I want things done this way. I just know that it's what I want. Can you support me in that?" And then I have to decide whether or not the issue fits within my frame and follows the "pick your battles" principle.

Was this the an RP move? Need advice/input.

1 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

me saying that I did not want a friendship with her needed to be said I think, because she responded by asking if we could still be friends.

I fully understand. If you felt you needed to say, that's your judgment call to make. But as to the title question you asked: "Was this an RP move?" the answer is probably no. That said, you're not trying to pick her up anymore, so who cares if you didn't do things the technical RP way? Now, if the next girl you have your eyes set on was in the conversation, that'd be a different story.

Was this the an RP move? Need advice/input.

1 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

One thing I do disagree on though, is the "If you can't find the perfect, godly woman, raise one up." I don't think its an RP idea to take up girls with high n-counts, waste time on lost causes, etc.

Sorry, I thought I had mentioned that in my original comment: "find someone who's already on the path to Christ who you find attractive, enter into a relationship, and begin discipling her. If you have to, go below your bar and raise her up. Is she not very attractive, but has other great qualities? Join in and show her how to become attractive to you. Take her to the gym with you; go clothes shopping with her; help her pick out makeup and perfume. If she's already attractive, but spiritually immature, start a relationship and lead her into godliness."

To be clear, I DO NOT recommend dating a non-believer in the hope of saving them (very, very bad idea), nor do I recommend picking up someone with a high n-count in the hope that you can tame them, nor do I recommend picking someone who you know you could never be physically attracted to, even if they got their body in slammin' shape and developed great fashion sense. You simply cannot take a 2 and make her a 9. This is basic MMSLP. That said, if you've been looking for an 8, find a 5 or 6 and help her become an 8. That's manageable.

The other reason that traditional RP logic doesn't work here is that the qualities that define a good RP LTR are vastly abundant. Spiritual maturity in a woman is nowhere near as abundant (to be fair, it's pretty rare among guys too). You can't just go to the bar and find someone ... in fact, you're almost certain not to find a spiritually mature woman if that's the place you're going to look. But the bar holds dozens of LTR-material women from an RP standpoint. Combine the spiritually mature factor with all the factors that make up a good RP LTR girl and the odds just look uncannily dismal.

Seriously, this post goes into the stats and concludes that just looking at people who self-identify as Christian (ignoring everyone else in the world), only .155% (yes, that's a point 155, not 1.55) are spiritually mature, marriageable material, "which means 1 in 645 people would be marriageable ... which would mean you'd simultaneously have to attend 9 churches consistent with the median [church size] to find your souse." That's ridiculous.

Now, add in the fact that only 70.6% self-identify as Christian and that .155% of self-identifiers becomes .109%. That's about 1 out of every 900 people walking down the street would be the truly great, spiritually mature Christian woman that every Christian guy dreams of.

His conclusion? Same as mine: "But the better solution is to do as I have said in other posts: raise up someone to the caliber of person you would want to marry (but in a safe context to do so that doesn't 'lead people on')." [This is the same guy where I learned that concept in the first place.]

No matter how RP you are, RP can help you get the girl when you find her, but finding her is going to be a nightmare without actual divine intervention.

How does biblical submission benefit wives?

1 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

And they tend to question it (not constructively, but critically) when, among other things, their relationship with God isn't close, or when there's mental or emotional trauma or damage, etc.

There's your best point. The question I was asking wasn't a present-context "why," it was a "God could have designed women to be the leaders, or for shared leadership instead" kind of "why." But you're spot on: people only question this when they're not already walking maturely in Christ. Those who are one with Christ in Spirit, actively evangelising and discipling, and engaging in fellowship - those people instinctively know the answers even if they don't consciously think about it, so they're not the ones asking the question. The real answer is, "Just go after Jesus and it'll all be clear." Or to put it another way: "Seek first His Kingdom and His righteousness and all this will be added to you as well."

God is not saying there aren't good women to be found anywhere. But God, through the inspiration of the Holy Spirit speaking through Solomon (the presumed author of Ecclesiastes) is saying it's far easier to find a good man than to find a good woman

I'd contend Solomon is more likely referring to the fact that good men and women are rare, but at least among the men there was one. There's no "far easier to find a good man" context for that. But I do see what you're saying. I'm more inclined toward the position that the "one" he's referring to is either himself or his father. Some people say he's speaking prophetically about Jesus, but I don't see that connection.

The three persons of the Godhead are equal. They just have different roles.

I often use this explanation as well. I've had success referencing it like a bicycle. Wheels are not a bicycle. A frame is not a bicycle. Handle bars are not a bicycle. Put these all together and you have a bicycle. But the wheels don't decide where you go - the handle bars do. The handle bars don't hold the rider, the frame does. The frame doesn't propel the bike, the wheels do. Nobody values a pair of handle bars alone. They want a bike in all three components. The person riding the bike equally values all aspects of the bike insofar as it gets him where he's going. So does God value all aspects of the family unit insofar as we're moving forward, doing what He designed us to do.

How does biblical submission benefit wives?

1 upvotes · 18 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

How would you respond to the woman who argues: "Sure, someone needs to take the lead ... a kingdom divided and all that. But why does the wife have to be the submissive one? What if what God established in Eden was just a starting point until we evolved enough as a species for women to take over in some relationships? Or why didn't God create a system where the better leader should take charge?"

I've heard these questions before and have some ideas, but I'd love to hear others' feedback.

How does biblical submission benefit wives?

1 upvotes · 18 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Good word.

Advice to Young Women Today for a Better, Happier Life and Relationships

1 upvotes · 18 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Good call. Just make sure those efforts aren't always directed at her. If you're not taking care of yourself, you will burn out after 7-10 years, which is when most people get divorced. Otherwise, great story :)

103 - Desire Cultivates Intimacy

1 upvotes · 18 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Hey there. I appreciate your efforts to add a sense of humor to this sub. That said, when that humor comes off as trolling or is denigrating to our faith, it does violate the rules. I have removed 3 of your comments for this purpose. I'm happy to let you continue participating, but please be productive in your discourse, mixing humor in as appropriate, and not purely poking fun at the subject matter. Thanks!

House-wife v. SAHM

1 upvotes · 18 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I agree. Personally, I'm not big on apologetics and I have found, as you noted, that it's worthless as an evangelistic tool and only really has value in affirming principles of the faith to younger believers who might otherwise be led away. I was in the apologetics scene for a long time throughout high school and college, then when my faith became real it slowly faded away until I saw it in its appropriate context.

Bottom line, as you say: it eventually all boils down to faith, and trying to pretend otherwise is a violation of 1 Cor. 2.

What's the stance on using RP stuff in other arenas?

1 upvotes · 18 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

Nice.

House-wife v. SAHM

1 upvotes · 18 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Don't resent it, use it for your benefit.

In its various forms, I call this intellectual, relational, or emotional Aikido.

The point of Aikido is to use an opponent's force against it, rather than attacking with your own force. I do this in law all the time. The other side makes an argument that sounds flashy. Rather than arguing against it, I find a way that my client could abuse their rationale for his own gain. This simultaneously shows how idiotic the argument was in the first place while also making my client look like a saint because he's passing up on the chance to take advantage of what the other side is proposing. Judges eat that up. Then, when the judge rejects that idea, I propose what my client really wants and the other side, not being trained in intellectual Aikido, can only try to poke holes ... and we all know how people respond to DEERing.

You're proposing the same thing on a societal level: Let them make their arguments; and then we'll adopt their arguments to prove our point anyway.

Presuppositional apologetics also brushes on this concept. It makes an offensive weapon of atheist worldviews by taking those worldviews and showing how they either support the Bible or were stolen from the Bible in the first place.

I've spent a lot of time mastering pretty much every form of Aikido ... except physical :p

What's the stance on using RP stuff in other arenas?

1 upvotes · 18 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

Good thoughts. My dad and brothers are two I've been subtly influencing. I've only actually used the phrase "red pill" with my dad, who is having significant problems with his LTR (they've broken up, but still hang out sometimes; she's seeing other guys, he wants to see other girls, but is too butt-hurt and won't admit it). My brother just started a new LTR 6 months ago, but is extremely BP (even more than I ever was; his last LTR was completely non-physical with him, which is partly why they broke up). My other brother has just given up on girls entirely, after having his heart broken.

If I hear "happy wife happy life" ...

What's your typical response? This phrase gets used a lot in my church. My wife even used to say it. My response nowadays is, "That's right - a happy wife does give a happy life [fogging], but a happy wife comes from a happy husband."

My wife about choked when I first said that, but I've never heard her say the phrase again. At various times over the past several years, she's consciously acknowledged: "If you're not in a good mood during this, it's going to suck and I won't be able to enjoy it either." I think when I first corrected the HWHL mantra, she connected it with those types of thoughts and realized I was right.

But as I continue to hear the phrase at least once a week, is there a better response?

What's the stance on using RP stuff in other arenas?

1 upvotes · 18 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

All good points. My only fear is that if the feminist, vag-worship agenda keeps getting pushed unopposed, that could likely create a world that's sucky to live in no matter how much sex you're getting. The opposition right now is weak, and the feminists laugh at it.

House-wife v. SAHM

1 upvotes · 17 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Just keep in mind, it may at times be beneficial to use different language to "win" over people. Pick your battles. Win the war.

Great conclusion. Thanks for this insightful write-up!

Rejecting appreciation ... weird concept, but it works for me.

1 upvotes · 17 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I agree. These would have been much better responses. Thanks for the tip.

Is Red Pill truly congruent with Holiness?

1 upvotes · 17 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Until I started making some changes, I would have put myself in that category (with one lull - and I know exactly why that lull happened). It goes back to my road v. destination example (if I used that; can't remember).

The physical expression is a "shadow" or "copy" (per Hebrews 8-9) of the "heavenly thing." I consider these to be roads. They are the path we often have to take to get to the destination, which is understanding the spiritual truth that God meant for us all along (see also 1 John 4:20). Once you are at the destination, you no longer require the road. You'll go out for a drive occasionally because you like revving your engine, blasting some tunes, and feeling the wind in your face. But you don't need the road. You're already at where you were supposed to be all along.

With this mentality, once a guy has developed a healthy understanding and lifestyle of evangelism and discipleship, physical child-conceiving and child-rearing are no longer necessities. They don't have the same value, although they are still greatly desired. As a result, I learned to be fully content and satisfied in my relationship with God through my DB times, even though I continued to desire sex. Likewise, I do not judge my worth as a man by how well I have raised my kids, but by Christ in me and the fruit he produces from me - yet this does not diminish my desire to raise my kids. Although my marriage was sexless and parenting together resulted in a lot of conflicts, I was already being filled by God through my evangelism and discipleship in these exact "truer" spiritual areas. I had exchanged the "shadow" of physical reproduction and co-child-raising for the truer "heavenly thing" of spiritual reproduction and discipleship.

Now, you don't actually get a new baby every time you have sex. Likewise, you don't get a new convert every time you share your faith. But the intimacy, passion, and overall ecstasy you get from working in unison with the Holy Spirit ("as one," even, per John 17) is far more satisfying than sex, even when the person ultimately rejects the Gospel (which Romans 3 addresses is still God-glorifying), just as sex is still satisfying, intense, blissful, etc. even when it doesn't result in conception. [This parallel leads me to some confusion on the appropriateness of contraception, as an intentional effort to reap the joy of sharing the Gospel while stifling the chance of actually reaping a convert ... that just seems wrong and I haven't processed that for long enough yet. Until I have, that's +1 for Catholics.]

It's also worth noting that some people wander through difficult terrain all on their own, arriving at the destination without ever having taken the intended road. That's fine. There's nothing wrong with this. The road just makes things easier. The road is also not a guarantee. At some point someone needs to tell a person where the road is supposed to take them, or else they might keep driving circles around the destination forever. I have found that Christians with healthy sex lives are more receptive toward learning and implementing an active lifestyle of evangelism than those without. Similarly, effective parents are much better disciple-makers than those who have never raised children. However, I've also found that if someone doesn't connect the dots for them, they will just keep living in blissful ignorance of what God wanted their healthy reproductive appetite to show them.

For example, a great parent might think discipleship is all about teaching, teaching, teaching, and not realize that methods that worked with his children (ex. modeling, heart-to-hearts, life-on-life observation, coaching, etc.) are virtually always necessary to apply in discipleship relationships too; so, his discipleship will suffer if he hasn't connected the concepts. Likewise, a person's evangelism will suffer if he doesn't account for all of the things that go into sex - not just the act itself, but everything that leads up to it, from dating to marriage to foreplay to intercourse, etc. When you don't account for these things you get preachers on the street corners with a megaphone saying, "Repent or burn in hell!"

Tag: /u/RedPillWonder - these are some of my more obscure thoughts and it might interest you as well.

Advice to Young Women Today for a Better, Happier Life and Relationships

1 upvotes · 17 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

It's worth noting, as you mentioned in your original post: the amount of debt brought into a marriage from student loans is an important factor. It would difficult on a marriage if a woman got her degree in archaeology or philosophy, for example. There are no "on the side" jobs she can do with these degrees, so the husband either has to absorb her student loans out of his income, which could otherwise go to the family, or the option of her staying home is off the table until she pursues her originally-intended career path long enough to pay down that debt, which can even be rough given the lack of jobs for people with these types of majors. Sure, she can do work outside of her degree, but she could have done that without the debt anyway. Also, if something happens to the husband, the likelihood of hopping right into a well-paying archaeology job without experience is nil. I don't say this to discourage women from pursuing some of these more "obscure" degrees, if they're truly passionate about them - you just have to be mindful of the potential long-term implications the debt to get that degree might have on your family and be up-front with your man about the realities of this before you get married.

On a separate note, my wife read the book Parenting by the Book, by John Rosemond. She said that he spends some time explaining how many marital problems and parenting issues arose a few decades ago (70s-80s) when language and emphasis shifted from women being "home-makers" or "housewives" to "stay at home mothers."

He says the implication is that the wife's primary responsibility to the kids and her responsibilities around the home (if any) are secondary. As a result, the role of the father in children's lives has been minimized and become subsidiary to a "mother knows best" mentality.

What are your thoughts on this? Actually ... I might make a separate thread about this altogether, so feel free to respond there instead!

Advice to Young Women Today for a Better, Happier Life and Relationships

1 upvotes · 17 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Young women can and should pursue a money making skill, obtain a degree, and prepare and work towards realizing financial blessings and independence for herself (and her future family)

My father-in-law instilled in my wife: When you become someone's wife one day, you need to be able to help him where he needs your help. If that means financial help, you need to prepare yourself for that possibility. If you just want to be a home-maker, kid-raiser, that's great; but your husband might have different plans and you need to be prepared to follow his lead rather than insisting that he make your dreams a reality, in which case you're really the one trying to control him.

So, when you say:

Even if a woman chooses to stay home and be a full time wife ...

I agree with my father-in-law that this should really be a marital decision, and that the wife must be willing to submit to her husband's lead on this, if they are not on the same page. If he's a good husband, he won't just be thinking, "Money! Money! Money! Make me more money!" He'll have properly evaluated the circumstances (including biblical role expectations), giving great weight to his wife's expressed desires (assuming he allows her an opportunity to express them fully, rationale and all), and she should be able to proceed comfortably knowing that his bottom-line is best for her rather than if she were to resort to dirtier tactics to get her way (i.e. manipulation, trying to buckle his frame, acting out, withholding sex, etc.).

Advice to Young Women Today for a Better, Happier Life and Relationships

1 upvotes · 16 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Very interesting. That story is simultaneously frustrating to hear, yet very intriguing to think about as to all the things going on behind the scenes. Thanks for sharing!

Welcome to Red Pill Christians

1 upvotes · 15 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

This is good advice. I did a little research on the Madonna-Whore Complex a week ago, but know I need to understand it much better. I'm confident that this affected my relationship - and probably still does.

103 - Desire Cultivates Intimacy

1 upvotes · 14 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks!

Girlfriend wants to start smoking cigs

1 upvotes · 14 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

You don't want to react, but you do want to respond. "Have fun" is non reactive. That's good. But you also didn't respond, so you are not leading her in a situation that she has brought to your attention. She mentioned this to you because she wants you to lead her. Your response should be a reaffirmation of your boundaries. /u/CapNBalls gave you a good example of this. Use it.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

1 upvotes · 14 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Good write up. Thanks for sharing! The key here is that because the hamster runs a different direction and sometimes uses different wheels, although MRP tactics will work, you might have to apply them in different ways from what people might suggest.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

1 upvotes · 14 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Anxiety is not a personality disorder. I can't remember off hand for sure, but I thought that fit into the axis 2 mood disorders.

Not Empathizing Enough

1 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

There's some intent to support contribution and growth of the sub, so I'm commenting on more things than I otherwise would. That said, I don't see the incontinence. One situation is a woman who is unhappy and speculating about what might make her happy; there other is a woman who has actually experienced that happiness. Also, marriage counseling is a unique endeavor that prompts people to speak off the cuff without really being able to process things fully before speaking.

Not Empathizing Enough

1 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

And this is where most marriage counselors I work with just don't get it. They assume a cry for help is a cry for help, or a shout of pain is a shout of pain. It's probably because most marriage counselors are female, but they assume that wives know what they want and are effectively communicating it and that over-simplistic husbands are just too dumb to understand how emotional needs work. The fact that there is a subconscious (and kill me if it ever becomes conscious!) hidden agenda never crosses their minds.

Even politically conservative psychologists have bought into this feminist model of marriage counseling - "You're just not communicating well enough; let me help you understand each other better." It worms its way in like a snake. No, she is communicating exactly what she intends. The problem is that when she's upset the hamster takes over and she doesn't know what she really wants, so whatever comes out of her mouth can't be trusted. I've seen this happen on loop more times than I can count. As a result, there's only 1 marriage counselor in my entire large-sized city who I will ever refer clients to.

Tag: /u/Olongapo

Woman's desire is to their HUSBAND according to God

1 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I don't even say "the prayer" with people anymore. I don't want to give them a false assurance of salvation. In my view, faith is what saves, but faith doesn't mean anything if not in the context of faithfulness. Likewise, I can say I "trust" someone, but that means nothing if not in the context of "entrusting" something to them. The bond isn't formed until there is some type of interplay.

Another way to look at it (and probably the simplest way I can explain it):

- Works can never produce faith; works can be faked
- Faith always produces works; faith cannot be faked (but also cannot be observed/objectively proven)
- Faith saves, works do not
- Evidence of works doesn't prove anything
- Absence of works proves absence of faith

As a result, based on the general concept of "good works," we can discern either (1) someone is most likely not saved, or (2) we can't tell if they're saved or not, but we cannot discern (3) that person is almost certainly saved.

In the same passage you quoted, the immediate previous section actually gives the test that Jesus recommends using to get to that (3) conclusion of a person: "By their fruit you will recognize them." Every time Jesus talks about plants and fruit he's referencing the joint evangelism/discipleship processes - planting a seed and helping it grow. The parable of the sower is probably the prime example. Even beyond that understanding, the rest of Matthew 7 and the surrounding passages make it clear that the "fruit" is not "good works," but those who are walking the narrow road because of us. So, I always ask people: who is following Jesus today because of your life? If you have no one, you may be saved but you will never have confidence in your salvation. If you can identify people, then you have every reason to be confident in your salvation. Not only did Jesus make this the standard in Matthew 7, but he also made imparted it to us as our mission and goal of what we're to do after his ascent: "Go therefore and make disciples of all nations" (Matthew 28:19). If that is our mission in life, I would be very curious how many people could reject or ignore that mission and claim that their faith is genuine when, again, faith always produces works.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

1 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Well said.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

1 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

That's quite a story. Thanks for sharing!

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I follow.

Woman's desire is to their HUSBAND according to God

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not sure why you think that needs to be proven here.

Woman's desire is to their HUSBAND according to God

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not sure what you're trying to prove. I've already agreed salvation is not by works.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

War is a common example. The first thing that a battalion needs to do is establish a boundary and its goal from there is to keep inching that boundary forward to take more ground from the enemy. Although the boundary itself is designed to be as defensive as possible, which helps protect the battalion from breaking, it is also usually an offensive strategy to cover more ground of enemy territory and also is comprised of soldiers and offensive men on the front lines.

6 Questions for Christian Merps

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Glad I could help clarify some things.

I agree that most churches do preach that sex after marriage is a good thing. Unfortunately, the teachings against premarital sex or sinful expressions of sex grossly outweigh the number of sermons you will ever hear on how good and beautiful it is to have a healthy sex life in marriage.

In addition, even though churches may preach that sex after marriage is good and healthy, people who have lived in the "sex is bad for me right now because I'm not married yet" phase often have lived there so long that they are mentally incapable of making the transition to appreciating healthy sex in the context of marriage. Intellectually they know that it is okay and there is nothing wrong with it but emotionally and subconsciously they are still stuck living in light of the message they had been told all of their unmarried lives: you shouldn't be having sex right now.

Interestingly, people who get saved after they have already been married tend to have much healthier sex lives because they did not live in the negative stigma the church otherwise presents about premarital sex. Although it is true that premarital sex is certainly sinful, the imbalance of attention given to this as opposed to the beauty of marital sex continues to be a frustration within many Christian marriages.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I don't see that concept as holding true in other contexts ... but I'll take your word for it as to its limited application in MRP.

Woman's desire is to their HUSBAND according to God

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I haven't seen enough of his stuff to endorse him, but those two videos are great. The first one is a far more humorous presentation of my 102 post. For his second one, I usually summarize it like this:

- Admit you're a sinner in need of a savior; you can't do it alone
- Believe Jesus' death and resurrection are the only way you can be saved from sin

- Commit in your heart to orient your thinking and actions around this belief (satisfying the James 2 requirement without compromising into a works-based salvation model)

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Game has nothing to do with setting and enforcing boundaries

That was my point: there's more to RP than just boundaries and defense.

Surrendering delusions of control over things beyond your power is a central part to Stoicism.

I haven't studied stoicism much yet, so I'll take your word for it. That said, from conversations with countless others here, I get the impression that there's nothing anti-RP about setting yourself up for success; you just can't let the outcome of your efforts make you all butthurt if/when those efforts don't give the results you want - you keep improving anyway.

How did you end up discovering Red Pill truths?

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That sounds like an awesome endeavor. Just be cautious that you're not putting him in a position of temptation either.

6 Questions for Christian Merps

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I know I responded to BPP and said I would cease comments on here

No need to delete comments or withhold future comments. Unlike TRP/MRP, I hope this sub to be far more open to hearing from both genders. If I think something is out of line or counter-productive, I'll probably remove it and clarify the rules so that other people know the standard up-front. The primary standard I have right now that might not already be on the sidebar is not to denigrate Christianity or RP praxeology. Challenging these concepts and discussing their validity is perfectly fine, but if some girl or WK wants to roll in and say, "You're all just stereotyping and being sexist!" I'll probably remove that, as that's not very productive to conversation.

Another thing worth noting: Christianity is designed to be challenged. Acts 17 commends the Bereans because they didn't just accept Paul's word for it - they tested what he said themselves before buying into it. What I gather from some of my posts on MRP is that many people are less interested in mass testing, observation, and data collection and more interested in hearing one-off stories about what worked for the author. That's another fine approach too, but I will be inviting all forms of challenge to our model as long as they are productive and rooted in observable fact and not intended to denigrate or lead people astray. (Tag: /u/BluePillProfessor as this may clarify something I said earlier; this may prove to be a bad idea, but it's the model I have in my head right now).

may have mistakenly assumed this sub would also discuss Christian sexuality

I absolutely intend it to :) We haven't necessarily gotten that far, and my guess is that most Christians are too subliminally stifled to feel comfortable talking about sexuality until there are a string of posts on it, allowing for crowd mentality to override Christian cultural stigmas about sex.

I asked if Christian sexuality is discussed that men with physical disabilities that result in ED be included.

I'm absolutely open to discussing posts on these types of topics.

a man might read all of the sexual success stories and think to himself "what about me"

My expectation is actually the reverse: I believe we are less likely to see success stories and more likely to see people who are hurt and wounded and embarrassed to talk about their sexual failures because of the social stigma of anti-sexuality implied in most churches.

I concluded with saying that a true Christian woman would not see this as a problem, and would find new ways of pleasing her husband and continuing their sex life.

That depends on the specifics of a problem. "Accept it and move on" is an acceptable conclusion when it is fairly definitive that nothing will solve the problem. But even when that mentality seems appropriate, one has to be willing to revert out of it to try new ideas that might come up after-the-fact.

I mention this because I was in an "accept it and move on" phase of my relationship with my wife for a long time. I had tried everything I knew how to do to help her become interested in sex and nothing worked. When we did have sex, although she would enjoy it, it was clearly obligatory, which affected the quality. As you say, I had moved on to finding other ways of connecting and relating with my wife because I assumed the problem was unfixable. It was about 6 months ago that I started my internal transformation and about 2-ish weeks ago that I discovered RP and have since realized that my efforts were not as exhaustive as I thought and that RP systems can work where everything else failed.

I believe women should take a similar attitude as well. Sometimes it is appropriate to give up on option 1 and move to option 2. Other times we should keep fighting or be willing to re-open doors to option 1 if the opportunity presents itself.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

For the OI/CI post I see where you're coming from and how it could be interpreted that way. That said, from what I've been reading, TRP/MRP is not a purely a defensive/boundaries game. I think /u/anythinginc addressed this issue better than I could, so I'll defer to his comment here. Long story short, a ton of stuff that gets talked about as "game" falls in line with exactly what I have been addressing. As I have done so far, I will continue to limit my posts to things that I have either personally experienced or personally observed en masse.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'm not sure what you're asking.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Vetting would be more appropriate for TRP. In MRP I'm going on the assumption that it's predominantly people who are already in LTRs and want to read about that context, not the stuff single guys would want to read. So, it made more sense to address this from a "Whoops I'm stuck with Sybil" vantage point. I usually try to consider the target audience before I write anything. I may not be right about what they want to hear all the time, but the reaction so far has been overwhelmingly positive with a few hard core complainers.

As for "not actionable," part 1 wasn't meant to be. It is the necessarily context paving the way for the actionable part. Without knowing the context, the application will almost always be off.

101 - Fitness develops attraction

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed ... just as women have to go out of their way to let their husbands lead when culture tells them they're superior to men and should be pedestalyzed.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

It's not us who diagnoses them. You also have to remember that there is selection bias because people come to us when they suspect a mental health issue in their SO, and more often than not their hunch is based in fact.

But more to the point: it's all about scale. A woman might have a personality disorder but be so high functioning that it only shows up when tested for it. In that situation, the features are present but controlled. This is no different than saying AWALT or that all women have hamsters. It's painfully common to over-diagnose too ... so MRP also drinks the company kool-aid. My kool-aid just has independent, objective, scientific testing to back it up.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Nice. I like it.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

As I noted a few other times on this sub, my firm specializes in cases involving psychological issues. The head partner was I the board of psychology and we are required to go through training and continuing education courses on personality disorders in specific because they are the most common issues impacting divorce and custody decisions.

So, although most divorce lawyers may be fairly ignorant, 80% of my cases do involve these issues and I need to understand them inside and out in order to be able to cross examine psychologists and present testimony from competing psychologists, etc. It's like a med malpractice attorneys. They're not licensed doctors, but they do know every bit about medicine relevant to their cases as most doctors and sometimes more. Now imagine that med malpractice attorney has her practice almost exclusively about one type of injury ... That's where I am with personality disorders.

One thing I've noticed is younger chicks don't seem to care about my career, only older women are impressed. Any thoughts?

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

I'm in the US. Some states actually do a great job limiting support figures ... mine is not one of them, but even then it's county specific. For example my county will give the lesser earner 45% of the after tax cash available to the parties from the joint income pot, unless it's a long term marriage (25-30+), in which case it can be 50% (max anywhere). The next county over only gives 40%. Others give 30%. Those are, of course, rough figures, as there is a lot of judicial discretion ... but judges follow them about 90% of the time.

6 Questions for Christian Merps

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I think I had already read that once (or maybe it was another post you made ... I think titled something akin to Athol Kay is official lost to us), but went through it again anyway. I was already familiar with his transition. From what I gather, the forum failed because there weren't enough clear boundaries placed on what people could and couldn't say and there wasn't enough emphasis on who is to be trusted. That's why I like MRP's flair system of "MRP endorsed" and "Red Beret." Although I often disagree with some of these people, I find that their comments actually are consistent with RP praxeology and my dissent is with RP concepts that are in conflict with Christianity (i.e. plating, pre-marital sex) and not the person ... although some of them can be just plain jerks too - not in a motivating way, but in a self-puffing way. But I kind of expect that from RP forums, and I deal with that in my law practice with pretty much every other attorney anyway, so it doesn't really get to me.

All of that said, if you have any suggestions specific to this sub, I'm all ears!

6 Questions for Christian Merps

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Sadly, I missed the comment and even reddit doesn't show it. Unfortunately, that means I can't start processing where to draw the lines. Do you remember what she said?

My original intention was to allow women to post freely, able to express their spiritual, relational, and sexual issues just as well as anyone else here. That said, I expect to put restrictions on both genders from denigrating the user-base here or our shared system of beliefs, including those shared beliefs that extend beyond the Bible alone (i.e. retained RP principles).

To that end, if someone wants to knock on plating, that's fine ... RP will not condone plating. But if someone wants to knock on physical fitness as being "shallow," they must do so in a respectful and productive way, not a denigrating way.

I moderate another fairly prominent sub on my main account, so drawing these types of lines isn't overly new ... this is just a new context. I will probably maintain a similar standard as I enforce there.

The biological step-mother.

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Hah, I do now. I started my RP journey 6 months before finding RP (discovered the principles from other sources). By the time I actually found RP, it was like turning the power on to an electrical relay that I had just spent the last 6 months building. I saw no progress for those 6 months, then BAM! All at once, there it is. Here I am about two weeks later and happy as can be. So, I'll keep trying to give back to the RP community, as it has helped me, even in the relatively short time I've been here. In the meantime, I'll keep dealing with all the haters who think I shouldn't post anything because I'm so "noob."

How to bring out the Alpha in a Beta man?

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Glad I can help. I wouldn't recommend trying all of these at once, and you'll very likely find that some of them just won't resonate with your SO ... but at least it's some things to think about.

One thing I've noticed is younger chicks don't seem to care about my career, only older women are impressed. Any thoughts?

1 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

It depends on the circumstances, but in total, it's about 2/3 women cheating, 1/3 men cheating. If I had to guess, it's because the majority of men are pretty BP and are so paranoid about losing the girl that they worship and the girls are just totally unattracted (until they reconnect with Chad on Facebook), so these men won't cheat. On the flip, when I do see RP-type guys (high confidence, great physique, charmers, hold frame, etc.) they're typically cheating on their spouses left and right - far more than the women cheat. To put it another way, fewer guys cheat, but when they cheat they cheat far more.

If it helps, that 2/3 - 1/3 statistic was actually found directly from an analysis I did of 78 of my cases, investigating the causes of divorce. Interestingly, cheating was only the 3rd most common cause for divorce on the list. #1 (by about double the cases that involved cheating) was having a controlling/manipulative spouse. #2 - irreconcilable disagreements (usually about money or how to raise the children).

One thing I've noticed is younger chicks don't seem to care about my career, only older women are impressed. Any thoughts?

1 upvotes · 11 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

My observation is the reverse: narcissists have a harder time beginning relationships with younger women, and even when they get them started they certainly don't last as long as compared with the frequency and duration of post-40 women. Again, though, my profession may be showing me a slanted sample of the population.

One thing I've noticed is younger chicks don't seem to care about my career, only older women are impressed. Any thoughts?

1 upvotes · 11 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

I can only go by what I see in my law practice, which is focused on divorce and custody law. So, I usually see it through the lens of marriage issues, but still hear a lot about all the ex's hookups.

Welcome to Red Pill Christians

1 upvotes · 11 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

BJs are totally off the table in her mind. It's one of those "dirty" aspects of sex to her and she doesn't consider it hygienic. Also, it's not a lube issue ... usually no problems naturally there, and she would affirm that. I think it's likely psychosomatic (is vaginismus the right term?) She has never asked a doctor since yr 1 of marriage and is too embarrassed. All they told her was to practice putting things in to open her up, which will also help her get used to it. This is another thing she won't do. Her mom would never let her use a tampon growing up and she's still never used one to this day. In her mind tampons or following the doctor's recommendation are parallel to masturbation.

Again ... When we're active she doesn't feel the pain at all (or at least very minimally and rarely), so when we're in a healthy place it's not a problem. But the "bad and hurts" phrase still shows that she psychologically can't get over seeing sex as a negative thing, even though she consciously knows better.

Welcome to Red Pill Christians

1 upvotes · 11 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I have asked what it means several times. She says she doesn't know what her mom meant - that's just what she was told. Knowing her mom, I wouldn't be surprised if it was a harmful manipulative tactic to keep her chaste until marriage.

My wife did have extreme pain on our honeymoon ... took 3 days to make PIV possible, so I'm sure there's some psychological aftereffects from that. Also, if we go a long period without sex, the first time again will have some pain for her as well, but nowhere near like the honeymoon. When we have sex consistently, though, there are no problems.

Marital Confidence Intervals and Probabilistic Stage Setting

1 upvotes · 11 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Good thoughts. As a note of clarification:

when she says "I want a divorce" ... you can't say "there is the door."

Immediately, no. But I'd hope no husband would do so immediately.

Matthew 18 says we try to talk to them, bring a friend or pastor if you have to. If she won't try to reconcile, treat her as a non Christian. 1 Cor. 7 says if an unbelieving spouse wants to go, let them go.

In short, we have to try to reconcile first, and if that doesn't work, then show them the door. The only additional requirement we have in that situation is to bring a friend or pastor to help, which non Christians might skip.

Welcome to Red Pill Christians

1 upvotes · 11 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That's just what her mom told her. I don't know why.

Marital Confidence Intervals and Probabilistic Stage Setting

1 upvotes · 11 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'm more open-minded about catholicism than most protestants.

I totally get that OI creates a bit of a catch-22 in that if you want to save the marriage, you have to be willing to give it up. That said, when I posted about OI here, several people reamed me for talking about OI in a long-term capacity when they said it only applies in the short-term, individual efforts. So, by that logic OI wouldn't apply to the long-term mentality of letting go of your marriage, right?

Who do you want in your church? ...

All of that makes sense, but there's also the option: "Someone who wants it so bad that they're willing to fight for it because they know it's right, even when it's not easy and they feel like things aren't working."

A man usually haha to show a lot of effort, maturity, and ownership ... before the community condones divorce versus "MRP harder."

This has not been my experience from reading around this sub for the past couple weeks. I do believe you that at its core the mods want to foster the exact attitude you're describing, but most comments I'm seeing do not seem to back this up.

by labeling divorce as "not true OI" and "beta" is counterproductive I feel

I see your point. I think my point was more one of semantics to show that the real culprit those comments are addressing is oneitis, not OI, and that OI in a raw sense should mean something different. I wasn't necessarily suggesting people have to follow "true OI" or cling to oneitis.

But, after many conversations in this thread, I see where I was wrong and miscommunicative on a few things, and I'm happy to own up to that and will fine-tune my word selection in future posts :)

Help

1 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed, it is very hard, and I loathe the thought of sex in those times too ... but I'm glad someone else can vouch that this does actually work.

Marital Confidence Intervals and Probabilistic Stage Setting

1 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I totally get where you're coming from and agree with a lot of what you have said. I do believe that a Christian worldview holds certain things to be of greater value than individual happiness, as our calling to be like Christ compels us to be willing to self sacrifice for the greater good. From a non Christian perspective I don't expect this to make much sense, but when you talk about "the person has to be more important than the vow," I agree to the extent of the identity God gives us, but Christians find their identity in Christ and not ourselves, so that is what becomes uncompromisable, not or own unique make ups of wants and desires.

That said, there are certainly appropriate reasons for divorce, which I readily embrace. Even beyond those reasons, if a person has a choice between two evils because the "right choice" is not something they are realistically capable of executing, and divorce is the lesser of those two evils, then I can support it (this is exactly what God did in allowing Moses to grant divorces). However, I do think that all rational effort to save the marriage should first be applied, including to a degree greater than MRP would otherwise encourage.

I hope that helps clarify.

Red Pill Advice for a 17 year-old?

1 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

That could be. Longer-term escalating friendships can also help this vetting process, though, without putting either of you at risk. My wife and I were romantically interested within the first month we met each other, but didn't actually start dating until almost 3 years later ... then it was another 3 years before we were married. That pre-dating friendship period gave us freedom to get to know each other deeply first, without risk, while also getting to know other people to figure out what we wanted in an SO and not, whereas jumping into a committed relationship right off the bat would have prevented us from figuring things out. We would have started wondering what life would be like with other people because we never vetted anyone else.

Looking for some advice. Situation is complicated.

1 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

A good friend of mine used to say:

Women go into relationships hoping to change their men; men go in hoping she'll never change; in the end, neither of them gets what they want.

She's trying to change you. As you say, "The man I was is slowly being chipped away." She doesn't like that it's taking too long to chip off more layers. Your problem is that you're letting her chip away layers at all. That's your frame buckling to hers. Even if you think it's internal and you're hiding it, she can smell it on you.

Is your marriage over? It doesn't have to be. That's really up to you. But letting her chip more away is not the way to fix it. I've divorced people (I'm an attorney) who have been married for less than 3 months and just want out. I've also others in the exact same situation who came to me for help with their divorce, I gave them a few pointers on fixing their relationship, and now 7 years later they're still together. I've had this happen a few times.

Your marriage will be what you make of it. That said, cutting and running seems to be the coward's way out that won't solve your long term problem. The problem you're having with her is something that will follow you into your next relationship if you don't learn how to deal with it now. To quote /u/ReddJive ...

Sure TRP says divorce start over ... MRP takes it to the level of fix yourself before you just up and divorce ... if you don't work on you these same issues will be there with the next woman. Your wife is simply your sparring partner. Your practice girl if you will.

Although I may still oppose the overly-relaxed attitude about divorce here, this is pretty good advice. Who knows ... maybe you'll end up saving your marriage in the process. If not and she can't handle the better you, let her be the one to walk away.

Welcome to Red Pill Christians

1 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That'd be cool. I haven't gotten to his stuff yet, but that's next on my list. I have read a few of his blog posts though.

Help

1 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

To you, is discipleship predominantly about teaching?

6 Questions for Christian Merps

1 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That is absolutely beautiful. I'll be pondering that for a while now. Thanks for sharing!

102 - Desire and the Curse

1 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Yes it is. Maybe one day I'll do a post on high-conflict personalities. That's more 400-level stuff, though.

Help

1 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah losing control is certainly bad and makes her think you are weak and can be controlled. Glad you don't have that problem either. But you do need to say things like, "I feel like ___ when you ___" or "I'm feeling ___ today, how about you?"

Help

1 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

One of her big objections is that I don't admit to doing something wrong when she blows up at nothing.

That's your main problem, then. I was taught early on and have never found any data, verse, scientific study, or even remote suggestion to counter this: In any conflict, you are at least partially to blame. Even if you don't think you've done anything wrong, you've at least done something to cause the other person to perceive you have done something wrong. You can always acknowledge that you gave that perception and say, "I'm sorry I made you feel that way."

I did that for 20 years and promised myself I wouldn't do it any more

I'm leading a 2-day spiritual freedom conference in September. One of the topics I'm in charge of is "inner vows." An inner vow is when we make a promise to ourselves that is not biblically mandated. It turns into "rules taught by men" that Jesus condemned the pharisees for following. 99% of the time they're unhealthy and based on a need to protect ourselves from internal emotional wounds rather than setting healthy scriptural boundaries.

interesting data point

That is very interesting! Keep me posted on how well this continues to work after the next few times.

What exactly do you mean by disciplining my wife? Physically? Consequences?

I think you misread that. I said "discipling" not "disciplining."

she wants the family to go away for a few days...I say "No, I can't imagine being stuck in a hotel room with you the way you are acting right now."

I would seriously tone it down on stuff like this. This is probably another huge part of her problem. How you communicate a decision matters deeply, and you're shifting the blame on her for the decisions you're making. If you're making a decision, own it. Let it be your decision. You don't have to explain to her what your reasoning is.

If you do want to explain your reasoning, don't make it an argument and don't say it in a way that belittles her or blames her. Take responsibility. If she wants to go on a vacation, just say no. If she persists, tell her you don't think it's a good idea. If she asks why, explain that you're not in an emotional state to enjoy a vacation and that you will let her know when you are. This might open up the door for her to (1) want to improve your emotional state, (2) want to understand how she has contributed to negatively affecting your emotional state, and (3) feel more connected to you as you are actually expressing feelings in a calm, safe manner rather than acting snide or belittling her or exploding at her.

Remember, as a BPD those feelings are what she craves from you. She needs to know you have them too. She just doesn't want them directed against her (but even against her is better than none at all).

Don't aim for perfect game, the bar for sex is not that high!

1 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/seduction

I disagree. Go to r/asktrp and post the question, see what you get.

Any statistics on what is considered a high n-count (for a female) before marriage? Or opinions?

1 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

Dang ... that's just screaming, "The best way to fix the country is to motivate people to be deadbeats!" It creates polarization. The lower-middle class has every motivation to get poorer because it's easier and won't really lower their life circumstances all that much. The upper-middle class can't take advantage of those benefits, so they're motivated to keep getting richer. As a result, poverty increases and the only way the state can keep up with the benefits is to tax the rich harder. Eventually the rich will leave and the state will break. That's why so many of our wealthy businesses have created home-bases overseas now :/

On the plus side, I suppose it's easier for those who are naturally bent toward alpha, leadership, success, etc. to establish their position and it's easier for women to spot the guys who are actually worth their salt. The problem is that there's a heck of a lot fewer of them.

The biological step-mother.

1 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Thanks for the feedback. I'm sorry to hear about your situation. If you want more input on how to deal with someone with a borderline personality disorder, I just made a decent write-up in this post over on r/RPChristians.

I also talk about BPD a bit in the end of this comment on this thread.

I hope that helps :)

Welcome to Red Pill Christians

1 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Yes, it certainly is a shame :/ Even as recently as a year or two ago (married 9 years), my wife would remind me periodically when arguing about sex, "My parents and church only ever taught me two things about sex while I was growing up: (1) it's bad before marriage, and (2) it hurts a lot. That's all I knew about sex for over 15 years.

It's going to take a long time for me to get past that." We have gotten past much of it, but I still notice reservation in her on a handful of things.

Any statistics on what is considered a high n-count (for a female) before marriage? Or opinions?

1 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

That totally sucks.

Any statistics on what is considered a high n-count (for a female) before marriage? Or opinions?

1 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

My state abolished estate taxes a few years ago, so you only have to worry about the federal level, which only applies if you have $5m per person or more. I've had a handful of clients where that has mattered, but the overwhelming majority of people in my state never have to worry about an inheritance tax. Even if you do, there are ways to plan around it with trusts, LLCs and Family Limited Partnerships.

No More Mr. Nice Guy Contradictions

1 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

FEELINGS - Beta guys hide feelings because they don't want to burden other people with them, lest they turn them away. Alpha guys are able to communicate feelings effectively because that's how you get what you want. Where this gets flipped in your mind is in being controlled by feelings. The reason beta guys hide their feelings is because it puts them at risk of not getting the love and validation they need, which controls them. Alpha guys can communicate what they're feeling without letting it affect their attitude, demeanor, etc. in the moment. They can say nonchalantly, "I'm angry with you. We need to talk." A beta guy will likely blow up when he can't bottle it up anymore.

PASSIVE AGGRESSIVE - There's a difference between setting boundaries and being passive aggressive. Burning dinner, spilling something on the floor, or making ambiguously innocuous/snide comments are all passive aggressive. Establishing a clear framework of expectations and how you engage with people who are inside from outside of that frame is setting a boundary.

Marital Confidence Intervals and Probabilistic Stage Setting

1 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I agree with what you've said in concept, but I still don't understand the problem of engineers embracing Hare Krsna or doctors starting a club to talk about philosophy. Are they not allowed to do that with a mindset: "How can these things help us become better engineers and doctors?" or "How can we become better philosophers without compromising our commitment to medicine?"

Help

1 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

My wife was formerly a teacher.

Another good passage for her: 1 Cor. 9:27 - "I discipline my body and keep it under control, lest after preaching to others I myself should be disqualified."

I'm sure this applies to you as well, but when she's out of control she undermines any legitimate contributions she has to offer God's people. When a leader lacks self-control, it's unclear if the leader is even capable of distinguishing between the Holy Spirit's guidance (where teaching should come from) or their own human intellectual capacity to understand and relay information. God constantly says that human wisdom will fail, so the church should never trust in the latter of the two, even if it does lead to correct conclusions most of the time.

Any statistics on what is considered a high n-count (for a female) before marriage? Or opinions?

1 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

rumblings of legislating this advantage away

True, but those rumblings have been around for so long that it's hard to take them seriously anymore.

I thought TRP/the manosphere's consensus was that there is no social advantage afforded by marriage outside conservative/religious circles?

That very well could be. I haven't read that yet, but I don't doubt it. That said, a quick glance at the TV will show that the media/entertainment world at least still puts pressure toward marriage as an admirable goal, and I'd be shocked if there wasn't something subliminal floating around in people's brains from all this. Just look at all the posts that come up about people who want LTRs despite the strong opposition TRP gives to this concept. It's coming from somewhere.

a legal wife can contest her husband's will

In my state it's called a "spousal election to take against the will." So, put everything in a trust and don't give your wife anything. End of story. I can't say all states will allow this, but I know for a fact mine does. You can also draft a pre-nup that waives her right to elect against the will or otherwise disclaims any inheritance she might receive from her husband.

abolished it altogether ... government has no real interest in it

I could not agree more. Well said.

Any statistics on what is considered a high n-count (for a female) before marriage? Or opinions?

1 upvotes · 8 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

it only does something useful when you break up or die

Taxes. Higher brackets = more disposable income than two singles filing separately. From any non-religious vantage point, that and social perception are the only real reasons to get married.

Divorce and inheritance can be dealt with by appropriately executed pre-planning documentation, so really don't have to factor into the equation at all (I'm a divorce/estate planning attorney, so I draft these documents all the time).

I should also note, before divorce laws started changing (beginning in 1969), there was a much greater security in the stability the relationship provided, which was a benefit. But because divorce rates are so high right now, rational expectation negates that security.

Dealing with the stressed wife.

1 upvotes · 8 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This is a good way to distinguish, although I think I'd use terms more like: manageable stress and unmanageable stress. For example, if her boss gave her a project that's going to take 80 hours to finish and wants it done in 1 week, you can't help her with it (i.e. it's unmanageable), but it's absolutely rational for her to be stressed about something like that.

Either way, this is a great line to draw when distinguishing how to respond to different types of stress. Thanks.

A reminder of why Redpillers should marry (and that redpill model with wifey works, and that beta bucks model does not).

1 upvotes · 8 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This is wonderful. Thanks for sharing!

Edit: I noticed after the fact, it's disappointing that the data is so old.

Marital Confidence Intervals and Probabilistic Stage Setting

1 upvotes · 8 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I think I understand this place better now. Thank you.

Question about stoicism and initiating .

1 upvotes · 8 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

Good word.

Marital Confidence Intervals and Probabilistic Stage Setting

1 upvotes · 8 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

More to /u/bogeyd6, historical samples v. current samples is a trite distinction if the history is recent or there has been nothing causing a total shift in the population from the time the historical samples were taken to the present. For example, if I were trying to develop confidence about how my wife will respond to me under a certain set of circumstances and I'm looking only at data from when we were dating 10 years ago, you're right, the historical data would be garbage. Our life contexts have changed and the data is so far removed from present reality that it's worthless. I should be looking at how she interacted yesterday or today. The fact of the matter is that all data is "historical" data - it's just a matter of how historical it is (i.e. extremely recent history all the way to extremely ancient history).

The reason the single historical data point doesn't work is because you don't have a big enough sample size. Any given sample has to be converted to a normal distribution first so that the standard deviation can be reliable. For the most part, "30" is a magic number that denotes an acceptable sample size that will give a reliable standard deviation, as long as there is consistency and true randomness in selecting the sample. For example, looking at 30 historical battles might not lend itself to high degrees of confidence in predicting outcomes of future battles if they were all fought on different fields, in different wars, different numbers on each side, etc. But if a battalion in one war had fought on a particular battlefield 30+ times, replenishing their troops to the same numbers at the end of each day, then we could develop a confidence interval for probabilistic outcome if that battle were repeated under the same conditions again in the future (costumes, weather, weaponry and all).

If it helps clarify that subject, *it doesn't matter how historical/ancient the data is. The CI simply says, "Under those same conditions, we can be x% confident that future cycles will, on the whole, produce an average within a particular range." If someone dug up a process from 1,000 years ago a CI could be developed all the same ... it would just be fairly useless if nobody uses that process anymore.

Although I don't use CIs regularly in my current profession, because of my background in statistical methodology I still talk about these things with my father-in-law, who uses them daily (he's an engineer). The examples I have used are consistent with how he expresses CIs are used in practice (as opposed to classroom theory), I just tweaked the subjects to things that might be slightly more aligned with RPer, hence protein count and women.

As for outcome value (to /u/GargantuaBlarg29 now), it's important to understand that confidence intervals are foundational to six sigma management, which is all about minimizing the number of outliers/defective products in ongoing production by creating consistency in processing one product after another, removing as many variables as possible. The CI is the primary tool used to measure the effectiveness of a given six sigma process because six sigma is more interested in developing confidence over the entirety of a population rather than discovering a conforming individual sample size. As a result, the parameter outcome is essential. We're just not looking at probability of how an individual unit will come out; we're looking at probability of where the average of all future units will end up.

As a result, to translate it back to marriage - a CI isn't about calculating the probability that my wife will respond X way under a certain set of stimuli I introduce into the relationship. It's about (much like six sigma management) reducing variables to set a stage where her average reaction falls within an acceptable range of desired outcomes. Although individual point probability is much simpler to calculate, in a marriage setting we are far more concerned with long-term behavioral results and not one-off victories.

Thanks

1 upvotes · 8 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I don't think we will be. But part of that depends on how active the community is. So, get in there and ask some questions :)

Marital Confidence Intervals and Probabilistic Stage Setting

1 upvotes · 8 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Exactly. That's why I noted in the post itself that if a RP guy converts RP thinking from his conscious mind to a subconscious lifestyle, he becomes beta, even though he maintains the appearance of being alpha. He's no longer intentional and in control - he's just on auto-pilot with a handful of tools he learned. Eventually your wife will adapt and get bored of those tools, at which point a new balance needs to be implemented to keep her on her toes. This adds PUA stuff like being a "man of mystery" because she never knows what you're going to do next ... or as MRP more commonly calls it: gaming your wife.

Welcome

1 upvotes · 8 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That's my hope too :)

Marital Confidence Intervals and Probabilistic Stage Setting

1 upvotes · 8 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You misunderstand. I wasn't endorsing this third option as a viable option. I was simply saying that true OI is worthless and the other two options aren't really OI in the first place, but that's okay.

Marital Confidence Intervals and Probabilistic Stage Setting

1 upvotes · 8 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Thanks!

Marital Confidence Intervals and Probabilistic Stage Setting

1 upvotes · 7 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Yeah, in trial M/T, so I figured I'd crank this one out before working all weekend. That's a good way to put it, though.

Dealing with the stressed wife.

1 upvotes · 7 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Who's the purple piller?

The biological step-mother.

1 upvotes · 7 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Already working on a post about this ... should be up soon.

The biological step-mother.

1 upvotes · 7 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

There are a few parts of my household that I'm still not involved in or aware of the details.

This is actually okay, over time. The captain has to be super hands-on when he hires his first-mate. Once he trusts his first-mate, the captain should be able to rest easy that there are some things he doesn't have to concern himself with anymore.

They key is that the captain trains the first mate to do the job the way he wants it, and only then does he stop overseeing that job. If he hired a first mate and just said, "That's your job, do it however you want," that wouldn't be a very good captain and it would create problems with other aspects of how the ship is run.

Otherwise, thanks for the feedback :)

Dealing with the stressed wife.

1 upvotes · 7 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Good point.

Dealing with the stressed wife.

1 upvotes · 7 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Giving her tasks to complete that would please her husband gave her that sense of accomplishment

This is spot on. When I was fully BP my wife would get super angry because I didn't tell her what I expected of her. As a result, she never perceived that I appreciated or cared for anything she did. In reality, she was doing things I didn't care about, so she was right - I didn't appreciate it, but like a good BP guy I told her I did anyway. She saw through it and it never worked.

When I started the exercise I referenced above, my wife said at first that it was really weird for her. Then I explained, "But when I ask you to do something rather than you just doing it, doesn't it make you feel better knowing that what you're doing are things that actually matter to me?" That turned her right around because now she felt like a nurturer once again. The very fact of my asking her to do it changed her attitude toward me. She felt appreciated even when I didn't communicate appreciation. Why? Because the fact of asking lets her know that what she's doing matters.

She performs heads above any other moms she knows, yet she is still not content.

There are two key reasons for this: (1) She only sees the best things from the other moms, whereas you have a realistic perspective in seeing that her life actually is better; as a result, the comparison game tells her she's always on the losing end. (2) Even when she sees her situation as better than theirs, she believes she experiences higher stress than them, mitigating the goodness of her own situation. Rather than taking the logical conclusion (decrease stress at the cost of nominal decline in standard of living so you're more like all the other moms), she resorts to the irrational one: "Increase my lifestyle even more to justify my feeling so stressed," which increases stress even more into a terrible cycle.

The key thing to remember is that the "lists" are all born from comparison to other moms. Take her out in the middle of the wilderness, removed from society for 10 years and I promise that list will crumble and vanish. Unfortunately, this is not a realistic exercise for getting her to drop the list, hence the short-term exercise I proposed in my post.

Dealing with the stressed wife.

1 upvotes · 7 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

announcing it to her

Remember, the announcement is only a short-term 3 day thing, and you don't have to tell her why you're doing it. The suggestion isn't meant to be a long-term endeavor, nor is it sustainable as one. When a first mate is hired by the captain, the captain has to be very hands-on for a while. When the first mate gets the hang of the job, the captain can back off.

The announcement only becomes truly problematic if you communicate a responsive expectation: "I'm doing this because I want our marriage to get better." Even something as generic as that will create presumptions in her mind that you're dissatisfied with something, she correctly pieces it together that she's not making you happy, so she internalizes it as a contract that makes her response one of duty and not authentic. Simply telling her, "Let's try this" does not invoke duty and obligation toward how she should react to what you're suggesting.

setting yourself up for failure.. or an opportunity for her to tell you didn't complete something on the list

How's that any different from any other fitness test, though? Women do this all the time anyway. If anything, you should welcome and invite the opportunity for her to tell you this so you can pass the test and show her that you really are in control and she can rest in the security that your control has to offer.

Let me be more clear: if you forget something on the list, she knows you're responsible for it, not her. She doesn't like that her life condition has decreased because of that forgetfulness, but she does like that it's not her responsibility. When she asks about you forgetting about it, it's a fitness test implying, "I don't believe his frame is big enough to handle everything my frame can handle; let me show him how big my frame is." When you take responsibility you are saying, "If I'm not happy, you're not happy; you don't even know how to make yourself happy, so neither of us can trust the way you want to do things. As a result, we're going to live the life I want to live, not the one you want to live. That might mean you don't get your way all the time, including in that one area where I forgot the thing that should have been on the list. But that's okay because it's my job to figure it out, not yours. If I need help with it, I'll let you know and tell you how to help." As this short-term exercise expires, you re-open the door to letting her help through communication about the list, while not necessarily controlling what goes on the list.

Dealing with the stressed wife.

1 upvotes · 7 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Take note, I said "for 3 days." I do not recommend this strategy as a long-term endeavor. This is more of a primer to reset the gears in the right direction, after which you can coast without micro-managing because the ship has been steered back on course and the wind and waves will take it from there.

The biological step-mother.

1 upvotes · 7 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

But I do delegate and observe

Yes. I addressed this in my "corollary" post titled, "Dealing with the stressed wife." I completely agree: Do not establish a lifestyle where she does nothing and you do everything. That will work out poorly for you.

For example, I once had a case where my client was in a deposition being asked about household responsibilities (they had no kids). He kept getting angry and I kept stopping him and trying to move the question along, but he eventually turned to me and said, "No, I want to make this clear on the record." Against my better judgment, I let him speak. He said, "I have done everything around here. I have produced all of the income, done all the house work, taken care of the yard, etc., etc. She sat on her butt for the last 30 years doing nothing but spending my money." The other lawyer smiled and said, "I'm glad you now understand the lifestyle expectation you have given my client, and the courts will be very interested to hear this." We still won that case on different grounds, but I now forewarn my clients the same thing: don't just do everything for her. Delegate. Make her do things, but you take the lead in how you do it.

Also, bear in mind that I did say in my post:

The father/husband must take the following attitude, regardless of whether or not it makes legal sense to do so

and

As a matter of fact, these assertions would not stand up in court if you were to get divorced

The point is that this mentality is what is required to restore the marriage and maximize your odds; not to ninjabodge state statutes.

How does her dependence on you affect other things like child support, alimony, etc.?

Most of my clients say that custody and parenting time are the most important aspects of the case and that everything else is peripheral. So, I do emphasize the custody component.

That said, deferring to my other post, I do agree that delegating is essential. When a step-mother moves in she doesn't just lounge in luxury; she integrates. The difference between this and the biological mother mentality is that biological mothers assume co-equality and co-ownership of everything, whereas step-mothers presume it's all his and she's joining in on his system.

Incidentally, if a biological mother does develop this attitude toward her husband, if they are ignorant of the law (as 95% of women are), they may naturally assume that their rights in divorce aren't as strong as they actually are. If she's attracted enough to her husband because he has his act together, she may never get around to researching divorce in the first place, so she never wises up.

Girls reading reddit, what is your impression on our experiences and what we go through

1 upvotes · 6 July 2017 · /r/seduction

This sounds a lot like the tingles and the fuzzies. If I recall from MRP, Cholomite's Law says: Tingles without fuzzies don't last; fuzzies without tingles are worthless/no fun.

Having your crap together and presenting an "I'm strong enough to protect you" (not just physically, but mentally and emotionally as well) mentality develops tingles (sexual attraction).

Being emotionally vulnerable and giving women an opportunity to nurture you or others that you care about (i.e.

your children) gives her the fuzzies (feel-good emotions).

What's your take on that?

Wife goes on a sex journey to 'find herself'. Is shocked when husband leaves her

1 upvotes · 6 July 2017 · /r/TheRedPill

Yeah, it's essentially how a woman rationalizes her behavior so that she can act on her feelings without guilt, shame, etc. I will disagree with /u/Popeman79 slightly in that sometimes the justifications are real and make sense, but they are either taken out of context or given more weight than should otherwise be allocated to them.

For example: "I'm super attracted to Bob and he's been hitting on me. Cheating on my husband is bad, so I shouldn't. But my husband has been cold and distant lately and he gets to do all the stuff he likes doing while I'm stuck at home with the kids, so I deserve something nice. Plus, maybe if I sleep with Bob it will make me feel sexy again, so I will be more into my husband and he'll benefit from it to - it's a win, win."

As you can see, some of these justifications might be true. Her husband might actually be distant. But that's not a good excuse. Feeling sexy again actually will likely make her want to sleep with her husband again (MMSLP talks about this), but that's a horrible reason to cheat on your husband.

Wife goes on a sex journey to 'find herself'. Is shocked when husband leaves her

1 upvotes · 6 July 2017 · /r/TheRedPill

I feel like 90% of TRP is about how men can utilize a combination of biology and the hamster to get what they want. Take the hamster out of our equations and a lot of TRP philosophy goes out the window. So, yes, we do have to deal with their hamster if we're going to maintain control of the situation.

FR – Qualities of a Good Husband

1 upvotes · 5 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

My guess is that advanced material (1) is situation specific, and (2) assumes you're not an idiot when discerning if/when/how to apply it. But I'm still relatively new too.

AMALT?

1 upvotes · 2 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I've heard it refrained here quite a bit: "Men are polygamous, women are hypergamous." So, that's the parallel there.

The change in how people treat you once you get fit/bulky is real, and one of the best things that happened to me. Thanks TRP

1 upvotes · 2 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

BENCH - W/ spotter: 235 4x, 225 8x, then 6x; w/o spotter: 225 12x, 205 12x, then 8-10x

SQUAT - Only tried once @ 315lbs, wasn't bad; I usually use the leg press machine and max it (500lbs) for about 20 reps

DEAD LIFT - Haven't tried, only been working out for a week

PROGRAM - None, just re-hashing what worked well when I was in HS/College when I was ripped. Usually run 1-1.5mi, bench, declined sit-ups, fly, leg press, curls, hamstring machine, shoulder press, quad machine, reverse shoulder press (lats), calves, lawnmower/triceps, back arch machine, bench, declined sit-ups, swim 4-6 laps and cool down in the pool. All items (except run/swim) are 3 sets.

Do you have a recommendation on a program? Obviously my full-body workout (every day for the past 7 days) is not sustainable long-term ... or should I keep trying it? I find that even with struggling on my last 2-3 reps each set (almost can't finish), I still come home fine and am not sore the next day. I attribute this to the pool, but may be wrong.

quitting videogames, porn and netflix have made me realize how sad and pathetic my life was.

1 upvotes · 2 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

Let me know if you ever figure this out. My brother is in this boat, except without the drugs and he used to have the real thing. He goes in phases staying in decent shape and women naturally love him. He's a total DNGAF type guy.

But he had one really bad relationship that was off and on (about 200 breaks-ups/get-back-togethers) for about 8 years. When it finally ended, it broke him and he's given up on everything except movies, video games, and (I presume) porn.

I try to talk to him about it, but as you say: he's 100% perfectly happy and content with where he's at. He knows that if he puts in literally 1/4 of the effort as most guys on this sub, he could be a stellar success with girls, athletics, enhancing his education, etc. because he's already proved it numerous times. But I can't get him to see the light again.

It's not bringing me down, as he lives over 100 miles away ... but he's still my bro and I love him.

The change in how people treat you once you get fit/bulky is real, and one of the best things that happened to me. Thanks TRP

1 upvotes · 2 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

I've been following this path, but probably shouldn't be. I'm 6'0" weighing 220lbs. My bench is currently at 250 max, 225 for reps. Is it time to cut or do I keep where I'm at until I'm benching 300 again? (haven't since college)

Still learning, help me understand this.

1 upvotes · 1 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

Overt ... 10 years ago, before we married, we discussed it and both agreed to it.

The after/eternally persistent test ... ?

1 upvotes · 1 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

Gotcha ... this is slightly different from what I would have though. Thanks for this. I don't think I'm at risk of going Rambo :)

The after/eternally persistent test ... ?

1 upvotes · 30 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Very insightful. Thanks! This gives vey good perspective.

What's Rambo? I see that a lot and know the movie by cultural references ... but what does it mean in a RP conversation?

The after/eternally persistent test ... ?

1 upvotes · 30 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Good points. No insult taken. I do agree that at her core, there is some innate desire to flirt in her. I just think it's been sooooo deeply repressed through extreme religious conditioning throughout her entire upbringing that it's highly unlikely she'll ever act on it, even if I did give her that freedom.

That said, would it be worth explicitly giving her that freedom? For example, telling her plainly, "Hey, why don't you go up there, ask like you're asking the clerk something and smile at the guy sitting at the counter?"

My thought is this. She thinks I find her attractive because I have to by virtue of being married, Bible, etc. In reality, although she's very physically attractive (solid 8.5, probably a 9 due to my tastes), her attitude is totally unattractive and I don't even want sex half the time because it's bad sex. She doesn't feel sexy because my attraction to her is "obligatory." As a result, she never presents a sexy attitude.

I'm thinking that maybe if she can see other guys also find her attractive, she will feel sex, then start acting sexy, then I'll be attracted to her and she's going to want it more because she'll believe once again that my attraction is genuine and not obligatory (and by that point it will be).

Thoughts on this? Also tag: /u/straius

The after/eternally persistent test ... ?

1 upvotes · 30 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Yes, and she will be for an entire year. I assume that makes a difference?

The after/eternally persistent test ... ?

1 upvotes · 30 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

intimacy building to do to create the necessary safe environment

Yeah, I definitely botched this a couple years ago, and it takes her forever to move on from things. There was one isolated time when she brought whipped cream and strawberries into the bedroom. Beforehand, we hadn't had sex in over a month and I was getting home from a night out with the guys long after she normally goes to sleep. As a result, I had no reason to expect sex and had gorged myself on food before coming home. The thought of more food (even whipped cream and strawberries) made me want to barf. I tried to act excited, but she could see right through it, noticing that I was disgusted. I was too beta to control the situation.

Long story short, we didn't have sex for another 3 months after that. Even after sex resumed and I confronted her about it being vanilla (which I have done periodically) she explained how embarrassed and mortified she was at how disgusted I was the one time she tried to do things differently, thinking it was her that I was disgusted with, not the pukiness from being so stuffed.

Fast-track a couple years later and despite a few efforts by me to try to do some different things (handcuffs, blindfold, etc.), she has been incredibly resistant to anything beyond missionary or cowgirl. For example, she refuses doggy style because: "I'm not an animal." She refuses oral because, "I would never do oral on you and I don't want to feel guilty for you doing something on me that I won't return." Even if I say I want to do it, she's hesitant and the guilt would still come.

Either way, I'll look into that blog. Thanks for the reference :) Not that it's going to stop me from bettering myself, I am extremely doubtful about the prospect of her ever turning from the "good girl" to the "hot slut." At least this doubt affirms to me that I'm doing this for my own purposes and not to get something out of it ... but it would be nice to have something to look forward to also :/

Thinking to end it with LTR for lack of feminine qualities

1 upvotes · 30 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Hey, do you have any updates on this? I know this is an old post, but I'm in a similar situation. I don't often find my wife attractive. She is, as you say, a "good girl," and makes no effort at all to seduce me. She is very physically attractive, but like you say ... when you've seen the same body over and over it's more about the attitude and attire. Even when we do have sex, it's usually me pleasing her and then finishing myself off in 30 seconds when she's done, or it's the same boring positions and routine (NMMNG had a lot to say about this that I'll be implementing down the road; post-c-section we've got a 6-week sex moratorium and are only 1 week in).

Before discovering TRP/MRP, about 4 months ago I started lifting and dieting and am in much better shape. For biblical reasons (I'm a Christian) I already started developing things like OYS and OI during that time-frame. I'm passing tests, but still failing some too. From what you describe, I am now where you were at when you wrote this post. So, I'm curious ... since you're two months ahead of me, where are you at now? Are you seeing progress in her, or did you leave her? Have you seen any signs of the "good girl" gone "slut" transition starting to happen?

The after/eternally persistent test ... ?

1 upvotes · 30 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

That was an incredible post. Thanks!

The after/eternally persistent test ... ?

1 upvotes · 30 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

I've seen this a million times, but have no clue: what is AM?

Because of the "I am" form of the word, this is pretty much impossible to google and the red pill glossaries don't include things like AA/AM.

The after/eternally persistent test ... ?

1 upvotes · 30 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Wonderful explanation. Thank you for taking the time to write this up.

Common shit test I've been getting.

1 upvotes · 30 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Let me know if you get an answer to this question. I can foresee my wife doing this. You pass the test, she says, "That's cute ... but no, really ... answer my question."

NMMNG and Divorce

1 upvotes · 29 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Are those books also in the sidebar or am I going to have to save this post to remember them?

NMMNG and Divorce

1 upvotes · 29 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

That's where my completionist nature kicks in :p I'm also an intellectual in nature, so from what I hear the writing is probably something that will resonate better with me than most.

NMMNG and Divorce

1 upvotes · 29 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

First was NMMNG. I think second is WISNIFG, which I'm starting tonight.

5 Love Languages v./and (?) NMMNG

1 upvotes · 29 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

That makes prefect sense. Reading this and other comments, I have come to this conclusion:

5LL cultivates fuzzies, RP cultivates tingles.

Cholomite's rule takes it from there. My marriage has more than enough fuzzies already.

How do I get a life?

1 upvotes · 29 June 2017 · /r/askTRP

It means that I'm approximately average weight (maybe slightly above) for my height/age, but also have slightly above average strength/muscle mass/stamina (i.e. I can still run long distances, I bench 250, etc.). I do not have a 6-pack or bulging biceps. People would look at me and say, "He's a big guy," but not "He's a fat guy" or "He's a jacked/ripped guy."

With this in mind, asking around on TRP about fitness goals and hearing advice, I'm told that from average it still takes 2 or so years to get in that ripped/jacked state that you need, unless you're hyper-ambitious about your regimen (which I am ... hoping to cut that time down a lot). I've had at least 2 people tell me that directly and I've seen it a couple times said to other people in similar conditions here.

If your body is not in top-notch shape, RP theory can work, but you're in hard-mode. Too skinny or too fat and you've got more barriers to work through when it comes to attracting women and your testosterone levels are too low to maintain the motivation and self-confidence needed to implement the more psychological aspects of self-improvement necessary to make red pill theory work in your life.

As a result, most threads suggest starting with improving your physical shape as the first and most important step, and also because it's the one that takes the longest to see real, raw results. Also, just as a matter of fact ... if a guy doesn't have the self-confidence and internal motivation to get himself in shape, he already lacks the qualities to make himself desirable to women or follow through with a self-improvement MAP because that lack of self-confidence and internal motivation spreads to all other areas of his life. So, the physical fitness regimen is, essentially, a hazing test to weed out people who just want an easy way to psychologically game women from the people who have what it takes to follow through.

That said, I'm still very, VERY new to TRP/MRP, so you might want to ask someone like /u/BluepillProfessor or one of the other veterans who knows their stuff better.

How do I differentiate friendliness with sexual interest with foreign girls?

1 upvotes · 29 June 2017 · /r/askTRP

Are those the kinds of friends who will help him grow or hold him back, though?

5 Love Langues v./and (?) NMMNG

1 upvotes · 28 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

This is insightful. That was my first red pill mind blow a couple days ago: women don't care about men, only about how men make them feel. I think the properly calibrated and mature Christian woman can overcome this at a conscious level, but there will always be a subconscious internal struggle with this core principle.

5 Love Langues v./and (?) NMMNG

1 upvotes · 28 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

This is very interesting and I feel like I only understand half of it :p I might have more questions for you after I take time to ponder.

5 Love Langues v./and (?) NMMNG

1 upvotes · 28 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Yeah, that's exactly what I'm thinking.

5 Love Langues* v./and (?) NMMNG

1 upvotes · 28 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Thanks! This is actually a helpful comment :)

Do you introduce your wives to TRP/MRP or RPW, and if so: when?

1 upvotes · 28 June 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Sage advice. Thanks!

Still learning, help me understand this.

1 upvotes · 28 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Vey insightful. Thanks for this. Does one of the books cover fogging specifically? I saw DEERING in NMMNG, but not fogging.

Still learning, help me understand this.

1 upvotes · 28 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Gotcha. I don't think either of us consciously took it as bragging, but I see how there could be subconscious elements of unattractiveness at work all the same.

Still learning, help me understand this.

1 upvotes · 28 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

This makes a lot of sense. I have a lot to learn! Read NMMNG going in thinking I wasn't a nice guy to begin with ... boy was I wrong. I'll keep going through sidebar.

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 28 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

frame is weak as hell and that you are pretty much obsessed with your wife's approval

I would have argued this point with you a couple days ago ... but after finishing NMMNG, I must agree. My frame is only strong outside my marriage (to be successful as an attorney it has to be). As soon as I get home, I'm into caregiver mode and try to be low maintenance and all that.

Still learning, help me understand this.

1 upvotes · 28 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Thanks for the input :)

crap-test

Sorry, the verbiage is my own internal word-preference. It has nothing to do with her or you or anything. Getting into it would get all religious and psychological ... suffice it to say I have no problem with other people saying certain words, but I respectfully decline myself.

Why did you tell her?

I should have explained: I didn't tell her to try to create dread; it's because we have an explicit, verbalized agreement to tell each other when these types of things happen in order to foster loyalty and trust.

Probably fogging in some way

So, any time she disagrees with me, rather than standing my ground I should just agree with her and submit to what she tells me to do? My understanding of fogging is that this is a tactic not intended for all arguments, but only those in which accepting her statements, frustrations, etc. would already fit within my degree of acceptance anyway. Otherwise, what's the difference between fogging and just being a pushover?

Still learning, help me understand this.

1 upvotes · 28 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Thanks for the heads up. 2 days in and already finished NMMNG. I'll start with MMSLP soon, as that's the other one I see recommended to me a lot.

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 27 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Good thoughts. Thanks!

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 27 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Interesting. Do you think the cultural norm reversal of being a SAHD has impacted the sexual interest reversal? I'd love to be a SAHD, and my wife's income could support it, but she also wants to be SAH and her job lends itself to that better (I have more day to day flexibility, she has season to season flexibility), so I'm likely always going to be full time.

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 27 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Looking more closely, is the "post on dread" the 60 day challenge? That's the only one I'm really seeing. The other thing on the sidebar that mentions dread is a blog that just recommends a ton of books that are already in the recommended reading. Is there something else I'm to be looking for?

As for the challenge, I think I've got some of it covered already:

FITNESS - I already mentioned I'm still working on this one DIET - I just finished the Whole 30 a couple weeks ago and am maintaining core principles. Diet is well under control.

Hygiene - I started addressing this a few months back. I used to have my wife cut my hair, but started going to a genuine barber; upgraded from generic brand to Old Spice shampoo and deodorant (I actually picked these out with my wife as the ones she liked); I've started shaving more regularly (I grow slowly, so it's easy to forget and let it go too far); I started using cologne.

STYLE - After fitness, this is probably where I need the most work. I'm in the "comfy clothes" phase still, except when I'm at work, when it's all suits every day. I did, however, start intentionally keeping the suit on until my wife was home and could see me in it (not in an obvious way, of course), rather than changing immediately when I got back. I suppose instead of gym shorts for the rest of the evening I should be putting on actual clothes :p

GAME - This is one I'll have to process some. I haven't intentionally made any efforts outside our marriage, but there have been a handful of times where I'll catch myself unintentionally chatting someone up just to feel good about the fact that I can still make someone smile. I used to be real good at game, but gave it up long ago, so I'm not sure how this fits in a marriage context. "Game your wife" seems like something you'd suggest to happen much later.

FINANCES - Immaculate. No debt (except our mortgage), great retirement, good buffer in the bank, and still freedom to live the lifestyle we want.

CAREER - Couldn't be better. I'm the senior attorney at my law firm and the boss is 82 or so; the expectation is that I'll take over the firm within the next few years (possibly co-own with another attorney, depending on the logistics).

SOCIAL AND HOBBIES - I already have a strong network of guy friends. I've typically tried to include my wife in that network vis a vis their wives or just directly, but she's very introverted, so she often complains about how I have all kinds of friends and she has no real relationships. Pushing too hard on this area beyond where I'm already it would probably come off as rubbing it in her face. To help, I've shifted to some more alone-hobbies, like novel-writing, going to the gym, racquetball, swimming with the kids, running/biking, going on walks with the kids, etc. Having 4 kids (including a newborn) pretty much means I have to pick hobbies that can be done when they're in bed or I take them with me; I have always refused to use my wife as a babysitter - I just always assume I'm responsible for the kids.

Any thoughts, comments, or suggestions? Areas where you think I'm deluding myself?

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 27 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Thanks :) This adequately addressed everything I was processing.

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 27 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Do you lift? Are you fat?

For the first 3 years of our marriage, yes I lifted and no I was not fat. Here's a quick snapshot. There have been ups and downs, but the overall trend looks something like this.

- At the time we married I was 6'0", 180lbs, doing triathalons and benching close to 300lbs.
- When we started having kids (3 years into marriage) I gradually declined until about a year ago when I hit my worst: 275lbs, struggling to run 5Ks and not lifting at all.
- Today, I'm back in marathon shape (not quite triathalon), weighing 220 and benching 250. I don't have a 6-pack or bulging veins and haven't had that since high school. I'm still working on rebuilding.

Why does everyone need to be reminded at all times about your love for God?

Sorry, that was kind of the context for this thread, and it also frames the context of my entire life, so I didn't think it would be off-putting. I'm happy to tone it down :) If you were referencing my conversation with my wife specifically, to that end you have to remember that I'm giving snapshots of conversations that might happen once every couple years, so it's not like I'm always feeding her this line. Part of my beta-ness was the fact that I really was not leading in a spiritual way (I gave up because she wasn't responding to my efforts to lead and specifically told me to stop trying to lead her at one point). Since then, spiritual conversation only comes up between us when we're in groups with other people who want to talk about it as well (b/c she won't shut them down if that's what they want to talk about), which also contributes to a huge disconnect: that despite having a common faith, we aren't "one" in how we live it out or communicate it. I clearly see that the responsibility for this is on my shoulders, not hers.

If you wife decidede to slut it up with you, you would probably judge her.

Not in the slightest. Biblically, I don't see many boundaries between what husbands and wives are allowed to do together. The only real boundary I have is causing harm (spanking is fine, doing actual damage to her body is not). I've tried introducing kinky-ish things in small ways here and there to gradually show her that I'm okay with it, but ropes to the bedpost is about the farthest she's ever been willing to go, and that probably only happened once or twice. Beta me respected her boundaries with a smile, while internally resenting her for it until I just said "screw it" and stopped caring anymore.

Oneitis is the idea that your wife is the only one for you

Yeah, I get what you're saying now. I don't believe in the concept of "soul mates," and fully accept the fact that there are countless other women out in the world with whom I could have a happier marriage. That said, having a happy marriage isn't my primary goal in life, and preserving the marriage I have is a significant factor in maintaining and pursuing the other things that really matter to me. So, for the sake of achieving higher priorities, making the most of my current marriage is what makes the most sense, even independent of any spiritual beliefs about divorce. But the spiritual beliefs certainly give her a reassurance that my independent priorities would not, as those priorities could change whereas she knows I won't give up on my faith, letting her abuse my oneitis for her own purposes. Interestingly enough, though, even though it doesn't come up often she has occasionally brought up the fact that one of her biggest fears is that I'll divorce her because my dad divorced my mom (my life very closely paralleled my dad's until about 5 years ago, when we finally diverged, the most significant parallel being that my dad was a pastor, yet that didn't stop him from divorce after he'd been out of the ministry for a couple decades).

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 27 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Disagreements aside, tell me more about this:

I do not particularly enjoy it because I am not attracted to her. Incidentally, that is how I found red pill theory.

My wife is very physically attractive, but I'm otherwise in a similar boat. Even when we do have sex, I really don't care for it. For a while I attributed it to boring repetition of the same 2 positions and the fact that her hands never move the entire time (doesn't grab her boobs, play with herself to help things along, won't touch me or move me to where she wants me to touch her ... literally, her hands are at her sides or under her head the entire time).

At some point I realized that despite her looks, even if I ignore her lack of skill in the bedroom, I'm not attracted to her personality anymore. For the first few years she was one person, then kids came and she became totally different. I've talked to her about this a handful of times, but the conversation doesn't go anywhere and my friend's old mantra usually pops in my head: "Women marry men hoping to change them; men marry women hoping they always stay the same ... in the end, both are always disappointed."

Doing divorce law, this is a reality I've seen proven over and over and over again. It puts men at a huge disadvantage because if you marry a woman for her personality and/or character, you have no guarantee that she'll still be like that in 5-10 years (when most people get divorced). If you marry her for her looks and sex appeal, you have a guarantee that this will fade with time.

I suppose that's where red pill theory comes in: just pick someone and "be awesome" regardless of whether or not you really like her 10 years down the line; find something else to center your life around. But even that seems to go against the grain of the notion that (as I have seen said here several times) MRP is, at its core, a strategy for sex.

Anyway, I'd love to hear more of your story and how red pill theory fits in :)

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 27 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

She is at many times like a child, treat her as such

This mentality helps. I think it gives a lot of perspective on how to deal with tests and general garbage that comes my way - and it's true: I can deal with my kids screaming at me without ruining my day, so I should be able to do it with her too. Thanks :)

That said, I'm pretty sure the covert contracts and OI stuff are things I've already got down pat. I have a lot of work to do in other areas, but the more I read about those things, the more I'm feeling confident in where I stand on them. Maintaining frame has always been a natural part of my character.

The "no begging or guilt tripping" thing confuses me a little. I have also refused to resort to those things. Beta me had that idea that the "perfect guy" was the one who would respect her boundaries and be happy about it. Everything I'm hearing here is to push those boundaries. So, I think I've already been doing the "no begging or guilt tripping" thing, but probably from the wrong place.

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 27 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

This is good. Thanks!

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 27 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Well said. Thanks!

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 27 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

2/2

Being satisfied with our earthly life is not exactly a recipe for spiritual progress.

Agreed. That said, as noted above, I do believe God gave us earthly things to find satisfaction in as a model for how we should find satisfaction in Him as well. 1 John 4:20 puts it incredibly well: "Whoever does not love their brother, whom they have seen, cannot love God, whom they have not seen." In essence, the physical/tangible things are the road map to how we can understand the spiritual things. Once we're at the destination, the road is no longer binding on us - its purpose has been served. But very few people can find what God has in store for them if they don't have some tangible example to look at first. After all, isn't that why Jesus spoke in down-to-earth parables rather than theological babble?

And this once again commingles nicely with MRP mentality: let's learn to master what God has given us first (Genesis 1:28 again, "fill the earth and subdue it, and have dominion ... over every living thing") so that we can understand the spiritual concepts those things were meant to parallel in our relationship with God. Genesis 1:28 is probably the most Red-Pill verse in the whole Bible for that reason alone, and that verse sets the context for every single thing the rest of the Bible is about thereafter: multiplication, discipleship.

So, when I say my passion isn't anything to do with my own life, it's simply this: to make disciples - helping others to find Christ and walk with him, experiencing what I have. This is the satisfaction I found in God that allowed me to give up porn and stop worrying about why my wife wouldn't sleep with me. Sex with my wife was merely the road, whereas spiritual reproduction with God was the destination. Once I'm at the destination and living in the place he prepared for me there, I no longer depend on the road or need it. That doesn't mean everyone should give up on sex; rather, it means that no one should have to rely on sex for their satisfaction once they have developed a lifestyle of disciple-making. In my mind, this is where I have become most OI in my marriage. Interestingly enough, in relationship with God he pretty much commands us to be OI there too (1 Corinthians 3:6-7 essentially says, "Don't worry about the outcome; that's my responsibility. You just be who I created you to be (Christ-like) and live that out (i.e. making disciples like Jesus did) and I'll take care of the rest." As you already cited, "Seek first His Kingdom and His righteousness and all these things will be added to you as well" (Matthew 6:33) - pretty OI to me :)

But it pales in comparison to what the Lord gives us through Christ by faith

Indeed ... just as a shadow pales in comparison to the intricacy and innate beauty of the thing casting it (Colossians and Hebrews again). This also reminds me of Psalm 37:4, "Delight yourself in the Lord and He will give you the desires of your heart." At first glance, this sounds great - "Yay! All those things I've been desiring will be mine!" But the passage could be re-written easily to say this, "Make me your greatest desire and I'll give myself to you!" Now that's a beautiful thing.

Tag: /u/cloud_of_unknowing /u/justpickanyusername

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 27 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

1/2

This is easily the best comment I've seen here so far. Thank you for this :) Love all the references and biblical grounding too! I'll try to give this the reply it deserves. Sorry if it's long :/

"Christianity" has been thoroughly feminized

I've been preaching this for years. In short, no matter what era or culture, women are more prone toward Christianity. The fact that we are the "bride of Christ" assures this - that's something they already are or want to be, so it comes naturally to them. Functioning in a relationship with God that way isn't natural for a man. As a result, the western church started playing to its strengths. It's very interesting that we don't see this same attitude in most of church history until suffrage movements started creeping up. I did a long study on that at one point and it was very eye-opening how church positions on gender roles and women's rights developed and at what was going on in history with each phase.

To some degree, this epitomizes MRP theory: wives want to submit, and if they don't respect their husbands, they just might go looking to someone else. When the church (the bride of Christ) lost respect for God, it looked to culture to screw it instead (not to be bizarrely graphic, but the entendre and implication both work).

Our sexual gratification, believe it or not, is not a high priority to the Lord. He is much more concerned with our faith and walk with him ... For the natural man, the flesh, sex is the peak of human experience.

Here's the biggest "MIND BLOWN" thing I've found in the last few years, which might tie a few things together for you, biblically, that jives quite well with this whole red pill thing. Discipleship is my greatest passion. God gave us the mission to "make disciples of all nations." He didn't "invite people from all nations to church" or "get people from all nations to say 'the prayer.'" He said, "Make disciples." This meant something very specific to him, and most of his last-supper speech (John 13-17) is devoted to this concept: "What I have done for them, now send them to do that for others." This has been my life-blood since the day I was saved.

Stepping aside for a moment, it's important to note that virtually everything God does in a physical/tangible way on earth is meant to parallel a deeper spiritual truth that only makes sense when someone understands the Gospel. There's a long-winded proof/explanation of this concept, which I'm happy to share, but for now I'll just assume you don't disagree. Marriage is no exception. In fact, this is one of the ones explicitly stated. We have the entire book of Hosea that exists to prove that physical marriage is meant to parallel our spiritual relationship with God, not to mention Ephesians 5, ever reference to us as "the bride of Christ" or Jesus as the "bridegroom" or God calling himself our "husband" (ex. Isaiah 54:5 - "For your Maker is your husband - the Lord Almighty is his name"). Looking into this, we also see that it extends to the familial structure as well. The apostles are constantly calling their disciples their "children." Paul even directly says a few times that he is their father.

At one point I was looking into the whole point of marriage. "It's not good for man to be alone" was not satisfying. God created man, including all of his needs. He could have said "it is good" as to his loneliness, just as he did with everything else. Why did he imbue this need for a spouse in him? The answer is right after he creates woman (Genesis 1:27 - "male and female he created them"), "Be fruitful and multiply and fill the earth" (1:28). That was God's purpose. But then you get to Genesis 6 and you see that they were fulfilling this command. They were filling the earth and multiplying, but God wipes everyone away and says, "That's not what I meant."

So, what did he mean? We get the answer in Malachi 2:15 - "And why did the Lord God make them one, with a portion of His Spirit in their union?" In essence, "Why did God want man and woman together?" It continues: "To produce godly offspring." Pre-Noah, the offspring were not godly, they were just warm bodies. God wanted godly offspring.

Now, because of the Gospel, we know that the physical things were only shadows of the truer heavenly things (Colossians 2:17 - "These are a shadow of the things that were to come"; see also Hebrews chapters 8-10 calling earthly things "a copy and shadow"). So, if the whole point of marriage is to produce godly offspring, that explains why God made sex so wonderful. As you say, "For the natural man, the flesh, sex is the peak of human experience." God wanted it to be that way. Why? Because just as physical oneness produces physical children, spiritual oneness produces spiritual children. Jesus even literally called it being "born again" (John 3). Producing those children is the whole reason God created marriage in the first place, and because of the Gospel we now understand that God didn't care for physical children alone: he wanted spiritual descendants (see Romans 9:8).

Spiritual descendants come from spiritual oneness - what Jesus talked about in John 17:21 when he said, "That all of them may be one, Father, just as you are in me and I am in you. May they also be in us." That's the reference to the spiritual oneness, but read the next line to see the product of this: "So that the world may believe that you have sent me." New believers. Spiritual babies who have been "born again."

To be clear, physical sex is the epitome of physical existence because God wanted spiritual oneness through evangelism to be the epitome of spiritual existence. And after someone has been "born again," they must be raised. Just as sex is the epitome of ecstasy in a marriage, those with kids typically agree that raising their children is the epitome of joy in a marriage (which is distinct from ecstasy). Not surprisingly, then, we see 3 John 4 saying, "I have no greater joy than to hear that my children are walking in the truth." In essence, his greatest joy was found in the way he raised his kids, just as I expect his greatest ecstasy from his relationship with God was found in the evangelism process that gave birth to those spiritual children.

So, although "our sexual gratification ... is not a high priority to the Lord," he had a very specific and clear reason for making it a high priority to us: to pave the way for an intense desire for evangelism and discipleship.

But look at what's happened to the western church! In many places overseas people are being converted left and right. But in the westernized church, where we have feminized Christianity to the nth degree, we're acting like all these low-libido women who would rather avoid sex. Sexless marriages and the stifling of sexual drive within the church has not led people away from sexual sin: it has only led them to repress or hide it (making true repentance insanely difficult), which also has the counter-impact of making them not want spiritual oneness with God through evangelism either, and thus Christianity is on the decline in America (among other factors, of course).

Sorry if that was long, but it's truly fascinating to me to see the bold connection in Scripture between things like marriage, sex, evangelism, discipleship, raising children, etc. Tons more to say on that, but I've already gone on too much :p

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 27 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

This comment was very helpful. Thank you!

it is not her fault, it is your fault the relationship is like this Totally agreed, and I have maintained this position for a long time. That said, beta me had given up on the relationship in the first time, just looking to enjoy the little things rather than actually making something of our marriage. So, in a way, I knew I was to blame, but I didn't care because I had become content with the low relational bar and the non-existent sex bar.

ease into everything slowly

This is going to be hard. I tend to be an all-or-nothing guy. For the last several years, it's been pretty much "nothing" in the marriage and sex departments. Now I've got some revitalized interest in taking charge and developing an attractive frame. My temptation will be to change everything overnight, implementing every new tactic the very next day after reading about it. Even as a cross country/marathon runner, I never quite learned to pace myself ... I sprint until I start to run dry, take a short breather, then sprint again.

you have never led her in the bedroom properly

This is true. I've always put her sexual satisfaction above my own, catering to her desires and not mine. She has said repeatedly that she appreciates that about me - that I won't finish until she does first, which she consciously thinks of as that one-in-a-million-kind-a-guy thing. But subconsciously, I feel like it was the ultimate beta bomb in her psyche, affecting how she views me.

Get ripped ... not I look better than I ever have. Or, I look pretty good for my age. Meaning I am just as ripped as any 20 something college athlete ripped.

This is probably the most helpful line I've seen on this thread. To some degree, I had "marriage weight" in my head as the goal. When we were married, I was 6'0", 180lbs, running triathalons, and benching close to 300lbs. Today, I'm the same height, but 220lbs (after losing the 35lbs I mentioned in my original post), still able to run a marathon (with much lower times), and benching about 250. But even at marriage weight and strength, I wasn't ripped the way you describe. I had abs that showed, but not quite a 6-pack, and I typically hid my physique under baggy clothes (hence what I believe to be the reason for much of the "men's fashion" advice around here).

Start passing s and comfort tests and your attractiveness will increase

So, I mostly read about these tests on TRP, but haven't gotten to much content about them here other than people saying, "I'm passing these" or "I'm failing these." What do these look like in a marriage context? Is it simply how you handle conflict/disagreements? Or is there more to it than that? How do you know when it's active v. passive? What's the difference between s and comfort in a marriage context? After 9 years of marriage, are these really "tests" or just patterns that have developed because she's already figured out beta-me's boundaries?

You have probably never pushed past any of her boundaries. You have always stopped at any resistance like a good beta nice guy.

This sums it up fairly closely. When she verbalized a boundary, instead of insisting, I would get angry. It's a pretty childish way of letting her know I didn't like her boundary ... but hey, I've been pretty naive about what a healthy sex life looks like for a good chunk of my life :p

Don't push any boundaries until you have reached this point or it will backfire

Sage advice there. That said, how clear is the line between, "That's easy - I'm already used to not pushing boundaries because I've been a pansy beta in the bedroom for so long" and "I'm an alpha now, but I'm tactfully withholding"?

Dread level 5

How does this whole dread level thing work? I saw it briefly on the sidebar, but haven't gotten there yet. Is that a place to start, or should I stick to the books before getting there?

about 5 months until you start this

That's about the time-frame I had in my head anyway.

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 27 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

none of this has anything to do with what actually matters here, which is improving yourself

Indeed. That single purpose is what got me started down this path months before even discovering this sub :) I'm still curious, though, if MRP thinks I should maintain my intentionally stifled libido leading to my "screw sex, I don't need it" attitude, or if giving up hope is really, in effect, giving her more power and authority over me, submitting to her frame of sexlessness rather than the frame I originally tried to maintain of desiring a healthy sex life.

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 27 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

I doubt that she has ever found you attractive ... gives her tingles

When we were dating, I did this. At some point she started feeling dirty for being aroused before marriage, which led to her withdrawing from situations where we could get physically close. I started to back off from the relationship as a result. She recoiled and promised that when we were married she would feel open and free, jumping all over me. Things got better for a while, but when we married she never followed through. Not sure if that changes anything, except to say that I do believe she found me attractive when I was an alpha before. I just let a few bumps and bruises along the way lead me down the beta path for so long that her former attraction fell into oblivion.

In other words your house/ yard is a pigsty and you do not do the manly things that a wife expects done.

I can see how you got that impression, leading me to make an edit on my post. My point wasn't that I'm not doing these things. It's that I don't care to and it's become something I dread rather than something I enjoy because I don't see how it connects to my passions and purpose. Of course, again, that's my problem, not hers.

focus on lifting and diet

Still working on this. I'm in pretty good shape now, but someone else here helpfully noted, "wedding weight isn't enough. You need to be like a ripped high school jock." I'm not there yet. I'm 6'0", 220lbs, can run a marathon and bench 250 ... but my physique is not "ripped" and I do still have a little padding on me.

there is no fixing your sex life ... You have never had a good sex life with her

Accepting the second part as true, if I'm correct about her being attracted to me at one point, does that change the hope for the future? Or is your line about her being "very low libido naturally" (if that's true) something that would override most everything else?

I do agree that the need to "erase all that history from her brain" is going to be the hardest part. But isn't the whole point of MRP to do exactly that? To give hope to guys who have struggled with this issue in their marriages?

any happy sexual future probably does not include your wife

That is a reality I accepted a few years ago and decided to move on with my life, content without a healthy sex-life. Discovering TRP/MRP last night started to make me reconsider my position on this. Am I correct in understanding that you're essentially saying, "Forget about us. If you won't divorce, you're a lost cause and we can't help you"?

Tag: /u/ParadoxThatDrivesUs

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 27 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

You were never Alpha

I respectfully disagree. But I'll take your post in this context nonetheless.

Organized religion is a tool for control.

I actually agree with you. That doesn't diminish the truth it has to offer or the value it brings. Faith and grace, on the other hand, are the exact opposite. They remove control by granting freedoms that didn't exist in the era of the law (or as Christians call it: the old covenant). Unfortunately, most modern western church leaders would prefer to be behavioral psychologists than actual pastors (the way the Bible defines the role), so they're more interested in conforming behavior patterns than developing hearts and relationships. To put it more clearly: God doesn't want people to act nice and avoid bad things; he wants nice people who have no desire to do bad things. One is actions based, another is character based. Most churches confuse actions and character. They'll use the word "character," but (to quote Inigo Montoya, Princess Bride): "I do not think it means what you think it means."

use it to your advantage ... persuade (trap) her into having sex with you

Yeah, I'm not interested in that.

"follows the bible ... good christian ... heaven"

Agreed, but on different grounds. This is back to that behavior conformity garbage that many pastors focus on. Behavior matters, but (to quote my discipler): "We are human beings, not human doings. Stop trying to define yourself by what you do; figure out who you are, then live it out." In other words, obeying all the rules cannot possibly make someone a "better Christian." But being a Christian does provoke an internal desire to live a certain way. Getting this process mixed up is one of the most serious problems in the church.

Rules are for Betas, exceptions are for Alphas

And that's probably a better way of summing up what I've been saying :p (using RP terminology, of course).

NO COVERT CONTRACTS

If you can, can you explain this covert contracts idea a bit more? Basic logic and context leads me to conclude that they're subconscious codes that we live by, assuming that we can expect a certain quid pro quo when we meet the code or sets of expectations others might have on us or that we put on ourselves. But how, exactly, does that fit into RP mentality? Is it simply that it's inconsistent with being OI and OI is necessary in order to reach a state of being that will attract her? Or is there more to it than that?

Questions aside, I obviously agree with the concept and have been implementing at least my understanding of this concept for a long time as something I believe the Bible teaches as well. But, maybe you saw something in my post that implied I'm a little blinded to my own covert contracts? If you could angle that mirror for me to catch the blind spot, that would be very helpful :)

It's also worth noting, if it makes a difference, that she is fully aware that my position will be "accept the no," which is exactly what I've done. I don't let it get to me anymore ... I just brought it up as an example, not something I'm worried about changing.

All that said, thanks for the input :) This has been helpful.

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 27 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

you don't need reasons for divorce anymore

Sorry, I meant biblical grounds. Legal grounds are a joke. As to my wife's hamster, she is a legalist through and through with every fiber of her being. This means that she will sacrifice every ounce of her own happiness for the sake of "not sinning." Interestingly enough, this attitude itself is pretty darn sinful and not what Jesus called us to. Jesus came to free us from the law, not to make us slaves to it again. But my point is: even though I accept the possibility that she may leave me one day, I see it as about as likely as me winning the lotto ... particularly in light of the fact that I don't buy lotto tickets. Is it possible? Yes. But even less likely than it is for the average lotto player, which is already absurdly unlikely as it is.

You coming to peace with the possibility that you might not be married for life, and that you can have a pretty good life without your wife.

Yes, I get that and am already on board ... have been for a number of years. There have been a handful of times when she has asked me, "How would you feel if I died?" My response is typically, "I would be sad, but not devastated. I find my satisfaction in God, not you. You're here because I like you and want you around." This is truth for me in my inner-most being.

That said, explain to me more about this "oneitis" thing ...? I've read it a few times on this and related subs, but haven't fully gotten what the MRP stance is on it.

I'm quite glad to hear from a christian RP noob who is cogent and can think for himself. It's fairly rare.

Yeah, I try to train the guys I teach to avoid being blind followers. Acts 17:11 commends the Bereans for being "more noble than the Thessalonians" because instead of just taking Paul's word for it when he taught things, they actually looked it up and tested his words against the Scripture to see if what he said was true. We should all be striving to be more like the Bereans ... otherwise, why would Luke commend them as being "more noble" if we weren't supposed to follow in their footsteps?

confirmation bias

Agreed and understood. In the many years I've spent developing my study/interpretation skills, hermeneutics, etc. this is one of the things I've worked at the most.

My discipler once suggested when we were studying a passage together, "How would your mom interpret this verse?" It caught me off guard. The he asked, "What about the president? How would he react to this? Or what about an atheist or buddhist or hindu? How would your best friend interpret this?" I scratched my head and realized I couldn't answer all these questions. He concluded, "Until you can visualize something from other perspectives beyond your own, you'll never fully understand it. That's the core premise behind meditating on Scripture." I now practice this regularly when I study the Bible, and have taken it a few levels forward since then as well.

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 27 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

if you see the dishes need to be cleaned, you do them. Why? Because they are dirty and you want a clean house.

That's probably where my biggest disconnect is. If the sink is loaded, sure, I'll want it cleaned. If there are a few dishes, I don't care to clean it more than it is ... but I still do it just because it's there and it needs to be done, not because it makes my house cleaner. I think it has more to do with making progress, even in the little things that don't matter - knocking them out before they do matter, even if I don't get the same gratification from it as if I had waited until it was a full sink and can actually see significant progress at the end.

game your wife ... "i dont need you. But i want you."

I've had this conversation many times :) In fact, there have been a handful of times when she has asked me, "How would you feel if I died?" My response is typically, "I would be sad, but not devastated. I find my satisfaction in God, not you. You're here because I like you and want you around." It's never translated to sex, though ... and that logic really came from beta me trying to be all sweet and thoughtful without sacrificing honesty. Needless to say, beta me was too internally screwed up to have the guts to pull her into the bedroom.

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 26 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Agreed.

RP and religion ...?

1 upvotes · 26 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

My alpha days were when we were dating and probably the first year of our marriage. I wasn't implying that I've been alpha the whole time, by any means ... betaness just developed over time. You may or may not believe me (doesn't really matter), but I'm content in what I believe to be an objective perception of how I interacted with the world and my wife back then. In her terms, that's what made her want to marry me, but it never did much for our sex life.

I didn't say I was concerned about getting BJs or going down on her. I was merely curious how this community would interpret things I've been through. I'm new to TRP/MRP, so I'm still absorbing things from an intellectual standpoint before I can start personalizing it. My analytical mental framework has that innate drive to want to understand where a thing begins and ends before I start walking its line.

I do feel like I have a strong understanding of my life's purpose and I'm committed to it. That is one of the things I have never wavered on during the course of our marriage. That said, I totally agree that I "don't know what MRP is," and that's the primary purpose of my post: to figure out what the heck this is all about and how MRP principles would apply in different scenarios. Understanding it as a sex strategy frame-work really helps (none of the other posts I read put it so bluntly). Is that the end-goal of MRP, or is there something more to it? I see a lot of "becoming the best you you can be!" slogans paraded through the comments sections, but that just seems cheesy and lame when it's put that way.

Soon-To-Be-Ex-Wife blows up constantly. Do I handle this right for the moment?

1 upvotes · 26 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

You say you don't want to re-commit to her, but I'm sensing ambiguity based on the character of your relationship and my experience as a divorce attorney tells me you could end up back together (I've seen it happen several times - even facilitated it, including after a 2-year long case that went right up to trial).

So, if you do want to get back together, here's something I just wrote up for the other guy who has problems with an explosive wife:

https://www.reddit.com/r/askMRP/comments/6jbhmn/wife_threatened_to_take_the_kids_from_me_over_a/djelguf/

I always err on the side of trying to preserve marriages, but from your description it sounds like she has borderline personality disorder (although I'm not yet licensed to diagnose, our firm specializes in divorce cases involving psychological issues) and you might have a touch of narcissism, which is always a devastating combo and can make relationships very difficult. So, I don't blame you for wanting out. But I would do some research on borderlines so you know (1) how to interact with her as the mother of your child, and (2) how to avoid these types of women in the future, or otherwise engage with them in a meaningful way.

My Daughters Rules for Dating My Daughter.

0 upvotes · 10 April 2021 · /r/RPChristians

My theory would be that it would breed resentment if she were forced into it

Do you believe that's the case because you come from a society that encourage people to choose their own spouses for any reason they feel like, and therefore shifting them to an arranged-marriage structure would be offensive to your values?

Or are you looking at this from the viewpoint of a society where that is all people have ever known, and the idea of choosing your own spouse would seem not only foreign, but even offensive and illogical?

So it's not really about having dad there, per-se, as much as not leaving any room for impropriety.

That makes more sense. Though now we're back to standard courtship culture: only group environments all the time, never alone (among other things). There's wisdom there. We just have to remember in this that we're not pulling these views from Scripture, but from our own efforts to be wise. As long as people recognize this, then you have freedom to lead your house as you do :)

Backwards sexual dynamic?

0 upvotes · 16 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Spiritual reproduction = causing people to be "born again," as Jesus puts it, and then raising up your spiritual children. More commonly: evangelism and discipleship.

Post is up: https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/lld7is/why_god_doesnt_love_you/

Is there a subreddit to post Christian Discord Servers?

0 upvotes · 7 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

You mean is there a subreddit that will let you advertise your server for free to all of their user base so you don't have to put in the work to build it yourself? Good luck.

Anyone else frustrated with their church leadership re: COVID?

0 upvotes · 30 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I don't disagree. But what of those ~~pastors~~ congregation leaders who make the personal decision that they wouldn't go? This approach basically forces all ~~pastors~~ congregation leaders to align their own preference with those who want to attend services in order to give them that opportunity.

The reality is that some places will open sooner than others. If someone whose congregation is closed wants to attend a service, they're welcome to go somewhere else that's actually open. This will, in the long-term, preference places that open sooner and cause a lot of member-shifting if the more scared ones stay closed.

That said, I prefer congregations to stay closed as long as humanly possible - not out of fear of corona, but because the prospect of re-opening is what's keeping most of churchianity from reflecting on necessary modifications to the structure and mission of the church during this time.

Actual conversations with "abuse" victims.

0 upvotes · 14 June 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Nah. Your every comment only proves the exact point of my post more and more. You're claiming you're the victim of "sexual coercion" yet simultaneously saying that you have sex over 7 times a week, on average, and that you initiate 60% of the time. Realistically, do you believe your husband deserves to be punished by the legal system in this situation? That's just laughable. Or perhaps you missed that I'm a divorce attorney and all of the examples I gave were specifically in the context of women asking the legal system to make their husbands pay for their "abusive behaviors."

But I also don't expect you to understand the way your own comments have been proving my point. You are entertaining this conversation from an emotional standpoint rather than rational thought. I'd never dream of telling you to calm down because (1) I doubt it would have the intended effect, (2) I don't think you'd be capable in this conversation, even if you wanted, and (3) that would take the fun out of it.

What is the Christian right's future in American politics?

0 upvotes · 20 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

What you're describing is called, by some, "missional communities" (a term that's expanded to mean other things too, as of late). The goal here, of course, shouldn't be to create political change because Jesus never intended the church to be a political kingdom on earth. That's what made Catholicism go so cockeyed. They tried to become a political force and lost track of the spiritual nature of God's Kingdom. Do you really want to repeat their mistake?

Let human governments do what they will. We keep focusing on discipleship.

That doesn't mean we can't exercise our political influence in a godly manner. By all means, do that! For most, our only political influence is the right to vote. For others, like myself, it includes influencing those who hold office. For still others, it means actually running for office and enacting change. But under biblical terms, it NEVER means revolution against the prevailing authorities, which would be a direct violation of Romans 13. If we were to disrespect our ungodly political authorities, being in the submissive position beneath them, it would, by parallel, set a precedent that wives, being in submission, should revolt against ungodly husbands. None of this is modeled by Jesus and the apostles in their interactions with a politically oppressive government.

Response to RPChristians from a Hindu

0 upvotes · 26 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Biblically, it's hard to make a case for polygamy as a black-and-white sin. Really, as I understand Romans 14, really nothing can be called a black-and-white sin at all. Rather, sin is based on an assessment of one's own heart toward the situation, as well as the prompting of one's faith (which flows from Scripture) toward the behavior.

Back on track: there are numerous godly men who were polygamous and never condemned for it or experienced the disastrous consequences that the anti-polygamists claim are "always" associated with polygamy in Scripture. What I see is quite the reverse - that God often even redeems polygamous relationships. Two easy examples:

- Jacob w/ Rachel/Leah/their servants. God used these multiple sexual sources for Jacob to father the 12 tribes of Israel, blessing all of them as part of the mighty nation, rather than only those born of Leah (which is a stark contrast to the Abraham story).
- David and Bathsheba. She was one of David's many wives - and her husband, who David essentially killed, was one of his mighty men and closest friends. Yet God chose her to bear Solomon rather than David's first/previous wives. In the entire story, the polygamy is never condemned; rather, it was the murder/adultery with another man's wife that was condemned. In fact, that's the point where Nathan even tells David, "I gave you all of Saul's wives and concubines, and if you wanted more I would have given them to you also," virtually endorsing David's polygamy as God's gift to him. How could we, then, call it sinful for all people?

Also, you say that Solomon was "punished" for having many wives and concubines. But I don't see that in the Bible. I see that he was punished because of the idolatry that these women led him into.

That said, and in light of the clearly negative examples of polygamy in Scripture, it's obvious that polygamy is generally unwise. Most men can barely handle one wife. Why make yourself responsible for even more? The NT is clear enough that it's even better to have no wives than one, but even if you're going to have a wife, it's better to have 1 than more or else you'll be disqualified from having any position of authority within the church. Who would want to sacrifice that if he has the capacity to avoid it? I certainly wouldn't want to compromise my life's mission in that way. Certainly it's unwise to increase the number of people you're married to, no matter what your current number is (which is why Paul advises in 1 Cor. 7 for each person to stay as they are).

But that doesn't make it inherently sinful.

At best, we could argue that Jesus has a singular bride: the Church, and therefore having multiple brides would be a poor reflection of Jesus's model of marriage, as he is not polygamous. Then again, others argue that we are all Christ's bride, which has the appearance of polygamy, as we are all independently autonomous in our relationship with him. Then others appropriately recognize that we're all also only part of one singular body - and I am not married to my wife's nose separately from her finger. Yet the other camp will also recognize the limited nature of this parallel because my wife's nose and finger aren't separately sentient. And around and around we go to the point that there's no definitive conclusion that can be made from this line.

The hard teachings against polygamy in churchianity are based on a combination of general wisdom and cultural condemnation of the practice. It's unlawful in most places in the world, so the church has conformed to the government's condemnation of it as well, as the church conforms to the secular world on a number of other things also.

But I do believe that God initially gave men a polygamous drive in order to populate the world. I also expect that, to some degree, God wanted us to see on a spiritual level that Jesus wants to reproduce through all of us and not just the one guy in a generation who happens to be a super-evangelist, like Billy Graham.

I don't see polygamy as being inherently sinful. But like all things, I see that it is most often expressed in a sinful way, just as sex isn't inherently sinful, but is often expressed in sinful ways.

To that end, I often tell people: if you live in a country where polygamy is legal and you have the financial resources to provide for multiple wives and you are willing to take on the responsibilities of a spiritual bond with multiple women, and you're also willing to give up your ability ever to be an authoritative figure in God's Kingdom, then go for it. For everyone else, you're best with no wife, or one if you can't keep your pants on.

The Main Event

0 upvotes · 1 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I disagree, actually. Sometimes a woman will not respond to a man's improvement, no matter how much he improves. We simply can't control this. Also, she might trigger the main event due to her own hypergamy, independent of the degree of the man's improvement.

There will always be outliers. The red pill is focused more on maximizing probability by assuming all women will conform to the norm because the norm for women is overwhelming, and all women are innately inclined to the norm. Buy certain outliers, either through psychological damage or incredible discipline, simply break the norm and we can't predict that.

What to do about boundaries being crossed?

0 upvotes · 8 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

If she brings up the parent-child dynamic again poke fun at her like you would if your little sister was bugging you.

Next time he makes dinner he should put a bottle with milk in it on the table where her drink should go. "Oh, I'm sorry, when you said parent/child you thought you were an older child?"

Discussion: Is it okay to masturbate to thoughts of your wife?

0 upvotes · 6 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Solid answer. I do think the bible gives more regulation than is implied here, as in isolation one could read this post and assume watching porn is just fine. But on the broader scope, within scriptural bounds, this is pretty darn close to my view.

I'm still committed to Romans 14:23 such that if you can't honestly say, "I was thinking about the gospel and it made me feel like I should jack off today," then it's still sin - as is the default state we live in. But, as you note, there can be a wisdom in being in one type of sin over another, and I believe there likely are circumstances where faith might compel masturbation (I'm just not in a place to conduct that thought experiment right now, need to be on a run or at the gym).

And I appreciate your fair treatment of the other side too.

Using power/muscle during sex

0 upvotes · 18 January 2019 · /r/askMRP

There's a difference between: "I love holding my wife against the wall and pounding away" and, "Hey guys, help me find more ways to show off my muscles in the bedroom." The context of the question screams validation-seeking.

Follow the Red Pill but Do Not Sin...

0 upvotes · 8 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Why do you care what he calls you? Amused mastery, and don't live in his frame ... then humbly learn and move on.

Where's the best place for a 21 year old man to meet other christian singles?

0 upvotes · 14 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

but the people I meet aren't grounded in the same values I am

You're looking for people who are ready made. Be a leader. If they don't share your interests now, find people who differ and lead them until they do. Intentional influence, even if not overtly recognized, can be very powerful.

The Consciously Crazy Wife

0 upvotes · 29 October 2018 · /r/askMRP

My wife hates the calm smile as well. She's commented on how much she hates it before.

I think they interpret it as a sign of intentionally flaunting to her that she has no power over you. To her, that's worse than me maintaining an even composure. It doesn't stop me from doing it, though - especially when it comes out because I'm trying to hold back actual laughter.

Was recommended to cross post from MRP.

0 upvotes · 29 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

After all, it takes 2 to escalate and go crazy most of the time.

"Most of the time" is the operative phrase. In my response, I identified with OP given a situation that happened just yesterday where my wife escalated into enraged shouting literally because she asked me to talk about something and I said "OK" and not "OK, let's talk about it sometime."

She acknowledged mid-conversation that she had no idea how her feelings escalated to that level and that it was completely irrational for her to be upset with me about it in the first place. But, "This is still how I'm feeling anyway," sprinkled with a little attitude that communicated, And you're responsible for my feelings, whether you caused them or not.

Open thread

0 upvotes · 27 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It's interesting, but definitely not odd.

1. 69% of redditors are men and 31% are women, so there's already a default leaning that you're more than 2x as likely to come across men as women.
2. Most of the users on RPC came from MRP, which expressly excludes women from participating (they're banned on sight, as they make it clear up-front that it's a men-only space).
3. Red pill praxeology resonates with men more than women because most women are already indoctrinated by feminism and see the red pill as their enemy, not a legitimate and viable option.
4. Similarly as 3, the biblical leader-helper dynamic, while being equally advantageous to both parties on the whole, has a first-blush appearance of favoring men, who get to be the leaders, and stifling women, who are instructed to be submissive, and thus men are going to be more drawn to it because they're quicker to embrace this biblical balance.

So, I'm not surprised that it's mostly men, but we do have about 5 or 6 women who comment fairly regularly and a few others that pop up here and there.

For Women: Getting Your Beta to Man Up

0 upvotes · 20 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

There is so much wrong with the underlying attitude you're writing with.

New to Christianity

0 upvotes · 20 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Read the first word of the quoted text. There is no major conflict like that.

A Guide to Manipulation - Part 1: Are You Being Manipulated?

0 upvotes · 13 March 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

In 1, a person feels this way regardless of the behaviors of other people. They are often irrational in the way they experience these things. Examples:

- 1 - Adam's girlfriend has always been encouraging and positive about the relationship, but he's still constantly afraid she'll leave him.
- 5 - The relationship is very normal and straight forward, but Adam feels like it's complex anyway.
- 8 - Adam's GF is happy and never indicates there's anything wrong, but he's paranoid and constantly thinks there is anyway.
- 9 - Adam's GF doesn't attack or criticize him, but he still feels compelled to explain away behaviors that he believes she should be upset by.
- 10 - Adam's GF has been faithful, shown every sign of trust, and has had absolutely no opportunity to cheat on him, yet he obsesses about the idea that if he stops watching her for a moment, she will betray that trust.
- 14 - Adam's GF has responded positively and been very receptive even when Adam has expressed negative thoughts/emotions, but Adam still feels like he's "not allowed" to do that around her.
- 18 - Adam's GF has always been warm and affectionate, but (for example, because of past relationships) he still thinks that she will withdraw sex, love, affection, etc. if he's not extremely cautious.

In 2, the person experiences these things because of cues triggered by the other person. For example, assume Bob has never experienced the strength and freedom of being a strong-independent man, still deeply-rooted in blue pill thinking:

- 1 - Bob's GF threatens to leave him frequently ... she has manipulated Bob into fearing the loss of the relationship because he doesn't want to be forever alone again.
- 5 - Bob's GF is constantly changing the context of the relationship and he can't understand her, making him feel unstable ... she has manipulated him into a position whereby he is easily malleable in any direction.

- 8 - Bob's GF is constantly complaining that something is wrong, making Bob feel like something is wrong even when she's not complaining anymore ... she has manipulated him into a framework of always trying to please her.
- 9 - Bob's GF is constantly attacking him, putting him on the defensive ... she has manipulated Bob into thinking that she is his judge and her word is final.
- 10 - Whether or not she's actually cheating, she suggests to Bob that she can go off and screw other guys whenever she wants and that she might do it if she's mad at him ... she has manipulated Bob into an emotional state that she can pull out as a trump card in any argument: "You're just being jealous, like when you __, __, and __. You know I wasn't being serious when I said that [regardless of whether she was or not]."
- 14 - Bob's GF guilt trips him every time he says something or acts in a way that makes her feel bad ... she has manipulated Bob into believing he is unlovable and must present himself to her on her terms in order to be loved.
- 18 - Bob's GF constantly denies him sex, storms out of the house, slaps his hand when he tries to touch her, etc. whenever he's not behaving the way she likes ... she has manipulated Bob into believing that he must behave on her terms in order to receive love, sex, attention, etc.

Both Adam and Bob have weak frames and are operating in their GF's frame. In Adam's case, he's doing it to himself, most likely because he lived Bob's situation in a previous relationship. He does not have a context for it in this present relationship, but can't let those feelings go anyway. In Bob's case, he enters without any inherent assumptions about the relationship, but his GF bends and twists him until he complies with her desire to control him, and if he leaves her he'll likely end up like Adam in the next relationship.

To /u/johnyapocalypse's credit, these both do result in mental illness, which will often persist even after the relationship ends. But in Adam's case, his GF is not manipulating him - Adam is just a manipulated man. Bob is a man who was not manipulated, but is being manipulated.

To be clear: Bob's girlfriend may not be doing any of this intentionally. It's just who she is. Bob just doesn't know how to deal with it.

Husband pastor & quite time

0 upvotes · 2 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Gay marriage has a different theological premise than the "women should never have a day job" concept you espouse. Homosexuality falls within my 95% overlap estimate. Your position is within the 5% that does not overlap.

Even Jesus debunked the Soul Mate Myth.

0 upvotes · 31 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with the heart behind a lot of what you're saying, with a few exceptions. I do want to be clear that in the absence of divine prophecy (which must be treated with great skepticism), even if God does have a specific "one" for you, there's no way of having concrete evidence of who she is.

To that end, apart from divine prophecy, the concept of a "soulmate" is a moot concept even if it is a theologically accurate one.

Hosea wasn't told to marry a specific woman, he was told to marry a prostitute, and he chose Gomer. He could have chosen another prostitute.

Good catch. I have been misremembering that for years!

And it is a search, for God says "he who findeth a wife findeth a good thing."

Oooh ... and you were doing so good. That word "find" is matsa, which is actually a type of Israeli food ... oh wait, that's matzah. For real, though, of its 455 uses, only once is it ever translated as "seek." Virtually every other context implies "happening to come across."

This goes perfectly with my view that men and women should avoid marriage to pursue God as their primary and sole interest, but that if while doing so they happen to be pursuing God alongside someone of the opposite gender and sexual attraction is becoming an issue, then get married and go at it. For the several people I know who have done just this they have the most godly marriages I know, including in an PR sense.

He does answer prayers, after all. It would seem awfully odd for God to answer prayers in other aspects of life, but not in the second most important decision a man will ever make that is to mirror one's own relationship with the Lord.

This presumes that God wants everyone who prays for a wife to get married. I believe that most people looking for spouses are doing so not because God wants them married, but because of societal pressure toward marriage. Now, some people legitimately should be married even by God's own plan, but they still marry for social pressure reasons, which I don't see God endorsing. God cares not only about what a person does, but why he does it (1 Samuel 16:7 and all).

To that end, I've long held the view, even since college before reddit was invented, that God will not aid someone in finding a spouse until they are first content in Him alone. When a man says, "God, I can't possibly be happy and satisfied on earth unless I get married," he has plainly made "marriage" an idol in his life. This is literally the epitome of blue pill thinking, and it was my first self-taught escape into red pill awareness. I do not see God supporting a man in his pursuit of idolatry - even if it is a man who, for all other practical purposes, God does intend to be married. So, no, I don't think God would assist this man in answering that prayer, though he won't hold him back from his idolatry (per the Romans 1 - "I'll give you over to your sinfulness" pattern).

Be the Judge

0 upvotes · 21 December 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I feel like we're saying a lot of the same stuff, so maybe I just worded myself very poorly.

High value men are not in short supply. A high value man she can "command" is the unicorn. That "command" comes from commitment - when she feels like she has him on her hook for whatever reason. Of course, it's a unicorn because once she commands him (because his commitment interferes with his power in the relationship) he loses value, as you noted.

Women DO want commitment. But they also want to be attracted to their spouse and it's darn near impossible to have both, which is why dread (demonstration of risk of commitment loss) actually works. It's these paradoxically competing desires that creates the problem I was outlining, and which I have written about on RPC.

So, my point was that she doesn't want the guy's "high value dick." She wants control of him which comes through commitment. That's the essence of hypergamy. She wants to know that she's locked Chad down. If it was really just about sex with a high value man and nothing more, marriage 1.5 or 2.0 wouldn't be a thing. There would be no concern for utilizing social and legal pressures to keep him committed because the next Chad is just around the corner, as the rate of women filing for divorce demonstrates.

The number one reason for leaving red pill

0 upvotes · 29 November 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

You assume too much.

113 - A History of Feminism

0 upvotes · 17 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Politics aside, it is significant to note that (1) no biblical society allowed women a right to vote or hold political office (Deborah being the rare, unusual case), (2) God never condemned that aspect of any of these societies, (3) God never issued any statement supporting equal political authority rights for women, (4) that these positions were true during a time when Israel was ruled by God before the reign of kings, and (5) that these principles continued throughout the new testament times, and (6) that these principles remained consistent throughout virtually all of church history until the 1800s, and (7) that given the obvious parallels between Israel and the church, it's very difficult to argue church leadership structure should be managed distinctly and separately from an ideal political structure among a godly people/society - and we should desire our nation to become a godly people/society.

Explain to me the problems of Red Pill

0 upvotes · 10 October 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

It sounds to me like you're in the same camp I'm in - you agree with the descriptive elements of RP, but disagree with the prescriptive. That is, RP seems to understand correctly how the world operates, and you find value in that - but when it comes to the advice on what people should do with that knowledge, you pave your own way. Sometimes it makes sense, like lifting, dressing better, flirting with your spouse, being a strong leader, etc. Other times it's stuff that can be rejected, like plating, negging, treating women like they're inferior, etc.

Anytime someone comes on this sub asking questions about why they're against RP, it's always the same response: "What does RP give that you can't get anywhere else?" The same question could be asked about any other mentality. There's nothing new under the sun. All we're doing is rearranging old ideas into more useful patterns. To that end, nothing in RP is "new" - but it does pull together useful ideas in a way that cannot be found anywhere else.

To clarify, if you're having trouble with your wife, you might find a marriage counselor who can explain how to develop an "amused mastery" (a common psychological concept by several different names) so that you don't get so worked up over small problems. But that counselor may not be familiar with developing an abundance mentality (another common psychological concept), although the counselor down the street might know about this one. Counselors are also pretty ignorant about things like personal hygiene, fitness, style, etc., so if you don't happen to bump into a life coach or personal trainer, you're not going to figure out how to do those things. Oh, and none of these people are going to understand the more intellectual backdroppings of socio-political movements, gynocentrism, covert matriarchies, etc., so you'd have to stumble across the right books to figure that stuff out.

In reality, there's even more useful information out there that RP hasn't yet discovered either - and some of what they've discovered is bogus. But that doesn't mean you throw the baby out with the bathwater. Take what's good and leave the rest. If being on RP was the only thing that motivated you to get to the gym in the past 5 years, the fact that someone else in the world might have been able to motivate you doesn't change the fact that in the absence of RP you may never have found that person or realized the importance of finding that person. So, "You can get all the good stuff somewhere else" isn't really helpful when "somewhere else" isn't knocking at your door saying, "Here I am! Now you know where to find me!"

To be clear, I'm in the same boat as you. I reject all the derogatory stuff against women. I reject ideas like "treat women like they're nothing more than sex toys" or "if she's not responding to you, just divorce her" and all that other garbage. I started a sub (r/RPChristians) specifically to invite the moralizing component into the conversation - to get the good stuff without the negative prescriptive aspects. MRP (r/marriedredpill) also has a much, much healthier view (although still has some serious problems).

For more information in the "RP" view of gender equality, This Thread was very, very interesting. It's not the "screw women, they're the scum of the earth" attitude that this sub would have you think RP believes. My guess is that most people on this sub are people who were on RP for a little while, saw a bunch of ignorant surface-level comments without getting into the meat of the material, and then decided to boycott it because they couldn't discern between the non-RP-hater-wannabes and the real deal. This sub would make more sense as "ex-MGTOW," where (from my limited understanding) women really are treated as scum of the earth.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

0 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

What you're describing is still spontaneous, though. The fact that a man gets hard when he sees cleavage but is flaccid when she's in a sweater doesn't make him a sexually responsive person, otherwise you'd be labeling pretty much everyone on the planet as "responsive" except a select few, which would render the whole classification system as pointless; or otherwise would just be defining things inconsistently with the alleged research behind it.

My understanding is that it's a scale. Nobody is 100% purely spontaneous or 100% purely responsive. The man who gets hard to the simple sight of cleavage is probably 98% spontaneous, 2% responsive. The woman who gets tingles before Chad even approaches her is 98% spontaneous, 2% responsive.

Maybe this is just my poor judgment, but a 'responsive' label should only apply when it takes some degree of sexual initiation before the person becomes aroused. So, if she's getting tingly before Chad makes his intentions for the evening clear, that leans more toward spontaneous desire - she wants it even before she knows it's coming.

I know the redpill advice, want to hear yours.

0 upvotes · 15 September 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

With minor caveats, this seems applicable: <http://adam4d.com/help-im-trapped/>

FR: 1 Year from the artist formally known as prarrott

0 upvotes · 10 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

1/2

I spin narratives for my job. OP's not getting divorced, so that's out. With my faith, I simply tell it like it is. To that end, /u/redeemedpr, r/RPChristians will be your friend in the upcoming future - but stick around here too. Regardless, here's what's happening from a biblical lens.

For context, so I don't have to go through the long proof, just assume husband/wife = Christ/church and that physical reproduction (i.e. sex) parallels spiritual reproduction (i.e. evangelism).

With that in mind, you've got a Hosea story (as most Christian men I know do). God has you married to someone whose behaviors are going to teach you what I bet you're doing to God. After all, you're part of the bride of Christ. If you don't like what your bride is doing to you, how do you think God feels when you do it to him? Especially since God isn't a big screw up like us!

conception of this child

Malachi 2:15 - And why did the Lord God make them one, commingling a portion of His Spirit in their union? To produce godly offspring. God's purpose in marriage is not just any kids, but raising godly kids.

I'm not sure why this aspect got so overlooked here, but you've got a new kid. This is clearly a driving force for her. Why? Because God put an innate biological drive in you and her to want to be with someone who will be effective at raising your kids. A repentant natural birth father is better than a half way decent step-father any day. Less psychological problems for the kids down the road. This influenced her - not just physically, emotionally, and mentally, but in her spirit.

one of the handful of times a year my wife and I would have sex

About as often as God's people attempt spiritual reproduction (i.e. evangelism)?

My wife seemed to despise me, she did not want to spend time with me, she did not respect me. She certainly didn't seem attracted to me. Common story here.

Common story for God's bride too.

I needed sex to fulfill me. To make me feel like a man.

Because God put that drive in you - not for the sake of sex itself, but as a path to lead you to the real conclusion: that your life should be revolving around evangelism. God doesn't need our spiritually reproductive efforts to be fulfilled any more than a good RP guy depends on his wife's vagina for his satisfaction in life. But there is a reason that for all of time most men have had a fairly one-track mind about sex. Our drive for physically reproductive acts is meant to highlight God's drive for spiritual reproduction through us. That's why you needed sex to fulfill you. Once you've got your mission (which should be discipleship), you will have arrived at the destination and can be truly OI about the road. You don't need the road once you've gotten where you're going.

As I swallowed the pill I began to generate, and be able to notice, interest from other women

You matured in a human way and generated tempting interest from other humans. Begin to mature in a spiritual way (read: become a threat to the enemy) and you'll generate temptation and seduction from evil spirits. You failed on the human side. So be it. Succeed where it counts. Now that you know the physical repercussions, don't let those become spiritual as well.

I began to pursue other women more intentionally

One of the main reasons God hates divorce and adultery is because men are meant to model with their wives how God interacts with his church. If we fail in this, we're sending a broken reflection of God's character to the world, compromising the impact of the Gospel in our lives. Just as cheating has a negative impact on your physical sex life, it's devastating to your spiritual sex life. Gotta love grace and forgiveness!

As Jerry Seinfeld says

Literally on my second monitor screen right now.

I was content to move on ... My wife began to change drastically

Like I said up front: God doesn't need us. If we refuse spiritual reproduction with him (read: bear good fruit, per Matthew 7), he moves on. Even when he sees people trying to impress him, if they don't really love him he says, "Screw off you evil scumbags" (also Matthew 7). It's interesting to me that Jesus passionately loves people and wants followers, but he's on the move and he's not going to compromise his path to suck up to people to get them to follow him.

I repented and returned to my faith

You hadn't repented yet. That didn't come until you fully confessed.

take that to my grave as my secret

It's often said: It only takes one sin to make a man imperfect. Imperfection is what separates us from God and dooms us to hell. If you tell God, "I'll give you 99.999% of my sin, but not this .001%" - you're still .001% imperfect, and therefore are not made perfect in Christ, and therefore are not saved. That's not to say you can't fail, but by reserving something to yourself and refusing to give it to Christ, that's a different story from, "I'm trying to give it to you, I just keep failing."

voice telling me without question to confess

1 John 1:9 - If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just and will forgive us of our sins and will purify us from all unrighteousness.

Information too late ...

0 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Not getting any isn't a problem right now and that's not what I asked about, although I get that guys here tend to just assume that's the question because it usually is. Either way, this should be clear from our conversation elsewhere here.

Mitch's Red Pill

0 upvotes · 29 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'm pretty sure I fully understand what he's saying and share his mindset on this. If I'm mistaken, let me know, but don't just assume because it reaffirms and validates your view of me. Despite whatever push-back I may give, I enjoy our conversations, but only to the degree they're helpful and actually cause me to re-evaluate myself. Unsubstantiated accusations that come off as assumptions to reaffirm your perceptions are not helpful. Not that you care for my respect (or even should), but that's where I start to lose some.

As for what /u/weakandsensitive is saying, this is an area where I think a proper biblical understanding really helps because this is a concept fully embraced about how God models relationships with us. He's God. He doesn't need us. That's theology 101. If every human on the planet rejected him and we all went to hell, he would not be devastated or ruined; he is internally self-contented. He only gives us comfort when we need it because it pleases him, not because he's worried he'll lose us. We have no power over him, not even over his mood (although many Christians mistakenly believe otherwise). This is something I've understood and modeled long before my RP days (albeit not as intentionally).

It's probably not the most "Christian" attitude to have, but I often maintain the mentality that I express positive virtues toward my wife because that's the kind of man I want to be, yet internally I think to myself: "I'd be totally fine, maybe even happier, if she walked away; I could do better." I desire a happy, successful marriage, but I also desire all the benefits that ending my marriage will bring, and I'm constantly living in the tension between the two - and I think that's a healthy tension to live in. So, my response is simply to be the kind of man I want to be (or more accurately: who God created me to be) and let the chips fall where they may. If it means my marriage remains, great. If it means my wife leaves me and I "upgrade," great. This is how I see Jesus approaching people - he's just going to be himself and if people want to respond, great. If they reject him or walk away, he's not pandering to them like a puppy scratching at the door when someone leaves.

In fact, when Jesus' followers were shouting his praises the religious people of the day tried to get Jesus to stop them. Jesus' response: "Even if they stop, the stones will cry out." In other words, God is worshiped because he deserves to be worshiped. Even if everyone rejected him, he'd just make the rocks sing his praises instead.

As for us, Romans 1 tells us that the more we walk away from God the more he "gives us over" to the things we left him for, essentially saying, "Fine, that's what you want? Go for it, see if I care. I'm going to keep doing my thing." To me, this parallels with, "You want to screw Chad? Go for it, you're not my problem anymore. I'm going to keep being awesome without you." - and mean it, not as a jab at her, but as a fact about you.

How do I get better at AA

0 upvotes · 28 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

I literally just wrote this comment that answers the question.

What I didn't say to /u/AustralianArm that more clearly applies to you: Your AA sucks because you don't believe it. I'm 99% confident that when you AA you play it off like a joke. It kind of works because she laughs at the joke and it lightens the mood, so you feel like you're doing it right. Obviously you're not seeing the results you've been reading about. Why? Because it's not a joke.

AA is a tactic within the amused mastery mentality. If my son does something bad and I give him the stink-eye, he might say, "Daddy, you're being mean!" I then tell him: "You're right I'm being mean [agree], and if you keep talking to me like that, you'll see just how mean I can get [amplify]." I'm not kidding when I say this. I have an amused mastery over my son because his misbehavior isn't actually ruining my day - I'm above that; but I communicate on his level so he can understand me. If I had to guess, you haven't risen above her testing within your own mind yet. That will come. Until it does, AA will be a lot harder to pull off.

With that in mind, with your wife, when you're ready to AA (and don't take the word "ready" lightly) this works better if you add playful innuendo. "You're right I'm being mean [agree]. Maybe it's because you need to be punished [amplify]." Now, if I say this as a joke, she's going to laugh, roll her eyes, flirt back, or ignore me and go on with whatever else she naturally would have said/done - probably a combination. If your actions after AA are dependent on how she responds, you've already lost. You have two primary actions:

- Follow through and have sex with her. If this is what you want and the opportunity exists, you have to follow through. Make it a genuine initiation. Show her you mean it. After you say something like that, you pin her to the wall and say, "Do I need to get the handcuffs or do you promise to be good?" Obviously don't commit spousal rape, but do show her that you're willing to follow-through. If she believes that, you're good, even if she ends up giving a hard no anyway.
- If you don't want sex, you've got to at least make her believe you would (or that you would if circumstances would permit). For example, if the kids are up, you start to initiate until she pulls away, then keep going a bit more until she's a bit uncomfortable, then you say, "You're lucky the kids are up right now or you'd be in big trouble." Same deal with "company's over" or "we have to go somewhere." After you do this, withdraw your presence. Remember, she's fitness testing you. If you want sex right then, great; if not, don't reward her garbage by re-engaging in the conversation afterward. Pull a tease-and-leave. If you can't control the conversation after an AA (or even before, for that matter), you've got bigger problems than learning how to AA.

Her need for external validation

0 upvotes · 21 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

I am wondering where this is explained in more detail, is it in the female psychology book that's recommended?

If you can get past some of the religious stuff, I write a lot about this validation-seeking behavior in women here. I call it The Comparison Game/Trap.

My conclusion is in the "Husbands: Don't Play the Game" section, et seq.

Does anyone really know what they want?

0 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/askTRP

If you mistakenly assume there is no God and reject Jesus/the bible/etc. then this is the sad reality. The best you can do is have as much fun as possible then die. Of course, if you're wrong, the result of that life will be terrifying :/

The Sandbox and the Swingset, Introducing MRPW

0 upvotes · 6 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Hard to find old posts on mobile. I dug it up nonetheless. This was written before I started talking to the other guys, but there wouldn't be too many other things they'd add. I don't pretend all of these will work for everyone - just the things that worked for me (and as I later discovered, for other guys as well).

It is certainly possible to bring out the alpha in him, but at some point he has to want it. Your job is to make him want it and give him an opportunity to practice. Here are a few tricks to try that worked when my wife (sometimes unintentionally) did them on me:

FIRST - Tell him bluntly. Also, explain that, physical characteristics aside, you aren't attracted to a man who defers to you all the time.

SECOND - Let things fall apart. He doesn't lead because he's grown comfortable with you doing it. Break that comfort. Escalate the discomfort if it doesn't work at first. Here are examples in escalating order:

- Stop cleaning/vacuuming/doing the dishes. Let them pile up until he asks you to do them. If he gets mean about it (releasing his harbored resentment - a classic beta trait), just say, "All you had to do was ask," and go do it with a smile.
 - Beta guys don't know the difference between being assertive and being a jerk. So, although it sounds counter-intuitive, you have to reward him when he's being assertive in any capacity, even if he's being a jerk too. When he learns that it's okay to be assertive around you, that's when you start helping him filter his jerk qualities out. His re-calibration will demand that he leave one extreme for the other extreme before he is able to find a balance. He is incapable of going directly to that happy balance.
- Stop doing the laundry. When he doesn't have clothes to wear to work, just say, "Oh, I didn't know it needed to be done," and toss him something from off the floor.
- Stop keeping the calendar. If friends want to hang out, forward the text message to him and make him answer it. Don't remind him when the day comes. If you miss it, then you miss it. Your friends may be upset, but you can always pass it off: "He was in charge of setting everything up."
- Toss the bills on his desk and if they don't get paid, let them go unpaid until he gets it done. Yes, you will lose some money by doing this, but consider that the cost of a much happier future together.

THIRD - Fuel his desire to be an initiator. Start with something you know he wants: a physical relationship. Wear something mildly provocative and doll yourself up a little bit more than normal, but act like you're wearing a nun's outfit. Don't get so dolled up that he thinks it's you passively initiating, though, because then he's just responding and not leading. The slight provocation will start spinning his wheels, but your non-initiation will force him to step up his game if he wants any actual action.

FOURTH - Don't start conversations. If he's not willing to initiate a conversation, let there be very, very, very long silences until he decides it's time to talk. My guess is he's used to you being the one to ask him questions and get the ball rolling. If he asks if there's a problem, just say, "No, I feel great today," and go about your business.

FIFTH - Do your own thing, not the default thing. Netflix and phone-scrolling are specifics, but the broader category is just chilling. He likes chilling with you. That's fine, but he has to lead you in that. So, get up and do other things around the house during the time you would normally watch Netflix. When he's all confused why you're not just automatically doing what he expects, he'll ask you, "Hey, are you coming down to watch?"

SIXTH - Flip conversations. If he asks you a question, put the onus back on him. For example, with that last question ("You coming down?") reply: "Do you want me to?" He asks: "What do you want for dinner?" You reply: "Thanks for asking. I'd rather you pick today."

SEVENTH - Master the art of fostering subtle curiosity. This is a very tricky concept to implement, but when a person becomes curious about something, it can consume them until they get answers. This, in itself, doesn't translate to leadership, but there are a great many alpha qualities that come out with this one-track-mind drive. If he's not typically a curious person, making him curious about things more frequently might get him practicing alpha traits without knowing it. For example, something as simple as turning off his facebook app to google the answer to a question (ex. "What else has that actor been in?") gives him a mini-goal and lets him practice immediately accomplishing that goal. Escalate this into bigger things down the road, like making him curious about why you wore that outfit in the third point, above, or why you put on lipstick just to hang around the house, when you almost never do that.

EIGHTH - If all else fails, as a last resort start commenting about situations at work, among friends, on TV, etc. where you see a guy take charge and how you respect that. This can really make beta guys insecure about the possibility that you're cheating, and RP guys are 100% going to tell him you're cheating when you make comments like that ... but sometimes a little reverse dread, highlighting the things you find attractive in a man, could do him a little good. [Since writing this post I've noticed my wife doing this more and more - pointing to clear alpha guys on TV, not saying anything about sexiness or attraction ... just that she's rooting for them even though everyone else thinks they're total jerks. It's subtle and context appropriate, but affirms in me the direction I've been taking our relationship, furthering my inspiration/motivation to be more alpha. If I were still beta-me this type of stuff would have kicked me in the but to think, "Clearly she's attracted to that - I better not let the clue go unnoticed."]

I hope this helps.

The Sandbox and the Swingset, Introducing MRPW

0 upvotes · 6 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I agree that a woman can't make a man alpha, and that too much effort in trying will cause her to lose attraction. Women who make "projects" of their men still see them as inferior, even if they make them superior. That's how basic ego functions.

That said, I do find that there are tactics a woman can employ that foster a higher likelihood that her man will develop alpha traits through probabilistic stage setting. My wife (unintentionally) employed many such tactics on me, which opened my eyes to the concept. I later revisited guys I'd known who had shifted from mostly beta to mostly alpha and asked what prompted the change, and of the 3 I asked, all of them explained things their wives did, in detail, that kick started the process.

They also agreed that their leadership is their responsibility, not hers ... but that she is not powerless in cultivating a leader. "STFU and get out of his way" can be part of that process, but there can be more active components as well. STFU is basically removing all the weeds and toxic substances you've been using from your garden. From there, a seed on the ground might grow from rain alone, but a diligent gardener will tend the soil, water it, and ensure proper lighting. The gardener can't force it to grow, but can cultivate the right conditions for growth to happen.

Wanted: Op-Sec Tips for MRPer out there getting numbers

0 upvotes · 25 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

Twice?

Married to a Beta Husband - How Can I Ask For More Leadership and RP Attitude?

0 upvotes · 20 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

The dangerous answer is that if he isn't comfortable taking control, be out of control so he has no choice but: (1) take control of you or (2) leave you. The problem is that he probably knows you well enough to know when you're acting out just to get him to do something. This will actively work against any RP directive he pursues because he's only doing it for the sake of fitting into the RP frame you want to create for him rather than him creating his own frame that you can rest in. It's a catch-22 for you.

Softer answers can be found in my post here

Rejecting appreciation ... weird concept, but it works for me.

0 upvotes · 17 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Agreed.

Rejecting appreciation ... weird concept, but it works for me.

0 upvotes · 17 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

and apparently you've missed 4 or 5 other opportunities

I should have noted that I did escalate most of the time. There was one where I didn't, but for good cause. I guess I still have latent tendencies about not bragging or "gentlemen don't kiss and tell," so I stopped with her reaction rather than continuing the story. I'll have to remember not to do that here. Thanks for the tip anyway.

How'd you guys beat the anger phase of trp, because I get these random feelings of anger randomly throughout the day

0 upvotes · 15 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

What causes the anger phase? I skipped this somehow and went straight to excited. What am I missing?

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

0 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I do not believe anything I have posted to date would fail your test. Being an attorney, I'm inherently skeptical of making an assertion (particularly a public one) that I cannot back up. The entirety of law centers around personal observation (hence rejecting hearsay, unauthenticated documents, etc.).

To be clear, this post is not to suggest that I've personally had successful sex stories with women who have these issues. But I do take the role of a scientist or observer, watching patterns and seeing what works and what doesn't. In the divorce itself I see very clearly what doesn't work and I often investigate why (because that often validates the findings of the psychological evaluation or is otherwise necessary to rebut it). But in virtually all of my cases, each party already as a new SO only a few months in, and I have the opportunity to chat with them about their bond and how/why they got together (this is relevant to discern stability ough homer environment for children or to see if the relationship will likely flake out).

Have you seen RESULTS from RP aware men

This is your best point. I do see proven results with fairly undeniable patterns of success v. failure. That said, I have never asked a client, "Do you follow red pill praxeology?" I could say this would violate rule 0 and bow out, but admittedly I haven't even known red pill terminology long enough to be so direct even if it were a good idea to ask. That said, I have been retroactively assessing (based on the information I now know) how aligned these men are with core RP concepts, whether they know it by red pill terms or not.

I hope that makes sense. I guess my position is that some data or parallel data is better than no data at all. So, where I have noticed RP had a blind spot, if I can use what I have personally observed to help fill in some gaps, even if it's not perfect, it's better than just "keep trying the same tactics even harder until it works," which is the mentality NMMNG condemns Nice Guys for using.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

0 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I usually see it in the PD context. It might simply be a severity line, like how schizotypal is a less severe schizophrenia(ish). I do know the DSM has categorized OCPD as a PD.

Marital Confidence Intervals and Probabilistic Stage Setting

0 upvotes · 8 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Very well said. I agree entirely.

That said, I'm not seeing the conflict with my perception of the "ditch and replace" attitude. If I get what you're saying, it can be summed up: guys can be emotional, we just can't let our emotions control us. In a marriage context, here are two possible scenarios:

ONE

- Guy 1's goal is to have a healthy sex life with his wife.
- He's not getting any, making him emotionally upset.
- He tries to fix it, but doesn't see improvement in a satisfactory time-frame.
- He leaves his wife to find someone else.

TWO

- Guy 2's goal is to have a healthy sex life with his wife.
- He's not getting any, making him emotionally upset.
- He tries to fix it, but doesn't see improvement in a satisfactory time-frame.
- He continues addressing the issue from different angles until he gets what he wants.

For guy 1, his emotional investment in the outcome of his efforts with his wife has led him to abandon his goal.

For guy 2, his emotional investment in the outcome of his efforts with his wife has not impacted his laser-sight gaze on that goal and he continues to pursue it.

The implication to me is that guy 1 lets his emotions control which goals he pursues, whereas guy 2 does not - he pursues the goals he wants to pursue independent of his emotional upset. Oneitis comes off as being an excuse to justify guy 1 giving up on the goal.

I'm sure I'm missing something here ... what is it?

Marital Confidence Intervals and Probabilistic Stage Setting

0 upvotes · 8 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I can respect that. What will help most is simply to say what you disagree with rather than complaining how noob I am. That's really it, in a nutshell.

As for fusing TRP and Christianity, I don't see why it can't work. TRP is not a supreme, ultimate concept that is all-or-nothing. I've seen it posted many times, "Don't accept things just because it's said here. Take what works and leaves the rest behind." When it comes to my faith, that's all I'm doing - my faith is the filter, and I have no problem taking everything that will slide through and leaving the rest behind. So far, I haven't found very much of the active advice here to need filtered out; it's predominantly the philosophical/theoretical context.

If RP really is the absolutely best possible sex strategy ever ... even if, say, 20% does get filtered out in the end, it just means Christians will run on 80% efficiency instead of 100%. My guess is that we have other advantages that non-Christians don't have, which I suspect can more than make up for that other 20%.

How to game rich girls?

0 upvotes · 6 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

I may get chastised here for this, but /u/firewaterdirt needs to go watch Notting Hill. I don't remember Hugh Grant's character well enough to recall if he should be a role model (probably not, since it's a chick flick), but the story is basically the same: super high-class girl gets into a blue collar worker; the quote the movie is famous for: "I'm just a girl standing in front of a guy asking him to love her." That's all she is - money, looks, fame and all that don't change the fact that girls are still girls and guys are still guys.

Really really fucked up. Shit test or comfort test?

0 upvotes · 26 June 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'm new to this whole thing, but my tactic has worked quite well for me. I just posted this elsewhere, but this is how I handle heated arguments with my wife now (not the menial day to day nit-picks):

- she's yelling about who knows what, trying to get a reaction out of me or just vent her frustrations ... doesn't matter
- hug her for about 15 seconds, counting it out if you have to; remain silent during this time, even if she tries to talk (let her, but don't respond); go longer if you have to
- lean your head back and brush her hair away from her cheek and put your hand on her cheek briefly
- lean in and kiss her cheek
- say, "I love you and appreciate that you are intensely passionate over this issue; but in this particular moment you are over-reacting and I'm not going to let it get to me."
- peck her on the forehead
- walk away with a smile
 - if she lets you go, the next time you see her in a calmer environment you HAVE TO re-raise the issue; this time it will be on your terms. Have an action-plan ready to go for how to solve the conflict, showing simultaneously that: (1) you care about her concerns; (2) you understand her perspective without validating the thought itself or how she handled the situation [don't underestimate the importance of this in any argument]; (3) you will take charge of the situation so she doesn't have to be the one to worry about it anymore; and (4) her over-reaction was not going to solve the problem. This is a perfect quadfecta (and if I really took the time to think about it, I could probably come up with 2-3 more benefits), but I feel like 99% of men miss the opportunity by forgetting to re-raise the issue on their own terms.

- if she follows you, still yelling and screaming: repeat all of the above until she doesn't know what to do. If that doesn't work or ...
- if she doesn't let you leave in the first place ("No! I'm not over-reacting. This is seriously an important issue. How can you not see that?!?" Proceeds to block the door.) ... fog. "I agree that this issue is important. You're right, we should be spending more attention on this issue. I actually have an idea for how we can address the issue," and then pull an action plan out of your butt, even if it's a crappy one. If she doesn't like it, let her make some adjustments. The point isn't to come up with the perfect solution; it's to show her how idiotic her over-reaction was when you could come up with a solution to the problem literally on the spot and you can all tweak the solution from there. This has the same benefits as the first option ("if she lets you go ...") except #1, as it usually comes off as you brushing the issue aside too quickly. Even so, she doesn't care because that negative is outweighed by the other benefits.

Is the wife's desire in Genesis 3:16 affectionate or antagonistic? Let's explore

-1 upvotes · 24 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Nice. I don't agree with all of his theology, but I do appreciate how well he articulates his thoughts and works through Scripture rather than his own musings, as most other commentators do. In this case he's spot on.

Mitch's Red Pill

-1 upvotes · 5 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This makes a lot of sense and is quite helpful.

moralizing ... advice initially was often to "talk."

Yeah, I definitely did that, been trying to tone it down. Also cut back on the main posts because, as you appropriately note, I still have a lot to learn.

you are missing an anger stage- which strongly suggests you have not changed your opinion about women and their motivations

I definitely missed that stage, but I think it's because I kind of went through it long before figuring out RP. My theology tells me that, at our core in our sinful nature, we're all extremely depraved. Couple that with the inherent sexuality of men and women that God imbued in us from even before the fall and logic alone can lead to the RP result.

For guys that's easy to visualize: rampant sex with whoever, whenever. For girls, it took me some time, but (with subtle clues my dad unintentionally fed me over the years) things like hypergamy, crabs in a bucket, AWALT, cheating, etc. became the expectation apart from Christ. I've also had my wife fess up to me a couple times early in our marriage that other guys were hitting on her and she liked those guys more than me - and that if it wasn't for her faith she would have cheated on me. So, that was figuring it out by being tested through fire.

But even then the anger was missing. By all rights, I should have been angry, but I was too beta at the time, setting my emotional conditions aside in an idiotic attempt to nurture my wife back to me. In short, most of the RP concepts about women were not new to me when I swallowed the pill - I only knew them by my own self-made terminology/explanations rather than the terminology I've learned here.

Interesting point to note, though: this might be why some other users (/u/88will88, for example) think I'm trying to stretch RP concepts beyond their RP definition. It's not that I've learned a concept from RP, didn't like it, then try to change it. Instead, I've probably taken some of my own discoveries, figured out what RP calls it, then started using the RP terminology while not realizing the subtle distinctions between the two. I tend to trust my experiences more than others, so it's hard for me to give up my perceptions of things - although I value the fact that if thousands of other men are seeing a more refined definition of a thing, I should respect that.

It probably helps to know that in my pre-Christian days (though I thought I was a Christian at the time) I was extremely Machiavellian. I would literally run experiments on people every day. Jocks, nerds, cheerleaders, tom boys, etc. You name it, I was trying to figure them out. I'd get in a conversation, then say things that are totally insane or unusual just to learn how people react. I would tell people lies to see how they'd respond - if they'd leave their boyfriend or decide to trust him over me. I refused to date anyone during this time, so it wasn't about getting girls. It was more just an effort to understand people, especially male-female social and relational dynamics. My overarching scheme was this: If I can figure out how people work, I can manipulate them to do anything.

It worked insanely well. From my freshman year of high school to my senior year, I went from the pudgy nerd that everyone picked on to getting the homecoming queen to ask me out to prom. By my first year of college I had come about as close to mastering the art of interpersonal manipulation as I imagine a person can get. Even with random strangers, after sizing them up in the first 30 seconds of a conversation, I could figure out how to make them laugh, cry, smile with glistening eyes of longing, or slap the guy sitting next to me because I didn't like him but had more fun masterminding someone else to torment him than just doing it myself (true story).

I still remember how to do most of this, but choose not to apply it (except in rare circumstances). Although the power itself wasn't problematic, the way I was applying it didn't mix with what God was doing in my heart at the time. To some degree, RP is re-awakening in small measure these aspects of my former self that I had buried for too long. I'm just applying them in a different context. But I'm also somewhat afraid of what I'll do if I go back to employing these things in full measure the way I used to.

Information too late ...

-1 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

It's not that I've intentionally withheld the information. Her mom's been over and I'd rather not have that conversation while she's around. The only reason I mentioned that line was to allay certain other anticipated responses.

My fiance has a dress code he wants me to follow.

-1 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

You mention church, so let me put a slight biblical spin on this. In 1 Cor. 11 Paul talks about women needing to wear head coverings. It's easy to brush this off as an antiquated passage that we should just ignore, but his rationale actually comes from Adam and Eve. In other words, Paul is saying, "This is because of how God designed men and women in the first place and has been true for thousands of years, and is something that transcends culture or eras of humanity." I've studied this so much that no one will ever convince me that this is a part of the Bible we can just ignore. So, the question is, then, how do we apply it?

The rationale Paul gives for why he insists on women wearing head coverings is that it is "a symbol of authority on her head." I don't think the "what" of the symbol matters as much as that there is one. This symbol is clearly tied with something to be worn - that is publicly visible and not something you keep in a box at home, although there's no clear requirement that other people have to understand its nature as a symbol other than those in the authoritarian relationship.

So, my wife often wears something that functions as a symbol of our leader-helper authority structure. She openly accepts this and embraces it. Most of the time, that's her ring. Other times it's me telling her what to wear on a particular day when we go out.

When biblical women were not in public, there was no requirement to wear a head covering or to show a symbol of authority. So, if he wants you to lounge around the house in a skirt and high heels, that's his own preference and you'll have to reconcile that with your views of him being the leader of your relationship - especially when he is your husband.

But when you go out together (possibly even without him, I haven't thought about that aspect of application of this passage), then there is certainly a Scriptural basis for you expressing his authority by what you wear. Now, you could argue that it should be this or that - like your engagement ring or wedding ring. But if he tells you what he wants that symbol of authority to be and you reject that authority to decide what your own symbol of authority will be ... what value is there in wearing a symbol of an authority that you don't submit to?

To be fair, this is also a passage I don't necessarily think about 24/7, so most of the time I'm not paying attention to whether or not my wife has her ring on, or I'm not telling her what to wear or anything like that. I'm not sure if this is a form of sin by neglect and I really should be stepping up and insisting on more adherence to 1 Cor. 11 or not - I just know that when I do express that it matters to me, it would be inappropriate for her to reject that authority. If he makes an overbearing requirement, my guess is that his request isn't following biblical principles anymore than your rejection of his request would be a rejection of biblical principles ... not that his wrong makes your wrong somehow acceptable.

Engaged or not, if he's that controlling, you're in for a wild ride. Get out before your submissiveness becomes a biblical/sin issue, particularly if he's going to abuse that obligation to funnel into a controlling nature on his part.

The Sandbox and the Swingset, Introducing MRPW

-1 upvotes · 6 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You're right: if someone is an idiot and does all of this at once overnight it'll probably lead to divorce, just like practicing male RP tactics in Rambo mode will lead to divorce. My wife did these things over a span of years.

Biblical submission involves (1) following someone else's lead (2) even in the face of disagreement. If she's only willing to follow his lead when she agrees, it's not submission. More to the point, if a man isn't leading, nothing the wife does can rationally be called submission. It might be humility, being a servant, being responsible, or any number of other positive traits, but it's not submission.

So, if a man does not lead, a wife cannot exercise biblical submission. To get there, I don't see a problem with a woman doing things to foster an imperative in him to lead - as long as (per one of my other comments) she maintains a positive attitude in how she implements these things.

Where is attraction? From my observation, attraction is not only from (1) seeing somethings who is capable of fulfilling their role in the relationship, but also (2) seeing someone who will let you fulfill your role in the relationship. Most men will not find a woman attractive who is bulging with muscles or is entirely independent, having no need for him. The things I have suggested, for the most part, are ways that she can show she actually needs or desires his presence in her life. If done with positive attitude, it can make a man feel fulfilled in the relationship and become more attracted to her, as opposed to relationships where the wife just romps around doing everything herself and shoving the husband into a corner in the basement to love out his days.

What percent of men are Alpha?

-1 upvotes · 27 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

These are about the percentages I had in mind. If a guy's going to "get it," it's most likely going to happen in his 30s. I assume this is because his SMV keeps going up until around 35-40, whereas women's goes down during that same age-range. So, he starts becoming superior to his female contemporaries on the SMP, which gives him unusual confidence.

Also, most divorces happen when people are in their 30s. So, the beer belly the guy had tends to go away at that time and he's re-learning how to game women for that next girl. Women post-divorce make an effort to fix themselves up too, but post-wall, they're fighting a much more uphill battle than he is.

What if you are just ugly?

-1 upvotes · 21 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

Find Jesus, become a pastor! No matter how ugly, an overwhelming majority of pastors seem to have one of the hottest girls in church as their wife.

Seriously, though: this is a horrible reason to "find Jesus" ... but there's truth in my jest.

The number one reason for leaving red pill

-3 upvotes · 6 September 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

What behavior are you referencing?

TRP isn't all bad, but hurt and/or hateful men take it too far

-3 upvotes · 13 August 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

To quote /u/imathrowyaaway:

you are essentially doing exactly what extreme-TRP is doing. generalizing a whole group, disregarding any valid issues those people have faced, advocating poor treatment of them regardless of what they actually did, just because they follow [_____]

TRP isn't all bad, but hurt and/or hateful men take it too far

-3 upvotes · 13 August 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

The core of the problem is disrespect for women as lesser beings.

Again, you're only referencing r/theredpill and you're making claims without a basis. At r/RPChristians we believe that women were also created in God's image and hold equal value as men. The fact that God assigned different roles does not mean one is a "lesser being."

As for MRP, you're right in that many people there do still maintain that type of attitude.

Marital Confidence Intervals and Probabilistic Stage Setting

-4 upvotes · 8 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You're right, I do still have a lot to learn. That said, looking back over the past couple years, especially in the last 6 months, I see that I am much further than I initially thought, and certainly than you'd like to give me credit for. Whereas many men may have to travel 1,000 miles from Disney Land to climb to the summit of Pike's Peak, I found myself already at the foot of the mountain - I just needed to start climbing. Instead of results (vertical ascent up the mountain) taking a year to manifest (because of the lateral journey to get to the mountain in the first place), they took a week - and I'm still climbing.

You're right, most alphas don't like "taking lessons from noobs." There are many ways in which I'm still noob-ish, and I'll keep climbing. As /u/man_in_the_world pointed out, my use of RP terminology is probably off. Although most of the concepts are not new to me, I'm used to a different set of terminology from before I discovered RP, and the concepts might not be an exactly perfect match. That said, I'm limiting my posts to areas where I have had personal experience and success, which laid the foundation for immediate results as soon as I discovered a few RP concepts that finally started building on the foundation I had built before coming here (ergo being at the foot of the mountain and starting to climb rather than still on the road from Disney Land). If I'd known how close I was, I probably wouldn't have been so whiny in my posts a couple weeks ago. In the meantime, I will try to discuss things more conceptually rather than using foreign terms until I'm sure my use of them is consistent with their application here.

In the meantime, I'll ask that you stop stalking my posts trying to discredit me. You come off as the ticked off ex throwing a hissy fit in public to the new girlfriend, "It's not fair! He's not supposed to be good in bed! He was just a crappy virgin who didn't know how to please a woman a couple weeks ago!" Presenting yourself this way makes it harder for me to take your accusations seriously and to learn from them. If what I'm saying is something people find helpful and beneficial, accept that and move on. If I say something wrong, correct me and I'll change it. It's that simple. There's no need for whining about how noob you think I am.

EDIT: Also, I expect some conflict between us, and that's okay. Looking through your conflict history, it's clear that we have different goals for being in MRP. I'm okay with that.

Tag: /u/GargantuaBlarg29 - since you joined the conversation

TRP isn't all bad, but hurt and/or hateful men take it too far

-5 upvotes · 12 August 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

A lot of the info ... is based on facts and useful in the right context ... but if taken to the extreme ... it makes men become comical caricatures

This is why I started r/RPChristians - basically sift out all the garbage, like plating, objectification, divorce/cheating, etc., while retaining the things that are actually of value.

As far as the alpha caricature thing goes, my guess is you probably haven't been to MRP (r/marriedredpill) or spent much time there. Where TRP only focuses on the physical aspects of male-female interactions, MRP adds the emotional, acknowledging the need to balance both alpha and beta traits.

As one regular noted: Tingles without fuzzies won't last, fuzzies without tingles are worthless. To put it another way: if you don't have a balance of beta in your character, you're never going to be able to keep a stable relationship.

To the point /u/raziphel made about seeing women as objects, it's important to remember that red pill praxeology is, at its core, merely a descriptive set of facts - observations that have been generalized after repetition has proved them reliable.

That said, most people don't want to understand how the world works - they want to use that understanding to take advantage of the system. This is natural and we all do it. If my computer isn't working, I'm not going to read a book about how computers function just for the fun of it - I'm going to read it to try to figure out how to fix my computer. If someone's marriage or relationship patterns are broken, they're not going to read books about fixing relationships just for the fun of it - they're doing it to fix a problem in their lives.

The problem with TRP is that it's mostly people who don't want to read the book or understand how it works - they just want to skip straight to the answers. It's like going on a "fix your computer" forum and asking how to fix your computer, they ask you what kind of motherboard you have, but instead of answering the question you insult them and insist that they give real answers on how to fix your computer. It skips the descriptive aspects and goes straight to the prescriptions. But if you take the wrong prescription for your problem, it's really damaging, which is why you need to understand your issues and symptoms before engaging. That's the real problem with TRP.

MRP is much better at sticking to the core descriptive understandings of RP praxeology, but still has some problems with pushing prescriptive measures out of alignment, like telling people, "Just divorce her, she's crazy" without actually trying to figure out why she's crazy and trying to address the problem. They'll simply answer, "That's too much effort. Stop your oneitis and go find someone else."

Over at r/RPChristians, the goal is to figure out what's at the core of a problem and give uniquely targeted solutions based on what we know about how the world functions (most of which we believe, of course, can be sourced in the Bible and isn't anything new RP discovered - after all, God created the human nature that RP is attempting to figure out, right?).

Rejecting appreciation ... weird concept, but it works for me.

-6 upvotes · 17 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

... oh good, another comment that attacks the age of my account rather than actually discussing the merits of anything I've said. I bet your wife finds it really sexy when she sees you picking all the low hanging fruit and rationalizing why it doesn't make sense to try for the better apples up top.

Using power/muscle during sex

-7 upvotes · 18 January 2019 · /r/askMRP

Is there a reason you need to feel macho and strong while having sex? Are you trying to impress your queen and judge with your muscles?

Preempting the DV charge.

-8 upvotes · 16 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Everything can be abused for the wrong purposes.

Preempting the DV charge.

-11 upvotes · 16 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Note the intro about when actually to apply some of this stuff. Some guys know when it's coming and it's wise to be prepared. If you're at low risk, ignore doing any of this.

Preempting the DV charge.

-12 upvotes · 16 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'm an attorney. I assure you, they are very real and literally happen every single day - in my city alone. I've known 2 policemen who have quit the force, in part because they couldn't stand the number of fake DV calls and the fact that their employers obligated them to support the charge, despite the evidence to the contrary.

The number one reason for leaving red pill

-12 upvotes · 5 September 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

Both you and "the red pill" make the mistake of assuming people have one nature. Christianity offers an alternative: dual natures. We were created by God to be one way (perfect, good, righteous, holy, whatever you want to call it), but because of sin we live another way (evil, depraved, selfish, etc.).

The Red Pill has figured out how the sinful nature works without acknowledging that there is something good and pure that God intended for us - including women - to live in. The solution you seem to be proposing is the opposite: to assume that women aren't any of these things. That's equally fallacious.

The more appropriate response is to realize that people have certain tendencies, but also have a modicum of free will to balance their sinful desires with the general redemptive grace that God gives to all people, which is meant to lead them to Jesus, who is the epitome model of living the redeemed life.

With Jesus alongside us, women can be more than the red pill would accuse them of being. But that doesn't mean those tendencies go away. In Romans 7:25, Paul notes, "I myself in my mind am a slave to God's law, but in my sinful nature a slave to the law of sin."

So, there's nothing wrong with suggesting that all women have certain tendencies. The Bible as much as says so. The Bible also makes such claims about men. The fallacy is in assuming that these tendencies are the only basis for operative thought processes, or otherwise in assuming that those tendencies don't play a role at all.

Of course, none of this makes sense if you don't buy into the Bible as a source for truth.

Preempting the DV charge.

-29 upvotes · 18 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Read the second introductory bullet point.

Where Are We Truly Investing: Earthly Things or the Kingdom?

score hidden · 2 March 2026 · /r/RPChristians

I don't see the dichotomy, unless we treat "investing in the Kingdom" as synonymous with "your own spiritual growth." Under this (inaccurate) definition, sure, you have to choose between "character, obedience, prayer life, and love for others" and "lifting, charisma, confidence-building, family-leading, career development, etc." because one would be drawing a line between what advances spiritual development v other forms of development.

In reality, "investing in the Kingdom" is about seeing it grow by spreading the Gospel to everyone around us, and discipling them into maturity so the Kingdom maintains the quality of people God desires. In this framework, we don't divide between tasks because each task is a different angle of pursuing the same goal.

- Prayer (i.e. talking to God) helps us communicate with Him and appeals for His help in the work He gave us, whereas charisma (i.e. talking to people) helps us draw those people to the Kingdom.

- Bible-reading helps us learn God's purposes, strategies, and principles for living out His purposes, whereas sidebar-reading helps us learn how to become more influential/persuasive to the people we're meant to be reaching as part of God's purpose.

- Developing spiritual character is good for making sure we don't stray from the mission; developing charm, confidence, and other "RP character" traits are good for helping us connect with people in ways that fulfill the mission.

- In the "love your neighbor as yourself" line, "loving others" feels like the spiritual, godly part because it is the reason why we bring the Gospel to them in the first place; the "as yourself" part is equally biblical as the degree to which you take care of yourself directly affects the degree to which you are capable of loving others, or for which they're willing to receive love from you.

For example, imagine some scrawny, pimple-faced geek who nerds out on mastering Tolkein's elvish language and has never talked to a girl in his life, other than his mom - although he prays and reads his Bible a lot. He decides to do something for God's Kingdom, so he goes out to the mall and tries to talk to strangers about how important it is to love Jesus. Sure, God can work miracles and use Him, but his pragmatic life choices have postured him to be entirely ineffective at accomplishing his goal. Most people will write off what he has to say - and when he fails at winning anyone's attention, he'll probably assume: "They rejected the Gospel message I was bringing" instead of the more accurate: "They rejected an ugly, socially awkward, socially inept nerd."

Again, I know God can work miracles. He can use a donkey to share His truth if He wants, or cause the rocks to cry out His praises. But the reality is that He chooses to work through us, and He has chosen not to do so through miraculous means for the vast majority of the fulfillment of His purposes for the building of His Kingdom. So, insofar as there are any hinderances, if anything will hold people back from accepting the message, let it be the message itself and not the messenger who gets in the way. Be the type of person you know others would want to hear from - and then if they turn you down, you'll know it was because of their disbelief in the Gospel that they walked away from Christ, not their disdain for the person sharing it that caused them to walk away.

In the meantime, never stop sharing, even before you're a prime messenger - because even if some do believe, you'll know it was by God's power through your weakness; not as an excuse to continue being weak, but as praise to God that He could use you even while you were still growing.

Welcome Disciples!

score hidden · 29 July 2022 · /r/RPChristians

I appreciate what you're doing, but promoting other subs isn't allowed here - especially brand new ones with no history to show if they're actually reliable or not.

Top tier

score hidden · 14 June 2022 · /r/RPChristians

This got to stay up for a day, but I'm taking it down for being low quality.

That said: welcome! Best way to get to know many of us is through the discord. Post an introduction to get access to the full thing.

Why is marriage special if there is no ONE soulmate?

score hidden · 10 May 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Read this post:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/cnoykj/understanding_why_sexual_sins_are_sin/

And this one:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/85wf8w/is_sex_outside_of_marriage_a_sin_an_official/

The second one is on our sidebar. The other is also highly relevant. As another user said, do read the sidebar before posting basic questions like this.

Hello

score hidden · 16 March 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Hello to you too. We don't normally let posts like this stay up, but I'd highly encourage you to join the discord and start conversation there.

Read the Sidebar

score hidden · 23 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

I'll endorse it. This is now an announcement post.

I took a dose of finasteride to see how the body would respond. The drug has irreversibly emasculated my brain.

score hidden · 23 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

I'm taking this down. Not enough substance here. Feel free to repost on /r/askRPC.

Need Help with Recurring Dreams

score hidden · 8 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

I'll leave the askRPC post up and remove this one.

In defense of the top moderator of Christian Marriage (who wrote a long essay earlier today rebuking this subreddit)

score hidden · 7 August 2021 · /r/askRPC

I wanted to politely advise the members of this subreddit not to brigade his subreddit

Let me be clear about this: we do not permit brigading. If anyone is instigating brigading, let the mods know and we'll put a stop to it.

MedianNerd is a good Christian who simply doesn't view the world through a red-pill lens.

That statement should also be true for every godly person on RPC also.

He's kind, caring, polite, and friendly as long as you reach out to him in good faith.

So is the devil, when it suits him. Be cautious with the metric you use to define the "goodness" of a person. Jesus tells us to look to a person's fruit, not how nice of a person they are. Kindness, caring, politeness, etc. can be faked quite easily. I say this with no judgment on u/MedianNerd - I've never talked to him or (I think) participated on his subreddit. It's more of a general caution.

That said, as others have noted: yes, he put up a lot of misinformation without giving us an opportunity to weigh in before defaming us. Oh well. It's his space and he can do what he wants with it. There's no reason to get in a tizzy about this. I'd rather quell any drama rather than stir it up, so I'm removing this post and leaving it up to MN if he wants to have an honest conversation at any point.

How to survive 'no sex before marriage' when your Love language is physical touch.

score hidden · 22 July 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Per this post, which is still an announcement on our main page, I have to remove this post and redirect you to /r/RPCWomen.

That said, I agree with what /u/HughBeaumont500 said. Love languages aren't in the Bible. They're a human classification system and not something ingrained in us by God. They are just a classification system based on generic preferences. It's like Myers-Briggs typology. It would be ridiculous to say, "I'm a P, not a J, but my boss wants me to be on time to work. What should I do?" The answer is: you be on time. You are not a slave to the labels people create to categorize you.

Also, LOTS of people claim that "physical touch" is their love language. The author of the book who man-made invented that categorization system even notes that physical touch doesn't mean "I feel loved when you have sex with me." My oldest daughter, for example, receives love through physical touch more than anything else. Does that mean I should start having sex with my daughter? Obviously not - nor would that actually make her feel loved. Because physical touch isn't about sex. It's about hugging, cuddling, holding hands, rubbing her head when we're watching a show together, or just putting my arm around her.

The reality is that most people who claim that "physical touch" is their "love language" really mean more generically, "I just want to have sex," which isn't a love language at all. It's a basic biological impulse. "This makes me aroused" and "this makes me feel loved" are not the same. Learn to distinguish between those two and you'll be fine.

My Current Status in this Scene

score hidden · 18 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Glad to see you back. With the number of bloopers and mental masturbators who have flooded into this place since the COVID boom, it's good to see someone around who knows their stuff and at least has the capacity to add value to the conversations here - something I really need to get back to, as I've spent too much time on the discord and neglected this sub lately.

I no longer run anything concerning these groups but I do have men in my life that I have my own independent group with ... I just enjoy mentoring and seeing others succeed.

Right. This is what we call discipleship. And what you're doing reminds me of a conversation that /u/r_horizon shared with me that one of my "heroes" - Dawson Trotman - had with a guy he was discipling. Dawson asked the guy what his long-term plans were for his life. The guy answered:

- Billy: Gee, Daws, I think I want to be a pastor. There's such a need for good pastors these days.
- Daws: Say, that's a great idea Billy. I bet you'd be a fine pastor.
- Billy: Me too. Thanks for the encouragement.
- Daws: Any time. But you know, Billy - I have a thought. What if you discipled a guy to become a pastor. Then you'd have a pastor to do your pastoring for you and you could still do whatever you want.
- Billy: Hey, that's not a bad idea! I suppose if I could do something else, there's really a need for missionaries in China. I could go do that!
- Daws: Wow. What a great idea, Billy. But what if you discipled a guy and sent him to China? Then you'd have a pastor here and a missionary there and you could do whatever you want. What would you do then?
- Billy: I suppose I might start up a soup kitchen or serve the homeless in some way.
- Daws: Now I bet you can guess what I'll say is the best way you can multiply your efforts to reach the homeless, right? And not only the homeless, but the people who need pastors and the countries that need missionaries, or whatever else the Kingdom might need.

Too many people are content to be a single cog in the machine. Yeah, those cogs are necessary. But there is no lack of cogs. There is a much greater lack in mechanics who know how to put the cogs where they need to go. Even greater is the number of people who don't realize that our miraculous God can turn a metal cog into a human mechanic.

My memory verse for the week: "For though by this time you ought to be teachers, you need someone to teach you again the basic principles of the oracles of God. You need milk, not solid food" (Hebrews 5:12). Everyone is meant to be moving forward from cog to teacher.

Yeah, there are some on this thread who will expect you to earn that role with current involvement rather than relying on past rapport - and you can even count me among them. But if I remember you well enough and your "re-joining" the manosphere brings with it consistency of involvement, I don't expect you'll fail to do just that.

Question for wives

score hidden · 23 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

First off: Why are you asking women? Watch what they do, not what they say, brother.

Second: There's an r/RPCWomen sub for a reason. This type of question belongs there.

Would you wear a mask in church?

score hidden · 15 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

This is way too off-topic. Removed.

Christian Marriage is not a good sub for young men looking for direction

score hidden · 13 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I just removed this post and you're going to re-post it? If it doesn't add value to our community, it doesn't belong here. Just because you're butthurt about what a mod on another sub did doesn't mean this is the place to whine about it.

Christian marriage sub is banning those who don't want their wives to hang out with the opposite sex

score hidden · 13 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, some subs suck. This isn't the place to complain about them unless you have an analysis that actually adds value to this community. Removed.

NoFap Accountability Telegram Group

score hidden · 22 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Rule 4.

Getting your wife back after a separation

score hidden · 12 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

MOD NOTE: This post does NOT represent the position of this sub. I'll write up a reply separately, but at least wanted to sticky this much. My actual analysis is, of course, subject to peer review.

Women are snakes

score hidden · 11 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with the others. I normally enjoy our conversations on discord, but this particular post doesn't resonate with me and seems more likely to produce weeds than fruit. Even if you're right about much of this (I don't know enough about snakes to confirm), it's not something that most people will be able to learn from.

Day 2- working from home

score hidden · 24 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This post isn't substantive for the main sub. This looks like it should be one part of an OYS comment. Also, your method for dealing with temptation is purely human effort. Galatians 3:3 - "Are you so foolish? Having begun by the Spirit, are you now being perfected by the flesh?" Or in the NIV: "human effort."

You didn't list spiritual reproduction as one of your strategies for conquering PMO, so you're doomed to fail. Good luck. In the meantime, if you want to share this, do it in a broader OYS comment.

Where should I get started with sidebar readings?

score hidden · 15 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Yet another question that really should have been on r/askRPC. Thread locked. I'm going to keep locking/removing these until people get it. Just leaving a few up so others can see that these low-quality questions don't belong on the main sub. We started r/askRPC for a reason.

Book recommendations for my single brother

score hidden · 15 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This really belongs on r/askRPC. It's already gotten a good number of replies and attention, so I'll let it stay up, but bear in mind that we have the other sub for a reason. Yeah, there are fewer total subscribers - but the active users here are over there also, so you're still getting the same quality of replies - you just bypass all the lurkers and bleeps who concern troll around here.

surrendering pride

score hidden · 15 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm locking this for a few reasons. First, I'm not sure how it connects to the purpose of our sub. There are lots of other forums to comment on general concepts of Christianity. This particular forum is meant to be more targeted to issues affecting relationships, sexuality, masculinity, and mission. Yes, "pride" as a general concept can tangentially relate to these categories, but you made zero effort to connect them, so I'm not sure why this post belongs here as opposed to somewhere else. Feel free to tweak and I may change my mind on this bit.

Second, and more significantly, you present nothing helpful here. Your entire post can be summarized in 3 words: "Pride is bad," mmkay? The "advice" you give is so vague as to have no practical utility. "Release things to God and trust Him" - what does that even mean. HOW does someone release something to God? HOW does someone trust him? These are very churchy-sounding words because they have a feel-good sentiment, but at the end of the day pastors primarily love using them because they're not challenging anyone to do anything different. It's so vague that people can FEEL like they're heeding the message even without changing their lives, simply because they feel different every now and then when they are reminded of the cool catch-phrases they heard on a Sunday morning. Let's be better than that.

If you want to write an exposition on how to conquer pride, and include why conquering pride is relevant to matters of sexuality, masculinity, relationships, etc. - I'm all for that. But let's step up the bar in the quality of content you're trying to post here.

Reviving the Lost Pursuit of Christian Manliness

score hidden · 10 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I haven't yet seen anything of unique value on that sub which isn't already addressed here. Significantly raise the quality bar and maybe we'll let you refer there in the future.

This is a good and easy way to share the Gospel! It's basically Ray Comfort in your pocket!

score hidden · 30 November 2020 · /r/RPChristians

No link posts.

Getting back into lifting.

score hidden · 25 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is for r/askRPC.

The impact of being Christian while dating.

score hidden · 24 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is a post for r/askRPC. The main sub is for more substantive posts.

why does it seem many former protestants convert to eastern orthodox rather than catholicism if both orthodoxy and catholicism are technically part of the same church from Jesus?

score hidden · 24 September 2020 · /r/RPChristians

You had it up for a while, but I'm removing this because the question really has very little to do with our sub. It's more for r/askRPC.

Post-Divorce Reports

score hidden · 21 September 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Let's be clear: RPC does not endorse casual divorce, especially for the purpose of "trading in for a much better wife." Your post is conspicuously absent of any biblical context.

That said, while the post inappropriately encourages men toward divorce, we'll leave it up for now on the expectation that maybe a few men in the process of divorce or who have recently been through divorce can be encouraged.

Another cuationary:

being less than two years after divorce and remarried

This tells me you're still in the honeymoon phase, so I'm extremely skeptical of the permanency of the results you're seeing. I'd prefer to see you write this post after you've got 10 years with the new woman under your belt. Yes, some men can and will - and I hope you're one of them. But for a newlywed, I wouldn't be surprised if you could also end up in the other larger camp of men who find that their second marriage is a re-hash of their first.

Put another way, you're not far enough in yet to be able to say authoritatively that your choice was a wise one, at least in the classic sense. Biblically, depending on your circumstances and theology, it's almost certainly a sinful choice. Though perhaps there's room for the choice to be redeemed.

Desire, Love and Intimacy: Red Pill Christian Podcast - Ep. 12

score hidden · 20 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

FYI - It got too complicated for /u/r_horizon to be the one to edit everything, then me to make these posts, so I delegated to him. When he posts them, it's still official.

Nowhere else to turn: Husband seeming to have trouble accepting a baby girl and I don't know what to do/how to support him

score hidden · 18 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

FYI - while this is also an appropriate place for this question, I'd also recommend posting on r/RPCWomen.

Official RPC Discord

score hidden · 15 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

When you join, do note Rule 1: THOU SHALT USE YOUR REDDIT USERNAME.

Do you have any concerns about how it seems like this view errs on the side of control of your wife over her personal growth and freedom?

score hidden · 15 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Mod Note: This post obviously does not reflect the views of this sub. OP admitted to being a troll on this sub, so he naturally got banned. That said, I'm leaving the post up anyway. I think there's enough value in the comments - especially from /u/Deep_Strength and /u/RedPillWonder - and I'm sad that /u/Praexology's comment didn't get much reply, because that would have led to some fruitful discussion too. Well done boys - and I mean everyone here, not just the guys I named.

I'm waiting on God to tell me who my wife is.

score hidden · 13 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

You get one. This is your one. Best for /r/askRPC for anyone else reading this. Expressing anger is fine, but the way you've acted in the comments (which I've removed) is completely out of line.

Your frame sucks. Fix it. That's got to be high on your priority list while you're here.

Also: stats? That's another rule. Yeah, you're not technically asking for advice - but your post is implicitly calling for it. It's relevant to the responses you'll get. Put them up.

The Southern Baptist Convention is going SJW. You read that correctly.

score hidden · 12 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Removed. This is a link post without adequate explanation. Please refer to Rule 8 and my comment linked there. u/Aaaquad also did a post on the subject, showing what a good link post looks like over here.

A picture of a relationally solid church community

score hidden · 11 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

MOD NOTE: We, as a sub, do not endorse the content written here. I have written more about this in my underlying comment. While the post is being left up for the interesting discussion it can generate, what this congregational structure is doing is neither red pill nor biblical, as far as I can tell based solely on OP's representations. I do believe this congregation's intentions are noble, but still ultimately misguided.

Update: Looking for guidance

score hidden · 6 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm sorry to hear about your situation. I've been there. But here's something I do want to comment on:

I think basically any relationship issue can be rectified through prayer, communication, and possibly therapy

Yikes. I mean, I might agree in the sense that you said "can" and I agree that it's theoretically possible.

But the reality is that if you take 1,000 couples with serious relational problems and told them: Use prayer, communication, and therapy as your primary strategies for fixing the problems, I'd wager 990 of them are going to pretend to feel better for a time, but end up in a cyclical pattern of relapsing and never finding permanency in their solutions.

Yes, some people will anecdotally find good results from these. But they are not consistently reliable strategies. It's like the guy who says that having an accountability partner is the best way to kick a porn problem. Out of several hundreds of people who try it, maybe 3-4 will actually find permanency in the cure from that method.

I want to be clear: I'm not knocking prayer. Prayer has value, but its purpose is not to fix our problems. God gave us other tools and resources. Prayer exists to give us a forum for expressing ourselves to God. It is not a "give me what I want" session - and those who treat it this way always find (as referenced above) extremely inconsistent results, often self-fulfilling to the degree that even if they get what they want, it's because they made it happen, not because they prayed for it to happen. This is a misuse and misunderstanding of biblical prayer.

For reference: "communication" sounds like a nice word, and it can be helpful, but usually not with the communication strategies that are taught to young married couples.

Likewise, "therapy" is often so doggone blue pill that it's actually likely to make relationship problems WORSE, not better.

Just some things to think about.

Who should you listen to on RPChristians?

score hidden · 4 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

If I'm not mistaken, this is a copy/paste of the last time you wrote a similar post. As such, some of the endorsements need to be updated, but I get the point. That said, as a note of explanation:

flair is almost always with black letters on a green background ... In some cases, it may be a blue background.

Green represents married men; blue for singles; pink for women.

Almost every single response is blue pilld af. What should we do as Christians to make the baseline of Christian social views more properly in line with the Bible so this doesn't happen?

score hidden · 4 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm removing this. I didn't, at first, realize it was a direct link to the other sub. It's not even an np link, thus could instigate brigading and get us in trouble with the Reddit admins. /u/RedPillWonder just wrote up a post on how to deal with this going forward.

Blocking Porn

score hidden · 27 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Who are you discipling right now?

For when you stumble

score hidden · 27 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm removing this because it doesn't seem substantially related to the purpose of the sub. This would be better posted on r/askRPC, where shorter, lower-effort content is permitted.

Divorce and Biblical Dread Game

score hidden · 24 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm removing this until you remove the links. We generally don't permit link posts unless it's within reddit or to a clearly established source. Take those down and the post will go back up.

Also, I appreciate your zeal here. You have a lot of good things to say. If you could tone down the bitterness you might actually gain some influence for your cause ... otherwise people will object to you - not necessarily on the basis of your content, but on your exaggerated communication style that makes you seem non-credible.

How to raise a man - Fr Ripperger

score hidden · 13 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

These types of posts require a description of the content before I'll allow it. This means at least an outline of his major points, not just a short blurb about the general topic.

Thanks!

Reformed? Or Arminian?

score hidden · 2 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

reformed or Arminian?

Compatibilist. Imagine being a two dimensional being looking at this three dimensional object. One person looking from the bottom would swear it's a square. Another looking at it from the side would think the first guy is crazy because it's obviously a triangle. The two appear completely incompatible, right? Yet those of us existing in 3 dimensions see how plainly simple the shape is.

Complementarian or egalitarian in marriage doctrine?

I say this as a mod and founder of this subreddit: EGALITARIANISM IS NOT WELCOME HERE AND IS NOT BIBLICAL.

...if you are egalitarian in doctrine id love to hear more from you!

For what purpose? Because you are an egalitarian and want more support for your unbiblical view? Or because you are opposed to egalitarianism and are curious to understand why anyone would believe such an unbiblical view?

What is this subreddit

score hidden · 1 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm removing this, as the answer is on the sidebar:

Welcome to Red Pill Christians

We are a subreddit that exists to provide a place for Christians to discuss problems, solutions and insights on relationships, sex, and biblical masculinity according to biblical principles.

How do I start serving in church?

score hidden · 29 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I get frustrated with the framework most people operate in when discussing things like this. There's a fundamental difference between "serving in the church" and "serving the Church." It's subtle, but do you notice it?

The Church = God's Kingdom, not these pockets of communities that amass in a particular building. Serving the people who congregate in your building is not the same as serving the interests of God's Kingdom. Yes, often-times they do overlap, but not nearly as much as you might think. This is why we call it "churchianity," right? Because at some point it stopped serving Christ in CHRISTianity and started its improper focus on itself as the church, hence CHURCHianity.

If you want to serve your local congregation, just ask someone on the welcoming team or the pastor. You'll get plugged in fast. But you'll be serving a machine. Sometimes it's a useful machine, other times it's not. Make sure you know which your congregation is before you start investing too much time. Just because they preach stuff you approve of doesn't necessarily mean they're actually advancing God's Kingdom.

But if you want to serve The Church, Jesus made it clear how to do that: "make disciples of all nations." Who are you discipling? If you're not discipling anyone yet, that's the starting point. As you do that, everything else unfolds.

So, start re-framing your thoughts away from "serving in my local church congregation" and toward "serving God's Kingdom" (i.e. The Church) and you'll find yourself likely coming up with a vastly different set of answers, all more biblical than the first question would produce.

What do I need to learn from here since I came from the og TRP?

score hidden · 20 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

As /u/r_horizon said, what you need to learn from here is on the sidebar. The most common answer to virtually any question that gets asked here is: "lift, sidebar, STFU." What that means is:

- Lifting is the foundation of being attractive - not only to women, but to make friends, earn respect in the workplace, gain influence in your social circles, etc. We could debate over whether the world should function this way or not, but the reality is that attractive people fare much better than unattractive people, and lifting is the most important factor in that equation.
- Sidebar content is all of the information you'll need to know beyond just lifting. If we break it down into physical, mental, spiritual, lifting covers the physical and the sidebar content covers the mental and spiritual. Specifically, the 100s and 200s cover the mental and the 300s/400s cover the spiritual (plus the other posts).
- STFU means to keep yourself out of trouble while you're getting fit and learning from the sidebar. People who talk too much while still ignorant end up with problems. Once you start developing a frame, ease your way back into dominating social communications once again, whether with a wife/girlfriend, boss, friend, etc.

I don't have a mission for Christ.

Of course you do. You're just not living it. A mod over on /r/TrueChristian \(/u/fictitiousfishes\) once commented appropriately that God doesn't have a history of repeating with unique, special revelation what he's already said in Scripture. You can pray for thousands of hours on the question, "God, should I lie or tell the truth?" He's not going to proclaim from the heavens that you should tell the truth. He already told you not to lie in Scripture and he won't repeat himself. God already told you to make disciples in Scripture. That's your mission. He's not going to repeat himself with some unique and special calling.

Your context in how you make disciples may differ from your neighbor's. But the goal is still the same. If you're spiritually gifted at hospitality, invite people into your home and disciple them. If you're gifted in mercy, disciple those who are suffering and in need. If you're gifted in teaching, disciple your students rather than merely teaching them. If you're gifted in evangelism, disciple those who are saved through your preaching. If you're gifted at fixing pipes, then disciple those whose pipes you fix. If you're an expert at delivering pizza, disciple those at the pizza shop or build relationships to people who order pizza and get to know them beyond your pizza-delivery role so you can one day disciple them. If you're (in /u/lamecatchphrase's case) gifted at protecting people, disciple those who protect others alongside you, or disciple the people you're protecting.

Context matters, but it is not the goal in itself. You can create new contexts for yourself, but people who are overly ambitious about "improving" their context, from a missional perspective, aren't improving at all - they're merely changing their context. In reality, devaluing your context is probably an actual improvement on a missional level. The poor and needy are more likely to receive discipleship than the wealthy. So, while getting a promotion may look like an "improvement" in your context, if it means being around wealthier people more and they're more resilient to the Gospel, then you've actually harmed your mission by getting that promotion (not that you shouldn't take it; but that you find a way to leverage your new context more efficiently and work harder to make your mission work in your new context).

This is partly, I believe, why Jesus said it's so hard for a rich person to enter the Kingdom of Heaven - because "improvements" in context from a worldly perspective are actually a devaluation in God's missional perspective. Yet when our context "declines" by losing our job, going into foreclosure, etc. then we actually end up with an even greater pool of people receptive to the Gospel - and that's a beautiful thing. That's not to say we shouldn't improve context from a more common sense of worldly ambition; just make sure you're leveraging the new context properly.

Thoughts about fraternity/sorority culture?

score hidden · 16 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is a post for r/askRPC. Please relocate it there. Thanks!

How to reach to being “ghosted”?

score hidden · 16 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm removing this post for two reasons:

1. It doesn't include your stats.
2. It cross-posts to another sub.

Please add the stats (see Rule 2 on the sidebar) and paste the post onto this sub so we're not redirected elsewhere, then you'll be approved. You may also want to post this on r/askRPC instead of r/RPChristians, as it's meant for these types of questions and the pool of users is more likely to evoke responses from quality contributors, as passive lurkers who decide it's time to chime in are less frequent there.

Need some dating advice...

score hidden · 10 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I thought I didn't need to put down things that didn't have anything to do with the question

I'm stickying this so EVERYONE can see this PERFECT example of why stats are absolutely necessary on advice threads. Asking a theology question? Screw the stats. Advice? Mandatory. Period. Let's break this down.

She would also like to, but one thing is holding her back: ~~I'm going into law enforcement~~ ... I am 5'7", 125lbs

FTFY.

/u/OsmiumZulu's advice to you is solid gold. He said pretty much everything I would have. The most critical point to absorb on why your stats matter?

- Women go out of their way to bend their schedules, goals, and preferences to suit a guy who she is highly attracted to, especially on a sheer physical level.

Now, in the comments below I'm seeing you make these statements:

the point of my post had nothing to do with physical fitness

and

Pretty sure I was asking relationship advice, not for a workout guide

and

I never said I had no intention of gaining more muscle mass. Btw, why did you comment, it has nothing to do with the topic of my original post. Literally the only reason why that's there is because otherwise I was violating rule 2 and this thread would be locked. Otherwise I would not have added it because it has nothing to do with the questions in my original post.

and nothing in my post had anything to do with, "I weigh this much will she think I'm cute". It had nothing to do with physical fitness. It was more of a, to put it simply, "how should I handle this particular situation" kind of questions

You've literally had at least 5, maybe 6 guys pushing the stats issue. You DEER and ignore every one of them. Consider the possibility that maybe ... just MAYBE there's a chance 5-6 people give the exact same advice for a reason. After all, only 5-6 guys actually engaged with the question that YOU thought was relevant.

Okay, let me put a bar here to emphasize the juxtaposition I'm trying to create.

OZ: Women go out of their way to bend their schedules, goals, and preferences to suit a guy who she is highly attracted to, especially on a sheer physical level.

You: nothing in my post had anything to do with, "I weigh this much will she think I'm cute". It had nothing to do with physical fitness

With those statements in mind, let's go back to your question. I'll paraphrase for you: I like a girl, I want to be a cop and she doesn't date cops, but might be changing her mind. Should I go for it or not?

The advice you're seeking is likely tied to your stats. If you were Chris(tian) Hemsworth as a cop, do you think she'd even think twice about dropping her "no cops" rule? Do you think she would have even told you that standard in the first place, knowing that it could drive you away? No. She wouldn't possibly take that risk.

By pre-emptively DEERING about your stats while simultaneously insisting that guys ignore your stats and focus on the question you want answered, what you're saying is: "I know my stats are probably the real problem in why this situation exists in the first place, but I'm going to repress that thought and see if there's another technical answer I can hang my hat on so that I don't actually have to fix my stats and can still get what I want."

I don't blame you for doing this (even if subconsciously or unintentionally). I did it once upon a time too. I had appearance issues I knew I needed to work out when I wrote up my first askMRP post. I lied and pretended I was in great shape. Why? Because I didn't want "relationship advice" to be clouded by a constant refrain of "get in shape." It's embarrassing now to look back at that. The one thing that made the singular biggest difference in my situation, taking away all the complications, was the one answer I didn't want to hear. Implementing all of the other advice without taking care of my physique wouldn't have come anywhere near to getting me the results I was looking for.

CONCLUSION

Yes, the stats matter. I don't say this to fault or shame you for anything - again, I've tried to get advice while ignoring my own stats too. Let my wasted effort be a lesson to you to start where we tell every guy to start: at the gym.

Practical Ways to Become More Masculine

score hidden · 7 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with /u/Deep_Strength about needing the Rule 2 information. This post is locked until edited to include that information.

What is this subreddit about? I can't figure it out based on the posts

score hidden · 3 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is more a post for r/askRPC. But yes, the answers are on the sidebar.

Pre-marriage sexuality

score hidden · 1 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

While this is an interesting question, I'd prefer you re-post it on r/RPCWomen and r/askRPC. Thanks!

Women are the beloved creation of Gods hand before they are temptation to you

score hidden · 21 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I thought about removing this thread for the blatantly unbiblical view it expresses, but maybe there's more value in leaving it up and just locking it instead. Before doing so, though, let's clear up some things ...

Looking at someone with lustful intent

It's amazing to me how many people call "lust" or even "lustful intent" a sin. Have you not read Matthew 5? Is it wrong for me to lust after my own wife? Of course not. Let's quote Jesus: "Anyone who lusts ... has committed adultery in his heart." Lust is not the sin. Adultery is. If the lustful intent is not in an adulterous context, we can't so quickly call it sin. I expanded on this significantly in my comment to /u/DeChef2 below. Here's the link for the lazy. purely as a means of gratification for you- as a means of satisfying a desire you have. It is turning them into a commodity to be consumed, rather than a person to honor

Hmm ... the word for "lust" in Matthew 5:28 is a conjugation of epithumeo. Let's look at another example the same author uses - Matthew 13:16-17.

- But blessed are your eyes because they see, and your ears because they hear. For truly I tell you, many prophets and righteous men [epethymesan - selfishly desired for their own gratification, as a commodity to be consumed rather than to be honored,] to see what you see but did not see it, and to hear what you hear but did not hear it.

Does that interpretation make ANY sense to you at all? This garbage interpretation by the author is imputing his own definitions and ideas of what that word means and using that as a foundation for Scriptural interpretation. That is not how we do things here.

Instead, from the very next time Matthew (again, the same author) uses the word, we see that this "lust/desire" is utilized in a very holy context by righteous people. Lust is not inherently degrading to women. The context and motive in which it is used is what causes the problem, per above.

David

As others have pointed out, this wasn't a one-way thing. Bathsheba was married to one of David's mighty men. Historically, David is understood to be close to 60 years old at this time. Most people also believe his mighty men came about when he was serving Saul as a young man! That means they'd known each other for a LONG time. This is also clear from Uriah's closeness to the palace. David almost certainly knew Bathsheba, and her him.

Yeah, she's either on the roof or bathing with an open window. Yeah, she could see the palace out the window. Yeah, she knew David lived in the palace. There's nothing in the Bible to suggest she shut the window if/when she noticed David oggling her. There's also nothing that indicates ANY type of resistance whatsoever to David's advances toward her. After all, she's a lonely woman whose husband was off at war, so she's hot and lonely.

Can we say definitively that she sinned in all of this? I suppose we could assume that David actually raped her. But something tells me that if he did, Nathan would have been having a different conversation with David later on. David was condemned by God in this situation for committing adultery and sending Uriah to his death. He was also condemned and got numerous Israelites killed by a plague for something as small as taking a census. If rape had occurred, something tells me God would have mentioned that to us, in light of the smaller things about David that actually are brought up.

In the absence of rape, the only other conclusion is that Bathsheba was willing. This was mutual adultery. And if she was willing when summoned, is it a hard leap to assume she was hopeful and perhaps even tempting? Obviously there's no guarantee that she lured David into this. But these are not far stretches, and they're pretty commonly agreed upon even by many blue pill pastors - one of the few cases in Scripture where I've actually heard pastors be willing to share the blame.

Oh, one reason I've heard for why Bathsheba was presumed to be at fault was God's insistence on the death of the baby. One pastor noted that 1 Cor. 7 sanctifies children born of sinful relationships as long as one of the parents is a believer/righteous. The presumption given was that if Bathsheba was innocent before God in the situation, he would have spared the baby, but because the baby died it implies that neither of them were innocent. Sure, this is a bit of a stretch, but also an interesting thought.

Who should you listen to on RPChristians?

score hidden · 20 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for posting this, brother. I want to clarify that being endorsed here isn't purely about reliability to the rest of the community, though that's definitely its primary function. It also determines the pool of people we select from for other projects. Examples of "other projects" include:

- Giving one-on-one attention for phone calls/zoom meetings to discuss important issues related to the sub, personal life, etc.
- I have on a couple occasions hosted small groups online, and when we set these up, it's primarily for flaired contributors or those who we are contemplating giving flair to.
- Endorsed/flaired contributors are also the only ones considered for participation in the RPC video chat series, which will be posted very soon (we have a number of sessions already recorded). Right now the group consists of 3 mods and 2 ECs. Other ECs may be asked from time to time to join in as guest speakers to the conversation.

My point is, there are other benefits to being a flaired contributor. While your motivation toward becoming a model for others to look up to should be internal and not motivated by flair-seeking, we do want to reward those people whose lives and participation here reflect what others should aspire to.

Does that mean you have to be perfect? Heck no. I was just chatting with u/TheChristianAlpha the other day about how I broke frame with my wife a couple weeks ago. There are some ECs who aren't even married, but that doesn't mean they can't give advice to those who are. There are others who are married, but still don't have the sex life they've always wanted. As Deep often says, our faith is one of direction, not destination. Of course, passing certain mile-markers can help make clear which direction you're moving.

Let me add a few more points on flair, in general:

- If you think anyone is a good candidate for endorsement, let us know. We will investigate it and make a decision. If you have any suggestions, put them here. /u/dechef2 is on my radar, for example. AlanNoles is someone I've meant to endorse for a while and hadn't done it yet - I'm going to get to that now. u/angusisin is another one, though he's significantly less active on reddit.
- You're welcome to nominate yourself for endorsement. We don't take this as arrogance. Also, if you take the view that "macho people don't ask for stuff like this," ease up. Paul says to eagerly desire the greater gifts, as if we are meant to pursue them with ambition. I take the pursuit of flair as a similarly appropriate ambition to have in order to enhance your ability to make a difference for God's Kingdom on this sub. That said, in humility, accept it if we say no.

- To re-emphasize: endorsement requires BOTH being red pill fluent and biblically grounded, though we may at times add other flair if someone is exceptional at one, but not the other. Also, you actually have to have a post/comment history that shows a wide enough array of your views, advice, and commentary to give us something to assess, which means you have to be fairly active before asking for flair.
- We will always give flair to any woman who wants it. Women having flair is not an endorsement, nor is it "favoring women" (instead, some may argue it's the exact opposite). It's for ease of differentiating whether you're talking to/getting advice from a woman or a man. That said, we won't automatically tag women publicly without a request because we already have a tagging system visible only to mods, so there's no need for our own purposes.
- We are not against adding negative flair for problem users. Some even specifically request it - like our "visiting infidel" who shows up from time to time.
- We're also not opposed to unique flair for people we don't necessarily endorse, but who do have a unique, valuable quality worth highlighting.

If you notice a color coding system with the flair, it's simple:

- Green: married man
- Blue: single man
- Pink: woman

Christians who have used the dating site E harmony, what was your experience like?

score hidden · 20 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is a post for r/askRPC.

What is the Christian right's future in American politics?

score hidden · 20 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm removing this temporarily. You haven't done enough to explain the content. We removed the option to give link posts for a reason. If you want to post a link, that's fine, but you've got to summarize what we'll hear so that people can engage without actually having to click on the link if they don't want to. Too many people will not actually watch the video. I don't want discussion confused between those who did and those who didn't.

What are the main points in the video? Add that to your post and I'll re-approve.

How do I approach my husband about this issue?

score hidden · 19 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

"HOLY TINTINNABULATION, BATMAN!" The comments in this post are sending off all kinds of alarms. It's like the bloopers were chomping at the bit for an opportunity to play white knight for the damsel in distress against the mean, evil husband ... despite not knowing his side of the story, which OP respectfully pointed out in the comments.

I'm truly shocked at the advice given in this thread. So many people are quick to hop on the "communication" bandwagon. Seriously? Do you all really believe that telling her husband what he's doing wrong - no matter how "lovingly" it's couched - is the solution here? Come on.

Sure, female strategy is going to be different from male strategy. But I'm completely baffled by comments advising: "tell him" followed by quoting Scripture that says to win him over "without words." If his frame is as strong as you portray it - cold and jagged, though it may be at times - your words are going to have very little impact and will, instead, more likely be interpreted as you complaining/nagging him, no matter how nicely you tell him.

So let's get to the meat of this. 1 Peter 3 is pretty clear: submit to your husband. The context is illuminating. Before, he talks about slaves submitting to oppressive masters. After, he talks about Jesus submitting to the government that was crucifying him. Right in the middle, he tells wives to submit to their husbands - specifically referencing non-believing husbands. The impression he's (likely intentionally) creating is that a wife should live in quiet submission to her husband, no matter how irrational or unbiblical his expectations are over her.

Yes, that's a tough pill to swallow. That's why it's a red pill and not a sugar pill.

Many people I've had this conversation with want to jump to 3:7 - "Husbands, in the same way be considerate as you live with your wives." But we're not talking to him. If he's in sin, he will answer for it. It's not your responsibility to repay his sin by more sin of your own in how you interact with him. That's horrible logic and God won't honor it. Even if he is at fault here, that's beside the point. You can't control him.

What you can do is control yourself and treat him the way the Church is to treat Christ.

First, I've heard a number of sermons preached on "Things we wish Jesus didn't say." The Great Commission often makes the list. It's hard work. It's easy for the Church to throw it back at Jesus, "Why is the burden on us to get your Gospel to the nations? Can't you just write it in the stars? It's your goal, after all, not ours. Why don't you help out some more?" Can you imagine having a conversation with Jesus like that? And if the Church shouldn't be talking to Jesus this way, why would it be appropriate for a wife to talk to her husband that way?

From there, some people like to say, "But Jesus's yoke is easy and his burden is light." Yeah, but that "easy/light" burden also required the rich young man to sell all his wealth and give it away in order to follow Jesus. That's what the Church is expected to do for Christ, upon his request. Are you willing to give up all of your paycheck to your husband instead of just $1k every couple weeks?

/u/rocknrollchuck brought this up, so let me include it here: at $52k/yr, after tax let's say you're at $45k. $1k/2wk = $26k/yr. That leaves you another $19k/yr reserved for yourself. If that's his idea, fine. But perhaps his thought is that if you're working full-time, but he's not getting the full benefit of your employ because you reserve so much for yourself, maybe he's recouping that value in a disproportionate share of the housework.

Sure, many objectors are going to say, "But that's not fair!" And yet who are you to judge what is fair in a man's own home without knowing the man? I know in my own home, my wife has often believed the balance of responsibilities is unfair - but this is because she does very little in the way of making disciples. She balances her job + kids + house. I balance my job + kids + house + making disciples. The last one is probably more time-consuming than any of them. It's also the one God's ultimately going to look at when judging what we did with our married life. So, if I spend an equal amount of time at work and with the kids, but I spend 90% more time making disciples than her, it only makes sense that the "fair" thing is that she do 90% more housework than me - or more, given that the two aren't actually equal and I'm carrying the load for her. Yet I still probably do about 45% of the housework anyway ... not to mention other necessary areas I spend more time on than her, like lifting.

My point is: housework isn't a 50/50 thing. Marriage is not a 50/50 split of responsibilities. THE BIBLE IS NOT EGALITARIAN. The balance is whatever the head of the household decides it should be. If he decides to make you do more work than he does, then that's the balance for your home. His obligation is not to be overbearing on you. I don't know that you've described any situation that I'd call sinfully overbearing. "Unfair," sure ... if we only look at housework compared to housework. But "overbearing" in a 1 Peter 2-3 sense? Not by a long shot.

The flip of this is that he bears the responsibility for the finished product. You don't. There's a value to that responsibility as well. Consider: my wife works for a large accounting firm. She has been offered a promotion multiple times. It would involve (1) significantly increased pay and (2) reduced hourly requirements, but (3) more responsibility for the final product. More money, less hours! Fantastic deal, right? Yet she refuses to do it. Why? "Because I don't want the pressure of knowing that everything in my department falls on my head if something gets screwed up." So, she actually prefers to bear a larger time responsibility with lower compensation in order to avoid that responsibility.

As men, we bear that responsibility whether we like it or not. There is a weight to this constantly hanging over our heads. And that weight comes with a value on our time that inherently permits a reasonable degree of offsetting actual hours worked against the weight of responsibility.

So, where one user commented that "The fact that he makes more money is IRRELEVANT to household planning" - I couldn't possibly disagree more. There is a premium on each person's time. A law firm owner working 50 hours per week bears WAAAY more stress and responsibility than a Subway worker doing 50 hours per week. I can say this because I've done both. If the pay were even remotely close, I'd take the sandwich artist job every time. The work simply isn't as hard and doesn't take nearly as long to recover from. When I worked at Subway, I went home and had no further cares. As a law firm owner, I come home and am still working out cases in my hind-brain, pondering whether there will be enough to cover payroll, wondering if I forgot about any deadlines, etc.

Now, imagine those same types of pressures on an eternal scale. It's up to you to consider day-in and day-out whether or not your marriage, family, and personal life is moving in a direction you could proudly present to God, or if you are failing to lead your wife properly, should have shared the Gospel with that guy you saw while out running the previous day, forgot to train your children how to lead their friends to Jesus, accidentally gave bad advice to the guy you're discipling whose life is in a bad spot, etc. I know for a fact my wife doesn't think about these things. Nor should she have to. It's not her responsibility to think about everything that needs to be done under God's eyes for our marriage. That's my job. But the added responsibility comes with an added premium on my time. This means that my man-hours contributed to low-responsibility work are worth more than her woman-hours. In an egalitarian marriage, that obviously wouldn't be the case - but in a godly, biblical marriage, this will always be true.

Now, it's perfectly possible that your husband isn't actually thinking of any of these things. He may not actually be leading your marriage properly toward making disciples. And if that's the case, then he's a crappy leader, still bearing the responsibility, yet ignoring and squandering it. But there's no evidence that this is the case, so I'm not going to make that assumption.

Lastly, just because you're required to submit to him, regardless of how "unfair" you think it is, that doesn't mean you have to like it. The Bible compels slaves to obey masters, Jesus to die on the cross, and wives to submit to their husbands. It doesn't compel any of these people to feeeeeeel a certain way about the situation they're in.

Too many people think that "good Christians" should always have positive feelings all the time. That's absurd when we see how often Jesus had negative feelings. Are we to preach at him about how he needs to depend on God more? Absurd!

He can lead his home how he wants. But his leadership may bring with it the consequence of an unhappy spouse. You should not disrespect him in your unhappiness, but you're not obligated to feel good about it. So, embrace your frustrations and allow yourself to feel it. Don't repress or stifle your anger and annoyance, pretending to be happy when you're not. But in the way you conduct yourself, allow how you feel to be tempered by the behavior of one who has the "beauty of a gentle and quiet spirit, which is of great worth in God's sight."

"But RC, that's an outdated passage!" cry the liberals. Verse 5, "For this is the way the holy women of the past who put their hope in God used to adorn themselves." In other words, Paul is saying, "Culture is changing, but this is the way it was done in the past, and that's reason enough to keep doing it that way."

What is your opinion on women who have had a breast reduction?

score hidden · 12 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

These are the types of posts that belong in r/askRPC. It's a question worth discussing. But it's not substantive enough for the main page.

A biblical sex commentary.

score hidden · 4 May 2020 · /r/askRPC

/u/Deep_Strength has a book on the subject. Our sidebar here also has pulled together a lot of content like what you're describing and put it in readily readable format. While I have put it on hold for some time, I have a book in the works that I will be returning to soon. This content is certainly out there. I know there are plenty of other Christian manosphere authors as well. Some of them are more reliable than others. Just take a look around.

That said, I have no idea how reliable you are, so it's hard to endorse what you're doing, and I'm debating removing this post for the self-promo without knowing what people will be reading. For all I know, it's a bait-and-switch and you've got some satanist garbage on your website.

There's one blogger who pretended to be a Christian red pill guy, yet was writing lots of blue pill content; another guy who claimed the same, but was going to such extremes as to have blog posts about how watching porn glorified God. You have to earn your place in the community here before you start promoting what you have to say. Start posting what you think would be valuable content to our sub, and as we see that your use of Scripture is appropriate and your understanding of the red pill is solid, and then let's talk.

In the meantime, especially given that it's broken, I'm going to request that you remove the link to your blog.

Single church group

score hidden · 2 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is more appropriate for r/askRPC. Removed.

Do you think the pandemic, is the foundation for the mark of the beast?

score hidden · 28 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is a question for askRPC, not here. Also, I'm a preterist (partial, leaning full). The beast/antichrist are a thing of the past, so no sense looking forward to any of that. For further reading: <https://revelationrevolution.org/>

Feel free to repost on r/askRPC

Response to RPChristians from a Hindu

score hidden · 26 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with /u/justforgigs96 insofar as I'm unsure what the purpose of your post is. If you want to post something here, you've got to engage the community in some way. That means either discussing an aspect of red pill or Christian truth that would be beneficial for the community to understand and that is not contrary to Christian belief (which it sounds like you may not be able to do) OR you can ask questions for the community to answer (which you certainly could be doing).

Also, given how the aspect of peripheral faiths isn't necessarily on-point, this might be better content for r/askRPC.

Lastly, as the other guy alluded to (though I don't necessarily track with his explanation), Christianity's position toward polygamy is more nuanced and not necessarily in alignment with what you make it seem.

Reposting as text: Advice on how to manage and potentially create a Red Pill women's subreddit for Christian women.

score hidden · 25 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

As u/TheChristianAlpha referenced, I'd be interested in chatting further about this. You're not the first woman to ask about doing this, and my advice to you is the same as I gave to the others: start out by posting content here that you find valuable for other women to know:

- What are unique things single girls need to be thinking about?
- How to inspire your husband to want to lead you?
- Why some men won't initiate and how to overcome that problem?
- How to handle marital conflict as a woman?
- Share examples from your own life or tell stories about your friends that affirm what the bible says about gender and relationships and why it's significant.

You may think of even better topics than these! I'm just working off the top of my head.

As you build rapport through high value content here, you will quickly become someone we can stand behind, and it would be much easier to endorse a sub like this. The women here will also realize you're someone they can learn from, especially in a Tatus 2 sense. That would be truly awesome.

With that foundation, I'd be happy to help you build such a sub. What I don't want is someone who is half committed or doesn't have much to offer the Christian female community. Without getting to know you, it's hard to tell which camp you'd fall into, hence building rapport here first.

Now, I do realize that some of the men in this community aren't too keen on the posts addressed primarily to women. If that's your hangup, I'm happy to chat in other ways to work toward establishing that foundation. I'd really like to see this happen eventually, and have thought about starting it a number of times, myself. But I ultimately hold with Titus 2, Song of Solomon, and other places of the Bible that model women mentoring other women (though not to replace a husband's role, but as a supplement).

Also: all your stats are going to be relevant here also. Are you actually the kind of woman other women will want to be like? Should they be learning from you at all? I've recently seen some of the videos u/pearlsandstilettos is putting out with u/bsutansalt. Look at what she's doing for the general population as a resource for what you can be doing for Christian women. But above all: remember that you're always going to have a bigger impact on women and the world through individual discipleship. A large group gathering place should always be seen as a hobby, not your primary ministry.

Also, if you're married, how does this ambition jive with your husband's goals and mission?

Just some things to think about.

Galatians 5, or The Answer to "Is XXXXXXXX a Sin?"

score hidden · 16 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

u/ruizbuja beat you to the punch on this one. He just uses Romans 14 instead of Galatians 5, but it sounds like the conclusions are the same. His analysis is a much more thorough break-down, and it gives a much clearer explanation for why you can't just go around sinning whenever you feel like it.

Either way, I'm glad you've discovered this very important aspect of how we ought to relate with God and orient our lives. I'll investigate Galatians 5 further, as I don't think I've read it recently enough with this context in mind.

For quick reference, ruiz's post is here:

https://www.reddit.com/r/TrueChristian/comments/f8vuke/is_this_a_sin_is_that_a_sin_not_the_right/ - I recommend everyone to read this as a supplement to what OP is saying here.

2 "Redpill" lies and deceptions built to enslave us.

score hidden · 7 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I think you're lacking insight of the oneness bond between God and man among those who are saved. Is God not excellent? Is he not sanctifying us into his likeness? Is God not in us? And if God is in us and he is excellent and he is sanctifying us into his image, should we not also become excellent in all the same ways he is? A failure to do this would seem to be sin to me.

The fact that God is in us is significant here. I've often commented before that the ultimate goal is not that we do things for God. This amounts to an external show of action of his will over our will in our lives. Some people praise the concept of defying their own will for God. Great. That's a start. But if sanctification is working in any way in your life, then your will gradually BECOMES his will until doing what you want to do IS doing what God wants to do. So, when you talk against man becoming his own point of origin, you're neglecting the impact of sanctification on a person's life.

And let's be clear: even secular MRP is going to say, "If you have a crappy frame, fix your frame before you start projecting it on others." That is, you have to have a proper frame before it's worth holding frame or living in your own point of origin. Secular RP will also say that your frame is "your best self."

Our best self is our fully sanctified self. A fully sanctified person's own desires ARE God's desires. They don't have to deny their own will in order to do God's will. They live out of their own heart and desires as one already fully aligned with God, whose internal compulsions are conformed to his character and will. This is an even better state than the one who still has to actively deny himself every time he makes a decision - because that person's heart isn't actually being transformed; he's just becoming better and better and conforming his behaviors.

Now, let's be clear: this process won't be complete until we're in heaven (unless you're Nazarene and believe in total sanctification). But that doesn't mean we can ignore all progress on earth. Part of chasing excellence is the path of becoming that person.

- Chase Excellence: Become more and more like Christ
- Operate From Your Own Point of Origin: As your frame improves from your pursuit of internal Christ-likeness, your internal point of origin is the EXACT place you want to operate from.

I have also commented to men before: I would MUCH rather you live out of your own point of origin than out of some idealistic notion of how you think you SHOULD be living. Yes, that means you will start sinning a lot more. But it also shows you EXTREMELY fast the true nature of your heart.

Those who behavior-control themselves as their primary mode of living ultimately identify themselves through their behavior and believe that their behaviors are the ultimate decider of their relationship with God. This is better known as legalism. Those who operate out of their own frame recognize quickly where they haven't yet been sanctified and are able to pray, repent, and work with God toward the internal change - the "renewing of your mind" - on those issues.

I'd like to talk [20M].

score hidden · 23 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Locked until edited for Rule 2 information and more information on what advice you actually need. Also, while there are certainly a few people I would endorse for personal, one-on-one chats (ex. mods, /u/TheChristianAlpha, other ECs), it's generally a bad idea to open the door to a 3k+ community and assume that whoever randomly says "yes" will be a reliable source of information. We have ECs for a reason.

Are women allowed to post?

score hidden · 17 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Yes, women are certainly permitted to post here. However, this particular thread is locked for lacking Rule 2 information. Please edit with this information and PM or another mod so we can unlock the post.

In the meantime ...

I really have a sense of feeling like he deserves someone with undying love for him no matter what and believe he should find someone new that is making him happy.

Way to hamster this one. You're unsatisfied and want out, but you find a way to rationalize that somehow it's for his benefit to end all of this? If he wants out, he can make that decision for himself. If you want out and you're willing to sin (divorce) to do it, take ownership of that rather than using cop-outs like this to make yourself feel better about a bad decision.

How to deal With People that have Contempt on you?

score hidden · 12 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Be attractive. Don't be unattractive. What are your stats? Rule 2.

How to game my fiancé?

score hidden · 10 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Rule 2. Edit to add this info. Locked until then. PM me or another mod when you do so I don't miss it and forget to unlock this.

In the meantime ...

things get a little dry, definitely not her fault as she is a reflection of me

She's not a reflection of you yet - especially if you're not even around each other often. She's only a reflection of you after she's had time to mold to your leadership. It sounds like you're not even close to having been together long enough for that to happen. It's possible she's just a dry person. Or it's possible that you're dry and she doesn't know how to deal with you. Or it's possible that neither of you are dry, but that you're both on different wavelengths so your passions never line up.

But don't play the "your wife is a reflection of you" card before you're even married. She will be like you, and if you keep this up you might find yourself very unsatisfied. So definitely take ownership of being your own solution. But don't make excuses for her before marriage either. You need to know now if this is going to get screwed up or not.

Confused

score hidden · 9 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

As others have noted, our community is predominantly men, but this sub intentionally keeps the door open for women to participate. The sidebar contains the following introduction:

We are a subreddit that exists to provide a place for Christians to discuss problems, solutions and insights on relationships, sex, and biblical masculinity according to biblical principles.

We are certainly open to topics on biblical femininity as well.

Our stated core principles are also on the sidebar:

- Genesis 1:28 - "Be fruitful and multiply" - God created us to be relational, sexual beings. It's okay to embrace that.
- 1 Corinthians 9:24-27 - God wants us to take care of our bodies. That means staying fit and exercising restraint both sexually (i.e. porn, pre-marital sex) and in our diets.
- Genesis 2:18, 3:16 - God designed husbands to be leaders and wives to be helpers. Although they have equal value in relation to God, we are not co-equals in authority within the household.
- Ephesians 5 - God designed physical relationships to parallel our spiritual one with Him; what God models on a spiritual level with us will work in our physical relationships as well.
- Galatians 6:1-10 - We can help, but you are ultimately responsible for your own life decisions. This is how it works with your spouse too. We are not here to help you engage in destructive manipulation tactics on your SO.

That said, I'm with /u/CarelessBowler5 in wanting to know the context that brings you here, as that affects how we respond. I'm locking this post until you edit it to include an answer to that question.

should men be the head of the house?

score hidden · 2 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This question shouldn't need to be asked here. It is plastered everywhere on our sidebar and inherent in all of our discussions. This is such a low-quality, over-basic post that I'm locking it from further discussion.

How to find Devout Christians my Age?

score hidden · 17 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Devout Christians are rare anywhere, not just Australia. The solution isn't to look harder. The people who often come off as "devout" really aren't "devout" at all. They're pious. They have an appearance of being "devout" because they "devote" so much of their time, money, etc. to churchianity, but they're not actually doing the work God called them to do. They're not making disciples. They're not sharing their faith. They just serve in 3-4 different ministries and show up to all the volunteer projects their congregation schedules so they feel like an all-star to the guy who calls himself a pastor.

If you want a truly devout believer to connect with, the best way is to disciple someone into being the exact type of person you want to relate with in the first place.

The Importance of Being Happy

score hidden · 26 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

/u/redwall92 is spot-on on this one. RP is not about finding happiness. It's about discerning truth. There are many happy people on both the red and blue lines, just as there are unhappy people on both sides. You're trying to affix a false relationship between happiness and the red pill.

That said, you're right: the red pill cannot be the source of someone's happiness - not sex, nor women, nor amusement parks or money or Netflix. Our satisfaction and happiness is found in God - and it is that restored relationship for which Jesus died.

Yes, this is on our sidebar, codified as the 400 series.

What are your thoughts on kissing a girl on the first date?

score hidden · 4 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This is more of an r/askRPC question. Because I didn't see it in time, I'll leave it up anyway. But low-effort stuff like this belongs over there in the future.

religion and the red pill and books

score hidden · 10 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Removed. I have no objection to posting to Rollo's content that are relevant here - in fact, I encourage it. But you can't just post a link. We don't allow link posts for a reason.

Please provide some insights on what you learned from the video, some of the interesting points, things you might disagree with, etc. Posts MUST be substantive.

Career change

score hidden · 4 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This post is better suited for r/askRPC. Please re-post it there.

I love The Red Pill

score hidden · 16 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm removing this just because it doesn't add much of value. Feel free to repost on r/askRPC with a little more content or a question to go with it.

Confronting the myth that you have to “earn sex” in marriage, and that if your wife deprives you, or worse, cheats on you with another man, it is completely your fault as a man for not being “red pillled” enough to stop her. This attitude is blue pillled, and takes away responsibility from women.

score hidden · 11 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I almost removed this post for concern trolling. But given our pleasant interaction in mod chat on another matter, I'm inclined to assume you're not trolling - just didn't have your head on straight when you wrote this. I don't have time to explain myself fully, but here's the snapshot:

First, you're confusing blame with responsibility. Women are to blame. But men are responsible for those entrusted under their authority, just as Christ is responsible for the Church, his bride, under his authority. If a manager hires an employee who screws up the whole office, the employee is to blame, but the manager is responsible to deal with the mess. Even worse if the CEO says, "Sorry, you can't fire her. You hired her, she's your problem now." Are you going to win any points with the CEO every time you blame the staff member for the screwed up state of your office at the executive meetings?

I'm all for blaming women when they're at fault. But I'm more interested in being a responsible manager over my own home. Blaming my wife might make me feel vindicated, but feelings are for girls and this is about getting your house in order. Crying to all my relatives that I'm too weak to get control over my wife so they can do my work for me doesn't strike me as the particularly manly or responsible thing to do. That's kind of like saying, "I can't afford my $100/mo health insurance premium, so let me get 10 other people who are better off than me to pay $10 each toward my premium so I don't have to pay it at all." Get that liberal garbage out of here.

Lastly, you have ABSOLUTELY NO CONCEPT AT ALL what frame is. You're confusing SMV with frame. Social status, looks, wealth, fame - none of these are frame. They are all external factors that women use to size-up a man before investing much time in him. Frame is not external; it's internal. It's the way you project yourself into the world. Maintaining frame is continuing to project yourself rather than allowing others to project themselves onto you. A titanium, barbed wire frame is the guy who pushes people away because he has no problem telling people to screw off when they want something from him. A fortified palace frame is the guy who draws people toward him by the way he tells them to screw off.

Red pill states that you may improve your frame so that she is less inclined to act out her hypergamous nature

Are you kidding me? I call shenanegins! AWALT. You can't control hypergamy. You make it work for you.

This entire post reeks of flagrant misunderstandings of the red pill. Back to the sidebar with you.

Self-conscious about things I cannot change immediately.

score hidden · 9 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This should be an r/askRPC question - not substantive enough here. Please re-post it over there.

Also, OYS. Midgets have reason to be upset about their height, but the ones who own it still get laid. Heck, Joaquin Phoenix has that unusually pronounced and off-center strip below his nose that's totally awkward, but he owns it and is a star. You got problems? Own them. Don't hide them.

I believe I have found my mission

score hidden · 2 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Due to vagueness and low-quality, I'm removing this post. Please re-up it when you add some more details about why you've selected this particular mission and once you have some vision to share about how you're going to live it out in a way that isn't vague and amorphous.

Any tips/resources for evangelism in the west?

score hidden · 27 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Lots to say on this. But this is a PERFECT question for askRPC, as it's too off-topic for the main sub. I'm going to remove this and request you post it there. Thanks!

was lutheranism cucked from the start?

score hidden · 26 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Again, good and interesting questions - but off-topic here.

Need help, asktrp was unable to help, maybe you guys can.

score hidden · 15 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Lots and lots that needs to be said here. But before going there, this is locked until the Rule 2 information is added in. It is virtually impossible to help you without that information.

A mission

score hidden · 7 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

That's not a mission. That's an amorphous goal that even someone like Joel Osteen would tout from the pulpit. Please read the sidebar content on developing a mission and come back. In the meantime, this post is removed for soliciting our members to something that we can't vet - Rule 4.

How to improve sex with wife?

score hidden · 8 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

For reference, while I appreciate the edit to add a small component of the Rule 2 information being added, I agree with /u/OsmiumZulu that so much of this information is covered on the sidebar that I'd like to see you read that first, then come back and post a more narrow question about what has or hasn't worked and why.

On Sodomy by bonald

score hidden · 20 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This is the definition of a low effort post. There's a reason we don't allow link posts. I have no problem with people posting links - but you've got to give us something else to go along with it. What's the article about? Why is it relevant to this sub? How did it affect your ministry or sex life? What applications do you expect people to walk away with? Something.

What to look for in wife

score hidden · 21 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Removed for Rule 4. If you want to re-post this with a description of the content in text and a link to your video at the end, that's fine. But this comes off as if you're just trying to use our sub to get more views.

Any RPChristians Near Dayton, OH?

score hidden · 15 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

To all, be extremely cautious about the risks of doxxing yourself or giving enough information about yourself for someone else to dox you.

While I have exchanged personal contact information with many of you, including face-to-face meetings, I only do this to the degree that I genuinely trust a user in advance, and where the prospective benefit outweighs the risk.

Do not exchange personal identifying information with anyone on this sub unless you believe that the benefit you would attain from doing so outweighs the potential risk of any involvement you have with this sub (including things you've posted or commented) getting to your wife, your boss, your friends, posted on your social media account, etc.

I received access to a reddit account not mine.

score hidden · 15 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, this is definitely not a post for this sub. I'd recommend just deleting the credentials and not worrying about it. If you have a used phone, it could be a remnant from the previous user, or perhaps someone else logged into their account using your phone. Or maybe a device that you have synchronized to your phone was used by someone else to log into reddit. There's a million ways this could happen.

I'm sure there is another subreddit for this type of stuff, I'm just not sure what it would be.

State of the Manosphere - Rollo

score hidden · 30 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Sorry, this is way too low effort. You gotta give some kind of summary. We don't allow link posts for a reason.

Red Pill Discord for Discussion and Support

score hidden · 10 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm removing this temporarily to give time to discuss with the other mods. I'm mildly concerned about directing our users to a non-RPC sub when we don't know what content will be taught there, what conclusions will be reached, who will be running it, if it's faith-based or secular, etc. Also, we don't have any authority to take action if something happens over there that works against RPC's goals and interests, which can be concerning. Please update this with lots of additional information so we can evaluate whether it's a safe space or not, and whether we can trust the authority of those who moderate the discord in the absence of any of our authoritative involvement. It's not a matter of stepping on anyone's toes or wanting to take over ... just a lot of unknowns.

Question - Book Recommendation on Finding Your Mission?

score hidden · 4 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm removing secular sources from this thread for obvious reasons.

Would the Modern Woman be Attracted to Jesus?

score hidden · 26 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a fun read. I suppose my biggest question is: how's that working out for you?

Specifically, the formula you propose at the end is too nebulous to have any actual value. Does denying oneself mean sacrifice just for the sake of sacrifice? What does it mean to take up one's cross? It sounds beautiful and christiany, but without the context of who Jesus is, they're just idle words.

Your end formula is also only targeted at one single thing Jesus told us to do, and certainly doesn't even embody the fullness of being Christ-like. More to the point: it does nothing to address the relational issues men find themselves in, as you acknowledge is still lacking in your own life. Until you have the results, the advice is suspect.

Perhaps the biggest problem inherent in your post is the confusion between the physical and the spiritual. When we use Christ as the model, it's not by the way he attracted physical women on earth. He didn't set out to do that in the first place. He did attract a spiritual bride, though. So rather than looking at whether or not Jesus was a physical Chad, contemplate the spiritual truths in his relationship with the church.

It seems to me that you misunderstood this core and foundational concept inherent in everything this sub teaches. Don't look at how Jesus would have attracted physical women, as that was never his goal. Look at how he attracted his bride. You'll find that all the one-sided, partial picture verses you quoted are well taught here, but alongside the other aspects of Jesus's character that you left out. It's highly suspect to say you "don't pretend to present a full picture of Jesus in a few verses," but then clearly present only verses that paint a partial picture.

Back to the sidebar.

Burn the NIV

score hidden · 15 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

As a moderator note: all of the mods agree that the 2011 NIV (and any revisions thereafter) is a relatively awful translation that does the original language an incredible disservice and often lends itself to grossly inaccurate interpretations of the text. We also recognize that their insistence to force gender-neutral language in an otherwise highly gendered text is a weak concession to the feminine imperative and reinforces the ongoing anti-male sentiment plaguing many churches.

That said, the attitude with which you communicate the point is not well-taken. This community is designed to help men, not flame against feminism and women. Pointing out the flaws in an overly-feminized culture, and even expressing frustration and anger against the impact this has on the broader church culture is appropriate. But trash-talking and raging are not appropriate here. This is not a hate community. Consider this a warning.

SHAME Case Study #2: The Freezing Point Of Water And The Isolation Of Shame

score hidden · 15 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You have been warned on more than one occasion, including by me personally, to stop using the oversized text. Take note, and the other mods have agreed, that further infraction will result in your posts and comments being removed.

Protection of the innocent femininity

score hidden · 12 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Let me be clear: this is not the position of the moderators.

I have debated with myself and others on a number of occasions whether or not to allow women to participate here. 4 out of the 5 mods have weighed in already and seem to agree to their ongoing place here, for differing reasons.

Let me also note that this is not a church. 1 Cor. 14:33-35 does not apply here. If you like, you can download the reddit extended suite extension and create labels to help you remember who the girls and boys are, or you can simply block any women so you don't have to read their comments.

The reason I have left this post up is simply to allow anyone to discuss the issue openly, not as an endorsement of the suggestion itself.

Question: Any Advice for a man wanting to start a relationship with a women?

score hidden · 18 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm temporarily locking this post until you edit it to comply with Rule 2. Once you do that, we'll be better able to help. Quite frankly, it sounds like you haven't read much of the sidebar yet, as many of your questions can be answered there. But without seeing your Rule 2 info, we can't really know where exactly you're at and where you're coming from.

Im a little women who needs some word of wisdom.

score hidden · 17 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm temporarily locking this post until you edit it to comply with Rule 2.

Head over heels infatuation.

score hidden · 15 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I have temporarily locked this post until it is edited to comply with Rule 2. As much as we would love to communicate with you on a conceptual level about this issue, relevant feedback can't be given until we know more about your situation. Thanks!

Sexuality

score hidden · 29 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Hey, I'm removing these posts - not because I don't want you to post this content, but because I'd like you to add more details with this.

I prohibit link posts for a reason, and it seems like you're trying to skirt around that by just posting the link with no context. What I've told other people who have wanted to post links, I usually have a few quick guidelines:

1. Do it as a text post [which on this sub is automatic]
2. Include a summary of the content in the link sufficient that someone could engage in the conversation without actually having to click on the link
3. Include a discussion prompt, such as "I'd love to talk about ___" or "What do you think about ___?"
4. Include the link at the bottom with a line: "If you'd like to read more, check this link ..."

Following this format will get you a lot more participation and discussion, which is better for both you in getting feedback and the sub as a whole :)

Also, you might want to space this out a bit. I know you're super into orthodoxy right now, which is cool. But I'd also be cautious not to have yourself labeled as "that guy who's always pushing orthodoxy," which your flair already kind of does :/ You've got some great things to say and I wouldn't want you to lose credibility by boxing yourself in a niche.

I hope this helps. That said, feel free to re-post these links (preferably one per day) pursuant to the guidelines above :) Thanks for your ongoing participation and contributions, brother!

Let's start a distinctly RP Christian feminist movement!

score hidden · 22 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I don't know ... should this be the first ever post taken down by this sub? I'll let /u/OsmiumZulu and /u/rocknrollchuck decide :p

I just don't even know what to say to this. It's basically saying, "Men, do everything and let your wives rest atop your slave labor because she's a woman and she deserves it because she has a vagina and you don't." Combine that with your comments in the other sub against biblical authority structure ... It's attitudes like this that make me want to take up cussing.

Jesus defined masculinity

score hidden · 22 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Warning: This is a troll post. Take that into account in your review.

This user has been temp-banned for 3 days. Feel free to leave your comments all the same, but do it for the benefit of the community and not to engage in an argument with a troll.

The Real Purpose of Woman!!!

score hidden · 8 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

If you're just asking the question, this is fine. But if your point is to get people to watch the video without any description or explanation, that's not cool. I'll give you the benefit of the doubt and leave this up, but put in a little more effort to posts that link to outside content.

Simple Questions

score hidden · 1 September 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

As was shared with me recently, there's some confusion over what constitutes "beta traits." Many people call things like kindness, compassion, empathy, etc. beta traits as a gut reaction because betas emphasize them. But RP doesn't actually define the traits themselves as alpha or beta; rather, the traits can be alpha or beta depending on who is applying them and for what reason.

So, if a guy is acting kind and compassionate to his wife because he thinks she will leave him if he doesn't, that's a beta trait. If another guy acts the exact same way because his wife makes him happy and he wants to reward her with his kindness and compassion, that's an alpha expression of the same traits.

From what I gather, a person is beta if they (among many other things):

- Operate on covert contracts
- Function on what they feel they need to do to get by
- Hide their faults
- Respond to threats passive aggressively
- Look for affirmation/validation from others
- Their plan for life is reactive to what the world throws at them

A person is alpha if they

- Operate on overt boundaries
- Function on what they want to do to enjoy life
- Own their faults
- Respond to threats with active aggression
- Don't need affirmation/validation from others
- Their plan for life is proactive, shaping the world around them

With these things (and more) in mind, you'll see quickly that buying your wife flowers, watching a chick flick, and rubbing her feet can all be done by an alpha male without compromising his alpha. The alpha does these things as an ongoing pattern of maintaining control over his environment. Part of that control falls into the "reward good behavior" advice we often see.

The "pure alpha" does not "care for themselves only" - they simply decide for themselves who they will care about and when and how and why. They don't let culture, social norms, etc. tell them who they should care for. If they decide they don't want to care about their wives anymore, for better or worse, they believe that's their prerogative and we're not going to let culture tell us, "No, you have to love her because you're married!" But many do care for their wives anyway. Why? Because we want to. Because that's who we are - proactively living out of our internal sense of wholeness and not reactively trying to meet a standard or identity that culture tries to push on us.

Simple Questions

score hidden · 3 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

It wouldn't be manipulative at all. Just explain to him that you did have sex, realized it was a mistake, and that you want to do better for the man you're going to marry one day. That's not manipulative, that's high-integrity.

Simple Questions

score hidden · 1 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

It's very hard to get turned down by a partner, so make sure you don't do that.

More to /u/AccountHoppingBunny - in my marriage I have found the old adage to be true: The greater the risk, the greater the reward.

Some people like to "ease into" initiating sex. They start very gradually and escalate. This is safe. If you hit a stopping point, you have all kinds of rationalizations as to why it didn't work, and you really didn't put yourself very far out there, so it's not like he's rejecting you ... he's just rejecting the little bit of effort you threw out. In your mind you think, I still have a lot more to offer. I could get him if I wanted, and that belief makes you feel safe.

But at some point, if you don't just put yourself fully on the table (sometimes literally), your mini-failures might breed enough resentment and insecurity that your "all-in" cards absolutely have to stay hidden to protect your last vestige of dignity and self-esteem. As a result, you're never willing to try something big.

Seriously, though ... work out hard and diet for a few weeks to do some short-term toning (after 2 weeks hard, it will always be noticeable), then put on some lingerie, light some candles, get some mood music set up, if you have kids, send them to grandma's for the night (even if you have to pay her and it doesn't make sense in your calendar), and maybe bring something fun into the bedroom that you can dangle when he walks in (handcuffs, whipped cream, etc.).

For some people, they have been rejected so many times that this thought absolutely terrifies them. "If he rejects me then, I'll have nothing left. I will have literally given it my all - and then I will know that it's not just the timing or the mood, it's ME that he's rejecting." That's a huge risk. But if it pays off (and it usually will), then the pay-off is big. First, you get a great night. Second, he sees that you have more to offer than what he previously knew (i.e. the $125 shoes from my other comment, rather than the discount wares), so he's interested again. Third, you'll feel sexier and be more motivated in the future. Fourth, you will be reaffirmed in the relationship that you really do have what it takes to please him, so your relationship will deepen rather than growing into fear and resentment.

Simple Questions

score hidden · 1 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Sounds like you've definitely got him interested. That's good! Keep upping your game (but not beyond sustainability) and he'll keep coming after you. My suggestion is not to put out until you're married, for a variety of reasons ... but suffice it to say that if you make yourself so desirable that he'll stick with you without sex until marriage (and you can keep that desire going into marriage rather than letting yourself go), you're going to be one happy wife when sex is on the table and he finally gets to unleash the pent-up desire he has for you, and that's going to make it easier for you to keep upping your sexiness game.

This is the positive-cycle that counters the negative-cycle that most people get stuck in, where sexlessness breeds resentment breeds less sex breeds more resentment, etc. The negative cycle starts when sex becomes commonplace and boring because you make it too cheap or routine (see my other comment in this thread to /u/AccountHoppingBunny).

If it doesn't get to marriage, at least you haven't upped your n-count for no reason.

Simple Questions

score hidden · 1 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

- Same = same
- more of the same = more of the same.

- Changed strategy = changed results.

You want changed results, so you need to change your strategy for getting the kind of passion you want. So, what you're really asking is what new strategies are likely to give you better results than you have now rather than worse results.

To be perfectly honest, if you think something's going to help, you probably know him well enough to be right. I just wrote this comment on another thread, which might be helpful. The general concept is that after some time in a relationship, the typical affection and intimacy becomes "cheap." You know you can get it anytime you want, so it doesn't hold high value anymore, whereas early in the relationship you had to work for it, so you desired it more.

So, when he's around you he probably feels like he's strolling through "Discount Clothes - All Wears 90% Off Store Wide!" It's comfortable and easy, so we shop at cheap places like this. But when he sees an amazing blazer in the latest GQ magazine, he thinks, "Man, I really wish I had something like that" and he just might start working harder to get that new blazer.

Simply put, don't be the "going out of business sale" girl - stock your shelves with some of that high quality product. He might not even know you've that stuff in the back room because he hasn't seen it on the shelves, so he's never bothered to ask. He assumes all of your wares are consistent with what he's seen so far.

Here's the key, though. Once you give him the high-quality product (i.e. buy some new lingerie, surprise him with a candlelit bedroom, have some whipped cream by the bed, etc.) - after 2-3 times, stop giving it to him until he works for it. If everyone drove a BMW, nobody would care about BMWs. If his entire closet was full of that blazer, he wouldn't value that blazer anymore. He'd know instinctively that he had a lot of high quality blazers in his closet and that he has better clothes than most other men ... but he will not personally value it because he doesn't have to work for it anymore, nor is it a symbol of his hard work. It's commonplace.

Now, if he's consistently putting in the effort to rekindle things, then you should be consistently returning the favor. After all, you don't want to make him think he's throwing money at a store and getting a defective blazer with loose strings and a button falling off. But my guess is that when he starts putting in the effort, you're going to enjoy it and be into it too, so that shouldn't be much of a problem.

Simple Questions

score hidden · 1 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

isn't actively looking for a relationship but that he can change his mind as we connect ... (No sex)

Educated guess: he's dangling commitment the same way you're dangling sex - it's an elusive goal that you don't intend to give until the other person goes first. Win that battle or he'll be gone in time ... but if you don't make him want your carrot bad enough (and keep wanting it even after marriage), he might be gone anyway when someone with an easier-to-get carrot comes along. It's a tough game, indeed.