Results? Women were MORE stimulated by physical imagery than the men were. However, they were also only sexually stimulated by the most physically attractive men (i.e. fat men touching themselves did nothing; a guy with a 6-pack did).

Want to know something even more fascinating? As confirmed by both studies: Even the heterosexual women had larger arousal spikes looking at other women than looking at men. That one still boggles my mind. For fairness sake, the most attractive men produced larger spikes than the most attractive women; but even the middle-ground women produced higher spikes than middle-ground men. Of course, that's not to say the heterosexual women are closet lesbians or that they would actually act on any arousal prompted by a woman; rather, it's to say (primarily) that women certainly are aroused through physical stimulation, but that their levels of stimulation by moderate or unattractive men is so low that it leaves the impression that they're not stimulated by physical appearance at all. Personally, I suspect hypergamy is at play here - that women know when a man is unattractive because she actively compares him to other men; but because of her heterosexuality she is not comparing women to other women, and thus is able to see and appreciate the attractiveness of even the average woman rather than discarding the average woman the way she does the average man (that's just my suspicion, though).

Character Traits

Another study attached monitors to people (I believe to assess heart-rate, breathing patterns, genital responsiveness, etc.) and placed them in small-group social situations. The circumstances varied. Sometimes it was a hot girl with two ugly guys. Others it was an average girl with an ugly and a hot guy. You get the point. The same people were placed in multiple different groups to chart data from a consistent source. The real goal of the study was not to measure arousal from visual stimulation; rather it was to rule out the impact of visual attractiveness so that they could gauge the impact of arousal from other traits. One guy wore an expensive watch and would talk about his high-end job and luxury car, whereas another would be a trained improv comedian, and another was well-versed as a poet, and so on.

Know what the results of that study were? NOTHING. That's right: it was a big, fat, pointless "inconclusive." Now, that doesn't sound very significant. But what it does show us is that even in a study uniquely designed to measure the impact of these peripheral characteristics on physical arousal, they could not prove that women were actually aroused by them the way they said they were, when physical appearance was removed from the equation.

2019 Meta Study

In 2019 a research group looked at 61 different studies that included brain imaging and concluded that "men and women don't differ much at all in the brain pathways that respond to sexually arousing visual stimuli." This was published in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences USA. Hamid Noori, head of the Neuronal Convergence research group in Germany commented that "the team found that being male or female contributes very little to which neural networks fire up in response to visual erotica."

Bergner and Chivers

Daniel Bergner has done a lot of research on the topic as well. One of his studies showed that women's eyes linger on erotic imagery just as much as men's do. In commenting on another researcher, he said, "Every one of Chivers' experiments shows an immediate physical response [by women] to erotic imagery, and that in itself is an indication that we've been missing something."

In another series of (self-reporting) studies, the first (and by far the oldest) involved a man and a woman asking 200 members of the opposite sex (1) for a date, and (2) for sex. Roughly the same % of men/women said yes to the date, but 75% of the men said yes to sex and 0% of the women did. However: another study was done where a hypothetical was presented instead of an actual person: an attractive celebrity is the one asking. Bergner notes: "What the researcher did was strip away the social stigma that's involved in casual sex and take away the reality of physical danger. And once those things were taken out of the equation, women said yes to casual sex just as often as men." Chivers did another study, changing the hypothetical to the trusted friend or stranger. The women self-reported being more turned on by the trusted friend, but their measured physiological responsiveness was significantly stronger in response to the hypothetical involving the stranger.

In short: the latest studies on the subject show no difference in the impact of visual stimuli on arousal between men and women. Moreover, women once again proved that their outward expression of what they feel they should be attracted to is inconsistent with their actual biological response.

Lastly: While not so much of a "study," visit /r/WhereAreAllTheGoodMen. The evidence is a never-ending stream of men swapping "notes" about real women and how they represent themselves in the online sexual marketplace.

Nuances

Let's be clear: these are just various studies performed to test isolated features. They don't account for every situation. A glaring one is that NONE of these accounted for the impact of a man employing kino on any of the women who participated in the study. That is, they only measured SPONTANEOUS arousal to the images, conversations, etc. My guess is that if men were allowed to initiate actual sexual contact with these women, we'd find the women getting far more sexually stimulated by things that wouldn't stimulate her innately.

What I'm getting at here is the difference between spontaneous and responsive sexuality. It's occasionally discussed that women are primarily sexually responsive - at least insofar as the average man is concerned. This is corroborated by the studies above, which show that the average man will not cause a spontaneous sexual arousal in her. But the most attractive men DO. Conclusion? She's sexually spontaneous for hot guys and only reactive for ... well ... you. So, average men who are not in the top 5% of physical appearance are going to have to rely on other attributes to stimulate sexual arousal with a woman. This is where things like confidence and frame come in. Yes, they are attractive in themselves. But even more so: guys who master these concepts have no qualms initiating with a woman because they're not afraid of rejection. That initiation triggers women's sexual responsiveness, developing arousal where it otherwise wouldn't have spontaneously occurred, and therefore they get sex and the guys who are too chicken or butthurt to initiate with a woman get nothing, unable to generate spontaneous arousal and also refusing to provide initial stimulation for her to respond to.

What About the Other Stats?

There are too many other stats to address entirely, though the majority of them can be written-off as being based on self-reporting (which I've shown actually provides conflicting results, not counter-results). Some which rely on brain scans (Noori's, for example, if you research his 2004 and 2014 studies) have been explained as being extremely nuanced, giving significance to micro-variances that aren't reflected in larger scale reviews. One of Noori's own co-authors came out and acknowledged, "For the majority of the brain, the neural response was actually similar between men and women" and that the variances were only in "a few small structures."

The majority of the remaining data is statistical in nature, such as the claim that only 1/3 of porn users were female (instead of 50%), or the fact that Playgirl was ultimately a huge flop among women (primarily finding its success among homosexual men). These types of variances are easily understood when one accepts women's tendency to conform to cultural norms. That is, if women believe it's not normal or appropriate for women to watch porn or buy a Playgirl, they're going to be less likely to do this. It's not surprising, then, that the percentage of women relative to men who are engaged in these activities has been rising consistently with cultural approval of open female sexual expression. That is, culture may not approve of men using porn so much, but it accepts it as the reality; culture does approve of empowering women toward the use of pornography, but it's not yet embraced as normal, and therefore the majority of women haven't yet embraced it, but those who do are increasing as it becomes more normal.

CONCLUSIONS

1. Lift. If sex is important to you, your physical appearance is important to you. That's not to say this should be your primary reason for lifting, but better sex and hotter women sure does provide some nice support to your pre-existing internal motivation (you do have that, right?).
2. Don't discount the importance of physical appearance to female sexuality, so go lift some more.
3. If you want your wife to initiate with you (i.e. become spontaneously sexual), do things that highlight your top-quality physical appearance in a sexually suggestive way. This could be the clothes you pick out for the day, knowing when to take your shirt off and when to keep it on, your physical presence around the house, not being afraid to move your body (dance, swagger, etc.) while you're getting stuff done, etc.
4. If you're not a top-tier looker, stop expecting her to be spontaneously sexual toward you and start driving home your married-man game: confidence, frame, kino, teasing, etc. Give her something to respond to. Hike up those feels.

5. If you wallow up in self-pity over how ugly you are, and therefore think you'll never have a happy sex life because you'll never be visually appealing to a woman, just remember: some of the best PUAs are slightly overweight, short, and in one case, even legitimately on the autism spectrum. This is not a post meant to enable those who take a "woe is me" reaction. It's to give you a hard dose of reality about the sexual marketplace, why your marriage may not be going the way you want, and why it's so doggone important to lift.

NOTE: No, I don't still have my college psychology textbook - though for this purpose I do wish I'd saved it, as I've referenced a few of those studies a number of times before. The Tinder/OKCupid stuff is easy to look up, as well as a few of the others. r/WhereAreAllTheGoodMen is, of course, a never-ending supply of evidence from the online dating world that shows just how looks-oriented women are.

There still seems to be some confusion about this subject, so let me break it down for you.

OVERARCHING GOAL

This is the broadest level of understanding your purpose. When a nation takes action, its overall purposes are broad: to keep its citizens safe, develop economic success, and (on occasion) improve the world. God's overarching goal is that he be glorified (1 Cor. 10:31) by building a kingdom for himself (entire Bible). This is what he asked Adam and Eve to do when he commanded them to fill the earth with godly offspring (Genesis 1:28; Malachi 2:15) - it's what he did through Abraham (Genesis 12:2), and what he did through Jesus and the Church (Philippians 2:10-11; many of Jesus' teachings on the Kingdom of God), and it will be complete in heaven (Revelation 20).

MISSION

A mission is a sub-task that drives forward the overarching goal in some way. It is the broadest way that an individual person can understand their contribution to the overarching goal, and big/valuable missions will involve teamwork. This is like a General who orders one battalion to complete one mission on the battlefield, such as demolishing a communications array. It's not the only mission in play, but it's the only one that battalion should worry about. While God has many avenues for building his Kingdom, the Church has its standing orders: make disciples (Matthew 28:19-20). If you are part of the Church, this is your mission also.

When we talk about mission, we tend to over-personalize it and blend it with your calling and vision. Why? Because if it's not personal, you won't follow-through. Plus, it's too confusing to use three separate words all the time, so we lump them all under the general word "mission." But let's break it down for now so you can understand the additional components of your mission.

CALLING

Your calling is the context in which you will fulfill the mission. Once the battalion gets its orders, the leader has to decide how best to fulfill it. Suppose the order is to destroy an enemy communication base. He may say to Adam, "You're great with demolitions. You place and prepare the bomb." He may say to Bob, "You're great with transport. It's your job to get Adam to the communications array." He may say to Carl, "You need to lead a team of ground troops to protect Adam and Bob." Then he'll say to Dave through Zeek, "You're part of Carl's team." These are all individual callings within the scope of the mission. The commander is the one who calls these people into their positions, but they also voluntarily chose based on their own skills and interests which areas they would specialize in, which makes it obvious to the commander what call to make.

God says to some, "You're really good at teaching. I want you to find people among your students to disciple." To another, "You're excellent in the art of hospitality. I want you to invite people into your home to disciple them." And to another, "You're gifted in how merciful you are. Go find those experiencing tragedy and show them mercy, then disciple them." These are where Spiritual gifts come in. Your career can play into this too, but it doesn't have to - and too many men want to pretend their career should be a bigger part of the mission than it actually should be. Don't get too hung up on any one thing, unless you're pretty certain what your gifting and calling already are. If not, keep an open mind.

VISION

This is the specific of how you see yourself accomplishing the goal. Once Adam is given the task of blowing up the communications array, he's going to be processing, "What explosive will work best? How many do I need? Where should I place them? etc." Carl will be thinking, "I've got to protect that transport, so how do I position my men? Which gear should we take with us? Where do we anticipate the enemy to be positioned? Do we focus on defense or taking out their offense? If x situation happens or y, how will we respond?"

You ever see Boondock Saints? Fantastic movie. Remember how Willem Defoe would close his eyes, turn on some music and see what must have happened at the crime scene? He could envision the past. Your vision is of what WILL happen in the future - in your own life (God-willing).

This is why a generic goal to "change the world" or "make disciples," in itself, is worthless. You'll note around here that even when a guy tells me his mission is to make disciples, I usually follow up - "Great. How are you going to do that?" Yes, your vision will fluctuate over time. Your interests will change. Circumstances will cause you to have to pivot. That's okay. Just make sure you're actually envisioning something you can follow through with and not setting out some generic goal that will get posted on your wall and 10 years go by before you think, "Oh yeah, I should probably get around to that."

MY APPLICATION

I'm not saying you have to adopt my understanding of these concepts. I'm just giving this as an example of how I've processed all of this information for my own life:

Overarching Goal: Glorify God by building a Kingdom for him.

Mission: Advancing the Gospel into the nations through spiritual generations flowing from my life, training those future generations to live and disciple among the lost as I model for them.

Calling: I have been given specific spiritual gifts in the areas of teaching and apostleship, and have become skilled in the areas of intelligence and developing/executing a broader framework for accomplishing God's purposes.

Vision: To build a network of discipler-making ministries throughout the world. Long-term mile-marker: 60 countries, 60 discipler-making ministries, by 60 years old. No, this is not a legalistic end for me. Yes, it's a high bar to keep me active - even if I miss it, I will have succeeded significantly.

Mile-Markers Within My Vision

- 2020 - Disciple 3 guys: 1 overseas, 1 from my home congregation, 1 other. Myself and my wife to build a relationship with my local congregation leader and his wife/kids. Lead a small group session.
- 2021 - Discipling 3 guys, as above. My family has a role of influence in my local congregation. My wife and I lead a small group session.
- 2022 - Discipling 3 guys: 1 overseas, 2 from my local congregation. Start a discipler-making team within my congregation. My wife and I lead a small group session. My wife begins discipling another woman.
- 2023-24 - Discipling 3 guys, as above. Establish a second discipler-making team led by someone in the first group (not me); I disciple him. Wife and I lead a small group session. My wife discipless another woman.
- 2025-34 - Discipling 3 guys: 2 overseas, 1 local. Begin developing interest in other congregations with what I'm doing in my home congregation. Wife and I lead small groups. My wife becomes seen as a valuable consultant for women's ministry.
- 2035-44 - Discipling 3 guys: 1 overseas, 1 locally, 1 ministry leader. Retire into full-time ministry. 1 home congregation; actively training other congregations. Wife and I actively training small group leaders. Wife seen as valuable consultant for women's ministry.
- 2045-54 - Same as above, except actively training full-time missionaries
- 2055-74 - Same as above, except all 3 guys I disciple should be ministry leaders

That's my "life mission" category. My spreadsheet breaks down other categories the same way: fitness, finances, career, family, hobbies, friends. All of this is, of course, "God willing." I don't know what will happen tomorrow. These views can change - but NOT due to laziness. They change when they become physical impracticable or inferior to a superior alternative that arises.

You'll notice in all of this: reddit is not included. What I do here is a hobby that has become a convenience to finding guys I disciple. It is inferior to the things I do IRL. I never want this to become my primary ministry. I encourage you all to take a similar view. But that doesn't mean I will neglect you, if I otherwise have time.

You'll also notice that I include my wife in my mission. I'd suggest she's even a vital part of it. If she doesn't cooperate, I can pivot my vision and proceed without her. But you can see that her contribution will be a great asset to accomplishing the goals I have set - being goals I hope and expect were influenced by God's Spirit. I encourage everyone here to contemplate if you view your wife as a HELPER TO YOUR MISSION, or if she's just the helper around the house so you can go do your mission alone.

If the latter, why do you have a house and family in the first place? It's circular to say, "I want a wife so I can have a family," and then when you have the family you say, "That's why I needed a wife." This is a fast-track to having a disgruntled spouse. You think Indiana Jones' girl would be content to sit around the house changing diapers and doing dishes while he quests for the Ark? Of course not. Yes, she can change diapers - but she also wants to know that she has a vital role to play in what he's doing. Give her that role. Let her be your helper and not just your fan.

YOUR ACTUAL MISSION

If you find yourself setting a mission, but doing relatively little to accomplish it, then IT'S NOT YOUR MISSION. Your mission is based on your CONDUCT, not your words. Look at what you're DOing with your life, not what you SAY you'll do with your life.

With that in mind, if you say your mission is to "make disciples" (as a lot of people have finally caught on to here), but your day-to-day life is full of going to work, fixing up your house, eating dinner, doing something with your kids, then going to bed ... then your mission isn't to make disciples. It's to live the "American dream." Because that's exactly what you're striving for.

So, before you start getting hyped up about your mission statement, take a look back at the last 4 weeks of your life and ask: Am I actually making disciples or am I pursuing the American dream with how I spend my time? Yes, it's possible to do both. But more often, one comes at the exclusion of the other. You cannot serve two masters.

In this situation, it's usually your vision that's lacking. You don't see how you can work toward making disciples today, much less tomorrow, or 5 years from now. You just assume it will happen. It won't.

BUT I CAN'T BECAUSE ... REASONS

There's a reason I told you to look back at the last 4 weeks, in particular. Too many people want to give "social distancing" as their excuse for not making progress. There are no excuses. Do you think that battalion trying to destroy the communications array would suddenly postpone their mission indefinitely because the enemy doubled their guard around the entrance they intended to take? No. They'd find another way. There are no excuses.

The mission is critical. The time is now. The lost don't have eternity to figure this out. Do you really love them? Forget your excuses. There are no good excuses. If you're alive, you're to make disciples. Your vision for how that will happen might change because of whatever "reasons" you think are out there. But the mission remains.

Paul was very clear in Phippians 1 - "I desire to depart and be with Christ, which is better by far." That is, he would personally be better off dead and in heaven. "But it is more necessary for you that I remain in the body."

Translation: The only reason he's still alive is because he has people to train up. "Convinced of this, I'm certain I will remain and will continue with all of you for your progress and joy in the faith." Are you helping anyone progress in the faith? If not, what's your "reason"? That's right. You don't have one. I don't want to hear it. Now go.

Is compatibility essential (or even useful!) in a marriage? No, not really.

26 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

This is a fantastic question recently raised - and one I'm surprised hasn't been brought up in any substance before. Let's look at what the Bible says and follow that up with some common sense that our modern culture has over-thunk itself out of.

BIBLICAL PRECEDENT

Everyone should have 2 Cor. 6:14 memorized by now, it's quoted so often here: "Do not be yoked together with unbelievers." But have you kept reading? *"For what do righteousness and wickedness have in common? Or what fellowship can light have with darkness? What harmony is there between Christ and Belial? Or what does a believer have in common with an unbeliever? What agreement is there between the temple of God and idols?" In short, when it comes to saved v. unsaved, the two are so drastically incompatible that compatibility actually matters.

Okay, beyond salvation, how important does God view the issue of compatibility? Let's start with the history of marriage throughout Scripture and see where we go.

First, there's Adam and Eve. God creates Eve to be his helper. Eve is created in Eden to be a suitable helper for Adam. The imperative here is that any "compatibility" is for the designed purpose of fulfillment of the mission for which she was to help - not that they shared common interests. There wouldn't even have been any interests on the first day of creation to know to vet for in the first place. Moving on.

After that, the next story of substance we have of biblical couples finding marriage is Isaac and Rebekah. Abraham orders his servant to find a wife for Isaac in another town so Isaac doesn't have to marry one of the local Canaanites. He asked God that she at least be someone who would give a drink to a stranger and his camels. The first girl who came along (Rebekah) did just that. Was compatibility at issue here? The only "compatibility" requirement was that she not be a Canaanite - and even Isaac didn't have a say in that aspect, as that command came from Abraham.

The next one is Jacob, who fell in love with Rachel because of her beauty. He got a bad case of ONEitis. He had to marry Leah first, then he got to marry Rachel, then eventually each of their servants. There's no mention of actual compatibility with Rachel, other than the assumption that they stopped sleeping together (and that even before he married their servants). This is evident from her demand that Jacob "Give me children, or I'll die!" As in, "Why won't you sleep with me anymore?!?" Of course, Jacob gets angry with her because he really didn't want to and didn't believe it would help, so she says, "Fine, sleep with my servant instead." Yeah, this sounds like they were real compatible. He also was obviously not all that thrilled about marrying Leah either. By the time the servants came into the picture, I imagine Jacob was really just interested in having more women under his sheets, so he went along with it. Sure enough, despite the obviously tense situation in the whole household, God blesses the situation and gives Jacob 12 children who became the 12 named forefathers of the tribes of Israel. Compatibility didn't seem to be necessary for the fulfillment of God's blessings here.

Somewhere along the way comes Ruth and Boaz. He basically sees her out in the field and finds her attractive. She sees a good man who can provide for her and sleeps with him (presumably non-sexually). There's no mention of shared interests here, other than that he liked growing things and she liked taking from what other people were growing.

Then comes David. Michal seems to think he's a great catch, even though he was poor and couldn't pay a bride price. Instead of money, Saul asks for 100 Philistine foreskins, and David was interested in Michal enough that he got Saul 200 instead, presumably to prove his desire for Michal. One could assume they thought each other a compatible match (though that's stretching it), but it ultimately doesn't matter, as their marriage ends very poorly, with the presumption that David stopped sleeping with her to focus on other women. Cue Bathsheba - the girl _____

David hooked up with before murdering her husband to hide their adultery. This was a marriage of lust. While God condemned the act, he also blessed the marriage and had Solomon be born from her.

After him is Solomon. While he does share a lot of general wisdom, he also had hundreds of wives and concubines. It's hard to say if any of his marriages were particularly successful. At best, we can suggest that the lustful attraction to his beloved in Song of Solomon is honored. Yet again, there is little reference to compatibility.

There are also laws on the books that if a guy raped a woman or (with mutual consent) took her virginity, he was legally obligated to offer to marry her, at which point her father would decide if the marriage would go through. This would seem to be the opposite of compatibility, yet it's God's law to the Israelites all the same.

Generally, there's enough information throughout the books of the law to figure out that most of Israelite culture involved arranged marriages for familial convenience, not out of love or dating to assess compatibility between the bride and groom. At best, we could say that the only actual "compatibility" requirement was that While marriages are referenced in the New Testament, there's no information that any of them - Joseph/Mary, the wedding where Jesus turned water to wine, etc. - were based on compatibility, arranged marriage, etc.

Jesus and Paul both encourage people who can avoid marriage to do so (Matthew 19; 1 Cor. 7). Paul elaborates on this that the only time he actually encourages marriage is if the two can't keep their hands off each other and they'd "burn" if they don't get married (I've always found humorous u/BluePillProfessor's note of the possible double-entendre here, as the "with passion" part is an editorial addition). Paul didn't say to look for someone compatible to marry; he said to avoid looking for someone to marry, but if you're so horny toward each other, that's the best time to start thinking of marriage.

Conclusion: Other than the requirement that both people be of God's Kingdom, compatibility is never referenced as a thing to look for in a potential spouse or successful marriage. In fact, it's curiously absent in a number of marriages that God seemed to bless anyway.

COMMON SENSE

Define Compatibility

You can't. You can give dictionary definitions, but what it means in a pragmatic sense is left wide open. Let's look at the dictionary definition:

- "A state in which two things are able to exist or occur together without problems or conflict."

Sure, if you want to define "compatible" this way, then compatibility would be a useful asset in a marriage - though not necessarily to perfection. A little conflict is good. It breeds emotion, which keeps passion alive. Compatibility, in itself, is often boring. But let's look to the more practical consideration: How can you ever know if you're compatible with someone under this definition? You can't ... at least not until years after you're married. Because you can't know if you'll co-exist "without problems or conflict" until you actually co-exist (unless you move in together before marriage, which is best left for another day).

Moving on from the dictionary definition, the common use of the word is even less useful. People say they're compatible if they have the same shared interests. Others think it means that you have personalities that, while different, blend well together. Others mean you have the same core values and aspirations in life. So, how important is compatibility? I can't even answer the question until I know which you're talking about. But even then, the answer is most likely going to be simple: It's as important as you want to make it. Personally, I don't think it's important at all. Why not?

Back to the Bible

For a brief interlude, let's look back at Genesis. God creates Eve out of Adam to be a helper for him. That is, God designs Adam for a God-given purpose; and then he designs Eve for an Adam-given purpose ... which, of course, is her God-given purpose, vicariously and directly - (1) vicariously in that God gave Adam his purpose that she's to help on; and (2) God also directly gave her the purpose of helping her husband. Long story short, a successful marriage is defined not by the levels of the happiness of the couple, but by their utility toward the purposes for which God united them in marriage (which is to make disciples - Malachi 2:15, etc.). Because of this, God designed women to mold to their man's purposes. This is why we often see that many women (yes, I'm over-generalizing in modern culture) tend to struggle to have hobbies of their own, but quickly adopt the hobbies of their husbands, either as direct participants or as sidelined cheerleaders. It's why literal cheerleaders exist in the first place, for that matter ... at least until some feminist somewhere decided it needed to be about female empowerment and competition rather than supporting their men on the field, or even their community pride.

The point is: if God designed women with an innate desire to mold their life direction and interests to the men they find most attractive (which is one of their tools for keeping an attractive guy around), then it doesn't really matter whether you have:

- ... shared interests, because those interests will conform to the man they want to be with. That's not to say women won't maintain independent interests. They will. But, on the whole, they are excited to adopt their man's interests also, if they find the man attractive and they want to be with him. The only broad-scope reason a woman wouldn't want to engage in her man's interests with him is if her attraction level toward him is lower than her interest in the activity he wants to do. Either he's unattractive, and therefore she's not motivated to do much of anything with him; or he's attractive, but the activity is so repugnant to her that she's still not interested ... though Deep's Brad Pitt post shows that even this is still all part of sliding scale and would be flexible if he was hyper-attractive.
- ... well-balanced personality traits, because as someone designed to be a helper, God created her to be able to fill in the gaps where her husband needs them. No, this isn't executed naturally in every marriage. But it is played out wonderfully in every biblical marriage. I have yet to meet a godly couple where the wife would not be gleeful to share all the ways that she helps cover the things that her husband doesn't have time, attention, or awareness to address - and a man who isn't ultimately glad that she does this.
- ... core values and aspirations in life, because the wife's God-given purpose is to pursue the mission God gave him, therefore becoming God's mission for her. To say she wants to pursue her own values and aspirations separate from the ones he discerns from God to set for the marriage is to suggest that she knows better for her life than God knows for her. This, of course, is more difficult when you have someone whose values and aspirations are not coming from God - but even 1 Peter 3 says she should submit to such a man's leadership (which I've already written on before, and won't do so again here).

People Change

Of course, the real common sense reason for ignoring "compatibility" is that people change. You can't ever predict what someone will be like in 10 years in the absence of you molding them during those 10 years. And if you're the one molding them, then who they are today is a lot less significant than who you're going to help them become tomorrow. This is, after all, the essence of discipleship and why Jesus was willing to die, even while he knew we were still sinners (Romans 5:8). Can you imagine if Jesus used "compatibility" as a standard before making us any part of his bride? - other than that Jesus was of the faith of Abraham, and therefore of "spiritual Israel" just as the Church also is (per Romans 9), and therefore the ONE area of necessary compatibility is satisfied.

I love my brother's comment shortly after he got engaged: "I wish I knew in high school how unimportant liking the same music was in a relationship." He literally only dated girls who liked the same bands as him. Idiot. My wife also once commented that when she was a kid she thought, "How are my aunt and uncle ever going to be happy in marriage? One is a [sports team 1] fan and the other is a [team 2] fan! How did they ever get married?"

See how juvenile those thoughts are? Yet the world still thinks this is true - that if you don't like the same things it will never work. It's laughable.

Working the Change

As a brief note, make sure you're actually giving her something to change into. Women WILL change no matter what you do. Period. It's a fact of life. Some basic aspects of their character may stay the same, but at the end of the day, they all have Next-Thing-itis, and that "Next-Thing" is what will keep them changing and always evolving. This isn't a bad thing - it can often even be a good thing! But it's a consistent thing, nonetheless.

With that in mind, if you're already "compatible" in the sense of being perfectly aligned with each other, there are only two ways this can go:

1. She's going to change away to be less compatible with you, or
2. You're going to keep changing to give her something to keep changing toward as well.

In the first instance - the one where you're not going to change, as a man - you're better off finding someone you're NOT compatible with, as that will at least buy you some time with the chance that her inevitable changing will eventually mold to who you are today. But this is only postponing the inevitable, even for the most attractive men.

In the second instance - the one where you're constantly changing as a man - you're either (1) changing for the worse and she's going to want to deviate away anyway ... because who wants to mold into the likeness of a rapidly deteriorating person? or (2) you're constantly improving yourself and giving her something to try to improve toward as well.

Which option do you prefer?

Two notes:

- First, obviously this is ultimately a post about discipleship. Disciple your wife! Single guys, be prepared to disciple the girl who catches your eye! Stop looking for a "perfectly compatible unicorn" and expect to have to disciple her.
- Second, also obviously: just because you shouldn't look for/expect compatibility doesn't mean you can ignore red flags. Having standards is necessary and appropriate.

Edit to Add: My wife and I are about the most incompatible couple I'm aware of. I've shared my story before about how she admitted years into our marriage that she lied about many facets of her personality and interests in order to get me to marry her, making us far less compatible than I had thought. I also started studying M-B typology late into our marriage and discovered that an ENTP (me) married to an ISFJ (her) not only has no personality trait in common - many message boards were saying (including from licensed marriage counselors) it was the worst possible combination for marriage in existence, often suggesting people to divorce and run away before you get too far down the rabbit hole to turn back. I believed these things would be problems and challenges for us for a long time - and, in fact, they were (when I wasn't focusing on taking care of myself and working my mission). Once I got myself pointed in the right direction:

- My wife, while being a 98% I is actually the one who coordinates play dates with other moms, invites people over for dinner, connects people in the neighborhood, etc. - all very E traits.
- While being a 58% S, instead of focusing on the details all the time, she's learned to look for patterns and threads between concepts, keep an eye out for the bigger picture, and plan events and activities from a bird's eye view rather than getting muddled down into the details too early - all very N traits.

- While being a 92% F, she now opens difficult conversations with rational arguments rather than emotional whining and complaining, and when she finds herself getting flustered throughout the day she can stop and remind herself of good things that are going on in life as well to direct her feelings through rational thought rather than the other way around - very T traits.
- As a 76% J, she still loves being organized and planning things in detail before getting started, or following the recipe exactly when cooking; yet she also recognizes that she EVEN MORE loves it when I throw all her planning out the window and spontaneously come up with better, more fun things to do or ways of doing things she had already planned to do - a bold embrace of the P.

No, M-B typology is not the focus here. My focus is that even a woman's core personality traits will ultimately mold to her man's - if not to adopt them completely herself, then at least to appreciate them and embrace them as her way of doing things too. To everyone who says an ENTP and ISFJ are incompatible and should never be married - now I just laugh because why did I ever think blue pill marriage counselors would ever have good advice in the first place?

Refreshing words and an encouragement to start conversations

28 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

Many of you know my passion for uprooting the churchianity structure we have today. I don't believe it is in any way compatible with the mission of the Church that Jesus gave us. Maybe it's better to say that it COULD be, but that we have dug ourselves in so deep a rut, that rather than shoveling the rut to move in a new direction, we're better off just getting out of it entirely. As long as the existing structure is maintained, people will expect the same activity and results that structure has always put out and will never be willing to put in the work to get a more Christ-like foundation for activity and the biblically promised results of 30, 60, or even 100 times what was sown.

Instead, my view is that discipler-making must exist independent of the congregational structure's authority, just as Jesus generally ignored the authority of the religious structures of his day, constantly rebuking the Pharisees rather than focusing all of his efforts on trying to change them. Instead, he largely ignored the religious leaders and focused his greatest efforts on commoners, like the 12. This grass-roots momentum Jesus modeled is ultimately how I believe we will bring Jesus's model back to the Church (capital C) today. That's not to say we can't utilize the work congregations have already done in pooling people together for us - and because of this I will continue to be a part of one. But my goal will always be to make disciples of the people, not to adapt the congregation itself.

Nevertheless, some moments, like this past Sunday, still give me some hope - and I believe the present time of the coronavirus lockdown gives a unique opportunity to initiate a change where one would have been impossible of the previous inertia of congregations had been permitted to continue. Specifically, I've texted off and on with my pastor about the difference between pursuing the MISSION of the Church rather than the growth of congregations. In his most recent (online) sermon, he seems to have caught on:

- "I personally empathize with the pain, the grief, the frustration, the anger that this season has brought - including myself. But I'm not convinced that 'normal' was working."
- "I think there is within this time the opportunity for us to lean into the creation of a new normal. I don't know how or what will change on the other side of this season, but I do know this: that I want to change in the midst of this season so I come out on the other side better, stronger, and more equipped."
- "I do know that right now ... that I'm a better dad than I've ever been. I'm a better husband right now than I've ever been. My wife would probably agree ... I'm a better friend ... a better pastor."
- "I'm thinking more about the mission of the church and less about the expansion of the church ... less about how we just keep on keeping on."

Fantastic. This isn't the first time he's directly referenced our conversations in his messages. I expect it won't be the last. But I'm more encouraged at the imperative toward change and improvement and ultimately the drive to place the mission over the structure. Baby steps for now. I can see the full-on sprint coming alongside the last few pastors I'd red-pilled (we've only barely touched on the feminization of the church, so there's still a long way to go).

Also on Point - Here's something else I'd written earlier in the lockdown season (addressed to a different, non-red-pilled audience), which adds to the point.

Many congregations are struggling to decide: "Do we keep meeting or not?" No, I'm not going to answer that question. Instead, I suggest it's the wrong question in the first place.

I'm disheartened to read on Facebook, Reddit, blog articles, hear on the news or from friends, etc. that as soon as Sunday services were shut down, the mainstream church's entire disposition ever since was focused on one operative question: "How can we get our Sunday services back!?!?" as if this is somehow the most important thing the church should be figuring out right now.

Some outright disregard social distancing and continue to meet in-person anyway - either in large groups or small ones. Others are doing drive-in services. Another sect honors social distancing and has found virtual ways of recreating Sunday services either through live simulcasts, pre-recorded messages, or video conferencing. Regardless of their disposition toward social distancing, the universal imperative seems obvious: "We need our Sunday services back!"

This would be fine if Jesus had ascended and said, "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me. Therefore, go and get all nations to attend Sunday services." If I'm missing that verse somewhere, help me find it! (No, Hebrews 10:25 isn't a reference to attending a weekly service.)

The way mainstream congregations idolize the Sunday service structure is truly saddening to me.

Don't get me wrong. It's a FANTASTIC tool/resource. I encourage everyone to make use of weekly services whenever possible (in more ways than you may realize!). But the services themselves are still just that: a tool - and one that's not even being utilized as efficiently as it could be, in many cases. These services are not the operative mission of the Church (capital C).

Plumbers have a fascinating, highly useful pipe cutting tool. You ever see one? They're really handy. I couldn't imagine how hard it would be as a plumber if they didn't have one. It's really quite necessary to many jobs (though not all). But can you imagine if a plumber loved this tool so much that it's all he ever talked about? Every job, he'd find a way to use it. Instead of that wrench to turn the nut, he pulls out that pipe cutter and starts toying around. He won't get very far, but he's okay with that as long as he gets to use his tool.

Of course, when the client complains about his kitchen flooding because the plumber cut a pipe that didn't need to be cut, he just say, "Oh, you're just mad because you don't understand how awesome this pipe cutting tool is. If you had one yourself and worshiped it the way I do, you'd realize that it's so great you won't care that your kitchen is flooding." Such a plumber might even get to the point of forgetting that wrenches actually exist! Or maybe he'll remember, but they're so side-lined in his mind compared to that pipe cutter that he views wrenches as archaic tools relative to what plumbers should REALLY be doing today. So, we don't need wrenches anymore.

You all know that my life's passion is making disciples. Actually, I got it from Jesus. It's really his passion. It's what he spent the bulk of his active years doing. It's what he commissioned the apostles to do. It's what the Holy Spirit has assisted the church in doing since the beginning. The Sunday service structure is a FANTASTIC resource for assisting in the disciple-making process. But it DOES NOT make disciples in itself. In fact, the current model we use for Sunday services didn't even exist for the first few hundred years after Jesus rose. I can't wait until we can resume services under more normal conditions, but the lack of services will have NO NEGATIVE IMPACT on my active daily ministry for Christ.

Let me rephrase that: I love weekly services, but I don't need them; I can serve Christ as completely without them as I can with them.

When COVID-19 caused the world to shut-down, my initial sincere hope was: "Finally! Congregations will have to rediscover the mission of making disciples rather than the mission of filling pews. Pastors will have to take a hard look at ecclesiology and rediscover God's mission for the church and figure out how to live it out in this new context now that they are forced to set aside their comfortable patterns."

I was wrong. All I have heard across the nation is a resounding: "We want our Sunday services back!" and congregation leaders are going to great lengths to find creative ways to make this happen. This is nothing short of idolizing the tool over the mission and the one who gave it to us.

Seriously: I don't see nearly as much emphasis from the service-attending community right now on spreading the Gospel as I do on Sunday services - whether in the form of complaining that they can't be in person, or in talk about how great it is that their congregation has found an innovative way to recreate it while honoring social distancing. Even before social distancing, I was already writing articles on my observation that I am hearing Sunday service attenders cry out "I love my church!" more than "I love Jesus!" This is bizarre and is turning CHRISTianity into CHURCHianity. Be extremely cautious that you don't tread in this direction.

If I'm right, what do we do with this? I encourage everyone to the following:

1. Study up on the way Jesus disciplined his 12, which didn't revolve around weekly gatherings. Emulate with others in your life the way Jesus oriented his time with his 12. If you need resources for figuring out how to do this, let me know and I can point you to some things that have been helpful to me.
2. In furtherance of #1, use the time that you're unable to meet corporately to start building individual relationships (with both believers and non-believers; whether from your congregation or not) in ways that you wouldn't have before - and also with people you wouldn't have before. Let these relationships start the foundation of something that can turn into an evangelistic or discipleship relationship as it grows. I find that most people today are excited to receive contact from others, but are too insecure to initiate it. Be the one to initiate it!
3. Continue to practice your convictions regarding social distancing. Adjust your evangelistic and disciple-making efforts to account for these convictions. Wave to your neighbors. Text the co-workers you aren't getting to see anymore. Play online board games, escape rooms, etc. with your friends. Synchronize a movie and watch it over the phone (video chat if you can!). There are lots of cool ways to connect with people still, and the sudden, drastic change in life context CREATES context to make it easier and more natural for you to initiate with others in ways you haven't done before, without it being weird or uncomfortable.
4. Continue to take advantages of the opportunities provided by your congregation leaders, as I intend to continue doing myself. Again, the point here is not to boycott these opportunities, but to understand their proper role and value in light of the church's actual mission. Use a wrench when you need a wrench, and use a pipe cutter when you need a pipe cutter (and no: a Swiss-army pipe cutter that has a wrench attachment to it is not going to be as effective as using an actual wrench). That's really all I'm saying.
5. Ask for help when you need it.

47

UPVOTES

r/RPCWomen is now active.

21 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

Welcome post is here: https://www.reddit.com/r/RPCWomen/comments/gnpbgh/welcome_to_rpc_women/

Ladies (and men who want to engage too), enjoy the conversations you all create at r/RPCWomen.

No, the mods here are not interested in taking primary responsibility for creating content there.

Yes, we're fine with having women join on as mods. It should be understood that the primary audience of this sub is women, even though men may participate from time to time. It should address many topics raised by passages like Titus 2, 1 Peter 3, Proverbs 31 - either from a theological level (if you're comfortable with that) or a more pragmatic, "Here's what's worked for me" angle.

Have fun.

Differences between red/blue for men and women (Drafted for RPCW)

21 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

This was written for the newly created r/RPCWomen sub, but if you want to take a read here instead, here you go.

Why listen to a man on a woman's sub?

TRP/MRP/RPC all note that women are generally not fluent enough with their own desires and what will make them long-term happy to provide reliable advice for men to follow. I agree. Heck, my own wife just told me 2 weeks ago, "I realize that if you became everything I want you to be, I'd be miserable and depressed. I think I know what I want, but I really don't. Somehow you've figured that out better than I have."

But the reverse doesn't necessarily apply. Women operate within relationships (not necessarily every area of life) primarily on feelings, which are fickle and not always consistent with what their biology responds to. An unattractive man can make them feel good, whereas an attractive man can make them feel like trash - yet they'll still want sex with the attractive guy more than the unattractive one anyway. When women give advice to men, it's usually in the context of what they think they SHOULD want in a man, not their ACTUAL desires (like a 6-pack) for fear of coming off shallow. Heaven forbid a woman in churchianity culture come off as shallow!

Men, however, often base advice not on fickle feelings or what we think should be true, but on observation and conclusions. Most competent men who haven't been completely feminized will have no problem explaining plainly to a woman: "Look around. Guys go for the hottest girls. You want a good guy? Become a hot girl." This isn't necessarily coming from our own internal experience. Even blue pill guys will recognize this - and then still think they're somehow better than "those macho guys" for it.

My point is: while I do encourage men to be skeptical of advice from women (not that we altogether discount it, but that we give it extra caution and testing), the same doesn't necessarily apply in the reverse. Now, onto the show ...

The Nature of Women: Hypergamy

If the red pill is knowledge/understanding of truth, the behaviors Anna references are the byproduct of one who operates within/without that knowledge. Most of the red pill for men revolves around understanding the female dual mating strategy (i.e. AFBB, "strategic pluralism"). When a man fails to understand this aspect of women, he is blue pill and his behaviors with women reflect this. He believes the falsity presented by culture that women truly love the BB who pedestalizes her and that if he is BB enough and gives her more and more of his power and authority, she will be sexually attracted toward him for it too. Similarly, it is his ignorance of the entire equation (AFBB) and how relationships should function that causes him to ignore other strategies toward achieving his sexual goals.

Along those lines, a woman who is ignorant of her sinful application of AFBB tendencies (i.e. who lacks "red pill awareness") will behave in a manner consistent with what culture tells her is acceptable and appropriate. It will encompass all of the entitlement dynamics Anna was referencing. When she becomes "red pill aware" in the sense that she discovers why her marriage is so unhappy (because she's not living in her God-given role as a helper to her husband), she begins to change, learning to suppress her cultural conditioning toward dominance over her husband and replaces it with conditioning from the Holy Spirit toward more godly qualities for women to express in marriage.

The Intergender Aspect

To be clear, there are two components to this: AF is the sexual nature of women, whereas BB is the relational nature of women. For men, understanding women is the operative impetus to get us to grasp where we're going wrong. For women, the same applies in reverse, so the red/blue dynamic is less about whether she understands her own sexual/relational nature and more about whether she understands that of the men she wants to be with in order to accomplish her goals.

In this, the red pill is often described as being a study of "intergender sexual dynamics." The "intergender" part of that means both genders are involved. It's not merely a study of female strategies, but of the male position as well. For the men, this means not only understanding women, but also their own nature and to improve upon it. Similarly, a red pill woman understands her own nature and seeks to improve upon her femininity, whereas a blue pill woman does not - yet she will also seek to understand the male nature and allow that understanding to affect how she goes about achieving her goals.

The Sexual Nature of Men: Polygamy

The red pill for men often revolves around getting sex, as that is one of our primary drives in life. Because of this, men often talk about the red pill in terms of sexual strategy. If we keep that limitation in place, then the red/blue pill for women would depend on how aware they are of male sexual strategy and how that affects their behaviors.

In that regard, there's a lot less discussion on female sexual strategy because single women don't really need it. Even a relatively unattractive woman could walk into a bar, take off her panties and announce, "Who wants to get lucky tonight?" and someone would answer. The issue is, he may not be the quality of man she wants, and he may not give her the commitment she wants. In this sense, a "female blue pill mentality" would involve a woman who believes she can get a grade-A man and keep him sexually aroused indefinitely without any work on improving herself because culture has trained her to believe that men should love her for "who she is" and that there's no reason for her to want to change.

Up-front, this may actually work for the first few lays. But in time, just as women are hypergamous, the polygamous nature of man will win out and he'll be focused on other women - even less attractive ones, which is mind-blowing to many wives out there who find their husbands cheating with someone who happens to be a step down. My dad was someone who did this, blowing up his marriage to my mom in order to pursue a relationship (that didn't end up working out) with someone who was far less attractive than my mom. That confused my mom to no end - but her blue pill ignorance let her be fooled about what would keep him sexually interested over the long-haul.

To be clear on that, she assumed my dad was hypergamous, projecting her own nature onto how she believed she would act, just as men do toward women in wanting them to be spontaneously sexual. Accordingly, she assumed he would only cheat with someone better. In her mind, he was overweight and childish, so she didn't think there was much of a chance that someone better than her would want him, thus she had no real risk of losing him. What she didn't count on is that men are not hypergamous; they are polygamous. He didn't want better. He wanted different. That mistaken understanding of the male sexual nature cost her her marriage.

The Relational Nature of Men

With all of the above in mind, just as hypergamy is both sexual and relational in its strategy, so is polygamy for men. Again, women don't need much sexual strategy to get a man in bed because men crave sex with women anyway. For men, even the most omega guys can get a girl to be in a relationship with him because women crave relationships. She just may not be sexually interested. Because of this dynamic, many of come to acknowledge the axiom that "women are the gatekeepers of sex, men are the gatekeepers of commitment."

What most women struggle with is getting commitment out of a man. Where's the ring? Will he stay faithful? Does he give me the time of day or do things by himself while avoiding me? These are the questions many women struggle with.

As such, if we ignore the "sexual strategy" definition of the red pill and focus on a more MRP-like angle, the blue pill for a woman is whether or not she understands the true nature of men to the extent of acquiring their commitment. Much of the answer is still found in the polygamous nature of men. That said, I'm out of time and it'd be more fun for you all to start discussing on your own what keeps a man around long-term.

If you're anything like pretty much everyone on the planet, your social life sucks. Why should you care? Because as much as you want to be your own man, you need other people to do pretty much anything you actually want to do in the world. In the drafting phase, I at one point split this out into a two-part post, but didn't feel like taking the time to separate it all out, and the content blends better when together, so here's the whole thing.

PART I: MENTALITY

No Man Is An Island

Most guys coming here need to learn independence. They're so heavily influenced by society that they need to pull away from everything the world and their wife tells them and develop their own kingdom that operates within their own frame. That's a beautiful thing. But it's unsustainable to go completely independent.

Let's be real: do you really want to live in the wilderness like Thoreau? Even Thoreau didn't live like "Thoreau." He made regular trips to town to visit family and friends. He didn't live in the woods, but in a cabin in a wide open field. He had visitors over and hosted an annual melon party. Nobody actually wants to live in isolation, yet many people's behaviors would indicate they do. Are your behaviors aligned with your goals? In the case of having a social life, for most people the answer is no.

The "Loneliness Epidemic"

I wrote a post about a year ago citing some stats from a survey by Cigna. The conclusion was that around half of the country admitted to sometimes or always feeling alone and having no meaningful relationships. Surprisingly, having kids doesn't decrease your susceptibility to the "loneliness epidemic." Not surprisingly, today's young adults are considered the loneliest people ever to live since we've been recording stats on the subject.

Interestingly, despite what our feminized society tells us about how women are so much better at being "social butterflies" than men, Psychology Today says otherwise:

"According to substantial research, women across all ages and lifestyles report higher levels of loneliness than men do. [Ironically:] Except, perhaps surprisingly, in one subset of people - single people. While married women inch out married men for the lonelier group, single men vastly outweigh single women as the lonelier bunch."

Sucks to be an omega. Notice the language here, though? Substantial research. All ages. All lifestyles. While the world will tell us that we should all build friendships like women (trust, communication, emotional connection, etc.), the reality is that it isn't working for them. At some point, you need to learn to build your social network like a man - and not the feminized betas and omegas who are ruining the gender curve. But we'll get to that later.

Why Does it Matter?

So you've worked on your stoicism and frame a bit. You don't feel lonely anymore. You're an introvert anyway, so why do you care about building social relationships? Because if you don't, you're still a loser. Let me break this down:

- Even the most introverted person needs some social contact. If you don't have friends outside the home, you're going to default to your wife and kids. This makes it easy to pedestalize them and become co-dependent on them as your only source of relational fulfillment in life.
- Dread is literally impossible if you never leave your house. Just as bad is when you do leave the house, but everyone knows you're not actually going to be chatting up a random hottie.
- Online forums can only take you so far. At some point, if you want to learn how to be a man you need to actually see what other men do. The movies don't cut it because you know it's scripted.
- Chances are, your mission in life involves other people. Financial goals? Unless you are forging your own currency, you can't manufacture money on your own, which means you have to get it from ... people. Athletic goals? You need someone to train you, a rival to best, peers to give you feedback, etc. Political goals? You have to have connections to get into office. Very few goals in life wouldn't benefit from an improved social game.

I could go on, but you get the idea.

So why aren't you?

Some people are dumb and needed to read all that, but for those with common sense, able to figure out with 10 seconds of thought why it's important to build a social game, you're still left with the cognitive dissonance: "Oh yeah, I guess it IS important, but I'm still not doing it. Why not?" There are lots of answers: fear, shame, apathy, laziness, mental health issues (that you probably don't even realize you have), etc.

But there are two answers that rise to the top: (1) You're incompetent. You just don't know how to make friends. I'll address this in the "Action" section, below, so no need to re-hash it here. (2) You Make Idiotic Assumptions. When I coach guys on building their social life, I ask lots of questions about why they're not already friends with someone in particular ... you know ... like ... women. Number 1 response? "They already have a circle of friends, and it's just hard to break in." I'll address the frame issue later. For now, let's realize that this is based on a series of bad assumptions.

- Assumption 1: The other person doesn't want more friends. This excuse only applies if someone has actually made a clear decision not to have anymore friends. I doubt anyone has actually done this, so they're on the table.
 - Assumption 2: The other person actually has friends. Yeah, you see them hanging around other people, but most social contexts are recurring acquaintanceships, not genuine friendships. Your neighbors and co-workers may call you their "friend," but do you really relate with them the same way you did your roommate in college? Probably not. And that's probably also the case for the person you want to connect with.
 - Assumption 3: The other person doesn't want YOU as their next friend. If you're making this assumption, you need to go back to the sidebar and learn (1) that you're the prize, or if you're not, (2) how to become the prize.
 - Assumption 4: It's hard to break in. It's not. More on that to come.
 - Assumption 5: That there's anything to "break in" on in the first place. Are they putting up invisible fences? Again, this is something of a frame issue, so let's go there.
-

Your Frame/Their Frame

When my wife looks to make new friends, she asks herself what she could do to cause them to want to include her. This is how women think. They're naturally compelled to want to be in the frame of someone they desire to associate with. But you're a man (I hope). You should be inviting everyone else into your frame. This means that your method of winning friends isn't to suck up to them. It's to be someone they pander to be around.

Church folk are an easy example of this dynamic. The typical strategy for "plugging in" is simple: believe what everyone else believes, suck up to those in authority and praise whatever they say. If you do this, you become part of the crowd and make lots of acquaintances. But nobody actually wants to spend time with you or become closer friends.

On the other hand, have you ever noticed that the popular people are the most critical? They gossip about the secrets they hear and make fun of those around them. This is true even in congregations. Why does everyone gravitate to them? Because they're alpha enough to say what the betas wish they had the balls to. These people are fun. They run against the grain. Their controversial nature gets them attention, and that attention wins them friends, but also makes them enemies. They live in their own frame and it's alluring to everyone around.

Of course, you can live in your own frame and not be a slanderous gossip. This is my approach. Instead of running my mouth about how much better than everyone else I think I am, I actually strive to be the best man I think I can be. People respect that. At some point, they realize they want what I have (even if I have to invite them to have it with me, to get them there). This is what draws the crowd. Once the crowd amasses, I can pick and choose who I want to build closer relationships with.

Relationships and Networking

Now, there's a reason I've been talking most of this time about building authentic relationships. Yes, acquaintances are useful. This is the goal of networking - to build a vast array of people you are loosely connected to in the hope that one of those connections will one day become handy. There is a value to having a vast plethora of people who know your name in the community. I had that in my old community, and I'm working toward rebuilding that after having relocated less than a year ago. Acquaintances make you look good in public, but their utility is limited. I have set aside "networking" as a viable model for long-term success as a man, whether in my career, my neighborhood, in my spiritual pursuits, etc.

When you network, nobody has a vested interest in what you're doing unless it mutually benefits them. Most relationships aren't immediately mutually beneficial. I may meet a businessman who could refer me a case someday, but chances are that he'll recognize me in the grocery store, but won't remember me when his neighbor needs an attorney. Why not? Because he doesn't have a relationship with me. He's only thinking about me when I reach out to him or when he's personally in need.

Instead, 99% of my clients by referral come from people I've spent substantial time with. We've gotten to know each other personally. We've sat down for a meal or talked a dozen or two times, even if only briefly. I know the names of their kids. We make it a point to meet up regularly. These people have you on their mind. My closest friends refer me 2-5 new cases each year, and my more casual friends give me 1-2 cases a year. Even when I'm not around, they're thinking of me when the context comes up. [Funny story: the 1% was a client who was referred to me by an opposing party who was so impressed with my cross-examination of her that she told her friend to go to me instead of her own attorney.]

Lee Rosen used to run the #1 blog on the internet for law practice management. He coached a number of businesses beyond just law firms. I spoke with him by phone once and he told me his singular secret to building a successful career. Can you guess what it was? "Build your relationships, not your networks. Nurture people to think about you when you're gone, not merely to notice you when you're there."

Now, realistically you can't have deep relationships with everyone. You have to balance networking and building relationships to get the best of both worlds. In reality, networking is the first phase of building relationships. So let's go there.

PART 2: ACTION

Building Your Network

I wrote a post a couple years ago titled Social Influence and Defying Context. Much of what I'd say here I've already said there, so no need to make this post longer than it already is. But let me clarify an easy way to build your social network.

- Say hi to new people. It's that simple. This is where it all starts. My favorites: on a jog, at the gym, in an elevator, grocery shopping, waiting in line. Just say hi. Even if you don't say anything after that, learn to get the conversation started. If possible, focus on people you know it's reasonably possible you'll see again.
- Say hi again. Again, basic stuff here.
- Have a brief conversation. This can be done simultaneously with one of the above, if the situation calls for it. What do you talk about? It doesn't matter. Talk about how awkward you are at starting random conversations, for all it matters. Preferably, talk about the aspect of your life for which you're trying to build a network. Just make sure you're smiling most of the time (unless they tell you their dad just died ... use some common sense, foo). You can have this conversation over coffee, or on the street where you met. It doesn't really matter, though more personal and focused environments are generally going to be more fruitful.
- Exchange contact information, or learn how to locate them. When I go running, I tend to learn where the people live who I say hi to. They remember me as that dad who pushes 3 kids in a jogging stroller for 5-8 miles at a time. "Hello" becomes "Hello again," which turns into, "Good to see you're still at it." Other times, I cut the conversation short and say, "I've enjoyed talking about this, but I've got to get going somewhere. Here's my number/e-mail. Let's finish our chat soon." If possible, get their info too, then leave. Once you have their info, by this point you've established enough of a foundation that it shouldn't be too awkward to contact them if you're in need.

That's about it for basic networking. Whenever you see these people again, they'll remember you and be primed for acquaintance-like conversations.

Building Your Friendships

After your network grows large enough, you'll start to get an idea of who you'd like to get to know better. It might be someone whose career aligns well with your career needs. It could be someone whose interests are similar to your own and you just want to have fun together. It could be someone you'd like to mentor so you can gain a sense of fulfillment in passing on what you've learned to someone else and sending them out into the world. Whatever your motive is, friendships are where the real value is at. Let's continue our path.

- Follow up. Remember that contact information you got? Start using it. While I encourage people to master the art of no-context conversations, this is a weird lull where it's better to create context so the other person feels comfortable with the foundation for follow up. "I remembered you said blank, and I'm doing blank, so I figured I'd call and get your thoughts on this."

- Invite, Mild. Keep it light at first. Grab a meal or coffee together. The idea is to become comfortable hanging out in person. Once that comfort is established, the friendship itself IS the context for future conversations, so you don't need to manufacture context to keep things from becoming awkward for long.
- Invite, Serious - "Going all the way." Don't do this too soon. Rather than explain this one, I'll just leave this clip.
- Shift the Dynamic. Make yourself available and let them invite you. This only works once they're already convinced you're someone they want to be around.

Male v. Female Social Matrix

It's important to note that there are some key differences about how men and women engage with friends when they're in the "follow up" and "invite" phases. Hopefully by now you've become fluent with The Female Social Matrix. From this and what I've observed elsewhere, here are a few discrepancies I've seen in how men and women interact, which should help you learn how to build friendships with other men that actually help rather than drain you.

Women	Men
Crabs in a bucket	Encourage social ascent
Equality	Competition
Diss progress beyond the group dynamic	Spur on progress
Social niceties; pleasant demeanor	Ribbing, critiquing
Focused on the group	Focus on role within the group
Supporting conversation	Dominating conversation
Plausible deniability	Overt expression
Appearance of being wholesome	Raw, crude, and blunt
Being fair	Being efficient
Consensus/Democracy	Hierarchical Structure
Involvement	Achievement

Obviously there are going to be exceptions, and most of these will operate on a scale. This doesn't mean that men can't engage in social niceties or encourage equality; rather, it's to say that if there is a conflict between the two, or the opportunity for the male side is present, the man will engage in ribbing and competition instead. For example, a guy might prefer to look for a consensus/democratic solution before acting. But when it becomes apparent that no consensus will be reached, the women will keep trying to find one, but the man will say, "Enough is enough. We're doing this," and then do it.

You'll notice quickly that this dynamic isn't merely describing the difference between men and women, but also between feminized men and the masculine. I have found that even the most feminized men will respect the male social matrix when in the presence of the masculine. Accordingly, my point here is not merely to explain the different social matrices to you, but to encourage you to socialize like a man. In doing so, you will teach other men how to be men, while simultaneously earning the social status afforded to the masculine in your social interactions.

Ten Extra Tips

1. Take Control of Your Social Life. Even before social distancing, the world at large conditions people toward isolation and arm's-length interactions with others. Even the most extroverted people are unlikely to make much of an effort to build genuine friendships with you. If you want it, you make it happen. That's how it is with pretty much anything worth having. Yes, other people want friends too, but they're either too dumb or too socially conditioned to act on it.
2. Ignore Context. "Context" is the meta framework most people operate in, made up of the social norms they think they must follow in order to take certain actions. Those social norms are the very ones that ruin so many marriages and condition guys to be beta pussies, leading to higher divorce rates, children out of wedlock, etc. Do you really want to submit to the cultural forces that have created the societal chaos we have today? Plus, learning to defy context makes you more interesting to others and also fast-tracks your progress. See my previously linked post on defying social context.
3. Embrace rejection. About 7 months ago I wrote a post titled Initiate Often, Confident Always. The premise is that rejection should not rattle your confidence - it should immunize you against further rejection and failure, making it easier the next time. I remember having to raise funds for a ministry job I once took. The first few rejections were tough to take. After several dozen more, I didn't care. It was much easier to raise funds after that - not merely because I could get to the "yes" people faster, but because my fearless charisma started giving some of the "no" people enough confidence in what I was doing that they came around.
4. Master Asking Questions. This is the most valuable skill you can ever learn. A decent conversationalist uses questions to keep a conversation going. A skilled conversationalist can use questions to engage in deep conversations on matters he's entirely ignorant. A master can use questions to persuade others to believe virtually anything, while thinking it was their own idea to believe it. I could do an entire post just on the art of asking questions.
5. Be a Social Sculptor. Many guys, especially those who run against the grain of culture, tell me, "I just don't want to be friends with the people I'm around. They're so liberal and weak and it's annoying." Right, unicorns don't exist. You think you're going to randomly bump into a red pill endorsed contributor out on the streets? It's not going to happen. Rather than looking for the perfect friend, create one. This is the same advice I give for relationships. In my experience, it's harder finding someone worth being friends with than it is to take someone I'm iffy about and influence them into becoming the kind of person I want as a friend.
6. Negative to Positive. Generally speaking, it's easiest to bond over shared disinterests. Many people have stronger negative reactions to what they don't like than they do positive reactions to what they do like. This creates an easy camaraderie up-front early in a relationship. Of course, focusing on the negative is unsustainable, as people don't like feeling negative all the time. Most people recognize their best friends as those with whom they shared overall positive experiences with. Even if the "positive experience" was something that landed them in trouble, they remember it fondly because of the fun they had in the process.
7. Learn Cultural Distinctions. Trying to engage with a hipster? Frat boy? Businessman? African American? There are so many cultural subsets that are misunderstood (or perhaps understood better than they want to admit). Knowing some of the unique ins and outs can go a long way.
8. Tell It Straight, Unapologetic, Yet Tactfully. Most people know I'm a Christian, so I'll use that as an example. Some people think it's impossible for biblical Christians to relate with certain communities, like homosexuals. This is dumb. I've had a number of homosexual friends. For a time, I danced around the issue, not wanting to upset them. That actually upset them even more because they knew I was treating them differently because of their sexual orientation. They wanted me to talk to them the same way I would anyone else. So, we took it a step further. He'd start talking about making out with his boyfriend and I'd tease back, "Yeah, you'll have a lot of time to do that while you're burning in hell for eternity ;)" and they'd laugh. Once the rapport is there, and it's clear that the friendship exists through your disagreements, let the disagreements be a point of humorous distinction, not a point of division.

9. Have Male Friends. You can't learn how to be a man without being around other men. Even if the guys you know aren't the types of guys you want to emulate, you can influence them to become someone you're proud to be around - and then you can fuel each other on. I've done this many, many times. It's fun and rewarding.
10. Have Female Friends. Society will tell you that a married man should not be good friends with a woman other than his wife. This is somewhat absurd. Can guys and girls actually be "just friends"? Probably not. So what? Does that mean you're going to start unzipping your pants every time you're around one of your female "friends"? Is your self-discipline really so low? The social convention on this makes sense if you're a weak man who can't control his own dick - and if that's you, and you don't want to blow up your marriage, then follow it. But if you know how to keep your pants on, you'd be a fool not to take advantage of the power that women have usurped in society by building relationships with them. It's seriously idiotic to cut off half of the population from your life just because your wife might not like it. Besides, chances are she actually does like it more than she's willing to admit to herself. Dread. Preselection. Mystery. Got it now?

If you're anything like pretty much everyone on the planet, your social life sucks. Why should you care? Because as much as you want to be your own man, you need other people to do pretty much anything you actually want to do in the world. In the drafting phase, I at one point split this out into a two-part post, but didn't feel like taking the time to separate it all out, and the content blends better when together, so here's the whole thing.

PART I: MENTALITY

No Man Is An Island

Most guys coming here need to learn independence. They're so heavily influenced by society that they need to pull away from everything the world and their wife tells them and develop their own kingdom that operates within their own frame. That's a beautiful thing. But it's unsustainable to go completely independent.

Let's be real: do you really want to live in the wilderness like Thoreau? Even Thoreau didn't live like "Thoreau." He made regular trips to town to visit family and friends. He didn't live in the woods, but in a cabin in a wide open field. He had visitors over and hosted an annual melon party. Nobody actually wants to live in isolation, yet many people's behaviors would indicate they do. Are your behaviors aligned with your goals? In the case of having a social life, for most people the answer is no.

The "Loneliness Epidemic"

I wrote a post about a year ago citing some stats from a survey by Cigna. The conclusion was that around half of the country admitted to sometimes or always feeling alone and having no meaningful relationships. Surprisingly, having kids doesn't decrease your susceptibility to the "loneliness epidemic." Not surprisingly, today's young adults are considered the loneliest people ever to live since we've been recording stats on the subject.

Interestingly, despite what our feminized society tells us about how women are so much better at being "social butterflies" than men, Psychology Today says otherwise:

"According to substantial research, women across all ages and lifestyles report higher levels of loneliness than men do. [Ironically:] Except, perhaps surprisingly, in one subset of people - single people. While married women inch out married men for the lonelier group, single men vastly outweigh single women as the lonelier bunch."

Sucks to be an omega. Notice the language here, though? Substantial research. All ages. All lifestyles. While the world will tell us that we should all build friendships like women (trust, communication, emotional connection, etc.), the reality is that it isn't working for them. At some point, you need to learn to build your social network like a man - and not the feminized betas and omegas who are ruining the gender curve. But we'll get to that later.

Why Does it Matter?

So you've worked on your stoicism and frame a bit. You don't feel lonely anymore. You're an introvert anyway, so why do you care about building social relationships? Because if you don't, you're still a loser. Let me break this down:

- Even the most introverted person needs some social contact. If you don't have friends outside the home, you're going to default to your wife and kids. This makes it easy to pedestalize them and become co-dependent on them as your only source of relational fulfillment in life.
- Dread is literally impossible if you never leave your house. Just as bad is when you do leave the house, but everyone knows you're not actually going to be chatting up a random hottie.
- Online forums can only take you so far. At some point, if you want to learn how to be a man you need to actually see what other men do. The movies don't cut it because you know it's scripted.
- Chances are, your mission in life involves other people. Financial goals? Unless you are forging your own currency, you can't manufacture money on your own, which means you have to get it from ... people. Athletic goals? You need someone to train you, a rival to best, peers to give you feedback, etc. Political goals? You have to have connections to get into office. Very few goals in life wouldn't benefit from an improved social game.

I could go on, but you get the idea.

So why aren't you?

Some people are dumb and needed to read all that, but for those with common sense, able to figure out with 10 seconds of thought why it's important to build a social game, you're still left with the cognitive dissonance: "Oh yeah, I guess it IS important, but I'm still not doing it. Why not?" There are lots of answers: fear, shame, apathy, laziness, mental health issues (that you probably don't even realize you have), etc.

But there are two answers that rise to the top: (1) You're incompetent. You just don't know how to make friends. I'll address this in the "Action" section, below, so no need to re-hash it here. (2) You Make Idiotic Assumptions. When I coach guys on building their social life, I ask lots of questions about why they're not already friends with someone in particular ... you know ... like ... women. Number 1 response? "They already have a circle of friends, and it's just hard to break in." I'll address the frame issue later. For now, let's realize that this is based on a series of bad assumptions.

- Assumption 1: The other person doesn't want more friends. This excuse only applies if someone has actually made a clear decision not to have anymore friends. I doubt anyone has actually done this, so they're on the table.
 - Assumption 2: The other person actually has friends. Yeah, you see them hanging around other people, but most social contexts are recurring acquaintanceships, not genuine friendships. Your neighbors and co-workers may call you their "friend," but do you really relate with them the same way you did your roommate in college? Probably not. And that's probably also the case for the person you want to connect with.
 - Assumption 3: The other person doesn't want YOU as their next friend. If you're making this assumption, you need to go back to the sidebar and learn (1) that you're the prize, or if you're not, (2) how to become the prize.
 - Assumption 4: It's hard to break in. It's not. More on that to come.
 - Assumption 5: That there's anything to "break in" on in the first place. Are they putting up invisible fences? Again, this is something of a frame issue, so let's go there.
-

Your Frame/Their Frame

When my wife looks to make new friends, she asks herself what she could do to cause them to want to include her. This is how women think. They're naturally compelled to want to be in the frame of someone they desire to associate with. But you're a man (I hope). You should be inviting everyone else into your frame. This means that your method of winning friends isn't to suck up to them. It's to be someone they pander to be around.

Church folk are an easy example of this dynamic. The typical strategy for "plugging in" is simple: believe what everyone else believes, suck up to those in authority and praise whatever they say. If you do this, you become part of the crowd and make lots of acquaintances. But nobody actually wants to spend time with you or become closer friends.

On the other hand, have you ever noticed that the popular people are the most critical? They gossip about the secrets they hear and make fun of those around them. This is true even in congregations. Why does everyone gravitate to them? Because they're alpha enough to say what the betas wish they had the balls to. These people are fun. They run against the grain. Their controversial nature gets them attention, and that attention wins them friends, but also makes them enemies. They live in their own frame and it's alluring to everyone around.

Of course, you can live in your own frame and not be a slanderous gossip. This is my approach. Instead of running my mouth about how much better than everyone else I think I am, I actually strive to be the best man I think I can be. People respect that. At some point, they realize they want what I have (even if I have to invite them to have it with me, to get them there). This is what draws the crowd. Once the crowd amasses, I can pick and choose who I want to build closer relationships with.

Relationships and Networking

Now, there's a reason I've been talking most of this time about building authentic relationships. Yes, acquaintances are useful. This is the goal of networking - to build a vast array of people you are loosely connected to in the hope that one of those connections will one day become handy. There is a value to having a vast plethora of people who know your name in the community. I had that in my old community, and I'm working toward rebuilding that after having relocated less than a year ago. Acquaintances make you look good in public, but their utility is limited. I have set aside "networking" as a viable model for long-term success as a man, whether in my career, my neighborhood, in my spiritual pursuits, etc.

When you network, nobody has a vested interest in what you're doing unless it mutually benefits them. Most relationships aren't immediately mutually beneficial. I may meet a businessman who could refer me a case someday, but chances are that he'll recognize me in the grocery store, but won't remember me when his neighbor needs an attorney. Why not? Because he doesn't have a relationship with me. He's only thinking about me when I reach out to him or when he's personally in need.

Instead, 99% of my clients by referral come from people I've spent substantial time with. We've gotten to know each other personally. We've sat down for a meal or talked a dozen or two times, even if only briefly. I know the names of their kids. We make it a point to meet up regularly. These people have you on their mind. My closest friends refer me 2-5 new cases each year, and my more casual friends give me 1-2 cases a year. Even when I'm not around, they're thinking of me when the context comes up. [Funny story: the 1% was a client who was referred to me by an opposing party who was so impressed with my cross-examination of her that she told her friend to go to me instead of her own attorney.]

Lee Rosen used to run the #1 blog on the internet for law practice management. He coached a number of businesses beyond just law firms. I spoke with him by phone once and he told me his singular secret to building a successful career. Can you guess what it was? "Build your relationships, not your networks. Nurture people to think about you when you're gone, not merely to notice you when you're there."

Now, realistically you can't have deep relationships with everyone. You have to balance networking and building relationships to get the best of both worlds. In reality, networking is the first phase of building relationships. So let's go there.

PART 2: ACTION

Building Your Network

I wrote a post a couple years ago titled Social Influence and Defying Context. Much of what I'd say here I've already said there, so no need to make this post longer than it already is. But let me clarify an easy way to build your social network.

- Say hi to new people. It's that simple. This is where it all starts. My favorites: on a jog, at the gym, in an elevator, grocery shopping, waiting in line. Just say hi. Even if you don't say anything after that, learn to get the conversation started. If possible, focus on people you know it's reasonably possible you'll see again.
- Say hi again. Again, basic stuff here.
- Have a brief conversation. This can be done simultaneously with one of the above, if the situation calls for it. What do you talk about? It doesn't matter. Talk about how awkward you are at starting random conversations, for all it matters. Preferably, talk about the aspect of your life for which you're trying to build a network. Just make sure you're smiling most of the time (unless they tell you their dad just died ... use some common sense, foo). You can have this conversation over coffee, or on the street where you met. It doesn't really matter, though more personal and focused environments are generally going to be more fruitful.
- Exchange contact information, or learn how to locate them. When I go running, I tend to learn where the people live who I say hi to. They remember me as that dad who pushes 3 kids in a jogging stroller for 5-8 miles at a time. "Hello" becomes "Hello again," which turns into, "Good to see you're still at it." Other times, I cut the conversation short and say, "I've enjoyed talking about this, but I've got to get going somewhere. Here's my number/e-mail. Let's finish our chat soon." If possible, get their info too, then leave. Once you have their info, by this point you've established enough of a foundation that it shouldn't be too awkward to contact them if you're in need.

That's about it for basic networking. Whenever you see these people again, they'll remember you and be primed for acquaintance-like conversations.

Building Your Friendships

After your network grows large enough, you'll start to get an idea of who you'd like to get to know better. It might be someone whose career aligns well with your career needs. It could be someone whose interests are similar to your own and you just want to have fun together. It could be someone you'd like to mentor so you can gain a sense of fulfillment in passing on what you've learned to someone else and sending them out into the world. Whatever your motive is, friendships are where the real value is at. Let's continue our path.

- Follow up. Remember that contact information you got? Start using it. While I encourage people to master the art of no-context conversations, this is a weird lull where it's better to create context so the other person feels comfortable with the foundation for follow up. "I remembered you said blank, and I'm doing blank, so I figured

I'd call and get your thoughts on this."

- Invite, Mild. Keep it light at first. Grab a meal or coffee together. The idea is to become comfortable hanging out in person. Once that comfort is established, the friendship itself IS the context for future conversations, so you don't need to manufacture context to keep things from becoming awkward for long.
- Invite, Serious - "Going all the way." Don't do this too soon. Rather than explain this one, I'll just leave this clip.
- Shift the Dynamic. Make yourself available and let them invite you. This only works once they're already convinced you're someone they want to be around.

Male v. Female Social Matrix

It's important to note that there are some key differences about how men and women engage with friends when they're in the "follow up" and "invite" phases. Hopefully by now you've become fluent with The Female Social Matrix. From this and what I've observed elsewhere, here are a few discrepancies I've seen in how men and women interact, which should help you learn how to build friendships with other men that actually help rather than drain you.

Women	Men
Crabs in a bucket	Encourage social ascent
Equality	Competition
Diss progress beyond the group dynamic	Spur on progress
Social niceties; pleasant demeanor	Ribbing, critiquing
Focused on the group	Focus on role within the group
Supporting conversation	Dominating conversation
Plausible deniability	Overt expression
Appearance of being wholesome	Raw, crude, and blunt
Being fair	Being efficient
Consensus/Democracy	Hierarchical Structure
Involvement	Achievement

Obviously there are going to be exceptions, and most of these will operate on a scale. This doesn't mean that men can't engage in social niceties or encourage equality; rather, it's to say that if there is a conflict between the two, or the opportunity for the male side is present, the man will engage in ribbing and competition instead. For example, a guy might prefer to look for a consensus/democratic solution before acting. But when it becomes apparent that no consensus will be reached, the women will keep trying to find one, but the man will say, "Enough is enough. We're doing this," and then do it.

You'll notice quickly that this dynamic isn't merely describing the difference between men and women, but also between feminized men and the masculine. I have found that even the most feminized men will respect the male social matrix when in the presence of the masculine. Accordingly, my point here is not merely to explain the different social matrices to you, but to encourage you to socialize like a man. In doing so, you will teach other men how to be men, while simultaneously earning the social status afforded to the masculine in your social interactions.

Ten Extra Tips

1. Take Control of Your Social Life. Even before social distancing, the world at large conditions people toward isolation and arm's-length interactions with others. Even the most extroverted people are unlikely to make much of an effort to build genuine friendships with you. If you want it, you make it happen. That's how it is with pretty much anything worth having. Yes, other people want friends too, but they're either too dumb or too socially conditioned to act on it.
2. Ignore Context. "Context" is the meta framework most people operate in, made up of the social norms they think they must follow in order to take certain actions. Those social norms are the very ones that ruin so many marriages and condition guys to be beta pussies, leading to higher divorce rates, children out of wedlock, etc. Do you really want to submit to the cultural forces that have created the societal chaos we have today? Plus, learning to defy context makes you more interesting to others and also fast-tracks your progress. See my previously linked post on defying social context.
3. Embrace rejection. About 7 months ago I wrote a post titled Initiate Often, Confident Always. The premise is that rejection should not rattle your confidence - it should immunize you against further rejection and failure, making it easier the next time. I remember having to raise funds for a ministry job I once took. The first few rejections were tough to take. After several dozen more, I didn't care. It was much easier to raise funds after that - not merely because I could get to the "yes" people faster, but because my fearless charisma started giving some of the "no" people enough confidence in what I was doing that they came around.
4. Master Asking Questions. This is the most valuable skill you can ever learn. A decent conversationalist uses questions to keep a conversation going. A skilled conversationalist can use questions to engage in deep conversations on matters he's entirely ignorant. A master can use questions to persuade others to believe virtually anything, while thinking it was their own idea to believe it. I could do an entire post just on the art of asking questions.
5. Be a Social Sculptor. Many guys, especially those who run against the grain of culture, tell me, "I just don't want to be friends with the people I'm around. They're so liberal and weak and it's annoying." Right, unicorns don't exist. You think you're going to randomly bump into a red pill endorsed contributor out on the streets? It's not going to happen. Rather than looking for the perfect friend, create one. This is the same advice I give for relationships. In my experience, it's harder finding someone worth being friends with than it is to take someone I'm iffy about and influence them into becoming the kind of person I want as a friend.
6. Negative to Positive. Generally speaking, it's easiest to bond over shared disinterests. Many people have stronger negative reactions to what they don't like than they do positive reactions to what they do like. This creates an easy camaraderie up-front early in a relationship. Of course, focusing on the negative is unsustainable, as people don't like feeling negative all the time. Most people recognize their best friends as those with whom they shared overall positive experiences with. Even if the "positive experience" was something that landed them in trouble, they remember it fondly because of the fun they had in the process.
7. Learn Cultural Distinctions. Trying to engage with a hipster? Frat boy? Businessman? African American? There are so many cultural subsets that are misunderstood (or perhaps understood better than they want to admit). Knowing some of the unique ins and outs can go a long way.
8. Tell It Straight, Unapologetic, Yet Tactfully. Most people know I'm a Christian, so I'll use that as an example. Some people think it's impossible for biblical Christians to relate with certain communities, like homosexuals. This is dumb. I've had a number of homosexual friends. For a time, I danced around the issue, not wanting to upset them. That actually upset them even more because they knew I was treating them differently because of their sexual orientation. They wanted me to talk to them the same way I would anyone else. So, we took it a step further. He'd start talking about making out with his boyfriend and I'd tease back, "Yeah, you'll have a lot of time to do that while you're burning in hell for eternity ;)" and they'd laugh. Once the rapport is there, and it's clear that the friendship exists through your disagreements, let the disagreements be a point of humorous distinction, not a point of division.

9. Have Male Friends. You can't learn how to be a man without being around other men. Even if the guys you know aren't the types of guys you want to emulate, you can influence them to become someone you're proud to be around - and then you can fuel each other on. I've done this many, many times. It's fun and rewarding.
10. Have Female Friends. Society will tell you that a married man should not be good friends with a woman other than his wife. This is somewhat absurd. Can guys and girls actually be "just friends"? Probably not. So what? Does that mean you're going to start unzipping your pants every time you're around one of your female "friends"? Is your self-discipline really so low? The social convention on this makes sense if you're a weak man who can't control his own dick - and if that's you, and you don't want to blow up your marriage, then follow it. But if know how to keep your pants on, you'd be a fool not to take advantage of the power that women have usurped in society by building relationships with them. It's seriously idiotic to cut off half of the population from your life just because your wife might not like it. Besides, chances are she actually does like it more than she's willing to admit to herself. Dread. Preselection. Mystery. Got it now?

46

UPVOTES

RPC Video Chat

3 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

For those not fans of long blocks of text, a few of us have started up an RPC video chat series for you all to listen in on. So as not to defeat the purpose, I'll just share the links and say no more.

- Episode 1 - Introductions
- Episode 2 - Archetypes

121

UPVOTES

Actual conversations with "abuse" victims.

4 June 2020 · r/MarriedRedPill · Archived copy · Reddit

It occurred to me recently that many guys may not know what their wives are telling the attorney in preparation for that looming divorce filing she didn't tell you she was already planning. So, let me give you some insight on what that conversation looks like behind the scenes.

All of these are approximations of actual quotes I've heard throughout my career. They usually start with an allegation that the other side is abusive, followed by my asking: "How is he abusive?"

The Typical Conversation

This is based off of an actual conversation I had with one client in particular, but is fairly common of most:

"Did he ever hit you?"

"No," she says.

"Okay, so how was he abusive then?"

"He's verbally abusive."

"How so?" I always ask.

"He swears at me."

"Out of the blue or during arguments?"

"During arguments."

"Did you swear back at him?"

"Yes, but nowhere near as bad as he did it to me. He gets REALLY angry during arguments. Did I mention he's emotionally abusive too?"

"How's he emotionally abusive?"

"Because he gets soooo mad at me for little things or when I didn't do anything wrong at all!"

"Does he think you did something wrong?"

"Well yeah, that's why he's mad. But I swear I didn't. I just didn't do it his way - and he wants to make me feel horrible for that. That's emotional abuse. I looked it up on the internet."

"I'm sorry to hear that. Have you ever gotten mad at him over something that he felt was unjustified?"

"Oh sure. He accuses me of nagging him all the time."

"And have you ever yelled or gotten angry in those situations?"

"Well, yeah - because he's so abusive that it makes me mad and I can't help but yell and get angry! But what do you think? Can we show the court how abusive this man is?"

Other Memorable Quotes

I have added the first sentence for context, but I assure you that ALL of these quotes have included an allegation of the exact type of abuse referenced at some point in the conversation/testimony, and the second sentence on is part of the explanation given. Some are my client, others are the opposing party during my examination.

- "He's manipulative. He doesn't actually do anything that I could call abusive, but he does things to make me feel abused anyway. That's how he tries to get away with his abuse."

- "He's manipulative." I ask, "How does he manipulate you?" She answers, "By asking me to do things, and then I feel like I have to do what he wants all the time." I ask, "Does he ever threaten you if you don't do it, either direct or implied?" "No, I just know that he'll be angry. He uses his anger to manipulate me into getting his way."
- "He's manipulative. He uses the kids as pawns to get at me." I ask, "How so?" She answers, "When we're fighting, sometimes he takes the kids and leaves the house. He says he's 'giving me time to cool off.'" "What does he do with them?" "Usually they go to a park or out for ice cream or something fun, knowing that I'm at home in tears - and he doesn't care. Then he looks like the fun dad and I'm the crazy mom who they have to be saved from. And everyone thinks HE is the hero in the situation!"
- "He's emotionally abusive. Every time we argue, he just sits there silently and doesn't talk or get mad or do anything. He knows it infuriates me, but he keeps doing it!"
- "He's emotionally abusive. He loves to look at me with this smug grin on his face, even when I'm obviously mad at him." I ask, "You mean he does it when you're not mad too?" She answers, "Yeah, he's just smug all the time."
- "He's emotionally abusive. He told me if I tried to leave him, he'd fight for custody of the kids."
- "He's emotionally abusive. He told me that if I didn't handle this situation his way, he'd take the kids and live with his mom for a while." I asked, "Isn't that what you did when you filed for divorce two years ago before dismissing it?" She answers, "Yeah, but I'm the mother. That's different."
- "He's sexually abusive. He thinks I should have sex with him whenever he feels like it, and he'll try to pressure me to say yes." I ask, "Do you say yes or do you stand your ground?" She answers, "I always say yes. It wouldn't be abuse if I felt like I was allowed to say no."
- "He's sexually abusive. He made me give him blow jobs even though he knows I don't like it."
- "He's sexually abusive. He looks at me all the time, even when I don't want him to. It creeps me out."
- "He's sexually abusive. When we have sex, after he's finished he ends things and never tries to help me along, then makes me feel guilty for not finishing as fast as him. It makes me not want to have sex with him anymore." I ask, "So did you stop having sex with him or tell him you didn't want to?" She answered, "No. I just started finishing myself off afterward."
- "He's sexually abusive. He raped me many times during our marriage, forcing me to do all kinds of outrageous things, like blow jobs, hand jobs, and other stuff." I find peers in her congregation to confront her about these accusations. She tells them, "Oh, I made all that up. My attorney said I had to say those things to win custody."
- "He's financially abusive. He controls the check book and I have to ask for permission whenever I want to buy anything." I ask, "Has he ever said no to anything that you needed for daily living purposes?" She answered, "No."
- "He's financially abusive" as above (a common one). I ask the same question. She answers, "No." I ask, "Has he ever said no to anything you wanted to buy at all?" She answers, "No. But he still has all the power over the finances and I have none."
- "He's financially abusive. He keeps all the accounts in his name and refuses to let me know what's in the accounts." I ask, "Have you ever asked and he told you no?" She answers, "No. I don't feel like I'm allowed to ask. But he never gave me access."

- "He's financially abusive. He buys whatever he wants, like eating out for lunch while he's at work pretty much every day. But when I want to buy something, he always says no." I say, "Give me examples of things he's said no to." She answers, "Usually new decorations for the house." I ask, "Is he buying decorations for his man cave or his office?" She answers, "No, he doesn't value decor, and because he controls all the money, it means I can never have what I want, while he still gets to have whatever he wants." I ask, "And what is it, exactly, that he wants?" She answers, "Usually he just spends money on food." [Note: the guy wasn't even obese.]
- "He's financially abusive. He spends all our money, and then there's nothing left for basic needs. We're in so much debt." I ask, "What types of things does he buy?" She answers, "TVs, sound systems, video game systems, computer stuff." I ask, "Have you ever bought things like that for fun yourself?" She answers, "Yeah, he buys me a new smart phone every year. I also have a few ipads and a laptop. He likes to buy me jewelry too. He thinks I have to forgive him when he does that. But then when there's no money left for groceries, we end up having to put it on the credit card, and now I'm constantly in a panic over all the debt we've racked up. Can the courts make him stop? I can't handle the financial abuse."
- "He's financially abusive. He knows I can't afford this divorce, yet he keeps doing everything possible to ring up my attorney fees and make this case cost a small fortune." I think to myself, "No, you calling me for 3 hour chats 2-3 times a week to talk about your insecurities and not letting me hang up the phone is what's costing you a small fortune. Learn to shut up and this whole thing would have been 80% cheaper."
- "He's verbally abusive. He yells and screams and swears at me all the time." I ask, "Do you ever do it back?" She answers, "Yes."
- "He's verbally abusive. He lies all the time." I ask, "Do you have any proof of any of the lies you just told me about?" She answers, "No, he's really good at hiding things. And a lot of the stuff he lies about are smaller things just to get under my skin, not big things that would be provable."
- "He's verbally abusive. He calls me names and tries to make me feel bad about myself, telling me I'm worthless and that nobody could love me." I respond, "I'm really sorry to hear that. That sounds cruel. How did you handle it?" I thought she'd say she went to her room and cried. Her actual answer: "I know I shouldn't have done it, but I started breaking his things. I figured that if I wasn't worth anything, he couldn't have anything worth anything either. I get that I reacted poorly, but that doesn't change the fact that the way he talked to me was abuse, and I want the court to see that."
- "He's physically abusive. Just look at these pictures!" She pulls them out, I say, "Oh, that red mark on your neck?" She says, "No, that was a bug bite. It's the spot on my arm, where he hit me." I ask, "Oh, the dot right there?" She says, "No, the other arm." She points to a slight discoloration that I'm pretty sure was really just a shadow. I say, "Oh, the picture must just be faded too much to notice. Can you get me one with better resolution so the judge can see what you're pointing out?" After she gets me the better resolution copy the next day, I still couldn't see it. She didn't have any other angles of the shot (presumably because she couldn't get the shading just right from any other angle).
- "He's physically abusive. Look at the pictures of the bruises on my arm!" The pictures were entered as exhibits and showed very serious bruises. She added, "I took this video of him slamming a door on my arm repeatedly." It gets marked as an exhibit and played for the judge. The video shows the two arguing, then she drops her phone, so the video goes black, but audio can be heard of her screaming and a door slamming on her arm multiple times. Later at trial, I have my client on the stand presenting a video that he was taking simultaneously, showing her slamming the door on her own arm with an identical audio track.
- "He stalks me. He walks his dog in front of my house all the time." I ask, "How far away does he live?" She answers, "4 houses down."

- "He stalks me. He constantly posts things on Facebook directed to me and he won't stop." I ask, "Have you ever told him to stop?" She answers, "No." I ask, "How difficult has it been managing your social media account with him doing this?" She answers, "Oh, he doesn't actually tag me in any of them. I only find out about it because my friends tell me about it."
- "He stalks me. He used to take videos of us having sex together." I asked, "When did you find out about this?" She answers, "I mean, I agreed to it at first, but I didn't know he was still doing it after the first few times. Plus, I didn't know he had videos of other women too - and he didn't delete them after he broke up with them! He probably still has my video too. Don't you think that's creepy like a stalker? He's out there watching videos of me naked after we're divorced. The court has to realize that's stalking, right?" I ask, "Do you have any evidence that he's actually watching those videos?" She answers, "No." I ask where she found the videos, she answers, "In a box in our shed." I ask, "Does he know you found the videos?" She answers, "No." I ask, "So, in all probability, he thinks they're still packed away in a box in the shed and hasn't actually seen them in years, right?" She answers, "Yeah, I guess that makes sense."

In all of these situations, the women genuinely believed they were the victims of abuse. I 100% believe that they were being sincere in their allegations, despite that in most situations they did not come anywhere close to the actual legal standard of abuse. To that end, I have only used examples from cases where the allegation of abuse didn't actually get substantiated in court (except a few of them, where the cases are still pending, but it's not been an issue yet). I'm not here to increase panic about the divorce-rape boogey-man.

BONUS 1. Gender Reversal: "She filed a CPO against me saying I'm abusive, but she's the abusive one!" I ask, "How so?" He answers, "For example, when we would have sex, she'd make me choke her. I was really uncomfortable with it, but she'd pressure me saying she couldn't orgasm unless I was choking her hard enough that she was actually having trouble breathing."

BONUS 2. Parental Alienation [an EXTREMELY common conversation]: "He/she is alienating my kids from me! He/she lies about me, blames me for everything in front of the kids, keeps telling the kids I cheated on him/her, tells the kids it's my fault we're getting divorced, etc. This HAS to stop. Don't the courts care about parental alienation? I read online that this is a big deal and that the Courts will put a stop to it." I ask, "How's your relationship with your children?" They answer, "Oh, they love and adore me. Our relationship is very strong." I ask, "How's the other party's relationship with the kids." They answer, "Not very good. The kids really struggle being over there because of how bad of a person he/she is." I ask, "Given what you just said, who do you think the court will believe is the actual alienated parent?" They answer, "But they're doing it to themselves! I'm the one being alienated by all the things they say about me." I answer, "Give me 3 examples of how your relationship with the children has been irreparably harmed by those things." They never get past the first.

BONUS 3. Danger to the Child: "He doesn't love our daughter. It's so obvious. He's using a size 3 nipple, which I know is the manufacturer recommended, but she had acid reflux 6 months ago, so she should only be using a size 1 nipple on her bottles to limit the flow. How does the court not see that he just doesn't care about his daughter at all?" [Yes, this one's more exaggerated because of the way I summarized the conversation, but every claim I referenced is true, nonetheless.]

Caveats

In maybe 2-3 of these cases there were more significant things that came up and these were secondary rationales. But in the majority, these were the primary reasons given.

I also have a number of cases where the abuse was very, very real. This isn't to say that abuse doesn't actually happen. Rather, it's to show that women have a grossly inaccurate concept of what actual abuse looks like.

NOT The Point

My point here is not to make you afraid that all women will cry abuse just because they can. It's also not to make you afraid of abuse charges that she will inevitably contemplate at some point throughout your marriage. I'm also not trying to make you extra cautious of doing anything that could possibly be interpreted as abuse in court.

The Point

My point ACTUALLY IS that if a woman isn't attracted to you or (even if she is) she's decided to leave, she's going to be prone to interpret any negativity in the relationship as a form of abuse no matter what you do. Sometime her feelings will be legitimate in light of the circumstances. Don't be that guy, unless it's self-defense. But none of the things I referenced above went anywhere in court, no matter how fervently she pushed the issue (some cases pending). So, my conclusion for you guys is to look at a list like this and think to yourself:

- There's no point worrying about whether or not she's going to cry "Abuse!" someday. Just assume she will.

From there, the guys who fare best are the ones who make her second-guess why she's divorcing him in the first place. And yes, that second-guessing is EXTREMELY common as well, despite how few women are willing to admit it. But they tell their attorney everything along those lines too. This is one of the reasons it's so vital to maintain a firm "stay plan is the go plan" mentality if your marriage is falling apart - not in the hope that you might win her back, but because the things that would give you that chance are the same things that are going to tweak whether she cries "Abuse!" or "Aw, I'm going to miss how bold of a person he was."

It occurred to me recently that many guys may not know what their wives are telling the attorney in preparation for that looming divorce filing she didn't tell you she was already planning. So, let me give you some insight on what that conversation looks like behind the scenes.

All of these are approximations of actual quotes I've heard throughout my career. They usually start with an allegation that the other side is abusive, followed by my asking: "How is he abusive?"

The Typical Conversation

This is based off of an actual conversation I had with one client in particular, but is fairly common of most:

"Did he ever hit you?"

"No," she says.

"Okay, so how was he abusive then?"

"He's verbally abusive."

"How so?" I always ask.

"He swears at me."

"Out of the blue or during arguments?"

"During arguments."

"Did you swear back at him?"

"Yes, but nowhere near as bad as he did it to me. He gets REALLY angry during arguments. Did I mention he's emotionally abusive too?"

"How's he emotionally abusive?"

"Because he gets soooo mad at me for little things or when I didn't do anything wrong at all!"

"Does he think you did something wrong?"

"Well yeah, that's why he's mad. But I swear I didn't. I just didn't do it his way - and he wants to make me feel horrible for that. That's emotional abuse. I looked it up on the internet."

"I'm sorry to hear that. Have you ever gotten mad at him over something that he felt was unjustified?"

"Oh sure. He accuses me of nagging him all the time."

"And have you ever yelled or gotten angry in those situations?"

"Well, yeah - because he's so abusive that it makes me mad and I can't help but yell and get angry! But what do you think? Can we show the court how abusive this man is?"

Other Memorable Quotes

I have added the first sentence for context, but I assure you that ALL of these quotes have included an allegation of the exact type of abuse referenced at some point in the conversation/testimony, and the second sentence on is part of the explanation given. Some are my client, others are the opposing party during my examination.

- "He's manipulative. He doesn't actually do anything that I could call abusive, but he does things to make me feel abused anyway. That's how he tries to get away with his abuse."

- "He's manipulative." I ask, "How does he manipulate you?" She answers, "By asking me to do things, and then I feel like I have to do what he wants all the time." I ask, "Does he ever threaten you if you don't do it, either direct or implied?" "No, I just know that he'll be angry. He uses his anger to manipulate me into getting his way."
- "He's manipulative. He uses the kids as pawns to get at me." I ask, "How so?" She answers, "When we're fighting, sometimes he takes the kids and leaves the house. He says he's 'giving me time to cool off.'" "What does he do with them?" "Usually they go to a park or out for ice cream or something fun, knowing that I'm at home in tears - and he doesn't care. Then he looks like the fun dad and I'm the crazy mom who they have to be saved from. And everyone thinks HE is the hero in the situation!"
- "He's emotionally abusive. Every time we argue, he just sits there silently and doesn't talk or get mad or do anything. He knows it infuriates me, but he keeps doing it!"
- "He's emotionally abusive. He loves to look at me with this smug grin on his face, even when I'm obviously mad at him." I ask, "You mean he does it when you're not mad too?" She answers, "Yeah, he's just smug all the time."
- "He's emotionally abusive. He told me if I tried to leave him, he'd fight for custody of the kids."
- "He's emotionally abusive. He told me that if I didn't handle this situation his way, he'd take the kids and live with his mom for a while." I asked, "Isn't that what you did when you filed for divorce two years ago before dismissing it?" She answers, "Yeah, but I'm the mother. That's different."
- "He's sexually abusive. He thinks I should have sex with him whenever he feels like it, and he'll try to pressure me to say yes." I ask, "Do you say yes or do you stand your ground?" She answers, "I always say yes. It wouldn't be abuse if I felt like I was allowed to say no."
- "He's sexually abusive. He made me give him blow jobs even though he knows I don't like it."
- "He's sexually abusive. He looks at me all the time, even when I don't want him to. It creeps me out."
- "He's sexually abusive. When we have sex, after he's finished he ends things and never tries to help me along, then makes me feel guilty for not finishing as fast as him. It makes me not want to have sex with him anymore." I ask, "So did you stop having sex with him or tell him you didn't want to?" She answered, "No. I just started finishing myself off afterward."
- "He's sexually abusive. He raped me many times during our marriage, forcing me to do all kinds of outrageous things, like blow jobs, hand jobs, and other stuff." I find peers in her congregation to confront her about these accusations. She tells them, "Oh, I made all that up. My attorney said I had to say those things to win custody."
- "He's financially abusive. He controls the check book and I have to ask for permission whenever I want to buy anything." I ask, "Has he ever said no to anything that you needed for daily living purposes?" She answered, "No."
- "He's financially abusive" as above (a common one). I ask the same question. She answers, "No." I ask, "Has he ever said no to anything you wanted to buy at all?" She answers, "No. But he still has all the power over the finances and I have none."
- "He's financially abusive. He keeps all the accounts in his name and refuses to let me know what's in the accounts." I ask, "Have you ever asked and he told you no?" She answers, "No. I don't feel like I'm allowed to ask. But he never gave me access."

- "He's financially abusive. He buys whatever he wants, like eating out for lunch while he's at work pretty much every day. But when I want to buy something, he always says no." I say, "Give me examples of things he's said no to." She answers, "Usually new decorations for the house." I ask, "Is he buying decorations for his man cave or his office?" She answers, "No, he doesn't value decor, and because he controls all the money, it means I can never have what I want, while he still gets to have whatever he wants." I ask, "And what is it, exactly, that he wants?" She answers, "Usually he just spends money on food." [Note: the guy wasn't even obese.]
- "He's financially abusive. He spends all our money, and then there's nothing left for basic needs. We're in so much debt." I ask, "What types of things does he buy?" She answers, "TVs, sound systems, video game systems, computer stuff." I ask, "Have you ever bought things like that for fun yourself?" She answers, "Yeah, he buys me a new smart phone every year. I also have a few ipads and a laptop. He likes to buy me jewelry too. He thinks I have to forgive him when he does that. But then when there's no money left for groceries, we end up having to put it on the credit card, and now I'm constantly in a panic over all the debt we've racked up. Can the courts make him stop? I can't handle the financial abuse."
- "He's financially abusive. He knows I can't afford this divorce, yet he keeps doing everything possible to ring up my attorney fees and make this case cost a small fortune." I think to myself, "No, you calling me for 3 hour chats 2-3 times a week to talk about your insecurities and not letting me hang up the phone is what's costing you a small fortune. Learn to shut up and this whole thing would have been 80% cheaper."
- "He's verbally abusive. He yells and screams and swears at me all the time." I ask, "Do you ever do it back?" She answers, "Yes."
- "He's verbally abusive. He lies all the time." I ask, "Do you have any proof of any of the lies you just told me about?" She answers, "No, he's really good at hiding things. And a lot of the stuff he lies about are smaller things just to get under my skin, not big things that would be provable."
- "He's verbally abusive. He calls me names and tries to make me feel bad about myself, telling me I'm worthless and that nobody could love me." I respond, "I'm really sorry to hear that. That sounds cruel. How did you handle it?" I thought she'd say she went to her room and cried. Her actual answer: "I know I shouldn't have done it, but I started breaking his things. I figured that if I wasn't worth anything, he couldn't have anything worth anything either. I get that I reacted poorly, but that doesn't change the fact that the way he talked to me was abuse, and I want the court to see that."
- "He's physically abusive. Just look at these pictures!" She pulls them out, I say, "Oh, that red mark on your neck?" She says, "No, that was a bug bite. It's the spot on my arm, where he hit me." I ask, "Oh, the dot right there?" She says, "No, the other arm." She points to a slight discoloration that I'm pretty sure was really just a shadow. I say, "Oh, the picture must just be faded too much to notice. Can you get me one with better resolution so the judge can see what you're pointing out?" After she gets me the better resolution copy the next day, I still couldn't see it. She didn't have any other angles of the shot (presumably because she couldn't get the shading just right from any other angle).
- "He's physically abusive. Look at the pictures of the bruises on my arm!" The pictures were entered as exhibits and showed very serious bruises. She added, "I took this video of him slamming a door on my arm repeatedly." It gets marked as an exhibit and played for the judge. The video shows the two arguing, then she drops her phone, so the video goes black, but audio can be heard of her screaming and a door slamming on her arm multiple times. Later at trial, I have my client on the stand presenting a video that he was taking simultaneously, showing her slamming the door on her own arm with an identical audio track.
- "He stalks me. He walks his dog in front of my house all the time." I ask, "How far away does he live?" She answers, "4 houses down."

- "He stalks me. He constantly posts things on Facebook directed to me and he won't stop." I ask, "Have you ever told him to stop?" She answers, "No." I ask, "How difficult has it been managing your social media account with him doing this?" She answers, "Oh, he doesn't actually tag me in any of them. I only find out about it because my friends tell me about it."
- "He stalks me. He used to take videos of us having sex together." I asked, "When did you find out about this?" She answers, "I mean, I agreed to it at first, but I didn't know he was still doing it after the first few times. Plus, I didn't know he had videos of other women too - and he didn't delete them after he broke up with them! He probably still has my video too. Don't you think that's creepy like a stalker? He's out there watching videos of me naked after we're divorced. The court has to realize that's stalking, right?" I ask, "Do you have any evidence that he's actually watching those videos?" She answers, "No." I ask where she found the videos, she answers, "In a box in our shed." I ask, "Does he know you found the videos?" She answers, "No." I ask, "So, in all probability, he thinks they're still packed away in a box in the shed and hasn't actually seen them in years, right?" She answers, "Yeah, I guess that makes sense."

In all of these situations, the women genuinely believed they were the victims of abuse. I 100% believe that they were being sincere in their allegations, despite that in most situations they did not come anywhere close to the actual legal standard of abuse. To that end, I have only used examples from cases where the allegation of abuse didn't actually get substantiated in court (except a few of them, where the cases are still pending, but it's not been an issue yet). I'm not here to increase panic about the divorce-rape boogey-man.

BONUS 1. Gender Reversal: "She filed a CPO against me saying I'm abusive, but she's the abusive one!" I ask, "How so?" He answers, "For example, when we would have sex, she'd make me choke her. I was really uncomfortable with it, but she'd pressure me saying she couldn't orgasm unless I was choking her hard enough that she was actually having trouble breathing."

BONUS 2. Parental Alienation [an EXTREMELY common conversation]: "He/she is alienating my kids from me! He/she lies about me, blames me for everything in front of the kids, keeps telling the kids I cheated on him/her, tells the kids it's my fault we're getting divorced, etc. This HAS to stop. Don't the courts care about parental alienation? I read online that this is a big deal and that the Courts will put a stop to it." I ask, "How's your relationship with your children?" They answer, "Oh, they love and adore me. Our relationship is very strong." I ask, "How's the other party's relationship with the kids." They answer, "Not very good. The kids really struggle being over there because of how bad of a person he/she is." I ask, "Given what you just said, who do you think the court will believe is the actual alienated parent?" They answer, "But they're doing it to themselves! I'm the one being alienated by all the things they say about me." I answer, "Give me 3 examples of how your relationship with the children has been irreparably harmed by those things." They never get past the first.

BONUS 3. Danger to the Child: "He doesn't love our daughter. It's so obvious. He's using a size 3 nipple, which I know is the manufacturer recommended, but she had acid reflux 6 months ago, so she should only be using a size 1 nipple on her bottles to limit the flow. How does the court not see that he just doesn't care about his daughter at all?" [Yes, this one's more exaggerated because of the way I summarized the conversation, but every claim I referenced is true, nonetheless.]

Caveats

In maybe 2-3 of these cases there were more significant things that came up and these were secondary rationales. But in the majority, these were the primary reasons given.

I also have a number of cases where the abuse was very, very real. This isn't to say that abuse doesn't actually happen. Rather, it's to show that women have a grossly inaccurate concept of what actual abuse looks like.

NOT The Point

My point here is not to make you afraid that all women will cry abuse just because they can. It's also not to make you afraid of abuse charges that she will inevitably contemplate at some point throughout your marriage. I'm also not trying to make you extra cautious of doing anything that could possibly be interpreted as abuse in court.

The Point

My point ACTUALLY IS that if a woman isn't attracted to you or (even if she is) she's decided to leave, she's going to be prone to interpret any negativity in the relationship as a form of abuse no matter what you do. Sometime her feelings will be legitimate in light of the circumstances. Don't be that guy, unless it's self-defense. But none of the things I referenced above went anywhere in court, no matter how fervently she pushed the issue (some cases pending). So, my conclusion for you guys is to look at a list like this and think to yourself:

- There's no point worrying about whether or not she's going to cry "Abuse!" someday. Just assume she will.

From there, the guys who fare best are the ones who make her second-guess why she's divorcing him in the first place. And yes, that second-guessing is EXTREMELY common as well, despite how few women are willing to admit it. But they tell their attorney everything along those lines too. This is one of the reasons it's so vital to maintain a firm "stay plan is the go plan" mentality if your marriage is falling apart - not in the hope that you might win her back, but because the things that would give you that chance are the same things that are going to tweak whether she cries "Abuse!" or "Aw, I'm going to miss how bold of a person he was."

Originally drafted for MRP. Still relevant for Christian guys whose marriage is headed toward divorce.

14
UPVOTES

RPCC Episode 3: The State of Marriage

9 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

Here's another round of our video chat series for you all to enjoy. The topic today: The State of Marriage.

Also, some bonus content: a short on whether or not creatine is worth using. Enjoy!

- Episode 3: The State of Marriage
- Short Chat: Creatine

33

UPVOTES

RPC Chat - Episode 4: Christian Dead Bedrooms

16 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

Here you go: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=JQEfHzAv8jA&t=2156s>

TRADITIONAL EXPLANATIONS

I have yet to see an even remotely persuasive view of this verse in any commentary I've read. Yes, I've gone through all of them on biblehub.org. Here are the answers given on that site and others:

1- It's a reference to the fact that a woman would give birth to the Messiah (Elliott, Benson, Matthew Henry, and virtually everyone else)

- Benson suggests Eve is the one saved through child-bearing, fulfilling Genesis 3's curse on the serpent

2- Paul just put the women in their place, so he felt obligated to make them feel better by highlighting that they can have kids and men can't; that is: women still have an honorable function in the earth, if not through teaching then through bearing children (Elliott's)

3- If women are faithful and holy, God will remove the curse of the pain of child-bearing, or perhaps even the possibility of death (Benson)

4- Child-bearing references all maternal duties, being what will save women (Barnes, Geneva)

5- Child-bearing is "synonymous with education ... woman, by the proper training of her children, can obtain salvation as well as her husband, and that her appropriate duty is not public teaching, but the training of her family" (Rosenmuller)

6- The real emphasis is that women must continue in faithfulness and holiness to be saved, as is apparent from the entire rest of the new testament, and the mention of child-bearing is merely because it was the curse on the woman, suggesting that she will be saved even despite the fact that she still experiences pain while bearing children (Barnes, Poole)

7- Child-bearing, and the work associated with it, would be the context in which women are most likely to be saved, whereas a lifestyle of public teaching would actually decrease their likelihood toward salvation (Jamieson-Fausset-Brown)

WHY THEY DON'T WORK

1) There is NOTHING in the context to support the reference to the Messiah. Further, the future-tense of the child-bearing being a salvific event precludes the option of the past child-bearing event of Jesus' birth, not to mention the "if they continue" language. This point is also made moot by the fact that men are also saved by the fact of Mary (a woman) having given birth to Jesus, so why would women be singled out in this way? For this to make sense, Paul would have had to re-word himself: "Women will be honored by being the gender through which the Messiah was born," yet that's not what he said. Barnes does a decent job shredding this view apart.

2) The passage doesn't say women will be "honored" or "esteemed." It says they will be "saved." The word for "will be saved" is used a dozen or so other times, none of those times being translated anything remotely close to honored/esteemed. The only two times it's not used salvifically are, ironically, references to Jesus bringing someone back from the dead. It seems apparent that these are interpretive translations whereby "will be resurrected" or "will be made well" could have just as easily been translated: "will be saved [from death]."

3) One could argue that the invention of epidurals has fulfilled this verse, defeating the curse. The problem is that this is available even to the most vile of women, having nothing to do with faith and holiness. There seems to be no distinction between those who are faithful/holy and those who aren't when it comes to pain in child bearing.

4) Again, if we take "saved" in a soteriological sense, as seems to be the case from the other uses of the word, this interpretation would make the passage read: "Men are saved by grace through faith, but women are saved if they have kids, but only if they're faithful and holy also." This is against most of the rest of the new testament on soteriology.

5) This interpretation seems to create an unnatural separation of the words as if it's suggesting, "Women will be saved, just like men, and they will also have a role of teaching among their children." It ignores the "saved THROUGH child-bearing" part.

6) This is perhaps the most plausible of the unlikely options. My only objection is that the word "through" in the phrase doesn't lend itself to be reinterpreted this way. Every other use of the word "through" here is a direct causal relationship. Many translations of the Greek word for "through" also say "because of." The majority use it in the context of something being said "through the prophets," emphasizing that they were the vehicle by which something would happen. It's also frequently translated as "by." None of the alternative translations lend themselves to this interpretation.

7) I'm fascinated by this interpretation, affirming my appreciation for the JFS commentary whenever I have come across it. But there is still too little context for this interpretation to make sense, and it ignores the causal nature of the word "through" in the actual text.

WHAT IT DOES MEAN

Virtually every commentary on the subject tries to "explain away" the phrase as if it means something other than it says. I propose that the Bible means what it says in this situation. The context is obviously soteriological, as it blatantly references the fall of humanity by its reference to Eve's first sin, and then immediately explains how women are to be saved going forward.

To give my TL;DR: We often discuss here that physical reproduction is a shadow of the reality of spiritual reproduction. I have also referenced on many occasions the soteriological connection to spiritual reproduction (which I will reiterate below). In this, child-bearing for women does have both spiritual soteriological significance (in the sense of producing spiritual children for them to mother, being the women they convert and disciple) as well as physical significance (by producing children to be the primary objects of their evangelistic efforts).

THE FULL EXPLANATION

Understanding the Fruit

Jesus talks a lot about plants, fruit, seeds, farming, growing, etc. He is consistent in his use of them. The parable of the sower is the most obvious one to interpret because he actually takes his disciples aside and explains exactly what it means:

- The seed is God's Word.
- We are the soil.
- The plant is when God's word grows in a person.
- When the plant grows large enough, it bears fruit.
- Fruit is the seed-bearing part of the tree that drops into the nearby soil.
- That seed then can grow, if the nearby soil is good soil.
- The result is that the tree yields a crop "30, 60, or 100 times what was sown."
- Only the good soil does this, and there's no room for the expectation that the good soil WON'T do this. It WILL.

In this, we see some imperative that those who are genuinely saved will produce fruit and a crop. The fruit contains the seed that we spread to those around us. The crop are those who grow from that seed, being those who we convert and ultimately disciple. Paul talks about evangelism as the planting process and discipleship as the one who tends the plant with water, fertilizer, etc. God is the one who makes it grow.

Caveat

Before I go much further, let me make clear up-front: I am not suggesting that spiritual reproduction is a prerequisite to salvation. That would be an absurd conclusion, as that would mean that one must have sex (physical reproduction) before they can be married. Instead, the marriage precedes reproduction, yet is also what consecrates it. Just as sex affirms the authenticity of the marriage and precludes the possibility of annulment, so also does spiritual reproduction - bearing fruit for Christ - affirm the authenticity of our salvation and preclude the possibility of a spiritual annulment, as will be addressed more with regard to the soteriological significance of the fruit, below.

Let me also make clear up-front that the fruit is not the actual disciple who is produced from our effort. That would be the plant that grows from the fruit falling in the nearby soil. Instead, the fruit is the part of us that goes out to spread seed into the nearby soil. The soil it falls in is still separate from the fact of the fruit that spread the seed there.

Soteriological Significance of Fruit

With that foundation, look at many other passages and the soteriological significance of bearing fruit and helping the crops grow:

First, the parable of the sower itself shows that this is directly associated with being good soil. I won't rehash that.

Second, in Matthew 7, Jesus says that we will recognize true believers from false ones by their fruit, showing the soteriological significance of bearing fruit (i.e. spreading seed, being God's Word out of us).

Third, in that same passage, Jesus doesn't say that the tree that produces bad fruit will be cut down and thrown into the fire (though this is also implicit), but that the tree that "fails to produce good fruit" is the one that is burned up.

Fourth, if we look at the parable of the talents/minas, it's all about reproducing what God gave you. The one who had 10 reproduced 10, the one with 5 reproduced 5. The one with 1 talent/mina held onto it and did not reproduce. He didn't lose it! That's important. He kept it safe. But he didn't reproduce it. What happened? It was taken away from him and he was cast into a place with the exact same description Jesus uses for hell ("weeping and gnashing of teeth").

Fifth, the parable of the fig tree (Luke 13:6-9) tells of a fruitless tree that the master wanted to cut down. It wasn't producing bad fruit. It wasn't a dead tree. It was a barren one. The gardener asks for one more year to fertilize it, tend it, and help it grow. He says, "If it produces fruit, I've saved the tree. But if it doesn't, then after giving it that one last chance, you're welcome to chop it down and throw it in the fire."

There are many, many more examples, but it's quite obvious throughout Scripture that spiritual reproduction is tied to soteriology. And consider how a woman's barrenness in the old testament was such a great shame over her! It was considered a sign of God having cursed her. She could have otherwise been a fantastic wife and woman, yet by being barren she was considered disgraced all the same. So it is with the barren believer.

The Unforgivable Sin

I'll actually add one more example: the unforgivable sin. Lots of people ask what it is. Jesus says it's "blasphemy of the Holy Spirit." Most people don't like the actual context of the passage and will say, "No, saying something with your words can't make you commit it. It's a heart thing." Then they'll break it down into one of the two most popular answers: (1) It's callousing your heart so hard that you will never choose repentance again, or (2) It's ignoring the Holy Spirit's work in your life all the way to the point of death without ever repenting.

These answers are completely absurd because there is NOTHING in the context of the passage at all that would even remotely imply this. It requires eisegesis to impute those concepts into the passage to get there. Let's look at the actual context:

- The pharisees verbally accused Jesus of working through demonic powers.
- Jesus rebukes them.
- He tells everyone that "every kind of sin and slander/blasphemy can be forgiven" - specifically highlighting verbal sins (slander).
- He adds, "Anyone who speaks a word against the Son of Man will be forgiven" - again, a verbal sin.
- "But anyone who speaks against the Holy Spirit will not be forgiven, either in this age or in the age to come" - obviously talking about verbal communication.

So what does it mean to "speak against" or "blaspheme" the Holy Spirit?

The obvious contextual answer is to do exactly what the Pharisees just did to Jesus, which created the context for why Jesus said all this in the first place. The pharisees verbally attempted to thwart Jesus' efforts by preaching against him to convince others not to follow him. I have to imagine that if we do the same against the efforts of the Holy Spirit - that is, verbally attempt to persuade others away from the faith that the Spirit is drawing them toward - this would be blasphemy of the Holy Spirit instead of "blasphemy of the Son of Man."

Let's expand on this. Acts 1:8 tells us that the function of the Holy Spirit when he comes on us is to cause us to become God's witnesses to the world. That is: spiritual reproduction. God's Word grows in us because of the Spirit's work, which then produces the fruit that is spread into the nearby soil ("Jerusalem, Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth"). So, the work of the Spirit is ultimately to cause us to produce good fruit (i.e. converts and disciples).

While the Spirit produces good fruit, one who produces bad fruit is one who does the opposite. Instead of generating life, they compel others toward death. Bad fruit is still fruit - it is still reproduction and not the same as barrenness. But it's producing something vile rather than nothing at all. The fruit is dead. So, one who produces "bad fruit" produces death in others, leading them away from life.

In short: those who "speak against/blaspheme the Holy Spirit" are those who attempt to lead others away from the life that the Spirit offers to everyone. It is those who fight against the Gospel and attempt to lure believers away from salvation and into death.

To recap up to this point:

- Trees with good fruit are those who are alive in Christ and actively sharing their faith among the soil (people) around them.
- Barren trees are those who are neutral and apathetic, having no interest to share their faith or fight against the faith, except to the degree that they find the conversations stimulating/amusing.
- Bad fruit comes from the active efforts made by those who seek to thwart the efforts of the Holy Spirit, leading others away from life and reproducing death in them instead.

The connectivity between the fruit and the unforgivable sin is obvious in that the very next verse after the unforgivable sin is: "Make a tree good and its fruit will be good, or make a tree bad and its fruit will be bad, for a tree is recognized by its fruit."

Oh, and after that Jesus goes into the verbal nature of the unforgivable sin: "how can you who are evil say anything good? For the mouth speaks what the heart is full of ... everyone will have to give account on the day of judgment for every empty WORD they have spoken. For by your WORDS you will be acquitted, and by your WORDS you will be condemned." I'm not sure how we ignore the verbal nature of this entire passage, or the context of the fruit.

... not to mention that the only reason Jesus is preaching on this at all is to rebuke the pharisees for trying to lead people away from following him, making it even more obvious that the unforgivable sin is to verbally entice others away from the life that the Holy Spirit is enticing them toward, specifically "blaspheming" the Holy Spirit in the process.

Oh yeah, and beyond the fruit being mentioned in the passage itself, you'll note that I bring up the parable of the sower a lot here because that parable is shared in the very next chapter and begins with, "That same day." That is, the parable of the sower was preached almost immediately after Jesus taught on the unforgivable sin (technically, he got interrupted before he could finish his explanation, the parable of the sower being Jesus's way to get back on track).

What about vocal atheists?

This always comes up, so let me clarify: it's one thing to present a defense of your own world view. Most vocal atheists are doing just that. They're pushy about it - not because they're trying to force Christians to give up their faith (much less with any success), but because they're intellectually ambitious and arrogant of their own views. They debate just because they enjoy the debate, not because they want to stifle the Holy Spirit (even though their actions may at least appear to have that impact). In this sense, most vocal atheists are forgivable, if they repent.

Under the view I'm presenting, the point where they cross the line is when they actually shift their focus off of mere verbal jousting as a game they enjoy, and instead adopt the focus of the pharisees: to allow their hate for the Holy Spirit's work cause them to argue that what the Holy Spirit does is evil in an effort to entice those who would live by the Spirit away (I may even add: "and actually succeeding").

Arguably, this wouldn't even apply to the degree they may persuade a fellow non-believer not to be saved, as there's no death being produced - there was already death in the non-believer in the first case. In that situation, they're merely nurturing the conditions for death to remain. Rather, if they actually persuade a genuine believer to give up their faith with the goal of stifling the Spirit's efforts, that's actually reproducing their own death into someone else who wasn't previously dead. That is when they have produced bad fruit.

Fun Fact

As something of an aside, the soteriological significance of spiritual reproduction also explains Deuteronomy 23:1 - "No one whose testicles are crushed or whose male organ is cut off shall enter the assembly of the Lord." What a fascinating verse. Why not? Because if you have no capacity to reproduce, you have no business pretending to be among God's people. In the old testament, it references the testicles as the means of physical reproduction. We now understand this as spiritual reproduction, and therefore anyone who is spiritually incapable of reproduction cannot be among God's people. Fortunately, all people are "capable" - yet some of us refuse, becoming like the eunuchs who emasculate themselves by choice, which Jesus references in Matthew 19.

THE CHILD-BEARING ASPECT OF MARRIAGE

What does any of this have to do with women being saved through child-bearing? I know I've gone on what must seem to be a confusing side-track for a bit. But here's where it connects.

If failing to produce good fruit is what causes someone to be chopped down and thrown into the fire (i.e. go to hell), then it follows that the only way to know you won't go to hell is to produce good fruit.

In Malachi 2:15, we read, "And why did the Lord make them [husbands/wives] one [flesh], with a portion of his [Holy] Spirit in their union? To produce godly offspring." That is: the point of marriage is to produce godly offspring.

God didn't want just any offspring. Adam and Eve fully populated the world by the time of Noah, but God wiped them all away with the flood, saying through his actions, "That's not what I meant when I asked you to fill the earth." Instead, Malachi 2:15 clarifies that God wanted GODLY offspring - people who are spiritually alive.

In the New Testament we readily understand that godly offspring is not produced merely from our physical descendants (even the Old Testament, such as in Zechariah, we see that the physical offspring of the spiritually alive can still be spiritually dead), but through our spiritual descendants. While Paul was not Timothy's physical father, he calls him his son in a spiritual sense. Romans 9 talks about how it is not those who are the physical descendants of Abraham who are his true children, but those who are the descendants of the faith of Abraham. Peter and John, in their epistles, also reference having spiritual children.

So, just as Malachi 2:15 alludes to the godly physical offspring of husbands and wives, the way married couples bear physical children is a model for how the church (and us, individually, as part of it) ought to bear spiritual children. Per the above, this child-bearing concept is directly associated with salvation - not that it makes us saved, but that saving faith will always lead to a compulsion to spread seed (which is found in our fruit). Put another way, our spiritual marriage to Christ should create a desire to spiritually reproduce with him in the same way that our physical marriages should include a healthy desire to engage in physically reproductive acts with our spouse.

CONCLUSION

So, "women are saved through child-bearing" seems to be this: Just as a wife is to bear children for her husband, which was (biblically) her most significant role in the household for most of history, so also is Christ's bride - the Church - meant to bear spiritual children for our groom. This process of child-bearing is substantially and undeniably tied throughout Scripture to our ultimate judgment. Reproducing spiritual offspring for Christ, our spiritual groom, contributes to and affirms our salvation in the same way sex (physical reproduction) contributes to and affirms a physical marriage - not as a necessary prerequisite (lest we be accused of reproducing with Christ before we are married to him), but as the seal that binds a marriage in the same way physical reproduction consecrates a physical marriage, eliminating the possibility of annulment.

In this sense, women are quite literally and soteriologically saved through child-bearing - not merely in the physical sense, but in the sense of raising spiritual children for which their ability to birth and raise physical children is a template.

Interestingly, "women are saved through child-bearing" can't possibly mean that they have a different means of salvation than men, as if men are saved by grace through faith, but women through child-bearing. That would be an absurd and inconsistent result with the rest of Scripture. Instead, it's best to understand that the soteriological significance of spiritual child-bearing is imputed to men in the way that we also adopt the role of the bride in regard to our union with Christ. That is, the soteriological rubric is same between both men and women in our relationship with Christ, yet women as a physical gender are uniquely given the template for how spiritual reproduction ought to occur by virtue of the physical representation they express in human marriages.

I just wrote this as a comment to someone else, but spent too much time on it not to make a post of it. So, here goes. The question was, essentially, how to arouse a husband who doesn't show much sexual interest in you. These are, for the most part, meant to be long-term solutions rather than short "put on lingerie, light some candles, cast Marvin Gaye to the speaker, and draw him in" types of advice that really only create one-off moments.

This is a good question - and it's not the first time I've heard it. This sub probably needs a guide on the sidebar for women on how they can enhance sexuality within a marriage, especially when the husband seems disinterested. Maybe /u/RedPillWonder has already written something like this. Either way, here are a few things that come to mind:

Physical Appearance

I know most people don't want to hear it, but guys are primarily turned on by physical appearance. Is he sexually attracted to certain celebrities? If the answer is yes, then it's not that he's sexually disinterested; it's that he's sexually disinterested in you. Ouch. I'm sure that hurts to hear. But the good news is that there are LOTS of things women can do to become more physically attractive. Lose weight. Develop an appealing fashion sense. Become more skilled at wearing makeup. Adjust posture. Use body language.

I used to be very unattractive to my wife. She'd suggest I change as a way of improving her sexual interest in me. I'd say, "But some of these things are just part of who I am." Her reply: "So you're saying that your self-identity is tied to wearing ugly clothes? That somehow if you stopped wearing ugly clothes, you as a person would change?" The reality is that it wasn't an identity issue for me. It was a preference issue. I wanted a better sex life, but at the time I preferred wearing my comfy-pants (even in public) more than I desired to have sex with my wife. That, in turn, made her have no sexual desire for me, creating a nasty sexual stale-mate. I had to lose 50+ lbs, gain a ton of muscle, up my wardrobe, start wearing cologne, etc. to be more attractive. Now, just yesterday, she's commenting on watching my butt while on a hike. All those things that made me unattractive that I didn't want to give up, or the hard work I didn't want to start - it's all just part of life now and I don't find my new lifestyle any less "me" or even less enjoyable than my prior lifestyle. Actually, I'm MUCH happier now, even though I couldn't have foreseen myself becoming happier before I'd started moving forward in these areas.

Kino

Beyond mere appearance, men are also turned on by direct physical contact. Kino is the art of utilizing physical contact to stimulate arousal. Learn to apply it and your husband will get hard fast. Just be tactful. Grabbing his crotch right off the bat isn't likely to work and the, "There, I tried and failed" attitude is unhelpful (I've been there and seen other women go there). Use physical touch in different ways. A hug might not get him thinking about sex. He might think you're looking for emotional connectivity through the hug. The same thing could apply to a kiss when he gets home from work or before bed. Most people take general gestures as just that: general and not a communication of desire.

Instead, try sitting next to him on the couch when you're watching a movie, rather than sitting on a chair across the room. Put your hand on his thigh and rub your fingers back and forth for a while. When you snuggle up to him, instead of just enjoying the comfort, put your hand on his chest. Maybe even slide your hand up his shirt just to feel the warmth of his skin. Give him a massage without expecting one in return. As part of the massage, slide your hands down his back and around his waist toward his front side, then go down his legs rather than pushing for his crotch. The point here is to tease his arousal, not to force it through direct contact. Get him thinking about sex without him realizing that's what you're pushing for. If he notices right away that you're trying to get him aroused, his anti-sex defenses will go up. Once he is aroused, they stay down.

Clothes

I don't think women realize how drastically important their clothing is toward getting a man to desire her. For some, this is a "down the road" kind of thing. You really have to have the right body to make your clothes work for you. But even then, there's a lot of wiggle room if you're clever with your fashion sense. There are even some obese models I've been shocked to find myself look twice at - all because they knew how to make their attire work for them. The goal here isn't to look respectable or cute or even fashionable. It's to look attractive and feminine. There is a huge difference. The clothes women like for themselves do not often overlap with the clothes men would want to see on their wives to instigate sexual desire. My wife can still use a lot of work on this one. Her go-to outfit is jeans and a t-shirt. She thinks it works because they're girly t-shirts. But they're not attractive. Even skin-tight jeans do nothing for me. I don't even get interested in yoga pants or leggings. Know what does it for me? Skirts and dresses. Capris can even work. Gaucho pants are also fine. My rule of thumb: if men commonly wear it, it's not going to attract a man. I don't want my wife to dress like a man. I married a woman for a reason.

Now, most women assume lingerie is the answer. Yes, lingerie is great. I LOVE it. But it's only great when you're already headed toward sex. It doesn't actually get him headed there, though. It assumes he's already ready to go, or that it will be enough of a tipping point to get him ready. In reality, if you want him thinking of sex before you get in the bedroom (which is the best way to assure it happens when you do get in the bedroom), you should be wearing clothes that imply sexuality ahead of time and save the lingerie for an added boost to his already-aroused state.

Attitude

There are really 3 qualities that affect a woman's SMV (sexual market value) to a man. The first is her physical appearance (often numerically reduced to an HB ranking - ex. "She's a 7"). The second is her fluency with physical contact. A guy will be more attracted to a woman who touches him than who stays seated on the other side of the table. This is where kino comes in. In my experience, it actually boosts attractiveness and not just arousal. But the third is your attitude. Some women are total nagging harpies or plain-janes who think their husband should get hard just because she says the word "sex." This is counter-productive and only actually works for incel men who would hump anything that gave them the time of day.

I've known a lot of women who thought they had a "good attitude" because they were generally positive, optimistic, upbeat, and happy people. That's fine. But having a "good attitude" is not the same thing as having an "arousing attitude" or a "sexually alluring attitude." You ever watch a James Bond movie? Notice how the girl who wants to get him in bed doesn't act like a wife. She acts like a woman who wants to get him in bed. Right? There are some women who are not physically appealing, yet I find myself attracted to them anyway because they speak seductively, use body language, have a presence that leaves me thinking: "If I wanted to, I could have sex with her right now." This attitude can be conveyed 100% with completely non-sexual dialogue, without any form of physical contact, and without overtly being sexual.

Now, part of this is tied to Madonna-Whore Complex (which it sounds like your husband may suffer from), and I'm persuaded that adjusting one's attitude is the best solution, even over wearing better clothes or applying kino, which are things even the sweet, innocent types will do. Instead, a seductive attitude stems from you FEELING like a sexual person first. Most Christian women who struggle with sexual allure have the framework, "I'm a good girl, but sometimes I behave sexually 'naughty' with my husband," then are proud of themselves with these isolated moments of sexual expression. This perpetuates the M-WC to be even worse. Instead, flip it to tell yourself, "I'm a naughty nymph, but I behave innocently so some people don't see it." Then let your husband be one of the people who DOES get to see it.

I will also note that just as a "good attitude" is sexually neutral and an "alluring attitude" is sexually seductive ... a "BAD attitude" is a HUGE turn-off. Don't be a harpy. Don't nag. don't complain. Don't boss him around. If you need help, ask him when he's available to help you rather than telling him, "Come here, I need your help."

Dialogue

I put this one really low on the list because it should be an afterthought. Behaviors will always be more alluring than words. If you're relying on words as your primary tool, you will fail. But if you've got the other things in line, learning to incorporate sexual suggestion into your dialogue can go a long way toward getting your man to be thinking about sex with you. This can be done through innuendo, conversations on the topic of sex, commenting when a movie, person on the street, or other person you come across makes you feel sexual, etc. Most women are taught to hide their sexuality. With most of the world, I don't necessarily disagree. But certainly with your husband you should be expressing it regularly, not hiding it. Sadly, for most women they've been hiding it for so long that they don't even know how to begin expressing it - especially through dialogue - and it feels very awkward and forced. Do it anyway. Even if it's out of character and out of context.

I will note here that general encouragement and support toward your husband is not sexually alluring. It's a fantastic expression of your loving commitment toward him and can help strengthen the relational bond you have with him, but this type of dialogue does nothing to entice a sexual bond. So, recognize that even good behaviors only work within their own context.

Ambiance: The above advice should produce long-lasting results with a continual boost to your husband's sexual interest in you. If you are doing well in those areas and you just need something that tips him over the edge, try working on creating a sexual ambiance in your home. Most women like very sterile, neutral colors for their walls, generic paintings of landscapes or flowers for the walls, etc. Try putting up decore that evokes sexual thought and imagery. It doesn't have to be sexual. My grandparents, for example, had a painting on their wall for as long as I knew them that was of a woman carrying a vase of water with a man holding his arms around her. It was not at all inappropriate for company to see - it would have been viewed as a normal painting. But it also expresses a moment of intimacy between two people. [I actually think my grandmother is the one who painted it.]

I also liked buying LED lights that changed colors. So, if I had company over, I could make them ordinary white. But if I wanted, I could change them to red or blue or something else that set a different atmosphere than the typical stale white colors we often see. Or lighting candles around a room to light it, rather than just the one on your kitchen counter for the scent, can go a long way. Or you can use cheap tactics and "accidentally" start leaving some of your sexier bras and panties on the floor by your bed where he'll take notice, whereas most women generally try to hide their "unmentionables" (oh, and stop calling them that). The point here is that there are lots of things you can do with the aesthetics of your house that convey intimacy and sexuality without being totally awkward when outsiders come in.

Sexual Association

Another thing that can help is to start creating sexual association with non-sexual things. For example, I was at a Bible study once where we were talking about the word "consecrate." One lady asked, "Is that like when you move into a new house and you consecrate it by having sex in every room?" Her husband says, "No, that's christening." Well, now a perfectly normal word that gets used even in Christian conversation ("consecrate") reminds me and my wife of that story and gets us thinking about sex. These types of associations can help create natural triggers toward sexual thought, which raise sexual activity overall.

How do you pull this off intentionally? Create a running joke about it. For example, you can be sarcastic about how some lame chore, like folding laundry, is so exciting for you. He comes home from work and asks how your day was. You say, "I folded laundry for an hour. It was so exciting! [with dry sarcasm]. Just thinking about the excitement of folding laundry anymore makes me horny." You both laugh. Next week, you're watching a show, pull some laundry out of the dryer and plot it on the floor to start folding it and say, "Laundry day. Time to get horny," as you hold up a pair of underwear. He remembers the previous joke and you both laugh. You've just created an inside joke and now every time you fold laundry he remembers that it "makes you horny" (sarcastically). You can push even harder by actually initiating sex while folding laundry or having sex on top of a clean laundry pile (yes, even if it means having to re-wash some of it). Suddenly, you have this weird "laundry" thing, and the fact that you fold laundry frequently means he's thinking about sex frequently. Just don't force it every time.

Other than a running joke, you can also create associations in other ways. For example: buy him a generic gift, but find a way to use it while having sex. I bought my wife a back massager once. It vibrated. At first, it was used while watching TV. Then I used it to give her an intimate massage before initiating sex. Eventually it got used while having sex. Now there's a household item that invokes sexual imagery/memory. Repeat the process with other things, like ice cubes or certain types of food or a pencil or some other random object that you SOMEHOW incorporate into sex. I once bought my wife a bouquet of flowers and used the petals to rub her intimately during sex. It wasn't particularly mind-blowing and was probably less interesting than normal stimulation ... but it made her laugh now that type of flower reminds her of that one time she was pleased by one.

That's all I've got time for. Best wishes.

24

UPVOTES

RPC Podcast Episode 6: Fitness Tests (and a crucial announcement)

30 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

Hi all, here's another episode of our RPC video chat series:

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=4eSrwjvPMn4&feature=youtu.be>

With that link in mind, there are rumors on the secular RP subs that another wave of SJW sub-banning is about to start and they're calling for all RP-related subs to be removed. Are we at risk? It would be unjustified, given our content compared to the other RP subs, but it's certainly possible. So, our solution for now is:

- SUBSCRIBE TO THE YOUTUBE CHANNEL. If this sub is ever shut down, we will announce our new location from this channel.

Yes, YouTube might shut down RP-related content too, but the odds of them doing it at the same time reddit does is pretty low.

Also, you'll be glad to see that more of our guys are turning their videos on at this point in the series - or at least using a pic ;)

LIVE CHAT

Also - is anyone interested in doing a Q&A session with me on Reddit Public Access Network? I've thought about doing something like this soon. You can't get the whole team on it, as it seems to be one camera at a time, but it could be fun.

ONE-ON-ONE CHAT

Also - I'm planning on doing what I call "walk and talks." I've done this with a number of guys from this sub, where I, essentially, walk around my neighborhood while chatting with them about various topics. It could be a relationship struggle they're going through, divorce advice, developing their mission, coaching on how to transform their congregation into having a culture of discipler-making, practicing studying the Bible together - or any other number of things. I have come to love these conversations. Well, after having enough of them it occurred to me that I could record some of these conversations and post them for others to benefit from as well. Anyone interested?

18

UPVOTES

RPC Podcast Episode 7: The Importance of OYS

8 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

Yeah, nobody wants to hear this topic. It's easier to get intellectual about self-improvement than actually doing it. Is that your struggle? Listen in.

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=u54FjCpt2ds>

Here's the latest in the RPC Chat series: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=2zcO9cDxcfQ&feature=youtu.be>

Some of my "walk-and-talk" conversations will start going up between these videos. They can either be on-point with red pill topics, or completely side conversations.

- The first, which will be posted soon, is a conversation with /u/praexology. It will address the spiritual realm - demonic forces, angelic armies, healing ministries, and other forms of spiritualism. While not necessarily authoritative, it's a fun conversation that addresses many questions people ask from time to time. I love to see prax's passion for this subject and I'm glad he's getting an opportunity to share it with you all!
- The next one to be posted after that is a chat I had today with Levi (/u/thechristianalpha) about the coronavirus and whether Christians should engage in political revolution.

I do have other calls scheduled, but want to refrain the opportunity for anyone else who would like to chat about anything - this is your moment to be in the spotlight ;) That can include things like ...

- Requests for advice
- Off-topic stuff that's been on your mind
- A subject you'd like to teach on or just flesh out more fully with another person (i.e. me)
- Studying a passage of Scripture together to hone our skills
- Challenges to the things we teach/believe here

Really, the goal of the walk-and-talk conversations is to start empowering our users to take ownership in what we're building here. Send me a message if you'd like to host or be a guest to one of these calls.

Here's the first walk-and-talk, everybody: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=4lvigXaSp68&t=227s>.

In this walk and talk, u/Praexology and I talk demonic forces, angelic armies, healing ministries, and other forms of spiritualism.

Warning: It's a long one, so here's a table of contents if you want to skip to the parts you find most relevant.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

- 0:00 - Intro & Background on u/Praexology
- 7:30 - Praex's Background with Spiritual Warfare
- 9:10 - Personal Experiences with Healing & Over Demonic Oppression
- 13:55 - "Can a Christian be possessed or demonically oppressed, or is that reserved for non-believers?"
- 17:30 - "Why are Spiritual Attacks not publicized in Church?"
- 21:59 - "Why does the Enemy pick one person over another to oppress."
- 24:30 - "Why do people who have experienced spiritual events not immediately come to Christ/faith?"
- 27:20 - "What is the enemies scheme? What is his overarching goal."
- 29:15 - "Why do we see more often demonic influence as opposed to angelic interaction?"
- 30:15 - "Could the focus on negative spiritual interjection be explain away by saying 'people don't want to take personal responsibility for their problems?'"
- 33:50 - "What is the enemies scheme? What is his overarching goal. pt.2"
- 36:25 - Red tries to trip up Praex. :)
- 39:11 - RC's "Screw tapes lost letter" aka. make them stumble by focusing on the general rather than the specific.
- 44:00 - How the enemy misleads or smokescreens your faith walk.
- 49:50 - Healing and Deliverance
- 52:55 - First person story "Healing of an unborn child."
- 56:25 - Healing and Deliverance pt.2 and "The purpose of healing."
- 59:05 - "Why doesn't someone with the gift of healing just go through a hospital and heal everyone in it?"
- 67:50 - RC's background with intercessory work.
- 70:30 - Praex's outline for intercessory work.
- 74:30 - Defining "Theophostic Prayer Ministry" and what can go wrong if underprepared people practice it.
- 83:00 - Outro

23
UPVOTES

Episode 9 - No Frame, No Game

21 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

Frame is a huge topic, so we're breaking this up into a few different episodes. Enjoy, brothers.

<https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ZxrRajelRCI>

15
UPVOTES

Episode 10 - No Frame, No Game Part 2
29 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

Here's the latest edition of the RPC podcast. Enjoy!

https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=J_-_6ymGP1M

I've heard the claim a number of times that "the origins of the word 'church' point to a place of worship." On r/askRPC a user asked if it's a biblical command to attend a weekly service. Other similar issues arise frequently, so let's talk about this.

"Church" is NOT Derived from Ekklesia

You heard me right. "Church" is one of the translations we have given to the word Ekklesia, but that's not the etymological root. The word we derived "church" from is actually German: Kirche. Some suggest that this may have come from the ancient Greek Kuriakon (or sometimes conjugated Kuriakos).

- Kirche in the German referenced a building or location.
- Kuriakon in the Greek generally means "belonging to a lord."

It's not hard to see how some people would confuse the location of the church with something belonging to God. After all, even the Jews before the cross understood the notion of devoting land and property to God (Mark 7:9-13, for example). That said, anyone looking at the two can obviously see that the two words split significantly in their definitions and historical use.

The latter is only used twice in the Bible, and never as a reference to the church. The first is in 1 Cor. 11:20 regarding eating "the Lord's supper." The other is in Revelation 1:10, referencing "the Lord's day." Note, of course, the comparison with Kyrios (sometimes Kurios), which is the Greek for "lord" and often used to reference Jesus throughout most of the epistles.

The Original Ekklesia

When talking about the Church, there are two Greek words that are translated as such: Ekklesia and Koinonia.

Koinonia is the word used to describe the spiritual connectivity of the Church. It is generally used to reference a oneness bond existing throughout a group. It's where we get the word "communion" from, as the KJV translated it that way and the word stuck. During "communion" we share a oneness with Christ. In the same way, Koinonia references, on occasion, the oneness that exists among a body of believers - that we are united in Christ, despite being different members of a singular body.

Ekklesia (or Ecclesia) is the word used to describe the structure of the church. It had an established meaning in the Greek language. While "church" to us seems like a uniquely religious word that predominantly applies to Christians, that wasn't the case for Ekklesia in the Greek language that most of the new testament was written in. It was a commonly understood term for a political (arguably military) structure. There are councils, senates, committees, ekklesias, and so on.

- Thought Experiment 1: Imagine this: in general life among your Christian friends, instead of the church the translation was "senate" and that's the word we used regularly. How would that change your perception of things? "Sorry, I can't hang out on Sunday because I have a Senate meeting." "I love my Senate." "You should go to Senate more often." "The Senate is Christ's bride." This has a massively different connotation to what we understand about the Church today, right? This is how the Greek-speaking population would have read the word - understanding, of course, that the reference was to the spiritual Kingdom, not the physical body that met in Athens.

The original ekklesia was a fascinating event, arising even before Daniel's time, meeting as early as 621BC. The Greek Empire in those days had a form of democracy that involved a popular assembly called an Ekklesia. A few relevant details:

- There were not many Ekklesias. There was only one. It referred to a unified assembly of the entire Kingdom, and not merely individual local assemblies throughout the Kingdom (which also existed by different names).
- It was not only comprised of willing participants of the entirety of the Kingdom; all people in the Kingdom were bound by it! ... even if they were not present or did not agree (i.e. were in the voting minority).
 - It was not a mandatory meeting. While attendance was encouraged, there was no expectation of attendance.
 - A quorum of no less than 6,000 people had to participate in any votes or else it was rendered moot or the meeting would be cancelled.
 - To encourage attendance, a per diem was given to all who participated: 1.5 drachma for special ekklesias and 1 for the ordinary. A drachma was roughly a day's wages.
- It focused not on teaching the attendees how to be "good little boys and girls." Rather, it was viewed as a business meeting. The people voted on issues related to Kingdom expansion - do we go to war? Send a diplomatic envoy to a neighboring Kingdom? Shall we ratify a treaty? Who do we appoint to keep rebels and criminals from destroying the country from within?
- This one's the must humorous to me: it met outside on a plain and not in a building.

I do not believe that in borrowing the word, Jesus or the apostles necessarily intended us to model the Greek structure of the Ekklesia exactly. Rather, I believe they were intending to convey, "Hi all you Greek-speakers. You remember those Ekklesia meetings you've been having all these years? Well, what I'm referring to is kind of like that, but based on the way Christ set it up rather than the way the Greeks set it up." This is pretty much the same thing Paul did in Acts 17 when preaching the Gospel with reference to the "unknown god" statute in Athens - find something not necessarily identical, but close enough that it conveys the point, while giving room for preaching God's intentions through that vehicle.

That said, I do believe the functional nature of the Ekklesia was part of the connection Jesus and the apostles were trying to make.

- Thought Experiment 2: Imagine if instead of the Ekklesia Jesus referred to our modern Congress, which is probably the closest thing we have to the Greek Ekklesia in America (with some significant differences). Now, consider the function and structure that this word-association would generate today. Can you imagine being told to build a Congress for the Church and instead coming up with the local congregational structure we now have and calling that our "congress"? Of course not. Virtually everyone alive today would know that what we do is neither structurally nor functionally anything like the American Congress from which the word would have been borrowed. In the same way, I'm confident that anyone alive in Jesus's day would look at our modern structure and say, "That's not an Ekklesia. You all are crazy."

Now, I've already noted that it's not meant to be a perfect comparison. Christ's Ekklesia is certainly distinct in many ways from the Greek ekklesia. But if we strip away our modern notions of the word "church" and, instead, place ourselves in the shoes of a brand new believer in the apostles' day who knew nothing about what Jesus taught and hadn't read the epistles and only heard that there was an ecclesia of Christ, here's what one might assume about it:

- The Church should meet corporately and universally, not only locally and divided (if it would meet locally/divided at all).
- There should be a singular, united structure for the Church, not numerous branches/denominations.
- The Church should not be tied to or associated with a building or location, but understood as the assembly of the people, meeting wherever is convenient.
- The purpose of the meeting is to decide matters of policy and vote on military matters, primarily affecting Kingdom expansion.

- There would be no expectation of teaching on how to be "good little boys and girls" (which would have been taught by discipler-makers within the Church).
- It would include appointing magistrates to judge and condemn those who would internally present a threat to the Kingdom, such as through promoting heresies.
- It would discuss policies on what types of bridges/treaties to build with those outside the Kingdom (i.e. the intermingling of "church and state").
- It would financially provide to the attendees rather than be a financial drain on them.

Now, I'm not suggesting the Church should incorporate all of these things. Again, this is just a picture of what someone in that day may have imagined based on that word alone. But it does get our brains realizing that we are WAAAY more unlike the Greek ekklesia than we are like to it.

Ekklesia Participation

Here's another fascinating point: the Ekklesia had restrictions on who could attend, speak, participate in votes, etc. It was limited to every (a) free, (b) native, (c) adult, (d) male (e) citizen in the entire empire was invited to attend and vote on certain issues. Consider these requirements in light of what we see in Scripture about participation within the Church. It would be limited to those who were

- (a) free - not enslaved by sin
- (b) native - born ("again" in the John 3 sense) into the Kingdom
- (c) adult - spiritually mature
- (d) male - i.e. not women
- (e) citizen - i.e. primary allegiance is to the Kingdom, not another country.

Interestingly, I could point to a number of Scriptural passages that would imply that this is the framework the apostles had for how the Church should be run, at least from a leadership, decision-making standpoint.

CONCLUSION

While the Greek ekklesia is not a perfect parallel to what Jesus and the apostles were building, that word was chosen over other structures at the time that would have been more alike to what we see in churchianity today. This tells me that Jesus and the apostles had a more Kingdom-building understanding of what the Ekklesia of Christ. While I won't conclude the parallels should all apply, what I AM willing to conclude from this is that the Church is not meant to be a place for people to come, hear a nice little lesson, ponder a quotable phrase for a few hours, and get on with their week. It's meant to be a strategy and planning session for how we get the Gospel out to the world - which is how the war will be won.

When you have "feeeelz" for someone else

2 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

About a year into our marriage, my wife confessed she had romantic feelings for her boss at the time. He was obviously hitting on her - and who could blame him? She's attractive, intelligent, in a great career, and she was extremely helpful to him in his mission to make a butt ton of money in life. This confession was nerve-wracking for her, thinking I would be infuriated. Of course, that response would have been almost as blue pill as my responsive effort to support her in her feelings and empathize with the situation. I, of course, confessed that I had felt things for other women since we'd been married too - and that this is a natural expectation, not something shameful that needed to be swept under the rug.

The Last Five Years

... is the name of one of my favorite musicals about a massively successful writer named Jamie (Jeremy Jordan) and a failing actress named Cathy (Anna Kendrick) who fall in love for all the wrong reasons and end up divorced in under 5 years (not spoiling the end: that's literally the first song). It can be found for free on YouTube. Note: if you watch, Jeremy Jordan's songs are in forward chronology, but Anna Kendrick's are in reverse (meeting in the middle for their wedding duet) - no doubt a metaphor for the way she, after their divorce, wishes she could go backwards to where they started. I know - movies/TV/books are generally taboo on red pill forums, but the author of this musical actually got sued by his ex-wife because it was so obviously about their relationship that I treat this as a predominantly true story, just expressed through music rather than a blog post.

There are tons of red pills in this movie. The author is so alpha by the end that he literally opens the film with his ex, having been alpha widowed, lamenting the fact that he's off enjoying life and sex with other women while she's regretting the fact that she was a cold, bitter harpy that pushed him away. I love her line: "Give me a day, Jamie. Bring back the lies. Hang them back on the wall." If you hadn't guessed, the moral of the movie (or at least one of them) is that (a) when a man is committed to his mission, and (b) he invites his wife to join him, but (c) she is bitter and won't follow because she insists on her own mission, and (d) she ends up leaving him, then (e) the alpha man ends up fine and she ends up sad and depressed.

A Part of That (25:55) is a fantastic exploration of a wife trying to conform herself to her man's frame and mission (don't worry: at 1:01:00 she change her mind and goes rebellious, like you knew she would). The Schmueel Song (30:13) is also perhaps the best example I've seen in film of a man pulling his cussing/screaming, scowling, harpy wife into his frame by addressing her feels, expressing amused mastery, negging, and applying /u/RedPillWonder's posts/comments about the power of story-telling (a tactic I use often). But I won't elaborate on those (or others - I'm sure I'll do a post on the movie someday), so let's skip to the song most relevant to this post: A Miracle Would Happen. Jamie and Cathy are newlywed, attending one of his work parties. He realizes that having a wedding ring doesn't magically take away his attraction for other women - yet it vastly enhances their attraction toward him. Some theorize that this is because the ring shows he's willing to commit, but I don't buy this explanation because being a mistress undermines his commitment (though I'm sure women can hamster this away). Instead, I believe it's because a guy stops GAF about other girls, when he's newly married, making it easier to maintain confidence around them because he doesn't need them. Until she turns on him, he at least has the abundance of his wife. In experiencing this phenomenon, Jamie sings:

Everyone tells you that the minute you get married every other woman in the world suddenly finds you attractive. Well, that's not true: It only affects the kind of women you always wanted to sleep with, but they wouldn't give you the time of day before, and now they're banging down your door and falling on their knees. At least that's what it feels like because you CAN. NOT. TOUCH THEM. In fact, you can't even look at them. Close your eyes, close your eyes, close your eyes.

Anyone else able to empathize?

Except you're sitting there eating your corned beef sandwich and all of a sudden this pair of breasts walks by and smiles at you. And you're like, "That's not fair!"

And in a perfect world a miracle would happen and every other girl would fly away. And it'd be me and Cathy and nothing else would matter. But it's fine, it's fine, it's fine. I mean, I'm happy. And I'm fine, I'm fine, I'm fine. It's not a problem - just a challenge. It's a challenge to resist temptation.

Every try to convince yourself when you start having those lustful thoughts or pesky feelings toward other people that "I'm happy" and "I'm fine" and that you wish you only ever had eyes for your wife? It's, of course, a pretty typical blue pill ideology that most newlywed men hold.

And I have to say that what exacerbates the problem is I'm at these parties. I'm the center of attention. I'm the grand fromage. And here she [that pair of breasts] comes: "Let's get a cup of coffee. Will you look at my manuscript?" And I'm showing her my left hand. I'm gesticulating with my left hand. And then OH! There's Cathy! Cause she knows. They always know. And there's that really awkward moment where I try to show I wasn't encourage this ... which of course I was. And I don't want to look whipped in front of this woman, which is dumb - I shouldn't care what she thinks since I can't touch her anyway.

That's right: women always know. Don't think you're clever enough to hide the way you find other women attractive. Own it. Make it work for you rather than being a secret you think works against you.

And in a perfect world a miracle would happen and every girl would look like Mr. Ed. And it'd be me and Cathy and nothing else would matter, but it's fine, it's fine, it's fine. You know I love her. And it's fine, it's fine, it's fine. It's what I wanted! And I'm fine, I'm fine, I'm fine. it's not a problem. It's just a challenge. It's a challenge to resist temptation.

Yes. The blue pill fantasy is what you want ED. Is it still what you want? The reality is that chasing it down with another woman is just shifting the object of your blue pill fantasy. Never forget the third commandment of poon here: You shall make your mission, not your woman, your priority. In the movie, as a writer, Jamie (Jeremy Jordan) ends up believing he needs a woman in his life to be the inspiration for his writing. This is his flat that contributes to the downfall of the marriage. But the point I want to summarize is a simple one:

- The fact that you get married doesn't change your proclivity to be attracted to other people.

My guess is that if you're lifting, developing a stronger and more fun frame, becoming more charming, socially acknowledged, etc. that along your red pill journey you're going to deal with this exact same kind of attention. Fantastic! Find proof in the abundance mentality you've been building. But as enjoyable as it may be, many men and women simply don't know what to do when these feelings come up - and I'm not just talking about casual lusts, but actual entanglements that haunt your mind and are difficult to pull yourself out of.

UNDERSTANDING THE LACK

I'm reminded of the three Hebrew loves (I hate talking about the Greek loves because Jesus didn't speak Greek, nor was it native to the apostles):

- Dod: Physical passion
- Raya: Friendship and fun
- Ahava: Commitment

These all hit different peaks at different points in a relationship. The dod is highest when you're young and hormones are high. The Raya grows over time and peaks in mid-life, if you are wise with your finances and have the ability to enjoy life when your kids are teenagers or off to college. The ahava peaks in late-life, experiencing the fullness of a committed life to one another. When one is at its peak, the others are generally weaker - and the further from the peak, the weaker you are. That said, it's possible (at least for short bursts) to have all three in perfect, excellent harmony - and those are your best emotional-feelzy moments with your spouse.

When you find yourself emotionally entangled with someone else, it's often because you haven't developed ahava in your marriage yet. This love is lacking. You'll get there. But that level of commitment is still shallow. That's why it's easy to have eyes for other people - and you'd be a fool to believe your spouse doesn't look outside the marriage in similar ways.

At some point, the dimmer switch on other prospects will fade away, and it happens very gradually over time. On a new marriage, you're still too used to being in the single arena. It's going to take over a decade to shift away from that and settle in your mind to a point where ahava can even start to take hold. For the newlyweds, it's only a fanciful notion of what you want to be true, but not yet being experientially true.

WHAT TO DO?

Well, if you feel like blowing up your marriage, you can act on these feelings. That option's certainly out there. Obviously I'm not going to recommend that for Christians, who wouldn't want that route anyway. Otherwise, the simple unhelpful answer is: Don't act on these feelings.

It's unhelpful because it's "easier said than done." There are a number of reasons it's hard to do:

- You lack discipline
- You intentionally enter tempting situations or permit them to continue
- You've trained your mind and body to act on impulses
- The alternative isn't particularly appealing
- It would be easy to "get away with it"
- There's nothing technically wrong with what you're doing

Notice something sorely lacking from all of these? Yeah, it's your mission. Do these feelings advance your mission? Let me recite the third commandment of poon yet again: You shall make your mission, not your woman, your priority. Most people wrestling with will-power issues only have those issues because they aren't committed to a mission that matters. Or, if they are, they either (1) haven't found much success at it to become passionate, or (2) have higher priorities, meaning their "committed mission" is really their "committed hobby."

Along the latter lines ...

APPRECIATION AND PRIORITIES

I said above that you'd be foolish to think your spouse isn't noticing, and possibly feeling things for, other people the way you do. It's human nature. Expect it. That said, here's one of the biggest blind-spots for men: when your wife feels unappreciated.

I've been there. I mentioned above that my wife developed feelings for her boss at one point. It happens. No biggie. But why? Well, she was doing a stellar job at the office and he appreciated that. He gave her attention for the things she contributed rather than just expecting them because it's her job. I, on the other hand, didn't give my wife a job in the first place. I let her make up her own set of responsibilities around the house, hoping she'd figure out what needed to be done and not. While she did a pretty good job, her priorities weren't identical to mine.

The things she was doing were things I didn't ask her to do and that I didn't find any value in - and yet she wanted me to dote on her for how well she did them. For example: she would dust the living room. I never saw any dust in the first place. She'd tell me she did it and I wouldn't bend over backwards with appreciation because I didn't even know it had been done. Why would I show appreciation for something that doesn't matter to me?

- Thought Experiment: Imagine that you're gone on vacation. A stranger comes by and spends 8 hours a day every day that you're gone picking up ants off your porch and putting them back in the grass. You get home and he tells you about all the hard work he did for you picking up all the ants and putting them back in the grass to keep your porch ant-free during your vacation. You're likely to say to him, "Thank you for your effort" as a general courtesy, but inside you will be thinking: "That was a waste of his time. The ants are going to come back anyway. And I wasn't here to enjoy the ant-free porch in the first place. And even if I was, I don't care if my porch is ant-free because I expect an ant every now and then. That's just normal for a porch. That guy was crazy and just wasted all that time and hard work for literally nothing."

Between your verbal expression of gratitude and your internal thoughts toward the situation, one is a lie and the other is true. I assumed it was better to live as I truly felt rather than lying in order to make someone else feel good. When my wife dusted the living room or vacuumed the floors, or wiped down the counters, etc. when I never saw them dirty in the first place, it felt like the guy picking ants off a porch. What a crazy, insane waste of time, expending all that effort for nothing! Rather than lying to my wife by pretending appreciation, I simply ignored it the same way I would have ignored the ant man in that scenario, brushing him aside to get his craziness out of my way.

Then at some point, especially after becoming red pill'd, I realized that women (with due respect) often have the emotional maturity of children - or perhaps most men have such a lack of emotional expressivity that a woman's emotional needs feels like the needs of a child. I don't extend the metaphor much further, as many men do. I do believe women can be highly intelligent, have well-developed thoughts and impressions and fascinating perspectives. And many are able to balance their emotions with rational thought. But the underlying craving for someone to treat them with the same expressivity they experienced as children is always there.

My kids waste time on lots of stupid things. It's fun to watch them sometimes. Sometimes they'll spend an hour trying to "help" me with something, while really making it worse. How do I respond? Do I chew them out for having caused me trouble? Of course not. I dote on them. "Oh, it's so wonderful. Thank you! Let me give you hugs and kisses. You really did this for me?!? I love it!" ... as I teach them a better way to do it next time that might actually be helpful in the future, or at least cause less harm.

At some point I realized my wife wanted me to treat her the same way. She wanted that affection and it was wise for me to give it to her because that would create the emotional context for her to desire to improve to a point where she actually was more helpful.

Simultaneously, my wife became wiser and started to realize she was plucking ants from a porch. She stopped wasting time on things that didn't need to be done because the list of things that actually did need to be done grew ever more massive. Prioritization occurred and helpfulness abounded, and now I am authentically appreciative for her contributions.

If your wife is looking elsewhere, there's a good chance it's because you're not giving her feels. You don't understand her child-like need for emotional fulfillment - possibly something that was lacking in her upbringing that she's validation-seeking from you. While there may be other reasons, that's often the case. Regardless, I don't say that as a negative. Wives SHOULD look for validation from their husbands - it's the husband who shouldn't look for it from his wife, but from God. So, she's right to want his validation. You'd be wise to give it - and not in the cold, dead way you probably often communicate. Try ...

- Giving her a high-five. It's corny, but makes people feel good. Even your wife.
- Doing a happy dance.
- Spinning her around and finishing with a dip.
- Wrapping your arms around her and whispering your appreciation seriously and mysteriously in her ear.
- Agree and Amplify the value of what she's done, but actually end on a more serious note of, "For real, though: thank you."

You get the idea. These are ways to trigger her feels. While the actual words you say may not be precisely accurate, your words aren't all you're communicating. You're communicating your emotions too. Just as true words with false emotions can be either a lie or accurate expression of truth, so also can false words used to communicate real emotions.

Now, if your struggle is that you just don't have any real emotions to communicate toward your wife in the first place ... well, you've got bigger frame issues to work out before trying to address stuff like this.

For the Women

For the women: my suggestion in all of this is to focus your efforts on things that your man does find valuable rather than things that you find valuable that you wish he valued as much as you do. But even if he doesn't, remember Luke 17:7-10.

- Suppose one of you has a servant plowing or looking after the sheep. Will he say to the servant when he comes in from the field, 'Come along now and sit down to eat'? Won't he rather say, 'Prepare my supper, get yourself ready and wait on me while I eat and drink; after that you may eat and drink'? Will he thank the servant because he did what he was told to do? So you also, when you have done everything you were told to do, should say, 'We are unworthy servants; we have only done our duty.'

Have this attitude with your husband, as we are to have with Christ. It's not fun, but if you can recognize this as your role, you won't be demanding the validation, thus will be less likely to fawn over the next guy who gives it to you. In this, while it's appropriate for a wife to seek validation from her husband, that should not be the purpose of her being with her husband.

The purpose of marriage is to produce godly offspring (Malachi 2:15), which means to make disciples - first of your birth children, if you have them, and simultaneously outside of your home.

If you view your own thirst for validation as the purpose of your marriage, then when you don't get it (despite appropriately seeking it), you'll begin to wish you were married to another man and forsake the things you'd otherwise do that would fulfill that purpose. If the point of marriage was to get validation from your husband, then you'd be right to develop feelings for another man when your husband isn't validating you. But because that's not the point of marriage, having your eyes fixated on the actual goal - to make disciples - should go a long way in reorienting your heart to where its passions should be aroused. 3 John 1:4 - "I have no greater joy than this: to get validation from others" ... ooops, I mean "to see that my [spiritual] children are walking in the truth." See how that works?

What makes a man "red pill"?

- A. Suppose a man reads red pill forums for several years. He reads every sidebar book, all the top posts, and familiarizes himself with all the major blogging content in the manosphere. He doesn't believe a word of it, but it fascinates him.
- B. Or suppose he does believe it. He gets fired up and goes through his rage stage before moving on into embracing the reality of how the world operates as a fact of life that he can make for him. But the red pill life requires him to change too many things about himself that he doesn't care to do. After all, it's hard work and he doesn't have the chops for that, so he ignores it. He spends the rest of his days as a fat slob, playing video games with most of his free time, ending up a true incel, forever alone, yet continually fascinated at how perfectly the red pill explains his life experiences and why he has been rejected by women.
- C. Or suppose a man knows the red pill, but completely rejects it as a source of truth regarding intergender relational dynamics. He, for independent reasons, lifts weights, develops a charming personality, is in high social demand, at the top of his career, and ultimately marries a major hottie. He idolizes her and continues to do all of these things in the hope of keeping her sexually interested in him.
- D. Or suppose he doesn't give two franks about her because he knows he could have sex with any woman he wants, but he stays loyal because she pleases him and continues to provide value to his household. He's still clueless about the red pill, but has observed enough about human nature to know that what he's doing works. He does live out of his own point of origin and accomplishes everything he sets his mind to, which happens to perfectly align with everything the red pill expresses to be true, despite his ignorance of it. His life is exactly as he wants it to be, not what anyone else tries to make of it.
- E. Or what of the man who reads the red pill forums, applies what he learns, and finds his goals becoming realities?

We'd all agree that behavior alone does not make a man "red pill," right? You can't lift enough, be charming enough, or have a good enough social game to be red pill if you're still pining over women.

We'd all agree that knowledge alone does not make a man "red pill," right? You can't read enough books, write enough posts, or have a thorough enough understanding of the content to be red pill if you reject the notion that these things have any application in your personal life - you are not transformed by them.

But at some point something clicks in the content. You realize: This isn't just some interesting theory. If it's true, then to accomplish my relational and sexual goals, I have to adjust my strategy. That is when you're red pill, right?

And perhaps even the man who doesn't know the content for what it is, yet by nature lives by what is true and trusts that it will work for him - as it does ... perhaps he is also red pill.

What makes a man "Christian"?

- A. Suppose a man reads the Bible consistently for several years. He reads it completely, studies commentaries, familiarizes himself with historical contexts and memorizes passages. He doesn't believe a word of it, but it fascinates him.
- B. Or suppose he does believe it. He gets fired up about this fascinating new discovery he's made about how God created the world and the spiritual realms beyond it that influence everything that's been going on for millennia. But the Christian life requires him to change too many things about himself that he doesn't care to do. After all, it's hard work and he doesn't have the chops for that, so he ignores it. He spends the rest of his days as a gluttonous drunkard, giving in to sloth, sexual sins, and ending up a truly depraved individual, yet continually fascinated at how perfectly the Bible explains his life experiences and why he never feels fulfilled in life.

- C. Or suppose a man knows the Bible, but rejects it as a source of truth. He, for independent reasons, decides to love his neighbors, serve those in need, develops a character of bold humility, is well-respected, and ultimately loved by all, accomplishing great things from his own internal sense of altruism toward the world. He thrives on the way the world recognizes him for these accomplishments, even if he doesn't show it, and he continues to do them in the hope that history will recognize him for it.
- D. Or suppose he doesn't give two franks about recognition from the world because he knows he could get recognition if he wants, but that's not what it's about for him. He continues to do these things because he genuinely loves the world God created. He's still clueless about anything the bible says, but can see through creation that there is some god out there who wants better for humanity - to redeem it - and that what he's doing is consistent with what this unknown god might expect of him. He lives to serve this unknown god and accomplishes everything creation can reveal to him about that god's expectations of him - which happens to be perfectly aligned with everything the Bible says is true, despite his ignorance of it. His life is, for all practical purposes, the closest representation of Christ on the earth since Christ himself, not what the world or any other religion would have him be.
- E. Or what of the man who reads the Scriptures, applies what he learns, and is transformed such that God's goals through him become reality?

We'd all agree that behavior alone does not make a man "Christian," right? You can't be good enough, humble enough, meek enough, serving enough, make enough disciples, or anything else to be Christian if you're still rejecting the truth of Scripture as the underlying foundation for your behaviors.

We'd also all agree that knowledge alone does not make a man "Christian," right? You can't read the Bible enough, memorize enough verses, study enough commentaries, or have a thorough enough understanding of theology to be Christian if you reject the notion that these things have any application in your personal life - you are not transformed by them.

But at some point something clicks in the Scriptures. You realize: This isn't just some interesting religious text. If it's true, then to accomplish my innermost goals and for my life to have any meaning at all, I have to adjust my lifestyle. That's when you're Christian, right?

And perhaps even the man who's never heard the name of Jesus or seen a Bible for what it is, yet by nature lives by what is true and trusts that the God who is discernible through nature will value his dedication ... perhaps he is also Christian.

Let's set this up clearly:

1. Christ is the groom.
2. The Church is his bride.
3. Producing spiritual children is evangelism - tantamount to spiritual sex through the oneness bond we have with Christ/the Spirit/God's Word.
4. Raising spiritual children is discipleship, which requires both a mother and a father.
5. A child who is birthed, but abandoned by the parent is an orphan.
6. Congregational structures collect spiritual orphans, becoming spiritual orphanages.

With this in mind, what do we make of our role within congregational structures - if any at all? Should we abandon them? Work within them? Worship them as many do? Did Jesus intend for the Church to become a spiritual orphanage? Or did he intend for his Kingdom to be made up of patriarchal lineages of grandparent to parent to child to grandchild to great-grandchild, and so on, and that the Church would be the name of the Kingdom under which these family units would live?

Let's go back through the list and contemplate these:

Christ is the Groom - Do we actually recognize our (instead of one-flesh) one-Spirit relationship with Christ? Is it an abiding relationship where he and his Spirit dwell within us, together with God's Word? If not, then the Church would be a single woman or a wife who has divorced her husband. Is that really what we want for ourselves? And if not, then what does it mean to live as if we are one-Spirit with Christ and he is head over us?

The Church is his bride - Do we really embrace the role of a bride in the relationship? Are you willing to live toward Christ the same way we talk about a woman should love toward us? After all, how can you lead your wife to follow you if you're not willing to model it in how you follow Christ? Contemplate 1 Cor. 11:3 on that. And this is where the MGTOWs get it wrong. A MGTOW mentality that communicates a man's refusal to engage in the sexual marketplace is akin not to our abandonment of the Church, but Christ's abandonment of the Church. Christ does not forsake the Church or his people. Nothing can separate us from his love. Neither should we model with our lives something distinct and separate from what would reflect the accuracy of Christ's relationship with his people - UNLESS we are already living out the spiritual reality to which the physical representation was meant to point. In that case, and that one alone - if a man is already united with Christ and reflecting to the World Christ's oneness bond with him through the way he spiritually reproduces and spiritually raises his children - then such a man is free from the model of the physical representation because the spiritual reality is already evident in his life and he doesn't need the road-map to get him where he already is or to show the world how to get to where he has already arrived. He merely says, "Here I am. Come with me." That is the only viable MGTOW man, who is in his physical singleness fully living in light of his spiritual marriage to Christ as an evangelist and disciple-maker.

Producing spiritual children is evangelism - One of my family members - gorgeous as she may be - cannot physically have children. She recently posted on Facebook that she's frustrated at the number of Christian men who insist on a bride who will give them children of their own, even saying that some were arguing that adoption is unbiblical. It's not, but that's beside the point. What man wouldn't want his seed to produce an heir for him? Of course you do. God gave you that innate desire. Yet when Christ wants a bride who will produce children for him, rather than raising someone else's kids, why do we suddenly shy away and think it's okay to ignore evangelism in favor of just teaching a class within our congregational unit? Just as sex is the most physically pleasurable and fulfilling (and if it's been a while, full-filling) thing we can do in life, so also is evangelism the most spiritually pleasurable and fulfilling aspect of the Christian life.

Raising spiritual children is discipleship - How many husbands and wives take a purely evangelistic approach, thinking, "I want to have as many kids as humanly possible so that I can fill the orphanages of the world and make them glorious with how many kids they raise!"? That's absurdity. The expectation - and even LEGAL OBLIGATION by default - is that parents must raise their own children. Virtually everyone recognizes that raising children into mature, upstanding citizens who can birth the next generation, giving you grandchildren and great-grandchildren, and so on is the most rewarding aspect of life, even as sex is the most pleasurable.

Which requires both a mother and a father - Here's where too many people misunderstand the balance of authority in discipleship. Many red pill men are quick to jump to the conclusion that "women are to raise the children at home" while the "men are carrying on a mission." I don't disagree, except to the extent that men are to be active fathers and the ultimate authority in deciding how the children are to be raised, even if the wife spends more of the day-to-day time implementing it. The congregational structure is quick to cut out Christ's model of spiritual parenting in how he disciplined his 12, and which they modeled with others, such as Paul with Timothy or Peter with Mark - instead, acting as if the mother (the Church) has the final say and authority in how children are to be raised. As such, we get congregations all over the world who come up with their own philosophies that they believe are based on various teachings of Jesus, while ignoring the example of Jesus. Others take the reverse approach: they cut out their own role in mothering/nurturing children, commissioning them to Christ on the expectation that God will carry the person on to maturity if the person is truly saved. In reality, Christ works through the Church as the vehicle through which his parental authority is carried out, and we must embrace his role in being a spiritual father just as much as we cannot abandon our role in spiritually nurturing the young and immature.

A child who is birthed, but abandoned by the parent is an orphan - This is when we evangelize someone, but refuse to be a parent to them. I love this quote in Dawson Trotman's message, Born to Reproduce (here, for those who want to listen):

A boy came into my office one day and told me about all the souls he had won. He said they were all Armenians. He was an Armenian. He had the list. I said, "Well, what's this one doing?" He said, "That one isn't doing so good. He sort of backslid." "What about this one?" We went all down the list and there was not one living a victorious life.

I said, "Give me your Bible." I turned to Philippians and I put a coardboard right under the 6th verse, and I took a razor blade out of my pocket and started to come down on it. He grabbed my hand and asked, "What are you going to do?"

"I'm going to cut this verse out. It isn't working." Do you know what was wrong, friends? I had been taking the 6th verse away from the 3rd, 4th, 5th and 7th verses. Paul didn't just plot that down and say, "All right, the Lord has started something, He'll finish it." You know, that's what people tell me when they win a soul. They say, "Well, I just committed him to God."

I see Norm Lewis here. He's the father of 7. If I went up to Norm and said, "Who's taking care of your children, Norm?" "Huh, oh, I left them with the Lord." I've got a verse for you, Norm, if you say that. If any man provide not for his own household, he is worse than an infidel. Paul said to the elders of the Presbyterian ... er, the church at Ephesus, "Take heed to the flock over which the Holy Ghost has made YOU the overseer." You don't make God the overseer. He makes you the overseer.

Congregational structures collect spiritual orphans, becoming spiritual orphanages - The reality is that most people aren't willing to parent their own spiritual children. They pretend they don't know how. They're good at having sex, but the concept of actually raising a child is too terrifying, so they either abort (i.e. engage in self-defeating evangelism strategies) so they don't have to worry about raising the child, or they leave the child up for adoption for the church to raise, hoping that they can find someone who can raise the child. The reality is that there aren't enough parents willing and able to adopt children - and even if you're not ready to parent a child, it's better if you try. It's better than letting the child die in the womb or sending them to the overcrowded mass-structure for them to be a number in the crowd.

God bless those who run orphanages. They are a necessary and praise-worthy part of society. Never stop supporting those who care for these little ones! But even better if we didn't need them. Even better if parents learned to raise their own children without killing them or giving them away. In an ideal world, there would be no congregations because every family unit would stay a family unit - and the Church would be meeting together not to teach all those orphans how to be good little boys and girls, knowing very few will actually listen - rather, it would be meeting to discuss how we can produce more children and raise them and make our family lineages even more fruitful in comparison to the opposing kingdoms around us - even dominating those kingdoms and making their children our own.

Support your spiritual orphanage, but always make it your primary goal to transform the world around you until they become totally and completely unnecessary because the Church becomes a united Kingdom of families rather than a structure to contain orphans.

7

UPVOTES

Walk & Talk 2: Kings, Kingdoms, and Corona

6 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

I almost forgot to post this. Enjoy! https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=7LtJMzHyI_s&t=60s

"Headship" as a concept is given a lot of lip service, but few people actually practice it the way Christ does with the Church. I can't count the number of people who tell me how "red pill" their ~~church~~ congregation is, or how "biblically grounded" the teachings are on marriage and relationships, while being exactly the opposite.

KNOWING THE STRUCTURES

I believe a large reason for this stems from inappropriately understanding the views on marriage expressed by different congregational structures. Here they are:

1. Headship: The view that the man is the head of his household. What he says goes.
2. Complementarianism: The view that God has given men and women different roles to fill. Among the man's roles are the right to have the final say on disputed matters in the home.
3. Egalitarianism: The view that husband and wives are on equal footing with regard to all roles, including decision-making authority.
4. Feminism: The view that women should be empowered in the home to do as they please and that men should support them in the direction the woman chooses to go, unless it would otherwise amount to direct sin.

Very few congregations actually claim the title of "feminist" when it comes to discussing marriage roles, as they realize this cultural ideology is in direct opposition to Scripture, so most of them will take the feminist agenda and mask it in the form of egalitarianism or complementarianism. Egalitarian-feminists will push the notion that a wife's equality with her husband prohibits him from exercising authority over her, empowering her to have an equal say, which is virtually always interpreted that her "equal" say should win because if he wins then he's just a patriarchal monster. Complementarian-feminists will pay lip-service to male authority in the home, but instead redirect that authority in ways that serve the wife. If there's a dispute, the husband would be "ungodly" if he were to exercise his authority in a way that displeases his wife or fails to give her what she wants. As such, the man's authority in the home is merely that of a puppet figurehead, while the wife truly runs the show. Feminist structures incorrectly reflect to the world that the bride (Church) has authority over her husband (Christ) either by direct authority or obligational exercise of authority.

True egalitarianism (of the non-feminist variety) is still unbiblical and dangerous. Jesus directly preaches that no kingdom can have two leaders, or else it will be divided. Married people are meant to be ONE, not divided. The only ways true egalitarians can resolve conflicts are: (1) by compromising, which inherently means that even if one party is right, the right answer must be set aside for the compromised conclusion, or (2) taking turns (usually couched in "loving the other enough to let him/her have this one"). Egalitarianism incorrectly reflects that Christ and the Church are equal in authority in the relationship.

True complementarianism (of the non-feminist variety) is another beast entirely. Even up to 3-6 months ago I would have identified as a complementarian purist (meaning: the feminist expressions of it are eradicated). But I have since come to realize that it is flawed even in its fundamental ideology, which is that God has assigned certain roles for men and women to follow. While many complementarians will focus on the authority dynamic as the "hot topic" to discuss, and thus use the word "headship" to describe aspects of their theology, the reality is that the full doctrine of complementarianism insists on many other role distinctions that men and women must align with. These roles are often not found directly in Scripture as obligations; rather, they are cultural norms that have an imputed theology about them, such as the man going off to work his 9-5 job while the wife stays at home to cook and clean. The complementarian view looks at the way men and women are created and attempts to deduce what God must have intended for men and women to do with regard to the family unit and within the body of Christ, while ultimately having little Scriptural support for the conclusions reached.

HEADSHIP

HEADSHIP, on the other hand, is completely distinct from feminism and does not have a feminist expression (at least that I've seen). It ordinarily isn't listed as a distinct structural component of marriages, often being taken as a singular component within true complementarianism. Yet to suggest that headship must also always be accompanied by other complementarian views is irrational. Headship, by itself, simply states that God gave men the authority over their own households to decide how they ought to be run. Instead of assuming that women are designed by God to fold laundry and men are designed by God to mow the yard, if a man so chooses, he may exercise his headship authority to delegate the responsibility of mowing the yard to his wife while he folds the laundry - or, if he so chooses, that she does both and he watches the football game.

Many women object: "That's not fair!" And it certainly doesn't seem so, if the man is ungodly. But I'll echo /u/RedPillWonder, who wrote a fantastic post which I'll paraphrase (you can go to his history for the full thing): The wife's obligation to submit to and respect her husband is not contingent on his fulfillment to love her as Christ loves the Church, and vice versa. I've written before on 1 Peter 3, showing that even for non-believers who were guaranteed to be ungodly, the wife was still expected to live in submission to him with a gentle and kind spirit toward him, and that this is set up in the passage as paralleled with the way a slave should submit to an oppressive master or the way Jesus submitted to the authorities who crucified him. No, it's not fair. But it's godly. Yes, you will fail, just as he will. But always remember that these obligations are independent, not interdependent.

The key aspect of headship is that the husband decides how his own household is to be run. There is no eisegetical attempt to stretch Scripture to endorse why women should cook and clean while the husband fixes the toilet. He plots the course and decides how the ship will get there. The wife helps him along the way, not defying him on the basis that "God created women to be better at cooking, so I'd rather cook the meals than do that other stuff you want me doing." Of course, this doesn't mean a man can't delegate domains to his wife. He doesn't need to micromanage her. But he does need to accept responsibility for those areas which are delegated to her because they are ultimately still part of his domain, not hers.

In this, I disagree with those who stretch passages like Titus 2:3-5 to suggest that the house is the woman's domain and not subject to her husband's leadership. I laugh at the concept of the "man cave," where men have defaulted so much authority over the home to their wives that they only have the frame to insist on a small corner in the basement to decorate as they choose. The entire house is his - and while he may trust her with much of the decor and maintenance, it is still ultimately his domain and he is the one responsible for its upkeep, which she helps him with, as that is her function within a headship structure: to be his helper.

Yes, this places an immense amount of responsibility for the well-being of the kingdom on the man - not only his personal kingdom, but God's heavenly Kingdom on earth too! He'd better be a man worth living up to that responsibility. This is what headship demands of him. And what the red pill teaches us is that a woman, even if she agrees with headship and knows it's wrong to divorce, will likely leave a man if she believes he is ultimately a dead-end for her. So, no ... you don't get to insist that she follow your crappy leadership "because the Bible says so" - you can expect she'd rather sin by divorcing you than sin by resenting you.

"Headship" Gone Wrong

The word "headship" is often misused in modern churchianity. Instead of referring to a man's God-given authority over the home, it gets misapplied to reference God's authority over man in how he treats his wife, undermining the whole concept in the first place. To be clearer: the word often gets used to imply that God micro-manages men to a point that the actual exchange of authority is little more than a phantom transfer for the woman's benefit. Take, for example, this article from the self-professed "Council on Biblical Manhood and Womanhood." Sounds like an authoritative body to decide these things, right? Let's walk through it.

- The Wife is Primary

I kid you not: the article's very first point is that "Christlike male headship means that you see the spiritual nourishment of your wife as your primary duty." Apparently our primary duty is not to God, but our wives. It has nothing to do with advancing God's Kingdom into the nations, but to "nurture" God's Kingdom within your own little household. What a joke. I also love the exaggeration of calling this a "primary" duty and using Ephesians 5:28-30 as the reference. Show me where it says anywhere that this is a "primary" duty.

Yes, the husband is responsible for the sanctification of his wife - but this is not his "primary" duty. God says the purpose of marriage is "to produce godly offspring" (Malachi 2:15). If the husband is to lead the marriage toward the fulfillment of the purpose God gave for the marriage, then THIS is his primary duty: to make disciples (i.e. godly offspring). Yes, he should begin with his wife and children, but he cannot teach them how to be discipler-makers if he is not showing them by how he makes disciples outside the home as well.

More to the point: what does this have to do with headship/authority? If I were to re-word his point, it would be more accurate to write: "Part of being a Christlike male headship husband means that you see the spiritual nourishment of your wife as your primary one of your duties." That's a statement I can agree with.

- One Wife

When he writes "headship means that you love just one wife" - does he mean you can have more, but you're only allowed to love one? Obviously not. So, the word "love" there is superfluous. He really means that a man should only have one wife (at least if he's to be in a position of authority within the Church). But note that he feels compelled to add the word "love" there to show extra emphasis on how good a man should treat his wife, because that's really the point of his article rather addressing biblical standards. By the way, note that he didn't cite a reference for this one.

Headship is an authority structure. Was David not head over his many wives? Was Solomon, with his hundreds of wives, not head of them? The authority structure is distinct from the issue of how many people you have authority over. If I were to rewrite this statement it would read either: (1) "Christlike male headship means that you ~~love just one~~ have authority over each and every wife in your household," or (2) "~~Christlike male headship means~~ Being a leader in the Church requires that you ~~love~~ have just one wife." Those are statements I can get behind.

- Know the Lord

He writes that "headship means that you train yourself to know the Lord in a vibrant way." This has nothing to do with authority structures within marriage. A better re-write would be: "Christlike male headship ~~means that is best expressed when~~ you train yourself to know the Lord in a vibrant way." I can agree to that.

- Her Interests First

No joke, actual quote: "Christlike male headship means on date night/vacations, you think first, 'What would she like to do?' not, 'What would I like to do?'" He concludes: "She will love you for it." Haha! Look, I'm all for rewarding a respectful, satisfying wife with things you know she enjoys and values. But the idea that a man must exercise headship in a way that defers to his wife and that he's not allowed to have his own wants and desires is unbiblical and inconsistent with what we see in Jesus throughout Scripture. By the way - where's his verse to back this one up? Oh yeah, that's another one without it. This would be better written: "Christlike male headship ~~means~~ can involve, at times, on date night/vacations, you think first, ~~What would she like to do~~ Do I want to reward this woman I care about?' not, ~~What would I like to do~~ What would she like to do?"

- Hold the Baby

He says, "Christlike male headship means that at dinner, after a long day at work, you hold the baby so your wife, frazzled from kids and home, can eat first." He gives no verse to back himself up, so let me give one instead: Luke 17:7-10 has something to say about this: "Suppose one of you has a servant plowing or looking after the sheep. Will he say to the servant when he comes in from the field, 'Come along now and sit down to eat'? Won't he rather say,

'Prepare my supper, get yourself ready and wait on me while I eat and drink; after that you may eat and drink'? Will he thank the servant because he did what he was told to do? So you also when you have done everything you were told to do should say, 'We are unworthy servants; we have only done our duty.'" Notice that the master isn't working hard in the field and coming home to ask for his food to be prepared. The SERVANT is the one who is working in the field and then comes home and is asked to do more work rather than getting to take a break. While I recognize that there is some distinction between wives and servants, the principles within the headship authority structure still apply, which is why 1 Peter 3 is written as it is.

I'll reword this one: "Christlike male headship means that at dinner, after a long day at work, you ~~hold the baby so your wife, frazzled from kids and home,~~ have the right, if you so choose, to ask your wife to cook you dinner so you can eat first." Would this be the best idea in modern culture? Probably not, given the feminist tendencies most women have today. But as a descriptor of biblical headship, this statement is MUCH more accurate.

- Apologize

"Christlike male headship means, when conflict happens (as it will), you lead in apologizing." Again, no verse for this one. Now, I'll note, in all these re-wordings I'm going to interpret "means" as "involves" going forward. Headship is literally just an authority structure. The "Christlike" part is what he's trying to get at, but by saying "means," it's as if he's trying to re-define the term/phrase. That said, ignoring the difference between "means" as a definition matter and "involves" as a matter of inclusiveness, let's re-word it: "Christlike male headship means, ~~when~~ if conflict happens (as it will if you're a blue pill idiot), you lead in ~~apologizing~~ resolving it."

- Show Strength

Woohoo! One I actually pseudo-agree with. Maybe his explanation could use some tweaking, but let's celebrate the commonality while we can and move on.

- Take a Hit

"Christlike male headship means that you put yourself in harm's way, gladly taking a hit to protect your family (and the weak)." Where did the "and the weak" section come from? How does my authority over my wife suddenly equate to me jumping in front of a bullet for a guy down the street from me? That aside, I'm not at all opposed to protecting my family. I'm just confused about how often this situation actually comes up? Regarding physical danger, I'm not sure how often you and your wife are held at gun-point or threatened by a man trying to punch your wife in the face and not you so that you'd have to jump in the way ... but it's never happened for me.

- Solicit Wisdom

He was doing so well with this one until the end: "Christlike male headship means that like the best leaders - generals, presidents, coaches, and so on - you solicit gobs of wisdom from wise counselors (namely, your wife)." I love his follow-up here: "If your relationship is like mine, she will put you to shame in this category." If she's so wise and you're so unwise, dude, why are we reading an article by you in the first place? His answer would, of course, have to be: "Because my wife told me to write it and I learned all this from her."

Yes, your wife is wise in many areas. Yes, you should absolutely hear what she has to say and weigh it carefully. No, you should not will-nilly assume your wife is wise on any particular issue just because she's your wife. If I'm fixing my lawn mower, I'm not going to solicit her "wisdom." When I'm arguing a case in court against a wife and I need to conceptualize how she and her attorney will present their case ... yeah, I'm going to ask my wife how a woman might perceive the issue, and her input is often helpful.

If I were to re-word this one, I'd probably add after "wife" - "in contexts that she is likely to have more experience and/or insight than I am."

- Die to Yourself

"Christlike male headship means you die to yourself daily." I would make no changes to this statement. But look at his explanation: "... for the good of my wife and my family." Yes, we want their good. But this is not the reason Jesus died. It was A reason GOD had Jesus die - because of his love for his children. But JESUS died to bring glory to his father and out of obedience to him. In the same way, your obligation to "die to yourself daily" is not "for the good of your wife and family," as the author suggests, though they certainly benefit from it the same way we benefit from Christ's death. Rather, it is for God's glory and out of obedience to him that we do it. Always keep your priorities straight here.

CONCLUSION

Biblical headship is an authority structure. It is not a collection of ideas about how a man ought to treat his wife. Those are peripheral aspects - and they may be quite biblical - but they are not headship itself. The authority to lead in the home is not synonymous with a man's obligation to love his wife - though both are equally and separately true. Failing to recognize the separation between these two leads to inappropriate results, such as a wife believing the husband's authority is contingent on him doing for her all the things that ridiculous article spells out.

Biblical headship simply states that a man has the authority from God to lead his home as he sees fit. The wife does not have dominion over the home or raise the children. Those are his responsibility. Her role is to help him with those responsibilities. If he trusts her, he will delegate some of these responsibilities to her with minimal oversight. If she is untrustworthy, giving her carte blanche would be a poor use of a man's headship and he should take a more involved role.

Just as you have headship of your wife, Christ has headship of you. Just as your wife tries to usurp as much control and dominion over your household, so do you to God's - which you shouldn't get if you are untrustworthy. Just as a husband does well to delegate (rather than micromanage) categorical responsibilities to his wife (rather than individual tasks) if she is trustworthy, so also, if you are trustworthy, will God delegate categorical responsibilities to you within his Kingdom (see the parables of the minas/talents, for example).

Meditate on this: that my point in this post is not to preach to the wives (who have their own sub), but to the men (who have their own spiritual head). 1 Cor. 11:3.

This is a tweaked version of an old post from MRP that I never shared here, but it came up recently, so enjoy.

My job right now is to argue (attorney). It's rare to have a case where I'm not arguing against someone. There's almost always an attorney or party on the other end. But if I were to run for judge and win, my new job would be to hear someone else's arguments and make a decision. Which role are you playing in your marriage?

Playing Attorney

When you DEER and argue with your wife, you are putting yourself on an equal playing field with her. You're saying that you're one attorney and she's the other and you're both pushing for differing agendas. The problem is that there's no invisible judge presiding over the situation. This means that you're both implicitly assuming that there's some objective "right answer" and you're more closely aligned with that objective reality than the other. But because that objective reality is an inanimate ideology that never acts or reveals itself, the argument itself becomes the centerpiece of the show. The argument is emotionally devastating in many such cases because there is no absolute resolution - only a concession toward trial and error based on whoever has more steel plates in their head to keep banging.

- EXAMPLE: Suppose she starts arguing that you should never spank your kids. You argue back that spanking is perfectly appropriate and beneficial. There's so much evidence on both ends of the spectrum that nobody can definitively say whose way is better. There is no magical parenting fairy who will appear to screaming parents and tell them who's right.

Whenever you engage in an argument in a back-and-forth manner, even though you're arguing against her, you're actually validating her view. By playing the role of "opposing counsel" you're communicating that objective truth has not been discovered on that issue yet, so it needs to be discussed and argued. Once you do that, you cannot then play the "headship card" because now it comes from a place of weakness (and playing that card so directly and verbally is generally from a place of weakness anyway). In the end, you have not persuaded her that your way is better. At worst one of you caves and the other feels like a loser; at best, you reach a compromise, which compromises the truth of the situation just to keep both parties somewhat appeased. Either way, you have just proven that no objective reality is going to decide the case ... so, in her mind she's following a guy who keeps getting it wrong, and she's the wife who just has to put up with a husband who makes wrong decisions all the time, or with whom she has to compromise to half-measures.

- NOTE: Winning arguments and getting your way aren't methods of strengthening your frame or "holding frame." Being an argumentative jerk who never backs down might be a persona you want to craft into your frame, but it is not your frame itself. Your frame is who you are and how you project that to those around you. If you deviate from who you want to be just to win an argument or get your way, you may prove a point, but you've broken frame to do it. You've shown her that she has the power (through sacrifice of her ideologies) to change you, for better or worse. This is not a display of strength, but of weakness.

Playing Judge

Instead, you just need to take the position of judge from the get-go. At that point, you're not arguing with her - you're listening to her argument. That's a huge difference.

Interestingly, go watch a real trial (not Judge Judy crap) and you'll notice something right away: Judges STFU. They sit there and listen. They don't argue. They really only speak when someone objects. When a witness is finished or the case concludes, the judge might ask some questions to get more clarity on the situation, but they never engage in the argument itself. They never argue back. They are only seeking more information with which to make a wise decision. The judge's opinion, then, becomes objective reality to the parties under its authority. Yes, it may be subjective as to the decision itself (one or the other always thinks the judge got it wrong), but the authority from which the decision is made is objective - something that everyone knows not to defy. As attorneys often tell clients, "I don't care if it's a bad decision; you better do what the judge says anyway."

Now, in his opinion the judge does account for the arguments. He doesn't "pre-judge" the case before even hearing the facts (which would be unethical in every jurisdiction). He shows empathy to the attorneys and parties: "I heard what you had to say and here's my conclusions based on all the information you've given me." He does this to let the parties know that their arguments have actually been heard and understood, not ignored - and that feeling of being understood is often more important to a wife than actually getting her way. It also bolsters his decision, making it harder to appeal, as often happens when a judge's decision fails to reference substantial aspects of one side's case. By acknowledging the arguments, he's not merely communicating empathy, but also establishing a precedent: "If something similar happens again in the future, this is how I'm going to process that situation and rule on it."

Whether you're an attorney or judge, the arguments will be never-ending - and often-times you will want them. My wife is great at researching issues and presenting information to me. When she does this, she has a conclusion in mind that she wants me to reach, so she presents the information in the form of an argument to persuade me to her side. Sometimes I agree with her position, other times I'm outright opposed to it, and other times what she says inspires me to investigate the issue personally because I may not agree with her argument immediately, but I'm persuaded enough that it's worth further insight.

The difference is that as an attorney the arguments are against you; but when you're a judge, the arguments are to you. Position yourself as judge, not attorney. Don't argue back. STFU until she's said all she has to say, then issue your ruling, acknowledging that you heard and understood her. In this, I'm not giving you a license to ignore your wife by giving a boilerplate speech of how you comprehended her words. Actually weigh them, as good judges do. But once you've made your decision, if she tries to argue back, let her know that you're not arguing - you're deciding. I've had good luck in the past reminding my wife, "We could argue about this, but then there would never be finality. Do you want to have a decision and move forward or do you want to debate for the next three hours?" The question is, of course, rhetorical - she knows I'm not going to entertain the debate even if she says that's what she wants.

Since I first wrote that post, the dynamic in my household has changed a lot. First, my views and understanding have updated enough that I had to edit significant chunks (and probably would have done more, if I had the time). But more to the point: my wife has wonderfully fallen in line with this forum. Instead of a civil court judge who is resolving conflicts, I'm now more of a probate judge who receives petitions and decides whether or not they have merit and should be granted or denied.

Or perhaps a better analogy would be the scenes we see in movies where the king sits on his throne as people file in, waiting for their turn to ask things of him. Their request always involves an argument. But it's not an argument against anyone. It's an argument to the king. This is how it should be. And yet when another subject within the kingdom has a petition - like one of your kids - your wife shifts to the role of the queen next to you or the advisor whose input you value and esteem, but have no obligation to. Do you think the king is worried about whether or not his advisor will be upset with him for making a different decision? Of course not. Yet the wise king makes the wisest decision, whether it came from his advisor or himself, or elsewhere entirely.

It's interesting to see how 2+ years of applying a concept has changed the dynamic. Sometimes I think my wife still has 998 feet to go on that 1,000 foot rope, but other times I look back at these old posts and realize we've come so much further than I ever imagined. But when the changes are ever so gradual, we hardly realize just how far we've come.

"Spiritual Growth" - such an awkward phrase.

14 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

The "spiritual growth" concept is another pop phrase I've started reconsidering lately. It's obviously not a phrase actually found in Scripture, though the concept is tangentially there.

The Bible talks a great deal of growth in individual virtues - "grow in stature" or "grow in grace" or "grow in knowledge" or other such traits. Everyone can understand that "grow in stature means developing a more mature frame. Growing in grace means becoming more gracious. Growing in knowledge means learning (and presumably understanding).

But "spiritual" isn't a biblical virtue or measurable attribute. I can tell when someone is very gracious and not gracious at all. But "spiritual"? It's so open for interpretation because the Bible doesn't define it. We see examples of Jesus showing grace and other people not showing grace in Scripture. We don't see examples that say: "This person is spiritual, and this person was not." It's a pop culture word created for convenience. When someone in the world today says "I'm a spiritual person," they mean something very different from when a Christian talks about "spiritual growth."

For the most part, people mean it to be a metric of the maturity of the believer - and that's probably the best and most biblically appropriate use of the phrase. But "maturity" of what? Their "spirit"? Their "spirituality"? They way they "walk by the Spirit"? What does that even mean? Yes, the concept of "walking by the Spirit" is certainly a biblical one (Galatians 5:16-18). But is that, itself, the standard of maturity, or is it merely one aspect of the mature person? Or does it all blend together.

- Let me sidetrack on that point real fast. Galatians 5:16-18 is an explanation of how we follow the command to "love your neighbor as yourself," as is made clear in 14-15. I show love for myself not merely in gratifying my desires, as is often misinterpreted in the phrase, but also by exercising, developing my career, taking care of my home, studying/memorizing Scripture, making disciples, etc. - as these all benefit me in a variety of ways. In the same way, if I am to love my neighbor as myself, just as I follow Christ as my primary means of loving myself, even as Christ loves me, so also must I disciple my neighbor to help him follow Christ if I am to love him the same way I love myself.

Back on point, many people use Christ-likeness as the standard of "spiritual maturity," which is probably best. But if the target is so clear, why use such an ambiguous phrase as "spiritual growth" when what we really mean is "growing in Christ-likeness"? The answer is, of course, because nobody really wants to sit down and examine what Christ would be doing in their personal situations. Would Christ really be sitting in front of a computer screen typing this post? Maybe. Maybe not. Would he really be playing that video game? Would he really be memorizing verses when his neighbors are out with their kids and he could be talking with them?

- Another sidenote: this is why I hate the "WWJD" phrase - because some of these things may seem like blind speculation. We don't know what Jesus would do in these situations, but we do know what he did do - and if 1 John 2:6 says that anyone who abides in him "must walk as Jesus walked," that means we don't ask the question of what WOULD Jesus do? but instead ask: What DID Jesus do - and that's what I must now be doing. Yet "spiritual" growth rather than being Christ-like can be attributed to a number of other things that are much less life-changing. And we all know how little Christians actually want to change their lives, despite how much they may talk about it. Really, though: I could walk into most grocery stores, shopping malls, movie theaters, etc. and find it impossible to distinguish the believer from the non-believer because the lifestyle churchianity produces today is in no way distinct from the lifestyle of everyone else in the world. The same "be good people" message churchianity puts out is, on the whole, no different than the moral life lessons even the non-believers convey in TV shows, public broadcasts, books, through counselors, etc. The notion that "by this all men will know that you are my disciples, if you love one another" ... it's just not working under the message of what churchianity puts out regarding what it looks like to "love your neighbor as yourself," as Paul is discussing in Galatians 5, per the last aside. That's why there has to be more to it.

Back on track again: all of this begs the question: "what's the metric?" Because the metric for maturity given by most of churchianity is not the one we see in Scripture.

Churchianity's metric of "maturity" is usually based on one or a combination of (1) emotionalism, (2) knowledge, (3) good deeds, or (4) avoidance of bad deeds. But this is an awful metric. A person could despise Christ in their heart, but wanting to fit in churchianity culture still train themselves to become emotional during worship, learn the Scriptures, serve his neighbors, and give up cussing, drinking, porn, etc. Yet he is no more "mature in Christ-likeness" than a pagan. It is a facade. This is why the generic term "spiritual growth" is often unhelpful - because it gives people carte blanche to decide for themselves what it looks like to "grow spiritually" or to look back to ANY life change over the last several years and conclude that it is "spiritual growth," and then people can persuade themselves that they are mature when they are still babes. And this is EXACTLY what we see in churchianity culture today: infants who want to play dress-up as adults.

Thank goodness Jesus gave us an actual metric for maturity: "By their fruit you will recognize them." If we look at the life of Christ, he was constantly producing fruit for the Kingdom. He was sowing seed everywhere he went. You can't fake that because at some point what you're proclaiming to those around you is going to result in fruit. Sow enough seed, something will grow. And you'll see really fast if it's good fruit or bad. And that process of sowing seed and nurturing it to life is evangelism (sowing) and discipleship (nurturing growth).

Paul confirms this in Philippians 3, saying, "Let all of us who are MATURE take such a view of things," meaning he's about to give his test for what distinguishes a "mature" person from an "immature" one. He emphasizes how ABSOLUTELY certain he is about this by adding immediately after: "and if on some point you think differently, that too God will make clear to you," meaning: "There's no way I'm wrong. Argue with me if you want, but God will prove to you I'm right."

He then gives two criteria for maturity: (1) "Only let us live up to what we have already obtained" - that is, mature people know their roles, capabilities, skills, limits, etc. and live in those, not pretending (a) to be more capable than they are, unlike a child who, in his immaturity, tries to act like an adult; rather, a child who is actually mature recognizes he is a child and embraces this as he continues to progress in life ... or (b) to be less capable than we are, failing to live up to the capacities we have attained in life due to sloth, apathy, etc. That is, we know our roles and capacities and we live within them.

(2) "Join with others in following my example, brothers, and take note of those who live according to the pattern we gave you." That is, Paul disciplined people at Philippi, showing them his way of life - his "pattern" of living, preaching, bearing fruit - all of it. 1 Thess. 2:8 - "so we cared for you. Because we loved you so much, we were delighted to share with you not only the gospel of God but our lives as well." And just as Paul did this with a wave of Philippians, he writes this letter, saying, "And just as we modeled our lives for them, now let their lives be the model for you," passing down that example through successive generations. And we know that Paul's "model" of life is based on Christ because he spells it out in the way he did this exact same process with the Corinthians in 1 Cor. 11:1 - "Follow me as I follow Christ."

To summarize this passage, Paul says that "maturity" is when someone (1) knows their roles and capacities and lives within them to the fullest, not over-reaching or under-performing, and (2) actively participates in a generational pattern of life-modeling in the art of Christ-likeness.

So, when someone talks about helping others with their "spiritual growth," and yet defaults to churchianity's rubric of (1) feeling more emotionally connected to God, (2) teaching them more knowledge, (3) helping them become better people, or (4) showing them how to avoid sin - I am immediately skeptical because it leaves out the fruitfulness aspect. "By their fruit you will recognize them," we see Jesus quoting in a number of places. A sapling struggles to bear fruit, but a full grown tree produces a lot of it - "30, 60, or even 100 times what was sown," as Jesus says. A tree that trickles out 1 or 2 apples a season would hardly be considered a mature apple tree; but one that produces hundreds ... now that's a fully grown tree. Right?

So, if you're going to help others with "spiritual growth" - what are you doing to prompt them to produce fruit? Because if the person you're "spiritually growing" isn't producing fruit and the things you're teaching aren't being communicated in a way that shows how they are helpful toward the goal of producing fruit, then what are you actually accomplishing? Certainly not maturation or "spiritual growth" at that point. Instead, (a) at worst, we are training them to put on a facade - "having a form of godliness but denying its power" in that God's power is designed for the expansion of his Kingdom, or (b) at best, we are giving them peripheral lessons/skills that could become helpful at bearing fruit if they ever connect the dots, but still failing to connect those dots, making it ultimately a wasted effort, just like giving a tree lots of water while denying it sunlight will still result in a dead, fruitless tree.

"Spiritual growth" - better termed "becoming more Christ-like" - must, then, be focused less on these things and more on what will result in production of fruit for God's Kingdom.

I was chatting with some guys from the RPC Discord recently about a few terms that could easily get confused:

- Formal Discipleship: When you invite someone to learn from you, and he commits to letting you lead him for a time.
- Informal Discipleship: When you disciple someone without a structured arrangement and, usually, he won't realize you're discipling him until weeks/months down the road where you give the big "ah ha!" reveal so that he can pick up on how to do the same for others.
 - These processes are identical. The only difference is that one involves the other's knowledge up-front and the other keeps it on the back-burner until the guy's ready to receive it.
- Reverse Discipleship: When you maintain the submissive position beneath someone in authority over you, but express your submissiveness in a way that is uniquely designed to train them to be a better leader over you ... and (more relevantly) others.
 - This process is distinctly different from traditional formal/informal discipleship.
- Direct Leadership: When you have a recognized position of authority within a group as the platform from which you speak.
- Invisible Leadership: When you take control of a group without anyone realizing you've done it, including the person who is the actual positional leader of the group.

It's this last point that prompted the relevant aspect of the discussion - something that you may find useful, whether in your personal life, your career, your congregation, or (ideally) your effort to make disciples.

LEADERSHIP

What is it? I often hear answers that more eloquently boil down to:

- A title or position
- Telling others what to do
- Serving others

Sure, these may be aspects or methods of leadership, but they are not leadership themselves. Lots of people hold positions/titles without actually leading anything. Tons of people boss others around and accomplish nothing. A butler serves people, but he's hardly leading them.

Leadership is influence. That's it. Any form of influence you exert over another person leads them down a path you created - whether intentional or unintentional; small steps or large ones; good or bad.

How do you gain influence? I'm only aware of three universal consistently reliable answers (though there may be more): force, fear and desire.

- Force: When you coerce someone to act differently by literally manipulating the world around them beyond their control. For example, when a mobster wants to buy out a business for cheap, they may vandalize the business. The owners are forced to sell it for cheap, knowing they don't have the funds to fix it up and make it operational again.
- Fear: Causing others to follow your influence by use or threats of negative consequences. A mortgage company leads you to make timely monthly payments by threatening foreclosure, payment of late charges, etc.

- Desire: Inciting others to want to be under your influence. A child will clean his room because he is promised a cookie if he does a good job.

There are other examples that fit in each category, but you get the point. Interestingly, we see Jesus leading primarily through desire, God (in the OT) often uses fear, and the Holy Spirit, in isolated examples, seems to consume people and cause them to start behaving as he sees fit, and also bends circumstantial reality to his whims, causing the world to follow in the broad direction he wants it to go, even in our ignorance.

INVISIBLE LEADERSHIP

Anyone ever visit a small group where "that one person" always makes the group about their problems and nobody else really gets to chime in about their own life issues? And don't even bother asking about the actual content prepared for the day! That person is practicing (unintentionally) invisible leadership ... often to the detriment of the group. They take the reigns on the direction the group should go. The positional leader believes he still has control because, as he tells himself, "I could put a stop to this if I wanted, but I'm going to entertain it" - and perhaps in so doing the leadership dynamic is in harmony between the two forces. But the reality is that most just don't know how to deal with someone like that. Nobody accuses the other person of taking over "leadership" of the group, but it's obvious that that person is the one setting the path the rest walk on for their time together.

But this strategy can be used as a force for good, especially if the positional leader is a useless one - and there are a lot of them out there in churchianity! Take small groups, for example. If you follow the Rick Warren model, as my previous congregation did, small group leaders don't even need to be Christian! They just need to have a TV and know how to press the play button. Yikes!

The Basic Plan

When talking with /u/brotherchad recently, I gave him this model to start with. It needs to be adjusted for each circumstance, and it's certainly not the only viable model, but it's a reliable one:

- Week 1: STFU. Observe the group, gauge where they're at, and learn their personality styles. Through observation and charm as a participant, focus purely on developing trust and rapport with no effort to dominate the group. Don't try to impress, unless the opportunity is handed to you on a silver platter. Literally, this week is all purely about making yourself likable.
- Week 2: Take on two roles:
 - Be the silent sage. /u/SkimTheDross is fantastic at this. When I was hosting a weekly small group for RPC guys, he rarely talked, but when he did it was solid gold. Instead of answering every question, you let others speak first. When they don't come up with a good answer, you give the best answer - and only when you actually have something better to say. Don't answer every question or it'll come off as if you think you have the best answer to every question - which you might, but building rapport right now is more important than preaching truth that won't be received well. When you speak, you affirm what others say, gaining rapport and trust, but take the conversation to the next level. The goal here is to earn respect through meaningful contribution rather than domineering contribution. Domination is a fast-track to butt heads with the positional leader. You want to stay off his radar.
 - Be curious. Ask lots of really good questions that get people thinking. Thinking about things you want them thinking about, that is. Do it in the context of the content of the week. Your goal here is not to wow anyone with how deep your questions are (that's what the silent sage comments are for), but to show them (1) that you're not an arrogant jerk who only ever impresses people with the final word because you're here to "learn" too, and (2) most importantly: to gauge in deeper measure what the needs of each person in the group are - at least insofar as what will get them where you want them. In the case of making disciples, this means figuring out how to help them move just one step further toward being like Christ.

- Weeks 3-5: Play the fool. By this point, if you're effective, you're pretty popular in the group (hitting the gym helps here - you are doing that, right?). People are picking up on the fact that you're probably the smartest person in the room (at least insofar as biblical wisdom is concerned), but instead of flaunting it you humbly ask questions to the group with a(n at least apparently) genuine desire to know the answers. These questions are designed uniquely to help each individual take one step further in the direction you want them to go. And you use the content as context to do it.
 - It doesn't matter what the content is, by the way. I did this with my last small group and the content was a Lord of the Rings book. No joke. Bob needs to start having quiet times? Me: "I'm fascinated at the way the hobbits seem to talk to themselves. It's obvious they're meditating on something. Has anyone in the group ever tried meditating on something like that? Do you ever talk to yourself - or even God - like they do? Is it a helpful thing to do, or a waste of time? Most people will realize the common-sense reply: that quiet times are a moment of personal, prayerful reflection on God's Word, much like this. So, someone brings it up and you respond: "Yeah, I do that sometimes too, I guess. Anyone want to do it with me this week?"
 - Let's give another example. You're going through /u/Deep_Strength's book with a group of guys. The first chapter is on the history of the feminization of the church. Carl really needs to learn how to memorize Scripture and Dave doesn't ever pray. Your agenda is to get these guys practicing these basic disciplines with Scripture. Yes, you want them to read the content of the book also, engaging with it - but discipleship is more than just good content here and there. It's developing a lifestyle. So, with Carl you ask the group if they know any verses that prove the feminized views of modern churchianity wrong (Deep gives plenty), and then say you're going to memorize one such verse a day - and then you look to Carl and ask if he'll check you on them next week. And then ask if he'll memorize some too so it's a mutual thing. For Dave, you ask about how the feminized churchianity culture can be fixed. He doesn't know if it can be. You ask, "Do you think we can get the job done, or is it going to require an act of God?" He says the latter. You ask, "So what can we do to get God to act?" We can pray! he says. "Great idea, Dave! How about we both pray every day this week, even if only for 3 minutes, that God would use us as instruments in helping to restore the Church to biblical teaching." Again, the content itself doesn't matter - you can use a bologna sandwich as content to get someone to evangelize, if you want. You just have to know how to ask the right questions.

THE INVESTIGATOR

In our 204 post on leadership styles, /u/ruizbuja sets up a handful of strategies that can work in different situations. Having learned from him, I've become proficient in being "the investigator" - the art of asking questions to lead people to a pre-drawn conclusion. This is, of course, something I'm trained at doing in my career: cross-examination. I know what I want an opposing witness to say and he's going to avoid saying it with everything in his power. Yet by wording my questions cleverly enough, I can get him there in a way he can't deny without committing perjury.

There are two great ways to do this:

*Direct

- If you're the positional leader, do it DIRECTLY. In this situation, people know in advance that you're going to teach them something. Rather than lecturing at them, you turn it into a fun game, where they get to figure out your conclusion for themselves by following the trail of questions you have set out for them. It's also a fantastic strategy for dealing with someone who has an opposing view. People who fail at this direct method, where others find it coming off as condescending, simply have a crappy frame. The goal is to make them WANT to answer your questions, not for you to force them to do it.

EXAMPLE 1: I'm leading a Bible study on why street preaching is not enough.

- Did Jesus teach in the streets? Yes, obviously.
- And did people follow him or reject him when he did this? Both.
- Was that the most effective strategy he utilized? Well, he did it, so we have to assume it was effective and biblical and that we should do it too.
- Good, but was it the only strategy he utilized? No.
- What other strategies did he use for spreading the Gospel? He discipled his 12.
- And which strategy proved more effective at spreading the Gospel to the nations - Jesus' street-preaching, or his discipleship of the 12? The 12.
- So, should we neglect preaching to crowds? No, Jesus did it.
- But between preaching and discipleship, which was Jesus' priority? Discipleship.
- Which should be our priority? Discipleship.

Fin.

I've had that conversation at least a couple dozen times. It goes exactly like that about 95% of the time. People enter the conversation knowing I'm going to unfold why discipleship is essential. But this method of "biblical cross-examination" is generally more effective than just teaching someone because they are forced to acknowledge their agreement every step of the way, making it particularly effective with someone who disagrees with you, whereas a lecture gives room for them to debate back with a big old "BUT ... I think this or that" afterward because you haven't compelled them to agree.

If you make them agree with your smaller points, the bigger point tends to stick much better.

Invisible

The second way is what I mean when I talk about "invisible leadership." Watch how this plays out.

EXAMPLE 2: I'm participating in a Bible study on why street preaching is the epitome of the Christian life.

- Guy starts off: "Street preaching is the best. Gotta get the word out. Let's talk about how we can do it better."
- Fun stuff. I always like to ask: Hod did Jesus do it? Great question. What does the group think? They give basic answers.
- One thing that's always puzzled me about street preaching is why Jesus seems to run away from the crowds. Why do you think that is? Because he did so much of it he needed a break to recharge with God.
- Was it always just to have quiet times by himself, though? No, he spent time with his 12 too.
- Is it possible that that's something God expects to accompany a good street-preacher? That he has his team of 12 also? It's an interesting thought, but maybe if we want to be better street preachers, the quality starts off the streets. What are some ways we can enhance our ministry and influence on the streets by what we do off the streets? Great question. What does the group think? They give basic answers of reading the Word, praying, studying, memorizing Scripture, etc. - the 7 basics, essentially.
- I'm still confused. Do we see Jesus spending more time doing this with his 12 or more time doing public preaching? Public preaching.
- Maybe I'm missing it. Can you give me examples of when Jesus did this without his 12 around? No, he always had them around (which isn't quite true, but that's what people say).

- I guess I just want to know what the goal of street preaching actually is. I know it's important, but what's the end-game? To get the Gospel to the world. To save the lost.
- So between street preaching and spending time with "our 12," what's the higher priority? Which one will be more effective? Help me wrap my head around this. Well, the priority is the 12, like Jesus had as his priority. But the preaching is what he trained them for. So we need to have people we're raising up to help us preach and who can go out preaching elsewhere.
- Ah, that clarifies things for me. Thanks! You're welcome.

They're not as far along in this example as in the first example. It's inferior, overall. But they still reach the same conclusion. Yes, they are still too focused on street-preaching, but now I've steered their approach to prioritize discipleship and raising up new leaders. And if the context they create is toward getting people to preach the Gospel on the streets, that's still a win.

But notice the bolded language I gave - see how those create an appearance of genuine question-asking and sincere exploration as compared with the more dominant approach? You're asking the group to teach you their wrong ways so thoroughly that they realize it's wrong. They won't admit they're wrong, but as they process the information to teach it, they have to refine it, and you use your feigned confusion as the vehicle to drive them toward realizing it.

In this approach, the leader believes he retains his position because he gets to be the know-it-all who has the answers to all of your questions, when in reality he's in your frame, and you're just leading/influencing him through clever questions to get him to give the answers you wanted all along.

/u/TheChristianAlpha - You want to share your experience when I made you (on the spot) teach us all something that only you knew, and with only using questions? Fun exercise for anyone who wants to try it.

Some people just can't figure out common sense. There's literally a group of people who lack this cognitive capacity ... then there are guys new to the red pill who forget they have this ability for a time. I'm skeptical that anyone will want to admit to identifying with this post, but there's a good chance others are seeing it in you - and in hind-sight, I wish I'd been self-aware enough a few years ago to know when I needed something like this, so let's see where it goes.

Google describes autism symptoms as "difficulty with communication, difficulty with social interactions, obsessive interests, and repetitive behaviors." Psychologists I have spoken with and examined as part of my career have noted that one expression of autism is when someone compartmentalizes a particular thought process away from all the others, or fails to recognize appropriate contexts or limits/boundaries for expressing that thought process through behavior. Another noted that what we perceive as common sense, they don't comprehend intuitively - they have to learn many such concepts the same way you would have to learn carpentry: study, observation, and practice.

Let's clean that up: autists have difficulty figuring out when to apply good advice and when not to.

EXAMPLES

Consider Sepean's 10 ways to fail at MRP post.

- You don't lift hard enough. Some guy reads this, doesn't actually research lifting or follow a program, but just puts more weights on the bar, then gets himself injured.
- You mistake your idea of a real man for being alpha. Guy has his own idea of "alpha" having a dominant frame, forgetting the importance of the quality of his frame, so he tries to dominate his wife in every conversation and it blows up in his face.
- You listen to your wife. Sepean already foresaw this one and addressed the guy who idiotically ignores everything his wife says, even in casual conversation.
- You're upset your wife is angry. Someone reads this and idiotically stops paying attention to legitimate emotional cues of other problems that don't involve you.
- You think your wife is a puzzle you have to solve. After reading this, you trivialize every differing thought and emotional issue she expresses, making you incapable of distinguishing fitness tests from comfort tests.
- You're angry at how women are. Guy reads this and decides that instead of being angry he'd embrace the nature of women, which idiotically came with an absence of caution when interacting with them, so he gets slapped with a DV charge, divorce, unexpected child support, etc.
- You go Rambo. Guy decides not to go Rambo, taking things slow, and 5 years later is wondering why he's still not seeing results.
- You won't play dread. Guy decides to "dread" his wife by making her jealous as often as possible.
- You half-a it. Someone decides he's going to be "all-in" and starts going Rambo instead, or so drastically changes his routine all at once that nobody else in his house has the ability to adjust or follow his lead.
- You don't switch into dominance and boundary enforcement. The guy reads this, ignores the "eventually" context and starts the process too early, resulting in massive Rambo-like explosions.

Let's add a few more common ones:

- Guy is told to STFU. He literally stops talking to his wife and won't speak during conflict.
- Guy is told to develop a strong frame. He becomes emotionally dead, extremely cold, and completely unlovable.
- Guy is told to AA through fitness tests. Starts cracking AA jokes during comfort tests.

You get the idea.

OBJECTION 1

But Red, most of these posts explain what they mean so people wouldn't make stupid mistakes like this.

You'd think, right? Turns out: lots of guys ...

1. Skim rather than read
2. Read, but read so much at once that they can't remember half of what they read
3. Remember what they read, but don't process it
4. Process, but don't apply
5. Apply, but only the things they think are relevant

This entire sub is filled with gold. Yeah, there's some crap too. I've written some of the crap myself - stuff I'd go back and change, if I cared enough. I get it. But that's kind of the point. Don't be autistic and do something just because some rando on the internet wrote a post. Look for the guys who have a track record for reliable content. Read through the comments and figure out which suggestions work and which don't. It's often said reddit-wide that the best of reddit isn't the posts, but the comments. That principle certainly holds true here too.

Actually read and process what you read, then test it against your own common sense and instincts.

OBJECTION 2

But, Red - if I've been blue pill for so long, should I really trust my own 'common sense' and instincts?

No, but I'm telling you to anyway. Know why? Because that's what's going to pace you. Yes, your "common sense" is going to push against all of this stuff. But if you didn't have that, you'd apply it all way too fast in all the wrong ways, as many do, and end up blowing up your life rather than fixing it.

Instead, you read a red pill nugget and your common sense says not to do it. Rather than picking one or the other, this tension causes you to test/practice applying the concepts at safe contexts at a gradual pace. As you see it working and you become competent, your common sense adjusts to recognize that you can keep applying the concept in other contexts as well. In time, your blue pill instincts that were buffering you from going Rambo are now encouraging you to expand.

In this, you'll figure out quickly what works for you and what doesn't. And when you see that you're improving, but plateauing in the results you wanted, common sense would send you back to some of those principles you previously discarded. Maybe you weren't ready for them then, but you are now. Pick them up again and get back at it.

OBJECTION 3

But if she's disgusted by me right now, wouldn't a sudden, drastic change be better to show her I'm not the same?

No. I've heard guys say this. You don't change overnight just because you read an internet post. YOU have not changed. At best, your perspective has changed. Besides, questions like this still focus too much on her. Stop worrying about how she perceives things and you be better because YOU want to be better. All I'm saying is that if you want to do that in a way that doesn't blow up your life/marriage, apply some common sense.

The levels of dread are a great reference point here. Notice how you don't even start studying PUA until level 6, and you don't actually practice it until level 7? So what are you doing hitting on your waitress in front of your wife when you haven't even passed your first fitness test yet? It's right there in bold letter: "Move up these levels one at a time, slowly, and carefully, taking approximately 1 month for each level." Slow down. Master the basics before going on.

I still find that revisiting the basics has more value to me than trying to practice "advanced" concepts. Do I learn anything new when I do? Nope. But I certainly remember some things I forgot. And it reminds me that being a high value man, while requiring lots of effort, is ultimately nowhere near as complicated as some men try to make it. Common sense. Don't be autistic.

Lots of guys have caught on to the mission of making disciple(r)s. This is great. I have three qualms with how this is manifesting here, though:

1. Some men are adopting this mission externally rather than internally. "The Bible says I need to do it, so I'm going to do it" is an acceptable starting point, but it's also a very blue pill approach. I've said here before: The red pill Christian doesn't "enter Christ's frame," as many suggest. He is internally transformed/sanctified so that HIS OWN frame becomes synonymous with Christ's frame. The mission to make disciples is something you do for you, not something you do to appease God or earn his favor (which would be legalism), and having a proper perspective on this world in light of eternity necessitates this conclusion for anyone paying attention.
2. I don't get the picture that many guys actually know what discipler-making looks like, often confusing the process with more common concepts like evangelism or mentoring. Join the RPC discord if you want to flesh this out more, as it's a much better place for getting insight. Otherwise, I do intend to proceed with the 300 series soon.
3. Other guys have compartmentalized their mission from their mate.

We've talked about the first before, and the second will be upcoming, but let's focus on the third for now.

COMPARTMENTALIZATION

I'm as guilty of doing this as anyone else here. I don't mean just in the past - I'm talking the present too. It's an easy trap to fall into, especially within the red pill scene where there's so much emphasis on the man doing his own thing separate from the inappropriate influence of his wife. Yet there's a significant difference between being influenced by her and influencing her.

To be clear, there are areas where you SHOULD be influenced by your wife. Maybe she has skills you don't, or insight you lack, or experiences you could benefit from. Don't shoot all that down just because you have some ridiculous notion of what it means to be a "red pill man." The red pill is about understanding the truth - and I'll add: in its proper context. Yes, it may be a red pill truth that sometimes women need to be told no. But don't be autistic about it.

When it comes to being the one doing the influencing, lots of guys take a pass. Or, more accurately: they become passive. They take the "autist" route of misunderstanding the red pill advice of "do your own thing and let her follow" as "I'm just going to ignore her and expect her to get with the program all on her own." That's foolish.

But the natural conclusion of this foolishness is segregating your mission from your mate. Why?

- Maybe she told us she didn't want to be involved, so we obeyed her like good little children
- Maybe she's not naturally good at helping in our mission, so we didn't even bother trying to train her
- Maybe we're just idiots and completely forgot to include her in the first place

Whatever your reason, the reality is that this needs to be fixed. Your wife is your helper. Let her help. If she doesn't try on her own, invite her. If she's not good at it, train her. If she resists, correct her. If she fails, encourage her.

RED PILL EXCUSES

What I DON'T want you doing is using the red pill as an excuse to avoid connecting her with your mission. I noticed myself doing this at one point, and I've seen it in other men. Their wife isn't following, so you say things like "1,000 foot rope" and "you do you" as cop-outs for never actually trying to connect with her on your mission in the first place.

Yes, the 1,000 foot rope may take time to reel in. Yes, "you do you" certainly applies. But these only make sense IN THE CONTEXT of her refusing to join in with the program. What if she doesn't refuse? Then there's no point going off on your own! How do you know if she will or won't?

Some guys fail to involve their wives for the same reason other guys fail to ask out a girl in the first place: "What if she says no!?" Oooh, the horror. So, you guarantee the bad conclusion (rejection) in order to maintain your feeling of control and dominance over the situation, giving a false sense of safety and emotional stability.

But if you can get on board with the idea of a single guy asking a girl out in order to build confidence (either through success or gradual immunization from rejection), the same should apply to you with your wife, just in a different context.

The principles are still the same. When a single Christian man asks out a girl, that's his way of saying, "I want you to be my helper in what God has in store for my life." In case you haven't caught on, what "God has in store" is for you to make disciplers. When a married Christian man is compartmentalizing his mission and his mate, he's in the same scenario, needing to ask her: "Will you start helping me in what God has in store for our lives?"

MARRIAGE AND MINISTRY

For discipler-makers, here's a principle to live by: Your marriage affects your ministry. You may not realize how, and even after hearing the explanation you still may not see it ... but it does.

Discipleship is about life-modeling. If your marriage sucks, how can you model for other men what marriage should look like? The Church has been warned that if a man can't manage his own household, he shouldn't manage God's household either. 1 Timothy 3:5. "One who is faithful in a very little is also faithful in much." Luke 16:10. And that applies to leading your family, if you want to have greater influence in God's Kingdom. Get the point?

But the connection goes to another level: your wife should be the first among those you disciple, and your children after her. How can a man pretend to disciple other men if he does not disciple his own family? It's a lunacy trap I'd been caught in for years, and having escaped it I see how many other men are there too. It ultimately stems from a weak frame - a man who likely believes, "My wife would never let me disciple her." This, as described above, is partly due to misconceptions about what biblical discipleship actually looks like and how to implement it in the context of a marriage (a process I'd enjoy much more discussion on). But it's more commonly because most guys haven't developed a frame that's strong and attractive enough to handle it.

FIRST AMONG

We've already said that your wife should be the first among your disciples. Great. But it's more than just that. She's also the first among those who should WANT to follow your lead. Does she?

Your wife has vowed to follow you, right? If anyone would want to follow you, she has more motive and obligation than anyone else. Now, remove the obligation component. Suppose the Bible never said wives should submit to their husbands, but still impressed on the man the obligation to lead their wives. The dynamic suddenly shifts to parallel the rest of the world in your discipler-making efforts, where you have an obligation to lead them toward Christ-likeness, yet they have no obligation to submit to your leadership.

With that in mind, the principles that will cause your wife to want to follow you are identical to what will cause others to want to follow you. Physical attractiveness, strength, confidence, charisma, charm, wit, emotional stability, financial acuity, a clear vision, etc. - these are all things that make you more attractive to your wife, and will also make you more attractive to the rest of the world. She's just the first among your followers.

Yes, you can probably get a guy or two to follow you even if your wife won't. But I've found that such relationships rarely produce fruit in the long-haul. They're guys who often see themselves as more your peer, and generally tend to be low-value men who share similar struggles as you. Maybe they respect one aspect of you that they want to learn from, but will they truly want to be discipled by you the way Jesus discipled his 12? Probably not.

My point: If you want to be effective at your mission, be effective in it at home first. I don't mean "first" in a successive sense - "this first, then that" - but in a priority sense. Have other guys you're working with too. Be simultaneous inside and outside the home. But make sure your home life is the priority. That's where it starts. Because that's where you're going to model for other men what they should look like in their own life and relationships.

CONCLUSION

If you don't know who to disciple, start with your wife/girlfriend. If you can't figure out why you're not effective at making disciples outside the home, perhaps it's because you haven't prioritized making disciples inside the home. The same things that make your wife want to follow you will also make other people want to follow you.

In another context, this is much of why we talk so much about improving men's marriage and sex lives - not because we're obsessed with marriage and sex. It's because the processes are often parallel, and a healthier marriage/sex-life is a waypoint on the larger journey toward advancing God's Kingdom during your time on this earth.

Some people just can't figure out common sense. There's literally a group of people who lack this cognitive capacity ... then there are guys new to the red pill who forget they have this ability for a time. I'm skeptical that anyone will want to admit to identifying with this post, but there's a good chance others are seeing it in you - and in hind-sight, I wish I'd been self-aware enough a few years ago to know when I needed something like this, so let's see where it goes.

Google describes autism symptoms as "difficulty with communication, difficulty with social interactions, obsessive interests, and repetitive behaviors." Psychologists I have spoken with and examined as part of my career have noted that one expression of autism is when someone compartmentalizes a particular thought process away from all the others, or fails to recognize appropriate contexts or limits/boundaries for expressing that thought process through behavior. Another noted that what we perceive as common sense, they don't comprehend intuitively - they have to learn many such concepts the same way you would have to learn carpentry: study, observation, and practice.

Let's clean that up: autists have difficulty figuring out when to apply good advice and when not to.

EXAMPLES

Consider Sepean's 10 ways to fail at MRP post.

- You don't lift hard enough. Some guy reads this, doesn't actually research lifting or follow a program, but just puts more weights on the bar, then gets himself injured.
- You mistake your idea of a real man for being alpha. Guy has his own idea of "alpha" having a dominant frame, forgetting the importance of the quality of his frame, so he tries to dominate his wife in every conversation and it blows up in his face.
- You listen to your wife. Sepean already foresaw this one and addressed the guy who idiotically ignores everything his wife says, even in casual conversation.
- You're upset your wife is angry. Someone reads this and idiotically stops paying attention to legitimate emotional cues of other problems that don't involve you.
- You think your wife is a puzzle you have to solve. After reading this, you trivialize every differing thought and emotional issue she expresses, making you incapable of distinguishing fitness tests from comfort tests.
- You're angry at how women are. Guy reads this and decides that instead of being angry he'd embrace the nature of women, which idiotically came with an absence of caution when interacting with them, so he gets slapped with a DV charge, divorce, unexpected child support, etc.
- You go Rambo. Guy decides not to go Rambo, taking things slow, and 5 years later is wondering why he's still not seeing results.
- You won't play dread. Guy decides to "dread" his wife by making her jealous as often as possible.
- You half-a it. Someone decides he's going to be "all-in" and starts going Rambo instead, or so drastically changes his routine all at once that nobody else in his house has the ability to adjust or follow his lead.
- You don't switch into dominance and boundary enforcement. The guy reads this, ignores the "eventually" context and starts the process too early, resulting in massive Rambo-like explosions.

Let's add a few more common ones:

- Guy is told to STFU. He literally stops talking to his wife and won't speak during conflict.
- Guy is told to develop a strong frame. He becomes emotionally dead, extremely cold, and completely unlovable.
- Guy is told to AA through fitness tests. Starts cracking AA jokes during comfort tests.

You get the idea.

OBJECTION 1

But Red, most of these posts explain what they mean so people wouldn't make stupid mistakes like this.

You'd think, right? Turns out: lots of guys ...

1. Skim rather than read
2. Read, but read so much at once that they can't remember half of what they read
3. Remember what they read, but don't process it
4. Process, but don't apply
5. Apply, but only the things they think are relevant

This entire sub is filled with gold. Yeah, there's some crap too. I've written some of the crap myself - stuff I'd go back and change, if I cared enough. I get it. But that's kind of the point. Don't be autistic and do something just because some rando on the internet wrote a post. Look for the guys who have a track record for reliable content. Read through the comments and figure out which suggestions work and which don't. It's often said reddit-wide that the best of reddit isn't the posts, but the comments. That principle certainly holds true here too.

Actually read and process what you read, then test it against your own common sense and instincts.

OBJECTION 2

But, Red - if I've been blue pill for so long, should I really trust my own 'common sense' and instincts?

No, but I'm telling you to anyway. Know why? Because that's what's going to pace you. Yes, your "common sense" is going to push against all of this stuff. But if you didn't have that, you'd apply it all way too fast in all the wrong ways, as many do, and end up blowing up your life rather than fixing it.

Instead, you read a red pill nugget and your common sense says not to do it. Rather than picking one or the other, this tension causes you to test/practice applying the concepts at safe contexts at a gradual pace. As you see it working and you become competent, your common sense adjusts to recognize that you can keep applying the concept in other contexts as well. In time, your blue pill instincts that were buffering you from going Rambo are now encouraging you to expand.

In this, you'll figure out quickly what works for you and what doesn't. And when you see that you're improving, but plateauing in the results you wanted, common sense would send you back to some of those principles you previously discarded. Maybe you weren't ready for them then, but you are now. Pick them up again and get back at it.

OBJECTION 3

But if she's disgusted by me right now, wouldn't a sudden, drastic change be better to show her I'm not the same?

No. I've heard guys say this. You don't change overnight just because you read an internet post. YOU have not changed. At best, your perspective has changed. Besides, questions like this still focus too much on her. Stop worrying about how she perceives things and you be better because YOU want to be better. All I'm saying is that if you want to do that in a way that doesn't blow up your life/marriage, apply some common sense.

The levels of dread are a great reference point here. Notice how you don't even start studying PUA until level 6, and you don't actually practice it until level 7? So what are you doing hitting on your waitress in front of your wife when you haven't even passed your first fitness test yet? It's right there in bold letter: "Move up these levels one at a time, slowly, and carefully, taking approximately 1 month for each level." Slow down. Master the basics before going on.

I still find that revisiting the basics has more value to me than trying to practice "advanced" concepts. Do I learn anything new when I do? Nope. But I certainly remember some things I forgot. And it reminds me that being a high value man, while requiring lots of effort, is ultimately nowhere near as complicated as some men try to make it. Common sense. Don't be autistic.

There's lots of material out there for understanding frame from a man's perspective. But I have seen scant little on how women reciprocate the frame game. In fact, even in places like /r/RedPillWomen, they're given incredibly anti-red-pill, anti-biblical advice ... and r/RPCWomen is still relatively new. So, let's explore. Here are my founding axioms:

- ONE: Submission and frame are not the same.
- TWO: Women have their own frame no matter what.
- THREE: Married women should live inside their husband's frame.
- FOUR: All women should, subject to nuance, submit to (rather than live within the frame of) male Church leadership
- FIVE: Women are not subject to submit or live within the frame of men in other contexts.

ONE: Submission and frame are not the same.

Lots of women are fine with both of these concepts in theory, but because they assume they're the same they miss the broader implications of frame. Some simplified definitions:

- Submission is a combination of the attitudes and behaviors expressed by a woman in graceful response to someone's exercise of authority.
- Frame is your "internal point of origin" or worldview that you project to the world around you.

1 Peter 3 is a great example of submissiveness. The compliance aspect is made clear by the fact that "submit yourselves to your own husband" is sandwiched between slaves submitting to their masters and Christ submitting to the authorities that crucified him. The attitude is more directly stated in the immediate context. The call to submission is followed by "when they see your respectful and pure conduct" and that a woman's beauty should be "of a gentle and quiet spirit, which in God's sight is very precious." These are how you respond to God-given authority.

Frame comes in all shapes and sizes. A woman can be non-submissive and yet have a strong, bold frame. 2 Samuel 6's story of David and Michal shows a clear example of this. David had his own worldview that God was to be glorified above all - and he expressed this through dancing in his underwear. Michal was embarrassed with the world view that her husband's dignity as king was more important than worshipping God. Here, her frame is evident in her rebuke of him, expressing the gap between David's frame and her own. This is why we can't confuse the two. Submissiveness is one aspect of a healthy frame for a woman. But a woman cannot claim to have a godly frame merely because she is submissive, or otherwise say that she is submissive merely because she lives in her husband's frame. Indeed, even people who share a common worldview can have a dysfunctional authority relationship.

TWO: Women have their own frame no matter what.

It's a common misconception in some conversations on the manosphere to assume that a woman must set aside her frame to cede to her husband's. That the perfect woman doesn't have a frame of her own. This simply isn't true - or even possible. Eve's conduct in the garden shows that even before the fall, women had the capacity for thought independent of her husband's leadership. Yes, that thought led to the first sin, but still predated that sin itself. When married, women do not abandon their worldview or point of origin. They are meant to adapt it. This is why many in the manosphere suggest that women are designed like clay, which adjusts to the mold it is placed in. The mold is a shape. But the clay, once placed inside, also has an external shape of its own that is maintained even when it is removed from the mold afterward, if it has set.

This is important for men to realize because it helps them overcome the anger-stage and realize that even if women are malleable to a strong leader, they are still independent, functional people with thoughts, feelings, and opinions that produce fruitful discussion and perspectives toward running the ship of which she is first officer. It is also important for women to recognize this - not to embolden them toward independence, but to have the self-confidence to function autonomously without the micro-management of a husband, and to know that women have great value to contribute to the relationship/marriage, even if it may not always be the exact kind of value she wants to contribute.

THREE: Married women should live inside their husband's frame.

Rather than proving the statement, I'll assume it's a given and instead discuss what this means in three significant contexts.

How can I live in my husband's frame and have my own frame at the same time?

The wife's frame is circumscribed within her husband's frame. Consider the fact that we have "freedom in Christ." Within God's framework for his missional, obedient, godly, and even hypothetically perfect followers there is room for doctors, plumbers, and financial advisors. There's room for introverts and extroverts. Animal-lovers and animal-eaters. Each different type of person has their own framework for understanding the world and operating within it - and each also, despite having disparate frames, also has the capacity to co-exist within God's framework for his followers. Each individual's frame is circumscribed by God's because it's big enough to encompass different attributes. Yet at the same time, if the person who is an introverted, animal-eating doctor decides that disciple-making isn't for him, he has suddenly left God's frame by resisting the adaptation of God's primary imperative for this earth into his own worldview.

In this, we can see that living within someone's frame isn't about adapting every single aspect of your personality and character to a rigid set of expectations. Rather, it is an adoption of the frame-holder's point of origin as one's own, and allowing your individual and unique attributes to be expressed in a manner consistent with that worldview. In this way, a man whose frame involves starting a charitable organization can be well-supported by an extroverted wife who interacts in the community to raise support for his cause, or by an introverted wife who helps manage his books, or other behind-the-scenes methods of assisting his mission. Yet a wife who says, "I don't care about your charitable purpose, so I'll just take care of the home," may be submissive without being in his frame at all.

What if my husband's frame sucks?

I've heard this question a number of times. The answer rests on why I distinguished between submissiveness and frame in the first place. A wife has a biblical obligation to submit to her husband, but not to live in his frame. Suppose Paul had a wife while he was killing Christians and she was saved before him. Should she have adopted his worldview that Christians are evil threats to the Jewish religion? Of course not. Should she have submitted to his leadership over her home? Yes - that he may be won over, as 1 Peter 3 says, by her submissiveness, purity, respect, gentleness, and quiet spirit.

But let me emphasize one thing: This will not produce a healthy interpersonal dynamic within the marriage; but some things are more important than having a healthy interpersonal dynamic. If a wife lives outside of her husband's frame, the relationship will suffer. But the point of marriage, as I've often said, is not to be happy or interact well with the other person - it's (per Malachi 2:15) to produce godly offspring. That is: make disciples. In this, a woman can be tactful in balancing between submission to her husband and living within Christ's frame if her husband's frame is not within Christ's frame.

What if "submitting to my husband" involves him asking me to sin?

Let's jump to extremes to illustrate a point. Husband asks wife to murder someone. Should she do it? No. The same Paul who wrote Ephesians 5 ("Wives submit to your husbands") also wrote Romans 13 ("submit to your governing authorities"). Does that mean he obeyed every rule, command, law, edict, etc. of Nero Caesar who was ordering Christians to be murdered when Paul wrote this? Obviously not! He wasn't telling all Christians to obey the command to put each other to death. Rather, when Paul was caught (Acts 16, for example), his response was not to escape and defy the judgment of his human authorities over him; it was to accept the legal consequences of his actions.

In the same way, if a husband asks a wife to sin, while she may have some argument to obey him (especially if it is a disputable issue, at which point she may - and perhaps should - defer to his leadership), if obedience would be clearly sinful, her act of submission is not in obedience to the order, but in accepting the consequences he lays out for her defiance - and embracing this with the same submission Christ gave to those who crucified him, or the same purity, reverence, gentleness, and quiet spirit that Peter references in 1 Peter 3.

If it helps, in my attorney-mind, think of it like parking illegally. The government doesn't say, "Thou shalt not park illegally." It says, "If you park illegally, you get a ticket." So, you can submit to your authority by not parking illegally and avoiding the ticket - or also by parking illegally and agreeing to pay the ticket. Extend that concept to submission within marriage and maybe it'll all make more sense.

What does it practically look like to live in my husband's frame?

On a behavioral level, it means adopting his worldview and supporting his purposes in all you do. If he's for the death penalty and you're against it, submission says you vote consistently with his expectations of you, but living within his frame means (on a behavioral level) trying to understand why he's for the death penalty, and giving him all benefit of the doubt in attempting to embrace his way of thinking.

But it runs deeper than behavior. Christ transforms his bride, purifying her and making him more like to himself. Consider the parallel with another concept I often teach:

- True Christians do not live by God's expectations of them. They are transformed by God so that their own internal desires are naturally God's desires flowing out of them.
- A true godly wife does not live by her husband's external expectations of her. She is transformed by her love, trust, and respect for his leadership so that her own internal desires are naturally identical to his desires flowing out of her.

This is what it means for a wife to live in her husband's frame.

FOR EMPHASIS:

Of course, as above, if a husband's frame sucks it's not practically going to happen. A woman's ability to live in her husband's frame is directly correlated to her attraction toward him. Like the mold and the clay, what happens if they're both magnetic and the clay is repelled by the mold instead of being drawn to it? You can try to force it in, but it will fall right back out long before it actually sets. You can't negotiate attraction. A man must take responsibility for being someone whose frame is strong and desirable enough to be a force of attraction rather than repulsion. Be attractive, don't be unattractive. Both matter (and yes, it's possible to be attractive and unattractive in varying ways simultaneously).

Equally significant: even though the man has the burden of developing attractive-leadership to draw his wife into his frame, this does not excuse her imperative to seek to live within his frame. Yes, it may be difficult. But this is also why I distinguish between "on a behavioral level" and when "it runs deeper."

FOUR: All women should, subject to nuance, submit to (rather than live within the frame of) male Church leadership

I'm not going to re-hash the passages on women trying to take roles of headship within the Church. I do what to emphasize a couple nuances in my wording here.

First, I reference "submission" here and not frame. Why? Because Acts 17 encourages us to challenge what is taught even from reliable sources. We are not meant to blindly follow those who preach just because they say so. In the end, if we find we agree, we adopt their frame through Scripture rather than through titular authority - and this produces an even better result. Yet submission to an authority within their own house is still a default, even if we maintain our own frame. Law 38 of the 48 Laws of Power is relevant here: "Think as you like but behave like others."

Of course, in the above I'm implying reference to involvement in a lower-case "church." Yet my original statement referenced Church with the capital C. When addressing submission to Church leadership, this is more absolute than the hollow, self-declared authority of so-called "pastors" who call their bodes local "churches." This is significant because some congregations demand submission on absurd things. In this, your "submission" to the local congregation in which you participate is a courtesy to the fact that you are a guest in their house and if you find value in participating in their house (as you should), you should play by their rules. It is virtually always possible to play by their rules and simultaneously pursue the purposes God gave The Church within their body.

From there, the question may be asked: "What does it mean to submit to The Church, proper, if not a local human authority?" The Church is the aggregate Kingdom of God as it exists on earth. There is no singular leader but Christ, who communicates his leadership to the Church through the Spirit, which is most prominently known through the canon of Scripture. So, that's where it starts. Submission to Scripture is primary, as Christ is the logos/Word of God made flesh and embodied through our living and active Scriptures, breathed by God, called the "sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God." But if we really want to get technical, your local Church (as opposed to local church) is those who God has placed in your life who you know to be trustworthy and reliable as members and leaders within God's Kingdom. That may be someone from your congregation - but it MAY also be your best friend or trusted advisor or co-worker, etc. who don't attend the same congregation as you. But this topic is too big to address here, so I'll leave it at that.

FIVE: Women are not subject to submit or live within the frame of men in other contexts.

My son used to hold the mistaken view: "Men are leaders and women are followers. So, my sisters have to do what I say." Not so, boy. This attitude is taken by many men in TRP, and is something I've even seen among some women - that men, generally, are the head of women, therefore women must submit to men on a societal level the same way as to a husband. This is, in my view, over-reaching.

Let me emphasize this: If you are an unmarried woman in a relationship, you do not owe a duty to submit to your boyfriend. For relational health, it may be wise to spend some time living within his frame in order to understand whether that's a healthy long-term residence for you. But be cautious against rote submission - especially if there is some form of pressure toward sinful conduct, such as premarital sex. Even if it is not sinful, if it crosses one of your boundaries, contemplate the pros and cons earnestly before resigning yourself to "he wanted me to, and I want to be submissive [in a wrong context], therefore I did it."

That said, even though you are not obligated to this, it doesn't mean it's a bad idea. It just means you exercise wisdom and discretion.

13

UPVOTES

Female Frame Part 2: The Value of Women

9 December 2020 · r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

Female Frame Part 2: The Value of Women

26 points • 6 comments • submitted 3 months ago by Red-Curious to r/RPCWomen

In red pill communities, it's easy to glorify men and make women feel like trash. Yes, there's good reason to speak blunt realities about women, just as we are even more harsh with the men who are idiots in how they interact with women. But in doing so, the red pill doesn't speak of women's value or worth. It only speaks to their nature. Yet a crucial aspect of a woman having a healthy frame is in understanding her own sense of value - where it comes from, how it's defined, and how to live within it.

TO WHOM?

Value is a subjective quantity. My wife values a cup of coffee in the morning. I don't. I'd spill it down the drain (sacrilege, I know!). So, when addressing the question of value, we must first ask: WHO is the frame of reference for this valuation?

If we ask feminists, women have great and massive value far and above that of men, right? If we ask a keyboard warrior who Facebooks by day and raids orc dungeons by night, he's still going to value women more than his kind, but for very different reasons. Or what if we ask OBGYNs? Or NFL athletes? Trannies? You'll get very different answers from different people.

I propose there are only two answers that should actually matter from a woman's perspective, though: (a) her spiritual groom and (b) her physical groom. As to the first, we have Galatians 1:10 - "For am I now seeking the approval of man, or of God? Or am I trying to please man? If I were still trying to please man, I would not be a servant of Christ." God is the primary person whose valuation you should care about. As for the second, Genesis 2:18 makes clear that God created women to be a helper to her husband. That is: she is to be valuable to him in the fulfillment of his mission. While women have direct access to God through Christ, and therefore don't technically need a husband, the fact that this imperative was placed in women even before the fall makes clear that God has no intention of removing that compulsion anyway. It's part of you and you SHOULD look to your husband for his valuation of you, and weigh heavily in your heart the validation (or lack thereof) that comes with it - especially if he is a godly man.

Now, I suppose there are other sources of value that should matter too. For example, a daughter should look to her father to find her value as his daughter while she lives in her home. But I assume we're mostly adults here. A woman can also be asking from her own frame of reference - and this is a good and valuable thing as well, in some circumstances (not all). Yes, it's good for you to ascertain your own internal sense of valuation. But women who already have this internal self-validation aren't often the ones struggling to comprehend their value, so that's a moot point in this post.

HOW DO WE COMPARE?

So, what IS the actual value of women? Are women valuable, but not quite as valuable as men? I suppose in the husband's eyes, that question is subjective. But God gives us a clear answer in Galatians 3:27-28: "For as many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Gentile, neither slave nor free, nor is there male and female, for you are all one in Christ Jesus." That is: from God's perspective, he doesn't differentiate between men and women when it comes to our ability to unite with Christ, have salvation, and participate in the work he has laid out for us to do. Yes, the actual work we are assigned may differ by gender, but we have equal access to his love and ability to be in a oneness, abiding relationship with our spiritual groom.

This is especially true in the sense that the Church is collectively the bride of Christ - men included. It's one of the reasons a man is uniquely qualified by God (and not himself), if he is mature, to lead a wife. God gives him the position of follower-helper in the Christ-Church union so that the man can understand and life-model for his wife how to live that role in their own husband-wife union.

WHAT IS THE VALUE?

And now to the meat of the question. Asking, "What is the value of women?" is no different than asking, "What is the value of the Church?" Yeah, it's obvious what Christ contributes to the picture - and his headship, strength/power, authority, vision, etc. may all make it seem like the Church is pointless by comparison. After all - Jesus says that if we won't do our job by proclaiming him, the rocks would cry out (Luke 19:37-40). Jesus doesn't need the Church - or ANY of us. But does that mean we're not valuable? In this, I find the following:

- Jesus finds the Church valuable, and therefore it is valuable. Period. We don't need to ask more questions or try to understand because He doesn't owe us an explanation on why he values us. It should be enough for us to know that he does.
- Jesus has chosen the Church to be the primary vehicle through which his mission is carried out. God created the Church to be Christ's "helper" in spiritually reproducing into the nations. The Holy Spirit works through us to make this happen. All members of the trinity participate in this value-assignment.
- The Church holds its primary pragmatic value in its ability to make disciples.

Yeah, I could list a lot more ways the Church has value. Feel free to do so for me in the comments. But having hit the big ones, consider:

- Women are valuable if, when, and because their husbands find value in them - Christ being the first among these.
- Women have been created to be helpers to their husbands - especially in regard to his mission (which if he is faithful in submitting to Christ, is also Christ's mission: make disciples of all nations). In this, if the man and wife are mature, he invites her into his discipler-making mission to help him, and she actively participates - and this adds value to the man, who is now more effective in proving his value to Christ, and also to Christ directly. As such, the woman has great value to both sources that matter when this plays out. But even if the man's mission is distracted from Christ's (i.e. anything else), she can still independently be valuable in both/simultaneously (a) helping her husband with his unique mission, and (b) helping Christ with his mission of making disciples of all nations. These do not need to be mutually exclusive.
- Women also have value in their ability to produce offspring. The Bible directly says: "Women will be saved through child-bearing," and I believe this is because they hold the template for how disciples are to be born and raised. More on that here. Remember that in Romans Paul had a similar value-conversation with the Jews after the Gentiles were given equality in God's Kingdom (per the same Galatians 3:27-28 passage, above). In Romans 3:1-2 he both asks and answers the question: the value is that they held God's Word and the prophets, which were the physical template for understanding the spiritual realities made known through the cross (Hebrews 8-9). That is: if Paul says the Jews were still of value for being entrusted with the template for understanding the subsequent spiritual realities of the cross, so also do women have value for being entrusted with the template for understanding the spiritual mission of Christ, which is also the very purpose of marriage itself.

If women ever doubt their value, contemplate whether or not the Church has value and let that guide your exploration of the matter.

DOWN TO EARTH

Men Don't Need Women - and that actually contributes to your value

What does this look like in a real sense? My wife used to be infuriated when I would tell her that I didn't need her. Yeah, it was a blunt reality that I could have communicated better at the time. The reality is: I don't need her. I would find a way to get by without her. But what I wanted her to understand is simply this:

- If I NEEDED her, then our interactions would be driven by compulsion.
- Because I DON'T NEED her, my interactions are driven by desire.

I want her help. I want her in my life. She adds something of value that I desire and find useful, and this is valuable. That value would not exist if it was from compulsion by necessity. I can despise something I need, and yet still make good use of it - because I have no choice. But to engage with someone I don't need should be a clear demonstration of the value we place on the help that is given.

Value-evasion through hollow contributions

Some women like to create fake value for themselves. They avoid being helpers to the man's mission by saying they'll do other things that they think he should find valuable because the woman values it. In reality, this is not a value-add at all. As discussed above, there are times when a woman's internal sense of value is sufficient. When she's married and her self-valuation is in conflict with her husband's ... that's not one of those times.

If he's asking for help making disciples, or building a company, or saving the rain forest, or whatever else - she cannot say, "I won't help with that; I'll take care of the house and kids so you have the freedom to go do that." Yes, this may be a healthy domain for her focus. But when God created women, he did not look at Adam and say, "I will create someone to take care of the habitat and children so you can name the animals without interruption." He created a helper suitable to him.

IF the husband does find distraction-removal to be the most helpful way she can contribute to his mission (which would make him a crappy husband with a weak vision for how his mission will be fulfilled, if he can't think bigger than this) - then and only then is it appropriate for her to ignore his mission and focus on the home and kids. But if he is appropriately inviting her to partake in the bigger plans he has for advancing God's purposes through his life, it is not her prerogative to step aside to focus on the things she'd prefer to do. Instead, she is being given an opportunity not only to be valuable, but to express that value, and a failure to do so deflates her worth to God and her husband. Contemplate this carefully before insisting within your own frame to reject the frame your husband invites you to live within.

130
UPVOTES

Merry Christmas - I've put together my "Tricks of the Trade for a Fun Frame" list as your present - good ideas for fun during the holidays

25 December 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill · Archived copy · Reddit

PREFACE

First off: This isn't a playbook I draw from. It's a slideshow of organic occurrences. These are mostly things I just naturally do that bring some fun and life into our relationship - ESPECIALLY in moments when she's acting sad, bored, depressed, furious, etc. That is, I created this list by reminiscing on times when she was caught in her own head, but I managed to pull her into my mood/frame/way of thinking in the moment - and what I remember doing that triggered it. That is, they are expressions of my frame. Some are heartfelt moments (which are often repeated more often than others, thus may look like they're not a significant part of my frame - don't be fooled). Others are cheap gags to introduce fun at random times (which, while high in quantity on the list, are used with far less frequency). Still others are just random things that generate feels. Play around to figure out what works for you and not.

I don't encourage you to copy my examples exactly or even try to write your own playbook. Rather, this is more to give you inspiration as you learn to develop a fun, safe, comfortable, and enjoyable frame for her to live in. Try a few things. Use what works, leave the rest. Tweak them. But if your frame sucks, by all means DO SOMETHING to build it.

Second, with the above in mind: this is meant for men who already have the foundation necessary before developing a good frame. You can't be a fat blob who gets butthurt all the time and expect these things to BE your frame. They are things occurring from my ALREADY EXISTING frame that have the effect of pulling her in when she's otherwise letting her own feels outside my frame be a bother to her.

Third: Don't be an idiot. Exercise discernment if you try these at home. For example, when she's sad, there's a difference between how I'd respond to "I'm sad just because I am" and "I'm sad because my mother just died." Don't be an idiot. Thad said, toy around with these, even if the context doesn't feel right. You may be surprised what works when you don't expect it.

Fourth: Also note that these are either supplements to existing strategies (AA, AM, etc.) or even, at times, expressions of them. Don't ignore everything you've learned and assume that you can skip the actual advice to try a few things that consistently work for me.

THE SLIDESHOW

Without further ado, in no particular order ... things I've done to pull my wife out of her own head and into my frame in the moment:

- The Elevated Hug: Hug her nice and sweet. Gradually tighten and lean back so her feet come off the ground, then bounce her a bit. She always complains: "Ouch, don't hurt me!" but it never fails to make her laugh and smile.
- The Height Shift: My wife is pseudo-tall (5'10") and self-conscious about it. I'm 6'0", but sometimes it's fun to hug when I'm on a step and she can feel petite, resting her head in my pecs instead of my shoulder. One time recently I did it in the reverse and dug my head into her breasts. That was fun(ny). For some reason, this one makes a difference to her when she's in need of a mood-booster.
- The Frown Upside-down: I have a few times picked her up and turned her upside-down and said, "See? That frown is now a smile. Mission accomplished." Extremely powerful - always gets the job done, especially when kids are around and say, "Do it to me too, Daddy!"

- The Feels: Hand on cheek, foreheads touching. "That sucks."
- The Tickler: Actually tickle your wife. I can't believe I went several years forgetting that this has magical smile-giving powers.
- The Tickle Transfer: Tease the kids about mommy being a grouch. "But Mommy doesn't like getting tickled too much because Daddy's tickles are too strong. So I'll tickle you and you can give her my tickles for me."
- The Confession: Hand on shoulder, "Can we just say it like it is?" with a laugh. She looks back confused. "Life sucks right now! Repeat after me (if you want extra emphasis, one hand on each cheek): Life. Sucks. Right. Now."
- The Sinatra: Start singing a song. Bonus points if you serenade her in front of someone (kids count, but not as many points as strangers/in public). Even more bonus points if you're embarrassingly bad at it. Brownie points if it's a song she knows and you invite her to sing the chorus with you.
- The Ballerina: At random times throughout the day/week, grab her hand and give her a twirl like you're on the dance floor. Dip her afterward.
- The Punching Bag: When she's frustrated, suggest that she needs to let it out and exaggerate telling her that "violence is the best answer for relieving frustration." Flex and let her punch you in the abs or tricep as hard as she can. The first few times she'll be sheepish, but egg her on to do it harder and harder. This one always works well for brightening her mood ... need to remember to bring it back. Been too long, old friend.
- The Imitation Game: Play the imitation game with her mannerisms, but grossly exaggerated (a form of agree and amplify, charades-style).
- The Impressionist: Pick a character to impersonate who you know she's familiar with. Randomly start impersonating that person during conversations when she's not expecting it. Bonus points if you're really bad at it.
- The Foreigner: Randomly start talking in other accents and see how she responds.
- The Nuisance: While she's working on something - typing on the laptop, cooking, vacuuming, reading the kids a story - keep "accidentally" bumping into her or interrupting her while she's talking or tapping her on the shoulder to get her attention, then saying, "Nevermind, I figured it out." Not enough to be actually annoying, but enough that she can tell you're toying with her. This is my natural twist on Athol Kay's "shower move" from MMSLP ... just doesn't require the shower, but same idea.
- The Fakeout: Make up some story that's believable, but also just barely pushes the boundaries of reality. Ex. We're watching a movie and she asks who an actor is. "Oh, that's the girl from <random movie she's not actually in>. Did you know she went to high school with my brother's ex girlfriend?" Every time: "Really? That's crazy." "No, not really, babe. You're so gullible."
- The Back Hug: Walk up behind her while she's doing something and wrap your arms around her. Lean your head into her neck and sway.
- The Sniffer: Start with the back hug, but sometimes start making sniffing sounds (noticeable, but not exaggerated). Pull away from her quickly. She gets awkward and asks, "What?!?" STFU and don't answer. "Do I smell?" If you feel like it, start laughing to confirm her suspicion that it's a joke.
- The Jalepeno: I've done this one several times - when you order a sub (or cook a meal where it's feasible), ask to have a single jalepeno hidden inside. Sadly, she only notices about 1/4 the time I do this one. Maybe you'll have better luck, or use a hotter pepper (not too hot though).

- The Pillow Thief: My wife knows I love sleeping with lots of pillows. It's been a long while since I've done this one, but when you make the bed, put every pillow on your own side - none on hers. Haven't tried it yet, but might be funny even to bring up random pillows from the couch to exaggerate how many end up on my side of the bed.
- The Dreamer: If you wake up in the middle of the night and she's also up, but doesn't know you're awake, start moaning like you're having a wet dream. Whisper some other girl's name. Have fun with the story (short mumbles). "I'm married" then 10-15 seconds later, "Okay, fast" then take a deep breath.
- The Provoker: Storm into a room she's in with an elevated voice and start accusing her without being exactly clear of what you're accusing her of (or be clear, but something that's not a legit issue). She gets worked up and defensive, you bust out laughing, "Just teasing you babe. Want to do X with me?"
- The Hunk: She's upset. "Babe, I know life sucks sometimes, but no matter how bad things get know that you always have one thing in your life that will never change that will always cheer you up." Stop there. She eventually asks, "What?" STFU. "God?" Well, sure. But that's not what I had in mind. "You?" Kind of. "Then what?" These! Grab her hand and put it on your bicep as you flex. Any time you're upset, just grab these and squeeze and I'm confident it will make you feel all better again.
- The Mad Hatter: Put random things on her head and say, "Hey, I found your hat. Stop losing it."
- The Comb: Rub her head. "I love rubbing my hands through your soft, smooth hair," then rub fast enough that your hands inevitably get caught in knots (but not so fast it hurts). "So silky smooth."
- The Empath: She's upset. You just hold her (standing or laying) and rub her back occasionally. Don't stay too stiff - motion = being present in the moment; stiff = awkward.
- The Protector: Someone upset her that day. Go to the door and start putting on your shoes. She asks what you're doing. "I'm going to kill him/her for you."
- The Listener: Actually listen to her. <I know, right?>
- The Nazi: Find a random framed picture in your house - particularly one she's not likely to pay much attention to. Open the frame. Slide the picture out. Replace it with a picture you printed of Hitler (or whatever else you think would be apt). Put it back on the shelf. STFU and wait for the fun to happen - preferably days or even weeks later.
- The Wrong Turn: You're driving and pretend you don't know where to go. Panic and ask her for directions because you can't remember. Whether she tells you a way in time or not you say, "Okay, I'm going left/right <pick the wrong one>" while you are simultaneously turning the right way. In the moment, she's paying more attention to what you're saying than what you're doing and doesn't pick up on the fact that you actually went the right way. "Too late, babe. I already turned. Can I make a U turn here?" She looks out the window and gets her bearings and punches you in the shoulder.
- The Story Teller: She asks you a question about something she's struggling with, wanting to know how to cope. Instead of telling her the answer or giving her advice, you tell her a story from your own life about a time you experienced something similar and came out with the result that she's looking for. Let her connect the dots for herself.

DURING SEX (leaving off most things that I assume you've already picked up from books like MMSLP, SGM, etc.)

- The Talker: Make her say what you tell her to say: "Say please" "If you want more, ask for it" "Beg" "Announce when you're cumming." Then add a phrase that's totally unexpected: "Tell me you like to do puzzles. Say it! Say it now! I like to do puzzles." When she says it, act like that's the thing about to push you over the edge. Yes, this breaks immersion, therefore defying SGM. But I've found that sometimes a sudden jarring out of immersion creates a jolt as a physical reaction and if it doesn't prompt an immediate orgasm (usually/I assume by breaking the concentration that was holding back), it's a nice transition point to shift to a new position. It can also be effective if she's just not immersed at all or her head seems to be somewhere else, pulling her back into the moment.
- The Disappointment: Edge her just before climax, then pretend you thought she already finished and lay down next to her like you're done.
- The Pretzel: Start moving her around like you're trying to change positions, but keep shifting things around in ways it that it would be ridiculously impractical to actually have sex like that.
- The Favorite: Give 98% of your attention to one part of her body - enough to others that you acknowledge that it's there, but voraciously go after that one part. For example: do everything and the book to the left boob for a while, then shift to the right boob and kiss it twice, then hammer right back into that left boob. So confusing to her, but seems to get a positive reaction the few times I've done it.

Okay ... I'm out of time, so I'm going to cut myself off there. I really wish I could keep going, though. This was fun to write!

No, I don't actually have names for these things in my head - I just put them there while writing this for the fun of it. That said, while writing this list, it's interesting to me that while she denies "physical touch" as one of her "love languages" (if you buy into that stuff), many of these involve physical touch and only work because of it. The ones that don't are often (but not always) less effective. Kino matters. Learn to take these starting points and build from them.

WHY I WROTE THIS POST

Because I love to have fun with my wife - and I'm sure you all have even better stories of things you've done that work and not. I'd love to hear those stories and be inspired by them. Maybe I'll add them to the list with credits.

Merry Christmas - I've put together my "Tricks of the Trade for a Fun Frame" list as your present - good ideas for fun during the holidays

25 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

PREFACE

First off: This isn't a playbook I draw from. It's a slideshow of organic occurrences. These are mostly things I just naturally do that bring some fun and life into our relationship - ESPECIALLY in moments when she's acting sad, bored, depressed, furious, etc. That is, I created this list by reminiscing on times when she was caught in her own head, but I managed to pull her into my mood/frame/way of thinking in the moment - and what I remember doing that triggered it. That is, they are expressions of my frame. Some are heartfelt moments (which are often repeated more often than others, thus may look like they're not a significant part of my frame - don't be fooled). Others are cheap gags to introduce fun at random times (which, while high in quantity on the list, are used with far less frequency). Still others are just random things that generate feels. Play around to figure out what works for you and not.

I don't encourage you to copy my examples exactly or even try to write your own playbook. Rather, this is more to give you inspiration as you learn to develop a fun, safe, comfortable, and enjoyable frame for her to live in. Try a few things. Use what works, leave the rest. Tweak them. But if your frame sucks, by all means DO SOMETHING to build it.

Second, with the above in mind: this is meant for men who already have the foundation necessary before developing a good frame. You can't be a fat blob who gets butthurt all the time and expect these things to BE your frame. They are things occurring from my ALREADY EXISTING frame that have the effect of pulling her in when she's otherwise letting her own feels outside my frame be a bother to her.

Third: Don't be an idiot. Exercise discernment if you try these at home. For example, when she's sad, there's a difference between how I'd respond to "I'm sad just because I am" and "I'm sad because my mother just died." Don't be an idiot. Thad said, toy around with these, even if the context doesn't feel right. You may be surprised what works when you don't expect it.

Fourth: Also note that these are either supplements to existing strategies (AA, AM, etc.) or even, at times, expressions of them. Don't ignore everything you've learned and assume that you can skip the actual advice to try a few things that consistently work for me.

THE SLIDESHOW

Without further ado, in no particular order ... things I've done to pull my wife out of her own head and into my frame in the moment:

- The Elevated Hug: Hug her nice and sweet. Gradually tighten and lean back so her feet come off the ground, then bounce her a bit. She always complains: "Ouch, don't hurt me!" but it never fails to make her laugh and smile.
- The Height Shift: My wife is pseudo-tall (5'10") and self-conscious about it. I'm 6'0", but sometimes it's fun to hug when I'm on a step and she can feel petite, resting her head in my pecs instead of my shoulder. One time recently I did it in the reverse and dug my head into her breasts. That was fun(ny). For some reason, this one makes a difference to her when she's in need of a mood-booster.
- The Frown Upside-down: I have a few times picked her up and turned her upside-down and said, "See? That frown is now a smile. Mission accomplished." Extremely powerful - always gets the job done, especially when kids are around and say, "Do it to me too, Daddy!"

- The Feels: Hand on cheek, foreheads touching. "That sucks."
- The Tickler: Actually tickle your wife. I can't believe I went several years forgetting that this has magical smile-giving powers.
- The Tickle Transfer: Tease the kids about mommy being a grouch. "But Mommy doesn't like getting tickled too much because Daddy's tickles are too strong. So I'll tickle you and you can give her my tickles for me."
- The Confession: Hand on shoulder, "Can we just say it like it is?" with a laugh. She looks back confused. "Life sucks right now! Repeat after me (if you want extra emphasis, one hand on each cheek): Life. Sucks. Right. Now."
- The Sinatra: Start singing a song. Bonus points if you serenade her in front of someone (kids count, but not as many points as strangers/in public). Even more bonus points if you're embarrassingly bad at it. Brownie points if it's a song she knows and you invite her to sing the chorus with you.
- The Ballerina: At random times throughout the day/week, grab her hand and give her a twirl like you're on the dance floor. Dip her afterward.
- The Punching Bag: When she's frustrated, suggest that she needs to let it out and exaggerate telling her that "violence is the best answer for relieving frustration." Flex and let her punch you in the abs or tricep as hard as she can. The first few times she'll be sheepish, but egg her on to do it harder and harder. This one always works well for brightening her mood ... need to remember to bring it back. Been too long, old friend.
- The Imitation Game: Play the imitation game with her mannerisms, but grossly exaggerated (a form of agree and amplify, charades-style).
- The Impressionist: Pick a character to impersonate who you know she's familiar with. Randomly start impersonating that person during conversations when she's not expecting it. Bonus points if you're really bad at it.
- The Foreigner: Randomly start talking in other accents and see how she responds.
- The Nuisance: While she's working on something - typing on the laptop, cooking, vacuuming, reading the kids a story - keep "accidentally" bumping into her or interrupting her while she's talking or tapping her on the shoulder to get her attention, then saying, "Nevermind, I figured it out." Not enough to be actually annoying, but enough that she can tell you're toying with her. This is my natural twist on Athol Kay's "shower move" from MMSLP ... just doesn't require the shower, but same idea.
- The Fakeout: Make up some story that's believable, but also just barely pushes the boundaries of reality. Ex. We're watching a movie and she asks who an actor is. "Oh, that's the girl from <random movie she's not actually in>. Did you know she went to high school with my brother's ex girlfriend?" Every time: "Really? That's crazy." "No, not really, babe. You're so gullible."
- The Back Hug: Walk up behind her while she's doing something and wrap your arms around her. Lean your head into her neck and sway.
- The Sniffer: Start with the back hug, but sometimes start making sniffing sounds (noticeable, but not exaggerated). Pull away from her quickly. She gets awkward and asks, "What?!?" STFU and don't answer. "Do I smell?" If you feel like it, start laughing to confirm her suspicion that it's a joke.
- The Jalepeno: I've done this one several times - when you order a sub (or cook a meal where it's feasible), ask to have a single jalepeno hidden inside. Sadly, she only notices about 1/4 the time I do this one. Maybe you'll have better luck, or use a hotter pepper (not too hot though).

- The Pillow Thief: My wife knows I love sleeping with lots of pillows. It's been a long while since I've done this one, but when you make the bed, put every pillow on your own side - none on hers. Haven't tried it yet, but might be funny even to bring up random pillows from the couch to exaggerate how many end up on my side of the bed.
- The Dreamer: If you wake up in the middle of the night and she's also up, but doesn't know you're awake, start moaning like you're having a wet dream. Whisper some other girl's name. Have fun with the story (short mumbles). "I'm married" then 10-15 seconds later, "Okay, fast" then take a deep breath.
- The Provoker: Storm into a room she's in with an elevated voice and start accusing her without being exactly clear of what you're accusing her of (or be clear, but something that's not a legit issue). She gets worked up and defensive, you bust out laughing, "Just teasing you babe. Want to do X with me?"
- The Hunk: She's upset. "Babe, I know life sucks sometimes, but no matter how bad things get know that you always have one thing in your life that will never change that will always cheer you up." Stop there. She eventually asks, "What?" STFU. "God?" Well, sure. But that's not what I had in mind. "You?" Kind of. "Then what?" These! Grab her hand and put it on your bicep as you flex. Any time you're upset, just grab these and squeeze and I'm confident it will make you feel all better again.
- The Mad Hatter: Put random things on her head and say, "Hey, I found your hat. Stop losing it."
- The Comb: Rub her head. "I love rubbing my hands through your soft, smooth hair," then rub fast enough that your hands inevitably get caught in knots (but not so fast it hurts). "So silky smooth."
- The Empath: She's upset. You just hold her (standing or laying) and rub her back occasionally. Don't stay too stiff - motion = being present in the moment; stiff = awkward.
- The Protector: Someone upset her that day. Go to the door and start putting on your shoes. She asks what you're doing. "I'm going to kill him/her for you."
- The Listener: Actually listen to her. <I know, right?>
- The Nazi: Find a random framed picture in your house - particularly one she's not likely to pay much attention to. Open the frame. Slide the picture out. Replace it with a picture you printed of Hitler (or whatever else you think would be apt). Put it back on the shelf. STFU and wait for the fun to happen - preferably days or even weeks later.
- The Wrong Turn: You're driving and pretend you don't know where to go. Panic and ask her for directions because you can't remember. Whether she tells you a way in time or not you say, "Okay, I'm going left/right <pick the wrong one>" while you are simultaneously turning the right way. In the moment, she's paying more attention to what you're saying than what you're doing and doesn't pick up on the fact that you actually went the right way. "Too late, babe. I already turned. Can I make a U turn here?" She looks out the window and gets her bearings and punches you in the shoulder.
- The Story Teller: She asks you a question about something she's struggling with, wanting to know how to cope. Instead of telling her the answer or giving her advice, you tell her a story from your own life about a time you experienced something similar and came out with the result that she's looking for. Let her connect the dots for herself.

DURING SEX (leaving off most things that I assume you've already picked up from books like MMSLP, SGM, etc.)

- The Talker: Make her say what you tell her to say: "Say please" "If you want more, ask for it" "Beg" "Announce when you're cumming." Then add a phrase that's totally unexpected: "Tell me you like to do puzzles. Say it! Say it now! I like to do puzzles." When she says it, act like that's the thing about to push you over the edge. Yes, this breaks immersion, therefore defying SGM. But I've found that sometimes a sudden jarring out of immersion creates a jolt as a physical reaction and if it doesn't prompt an immediate orgasm (usually/I assume by breaking the concentration that was holding back), it's a nice transition point to shift to a new position. It can also be effective if she's just not immersed at all or her head seems to be somewhere else, pulling her back into the moment.
- The Disappointment: Edge her just before climax, then pretend you thought she already finished and lay down next to her like you're done.
- The Pretzel: Start moving her around like you're trying to change positions, but keep shifting things around in ways it that it would be ridiculously impractical to actually have sex like that.
- The Favorite: Give 98% of your attention to one part of her body - enough to others that you acknowledge that it's there, but voraciously go after that one part. For example: do everything and the book to the left boob for a while, then shift to the right boob and kiss it twice, then hammer right back into that left boob. So confusing to her, but seems to get a positive reaction the few times I've done it.

Okay ... I'm out of time, so I'm going to cut myself off there. I really wish I could keep going, though. This was fun to write!

No, I don't actually have names for these things in my head - I just put them there while writing this for the fun of it. That said, while writing this list, it's interesting to me that while she denies "physical touch" as one of her "love languages" (if you buy into that stuff), many of these involve physical touch and only work because of it. The ones that don't are often (but not always) less effective. Kino matters. Learn to take these starting points and build from them.

WHY I WROTE THIS POST

Because I love to have fun with my wife - and I'm sure you all have even better stories of things you've done that work and not. I'd love to hear those stories and be inspired by them. Maybe I'll add them to the list with credits.

Anything You Can Do I Can Do Better.

22 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

There are a lot of blue pill incel types coming on here lately, who for some reason think they're other than they are. We've had massive growth over the last year, so this isn't shocking. I think last February we were at maybe 1,000 - in under a year we're almost at 9,000. A lot of people aren't reading the sidebar and are asking dumb questions or trying to put out false teaching.

I haven't helped the situation much because I focus my time on the discord. In the pareto principle, the discord and the people I work with IRL are the top 20%. I'll always invest in the committed few over the masses, so reddit takes a sideline. Point being: if you want to get serious, prove it through OYS and investing the time to get to know people through the discord. In the meantime, here's something to remember:

YOU SUCK

This is the actual problem: You suck.

Sure, argue with me: "Not every guy on here sucks." If you don't suck, you're a guy who doesn't care that I said it anyway. But the ones who have that knee-jerk reaction are the ones who need to take a lesson. I was one of them. When I joined the manosphere, I sucked just as bad as you all - maybe even worse. I had so much pride in my blue pill nature that you could fry a turkey in it.

- Physical: If you're without a physical deformity and you're not benching 2 plates yet (i.e. 225+ if you can't do math or have never been to a gym to know what a plate is) and deadlifting 3 (i.e. 315), stop and ask yourself real hard: "Have I earned the right to post in this forum yet?" No, spraining a muscle two years ago "and it never fully felt back to normal ever since" isn't a good excuse.
- Mental: Have you actually read the sidebar? Have you internalized, practiced, applied, and become it yet? How many fitness tests have you failed in the last month? If you're single, how many approaches have you been making to even engage with fitness tests at all? When's the last time you read a book? What's the last behavior you've done in the last 7 days that was caused directly by a book you read in the last 3 months? If you can't give good answers to these questions, stop and ask yourself: "Have I earned the right to post in this forum yet?"
- Spiritual: How are you doing on the basics? If you're not engaging in the Word directly, in constant communication with God, sharing your faith constantly, and living out the mission to make disciples with people you can reference by name and not the general "I make disciples by just hoping people see my life" garbage, ask yourself hard: "Have I earned the right to post in this forum yet?"

This is not an open free-for-all. This is a place for people who are serious and want to grow. If you're asking questions, you'd better be willing to take the advice and apply it. If you come back a few months later asking the same questions or still speaking as if you plainly haven't read or internalized the sidebar, don't be surprised if we boot you. Yeah, banning you might mean you can't comment - but it doesn't mean you can't read. Prove you've made progress and we'll let you back. In the meantime, stop sucking so much. Also, get in the OYS either here or on the discord. Make some of these things mile-markers you're shooting for and get off your butt to achieve those goals.

THOSE WHO HAVE, MORE WILL BE GIVEN

With that out of the way, do I really need to explain why people who don't suck get better results than those who do? A couple days ago this post popped up about a guy who couldn't understand why women were repulsed when a pot-belly, toothpick-armed man asked some randos if they were virgins and it didn't go well. The reaction: that he's "a judgmental repulsive woman hating jerk for even asking that."

Years ago, when I was first starting out, I remember whining on MRP about why my wife wouldn't do this or that in bed (yeah, I was that guy too). One of the vets said: "I don't care how goodie-two-shoes she is of a Christian stereotype. Give me one day with her and she'd be begging to do those things with me." In another conversation /u/weakandsensitive commented: "An ugly guy gives a girl a teddy bear he won at the fair and he's creepy. An attractive man gives a girl a teddy bear he won at the fair and he's so dreamy. See how that works?" It took me longer than I'd like to admit to fully embrace the reality in the concepts these men were sharing - and we've incorporated into our own side bar as /u/Deep_Strength's Christian Brad Pitt Thought Experiment post.

The reality is: just as that OP was asking women, "Are you a virgin?" like a social incompetent, instead of being treated like a creeper I'm confident I could get away with asking the exact same question and get a positive reaction instead. It's the same as the teddy bear. A guy who lives in his own frame and oozes confidence, purpose, and social dominance (among other things) can not only get away with things - but it even ENHANCES his attraction for having the audacity to be so bold.

- Unattractive Guy: "Are you a virgin?"
 - Woman: "Ew, get away from me, creep!"
- Attractive Guy: "Are you a virgin?"
 - Woman: "Does it matter? Because I'm getting the vibe that even if I was, I won't be for long."

THOSE WHO DON'T, EVEN WHAT THEY DO WILL BE TAKEN AWAY

Yeah, this is definitely not Jesus' intended context for the verse, but so many things he says turn out to be true in contexts beyond what he meant. Remember the guy in the parable? He was weak. He squandered the time he had to achieve goals while the master was away. When he had to answer for his fruitlessness, rather than owning up to it he DEERed. To his credit, I don't think a big fat: "Yeah, I screwed up. Sorry," would have changed the outcome anyway. But you see that his 1 was taken away. He wasn't put in charge of any cities. Instead, he not only lost what was given - he was even sent out of the master's vineyard altogether, where there would be weeping and gnashing of teeth - the same description Jesus gives for hell.

That's right: if you continue sucking, you will be subject to a living hell. This is exactly how many guys describe their dead bedroom marriages. It's how they talk about the nagging and disrespect they get from their wives. It's the words they use to talk about their hopeless incel singlehood. All because they're not improving. They're not setting goals and accomplishing them.

1 Timothy 3:5 says that "if someone does not know how to manage his own household, how will he care for God's church?" Yeah, single guys seem to get a pass at this, right? They don't have "members of their own household." But here's the broader principle: if you can't be faithful with the tangible things you can see and feel and touch, how can you ever expect to be faithful with the things you can't see, feel, and touch? 1 John 4:20 shows the expanding use of this concept: "he who does not love his brother whom he has seen cannot love God whom he has not seen."

The physical world is easy. And Hebrews 8-9 says that the physical things are "copies" and "shadows" of the truer heavenly things - the parallel God has always intended and which is self-evident by even a very cursory comparison of the Old and New Testaments. No, it's not the focus. But if you suck even at the easy stuff, how can you expect to master the things that actually matter in life?

CONCLUSION

Getting a girl to go gaga for you is easy. Even virgins. Even ... No: especially if you have the gall to ask ridiculous questions like, "Are you a virgin?" to their face. Getting a lost soul to go gaga for Christ ... well, that's a lot harder. But it's a LOT easier if you don't suck at life.

So, if your arms are toothpicks, start benching. If your social game is lame, start cold approaching randos until you master it - guys and girls; this isn't about dating, but about learning to talk to people. If your spiritual disciplines are weak and you still can't pull 20+ observations from a single verse, open your Bible and stop making excuses.

.
.
.
.
.
.
.
.
.
.

GOTCHA: That wasn't the conclusion. DISCIPLESHIP actually is - BE FAST

Here's the real advice I want you to walk away with: if you suck, but you know people who don't, ASK THEM FOR HELP!!! If you know someone who can do something better than you - even if it's just one thing in life and they suck at everything else more than you, at least ask them to teach and train you (i.e. disciple you) in that one area.

But BEFORE you do this, make sure you're someone worth their time investment. I won't disciple people who aren't worth it. I only have limited time to help people and I usually live within my maximum capacity - to the point that it puts a strain on other areas of my life. Other people who I'd call the "top notch" disciplers would do well to be equally selective, as long as they're living at their capacity too. If you aren't proving that you're FAST - Faithful, Available, Saved, and Teachable - then why would we spin our wheels on you when someone else who IS FAST is right around the corner?

No, you don't have to be benching two plates for me to teach you how to lift. You just need to be FAST. No, you don't need to have fully mastered everything in the sidebar for me to show you how I live it out. You just need to be FAST. No, you don't need to having daily quiet times and memorizing Scripture before I teach you how to have quiet times and memorize Scripture. You just need to be FAST.

In the parable of the sower, only one seed is given to the soil, yet after it's watered and tended and pruned (see also John 15), it yields a crop 30, 60 or even 100 times what was sown. You get that harvest from the process - not before the process. But being FAST does actually mean something more than "I'm willing."

- FAITHFUL: When something is given to you, you've got to apply it. You make a stupid post on here and get replies telling you what to do: you'd better come back a couple months later with a field report telling us how you've implemented the advice and what the fruit of it was - or even if you're still struggling, to give it another go.
- AVAILABLE: You can't pop your head around one or two times and expect people to invest in you and help your situation. I'm guilty of feeding into this attitude because I find personal enjoyment in talking to randos about their problems because it helps me stay on my game too. But don't expect this to get personal unless you — show a commitment to being present and active often enough for your name to be known and recognized.

- SAVED: I have no problem evangelizing you if you're lost (even if you don't realize it); but the "fast"est growth and the real function of discipleship begins after salvation.
- TEACHABLE: If you come in with an attitude that you think everyone should learn from you and you just want to DEER your way through a conversation when mods and ECs are telling you you're wrong, bugger off. We're not wasting our time investing in that attitude (at least not on your terms or for your benefit).

In the end, however much you may NEED someone to disciple you to stop sucking, the reality is that discipleship is a luxury, not a need. You're responsible for your own growth. So this is where it gets meta:

- You have to stop sucking at life, which would be much easier if you had someone to disciple you.
- You have to stop sucking at being FAST if you want someone competent to disciple you.

Got it? Now go do it.

Book Notes: When To Walk Away, by Gary Thomas

23 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

I'd be interested in seeing book reviews coming through from people who find value in them. No book will be perfect. We've even got non-Christian books on the sidebar, such as MMSLP, which talks about the proper way to watch porn with your wife. As always, understand that you've got to sift the good from the bad. But every now and then a book has enough good that it's worth overcoming its weaknesses - whether those are in the form of non-Christian world-views or blue pill ideologies mixed into otherwise highly useful content.

Gary Thomas's book When to Walk Away is one such book. I don't endorse the author as a whole. While I've known his name for some time (famous for Sacred Marriage, which I assume is blue pill), this is the only book of his I've actually read. So, let's dive in.

Read: January, 2021 Rating: 7.5/10

Summary: The driving theme of the book is that you shouldn't let your mission be distracted by toxic people - whether those are friends, family members, co-workers, or even your spouse. He makes a few blue pill statements about marriage as a whole, and also has a generally unbiblical view about how freely he encourages divorce from a "toxic" spouse, and some of his examples call into question whether he was accurately understanding both sides of the story (or that could just be skepticism due to my profession and what I really know goes on behind the scenes). But the drive to make disciples above all else is admirable.

Conclusion: This book is a must-read for anyone interested in engaging in online ministry in any capacity or taking on a ministry leadership position - whether by starting your own ministry or doing so within the context of an existing congregation or other entity. I hope and pray you all do have that ambition, though. It's also useful if you have legitimately toxic people in your life. Also useful for anyone involved in family law at all. For anyone else, skip it.

All italics in the original. Bolding is mine for significant quotes.

CHAPTER 1: A Most Clever Attack - If someone is getting in the way of you becoming the person God created you to be or frustrating the work God has called you to do, for you that person is toxic.

- One of the cleverest attacks against God's church today centers around our guilt in dealing with toxic people. Satan knows he can't stop God's people from loving and caring, because God's Spirit makes us love and care. What he can do, however, is urge us to pour most of our God-breathed love, intention, and goodwill on people who actually resent it and who will never respond to grace.
- One caveat before we begin. Some use the label toxic much too broadly as an excuse to avoid difficult, different, or hurting people. Let's not do that.

CHAPTER 2: Walkaway Jesus - Jesus walked away or let others walk away ... a lot.

- I reread the gospels and counted every occurrence where Jesus deliberately parted ways with others ... I counted forty-one such instances in all four gospels. Forty-one!
- One thing we don't see when others walk away is Jesus giving chase. As powerful as Jesus was, as brilliant as Jesus was, as pure as Jesus was, and as surrendered to God as Jesus was, not everyone he interacted with 'changed,' repented, or agreed with him.
- Not just one, but many walked away. And not just casual onlookers; they're called his 'disciples.' Instead of chasing them down and begging them not to misunderstand him and to please come back, Jesus turns to the reliable people, the Twelve, and says, 'So, what about you?' Notice the confidence that gives authority to his message. Jesus never appears desperate, manipulative, or controlling, as if when people didn't agree with him his feelings would be hurt. He is mission focused and others-centered to his deepest core.

- Many plastic bracelets have been sold with the words 'What Would Jesus Do?' If you're dealing with toxic people, you may want to get a bracelet that reads, 'What Would Jesus Not Do?' The answer is, 'He wouldn't chase after them.'
- [Jesus] never allowed the desire of others to dictate who he spent his time with.
- Don't think that letting yourself be abused is always the holy choice.

CHAPTER 3: A Murderous Spirit - Three common elements of toxic opposition ... a murderous spirit, a controlling nature, and a heart that loves hate.

- They murder relationships, turning people against each other. They murder churches, turning meeting times into gigantic fights instead of worship and service. They murder workplaces, destroying productivity. They murder reputations.
- I've seen many people claim to do God's work while seeming to use Satan's methods.

CHAPTER 4: Control Mongers - As powerful as God is and as sovereign as God is, he is never controlling.

CHAPTER 5: Loving Hate - Some people just seem to love hating others.

- If you tell a toxic boss, "What you just said hurt me deeply," that's like telling a rhinoceros he has bad breath. He doesn't care. It doesn't even register. If you say, "What you're doing is shameful," you're confusing them with a person who is capable of feeling shame.
- "Proactive people show you what they love, what they want, what they purpose, and what they stand for. Those people are very different from those who are known by what they hate, what they don't like, what they stand against, and what they will not do."
- The challenge is that those who have most fallen into pride, envy, ambition, and hatred are the least likely people to see it in themselves. We recognize adultery, drunkenness, and murder, but there's something about these attitudinal sins that blind us spiritually."
- Toxic people enjoy the stink. They stop recognizing it as stink. To them, their smell is delicious. They like it. They love it. They want some more of it.

CHAPTER 6: No Time To Waste - If you are in Christ, you aren't just saved; you are enlisted. You have been called into a tremendously important work - an urgent work - and there's no time to lose.

- Too many people think our salvation is about us - personal peace, assurance, happiness, and security. One of the greatest needs in the church today is more workers. Not just believers. Not just church attenders. Not even tithers. It is workers, those who believe that to be saved isn't to wait for heaven but to get busy bringing heaven's presence and authority to this present earth as ambassadors for Christ.
- It's not about protecting yourself from toxic people (though that's a valid aim); it's more about protecting your mission from toxic attacks.
- This world may not reward your mission before God; it will more likely oppose it ... The more important the work, the more you can expect attacks. Thus, to complete your work, you have to learn how to recognize, disarm, or step aside from such attacks.

- I have had to come to grips with the fact that people have lied and will lie about me; they will rip a few sentences out of context, twist a few passages, and make me sound like I believe something I don't because they need something to be angry about and oppose. And they'll post it all on an Amazon review or in a blog. It has taken me too long to learn that it's often best to simply not respond ... I don't want to be distracted even to defend myself. Why? God's Kingdom is more important than mine. [RC Note: If we are within God's Kingdom for eternity, it IS our Kingdom too.]
- Our mission is not to seek out and defeat toxic people ... our job is to ignore them so we don't get distracted from our mission.

CHAPTER 7: Reliable People - We should be looking for people to invest in. If I'm already living a full schedule because there are reliable people and kingdom-minded work filling up my calendar, it is much easier to say no to someone who just wants to take up time and be noticed in a toxic sort of way.

- This priority to put our first and best effort into reliable people is a biblical call, not a personal preference ... We want to be generous to all, but focused on a few, as Jesus was.
- Notice that Jesus didn't always walk away at the first sign of resistance. He figured out why a person was resisting and responded accordingly. If the reason wasn't toxic, Jesus often walked toward someone rather than away.

CHAPTER 8: Pigs and Pearls - The clearing of the temple is actually the scene that all but confirms Jesus' gentleness in this sense: the reason this incident struck a nerve is that it seemed so unlike Jesus' normal mode of operating ... this is one of the few acts of Jesus recorded in all four gospels ... Virtues like gentleness aren't always absolutes.

- If you're like me, preferring to be gentle most of the time, this may be a painful chapter for you. I'd much prefer to write a book about how we should love everyone extravagantly, sacrificially, and enthusiastically ... But this kind of book isn't written very often.
- Jesus is essentially saying that a spiritually dead person is as insensitive to the glory of God's truth as a big is to the value of a pearl ... When this is the condition of a person's heart, only a direct act of God can melt such a soul - not you.
- It's not the fruit's fault. You can take the most fertile seed known to humankind, pour it out on I-10 all the way from Florida to California, and nothing is going to happen. It's not that there's something wrong with the seed; there's something wrong with the surface that won't receive it.

CHAPTER 9: Love Tells the Truth - Jesus and Paul obviously didn't believe that dismissing someone's evil and sin as "well-intentioned but misguided" is always the right path. They called people out on their toxicity ... there's a difference between labeling and name-calling.

- Name-calling is about hurting, demeaning, and using words as a weapon. Labeling is about understanding. It's helpful for Tim to know his wife is selfish and manipulative because what works for a "healthy" wife may not work for his wife.
- I can't control a toxic person. I can't change a toxic person. I can't understand a toxic person. But I can guard my mission and maintain my character.
- A caveat here: we should be wary of labeling someone too quickly.

CHAPTER 10: A Man With A Mission - If only Satan were lazy ... Keep in mind, merely distracting you is a win for them. If they can't ultimately defeat your work, they at least want to delay your work. Our job, based on Matthew 6:33 and 2 Timothy 2:2, requires us to maintain a laser-sharp focus with wisdom, discernment, and determination.

- Mission-minded people don't have time for sentimental foolishness. Nehemiah saw through the facade to these men's real intentions and refused the meeting. Here's why: "But they were scheming to harm me; so I sent messengers to them with this reply: 'I am carrying on a great project and cannot go down. Why should the work stop while I leave it and go down to you?' Four times they sent me the same message, and each time I gave them the same answer."
- When a toxic person doesn't get his or her way, their next gambit is often to make your motives sound sinister.
- Here's the blatant trap you need to be wary of. Some people will want to waste your time and drain you by using a false sense of neediness. When that stops working, they don't give up. If they can't make you sympathize, they'll seek to make you defensive. They'll attack so you'll want to defend yourself. What's really going on is that they just want your attention. They want to keep controlling a slice of your time, effort, and energy. Whether you sympathize with them or are angry with them doesn't matter as much as the fact that you notice them and spend time interacting with them.
- One of the best defenses against toxic attacks, then, is seeking what John Climacus called true meekness, "a permanent condition of that soul which remains unaffected by whether or not it is spoken well of, whether or not it is honored or praised."
- The best way to confound toxic people is to ignore them while you complete the work they want to stop.
- The best thing you can do to witness to a toxic person is stay focused on your task, refuse to be distracted or play their games, pray instead of gossip, and then get the work done. Find the reliable people God has called you to invest in ... Then they will see that God is God, and they are not.

CHAPTER 11: Looking Like Jesus When Working With Judas - Three key strategies, based on Jesus' interaction with Judas, for how we can live with or work alongside toxic people without going crazy for ourselves:

- Jesus Didn't View His Mission as Stopping Toxic People from Sinning - Maybe it seems more obvious to you, but it was startling to me when I realized Jesus knew Judas was a thief and never chose to stop him.
- Jesus Didn't Let Judas's Toxicity Become His ... Just as astonishing to me is what happened during the act of betrayal. When Judas walks up to Jesus to hand him over to the soldiers, Jesus looks at Judas and says, "Do what you came for, friend" (Matthew 26:50). Friend? How about skunk? How about snake? Jesus said "friend" because Jesus didn't have a toxic molecule in his body.
- Jesus Spoke Truth to Crazy ... In fact, he warned Judas at the Last Supper that if he were to go through with his plans, things wouldn't end well for him: "Woe to the man who betrays the Son of Man! It would be better for him if he had not been born" (Mark 14:21).

CHAPTER 12: Learning How to be Hated - Jesus was reviled, executed as a criminal, seen as a threat, and held in utter contempt - and we demand to be praised? Paul said the early apostles were cursed and called "the scum of the earth" (1 Cor. 4:13), and yet we are sent into a tailspin if a lonely person with thirty Twitter followers attacks us?

- The seventh-century writer John Climacus writes of three stages through which we must pass as we learn to handle toxic behavior: "The first stage of blessed patience is to accept dishonor with bitterness and anguish of soul ... The intermediate stage is to be free from pain amid all such things" ... Climacus goes on to describe stage three, which he calls "the perfect stage, if that is attainable," which he characterizes as being able "to think of dishonor as praise."

- Climacus summarizes all this with, "Let the first ... rejoice and the second be strong, but blessed be the third, for he exults in the Lord."

CHAPTER 13: Scripture's Skeleton - Educating an evil person without regard to evil doesn't remove the evil; it simply makes him or her more equipped to spread their evil.

- Scripture has a helpful skeleton ...: creation, fall, and redemption.
- Every war is caused by evil, but not every war is evil. Every divorce is caused by sin, but not every divorce is sinful. Sin is behind every act of a child being removed from its parents, but it is not always sinful to remove a child from abusive parents ... We hurt the people being hurt if we can't call evil evil or toxicity toxic.
- Looking back, while I'm grateful we talked so much to our children about Jesus, I wish we had talked a little more about the reality of evil. Evil is an uncomfortable subject, but if we don't talk about it, evil is free to wage war against us under the cover of darkness.

CHAPTER 14: A New Allegiance - When Jesus was out ministering, he didn't allow family drama to distract him. On one occasion, he is interrupted by a family visit and seems almost harsh in his indifference. It's not that Jesus is apathetic toward his family; it's that he is passionate about his mission.

CHAPTER 15: The Most Vicious Attack - Toxic people are masters at lecturing Christians over how they are "supposed" to behave. Even though they may have never acted like a Christian themselves, they love to hold Christians to the way they assume Christians are supposed to act.

- Toxic people are usually much better at being toxic than we are at dealing with them. They've been toxic most of their lives, are familiar with manipulating others, and enjoy conflict like a dog enjoys rolling on top of a dead squirrel.
- Think about it this way. Would you as a healthy believer ever tell someone they're not a Christian or acting like a Christian in a cavalier manner? You know that's a serious charge. Learn to see through the ruse: they don't want you to act like a Christian as much as they want you to do what they want you to do - and they're using Jesus as a weapon to wound you. He is not a Lord they follow and revere. Anyone who tries to use Jesus as a weapon instead of as Savior proves they don't know the first thing about following Jesus.

CHAPTER 16: Toxic Parents - Evil doesn't always come sporting a goatee and carrying a pitchfork. It doesn't always present itself with malice. It can use words of love, faith, proper authority, and even Scripture. But evil always destroys. Sometimes quickly, sometimes slowly, but eventually it takes its toll.

- I've seen several young women from dysfunctional homes fall into a common spiritual trap. In spite of the negative imprinting of their childhood homes, they end up making a very wise choice for marriage ... Then the common temptation follows. It's a clever spiritual distraction. The woman has escaped a dysfunctional family and is now settled in a functional one. It won't be too long (mere months) until she thinks she is supposed to return to the dysfunctional family and try to fix it.
- Trying to fix an unfixable relationship is doomed to failure and simply robs them of the time they need to grow their functional family.

CHAPTER 17: Toxic Marriages - There is a crucial difference between a difficult marriage and a toxic marriage. A difficult marriage consists of two sinners growing out of their selfishness, spiritual immaturity, and pride to learn how to become more like Christ.

- A difficult but not toxic marriage can also exist with a non-believer. I've talked to women who have grown in their faith and love for God, even though their spouses have never been followers of Jesus. Such relationships always have a measure of disappointment, but that disappointment falls well short of toxicity.
- A number of men are married to women who are selfish. Some of these guys have to double down on worshiping God because they receive so little from their wives. This is very discouraging, but it's not toxic.
- A toxic marriage isn't just frustrating; it's also destructive. It's marked by unrepentant, controlling behavior from which the spouse refuses to repent.
- When divorce is used as a self-indulgent weapon ... you learn to hate such selfish foolishness. By contrast, in the face of unrepentant and unrelenting evil, divorce can be an effective tool rather than a weapon.
- Jesus once said, "No one who has left home or wife or brothers or sisters or parents or children for the sake of the kingdom of God will fail to receive many times as much in this age, and in the age to come eternal life" (Luke 18:29-30). Did you get the part where Jesus explicitly says some will be forced to forsake even their spouse in service to him?
- [Toxic spouses] love the word reconcile because they know it's a loaded theological term and it tugs at the heartstrings of any sincere believer, but when you press below the surface, you soon find out they hate the practice of being reconciled to God and his ways. If you don't understand spiritual depravity, you'll of course want to "rescue" the marriage.
- "God doesn't care about shells; he cares about the people in the shells." Mike was referring to churches [RC Note: The author goes on to inappropriately apply this concept to marriages, but I thought the statement in its proper context was valuable all the same.]
- With sincere and mission-minded hearts, some spouses married to toxic people have fallen into responding in self-toxic ways. They have sacrificed themselves, blamed themselves, and exhausted themselves as they tried to cure a loved one's toxicity. The only thing this has accomplished (unwittingly) is to keep the toxic person from recognizing his or her toxicity. Sometimes the most loving thing a spouse can do is to walk away, as Jesus did, and let the toxic person face, perhaps for the very first time, the consequences of their toxic actions. Walking away doesn't mean you'll never walk back. It just means you won't participate in toxic activity going forward. Don't tie yourself in knots trying to figure out whether this should be a permanent walking away or a strategic walking away. That can be decided later.

CHAPTER 18: Leaving the Toxicity Instead of the Marriage - [This entire chapter is a long field report on a couple who were mutually toxic and how the man improving himself caused his wife to follow shortly behind.]

- [Darin:] "I stopped looking to her for things that I needed to look to God for."
- [Lesli:] "I bought into the lie ... that because Darin has a strong, masculine personality he must be the manipulator and I must be the victim. God showed me that it was really more the other way around. By withholding affection, respect, and communication, I often played the role of the manipulator."

CHAPTER 19: Toxic Children - When you stop fighting your adult kids' battles, you start enjoying your kids a whole lot more ... Instead of constantly strategizing about how to change them, you listen to them and relate to them. Do you ever stop praying and hoping? Of course not. How could you? But you also remember that this is their battle.

- Whenever you have a difficult child, the natural temptation is to pour most of your energy into saving that child as you (perhaps unwittingly) spend less time and thought on the reliable ones. This is the exact opposite of the biblical model we've been discussing in this book: Don't throw away your time on toxic people; invest that time in reliable people. [RC Note: he earlier states that he's giving advice for managing adult children, not young ones. The context is a story of a man dealing with his three grown children.]

- If you have a reliable child who is qualified to teach others, one of the greatest gifts you can give to the church is to invest deeply in that child's mind and soul and imbue them with earnest passion to seek first the kingdom of God. Don't make the reliable children pay for the unreliability of their sibling(s).
- It's difficult for a pastor to break the sad news that loving Jesus with all your heart, raising your children in a solid church, and taking time at home to instill the basics of the faith don't guarantee any particular outcome. We're not programming computers; we're raising young women and men made in the image of God, and that image includes the ability to make choices.
- Thinking that we can be such good parents that our children will never stray is to think we can outdo the Trinity. You cannot as a parent create a perfect Eden experience for your kids, but even if you did, they'd mess it up.
- Jesus, by the way, is also our hope ... Our children's salvation never depended on us - most of us know that. Here's the refuge for brokenhearted parents: their return doesn't depend on us either.

CHAPTER 20: Trading Toxic for Tender - Franciscan priest Richard Rohr writes, "I am most quoted for this line: 'If you do not transform your pain, you will always transmit it.' Always someone else has to suffer because I don't know how to suffer; that is what it comes down to."

- The only person we are called to control is ourselves. Self-control is a biblical command and a fruit of the Spirit. Trying to control others, as we've seen, is a murderous strategy from Satan.
- God's love and affirmation lift us to a dimension of living where fighting each other doesn't make sense. When I feel spoiled by God, what you do to me or think about me doesn't matter all that much, because God's opinion is superior to yours." [RC Note: A little AM there.]
- What should scare all of us believers a little bit is that when we listen to Jesus, he seemed to show the most compassion toward sexual sinners and more judgment toward mean people.

CHAPTER 21: Don't Be Toxic To Yourself - Anything you wouldn't say to someone else, stop saying to yourself.

- What would God want you to say to you?

[Note: Originally written for /r/NoFapChristians - this draft is unedited. Yeah, it's re-hashing old material for this crowd, but still a useful reminder.]

I've been clean from a history of what many would call porn addiction for years now. I've since discipled a number of men through the issue and found immense success with helping these men find the same victory I did. Over the years, some have suggested I post here and I was just recently reminded, so here goes. My posts tend to be long-winded, so I'll give the abbreviated version, given how late it is.

FIRST: Embrace the Limitations of Human Methods

- "Are you so foolish? After beginning by the Spirit, are you now trying to be made perfect by human effort?" Galatians 3:3

When I first got started, I tried it all - accountability partners, post-it notes, verses left around my computer desk, leaving a Bible next to the monitor. I tried the "when you're tempted" strategies of "stop and read the Bible first," "pray in the moment," or "quote verses you've memorized. I even contemplated tattooing a cross on my "special hand," as if the guilt it would create could somehow save me from ... well, becoming guilty.

These things helped on occasion. But I found the results to be very inconsistent. I was left longing for a reliable method. I found that anything that required "human effort" ultimately failed me at some point or other, never producing divine permanence.

SECOND: Understand Reproductive Compulsion

- "Did he not make them [husband and wife] one, with a portion of the Spirit in their union? And what was the one God seeking? Godly offspring." Malachi 2:15

One of the most illuminating things for me was when I saw in Scripture the parallels God was drawing between physical relationships and spiritual ones. Most notably: the Church is often referenced as Christ's bride (or even the Father's bride, in Isaiah). I discovered in my marriage that the sexual frustrations I experienced with my wife were highly correlated with the ways I was interacting with God. In the days when my wife had no spontaneous desire for physically reproductive acts as a one-flesh relationship, I also was expressing no spontaneous desire for spiritual reproduction through the oneness bond I have with the Spirit who lives in me.

The Bible constantly talks about how the physical things of this earth are (in Hebrews 8-9 terminology) "copies" and "shadows" of the truer heavenly things. In this sense, I found that my desire for physically reproductive acts (birth control notwithstanding) were little more than a roadmap to help me get to the end-destination of spiritual reproductivity. That is: evangelism/discipleship was the spiritual fulfillment of the physical drive I had for sex.

THIRD: Understand Biblical Indwelling

- "They shall become one flesh" Genesis 2:24

The Bible was (presumably with some exception) written in a time when there was virtually no real form of birth control. Sex produced babies. When a man physically indwells a woman, that's the expected result. So, I started looking at what the Bible says about a spiritual indwelling. I found that there are only three good things (i.e. not demons, sin, etc.) that can indwell us: (1) God's Word, (2) Jesus, and (3) the Holy Spirit - not unsurprisingly, these are all representative of the three aspects of the trinity (God's Word, as referenced by Jesus, being OT Scripture, thus the Father - not the "Word" in the John 1:1 sense). Fascinating to me was that all these references to God indwelling us shared a common trait:

- God's Word: "The sower sows the word ... those that were sown on the good soil are the ones who hear the word and accept it and bear fruit, thirtyfold and sixtyfold and a hundredfold."

- Jesus: "I in them and you in me, that they may become perfectly one, so that the world may know that you sent me and loved them even as you loved me." John 17:23 (see also John 15, where this is spelled out in much greater detail)
- Holy Spirit: "You will receive power when the Holy Spirit has come upon you, and you will be my witnesses in Jerusalem and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the end of the earth." Acts 1:8

When God - any person of the trinity - enters into and indwells us, the result is spiritual reproduction. Someone else just posted a CS Lewis quote about our desire for physical sexuality not being too much, but too little - that God has so much greater in store. I have found this to be quite true in the form of evangelism and discipleship - that, to be crude, it "scratches that itch" in a way that I never would have expected.

FOURTH: Pruning

- "Every branch that does bear fruit he prunes, that it may bear more fruit" John 15:2

Jesus as much as gives the answer to all sin problems, and it's not "try really hard to stop!" He says first that any branch that fails to produce good fruit "withers; and the branches are gathered, thrown into the fire, and burned" (John 15:6). Yikes! If you are fruitless, God won't prune away your sin. He lops you off from the vine entirely. See also the parable of the talents/minas - the one who kept his coin didn't lose it. He still had it. But he didn't produce with it, but that was enough for the master to cast him out "where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Matthew 25:30) - the same description Jesus gives for hell in Luke 13:28 (not at all surprisingly: the same chapter where Jesus preaches the parable of the fig tree, once again affirming that fruitlessness = cut down, per v7, 9).

But if we want to know how to get rid of our sin, Jesus talks about "pruning." Who gets to be pruned? "[E]very branch that does bear fruit he prunes" (John 15:2). That's right: if you want your sin pruned away, you must bear fruit. And what is the goal of the pruning? "... that it may bear more fruit."

Our goal in avoiding sin is usually because we want to feel less guilty. Or sometimes it's this vague concept of "being more like Christ" by being sinless. How many people do you know who struggle with porn who, when asked why they want to quit, the answer is: "So I can be better at making disciples?" Some people might get that somewhere on their list if you asked them to give a top-10 for why they want to quit, but it's rare to find anyone who has that as their instinctive response. Yet that's God's #1 reason for pruning away your sin. If he's not going to get that result - as evidence by the fact that you're not producing disciples yet already - then why would he bother pruning you? Better to lop off the unfruitful branch. But if you are producing disciples - if you are fruitful - then he has every reason to prune you to make you even more fruitful.

No, I don't mean to degrade this into a conversation on whether or not "bearing fruit" is what saves us (it's not). But I do want to take Jesus as seriously on this subject as his words portray, not undermining the significance of the weight he places on the concept simply because I prefer to cling to a "not by works" mantra that makes me feel good about ignoring any actual spiritual obligation that comes with my salvation.

FIVE: Make Disciples

- "Go, therefore, and make disciples of all nations ... teaching them to obey everything I have commanded you." Matthew 28:19-20

Jesus opened his earthly ministry: "Come, follow me and I will make you fishers of men." He was clear up-front that the end-product he would be creating in his disciples would be that they become discipler-makers too (no that's not a typo). When he prays during his final meal with them, after teaching them everything he could and showing them through the model of his own life how he disciplined them, he says to God: "I do not ask for these only, but also for those who will believe in me through their word" (John 15:20). He was thinking toward future generations that would flow from them - that crop "30, 60 or 100 times what was sown." In his ascent, his final words are for them to "Go and make disciples." This singular mission is literally the focus of everything Jesus passed on to the 12 - and it's the reason God saves us. This is among the "good works prepared in advance for us to do," as Paul references as being the reason God saved us by grace through faith (Ephesians 2:8-10).

When Jesus said to "make disciples," he didn't say those words in a vacuum. He didn't mean to make "converts" or to "get people to attend a Sunday service" or "have them say a prayer." He's saying, "What I just did for you all for the last few years - now go do that for everyone else on the planet." Both Jesus and Paul understood and preached that this would happen through spiritual generations - the fruit of our oneness bond with Christ, just as physical children are the fruit of a one-flesh bond between spouses. Disciples are ones who follow to become like their master. And if people don't know what Jesus looks like, we reflect Christ to them living in such a way that we can profess boldly as Paul did: "Follow me as I follow Christ" (1 Cor. 11:1).

Pink Elephants

While this is a poor reflection of the spiritual dynamic at work in the oneness bond we have with God and the spiritual reproduction that can ensue from that, it at least conveys one aspect of mental remapping that has helped some.

Have you ever tried to stop thinking of a pink elephant? The more you or someone else chants: "Stop thinking of pink elephants!" the more you keep thinking of them. What's the answer to the riddle? How can you possibly stop thinking about them when the harder you meditate on that command the harder it becomes? The answer, as every child knows, is to go do something else.

The more you try and try and try to stop thinking about porn, the more you keep making it the center of your thoughts and attention. Jesus says, "I have better things in store for you. Will you join me? If you will, I will make you a fisher of men. Will you actually start fishing for men?" On that journey is when sanctification happens - not by you turning away from sin, but by turning toward Christ and becoming what he is molding you into: a fisher of men.

CONCLUSION: Sanctified Framework

In my journey, I've found that when I am spiritually satisfied by my oneness with Christ (which has the result of producing disciples/fruit), my compulsion toward physical gratification is equally satisfied.

I also find that the more I become like Christ - not in what I avoid, but in what I DO: make disciples - the more my way of thinking conforms to his. How could it not? If I want to make disciples like he did, I need to study his life and the example he gave. I need to live like he did. I need to pass on my lifestyle like he did. I need to embrace Philippians 3:17 - that Jesus was the model for the apostles, who set a model for others, and that others were instructed to follow that model, and so on down the spiritual-generational line. And in doing this, just as a physical child receives my physical DNA and becomes like me when it observes me and how I model life for him - so also do our spiritual children inherit our spiritual DNA, and we are raised to be like our spiritual parents. And in this process, with Jesus being the patriarch over all spiritual generational lineages - the more we become like Christ, the more we have the mind like Christ (Romans 12:1-2).

Was Jesus tempted as we are? Absolutely. And those temptations will still come, no doubt. I am still tempted. But it is never anything more than that: a temptation. Just as Jesus had a mental framework of understanding and saying no to temptation because he had more important things to focus on (like bearing fruit - making disciples), so also do I develop a mental framework of understanding and saying no to porn (and this applies to all other sins as well) because I have more important things to focus on: making disciples.

Yeah, God loves you, but that doesn't mean you'll always experience the benefits of a loving relationship with him. Lots of people see these constant, recurring struggles in their lives and think, "God must not love me." Some people are less dramatic and just want answers to their problems.

But answers aren't always easy to come by. Yeah, "no temptation has overcome you except which is common to man," but man's most common response to those temptations is also to cave. So, the commonality of our temptations, frustrations, struggles, etc. only speaks to the fact that we're "not alone" - it doesn't at all indicate that there are answers.

WHY You Struggle

There's a difference between what you NEED and what you WANT. Goodness, I feel like I'm talking to 3-yr-olds about "needs and wants," but seriously: this phenomenon persists even into adulthood with our faith.

Want

When people ask about "how to stop watching porn" or "how to get my wife sexually interested in me" (or even the reverse) or "how to find a girlfriend" or "what to do about my spouse's sin issue" or "how to cope with the feminine imperative" or any other life issues, they're focusing on WANTS.

These people are saying: "I have an idea in my head of what my life ought to look like. This thing is holding me back from experiencing that ideal. As such, I think I need the answer to this problem in order to get back on track to my ideal life." In reality, they can be fine with or without that resolution. They just don't comprehend that reality yet because they're so fixated on that one issue.

Look at all the chumps on askMRP who think they need their wife to change. The barrage inevitably comes in: "No, what you really need is to STFU, sidebar, and lift." The seculars over at MRP understand that what a person wants isn't the same as what they actually need in the moment. In fact, even getting what they want probably wouldn't make the person's life nearly as good as they expect because the resolution of one problem without solving the underlying cause is inevitably going to expose even more problems.

Need

What you NEED in life is spelled out in Scripture. You NEED to be following Jesus; you NEED to be bearing fruit - spiritually reproducing; you NEED to know the Scriptures inside-out to be established and equipped to do these things. I have summarized it consistently in the three greats:

- Love God - This is the greatest commandment. Go read Deuteronomy 6:4-9 again, if you haven't lately. Get to know him, prioritize his interests for you rather than your interests for him. Study the Bible, pray, meditate, memorize, etc. Remember that time Jesus said in John 14:21, "The one who has gushy feelings for me is the one who loves me?" Oh, that's right, neither do I. It says, "Whoever has my commands and keeps them is the one who loves me."
- Love Others - This is the second greatest command (per Matthew 22:39). Same as above. It doesn't mean just having positive vibes or good-will toward your neighbors. It's active. But even more so: 1 John 4:8 says that "God is love." God has to be part of the exchange. If you're not reflecting God's character toward them in the interaction, it's not loving.
- Make Disciples - The Great Commission. Matthew 28:19-20. This isn't just for that one person you've thought about sharing the Gospel with, but you never get around to doing it. It's a call that we, collectively, are responsible for the whole world - yes, literally ALL NATIONS - being not only "converted" to faith, but disciplined toward competency at obeying everything Jesus commanded us. Who are you discipling right now? If no one, you'd better figure out what's holding you back and overcome it. If you don't know how to disciple someone, that's what the discord (called "disciplecord") is for.

These are your NEEDs. These are the things you should be focusing on in your life. These are as important to you as the food you eat and the water you drink and the sleep you get every night. Without these things, you will die and burn in hell for eternity. Yes, I can point to very clear soteriological passages on each of these points if this were open to debate, but let's skip that from this conversation and simply note that if this is what God wants for your life, it's what you NEED.

ARE YOU PRAYING TO US?

A "prayer" is, in its most historic context, an earnest expression to another, usually with a hope or expectation of a helpful reply. It's not always "fix my problem." Sometimes it's just communication of a situation with the hope that the recipient would receive and experience the good-intent. For example, "I prithee well" was an old-English way of saying, "I earnestly hope/pray things go well with you." Biblically, prayer has a somewhat expanded definition with a more conversational aspect of our relationship with God, but the "earnest expression" is always a part of the definition, as seen clearly through many of David's Psalms - even the ones where he's just talking to God and not asking for anything back.

Lots of the posts we get around here are honest requests - even earnest ones. People see a problem in their lives. It's killing them. They desperately want a solution. I'm guessing that most people haven't prayed with the Luke 11:8 earnestness or, as the NIV puts it: "shameless audacity," before coming here. But even if they have, it's because God hasn't given them the solution they're looking for. So, they come to us instead.

We are NOT here to give you the answer to your perceived need (i.e. your "wants"). What we CAN do is point you toward what your actual needs are (i.e. your "needs"). This will include sub-goals with a broader agenda than what you intend for yourself.

- You aren't getting sex with your wife. We find out you're fat. We tell you to lift and diet. You think it's because we know that'll help your sex life. Our real agenda: men who are fit and disciplined are more useful to God's Kingdom than those who aren't.
- Your wife keeps nagging you. You have no frame. We teach you how to build a both strong and desirable frame. You think it's so you can pass fitness tests and curb the nagging. Our real agenda: men with desirable frames are able to be more influential in Kingdom-building.
- You struggle with porn. We give you advice on how to overcome it. You think it's because porn is sinful and you need to stop. Our real agenda: get you focused on making disciples like Jesus told you, which is more important than stopping porn.

u/RStonePT once commented that MRP was one of the greatest bait and switches of our time because "men come here for better sex, but we send them away as better men." When you pray your problems to us, that's what our agenda should be to you. It's what my agenda always is - ask /u/paexology for his memes on-point. And if you're responding to people's posts by focusing on the weeds and forgetting the forest, think twice about what you're actually trying to accomplish.

But there's also a reason WHY you CANNOT find actual solutions to your broader problems without this bait-and-switch in the answers we're giving: because to do otherwise would simply be enabling.

FRUITFUL PRAYER-DYNAMIC

I'm going to keep this short and sweet: If you aren't living the victorious life that God designed for you - a life of fruit-bearing discipler-making - why do you think God would be so foolish as to become your enabler by solving your problems, making you more comfortable in your unfruitfulness?

The reality is that Jesus says in John 15 that the fruit-bearing branch is the one that gets pruned - whose problems are shorn away; but the fruitless branch is lopped off and thrown into the fire. So, if you're not bearing fruit for the Kingdom yet, NO DUH! why you aren't seeing clean, easy, and consistent answers to your prayers.

Ironically, when you ARE bearing fruit for the Kingdom and your whole life is bent around those things which God designed you for - not because "God said so, so I'd better get off my butt and do it" but because you are transformed inside and out and can't stop seeing the world the way God sees it in its vast need for the Gospel and training in righteousness ... when you're there you find two changes in your prayer dynamic:

- You stop praying about things like "fix my spouse" or "help me stop sinning" or "what job should I choose?" because you realize that when you're living victoriously, these things seem to work themselves out naturally (Matthew 6:33) to the point where they're non-issues; or your priorities are so rightly re-aligned that you realize the insignificance of such trite and silly little requests in the face of the larger missional objectives ahead of you, thus ...
- You ask for BIG things in your prayer life. Instead of asking for trinkets, you begin asking God for continents. Anyone remember my vision for how I'm pursuing the fulfillment of my mission? Yeah, think big! To quote Dawson Trotman:

"Do you know why I often ask Christians, 'What's the biggest thing you've asked God for this week?' I remind them that they are going to God, the Father, the Maker of the Universe. The One who holds the world in His hands. What did you ask for? Did you ask for peanuts, toys, trinkets, or did you ask for continents?

"I want to tell you, young people, it's tragic! The little itty-bitsy things we ask of our Almighty God. Sure, nothing is too small – but also nothing is too big. Let's learn to ask for our big God some of those big things He talks about in Jeremiah 33:3: 'Call unto Me and I will answer you and show you great and mighty things that you do not know.'"

THE IMPERATIVE OF BIBLE FLUENCY

The reason it's easy for people to forget the difference between wants and needs in our lives is that most people don't have a competent grasp of Scripture. A physical bride has a physical husband who presumably speaks to her regularly, even when she isn't chasing him down for a conversation. Our spiritual groom, however, speaks primarily through his Word. And where he has spoken, he won't repeat himself. If we don't pick up his Word, we'll never figure out what he's trying to say to us. With that ignorance, it's easy to come up with our own ideas of what God expects.

But even among those who do pick up the Word regularly, if they're doing it just for the purpose of hearing God's voice, but without the intent of understanding it (i.e. frequent quiet times, but never moving on to actual Bible study), they'll be no better than a wife listening to her husband say, "I have a present for you, so go finish your household responsibilities and I'll give it to you" and all she hears is, "I have a present for you ... and I'll give it to you," then holds out her hand waiting, ignoring the rest of what he says.

Just as our daily time in the Word (i.e. quiet times/devotionals) help us develop a breadth of knowledge of what the Scriptures say, Bible study is necessary to develop a depth of understanding of it - and the two MUST work hand-in-hand. And Scripture Memory is the key to persistence in application of the Word, having an almost mysterious quality of evoking internal transformation as we let God's Word indwell our hearts.

THE OTHER BASICS

And if you haven't guessed it by now, just as I've covered prayer, quiet times, and Bible study, I could write sections in this post for the other 7 basics in the 300-series, if I had the time. Content like this post comes in the equipping phase after the basics are instilled, but hopefully you see how developing a lifestyle that exudes these disciplines with great frequency will both make you fruitful as a Christian and also optimize the conditions in which God will want to prune away the struggles you're dealing with, just as Jesus said in John 15 that the fruitless branch is chopped off, but the fruitful one will be pruned.

CONCLUSION

The lives we want for ourselves are incompatible with Christian living. Pursuing our own vision for life, no matter how well-intentioned and God-honoring we try to make it, will always be rife with problems. Some people want to tell God how they will serve him. It doesn't work. We must start focusing on God's vision for our lives as expressed through Scripture, most notably through the example laid out by Jesus and the apostles, who devoted their whole lives toward a singular purpose - everything else being mere stepping stones along the way. Only then will God give solutions.

If God gave answers to our problems any sooner, he would become an enabler. Why would God enable us in our sinful rebellion toward our own life-visions by taking away the problems that inherently arise when we pursue those other visions? That would be foolish of him, and God is no fool. This is why even Paul, when addressing the "thorn in his side" (2 Cor. 12) finds peace in the conclusion that God's grace is sufficient for him, embracing the weaknesses without allowing them to hinder his relentless pursuit of making disciples for Christ.

So when someone complains, "How do I deal with my spouse?!?" and insists, "She simply refuses to change/follow me," don't get so hung up on her reaction. You do what you need to do and if the thorn persists, it persists and you accept the sufficiency of the grace God does give. But most often, I find that this attitude achieves the result promised in Matthew 6:33 - "Seek first His Kingdom and His Righteousness and all these things will be added to you as well." Are you Loving God, Loving Others, and Making Disciples? If not, get to it - and work toward internalization of these things as part of your frame (i.e. your own internal point of origin) rather than rote behavioral modification.

Why Lifting is Not a Suggestion

18 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

__ Mental Masturbators __

Mental Masturbation: "The act of engaging in useless yet intellectually stimulating conversation, usually as an excuse to avoid taking constructive action in your life" (urban dictionary).

I'll throw out the way I tend to use the word most: People who "get off" on talking of subjects they fantasize about, but only toy around with in practice.

A post recently showed up titled "The (True) Biblical Argument for 'Lifting Is Not A Suggest.'" It was written by a man who self-described: "For full accountability: I'm fat. 6'4" 300lbs." I wrote a post not too long ago, titled: Anything You Can Do I Can Do Better. One of the thrusts of the post was that people here should be asking themselves before posting: Have I earned the right to post on this subject? I concluded: "This is not an open free-for-all. This is a place for people who are serious and want to grow."

To that poster's credit, he seemed to be growing. But I stand by the fact that this place is not for keyboard jockeys to steal a platform they haven't earned. I have met many men here in-person or spoken face-to-face over Zoom - /u/praxology, u/redirectedfs, /u/TheChristianAlpha, among many others - and even, most notably in this context: /u/OsmiumZulu. I can attest that these men are the real deal. This sub has become increasingly relaxed about permitting content from those who aren't.

No, your ability or failure to bench 300+lbs does not directly affect your intellectual capacity to exegete Scripture. But it does affect the lenses through which you interpret it. I've scarcely ever seen an obese pastor preach a sermon on gluttony. I've yet to see a woman pastor preach a sermon on the biblical premise for why women should not be leaders in the church. I've never found a pastor who isn't solid on Scripture memory preach a sermon about the importance of memorizing Scripture.

In the same vein - and not intending to be cruel, rather to point out the blunt reality: are we at all surprised when a 300lb man wants to argue the nuances of Scriptural interpretation regarding the degree to which men should be taking care of their bodies? And to use the exact same eisegetical and logical-leaping strategies that he accused OZ of using is humorous, at best - misleading this body of believers, at worst. This is the definition of mental masturbation. No.

Also significant: Any time someone claims to have the "true" anything, treat the claim with great skepticism - even if it's coming from me. In this case, the "True Biblical Argument" was just another hollow stab at pretending one avenue of beating around the bush was better than another.

__ The Bible __

You'll notice that OZ's original "Lifting Is Not A Suggestion" post is the only one on the entire sidebar that's bolded. Does that mean it's more important than all the other content? Nope. But it does mean it's the one that most guys need to start with when they first come here complaining about how awful their marriage/dating life is.

The "Biblical" Foundation ... is Lacking

You'll notice from the post immediately that OZ did not intend it to be an exegetical-heavy post. It isn't there to create a Scriptural foundation for the practice of hitting the gym. The reality is that there's no exegetical basis in Scripture for how many plates you should bench or squat, or what your body fat should be. We all get that.

Any verse that could be interpreted to imply the level of body-building/strength-training that we encourage here could also just as easily (sometimes even more easily) be interpreted in another way that wouldn't support our model at all. I'm okay with that.

And why would we expect the Bible to address lifting in the first place? The cultural dynamic is also different today than it was back then. Instead of walking from town to town, we ride cars, bikes, or even things like my son's Christmas present that don't require any more muscular action than tilting your foot a degree or two. Instead of eating predominantly what grows from the ground, meat, and bread, we're inundated with greasy fried foods plastered on billboards, tv commercials, and signs creating pavlovian responses toward obesity.

Suffice it to say: I'm not persuaded that obesity or muscular atrophy were such great problems in the biblical days that would have warranted a clear biblical statement. I'm also not persuaded that Jesus made sure all his apostles could bench 300+ lbs with a six pack either.

Don't Be An Idiot

Is there a subreddit for Christian physicists? I love physics. It's fun to study it. Wouldn't it be so much fun to go on a subreddit for Christian physicists and start attacking them: "Your biblical basis for comprehending mass and acceleration is totally weak!" That's called being an idiot, for lack of other words that the reddit admins are now banning us for using (though I have a post for that too).

- Obviously subreddits for Christian physicists are going to include discussions of equations, scientific theories, etc. that involve things they learned outside the Bible.
- Obviously subreddits for Christian lawyers are going to include discussions of statutes, arguments, etc. that involve things they learned outside the Bible.
- Obviously subreddits for Christians who want to talk about building attraction are going to involve discussions of physical, mental, emotional, and ... yes, even spiritual "game" (or for /u/Deep_Strength's benefit, let's call it "passively internalized attraction factors") that we've learned outside the Bible.

I frequently talk about the knowledge hierarchy: theology >>> science >>> philosophy. I note that philosophy is "logical reality," if the world were a logical place all the time; but science one-ups it by addressing "observable reality," if the world always functioned in scientifically predictable ways (i.e. in the absence of miracles); while theology addresses "actual reality." Yeah, this is one of those "the TRUE thing" statements I'm making. Feel free to test that claim yourself.

The hierarchy exists because we recognize that one method of answering questions and solving problems won't have all the answers. It isn't to shame lesser degrees of thought. It's to make sure they are used in their proper place and to empower them - that as we recognize where theology is silent, we move to science; and when both are at a loss, we defer to logic and philosophy. The Bible doesn't teach us that $2+2=4$, yet I'd be hard-pressed to function in my day job if I didn't rely on that scientifically observable reality.

You'd be a fool to reject such useful information as the very foundations of mathematics on the principle that "the Bible didn't say it, so I won't acknowledge it."

You'd be a fool to reject such useful information as the very foundations of the principles of attraction on the ... principle that "the Bible didn't say it, so I won't acknowledge it."

Don't be an idiot.

__ Why Lifting Isn't A Suggestion HERE __

The Surface Level

For RPC purposes, lifting is a mandatory part of our prescriptive advice. I maintain that the red pill is descriptive, not prescriptive. But there are some realities that are so broadly true that it's hard to reach any other conclusion. In the case of developing attraction - whether for the single guys who come here complaining they can't get a date, or the married men who complain their wives won't sleep with them - we have to assess quickly: Are you here to accomplish the goals you're asking about, or are you just mentally masturbating?

It's been said a number of times: Looks aren't everything, but they are the difficulty level you're playing on.

When we tell a guy to hit the gym, are we commanding: "This is a theological imperative, and you're sinning if you're not"? Well, I suppose someone did suggest that, but he's not endorsed ;) No, we're not making a theological conclusion.

Instead, we're making a broader statement: The chances of you developing an idyllic frame and tight social, mental, emotional, and spiritual game to the degree that you will achieve all of your relationship and sexual goals while still being over 25% body fat and unable to bench your own bodyweight is so low that if you're serious about your goals you must treat lifting and dieting as mandatory.

If you're not willing to put in the effort to lift, then we are treating your goals as unachievable. In this sense, it is not a suggestion.

The Deeper Reality

I've also noted a number of times that RPC is a giant bait-and-switch. Men start here with the aim of improving their relationship/sexual prospects - and we can help you with exactly that. But my greater purpose is - and always has been - my mission: to make disciples. I want to get guys following the Jesus of the Bible. For many men in the manosphere, a healthy relationship/sex life is a milestone still ahead of them in that journey, not a waypoint they've already hit and somehow lost track of. So, if they start at A, a healthy relationship is B, a healthy sex life is C, and Jesus is moving on to D, then E, then F, etc. - well, getting them from A to B to C is part of the process of moving men to follow Jesus. No, it's not all of it. That's why I refused to stop the sidebar series with only the 100s and 200s - why I continued to add at least the basics of following Jesus as the 300 series, or dealing with complex sin/emotional/whatever struggles as the 400 series, even though at the time it felt grossly out-of-place on this sub. But for many men, these relational/sexual pursuits actually will be the starting point.

For most of these guys, their relational/sexual dysfunction is so blinding to them that they cannot see anything past it. They cannot get on board with making disciples for Christ, much less follow him themselves, until they see that "the light at the end of the tunnel" will let them drain their balls every now and then.

To put it another way: If we want guys following Jesus, we have to get them past the immediate roadblocks holding them up. If a guy's physical shape is so poor that he can't jump either the literal or metaphorical hurdles he comes across in life, then he's never going to be an effective Kingdom-builder.

Is it possible to help you all develop such a great frame that you don't need to be physically fit? Yes. But it'd probably take half a decade of training, life-modeling, etc. that I simply don't have to give. And why would I when I can accomplish the same level of progress with the next guy over in 1/10th the time because he's actually willing to hit the gym and I don't have to put in any more effort than tell him: "DYEL, bro?"

No, that's not a testament to the laziness of not wanting to put in the time to train men. It's a testament to the fact that we won't waste our time to train the man who isn't willing to train himself; yet for the one who does, we don't have to waste the time on intricate nuances and advanced concepts of frame projection or what-have-you because we can get down to business in being effective for the Kingdom far sooner. And the man who lifts will be playing life on easy mode, meaning he's far more likely to be effective, multiplying our efforts beyond what the other man will ever likely achieve. That's a wise choice.

Seriously: think about that for two seconds. Imagine two guys are competing against each other to see who can survive the longest in a game of Tetris. The competition rules are ambivalent toward what difficulty you play on. One man is playing on easy mode and the other is playing on "dear God just kill me now" mode. Your job is to train one of these guys to beat the other. Could you train the second guy to win? Possibly. But that would be the foolish choice. Being effective for God's Kingdom is not an area of life where we should take on the challenge just for the sake of it being challenging. Yeah, I like the challenge every now and then too. But when it comes to the Kingdom I will always prioritize being effective over testing my ego. No mental masturbating over theory. If you want to achieve a goal, put in the work. When you've proven yourself, then we can talk the finer points - if we even need to at all.

Here's a quick hint: There's a reason MRP/RPC rarely ever talk about "advanced" topics. Because most men never need them. Why not? Because they hit the gym, after which the basics are more than enough to get them where they need to be.

Steve and Susan

"You're just like your father!" Susan shouted at Steve. She knew how to push his buttons, and that particular one stung the most. Steve let out a flurry of cuss words, mumbling promises to himself under his breath between outbursts. He raised a hand to her and she dared him to do it. He knew better. It was 3 in the morning before he came home that night. She tried to apologize, but he was back to his cold, dead self. The excitement only lasted a little while. At least she knew how to get him back to a place where he makes her feel something. It's so much easier now that they have to share parental rights of their child.

Susan couldn't love a robot, but the fighting humanized Steve - and having solidified their status as cojoined opposing forces in legal documentation, she continues to enjoy the histrionics she came to remember as the only thing from her marriage that was worth talking about with her girl friends. In fact, it helped her find a new man who was only too eager to play the hero. She felt something with him ... as long as her ex continued to make her feel like the damsel in distress. Otherwise she was just as bored with segundo macho. Steve hasn't found another input-giver to take coding from yet.

Polarization

Polarization has value. But jumping from one off-putting characteristic to another is not being polar. It's closer to being bipolar. Valuable polarization comes when one crowd identifies with you and another despises you. It lets you know quickly where you stand, and builds a powerful bond of camaraderie with those on your end of the line. It also creates a strong emotional reaction with those on the other side that can, in many cases (though not all), result in an "opposites attract" path opening up.

Jesus was polarizing. He did it the right way. He had a drove of followers who adored him. He also had a committed band of opponents with influence and authority who wanted to kill him. He knew where he stood between each crowd and he played it to his own advantage unto his death, resurrection, and glorification.

Steve was not polarizing with his wife. He was agonizing. But there were two more things he also was not:

Equable

Equability is when a man is able to remain calm and centered in the midst of troubles that come his way. As the Bible says, he is "not easily angered" and "keeps no record of wrongs." He is a static force. He is a rock in the midst of the stormy seas - a rock that some people despise and others love, but a rock nonetheless.

Jesus was equable. He could be driven to great anger and even insults, as we all know. But he was not easily angered. It took a lot to get him riled up, and even when he was, it was always for a purpose. It was rational anger.

Steve was not equable. Equability is a virtue that is not expressed in any one moment, but as a broader character trait that can only be understood with observation through a multitude of scenarios of varying intensity. At times Steve was shallow and robotic, but it wasn't hard for Susan to rile him up. It wouldn't be proper to say he was "equable in his calmer moments" and then simply "stopped being equable" when he became angry any more than I could say that "Bob is an honest man, except when he tells lies."

Rational

I don't believe Rollo titled his books simply because the name sounded cool. He understood that rational thought is a shockingly rare commodity these days. People are beholden to their emotions as the foundation for their decisions. The dominance of feelings over rational thought is apparent not only in intersexual relationships, but also in politics, our educational system, the business/marketplace, and even the judiciary - the one bastion of logic and argument that should have held out. The church is no exception.

It is not sufficient that a man has the capability to express rational thought. He must BE a rational male.

Rationality is not a factor of intelligence or mere logical clarity. A man is irrational when his behaviors don't align with what he knows to be the proper course of conduct. When a man discovers the red pill and intellectually grasps that ONEitis is destroying him, yet he continues to cede to the contrary impulses at work in him, he is irrational. Rationality is not only about how well you can comprehend your own circumstances, but also how you translate that into behaviors that dominate over your emotional predispositions.

Jesus was rational. He not only knew the face value of his circumstances, but also the motivations of the people who presented them, and had thought out insightful solutions in response. He also acted on these solutions in a manner that consistently led him to his ultimate goal to be crucified so as to save us all.

Steve was not rational. Even if he knew why Susan was pushing his buttons, he didn't behave in a manner that was grounded on any real solution. He never bothered to rationalize his circumstances or assess solutions to his problems. He is still unhappy to this day, last I knew him.

Jeff and Jane

Jeff was a character. He was funny, ~~even~~ especially when he didn't know it. Not everyone got his type of humor, so there was a degree of polarization too. You had to appreciate the macabre to get him. Jane didn't. She romanticized men like Steve because of the high paying job, well-groomed haircut, and flashy clothes. Steve knew how to attract a woman, but not how to keep her interested. Jeff was the opposite. It took a man like Steve in his life to play "wingman" before Jane gave him the time of day. After the first introduction was made, Jane was reassured by Jeff's unending fun with life, even when pessimistic. He once was genuinely worried he would be fired from his job, but teased Jane endlessly about the "poor, homeless schmuck she'd soon be dating." Whether she believed there was any real risk or not, it was obvious that even when times were bad he knew how to make her laugh and enjoy what life brought their way. He was never fired.

Jeff and Jane are engaged. I don't know if marriage will change Jeff as it does for so many. But I do know that Jeff, at least for now, is equable. His demeanor is entertainingly consistent (and I include that modifier by necessity, not merely for emphasis), despite that the things he has experienced would trouble the average Steve into a cold depression or an angry storm. He is also rational. He understands that his behaviors have consequences and affect his relationship and sexuality, and he allows that cognizance to be the primary contributor (over emotional impulsivity) toward the resolve he has in maintaining his affable nature.

Patrick and Sally

It's not quite fair to compare Steve and Susan with Jeff and Jane because Jeff and Jane are still "young and in love." It's easy to overlook a lot and stay positive when you're still in your mid-20s, broadly untainted by the burden of responsibility, and new in a relationship with lots yet to explore about each other. Patrick and Sally have been through all that. Patrick and Sally are who I imagine Jeff and Jane will become someday, if they don't lose what they have going for them right now. I've seen Steves and Susans in the dating phases of life too, and it's never pretty when solemnized.

Patrick and Sally have not only learned to enjoy each other without regard for their circumstances, but they have also learned to balance that with the weight of the responsibilities God has given them in life - responsibilities not only to their own family, but to a much bigger purpose that they could not manufacture for themselves. It took this purpose to help them work past their low points before Patrick could lead Sally into a healthy bond that remains today.

Patrick is the head of a local student ministry where Christians are not welcome. He and Sally are constantly struggling between a family of believers who love them and a secular institution that has engaged in legal proceedings on at least two occasions to kick them out. It makes life interesting, if not worrisome. He is a polarizing person on his campus, and not shy to engage in conversation with those he knows oppose him. You have to be that way in ministry. His theme verse for his family is both equable and rational: "I have learned to be content whatever the circumstances. I know what it is to be in need, and I know what it is to have plenty. I have learned the secret of being content in any and every situation, whether well fed or hungry, whether living in plenty or in want: ..." He humorously leaves off the far more popular concluding verse in an effort to draw on others' curiosity while simultaneously emphasizing the context that is so often forgotten.

Patrick is a man I want to be like in many ways.

Steve and Susan

"You're just like your father!" Susan shouted at Steve. She knew how to push his buttons, and that particular one stung the most. Steve let out a flurry of cuss words, mumbling promises to himself under his breath between outbursts. He raised a hand to her and she dared him to do it. He knew better. It was 3 in the morning before he came home that night. She tried to apologize, but he was back to his cold, dead self. The excitement only lasted a little while. At least she knew how to get him back to a place where he makes her feel something. It's so much easier now that they have to share parental rights of their child.

Susan couldn't love a robot, but the fighting humanized Steve - and having solidified their status as cojoined opposing forces in legal documentation, she continues to enjoy the histrionics she came to remember as the only thing from her marriage that was worth talking about with her girl friends. In fact, it helped her find a new man who was only too eager to play the hero. She felt something with him ... as long as her ex continued to make her feel like the damsel in distress. Otherwise she was just as bored with segundo macho. Steve hasn't found another input-giver to take coding from yet.

Polarization

Polarization has value. But jumping from one off-putting characteristic to another is not being polar. It's closer to being bipolar. Valuable polarization comes when one crowd identifies with you and another despises you. It lets you know quickly where you stand, and builds a powerful bond of camaraderie with those on your end of the line. It also creates a strong emotional reaction with those on the other side that can, in many cases (though not all), result in an "opposites attract" path opening up.

Steve was not polarizing with his wife. He was agonizing. But there were two more things he also was not:

Equable

Equability is when a man is able to remain calm and centered in the midst of troubles that come his way. As the Bible says, he is "not easily angered" and "keeps no record of wrongs." He is a static force. He is a rock in the midst of the stormy seas - a rock that some people despise and others love, but a rock nonetheless.

Steve was not equable. Equability is a virtue that is not expressed in any one moment, but as a broader character trait that can only be understood with observation through a multitude of scenarios of varying intensity. At times Steve was shallow and robotic, but it wasn't hard for Susan to rile him up. It wouldn't be proper to say he was "equable in his calmer moments" and then simply "stopped being equable" when he became angry any more than I could say that "Bob is an honest man, except when he tells lies."

Rational

I don't believe Rollo titled his books simply because the name sounded cool. He understood that rational thought is a shockingly rare commodity these days. People are beholden to their emotions as the foundation for their decisions. The dominance of feelings over rational thought is apparent not only in intersexual relationships, but also in politics, our educational system, the business/marketplace, and even the judiciary - the one bastion of logic and argument that should have held out. The church is no exception.

It is not sufficient that a man has the capability to express rational thought. He must BE a rational male.

Rationality is not a factor of intelligence or mere logical clarity. A man is irrational when his behaviors don't align with what he knows to be the proper course of conduct. When a man discovers the red pill and intellectually grasps that ONEitis is destroying him, yet he continues to cede to the contrary impulses at work in him, he is irrational.

Rationality is not only about how well you can comprehend your own circumstances, but also how you translate that into behaviors that dominate over your emotional predispositions.

Steve was not rational. Even if he knew why Susan was pushing his buttons, he didn't behave in a manner that was grounded on any real solution. He never bothered to rationalize his circumstances or assess solutions to his problems. He is still unhappy to this day, last I knew him.

Jeff and Jane

Jeff was a character. He was funny, ~~even~~ especially when he didn't know it. Not everyone got his type of humor, so there was a degree of polarization too. You had to appreciate the macabre to get him. Jane didn't. She romanticized men like Steve because of the high paying job, well-groomed haircut, and flashy clothes. Steve knew how to attract a woman, but not how to keep her interested. Jeff was the opposite. It took a man like Steve in his life to play "wingman" before Jane gave him the time of day. After the first introduction was made, Jane was reassured by Jeff's unending fun with life, even when pessimistic. He once was genuinely worried he would be fired from his job, but teased Jane endlessly about the "poor, homeless schmuck she'd soon be dating." Whether she believed there was any real risk or not, it was obvious that even when times were bad he knew how to make her laugh and enjoy what life brought their way. He was never fired.

Jeff and Jane are engaged. I don't know if marriage will change Jeff as it does for so many. But I do know that Jeff, at least for now, is equable. His demeanor is entertainingly consistent (and I include that modifier by necessity, not merely for emphasis), despite that the things he has experienced would trouble the average Steve into a cold depression or an angry storm. He is also rational. He understands that his behaviors have consequences and affect his relationship and sexuality, and he allows that cognizance to be the primary contributor (over emotional impulsivity) toward the resolve he has in maintaining his affable nature.

Patrick and Sally

It's not quite fair to compare Steve and Susan with Jeff and Jane because Jeff and Jane are still "young and in love." It's easy to overlook a lot and stay positive when you're still in your mid-20s, broadly untainted by the burden of responsibility, and new in a relationship with lots yet to explore about each other. Patrick and Sally have been through all that. Patrick and Sally are who I imagine Jeff and Jane will become someday, if they don't lose what they have going for them right now. I've seen Steves and Susans in the dating phases of life too, and it's never pretty when solemnized.

Patrick and Sally have not only learned to enjoy each other without regard for their circumstances, but they have also learned to balance that with the weight of the responsibilities God has given them in life - responsibilities not only to their own family, but to a much bigger purpose that they could not manufacture for themselves. It took this purpose to help them work past their low points before Patrick could lead Sally into a healthy and sexually fulfilling bond that remains today.

Patrick is the head of a local student ministry where Christians are not welcome. He and Sally are constantly struggling between a family of believers who love them and a secular institution that has engaged in legal proceedings on at least two occasions to kick them out. It makes life interesting, if not worrisome. He is a polarizing person on his campus, and not shy to engage in conversation with those he knows oppose him. You have to be that way in ministry. His theme verse for his family is both equable and rational: "I have learned to be content whatever the circumstances. I know what it is to be in need, and I know what it is to have plenty. I have learned the secret of being content in any and every situation, whether well fed or hungry, whether living in plenty or in want: ..." He humorously leaves off the far more popular concluding verse in an effort to draw on others' curiosity while simultaneously emphasizing the context that is so often forgotten.

Patrick is a man I want to be like in many ways.

A few years ago I wrote this post on spinning plates. Over the last few years I've heard a few people comment on the need for an update or more info on this topic. Let's start with a recap:

- Definition: "Spinning Plates doesn't necessarily mean you're f----- all of your plates. It's more of a spreading out of your efforts across a wider pool of subjects." ~ Rollo Tomassi. Spinning a plate is simply exerting effort toward a woman (and I'll add for precision): who finds you more desirable than you find her. If you're interested and she's not, she's not your plate; you're hers. She needs to be your orbiter, not you hers.
- If you're not satisfied with your current relationship status or prospects, you can do one of three things: (1) fix yourself, (2) improve the quality of your plates, or (3) improve the quantity of your plates.
- You're far more likely to (a) find a high quality woman, or (b) develop an abundance mentality if you take a shotgun approach (multiple targets spread out) rather than a sniper approach (single target and just waiting for your one chance).
- Different people will require different levels of effort to keep them spinning. However, the more effort you put in, the more you display low value because at some point she assumes she's worth all that effort ... and more. The result is that she stops putting in effort back toward satisfying you (except as may be innate to her sense of self-identity).

Why is this okay?

My son recently asked me why I said it's okay to go on dates with different people at the same(-ish) time. I simplified it for him this way:

- When you're dating, you're not married, right?
- You haven't agreed to be exclusive yet?
- Dating is just two friends spending time together to see if they might want to be exclusive later, right?
- So why does spending time with one friend mean you can't spend time with other friends at other times?

He kind of got it, but a few days later asked again, so I simplified it some more:

- Have you ever played with your friend Cordelia without Angie around?
- Have you ever played with Angie without Cordy there?
- In the same week?
- Even though they're both your friend? How dare you!
- Was it wrong to do that?
- So why would it be wrong to spend time with two different girls who are both your friend, even in the same week?

Going on a date is not a commitment to exclusivity. It's just something you do to get to know someone better. It might lead to marriage. It might not.

They're just friends at this phase of the relationship. Jesus had lots of friends - both guys and girls. He spent time with them jointly and also individually. Do likewise.

Acquiring "Friends" (i.e. orbiters and preselection bouys)

Now, depending on where fall on the "can guys/girls ever be 'just friends'?" question, dating can take two spins:

(1) Can be friends: If guys and girls can be "just friends" and nothing more, then shotgun dating (rather than sniper dating) doubles as an opportunity to build your social circle, making you more capable of meeting others and expanding your influence in the world. This can be beneficial not only toward finding higher quality women to spend time with, but also in broader missional/ministry efforts because I guarantee that most of the people you will ever meet in life aren't actually following Jesus. So, if you believe men and women can be "just friends," then there's no reason not to "spin plates" to the end that you're just building friendships (even if with the passive hope that one of them pans out into something viable as a romantic interest).

For married men, this "just friends" thing is significant because it affects personal boundaries for the undisciplined. If you can "just be friends," then there's no harm in seeing a colleague or whoever over lunch. If you can't just be friends, then it's a bit trickier: you then have to balance the risk of your sexual interest becoming a problem (i.e. the degree of your own self-control) against the value that the relationship adds.

(2) Can't be "just friends": In this view, there's no such thing as "we're just friends getting to know each other better" because all guy/girl interactions will ultimately have romantic undertones. Either you're sexually interested or you're not. While the term "friends" might be used to describe the relationship, at least on some subconscious level it will never be truly platonic for at least one of them. While the pragmatic utility doesn't change here, some guys interject an ethical conundrum that's twofold:

- If she's the one sexually interested in me, am I inappropriately leading her on? To this I defer to my analysis in the previously linked post. Be friends, just don't incite her to cross any boundaries that you don't intend to cross yourself.
- If I'm the one sexually interested in her, but I'm only willing to have sex within marriage, is okay for me to pursue marriage with multiple women? To this I say to stop over-thinking it. Until you've made a commitment of exclusivity, it doesn't matter.

In either case, if you decide the person isn't someone you want to marry, they will either become passive orbiters (i.e. orbiters you don't have to exert much/any influence to keep around) or they'll become preselection buoys. Buoys just kind of float in place. They have a purpose, but it's not readily apparent to those swimming in their vicinity. Sometimes they are there just to mark a boundary, other times it's to test the temperature of the waters, or they can record oceanographic data ... or in this context they can just be in your presence so that the type of women you want to attract will have their preselection vibes triggered and be more interested.

On a more biblical note, the question arose in my head whether or not Jesus was "just friends" with some of the women in his life? As a matter of technicality, they became part of the Church, which is his bride, but his interest wasn't sexual-reproductive; it was spiritual-reproductive. And yes, he did want to reproduce spiritually through all of his followers and not just any one of them. But we are also a collective singular body. So, take that for what you will. In the end, I do believe Jesus experienced sexual attraction (otherwise Hebrews 4:15 would be false which says that he was tempted in every way we are), but I also believe that he was perfectly able to maintain platonic relationships with women because of his devotion to his mission without room to be distracted with thoughts of marrying. So, I do believe at least in the case of Jesus that "just friends" is an option ... but he's also Jesus, so take that for what you will too.

Impact on Age

Drawing from /u/praexology and /u/r_horizon's comments on the discord, it's significant to note that spinning plates is different at different ages. When you're a teenager, you may not actually be thinking about marriage yet, or close to being ready. I recommend guys not marry until you're in your 30s, or at least late-20s if you really want to optimize (though depending on your individual goals, earlier can still certainly be appropriate).

When you are marriage ready, it's almost impossible to go on a date without the subconscious assessment of whether or not the person in front of you is potential marriage-material. This goes back to the "can we really just be friends?" question, but suffice it to say: it's something you should be thinking about. Otherwise, why are you going on the date to begin with? And the answer is that you could still just be acting like a child.

In those younger childhood years before you're ready for marriage, the goal of going on dates is to practice your social skills. As praex words it, "Exercise my social muscles." This benefits not on your dating-game, but your broader social life as well. The more things you go out and do, as compared with sitting in your room playing video games and watching netflix, the more interesting stories you'll have to tell and life lessons you'll have to teach. In the end, you won't be "starting from nothing" when you are ready to be marriage-minded. You'll have a solid foundation under you, rather than being one of those guys in their 30s who has only just now really started going on dates. [Any of you guys in that situation want to share your horror stories in the comments?]

Invest in your social skills now, reap the reward later.

Biblically, Ecclesiastes 11 has some wisdom for us. Verse 6: "In the morning sow your seed, and at evening withhold not your hand, for you do not know which will prosper, this or that, or whether both alike will be good." Fascinating. Let's skip to 9, which gives a good set of boundaries for the young who want to start dating. "Rejoice, O young man, in your youth, and let your heart cheer you in the days of your youth. Walk in the ways of your heart and the sight of your eyes." This is reminiscent of chapter 2 where Solomon talks about how he "denied myself nothing my eyes desired," and we all know how many wives and concubines those eyes desired. But he doesn't merely give men a blanket green-light to take the same path that he ultimately found to be meaningless. He ends the verse with a caution: "But know that for all these things God will bring you into judgment." Yikes! Yes, sow your seed and don't put all your eggs in one basket; but make sure that you do it in a way that's mindful of the coming judgment. That's wisdom.

What to do?

Okay, so you've figured out what a plate is, decided who you want to start getting to know better, resolved your moral dilemmas, and are ready to start building friendships with these women in your life. What do you actually do now?

Do you take them out to the movies? Go on a romantic date to a fancy Italian restaurant? Play putt putt just the two of you? Take a stroll down the beach? Grab a cup of coffee? Head to a night club?

The simple answer is: just do whatever you want to do. But know that when you do this, if "what you want to do" is to be alone with her, you quickly open the pathway to ONEitis.

My alternative answer is: do whatever you would have done if she wasn't around, but invite her to join you.

- If you were going to spend time with friends, still do so ... just let her come along.
- If you were going to watch Netflix and chill, still do so ... just let her come along.
- If you were going to your congregation's small group, still do so ... just let her come along.
- If you were going to study for an exam, still do so ... just let her come along.

This isn't rocket science here. You live your life. You invite her to join you on your life. If she can help you live your life, even better. If not, you'll find out fast.

In the early days of a relationship, I'd certainly emphasize this "join what I'm already doing" strategy, not bending your plans to create isolated time. After a bit, once you have a clearer decision about where you want to take the relationship, go do whatever fun "couples stuff" you've been holding off on. But always watch out for ONEitis because it will crush those who are not careful, even when you don't think you have it.

WISNIFG RECAP

Hopefully by now you've all read WISNIFG, which has some great communication strategies. Let me recap the most significant ones:

- Fogging: Find a way to agree with what someone else says, even if you don't agree to the substance. "I can see how from your perspective that would make a lot of sense." It's hard to argue with someone who keeps agreeing with you.
- Broken Record: Keep repeating the same phrase over and over without changing your position. This shows people that you won't back down and you insist on getting your way on this issue. "I want a refund ... I understand, but I still want my refund ... Yes, you may speak with your manager if he is the one who can give me a refund ... I appreciate your alternative offer, but I want a refund."
- Self-Disclosure: Providing relevant additional information about your situation, goals, motives, etc. that can move people toward understanding what you want from them and be more inclined to give it to you. "I need to reschedule our appointment" v. "My child is in the hospital, so I need to reschedule our appointment."
- Negative Inquiry: Asking questions that challenge the false assumptions people make when they accuse you. "Why is it wrong for me to spend time with my co-worker after hours?"
- Workable Compromise: Exchanging something that does not sacrifice your goals or self-worth in order to get what you want in return. "If you give me the parenting schedule I want, I'll agree to your right of first refusal provision."
- Negative Assertion: Admitting to your own shortcomings in order to build credibility or neutralize accusations. "That was a dumb thing for me to do." It's hard to accuse someone angrily who already recognizes the full weight of the accusation. Of course, this doesn't work if the "owning up" is done in a minimizing way.

RC'S ADDITIONAL STRATEGIES

In my time as an attorney, I've found that there are a number of additional conversational strategies that work not only in the courtroom, but also at home, in social contexts, high conflict scenarios, in the office, etc. Here are a few to dabble with.

It's About Me (But Really You) - Leadership strategy

Legal Context - I'll open with a simple one because it plays into some of the others really nicely. As we all know, blunt accusations aren't often received well. They make people defensive and emotionally unstable. So, I often suggest to my clients that instead of accusing the other parent of doing something wrong, take that exact issue and communicate (preferably in writing) to the other parent that you intend to work on that issue in your own parenting because you believe it would be best for your child. The idea is that the other side is then prompted to process the utility in what you're doing and they may attempt to implement it in their own home (even if my own client doesn't actually follow through or never intended to in the first place). This comes down to the power of suggestion. As a worst-case scenario, even if they don't implement the thought, if things go wrong my client now has a written record that they are trying to be proactive thinkers for their child and the other parent's failure to do likewise is what contributed to the mess.

Home Application - This works outside the legal custody context also. If your wife is fat, telling her, "You need to lose some weight" can be powerful if you have the frame and value to pull it off, but it's still probably going to make her upset. The "It's about me (but really you)" strategy is simply to take ownership of something you want another person within your influence to do also. In this example, you could tell your wife, "I've decided I'm not satisfied with my body. I'm overweight and it's time to start dieting and exercising more." Often-times such clear statements about your own intentions causes the other person to self-reflect and contemplate that they should make a similar decision for themselves.

This conversational approach shouldn't be used to undermine the importance of "do, don't tell." There is still great value in not blabbing your mouth about your plans if your primary concern is your own life improvement. But sometimes the "lead by example" path doesn't quite get through. Remember the discipleship strategy Jesus used: (1) tell them what, (2) show them how, (3) let them try, (4) send them out/keep them going, and (5) pass it on. If your goal isn't just for your own improvement, but also to lead someone else, then it can be beneficial to tell before you show, giving them a context to see how to do what they're aspiring to and to stay motivated by seeing your progress.

There's also a split between situations where you're leading by example and leading by setting boundaries/expectations. I can tell my wife, "cook this for dinner" or "wear this tonight" without showing her how first. I'm not going to put on a skirt just to "show her how" when she already knows. So, if I'm setting a boundary or expectation for her, telling her without showing is sufficient and the "it's about me (but really you)" strategy is unnecessary. When this comes most into play is when you're dealing with more sensitive issues of a spouse's shortcomings and you want her to learn from your example how to overcome them.

Lastly, it's worth noting that you can use this strategy by replacing "me" with someone else your wife might have reason to keep up with. Here are some examples of how this conversational technique can work:

- Example 1: "I've noticed our bathroom sink getting cluttered. I think I'm going to clean it up and make an effort to keep it clean soon. Is there anything on there that you don't want me messing with?" Chances are, 80% of the mess is hers. You're not accusing her; you're just taking responsibility. But she will likely adopt that responsibility as her own also.
- Example 2: I want my wife memorizing Scripture more often. I start training my kids in Scripture memory. I tell my wife, "I've decided that Scripture memory is important and our kids need to be doing it. So, I've been having the kids memorize <this or that> verse. They're doing great! I love the idea that our family will become one that knows the Bible inside and out." She sees that the kids are starting to excel at something that she should be better than them at, so she starts memorizing Scripture with them to keep up.

DOC Examination - Conflict and Leadership Strategy

Legal Context - The goal of any good cross examination is to lead a person to your own pre-drawn conclusion by asking questions. The most famous technique is the "Pozner Cross," which involves only yes/no questions. You essentially back the witness into a corner where they ultimately have to agree to see things your way. Through a series of "yes or no" responses the person ultimately admits what you want. It's ideal if you begin the line of inquiry in a way that the other person doesn't know what you're trying to get them to admit to.

- Pozner Example: I may ask Bob about his favorite holiday. "Even if it's not your favorite, Bob, July 4 is always a great time, isn't it?" "Don't you just love to sit on your lawn sipping a few beers while the lights dance in the sky?" "And it's even better when you get to be with your kids, enjoying a family holiday, don't you think?" "Wasn't it great that you got to do that last week?" "And you even had your kids with you too, to make it even better, right?" "And you were drinking those beers while your kids were with you, right?" "And you knew the order prohibited drinking during your parenting time, right?" Trapped.

Home Application - To be clear, making your spouse feel "tricked" into an admission rarely goes over well, so avoid the yes/no questions. Instead, I've started doing in specific cases what I call a "direct-on-cross" (DOC) strategy. During direct examinations you can only ask open-ended questions. Yes/no questions are prohibited (with limited flexibility). Why would you limit yourself like that on cross examination? Because it better shields your motives and removes the air of trickery, as they get to answer any way they like. But by maintaining control of the conversation and ensuring that it follows the direction I want it to, the person usually ends up saying what I want them to say anyway. Even better: in low-conflict scenarios, I can even persuade someone through this strategy to think that my idea is actually their idea.

- DOC Example 1: My son says something nasty to his sister. Instead of scolding him I ask, "Ten years from now, what kind of relationship do you want with your sisters?" He answers with something generally positive. "That's a great goal. If you want that goal to become a reality, how do you think that will happen?" He answers that they both have to work on being "excellent" to each other (a Bill & Ted reference I tease them about every now and then). "What are things you can do to help her be 'excellent' toward you?" He gives an idea or two and I latch on. "What are ways that will get in the way of your goal of having a good relationship with her?" He starts to connect the dots and realizes that talking mean doesn't help.
- DOC Example 2: Suppose I want to teach someone about the importance of prayer. I would open with the IAM(BRY) strategy: "I've been thinking about things I can do to improve my relationship with God." Response: That's a good idea. "Do you have any ideas on how I can do that?" He goes through a list. Prayer is on the list. "That's a good one. What would be good ways to approach prayer?" I let him brainstorm a few ideas. If he's struggling I give a few mediocre ideas while waiting for him to come up with the ones I really want him doing. "I like that. Do you want to do that with me?"

Buffering - Conflict and Persuasion Strategy

Legal Context - This is one of the most useful strategies I use in my legal profession. Parties in custody disputes can't wait for their chance to talk about how awful the other side is. When they get before a psychologist, judge, magistrate, guardian ad litem, or whoever, they just blab their mouth about "he's so evil because he did this" or "she's so crazy because she did that." Result? "You're both crazy and just acting out of spite and emotion. I can't trust either one of you." That's not how you win cases. And I like to win.

In order to combat this dynamic, I teach my clients the art of "buffering," which is a strategy I've developed for building credibility without compromising the very real and serious points you otherwise like to make. It's very simple: for every accusation you want to make, "buffer" it with a complementary statement of understanding and giving the benefit of the doubt. That's it. $Credibility = [Buffer] + [Harsh Truth]$. The two are reversible or can be multiplied in any number and order you see fit. It's a way of saying, "You can trust me. My motives aren't bad like you might assume, but I do want you to know the seriousness of this issue."

Especially when you're in a conflict scenario, other people are constantly trying to evaluate whether or not they can trust what you're saying. If you come off as your perspective being clouded by your own ego investment in the situation, you lose credibility and hinder your ability to achieve your goals in the situation. By demonstrating that you really are level-headed about the situation and thinking rationally and even with positive affect toward the other person in the conflict, you don't merely "not hurt" your credibility; you bolster it.

Home Application - This strategy works well in the home when you're giving instruction to someone else, such as your spouse or your child, on something you know they will be resistant to, but you want them to do it anyway. By creating an identification with their frustration, they are more likely to accept the reality of the undesirable task as a mandate from you because you're not asking them to do anything you haven't already done yourself. Or you can use this strategy to resolve conflict with your spouse because at the end of the day, your wife is probably more interested in being understood than she is in actually getting her way (at least if she trusts you this is more often the case).

- Example 1: "[Buffer] In an ideal world, I'd love nothing more than to have shared parenting with equal time with my ex, [Harsh Truth] but that's just not feasible in this situation, and here's why."
- Example 2: "[Buffer] I fully believe that my spouse has good intentions and is just trying to do what s/he thinks is best, [Harsh Truth] but the reality is that she has made things worse."
- Example 3: "[Harsh Truth] Dalia is insane. [Buffer] I don't say that lightly. I love her and care about her. I wish we could figure this out peaceably between us. She's a beautiful, intelligent woman. [Harsh Truth] But the more I have spoken with competent professionals and researched what I've seen in her, the more I see lots of overlap with serious mental health concerns. [Buffer] I think if she could get the help that she needs, we might actually be able to communicate with each other in a way that would be fantastic for our kids. [Harsh Truth] But we're just not there right now, [Submissive Posturing] and I don't know how to get there. Could you help me figure that out?"
- Example 4: [Harsh Truth] Son, you're going to have to clean your room. [Buffer] I know you don't like doing it. It sucks. I hated cleaning my room when I was a kid too, so I understand your frustration with it. [Harsh Truth] But your room is trashed and it is your responsibility to get it back in order."
- Example 5: [Harsh Truth] Babe, this is what we're going to do going forward. [Buffer] I understand that you think this and that. I appreciate your thoughts and how well you have communicated them. But as much as I can see where you're coming from, [Harsh Truth] this is the decision I'm making right now and I would like you to be on board with me."

Submissive Posturing - Persuasion/Likeability Strategy

Legal Context - Another big mistake a lot of people make (especially in the legal arena) is failing to recognize power dynamics. For example, when meeting with a guardian, lots of people want to tell the guardian how to do their job, what they should believe, why their choices with the kids were the best ones, etc. This can work if you legitimately have the better position. But I've found that EXACTLY 50% of parties in custody cases overestimate the actual strength of their position relative to the other side, so it's a risky gamble. The better strategy is to set your own agenda aside, take some humble pie, and submit yourself to the "experts."

Home Application - To do this, you simply ask for help, advice, or suggestions from the person who has a power dynamic over you or with whom you want to build a better relational affinity. The goal is to demonstrate that you can be trusted because you're more interested in finding the best solution than in pushing your own proposed solution (or at least this is what you give the appearance of doing). If your solution really is the best one, it's not often hard for the person in the higher power dynamic to realize this, so you can blend in some DOC Examination strategy as a way to get them to your actual preferred solution. The real thrust here is that you're getting someone else to empathize with you and your way of doing things by letting them believe you are allowing them to be in control.

The reality is that you are in control. But you are expressing your control in a way that utilizes an appearance of submissiveness coupled with guided disclosures or questions that ultimately lets them feel like they have been instrumental in your decision-making process to the degree that they believe you are taking their advice rather than persuading them that your decision was the correct one. The end result is that people see you as an appropriately humble person who validates their need to be needed, giving them a positive affinity toward you in future interactions and makes them more inclined to side with you when you need them to ... all without actually having to change what you ever intended in the first place. Law of Power 38 comes to mind: "Think as you like, but behave like others."

Another benefit is that this gives you a win-win-win-win scenario in the aftermath no matter what the outcome.

Win 1: If things go well, they go well and you've improved your relationship with the other person by making them feel validated for having been able to participate in the process. Win 2: If things go poorly, you have the option to double-down on the humility aspect by accepting responsibility, even though the other person believes that they were the one who gave the advice that led to the failure. Win 3: If the situation truly calls for it, you also have the option available to defer responsibility because you were "just following so and so's advice, and after all, he's the one in charge." Win 4: By getting someone else's input before acting on your plan, you may actually discover a better plan than what you were thinking.

In all of this, don't apply this strategy on the mundane where it would seem trite or even pedantic to bring it up.

While I call it a "submissive" strategy, it is really about leveraging (hopefully authentic) humility to advance your own goals and build up others around you in the process. As such, it can be applied in situations where it may be beneficial to express humility, even if the person is not in a higher power dynamic over you, such as with your spouse at times. Women love to feel needed. Even if you have a plan, allowing her to feel involved in the process validates her desire to be helpful to you in what you do. Let her be that help, even if you don't actually need that from her. This is part of where she gets her feels.

- Example 1: I want to do something unique a certain way in my job. Instead of doing it myself, I go to my boss and ask, "Do you have any suggestions for how I can handle this somewhat unique situation?"
- Example 2: I have a tricky situation coming up with my job so I ask my wife, "What would you do if you were in my situation?" Whatever answer she gives, I say, "Those are some good thoughts." If she says the thing I was thinking, I answer: "That's a good idea. I think I'll go with that. I appreciate the help, babe." She doesn't need to know if I'd already come up with that idea on my own or not.

Key Issue Focusing

Legal Context - Virtually everyone in custody cases blurs the line between their own goals/desires and what's best for the children. They always assume that what they want is best for the children, but neglect to connect the two concepts. So, I always prepare my clients for meeting with a GAL or psychologist or before going into a deposition or trial: "Make sure to connect EVERYTHING to the well-being of the children in some way." If they can't stay laser-focused on that singular issue, then much of what they say will be deemed "not credible" and they can lose. Of course, many judges forget this line too, which isn't helpful. But as soon as one party repeatedly hammers that line and the other party isn't ready for it, you'd better believe the judge will suddenly remember the actual focal point, and guess which parent he's more likely to side with on that focal point? The one who repeatedly demonstrated the connection between their plan and the relevant goal.

Home Application - I remember days of arguing with my wife where we jumped from one issue to the next and at the end it was all just a confusing mess and the actual core issues beneath the argument became a thing of the past by the end. That doesn't mean the new things that came up weren't significant issues too; they're just independent issues that distracted from resolving the first ones first.

Keeping this in mind, "Key Issue Focusing" is a framework for applying things like "broken record" or "negative inquiry" or other WISNIFG strategies in a way that avoids the argument and minimizes your risk of DEERing significantly. The reason that arguments get out of hand and become unproductive is because people over-explain themselves in manners that remind the other person of even more things they want to complain about, or at least more things that they want to say in defense of their position or feelings.

To do "key issue focusing" effectively, you use a string of negative inquiry to figure out what the actual core of the issue is, then as the conversation evolves you keep asking questions to bring it back to that.

- Example 1: Your wife is bouncing between comfort and fitness tests like a game of pong. You ask questions to figure out what's really going on and find out an insecurity issue is at the core of her discontent. She starts talking about how annoyed she feels when you clip your toenails in the living room. "[Fogging] I can see how that would upset you, but [KIF] we've been talking about the insecurity you've been experiencing and I'd like to focus on that. How does that affect your feelings of insecurity?" She goes on about how annoying it is. "[Fogging] I get that and agree you find it gross, which we can talk about later. [KIF/Broken Record] But let's stay on the insecurity topic for now. [Self-disclosure/passing comfort test] You know you're my woman and I care about you. [KIF] That's what's most important here."
- Example 2: You're talking to a GAL and tell a story about how the mother is with a new boyfriend who you don't like. WRONG: "He's a dangerous person and shouldn't be around my kids. He has a criminal record for drug possession and assault. She shouldn't be taking people like that around my children." This is a lot of "he, he, he" and "she." The kids are mentioned, but not the actual FOCUS of the statement. RIGHT: "My children are experiencing a lot of anxiety through this legal process. Bringing new people into the home who aren't even established in the relationship could put the kids in a situation of building a bond with someone just to have it ripped away from them if it doesn't work out. This guy has a criminal history and if he gets picked up again, he'll probably go to prison, and that would be unnerving to have these relationships come and go without safeguards. That situation would also hurt their relationship with their mom too, if they started seeing her poor choice in men. What's more concerning, though, is that kids with anxiety problems are more prone to self-medicate through the use of drugs, and if this new guy in their home has a history of it, and may even still be doing it, there's a chance that he's going to endorse that type of behavior around them, or at least not discipline them against it, which could really harm them in the long term. The fact that he has an assault on his record also shows that he's easily angered to a point where he'll cross even legal boundaries - and if he did that in a public forum with others watching, how much more will he be willing to lose his anger in a private setting around my kids in a way that will increase their already existing anxiety issues? All around, it's not a good situation for them. [Submissive Posturing] So, I'd really like some feedback on the best way to approach protecting my kids in this situation. Do you have any suggestions?"

The E-Mail Formula

Legal Context - While this is generally a blend of other strategies, it's worth noting that when I find a client constantly communicating in ways that are damaging to their case, I always coach them on how they can communicate better in writing. After all, written communication will generally be used as exhibits against you if the other side can find a way to do so. So, I created a general formula for high conflict situations to create a productive and self-preserving written record in case the communication is ever shown to anyone else.

Home Application - The same communication strategy can work when you're dealing with conflict in the workplace, with your spouse, neighbors, etc. The only thing that may be different is that in some contexts you're less likely to have someone ever take a look at what you're writing - especially if it's a verbal conversation where you're applying this pattern. That said, do be mindful that even audio can be recorded, and you never know when a co-worker will want to get you fired, a spouse may want to leave you (even dredging up texts from a year or two prior), another person in the church will want to stir up trouble with you to the pastor, etc. So, tact in communication is generally warranted in most situations. With that said, here's the formula (no, I didn't bother to come up with some cool acronym; make up your own if you prefer):

- Empathy: Validate their feelings without validating their position on the issue and, if possible, share in them openly. "I'm sorry that you're frustrated by this situation. I am too."
- Grace: Communicate a way of giving them the benefit of the doubt (i.e. pre-buffering). "I believe you mean well and hope you know that I truly do understand your position."

- Repeat: Repeat what they're saying in your own words to confirm your understanding. This is not always necessary, but can be useful in some contexts. "From what I can tell, you're concerned about x, y, and z because of a, b, and c."
- Assert: Share your viewpoint in contrast in a clear, concise, and definitive way applying buffering (if you haven't already above). "[Buffering] While I can understand why you'd think that way, [Harsh Truth] I simply cannot agree. I believe h, i, and j is better because r, s, and t."
- Offer: Give them an olive branch - a way to look like the good guy or else pigeon-hole themselves into being the bad one. "[Buffering] I know you don't agree with me, [Harsh Truth] but a decision has to be made [Offer] and I'd like for us to work together on this. Are you willing to join me in doing things this way?"

WISNIFG RECAP

Hopefully by now you've all read WISNIFG, which has some great communication strategies. Let me recap the most significant ones:

- Fogging: Find a way to agree with what someone else says, even if you don't agree to the substance. "I can see how from your perspective that would make a lot of sense." It's hard to argue with someone who keeps agreeing with you.
- Broken Record: Keep repeating the same phrase over and over without changing your position. This shows people that you won't back down and you insist on getting your way on this issue. "I want a refund ... I understand, but I still want my refund ... Yes, you may speak with your manager if he is the one who can give me a refund ... I appreciate your alternative offer, but I want a refund."
- Self-Disclosure: Providing relevant additional information about your situation, goals, motives, etc. that can move people toward understanding what you want from them and be more inclined to give it to you. "I need to reschedule our appointment" v. "My child is in the hospital, so I need to reschedule our appointment."
- Negative Inquiry: Asking questions that challenge the false assumptions people make when they accuse you. "Why is it wrong for me to spend time with my co-worker after hours?"
- Workable Compromise: Exchanging something that does not sacrifice your goals or self-worth in order to get what you want in return. "If you give me the parenting schedule I want, I'll agree to your right of first refusal provision."
- Negative Assertion: Admitting to your own shortcomings in order to build credibility or neutralize accusations. "That was a dumb thing for me to do." It's hard to accuse someone angrily who already recognizes the full weight of the accusation. Of course, this doesn't work if the "owning up" is done in a minimizing way.

RC'S ADDITIONAL STRATEGIES

In my time as an attorney, I've found that there are a number of additional conversational strategies that work not only in the courtroom, but also at home, in social contexts, high conflict scenarios, in the office, etc. Here are a few to dabble with.

It's About Me (But Really You) - Leadership strategy

Legal Context - I'll open with a simple one because it plays into some of the others really nicely. As we all know, blunt accusations aren't often received well. They make people defensive and emotionally unstable. So, I often suggest to my clients that instead of accusing the other parent of doing something wrong, take that exact issue and communicate (preferably in writing) to the other parent that you intend to work on that issue in your own parenting because you believe it would be best for your child. The idea is that the other side is then prompted to process the utility in what you're doing and they may attempt to implement it in their own home (even if my own client doesn't actually follow through or never intended to in the first place). This comes down to the power of suggestion. As a worst-case scenario, even if they don't implement the thought, if things go wrong my client now has a written record that they are trying to be proactive thinkers for their child and the other parent's failure to do likewise is what contributed to the mess.

Home Application - This works outside the legal custody context also. If your wife is fat, telling her, "You need to lose some weight" can be powerful if you have the frame and value to pull it off, but it's still probably going to make her upset. The "It's about me (but really you)" strategy is simply to take ownership of something you want another person within your influence to do also. In this example, you could tell your wife, "I've decided I'm not satisfied with my body. I'm overweight and it's time to start dieting and exercising more." Often-times such clear statements about your own intentions causes the other person to self-reflect and contemplate that they should make a similar decision for themselves.

This conversational approach shouldn't be used to undermine the importance of "do, don't tell." There is still great value in not blabbing your mouth about your plans if your primary concern is your own life improvement. But sometimes the "lead by example" path doesn't quite get through. Remember the discipleship strategy Jesus used: (1) tell them what, (2) show them how, (3) let them try, (4) send them out/keep them going, and (5) pass it on. If your goal isn't just for your own improvement, but also to lead someone else, then it can be beneficial to tell before you show, giving them a context to see how to do what they're aspiring to and to stay motivated by seeing your progress.

There's also a split between situations where you're leading by example and leading by setting boundaries/expectations. I can tell my wife, "cook this for dinner" or "wear this tonight" without showing her how first. I'm not going to put on a skirt just to "show her how" when she already knows. So, if I'm setting a boundary or expectation for her, telling her without showing is sufficient and the "it's about me (but really you)" strategy is unnecessary. When this comes most into play is when you're dealing with more sensitive issues of a spouse's shortcomings and you want her to learn from your example how to overcome them.

Lastly, it's worth noting that you can use this strategy by replacing "me" with someone else your wife might have reason to keep up with. Here are some examples of how this conversational technique can work:

- Example 1: "I've noticed our bathroom sink getting cluttered. I think I'm going to clean it up and make an effort to keep it clean soon. Is there anything on there that you don't want me messing with?" Chances are, 80% of the mess is hers. You're not accusing her; you're just taking responsibility. But she will likely adopt that responsibility as her own also.
- Example 2: I want my wife memorizing Scripture more often. I start training my kids in Scripture memory. I tell my wife, "I've decided that Scripture memory is important and our kids need to be doing it. So, I've been having the kids memorize <this or that> verse. They're doing great! I love the idea that our family will become one that knows the Bible inside and out." She sees that the kids are starting to excel at something that she should be better than them at, so she starts memorizing Scripture with them to keep up.

DOC Examination - Conflict and Leadership Strategy

Legal Context - The goal of any good cross examination is to lead a person to your own pre-drawn conclusion by asking questions. The most famous technique is the "Pozner Cross," which involves only yes/no questions. You essentially back the witness into a corner where they ultimately have to agree to see things your way. Through a series of "yes or no" responses the person ultimately admits what you want. It's ideal if you begin the line of inquiry in a way that the other person doesn't know what you're trying to get them to admit to.

- Pozner Example: I may ask Bob about his favorite holiday. "Even if it's not your favorite, Bob, July 4 is always a great time, isn't it?" "Don't you just love to sit on your lawn sipping a few beers while the lights dance in the sky?" "And it's even better when you get to be with your kids, enjoying a family holiday, don't you think?" "Wasn't it great that you got to do that last week?" "And you even had your kids with you too, to make it even better, right?" "And you were drinking those beers while your kids were with you, right?" "And you knew the order prohibited drinking during your parenting time, right?" Trapped.

Home Application - To be clear, making your spouse feel "tricked" into an admission rarely goes over well, so avoid the yes/no questions. Instead, I've started doing in specific cases what I call a "direct-on-cross" (DOC) strategy. During direct examinations you can only ask open-ended questions. Yes/no questions are prohibited (with limited flexibility). Why would you limit yourself like that on cross examination? Because it better shields your motives and removes the air of trickery, as they get to answer any way they like. But by maintaining control of the conversation and ensuring that it follows the direction I want it to, the person usually ends up saying what I want them to say anyway. Even better: in low-conflict scenarios, I can even persuade someone through this strategy to think that my idea is actually their idea.

- DOC Example 1: My son says something nasty to his sister. Instead of scolding him I ask, "Ten years from now, what kind of relationship do you want with your sisters?" He answers with something generally positive. "That's a great goal. If you want that goal to become a reality, how do you think that will happen?" He answers that they both have to work on being "excellent" to each other (a Bill & Ted reference I tease them about every now and then). "What are things you can do to help her be 'excellent' toward you?" He gives an idea or two and I latch on. "What are ways that will get in the way of your goal of having a good relationship with her?" He starts to connect the dots and realizes that talking mean doesn't help.
- DOC Example 2: Suppose I want to teach someone about the importance of prayer. I would open with the IAM(BRY) strategy: "I've been thinking about things I can do to improve my relationship with God." Response: That's a good idea. "Do you have any ideas on how I can do that?" He goes through a list. Prayer is on the list. "That's a good one. What would be good ways to approach prayer?" I let him brainstorm a few ideas. If he's struggling I give a few mediocre ideas while waiting for him to come up with the ones I really want him doing. "I like that. Do you want to do that with me?"

Buffering - Conflict and Persuasion Strategy

Legal Context - This is one of the most useful strategies I use in my legal profession. Parties in custody disputes can't wait for their chance to talk about how awful the other side is. When they get before a psychologist, judge, magistrate, guardian ad litem, or whoever, they just blab their mouth about "he's so evil because he did this" or "she's so crazy because she did that." Result? "You're both crazy and just acting out of spite and emotion. I can't trust either one of you." That's not how you win cases. And I like to win.

In order to combat this dynamic, I teach my clients the art of "buffering," which is a strategy I've developed for building credibility without compromising the very real and serious points you otherwise like to make. It's very simple: for every accusation you want to make, "buffer" it with a complementary statement of understanding and giving the benefit of the doubt. That's it. $Credibility = [Buffer] + [Harsh Truth]$. The two are reversible or can be multiplied in any number and order you see fit. It's a way of saying, "You can trust me. My motives aren't bad like you might assume, but I do want you to know the seriousness of this issue."

Especially when you're in a conflict scenario, other people are constantly trying to evaluate whether or not they can trust what you're saying. If you come off as your perspective being clouded by your own ego investment in the situation, you lose credibility and hinder your ability to achieve your goals in the situation. By demonstrating that you really are level-headed about the situation and thinking rationally and even with positive affect toward the other person in the conflict, you don't merely "not hurt" your credibility; you bolster it.

Home Application - This strategy works well in the home when you're giving instruction to someone else, such as your spouse or your child, on something you know they will be resistant to, but you want them to do it anyway. By creating an identification with their frustration, they are more likely to accept the reality of the undesirable task as a mandate from you because you're not asking them to do anything you haven't already done yourself. Or you can use this strategy to resolve conflict with your spouse because at the end of the day, your wife is probably more interested in being understood than she is in actually getting her way (at least if she trusts you this is more often the case).

- Example 1: "[Buffer] In an ideal world, I'd love nothing more than to have shared parenting with equal time with my ex, [Harsh Truth] but that's just not feasible in this situation, and here's why."
- Example 2: "[Buffer] I fully believe that my spouse has good intentions and is just trying to do what s/he thinks is best, [Harsh Truth] but the reality is that she has made things worse."
- Example 3: "[Harsh Truth] Dalia is insane. [Buffer] I don't say that lightly. I love her and care about her. I wish we could figure this out peaceably between us. She's a beautiful, intelligent woman. [Harsh Truth] But the more I have spoken with competent professionals and researched what I've seen in her, the more I see lots of overlap with serious mental health concerns. [Buffer] I think if she could get the help that she needs, we might actually be able to communicate with each other in a way that would be fantastic for our kids. [Harsh Truth] But we're just not there right now, [Submissive Posturing] and I don't know how to get there. Could you help me figure that out?"
- Example 4: [Harsh Truth] Son, you're going to have to clean your room. [Buffer] I know you don't like doing it. It sucks. I hated cleaning my room when I was a kid too, so I understand your frustration with it. [Harsh Truth] But your room is trashed and it is your responsibility to get it back in order."
- Example 5: [Harsh Truth] Babe, this is what we're going to do going forward. [Buffer] I understand that you think this and that. I appreciate your thoughts and how well you have communicated them. But as much as I can see where you're coming from, [Harsh Truth] this is the decision I'm making right now and I would like you to be on board with me."

Submissive Posturing - Persuasion/Likeability Strategy

Legal Context - Another big mistake a lot of people make (especially in the legal arena) is failing to recognize power dynamics. For example, when meeting with a guardian, lots of people want to tell the guardian how to do their job, what they should believe, why their choices with the kids were the best ones, etc. This can work if you legitimately have the better position. But I've found that EXACTLY 50% of parties in custody cases overestimate the actual strength of their position relative to the other side, so it's a risky gamble. The better strategy is to set your own agenda aside, take some humble pie, and submit yourself to the "experts."

Home Application - To do this, you simply ask for help, advice, or suggestions from the person who has a power dynamic over you or with whom you want to build a better relational affinity. The goal is to demonstrate that you can be trusted because you're more interested in finding the best solution than in pushing your own proposed solution (or at least this is what you give the appearance of doing). If your solution really is the best one, it's not often hard for the person in the higher power dynamic to realize this, so you can blend in some DOC Examination strategy as a way to get them to your actual preferred solution. The real thrust here is that you're getting someone else to empathize with you and your way of doing things by letting them believe you are allowing them to be in control.

The reality is that you are in control. But you are expressing your control in a way that utilizes an appearance of submissiveness coupled with guided disclosures or questions that ultimately lets them feel like they have been instrumental in your decision-making process to the degree that they believe you are taking their advice rather than persuading them that your decision was the correct one. The end result is that people see you as an appropriately humble person who validates their need to be needed, giving them a positive affinity toward you in future interactions and makes them more inclined to side with you when you need them to ... all without actually having to change what you ever intended in the first place. Law of Power 38 comes to mind: "Think as you like, but behave like others."

Another benefit is that this gives you a win-win-win-win scenario in the aftermath no matter what the outcome.

Win 1: If things go well, they go well and you've improved your relationship with the other person by making them feel validated for having been able to participate in the process. Win 2: If things go poorly, you have the option to double-down on the humility aspect by accepting responsibility, even though the other person believes that they were the one who gave the advice that led to the failure. Win 3: If the situation truly calls for it, you also have the option available to defer responsibility because you were "just following so and so's advice, and after all, he's the one in charge." Win 4: By getting someone else's input before acting on your plan, you may actually discover a better plan than what you were thinking.

In all of this, don't apply this strategy on the mundane where it would seem trite or even pedantic to bring it up.

While I call it a "submissive" strategy, it is really about leveraging (hopefully authentic) humility to advance your own goals and build up others around you in the process. As such, it can be applied in situations where it may be beneficial to express humility, even if the person is not in a higher power dynamic over you, such as with your spouse at times. Women love to feel needed. Even if you have a plan, allowing her to feel involved in the process validates her desire to be helpful to you in what you do. Let her be that help, even if you don't actually need that from her. This is part of where she gets her feels.

- Example 1: I want to do something unique a certain way in my job. Instead of doing it myself, I go to my boss and ask, "Do you have any suggestions for how I can handle this somewhat unique situation?"
- Example 2: I have a tricky situation coming up with my job so I ask my wife, "What would you do if you were in my situation?" Whatever answer she gives, I say, "Those are some good thoughts." If she says the thing I was thinking, I answer: "That's a good idea. I think I'll go with that. I appreciate the help, babe." She doesn't need to know if I'd already come up with that idea on my own or not.

Key Issue Focusing

Legal Context - Virtually everyone in custody cases blurs the line between their own goals/desires and what's best for the children. They always assume that what they want is best for the children, but neglect to connect the two concepts. So, I always prepare my clients for meeting with a GAL or psychologist or before going into a deposition or trial: "Make sure to connect EVERYTHING to the well-being of the children in some way." If they can't stay laser-focused on that singular issue, then much of what they say will be deemed "not credible" and they can lose. Of course, many judges forget this line too, which isn't helpful. But as soon as one party repeatedly hammers that line and the other party isn't ready for it, you'd better believe the judge will suddenly remember the actual focal point, and guess which parent he's more likely to side with on that focal point? The one who repeatedly demonstrated the connection between their plan and the relevant goal.

Home Application - I remember days of arguing with my wife where we jumped from one issue to the next and at the end it was all just a confusing mess and the actual core issues beneath the argument became a thing of the past by the end. That doesn't mean the new things that came up weren't significant issues too; they're just independent issues that distracted from resolving the first ones first.

Keeping this in mind, "Key Issue Focusing" is a framework for applying things like "broken record" or "negative inquiry" or other WISNIFG strategies in a way that avoids the argument and minimizes your risk of DEERING significantly. The reason that arguments get out of hand and become unproductive is because people over-explain themselves in manners that remind the other person of even more things they want to complain about, or at least more things that they want to say in defense of their position or feelings.

To do "key issue focusing" effectively, you use a string of negative inquiry to figure out what the actual core of the issue is, then as the conversation evolves you keep asking questions to bring it back to that.

- Example 1: Your wife is bouncing between comfort and fitness tests like a game of pong. You ask questions to figure out what's really going on and find out an insecurity issue is at the core of her discontent. She starts talking about how annoyed she feels when you clip your toenails in the living room. "[Fogging] I can see how that would upset you, but [KIF] we've been talking about the insecurity you've been experiencing and I'd like to focus on that. How does that affect your feelings of insecurity?" She goes on about how annoying it is. "[Fogging] I get that and agree you find it gross, which we can talk about later. [KIF/Broken Record] But let's stay on the insecurity topic for now. [Self-disclosure/passing comfort test] You know you're my woman and I care about you. [KIF] That's what's most important here."
- Example 2: You're talking to a GAL and tell a story about how the mother is with a new boyfriend who you don't like. WRONG: "He's a dangerous person and shouldn't be around my kids. He has a criminal record for drug possession and assault. She shouldn't be taking people like that around my children." This is a lot of "he, he, he" and "she." The kids are mentioned, but not the actual FOCUS of the statement. RIGHT: "My children are experiencing a lot of anxiety through this legal process. Bringing new people into the home who aren't even established in the relationship could put the kids in a situation of building a bond with someone just to have it ripped away from them if it doesn't work out. This guy has a criminal history and if he gets picked up again, he'll probably go to prison, and that would be unnerving to have these relationships come and go without safeguards. That situation would also hurt their relationship with their mom too, if they started seeing her poor choice in men. What's more concerning, though, is that kids with anxiety problems are more prone to self-medicate through the use of drugs, and if this new guy in their home has a history of it, and may even still be doing it, there's a chance that he's going to endorse that type of behavior around them, or at least not discipline them against it, which could really harm them in the long term. The fact that he has an assault on his record also shows that he's easily angered to a point where he'll cross even legal boundaries - and if he did that in a public forum with others watching, how much more will he be willing to lose his anger in a private setting around my kids in a way that will increase their already existing anxiety issues? All around, it's not a good situation for them. [Submissive Posturing] So, I'd really like some feedback on the best way to approach protecting my kids in this situation. Do you have any suggestions?"

The E-Mail Formula

Legal Context - While this is generally a blend of other strategies, it's worth noting that when I find a client constantly communicating in ways that are damaging to their case, I always coach them on how they can communicate better in writing. After all, written communication will generally be used as exhibits against you if the other side can find a way to do so. So, I created a general formula for high conflict situations to create a productive and self-preserving written record in case the communication is ever shown to anyone else.

Home Application - The same communication strategy can work when you're dealing with conflict in the workplace, with your spouse, neighbors, etc. The only thing that may be different is that in some contexts you're less likely to have someone ever take a look at what you're writing - especially if it's a verbal conversation where you're applying this pattern. That said, do be mindful that even audio can be recorded, and you never know when a co-worker will want to get you fired, a spouse may want to leave you (even dredging up texts from a year or two prior), another person in the church will want to stir up trouble with you to the pastor, etc. So, tact in communication is generally warranted in most situations. With that said, here's the formula (no, I didn't bother to come up with some cool acronym; make up your own if you prefer):

- Empathy: Validate their feelings without validating their position on the issue and, if possible, share in them openly. "I'm sorry that you're frustrated by this situation. I am too."
- Grace: Communicate a way of giving them the benefit of the doubt (i.e. pre-buffering). "I believe you mean well and hope you know that I truly do understand your position."

- Repeat: Repeat what they're saying in your own words to confirm your understanding. This is not always necessary, but can be useful in some contexts. "From what I can tell, you're concerned about x, y, and z because of a, b, and c."
- Assert: Share your viewpoint in contrast in a clear, concise, and definitive way applying buffering (if you haven't already above). "[Buffering] While I can understand why you'd think that way, [Harsh Truth] I simply cannot agree. I believe h, i, and j is better because r, s, and t."
- Offer: Give them an olive branch - a way to look like the good guy or else pigeon-hole themselves into being the bad one. "[Buffering] I know you don't agree with me, [Harsh Truth] but a decision has to be made [Offer] and I'd like for us to work together on this. Are you willing to join me in doing things this way?"

I loved the 2022 Toyota Prius

29 September 2021 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

I had the opportunity to visit Oregon/Washington recently. Beautiful states. I totally loved driving around and seeing all of the landscape God masterfully created - especially the volcanic Mt. St. Helens. But even more than the landscape, I enjoyed the car that drove me through it. This 2022 Prius was incredible.

Steering Assist

The best feature was the "steering assist." Now, I could just be too old-school because I've never owned a car newer than 2012. I'm generally overly-frugal for long-term financial planning purposes. So this was a brand new feature to me. I didn't even know normal cars had stuff like this, short of Tesla's or Google's fully self-driving cars that nobody actually owns en masse.

This steering assist was more like it was driving than me. I could literally let go of the wheel for 15 solid minutes on the freeway without any difficulty, and boy was that a beautiful and impressive thing! I respected the car's power, technology, and capabilities to do that.

The road has clear boundary lines that the car knew to stay between. I liked knowing that the pressure wasn't all on me to get to the destination safely. Yeah, I'm not going to be stupid and ignore the road ahead altogether. The car wasn't designed for me to be totally ignorant as it trudged forward at highway speeds. It wouldn't be good for the car to be alone, without a driver. It wasn't designed for that (at least not this one). But it did have a clear purpose: to get from point A to B, and it was designed skillfully and wonderfully to do just that.

Now, as the car had that goal, I had the ability to take over the wheel when I wanted. Even with the steering assist on, it didn't force me to follow its whims. I had autonomy, even though I respected the operative drive and safety controls of this vehicle. But the ideal times to exercise this autonomy against the resistance the vehicle gave me were the rare exceptions, not the rule.

That said, this was a power I sometimes abused anyway. Why? Because it was fun! I became like a child playing with a toy when testing the steering assist feature (and if the car were sentient, it would have been well within its rights to treat me like one at times!). I enjoyed grabbing the wheel and encroaching on one of those boundary lines the car knew not to cross. It was fun to see how the steering assist would react and to hear it start to beep in my ear to get back on the road. It gave me a sense of comfort to know that the car would protect me and keep me safe on the road when it saw I presenting a danger to it and myself.

It would turn the wheel against me, fighting the direction I was steering because it knew that's what needed to be done. I did this repeatedly while driving - not because I actually wanted to violate any boundaries, but because I enjoyed the dynamic of seeing the car maintain them in the face of my obstinacy. It made me smile, but also feel an extra sense of safety that the manufacturer no-doubt knew I would experience while enjoying the features in its design.

Radar Cruise Control

It also had an incredible radar cruise control. I could set the speed at whatever maximum I wanted and it would self-adjust the speed to maintain a safe distance from the car in front of me. It knew how to follow what was ahead and let those behind keep an appropriate pace with it as well. In fact, I once even set the cruise at 75mph on the highway, got off at an exit and took the car to a complete stop at the end of the exit ramp all without ever touching the breaks because my rental 2022 Prius knew the appropriate timing to slow down and speed up while on the road to our destination, keeping in appropriate pace with the lead car ahead.

Side Sensors

It wasn't just front/back sensors that helped, but it also knew when cars were keeping pace beside me. If they tried to steer into my lane, an alarm would go off so I'd have extra attention to handle the problem appropriately. It was looking out for me in ways that I'd never expected even beyond the lead/following car by looking side-to-side too.

Windshield Wiper Automation

It also had this fascinating feature: I never needed to control my windshield wipers. It rained a lot in Oregon/Washington, and at unpredictable times. But I never had to turn the wipers on/off myself. The car knew when I needed to have clearer vision on my windshield and not. It could sense when my vision was blurred by the weather and would automatically adjust my visibility so that I could see where we were going. It would entirely turn off if it sensed the windshield was dry, knowing not to waste its time on trying to fix something that wasn't a problem. Or if it went from a slow mist to a heavy rain, it'd switch all on its own to full blast so that I could keep my visibility as best as the weather conditions allowed. Granted, even if my vision was severely hindered by the pelting rain on the windshield, I still knew the other safety features on the car were there to keep me protected.

Conclusion

Of course, the car had a host of other features too. But those were the ones that stood out to me. Although no metaphor is perfect, while I may have understood it on an outside-observational level before, my eyes were uniquely opened to how fun it can be to test the boundaries of something designed to keep me safe and protected on a singular mission, despite my wife's occasional comment about how "The car's getting mad at you!" The reality is the car had an unshakable frame. Its periodic beeping when I'd toy around with its features wasn't an emotional burst of anger from a machine. It was an appropriate warning designed to keep me from interfering with its purpose or making sure I wasn't screwing up my own agenda.

Then I remembered how I, as Christ's follower, used to marvel in the ways I used to let him do these very things for me - keeping me safe and protected, moving at an appropriate speed, in right relation with others around me, and giving me the appropriate vision to see what lies ahead. It's easy to forget to be dependent, which Galatians 3:3 warns against. Yet just as I expect this dependence and trust from my wife, I can't hypocritically refuse to give the same to Christ. Thank you, rental 2022 Prius. I will miss you, but your lessons will remain.

What is the role of "the red pill" in Scripture? We have a whole sidebar series devoted to showing how it's in there. But what do we do with it? Where does it fit in with God's master plan? I've addressed this a lot on the discord, but it occurs to me I haven't put it here yet, so let's do that now.

DISCIPLES OF WHO?

I've seen many men in this forum get hooked on the concept of discipleship. Excellent! I've said before that the entirety of the Christian life can be summed up in the three greats: (G) Love God, (O) Love Others, and (D) Make Disciples. These are the greatest command, second greatest command, and great commission. Jesus says, "The one who has my commands and obeys them is the one who loves me," so you can't say you truly love God if you're not fulfilling his command to make disciples. "Jesus, I love you enough to follow most of your commands, but not that one. I won't make disciples. But if I follow your other commands, is that enough love for you?" Good luck with that line.

Okay, so you're making disciples ... but disciples of who? I've known too many men who want to make disciples of masculinity instead of Christ. I'm going to pick on our mod /u/TheChristianAlpha because he's an easy target and has the frame to handle it. I remember asking him his mission at one point and he said, "To raise up more masculine men in the Church." Cool. That's useful. But it also means that the focus of his mission at that time was to generate masculinity, not Christ-followers. There's a difference. For the record, that was years ago and TCA has moved past that.

1 John 2:6 says, "Whoever says he abides in him [Jesus] ought to walk in the same way in which he walked." We are to be training people to be disciples of Christ, not disciples of "masculinity," whatever that means.

IT'S NOT A TWO-WAY STREET

The reality is that every man who follows Jesus and strives to be like him will be masculine. Jesus is the model man. The more you become like Christ, the more you will attain the epitome of masculinity. It won't be the world's definition of masculinity, nor will it be the mainstream church's. But it will be Christ's expression of it, and you can't go wrong with that. Just make sure you know who Christ actually was and what he actually did and do likewise, rather than trusting in assumptions and ingrained notions you may have been raised with on the subject. Again, we have a whole sidebar for that.

But the reverse is not true. Not everyone who pursues masculinity will be more like Christ. There are several expressions of masculinity - including those taught in secular red pill channels - which are quite unChrist-like.

This is hard for many red pill guys to wrap their heads around because the red pill has so drastically changed their lives that some people are more evangelistic about the red pill for saving them from blue pill agony than they are about Christ for saving them from sin and eternal hellfire. See the imbalance there? If the red pill has changed your life more than Jesus has changed your life, there's a problem. Which one are you looking to as your actual savior?

In the end, the goal should be to make people more like Jesus, which will inherently mean making them more masculine and "red pillled." But making people more red-pillled/philosophically-masculine will not necessarily make them more like Jesus.

TIMING IS KEY

The Timeline

So, why bother with the red pill at all, if Jesus is the short-term, mid-term, and long-term goal anyway?

Ecclesiastes 3 tells us, "For everything there is a season, and a time for every matter under heaven: a time to be born, and a time to die; a time to plant, and a time to pluck up what is planted; a time to kill, and a time to heal ..." a time to talk about relationships and sexual strategy, and a time to set those things aside.

In my 309 post on "the discipleship process" I wrote about distinct process that help us grow. A non-Christian is "Evangelised" into becoming a Convert. A Convert is "Established" into becoming a Disciple. A Disciple is "Equipped" to become a DiscipleR. And a DiscipleR builds an "Entrusting relationship with his disciples to become a Leader over discipleR-making ministries.

- Evangelism is about building relationships with non-believers and leveraging those relationships to spread the Gospel.
- Establishing is getting a new believer grounded in the faith to the point where they are capable spiritual survival even without your leadership.
- Equipping is the process of casting a vision on one who is already following Christ so that instead of merely surviving in their faith, they are thriving and producing. The equipped man has a purpose in his following that is actually beneficial to the Kingdom and not only his own life.
- Entrusting is the process of coordinating discipleR-makers of all sorts into a common, unified effort for the sake of growth and efficiency rather than discipleship chaos.

This process is your timeline, and it could take any amount of time to help any one person move from each phase to the next. Evangelism could take weeks or years. Establishing should ideally take about 6 months, but could take as little as 3 or as long as years. I try to shoot for Jesus' timeline: roughly 3 years for the entire process with any one person.

Red Pill Timing

The Evangelism phase is not the place for the red pill (with one caveat): UNLESS the person is a non-Christian and the fact of his dying marriage is the relational "in" you have with him to build toward sharing the Gospel. In that situation, use the red pill to help him unscrew himself while pointing out that you learned all of this stuff from Jesus and that becoming like Jesus can not only help fix him in the midst of relationships woes, but every other area of life too - especially eternity. See how that works? But for the most part, evangelism is NOT the proper timing to be pushing red pill concepts.

The Establishing phase is also not the place for the red pill (with one caveat): UNLESS the guy is on the brink of divorce and his marriage woes so bad that they are preventing him from otherwise being established and you have no choice but to work through those issues before getting him grounded. Otherwise, the main goal of the establishing phase is just to get him following Jesus. This is the 300 series' "7 Basics" - Assurance of Salvation, Quiet Times, Bible Study, Scripture Memory, Prayer, Evangelism, and Fellowship. Those are all that matters. Keep the red pill sidelined in virtually every situation in the establishing phase (i.e. at least the first 6 months you're working with someone, unless they're already extremely well-established).

The Equipping phase IS the proper place for the red pill. To quote that section of my 309 post:

In order to aid him in this process, he must be equipped with several tools to help him. Those tools might be additional disciplines beyond the basics. It might be theological understanding. It might be a strong familiarity with the Word. It could be practical life skills, like charisma, passion, humility, etc. It could be practical things in one's life that help him connect with others, like his good looks, having a respectable family, house, and car, etc. All of these tools can usually be summarized in three categories: things that foster (1) relationship-building, (2) ministry skills and understanding, and (3) character development.

The "practical things in one's life that help him connect with others" and "relationship-building" concepts are where the red pill are finally of value in the discipleship process. Here you're not trying desperately to save a sinking ship. You're properly giving a man tools that you know he'll need in proper timing. This is the core of wisdom in the timing of the red pill in the discipleship process. If you are introducing the red pill in your discipleship process sooner than this, then you are probably trying to red-knight a man more than you are trying to disciple him. Discipleship is about making a Christ-follower, not a red-pill-follower.

The Entrusting phase is too late to bring up red pill concepts. In order for him to be an effective discipler he needs to know how to be an effective man. If you're training him to lead discipleship ministries and he doesn't even know how to interact with his wife or a single woman properly, you're jumping the gun.

WHY DOES THIS MATTER?

If you introduce red pill praxeology and marriage/relationship theology out of turn, you are going to create an inappropriately timed over-excitement about those concepts because they're easy to get worked up over. The person will be less interested in Jesus than they are in their newfound sexual capabilities, which will make it difficult to guide the ship where it needs to go later.

It also says a lot about your own character and the degree to which you're committed to Christ v. the red pill. What you evangelize most is likely who/what you worship most.

By introducing red pill prior to the equipping phase, you are more likely to get someone to go Rambo because he doesn't have the filter of biblical discipline tempering his understanding and expression of the red pill.

The list could go on. If you want to discuss further, do it in the comments. In the meantime, I'll simply note that there's merit to the view that we can use the red pill to build rapport with those who are hurting and struggling in their marriages, helping them with their marriage/sexuality woes as a waypoint toward becoming better men who are more like Christ. I actually love this approach to things. But we can never forget the end-goal in the process and stop at this waypoint or let the waypoint dominate our discipleship process.

THE END GOAL

In all of this, the "end goal" is to "make disciples of all nations, baptizing in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and teaching them to obey everything [Jesus] commanded [us]."

- Our end-goal is NOT to red knight people.
- Our end-goal is NOT to bring on a resurgence of masculinity.
- Our end-goal is NOT to enact political change in favor of men.

These may be great mini "on the way" goals that are sidelined. But the "big job" in the Bible is to make disciples. Who is your man? Who is it that you're raising up to be like Christ? Are you really raising him up to be like Christ in ALL ways that Jesus lived, or are you just hitting the "masculine" points of Jesus' life and ignoring the rest?

The "end goal" here includes not only the red pill, which is one small component of the broader Christian life for a man, but also the spiritual basics (per the 300 series) and a broader missional lifestyle. Always remember the mantra: "Whoever says he abides in him ought to walk in the say way in which he walked." That's the end-goal: to walk as Jesus walked. Yes, Jesus was masculine. But he also prayed, also studied and taught the Scriptures, also built relationships with believers and non-believers alike, and so much more.

Just as the mainstream "church" has cut off significant aspects of Jesus' character, let's not do the same on the other end of the spectrum.

Fix Your Low-Hanging Fruit

31 January 2022 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

I've been reviewing some of the OYS on the discord and responding a bit more, now that I've had an interlude of time open up. Here are some lessons everyone should learn.

1. OVERWEIGHT

I get it. I like to eat as much as the next guy. I've struggled with weight all my life too. I just hit my post-RP high on weight this past December. January came around and I decided to do something about it. I started a #diet-reporting channel on the discord and post ever calorie that goes into my mouth, as well as every calorie of exercise I burn. Result? Over 15lbs down in 3 weeks, and counting. It's not that hard guys. Too many men want to pussyfoot around with complaints about their life while trying to hide their physical fitness problems by simply citing "5'10, 120kg," not saying anything else about their size, and hoping nobody else notices or does the conversion (it's over 260lbs, by the way).

Here's the advice I just gave two guys who had an obesity problem and both reported playing video games. I told them they must repeat this phrase back to me: "I promise I will not play another video game until I have bought a stationary bike. I will not play video games anymore unless I am also riding that bike and maintaining a minimum 10mph pace."

Know how I lost over 15lbs in 3 weeks? I'd literally have to 100% stop eating to maintain that same pace. My solution: I still cut my calories, but I just sit on the stationary bike for hours a day. Sometimes I'm working. Other times I'm playing video games with my son. When I'm chilling with my wife after the kids go to bed, either talking about life or watching Netflix, I'm on that bike. I refuse to allow myself certain life pleasures, like video games, unless I'm burning calories while I do it. No exceptions. I ate over 3,000 calories a few days ago but still hit my 5lbs/wk goal. Know why? I biked 51 miles and burned more than what I ate.

Two caveats:

- No, the bike (or if you prefer: treadmill) is not a substitute for your diet. You cannot maintain 2-4hrs on a stationary bike 5-7 days a week for the rest of your life. At some point you're going to reduce the cardio again. At that point you have two options: (1) make sure to keep your diet in check while you cardio-focus, or (2) eat normal, but be prepared to have this cardio-phase of life happening constantly throughout your life, even after you've hit your ideal weight; every time you creep 5-10lbs over your ideal, that's another 1-2 weeks of a sub-zero diet.
- No, you don't stop lifting. Realistically, I can only maintain this sub-zero diet for a month at a time before I have to take a week off to re-bulk. Can't lose my 275lb bench press max. So, you do the above for a month (i.e. 20+lbs lost), then take a week off to re-bulk and heavy lift (which you should also be lifting during your cardio-focus too, just not as much time-investment) in order to get your lifts back to where they were pre-cardio (you'll re-gain 5-7lbs), then hit another month sub-zero dieting. Trust me, after the first week, you don't even notice that you're dieting anymore.
 - The caveat to this second caveat is that if you're over 25% body fat, you just cardio until you're down to 25% before you try to do a "re-bulk lifting" session. You didn't have muscular bulk in the first place, so there's no "re" to do. Still work light lifting (2days/wk) into your routine, but hammer that cardio. Once you're 25% body fat, you can start hitting lifting much harder to make use of your size for quick easy lifting gains. Starting to lift when you're a twig is a lot harder than when you've got extra fat on you. Take advantage of that - and 25% is not ideal, but acceptable enough that you can scrape by in society without being a total embarrassment.

2. TIME-SINKS

So many guys in OYS are wasting their time. It's usually video games, porn, and social media. I noticed over a decade ago that my weight was directly correlated with how frequently I watched porn. Cut it out of my life entirely and I permanently lost roughly 50lbs that even in my peak-weight since then, I've never gained any of that back.

I already told you what to do about video games, so look above on that.

For social media, the same as above applies. Just promise to yourself: "I will not scroll Facebook/Instagram/Twitter/crazy blogs/etc. unless I'm burning calories while I do it." Even while I'm at work talking to clients - something that's actually a high-value, productive activity - I hop into my office conference room and pace laps. Other people recommend an under-the-desk treadmill and just go at it all work day with a standing desk. With all the time you're wasting on social media or other things, think of how much better your life would be if you either (1) burned calories while you did it, double-valuing your time, or (2) had extra non-cardio time to do more productive things in life because you've committed that you won't use social media while not burning calories.

3. PRIORITIES SUCK

One guy in his OYS talked about wanting to improve his fashion, but he was still overweight. Horrible idea. Let's break this down:

- If you buy a bunch of new clothes now, then lose a ton of weight and bulk up your chest size, you'll have wasted that money.
- By having the heavier-set clothes still in your wardrobe, you'll have more psychological lax to let yourself gain weight because you know you still have clothes to wear.
- If you wait to up your wardrobe until you have the body you want, you'll have extra motive to keep your body in that shape.
- Holding off also gives you an opportunity to save up in your budget to afford decent threads.

This type of mis-prioritization happens in other areas too, this is just an easy example. Think before you pick what you're going to start working on. Get feedback from other guys. Don't think a new slick pair of shoes is going to impress women enough to ignore your pot belly.

4. NO OTHER SINGLES

Do you know how many OYS I've read where someone complains, "Everyone I know is already paired up. The only singles I'm around are people I'm uninterested in." Seriously, if you don't have women crawling over you, it's because you suck in some way. It could be your physique, but even hot guys have trouble sometimes. Maybe his social game sucks. Maybe he has awful habits/quirks that he won't give up. Maybe he wastes his time on video games rather than socializing, even though he's good in social settings when he's there. Figure it out.

When someone complains that there are no singles in his area, here's my thought process:

- First, why do I care? Useless information. My guess is that most of these guys think it's useful because they want others to accept it as some sort of explanation or excuse to justify their frustrations with being single. That's literally half of the letters in DEER(ing). Stop doing that.
-

- Second, even if you're telling the truth and there are no singles in your social circle, your social circle sucks. Go make other friends.
- Third, most people who say this aren't being technically accurate. Literally every contact you have is married or engaged? Redefine "single" in your mind: If she doesn't have a ring, she's single. Options open up with this mentality. The mental box Christian guys put themselves in is pure lunacy. Trying to "honor her boyfriend's right (!?) to her" is something even feminists would find cringy. It's a sign of a weak frame. Guys who think this way presume that because of temporal happenstance (i.e. he got there first), somehow she shouldn't have the option of being with a better guy (i.e. you, if you keep improving; it's really NOT hard to become one of the top 10% of men). If this is making your moral insides tingle in discomfort, just stop and think about it for a second:
 - How's it fair to you to close that door on yourself because of factors out of everyone's control?
 - How's it fair to her to deny her the opportunity of being with a better guy because "he called dibs on her first"?
 - How's it fair to the other guy if he's with a girl who COULD do better (i.e. you, when you improve past her boyfriend and you're still interested), and you know hypergamy is going to kick in at some point and she's either going to (1) leave him, or (2) they're going to have a crap relationship?

Of course, if you do improve enough that you could pull a girl from her boyfriend, you may find you can pull better than her anyway, so you may not be as interested at that point regardless. But the mentality is useful all the same. Either way, it's a win-win-win to view relationships this way. My dad taught me that very young and I ignored him, but I see the wisdom in it now: If you don't see a ring, she's on the market.

Seriously, think about that: she hasn't made a commitment to her boyfriend, nor he to her. They haven't promised to be with each other for life. They haven't promised, "I will not break up with you if someone better comes along." If they did have that promise, they'd literally be engaged at that point. Rings would be exchanged. If there is no ring, that commitment isn't there. If you're better and you come along, without the ring she has the right to upgrade.

5. LOOKING TOO EARLY

I have to distinguish here:

- You should ALWAYS be approaching. For more on that, I'll defer you to the principles in one of my older posts.
- HOWEVER, you shouldn't actually expect to find your wife as a result of these approaches. Don't bother "looking" until you're actually ready.

The goal of early approaching is just to have fun socializing and getting good at it. You can play around with number-closing as a goal if you want, but you don't even have to go that far. Just learning to talk to girls is valuable in itself - especially upgrading your confidence talking to attractive people. That applies to men too. Back in the day, my fear of talking to hot girls was associated with fear of sexual rejection. But I also had a fear of talking to highly attractive men, assuming they wouldn't want to hang out with "someone like me." What a useless mentality, especially for someone committed to improving (you are committed to that, right?). Learn to talk to attractive people, in general. This boosts your confidence all around.

But let's be real: if you're still 25%+ body fat, earning under $40k/yr, with a crappy wardrobe, no social skills, etc. - do you really think you're going to pull someone you think would make your ideal wife? Think of the best woman you could pull with stats like that (and be realistic). Now imagine yourself 50lbs lighter, muscular build, better financial portfolio, having learned social skills and developed your social circle, etc. - and now think of the best woman you could pull. You're shooting for all those things in your life, right? You're trying to improve, right? Why would you settle for the type of person you could pull now when you could make substantial gains first and then have a much, much better pool of people who would be interested in you?

Think about it this way: with your crappy stats you might be able to pull an HB6 if you compromise on some of your standards in other areas. With better stats, you might be able to pull a 9 (perhaps even a 10?) with similar compromise. Oooooooooor ... you could pull an HB6 or 7 without having to compromise on any of your other peripherals. Suddenly, instead of the semi-psychotic 6 who actually gave you the time of day, you've got a 6 (or even 7) who also happens to be an actual Christian (rather than the psycho girl who was LARPing in the church), takes her faith seriously, perfectly sane (for a ...), intelligent, no debt, possibly even a financial contributor, good mom-qualities, etc.

Right now you can pull the former. 6-12 months from now (longer if you dilly-dally about self-improvement) you can pull the latter.

- Yet for some reason guys keep saying with crappy stats how they're looking for a wife.

That's lunacy. Always practice game, but don't actually prioritize "looking" until you're at least as good as the girl you want to marry. Remember: women marry up, not down. Deal with it.

Caveat: Everything else I've ever written on why you shouldn't even been "looking" in the first place. Read my two sidebar posts on "how to find the girl you can't keep yourself from banging." More details there, especially the section, "How to find a wife (by not looking for one)." I stand by those posts to this day.

6. DOUBTING GOD

Lots of guys post Assurance of Salvation numbers below 10. Okay, we all have doubts every now and then. That's actually not a bad thing (longer conversation there, which I'll table for purposes of this post). But for a lot of guys, the reason is that they're on the fence about whether God is even good or has good thing sin store for them. They doubt Jeremiah 29:11 - "'For I have good plans for you,' says the Lord. 'Plans to prosper you and not to harm you.'" Yeah, that wasn't spoken to you individually, and context matters, and God created some people for humble purposes. Fine. But God still "works all things for the good of those who love him." That's a promise you can take to the bank (figuratively, not literal money; if you're into prosperity gospel garbage, go away unless you're here to learn your way out of it).

When people look at their sucky life and doubt God's goodness, I can't help but chuckle while shaking my head in disappointment.

- You screw up your physique, social life, time allocation, spiritual disciplines, etc. Your life sucks.
- But somehow God is to blame and his plans aren't good?

Get real. People like this aren't following God's plan in the first place. Our sidebar is already replete with biblical information to demonstrate that God does, in fact, want us to take care of our bodies, be good stewards of the finances he gave us, be disciplined in our pursuit of Christ and the work he gave us, managing our time appropriately, etc. Nobody actually doubts that these things are in the Bible (and much, much more that we discuss here). How can you claim God's plan for your life isn't good if you're not actually living in God's plan for your life yet?

Until you fix your physique, ability to love and relate with his people (i.e. social skills), become a good steward of your finances, and all those other things we try to get guys to work on, you are not in God's will for your life, and therefore you have no basis for saying that God isn't good or that his plan for you sucks. You are in rejection of God's plan, if you're like that, and that means YOUR plan for your life sucks, not God's.

7. NO MISSION

If you have no mission in life, you will never be satisfied with your life. Jesus gave you a mission. You can be satisfied with your own, but it won't get you very far in eternity. Better to adopt his so you're not only satisfied, but also building a foundation for eternity.

Guys who write OYSes ignoring mission or noting that they don't have a mission - especially if they've done several OYSes and haven't fixed this by now - are doomed to eternal failure. Even the secular guys eventually figure out that achieving their own mission isn't enough. I've talked to a number of TRP/MRP ECs and mods who have all adopted some form of spiritual pursuit (a lot turning to Christianity directly) because they realize there's got to be more to life than the silly things their own brains can come up with.

Mission matters. If your life sucks right now and you don't have a mission, that's why. Mission matters, nothing else. I'll defer to the barrage of other posts on the sidebar and in my post/comment history on this topic rather than belaboring the point here any further.

8. COVERT CONTRACTS

I've seen a number of guys complain about why other people won't treat them the way they want to be treated. In some regard, this is because you haven't earned the right to be treated that way yet. Look to the above and fix those things to deal with that.

Other times, the issue has a different cause: You never told them how you want to be treated. One guy recently posted an OYS complaining that his church friends didn't understand how bad he was hurting. He just assumed that it was their job to probe his mind and figure that out. That's a covert contract. If you want people to "get you" it's your responsibility to tell them who you are and what you're dealing with in life.

The problem is that most people take the "play it off" approach. They'll share their deepest fears and struggles, but they'll do so with a bold face. This is a defense mechanism, NOT the sign of a strong frame ... IF you're upset about their response, or lack thereof. Re-read that sentence. If you really don't care how they respond (which is part of a strong frame), then don't whine about it. If you DO care about them not reaching out and helping you the way you think they should, it's probably because you haven't communicated how deeply the issue is actually affecting you. Don't assume they'll get it. Don't have covert contracts with them. Be overt. Thinking that you're some "red pill guru" because you can talk about difficult issues with a straight face is a straight up lie you're telling yourself if you get butthurt about people's responses to you afterward.

CONCLUSION

Didn't make it to 10. Ran out of time. Suffice it to say, if you want to improve:

- First, get a mission and start pursuing it relentlessly. Consider EVERY angle that you can take in life to optimize this.
- Second, if you're not already in good shape, get there. This could be one of those extra "angles" for your mission - people will bend over backwards to help others who are fit.
- Third, stop DEERing or wasting time on stupid things, or misprioritizing your life. Re-read the first two bullets of this conclusion and let that be your focus for now.

When you've done at least that much, and your spiritual disciplines are in order (which should be part of the pathway to achieving your mission - if they're not, then your mission sucks), then you'll start to taste what it's like being within the bounds of God's plan for your life and you'll see that it's good. It may not be what you wanted for your life. It may also not be a high and noble earth-changing plan. But it will be good. Steven was stoned to death. That was God's plan for him. That was a suck plan, God. But it was good. Know why? Because that's what scattered the early wave of new converts across the globe, when persecution began, and his death brought the Gospel to many nations. It was good. Do you think anyone would have viewed him as a martyr or that people would have scattered if it was a random ugly fat guy who did nothing for God's Kingdom and only happened to show up to a few services every now and then who was stoned? Hah. No.

40

UPVOTES

Fixing Your OYS - Your Life Will Keep Sucking Until You Read and Apply This Post

31 January 2022 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

I've been reviewing some of the OYS on the discord and responding a bit more, now that I've had an interlude of time open up. Here are some lessons everyone should learn.

1. OVERWEIGHT

I get it. I like to eat as much as the next guy. I've struggled with weight all my life too. I just hit my post-RP high on weight this past December. January came around and I decided to do something about it. I started a #diet-reporting channel on the discord and post ever calorie that goes into my mouth, as well as every calorie of exercise I burn. Result? Over 15lbs down in 3 weeks, and counting. It's not that hard guys. Too many men want to pussyfoot around with complaints about their life while trying to hide their physical fitness problems by simply citing "5'10, 120kg," not saying anything else about their size, and hoping nobody else notices or does the conversion (it's over 260lbs, by the way).

Here's the advice I just gave two guys who had an obesity problem and both reported playing video games. I told them they must repeat this phrase back to me: "I promise I will not play another video game until I have bought a stationary bike. I will not play video games anymore unless I am also riding that bike and maintaining a minimum 10mph pace."

Know how I lost over 15lbs in 3 weeks? I'd literally have to 100% stop eating to maintain that same pace. My solution: I still cut my calories, but I just sit on the stationary bike for hours a day. Sometimes I'm working. Other times I'm playing video games with my son. When I'm chilling with my wife after the kids go to bed, either talking about life or watching Netflix, I'm on that bike. I refuse to allow myself certain life pleasures, like video games, unless I'm burning calories while I do it. No exceptions. I ate over 3,000 calories a few days ago but still hit my 5lbs/wk goal. Know why? I biked 51 miles and burned more than what I ate.

Two caveats:

- No, the bike (or if you prefer: treadmill) is not a substitute for your diet. You cannot maintain 2-4hrs on a stationary bike 5-7 days a week for the rest of your life. At some point you're going to reduce the cardio again. At that point you have two options: (1) make sure to keep your diet in check while you cardio-focus, or (2) eat normal, but be prepared to have this cardio-phase of life happening constantly throughout your life, even after you've hit your ideal weight; every time you creep 5-10lbs over your ideal, that's another 1-2 weeks of a sub-zero diet.
- No, you don't stop lifting. Realistically, I can only maintain this sub-zero diet for a month at a time before I have to take a week off to re-bulk. Can't lose my 275lb bench press max. So, you do the above for a month (i.e. 20+lbs lost), then take a week off to re-bulk and heavy lift (which you should also be lifting during your cardio-focus too, just not as much time-investment) in order to get your lifts back to where they were pre-cardio (you'll re-gain 5-7lbs), then hit another month sub-zero dieting. Trust me, after the first week, you don't even notice that you're dieting anymore.
 - The caveat to this second caveat is that if you're over 25% body fat, you just cardio until you're down to 25% before you try to do a "re-bulk lifting" session. You didn't have muscular bulk in the first place, so there's no "re" to do. Still work light lifting (2days/wk) into your routine, but hammer that cardio. Once you're 25% body fat, you can start hitting lifting much harder to make use of your size for quick easy lifting gains. Starting to lift when you're a twig is a lot harder than when you've got extra fat on you. Take advantage of that - and 25% is not ideal, but acceptable enough that you can scrape by in society without being a total embarrassment.

2. TIME-SINKS

So many guys in OYS are wasting their time. It's usually video games, porn, and social media. I noticed over a decade ago that my weight was directly correlated with how frequently I watched porn. Cut it out of my life entirely and I permanently lost roughly 50lbs that even in my peak-weight since then, I've never gained any of that back.

I already told you what to do about video games, so look above on that.

For social media, the same as above applies. Just promise to yourself: "I will not scroll Facebook/Instagram/Twitter/crazy blogs/etc. unless I'm burning calories while I do it." Even while I'm at work talking to clients - something that's actually a high-value, productive activity - I hop into my office conference room and pace laps. Other people recommend an under-the-desk treadmill and just go at it all work day with a standing desk. With all the time you're wasting on social media or other things, think of how much better your life would be if you either (1) burned calories while you did it, double-valuing your time, or (2) had extra non-cardio time to do more productive things in life because you've committed that you won't use social media while not burning calories.

3. PRIORITIES SUCK

One guy in his OYS talked about wanting to improve his fashion, but he was still overweight. Horrible idea. Let's break this down:

- If you buy a bunch of new clothes now, then lose a ton of weight and bulk up your chest size, you'll have wasted that money.
- By having the heavier-set clothes still in your wardrobe, you'll have more psychological lax to let yourself gain weight because you know you still have clothes to wear.
- If you wait to up your wardrobe until you have the body you want, you'll have extra motive to keep your body in that shape.
- Holding off also gives you an opportunity to save up in your budget to afford decent threads.

This type of mis-prioritization happens in other areas too, this is just an easy example. Think before you pick what you're going to start working on. Get feedback from other guys. Don't think a new slick pair of shoes is going to impress women enough to ignore your pot belly.

4. NO OTHER SINGLES

Do you know how many OYS I've read where someone complains, "Everyone I know is already paired up. The only singles I'm around are people I'm uninterested in." Seriously, if you don't have women crawling over you, it's because you suck in some way. It could be your physique, but even hot guys have trouble sometimes. Maybe his social game sucks. Maybe he has awful habits/quirks that he won't give up. Maybe he wastes his time on video games rather than socializing, even though he's good in social settings when he's there. Figure it out.

When someone complains that there are no singles in his area, here's my thought process:

- First, why do I care? Useless information. My guess is that most of these guys think it's useful because they want others to accept it as some sort of explanation or excuse to justify their frustrations with being single. That's literally half of the letters in DEER(ing). Stop doing that.
-

- Second, even if you're telling the truth and there are no singles in your social circle, your social circle sucks. Go make other friends.
- Third, most people who say this aren't being technically accurate. Literally every contact you have is married or engaged? Redefine "single" in your mind: If she doesn't have a ring, she's single. Options open up with this mentality. The mental box Christian guys put themselves in is pure lunacy. Trying to "honor her boyfriend's right (!?) to her" is something even feminists would find cringy. It's a sign of a weak frame. Guys who think this way presume that because of temporal happenstance (i.e. he got there first), somehow she shouldn't have the option of being with a better guy (i.e. you, if you keep improving; it's really NOT hard to become one of the top 10% of men). If this is making your moral insides tingle in discomfort, just stop and think about it for a second:
 - How's it fair to you to close that door on yourself because of factors out of everyone's control?
 - How's it fair to her to deny her the opportunity of being with a better guy because "he called dibs on her first"?
 - How's it fair to the other guy if he's with a girl who COULD do better (i.e. you, when you improve past her boyfriend and you're still interested), and you know hypergamy is going to kick in at some point and she's either going to (1) leave him, or (2) they're going to have a crap relationship?

Of course, if you do improve enough that you could pull a girl from her boyfriend, you may find you can pull better than her anyway, so you may not be as interested at that point regardless. But the mentality is useful all the same. Either way, it's a win-win-win to view relationships this way. My dad taught me that very young and I ignored him, but I see the wisdom in it now: If you don't see a ring, she's on the market.

Seriously, think about that: she hasn't made a commitment to her boyfriend, nor he to her. They haven't promised to be with each other for life. They haven't promised, "I will not break up with you if someone better comes along." If they did have that promise, they'd literally be engaged at that point. Rings would be exchanged. If there is no ring, that commitment isn't there. If you're better and you come along, without the ring she has the right to upgrade.

5. LOOKING TOO EARLY

I have to distinguish here:

- You should ALWAYS be approaching. For more on that, I'll defer you to the principles in one of my older posts.
- HOWEVER, you shouldn't actually expect to find your wife as a result of these approaches. Don't bother "looking" until you're actually ready.

The goal of early approaching is just to have fun socializing and getting good at it. You can play around with number-closing as a goal if you want, but you don't even have to go that far. Just learning to talk to girls is valuable in itself - especially upgrading your confidence talking to attractive people. That applies to men too. Back in the day, my fear of talking to hot girls was associated with fear of sexual rejection. But I also had a fear of talking to highly attractive men, assuming they wouldn't want to hang out with "someone like me." What a useless mentality, especially for someone committed to improving (you are committed to that, right?). Learn to talk to attractive people, in general. This boosts your confidence all around.

But let's be real: if you're still 25%+ body fat, earning under $40k/yr, with a crappy wardrobe, no social skills, etc. - do you really think you're going to pull someone you think would make your ideal wife? Think of the best woman you could pull with stats like that (and be realistic). Now imagine yourself 50lbs lighter, muscular build, better financial portfolio, having learned social skills and developed your social circle, etc. - and now think of the best woman you could pull. You're shooting for all those things in your life, right? You're trying to improve, right? Why would you settle for the type of person you could pull now when you could make substantial gains first and then have a much, much better pool of people who would be interested in you?

Think about it this way: with your crappy stats you might be able to pull an HB6 if you compromise on some of your standards in other areas. With better stats, you might be able to pull a 9 (perhaps even a 10?) with similar compromise. Oooooooooor ... you could pull an HB6 or 7 without having to compromise on any of your other peripherals. Suddenly, instead of the semi-psychotic 6 who actually gave you the time of day, you've got a 6 (or even 7) who also happens to be an actual Christian (rather than the psycho girl who was LARPing in the church), takes her faith seriously, perfectly sane (for a ...), intelligent, no debt, possibly even a financial contributor, good mom-qualities, etc.

Right now you can pull the former. 6-12 months from now (longer if you dilly-dally about self-improvement) you can pull the latter.

- Yet for some reason guys keep saying with crappy stats how they're looking for a wife.

That's lunacy. Always practice game, but don't actually prioritize "looking" until you're at least as good as the girl you want to marry. Remember: women marry up, not down. Deal with it.

Caveat: Everything else I've ever written on why you shouldn't even been "looking" in the first place. Read my two sidebar posts on "how to find the girl you can't keep yourself from banging." More details there, especially the section, "How to find a wife (by not looking for one)." I stand by those posts to this day.

6. DOUBTING GOD

Lots of guys post Assurance of Salvation numbers below 10. Okay, we all have doubts every now and then. That's actually not a bad thing (longer conversation there, which I'll table for purposes of this post). But for a lot of guys, the reason is that they're on the fence about whether God is even good or has good thing sin store for them. They doubt Jeremiah 29:11 - "'For I have good plans for you,' says the Lord. 'Plans to prosper you and not to harm you.'" Yeah, that wasn't spoken to you individually, and context matters, and God created some people for humble purposes. Fine. But God still "works all things for the good of those who love him." That's a promise you can take to the bank (figuratively, not literal money; if you're into prosperity gospel garbage, go away unless you're here to learn your way out of it).

When people look at their sucky life and doubt God's goodness, I can't help but chuckle while shaking my head in disappointment.

- You screw up your physique, social life, time allocation, spiritual disciplines, etc. Your life sucks.
- But somehow God is to blame and his plans aren't good?

Get real. People like this aren't following God's plan in the first place. Our sidebar is already replete with biblical information to demonstrate that God does, in fact, want us to take care of our bodies, be good stewards of the finances he gave us, be disciplined in our pursuit of Christ and the work he gave us, managing our time appropriately, etc. Nobody actually doubts that these things are in the Bible (and much, much more that we discuss here). How can you claim God's plan for your life isn't good if you're not actually living in God's plan for your life yet?

Until you fix your physique, ability to love and relate with his people (i.e. social skills), become a good steward of your finances, and all those other things we try to get guys to work on, you are not in God's will for your life, and therefore you have no basis for saying that God isn't good or that his plan for you sucks. You are in rejection of God's plan, if you're like that, and that means YOUR plan for your life sucks, not God's.

7. NO MISSION

If you have no mission in life, you will never be satisfied with your life. Jesus gave you a mission. You can be satisfied with your own, but it won't get you very far in eternity. Better to adopt his so you're not only satisfied, but also building a foundation for eternity.

Guys who write OYSes ignoring mission or noting that they don't have a mission - especially if they've done several OYSes and haven't fixed this by now - are doomed to eternal failure. Even the secular guys eventually figure out that achieving their own mission isn't enough. I've talked to a number of TRP/MRP ECs and mods who have all adopted some form of spiritual pursuit (a lot turning to Christianity directly) because they realize there's got to be more to life than the silly things their own brains can come up with.

Mission matters. If your life sucks right now and you don't have a mission, that's why. Mission matters, nothing else. I'll defer to the barrage of other posts on the sidebar and in my post/comment history on this topic rather than belaboring the point here any further.

8. COVERT CONTRACTS

I've seen a number of guys complain about why other people won't treat them the way they want to be treated. In some regard, this is because you haven't earned the right to be treated that way yet. Look to the above and fix those things to deal with that.

Other times, the issue has a different cause: You never told them how you want to be treated. One guy recently posted an OYS complaining that his church friends didn't understand how bad he was hurting. He just assumed that it was their job to probe his mind and figure that out. That's a covert contract. If you want people to "get you" it's your responsibility to tell them who you are and what you're dealing with in life.

The problem is that most people take the "play it off" approach. They'll share their deepest fears and struggles, but they'll do so with a bold face. This is a defense mechanism, NOT the sign of a strong frame ... IF you're upset about their response, or lack thereof. Re-read that sentence. If you really don't care how they respond (which is part of a strong frame), then don't whine about it. If you DO care about them not reaching out and helping you the way you think they should, it's probably because you haven't communicated how deeply the issue is actually affecting you. Don't assume they'll get it. Don't have covert contracts with them. Be overt. Thinking that you're some "red pill guru" because you can talk about difficult issues with a straight face is a straight up lie you're telling yourself if you get butthurt about people's responses to you afterward.

9. NO OYS AT ALL

Some guys love to complain about how their life sucks, or ask questions about these "tricky" (read: completely normal to everyone else) situations they find themselves in, but they're not even posting OYSes at all. I get it, not everyone has time to be engaged. Are you actually at least going over this type of content regularly with someone else in your personal life?

I have a number of men who I address these things with verbally - at least every other week, often-times more than that. But I still post the monthly OYS in the discord. Why? Because OYS matters.

If you're not constantly self-evaluating, you will never actually improve. If you're not doing it in a context where other men can help you, you'll be stunted by your own narrow-sightedness in how far you can improve and in which directions. Simply put, if you don't post or discuss these types of things for others to engage with (and no, the "tell us how your week went" at small group does NOT count), then you have no business coming here complaining or asking questions about why your life sucks because I can tell you the answer in one second: "No OYS."

CONCLUSION

Didn't make it to 10. Ran out of time. Suffice it to say, if you want to improve:

- First, get a mission and start pursuing it relentlessly. Consider EVERY angle that you can take in life to optimize this. Post about it in OYS and discuss with others.
- Second, if you're not already in good shape, get there. This could be one of those extra "angles" for your mission - people will bend over backwards to help others who are fit.
- Third, stop DEERing or wasting time on stupid things, or misprioritizing your life. Re-read the first two bullets of this conclusion and let that be your focus for now.

When you've done at least that much, and your spiritual disciplines are in order (which should be part of the pathway to achieving your mission - if they're not, then your mission sucks), then you'll start to taste what it's like being within the bounds of God's plan for your life and you'll see that it's good. It may not be what you wanted for your life. It may also not be a high and noble earth-changing plan. But it will be good. Steven was stoned to death. That was God's plan for him. That was a suck plan, God. But it was good. Know why? Because that's what scattered the early wave of new converts across the globe, when persecution began, and his death brought the Gospel to many nations. It was good. Do you think anyone would have viewed him as a martyr or that people would have scattered if it was a random ugly fat guy who did nothing for God's Kingdom and only happened to show up to a few services every now and then who was stoned? Hah. No.

Abundance Fatigue and "The Meaning of Life"

23 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

I've observed that abundance isn't always the blessing people expect, but is perhaps sometimes the one they need. Let's be clear up-front:

- Abundance Mentality is when you live your life in a way as if you have abundance, whether you do or not.
- Actual Abundance is the fact behind the mentality. You either have it or you don't.

Let's briefly look at 3 mistakes people make when improperly balancing these two in their lives.

Over-Confidence

Some people have an abundance mentality without actual abundance. This can be good and bad. On the "good" side, I like the "fake it 'til you make it" concept. This works marvelously ... as long as you actually make it and you're not just faking it all your life, which just cripples your frame. A guy who acts as if he already has the thing he wants will find it much easier to attain it "again" - especially when it comes to sexual dynamics.

On the "bad" side, I'm reminded of the saying: "Before you attempt to beat the odds, be sure you could survive the odds beating you." Some men play the abundance mentality or other confidence-techniques in ways they're not ready for, and when it doesn't work, they find themselves turning to the black pill, thinking the "abundance mentality" concept failed them in one set of circumstances, so it must be a failure in all, so they just give up and assume looks are all that matter.

Broken Confidence

The consequence of failed over-confidence reminds me of circus elephants. Did you know an elephant in the circus (before PITA put the kibosh on all that) could be tied to a 3ft stake in the ground and it will not escape? It could easily rip it out. In fact, if you take a wild elephant and tie it to that same 3ft stake, it'll rip it right out. Why doesn't the circus elephant? Because when it was a baby, it was tied to that same stake. It tugged and pulled and stretched at its rope with no luck. Eventually it just gave up. When it grew and developed the strength and ability to rip the stake out, it wouldn't - because its confidence was broken.

That same danger exists with sexual dynamics both inside the home and out. I remember in my own past being denied sex and thinking under similar situations even years and years later, "She said no in these circumstances last time, so she'll say no again," so I didn't even bother trying. This self-defeatist attitude wasn't helping me ... or her. Or anyone. It just made the world a sucky place to live in. Even shortly after I had just-cause for initiation-confidence and could have had an actual abundance of sex, I didn't believe it was real, so my lack of abundance mentality put the kibosh on my sexuality as hard as PITA did to the circus elephants. Goodbye, poor circus elephants. We miss you.

"Just a little bit more."

All of that leads us to the very real situation of a person with actual abundance, but no abundance mentality. Shockingly, one would think the former would produce the latter, but it often doesn't. I remember reading a quote about John D. Rockefeller, who at one point had 1% of the entire US economy as his net wealth. Insane. A reporter asked him, "How much money is enough?" His answer: "Just a little bit more."

Now, I fully expect Rockefeller had an abundance mentality to go with his unquenchable thirst. But many guys will actually let their quest for abundance control them to a point where they are never satisfied and it creates a scarcity mentality, despite being in the SMP equivalent range of a Rockefeller. I've met guys like this. Sometimes ONEitis is the culprit - because they can have any girl they want, except that one who he met before he became "all that."

Abundance and Hypergamy

Women have actual abundance. For the most part any girl who's a 4 or higher could probably walk into a bar and announce, "Who wants to have sex with me?" and someone in the bar would be willing to take her up on that offer (barring circumstances that might get in his way). Girls on dating websites have a plethora of male attention - even the ugly ones. On social media, guys will rush to a woman's defense or disproportionately respond to women's posts over men's. I don't need to prove this point, right? We have all seen it.

But let me tell you - 99% of those women, when they were barely pubescent, still got flutters in their stomach at the first guy or two who showed any actual interest in them. Why? Because they hadn't been emotionally inoculated yet.

That same young girl, no doubt, maintained a steady stream of attention from men for years. It may not have always been the attention she wanted, but it was attention nonetheless. This is where hypergamy is born. The constant stream of attention makes the drug ineffective, hence inoculation. Pharmacists are noticing this with the z-pak with bacterial infections. The z-pak has become so over-used that many strains of bacteria have become immune to it, so they have to create stronger antibiotics. When a woman has been inoculated to low-brow attention from men, she needs a stronger, more powerful hit. That means a higher value man. Instead of getting flutters when the 5 gives her attention, she then needs the 6 ... then the 7, and so on. Non-hypergamous men are willing to give them that attention because "the chance of sex is still the chance of sex." Does he intend to marry her? Probably not. She won't get the commitment she seeks. but the sexual attention she craves is coming - and from higher than her market value would account for.

Even if a woman manages to get a ring from the highest-value man in her social sphere, over time she will become inoculated to even his affection and begin to look elsewhere. At this point, lateral moves are a viable option, even in the absence of upward potential ... ergo "branch swinging." This is why there's a V in DEVI. As I assume /u/hornsofapathy would tell you, there's often value in integrating sexual dynamics outside the bedroom just as much as in it. One of my solutions to this problem is to constantly expand my playbook of ways to keep life/sex/"the relationship" (whatever that means) interesting rather than stale. New "tricks of the trade" create new flutters.

Abundance Fatigue

The way women become inoculated to male attention can happen to men with actual sexuality as well. The only difference is that women tend to look up (hypergamy) for a bigger dose, whereas most men I've met tend to look down. They get depressed and nihilistic. Most of these guys had made sex out to be their god, violating the third commandment of poon - "You shall make your mission, not your woman, your priority." For reasons I won't go into here, I'm persuaded that at least in monogamous relationships, making sex from her your priority de facto makes her your priority, even if because of whatever "blah blah red pill blah blah" you don't get sex from her the way she thinks she wants it.

But this applies to non-monogamous relationships too. I remember a post from a TRP Endorsed Contributor who had essentially "mastered" sexual strategy and had such great abundance - both actual and in mentality - that he, theoretically, could have sex whenever he wanted. The story initially reads like a success story on how effective the red pill is ... until you get to the end and find out that actual abundance turned him nihilistic and horrified.

I'll call this "abundance fatigue." It's when a person experiences abundance to such a degree that he no longer values the thing he now has in abundance.

A bite of chocolate cake is delicious. I have no use for having 12 chocolate cakes in my kitchen. This is why restaurants will sell you a slice of pie for $9, or the whole pie for $15 (although there are other aspects of business psychology in there too).

Imagine a meteor shower hit earth raining gold from the sky all over the world. What do you think that would do to the value of gold? Is it going to go up? Stay the same? Of course not. It would plummet. Because when you have more of something than you actually need or care to have, its value diminishes.

Wisdom From Solomon

King Solomon was wise enough that even atheists will quote him. He was famous for having 700 wives and 300 concubines. Crazy. That's a new woman a day for 3-ish years (though, let's face it, it was probably multiple a day, likely even at a time). Yet he writes:

I amassed silver and gold for myself, and the treasure of kings and provinces. I acquired male and female singers, and a harem as well - the delights of a man's heart. I became greater by far than anyone in Jerusalem before me.

Then he says, fascinatingly:

In all this my wisdom stayed with me.

What cocky arrogance. I love it. Not only did he have a harem of 1000-ish women, but he was never mentally consumed by all of it. He goes on:

I denied myself nothing my eyes desired; I refused my heart no pleasure

My heart took delight in all my labor, and this was the reward for all my toil.

Yet when I surveyed all that my hands had done and what I had toiled to achieve, everything was meaningless, a chasing after the wind; nothing was gained under the sun. (from Ecclesiastes 2)

Solomon spends quite some time after this on his diatribe toward the meaning of life, but I won't get into that here. The point is simple: even the wisest man in the world realized the nihilistic end of such pursuits.

This Isn't So Bad

Abundance fatigue can be depressing - to realize that everything you hoped and strived for all this time isn't all it's cracked up to be when you're swimming in it.

But that's actually okay. The reality is that abundance fatigue is usually associated with men who haven't actually "killed the blue." I remember Rollo writing in one of his posts that some men like to take blue pill notions and "sprinkle a little red on it." Some guys get REALLY good at sprinkling so much red that they look pretty doggone red. But when they end up nihilistic because mass-sex didn't fulfill them the way they'd hoped, it's clear that they were still living in their blue pill fantasy world and needed something more. I once wrote a post about Killing the Blue - and if I were to re-write it today, I'd have a lot more to add, but one that stands out in this context is the blue pill notion that "women can fulfill us" - even if "women" is an indirect way of saying "sex."

I remember in my early days of having discovered the red pill, I was sex-starved. Constant denials. Sex was once every few months, if-that. We went as long as 18 months with squat (and not the kind you do in the gym). I had in my mind, reading MMSLP for the first time, that by the time I was done, I'd be having sex multiple times a day. And yeah, we got there. Once I realized I had achieved actual abundance - that sex was available whenever I wanted

... I no longer wanted it as much as I thought. I cared more about quality than quantity. It's the same with fasting. I remember fasting for an entire week once. When it was over, I thought about all the foods I would eat. We went to a buffet. I filled my plate and sat down. A few bites in, I was done. Why? Because my actual appetite was nowhere near as big as I thought it was when I was starving. Different people will have different thresholds, but I'd wager every guy here will have a point where he realizes, "X is enough sex."

Back to Poon - "You shall make your mission, not your woman, your priority."

Becoming nihilistic from life due to an over-abundance of many good things is cured simply by finding something more valuable to spend your time on than accumulating that which will ultimately disappoint.

If you bother to read the rest of the book of Ecclesiastes, by chapter 12 you'll find that Solomon figured out what he believed to be the meaning of life. You need to figure that out for yourself and then pursue it.

Abundance Fatigue and "The Meaning of Life"

23 February 2022 · r/MarriedRedPill · Archived copy · Reddit

I've observed that abundance isn't always the blessing people expect, but is perhaps sometimes the one they need. Let's be clear up-front:

- Abundance Mentality is when you live your life in a way as if you have abundance, whether you do or not.
- Actual Abundance is the fact behind the mentality. You either have it or you don't.

Let's briefly look at 3 mistakes people make when improperly balancing these two in their lives.

Over-Confidence

Some people have an abundance mentality without actual abundance. This can be good and bad. On the "good" side, I like the "fake it 'til you make it" concept. This works marvelously ... as long as you actually make it and you're not just faking it all your life, which just cripples your frame. A guy who acts as if he already has the thing he wants will find it much easier to attain it "again" - especially when it comes to sexual dynamics.

On the "bad" side, I'm reminded of the saying: "Before you attempt to beat the odds, be sure you could survive the odds beating you." Some men play the abundance mentality or other confidence-techniques in ways they're not ready for, and when it doesn't work, they find themselves turning to the black pill, thinking the "abundance mentality" concept failed them in one set of circumstances, so it must be a failure in all, so they just give up and assume looks are all that matter.

Broken Confidence

The consequence of failed over-confidence reminds me of circus elephants. Did you know an elephant in the circus (before PITA put the kibosh on all that) could be tied to a 3ft stake in the ground and it will not escape? It could easily rip it out. In fact, if you take a wild elephant and tie it to that same 3ft stake, it'll rip it right out. Why doesn't the circus elephant? Because when it was a baby, it was tied to that same stake. It tugged and pulled and stretched at its rope with no luck. Eventually it just gave up. When it grew and developed the strength and ability to rip the stake out, it wouldn't - because its confidence was broken.

That same danger exists with sexual dynamics both inside the home and out. I remember in my own past being denied sex and thinking under similar situations even years and years later, "She said no in these circumstances last time, so she'll say no again," so I didn't even bother trying. This self-defeatist attitude wasn't helping me ... or her. Or anyone. It just made the world a sucky place to live in. Even shortly after I had just-cause for initiation-confidence and could have had an actual abundance of sex, I didn't believe it was real, so my lack of abundance mentality put the kibosh on my sexuality as hard as PITA did to the circus elephants. Goodbye, poor circus elephants. We miss you.

"Just a little bit more."

All of that leads us to the very real situation of a person with actual abundance, but no abundance mentality. Shockingly, one would think the former would produce the latter, but it often doesn't. I remember reading a quote about John D. Rockefeller, who at one point had 1% of the entire US economy as his net wealth. Insane. A reporter asked him, "How much money is enough?" His answer: "Just a little bit more."

Now, I fully expect Rockefeller had an abundance mentality to go with his unquenchable thirst. But many guys will actually let their quest for abundance control them to a point where they are never satisfied and it creates a scarcity mentality, despite being in the SMP equivalent range of a Rockefeller. I've met guys like this. Sometimes ONEitis is the culprit - because they can have any girl they want, except that one who he met before he became "all that."

Abundance and Hypergamy

Women have actual abundance. For the most part any girl who's a 4 or higher could probably walk into a bar and announce, "Who wants to have sex with me?" and someone in the bar would be willing to take her up on that offer (barring circumstances that might get in his way). Girls on dating websites have a plethora of male attention - even the ugly ones. On social media, guys will rush to a woman's defense or disproportionately respond to women's posts over men's. I don't need to prove this point, right? We have all seen it.

But let me tell you - 99% of those women, when they were barely pubescent, still got flutters in their stomach at the first guy or two who showed any actual interest in them. Why? Because they hadn't been emotionally inoculated yet.

That same young girl, no doubt, maintained a steady stream of attention from men for years. It may not have always been the attention she wanted, but it was attention nonetheless. This is where hypergamy is born. The constant stream of attention makes the drug ineffective, hence inoculation. Pharmacists are noticing this with the z-pak with bacterial infections. The z-pak has become so over-used that many strains of bacteria have become immune to it, so they have to create stronger antibiotics. When a woman has been inoculated to low-brow attention from men, she needs a stronger, more powerful hit. That means a higher value man. Instead of getting flutters when the 5 gives her attention, she then needs the 6 ... then the 7, and so on. Non-hypergamous men are willing to give them that attention because "the chance of sex is still the chance of sex." Does he intend to marry her? Probably not. She won't get the commitment she seeks. but the sexual attention she craves is coming - and from higher than her market value would account for.

Even if a woman manages to get a ring from the highest-value man in her social sphere, over time she will become inoculated to even his affection and begin to look elsewhere. At this point, lateral moves are a viable option, even in the absence of upward potential ... ergo "branch swinging." This is why there's a V in DEVI. As I assume /u/hornsofapathy would tell you, there's often value in integrating sexual dynamics outside the bedroom just as much as in it. One of my solutions to this problem is to constantly expand my playbook of ways to keep life/sex/"the relationship" (whatever that means) interesting rather than stale. New "tricks of the trade" create new flutters.

Abundance Fatigue

The way women become inoculated to male attention can happen to men with actual sexuality as well. The only difference is that women tend to look up (hypergamy) for a bigger dose, whereas most men I've met tend to look down. They get depressed and nihilistic. Most of these guys had made sex out to be their god, violating the third commandment of poon - "You shall make your mission, not your woman, your priority." For reasons I won't go into here, I'm persuaded that at least in monogamous relationships, making sex from her your priority de facto makes her your priority, even if because of whatever "blah blah red pill blah blah" you don't get sex from her the way she thinks she wants it.

But this applies to non-monogamous relationships too. I remember a post from a TRP Endorsed Contributor who had essentially "mastered" sexual strategy and had such great abundance - both actual and in mentality - that he, theoretically, could have sex whenever he wanted. The story initially reads like a success story on how effective the red pill is ... until you get to the end and find out that actual abundance turned him nihilistic and horrified.

I'll call this "abundance fatigue." It's when a person experiences abundance to such a degree that he no longer values the thing he now has in abundance.

A bite of chocolate cake is delicious. I have no use for having 12 chocolate cakes in my kitchen. This is why restaurants will sell you a slice of pie for $9, or the whole pie for $15 (although there are other aspects of business psychology in there too).

Imagine a meteor shower hit earth raining gold from the sky all over the world. What do you think that would do to the value of gold? Is it going to go up? Stay the same? Of course not. It would plummet. Because when you have more of something than you actually need or care to have, its value diminishes.

Wisdom From Solomon

King Solomon was wise enough that even atheists will quote him. He was famous for having 700 wives and 300 concubines. Crazy. That's a new woman a day for 3-ish years (though, let's face it, it was probably multiple a day, likely even at a time). Yet he writes:

I amassed silver and gold for myself, and the treasure of kings and provinces. I acquired male and female singers, and a harem as well - the delights of a man's heart. I became greater by far than anyone in Jerusalem before me.

Then he says, fascinatingly:

In all this my wisdom stayed with me.

What cocky arrogance. I love it. Not only did he have a harem of 1000-ish women, but he was never mentally consumed by all of it. He goes on:

I denied myself nothing my eyes desired; I refused my heart no pleasure

My heart took delight in all my labor, and this was the reward for all my toil.

Yet when I surveyed all that my hands had done and what I had toiled to achieve, everything was meaningless, a chasing after the wind; nothing was gained under the sun. (from Ecclesiastes 2)

Solomon spends quite some time after this on his diatribe toward the meaning of life, but I won't get into that here. The point is simple: even the wisest man in the world realized the nihilistic end of such pursuits.

This Isn't So Bad

Abundance fatigue can be depressing - to realize that everything you hoped and strived for all this time isn't all it's cracked up to be when you're swimming in it.

But that's actually okay. The reality is that abundance fatigue is usually associated with men who haven't actually "killed the blue." I remember Rollo writing in one of his posts that some men like to take blue pill notions and "sprinkle a little red on it." Some guys get REALLY good at sprinkling so much red that they look pretty doggone red. But when they end up nihilistic because mass-sex didn't fulfill them the way they'd hoped, it's clear that they were still living in their blue pill fantasy world and needed something more. I once wrote a post about Killing the Blue - and if I were to re-write it today, I'd have a lot more to add, but one that stands out in this context is the blue pill notion that "women can fulfill us" - even if "women" is an indirect way of saying "sex."

I remember in my early days of having discovered the red pill, I was sex-starved. Constant denials. Sex was once every few months, if-that. We went as long as 18 months with squat (and not the kind you do in the gym). I had in my mind, reading MMSLP for the first time, that by the time I was done, I'd be having sex multiple times a day. And yeah, we got there. Once I realized I had achieved actual abundance - that sex was available whenever I wanted

... I no longer wanted it as much as I thought. I cared more about quality than quantity. It's the same with fasting. I remember fasting for an entire week once. When it was over, I thought about all the foods I would eat. We went to a buffet. I filled my plate and sat down. A few bites in, I was done. Why? Because my actual appetite was nowhere near as big as I thought it was when I was starving. Different people will have different thresholds, but I'd wager every guy here will have a point where he realizes, "X is enough sex."

Back to Poon - "You shall make your mission, not your woman, your priority."

Becoming nihilistic from life due to an over-abundance of many good things is cured simply by finding something more valuable to spend your time on than accumulating that which will ultimately disappoint.

If you bother to read the rest of the book of Ecclesiastes, by chapter 12 you'll find that Solomon figured out what he believed to be the meaning of life. You need to figure that out for yourself and then pursue it.

Basic "2-2 Dinner Party" Social Skills

25 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

This one's for all you social auti--s out there. Some of this may seem overly basic, but I can think of at least 7 people off the top of my head who would benefit from at least a few of these - and every one of them is relevant for at least one of those people. I'm sure others are in that same boat, even beyond my 7, so here goes.

Social influence is one of the most valuable domains to keep a mastery on. Over the years I've gotten a number of questions about conversational strategy and social skills, as it's one of my strengths. There's a lot of different sub-groups within the broader category of "social influence," though.

Take cold approaches, for example. /u/TheChristianAlpha is probably the best I've ever seen at this, in-person. I randomly took him to dinner and half way through he had our waitress sitting at our table in tears as he's telling her how Jesus is the best solution to her life troubles. I thought I was great at cold approaches. He put me to shame.

Then there are group gatherings, professional functions, public events, and the like - all which require unique (though often overlapping) sets of skills, depending on your goals for the situation. Do you just want to have fun? Are you trying to build a relationship with someone in particular? Are you just trying to meet new people, generally? Are you trying to teach someone in your group a personal lesson or model a skill or trait for them? There are all kinds of goals you can have, and those should and will affect how you approach your time.

I have a dinner party with a new couple this weekend, and someone else asked about a similar situation (having another couple over for dinner) recently as well, so I'm going to stick with the dinner party context and assume the goal is simple: make new friends. What I do with that friendship later is a separate goal. For right now let's just make sure things go off without a hitch.

10 Dinner Party Tips

1 - Practice "Mayor Game"

Rather than going in crazy depth here, I'll defer a lot to Jacktenofhearts' comment here. Obviously it's a bit different because a two-couple dinner party is not a mass social outing. But in our context it will mean engaging in small talk, even if you don't care what it is. This small talk will be filtered throughout the evening between larger topics, which we'll get to later. The utility of your mayor game here is to make people feel like they're having a good time through subtle (or, on lesser occasion, overt) supportive gestures rather than trying to push an agenda for yourself. You are pushing your own agenda: "make new friends" and "advance my social network." The mayor benefits from mayor game. But he does it in a way that looks like you're the one benefiting from him. That's why he's so doggone popular.

2 - Don't Dominate

Yeah, I know all you alpha-wannabes think dominating is everything. Domination is a tool. 2-2 dinner dates where you're just trying to build rapport with someone aren't necessarily the best situation for that tool. Domination is great for building sexual attraction with women or respect from men in male-only spaces, but when you put yourself in front of another married couple, the dynamic needs shift away from brute domination toward charm. Mayor game is also highly relevant here.

The mayor isn't dominating the conversation. He's its catalyst. I like to think of my conversational style at 2-2 dinner parties as if I'm pushing one of my kids on a swing. They're the one on the swing, not me. It's not about me. At first, I may have to push several times to get her going, some hard pushes even. But once she's got momentum, it's just a few light taps here and there to keep her from slowing down. If I look away too long and she slows down too much, I push hard again, but it only takes one good push that time. In the end, my daughter had a great time and I didn't have to do much. She gets off the swing and is smitten with what a great time she had with me.

3 - Don't expect help

If I insisted that I be the one on the swing (i.e. dominated the activity) and that they should be priming the conversation for me to enjoy, I'll end up sorely disappointed. Why? Because my 4yr old isn't strong enough to push me on the swing. Even my 10yr old couldn't push me very high. I'm the strong one, not them. Your dinner guests may actually be better conversationalists than you - and if so, that's great. But don't expect it. I used to expect it and it backfired often. Go in expecting that they are conversationally weak and immature. You will be less disappointed and more on your game that way.

4 - Use your wife

She's there to help. Let her help. If she is sidelined in the conversation, (a) she's going to be upset afterward because of your crappy leadership, and why bring those tests and burdens on yourself? But more significantly: (b) your guests will notice and it will affect how they feel about YOU. They came to see both of you, not just you (in most cases). One of my common strategies is the "Have you met Ted?" play from How I Met Your Mother. I introduce a topic, put my wife on the spot (sometimes awkwardly, for hilarity) and say, "You've got a good story on that, babe. Why don't you tell them?" (if I know she actually does) or, "Honey, what do you think of that?" (if I'm being more general). This form of enabling someone else in the conversation is the best way to play mayor game in small settings, priming conversations without dominating them.

5 - Ask lots of questions

The goal is getting to know them and building a relationship. Excellent. Best way to do that is to speak with other people on their terms about things they enjoy. If they, on their own, raise a topic of interest to you, by all means: engage. Share your own thoughts. But always end what you say with a question. Whenever you talk, you should finish your portion of the conversation in one of two ways:

- You slowed down your speech enough, winding down your thought, that they cut you off with their own thoughts (ideal)
- They didn't cut you off, so you ask a question to pass the ball

6 - Avoid Awkward Silences

If you finish talking and one of the two above things hasn't happened, the ball is still in your hands. More accurately: the ball is rolling around on the floor without anyone picking it up, and because you're the last one who had it, it's your fumble. If it's not a natural transfer, asking a question passes it. Even if no one answers, instead of you fumbling, it's them failing to catch it. Sure, it can still be a bad pass if you asked a dumb question, but something is better than nothing. Without a question, you haven't passed the ball. It's still your ball.

They may break the awkward silence and steal it from you, but then the impression is: "This is boring. He's just holding the ball. I don't like boring, so I'll grab it and do something." To be fair, I LOVE awkward silences. They're great learning and teaching tools. But not when my goal is to get to know someone or build a relationship. Awkward silences are better when you're leading a small group/Bible study/class/discipleship meeting/etc. Use the right tool in the right context. A first dinner party is not the proper context for the awkward silence tool.

7 - One Big Topic, One Backup

Not 5. Not 0. One or two. Your guests may have big topics too, but (per no. 3) don't expect their help. Big topics are things you know the group can spend 30+ minutes talking about before changing subjects again. This is hardest with new people. If I were chatting with one of you all, I know I can bring up anything red pill and we can go off for a while. With someone like /u/praexology, I can mention the topic of behavioral study and we're good for 30+ minutes. With my friend Ryan, it's home repair. With John, it's church discipleship. Big topics must be something you're either fluent in, or where you can fake fluency reasonably well. Ideally, your big topic will be something personally relevant for them. For example, if the person's dad is dying of cancer, ask about that and let that spawn big-topic ideas for conversation.

If you are really struggling for big topic ideas, just ask yourself, "What is everyone on the internet posting about?" If it's Ukraine/Russia, you can go with that. If it's some new BLM outrage, use that one. If it's a celebrity doing something absurd, that's another. The pop-event is not the topic. The philosophical questions and issues the event raises are your big topic.

Example: With Ukraine/Russia, I'd be asking questions like:

- Countries used to war all the time, but our wars lately have been against small factions, not whole nations. Have we really evolved as a people or did we just become complacent in a few decades of general world peace?
- Is there biblical merit to the idea of one nation conquering another in a post-Gospel world where we are citizens of a spiritual Kingdom before any physical one?
- To what extent should Christians actually get concerned with political issues like this?
- Should the US intervene at all? Or is it better to let other nations figure out their own problems?

Notice how these are all questions. You will have opportunity to share your views, but not until after you let them share theirs first. The reason is no. 8, below.

The goal of your "one big topic" is to make the other people feel like you actually discussed something of substance rather than lots of small talk before going home. You need the small-talk too. Small-talk matters, especially when it's, "What's been going on in your life lately?" Showing them that you actually care about who they are and what they're experiencing matters. If you only care about their opinions on subjects, but not their own life experience, you will have an obvious gaping hole in the "get to know you" aspect of the relationship. But don't neglect the big-issues that will drive conversation through the evening too.

Put another way: small-talk lets you know what's happening in their life. Big topics let you know who they are as people. How you handle the "big topic" and which topic you selected is vital to them feeling like a relationship is being built. That's the topic that will make them go home and think, "We really got to know them." Without a big topic they will think on the drive home, "That was decent chit chat" and they won't give you a second thought.

8 - Read the Room

The first 20 minutes your guests are over are the prime opportunity to assess who they are. You'll be able to tell if the guy is passive or dominant. You can figure out if the wife runs the show or if she's a biblical helper. You can assess whether they are neat or sloppy. You'll pick up things about their lingo and style of speech. You'll figure out if they're socially competent or inept. Most importantly, you can use all of this information to assess what's safe to discuss and not. Trying to red knight the new co-worker and his wife on the first dinner date you have with him is ... not smart.

Remember, you have a goal: build a relationship/get to know them. Saying something that completely offends them is counter-productive to that goal, even if it happens to be true. AFTER the relationship is well-established, you will have room to say offensive/unsafe things and they won't care. But if they're at all like 99% of the world, you will not be given that level of respect up-front. You'll have to gauge their body language, facial expressions, times when they forcibly derail the conversation (especially if it's unnatural to the natural flow).

Another big aspect of reading the room is gauging how well they're responding to the things you're saying and doing. The reason you often want to ask questions about their views before sharing your own is not only because it (a) creates the trust necessary to get away with sharing some of your more "unpopular" views and opinions, but also (b) gives you valuable information about where they're coming from so you can present your "unpopular" views and opinions in a more palatable way, without compromising your goals for the evening. If while you're reading the room you notice that you're cutting them off more than they're cutting you off, you're not asking enough questions and they're going to feeeel disengaged with the conversation, even if they are actually engaging. From there, part of reading the room also means ...

9 - Avoid Taboo Topics

... until the relationship/respect is established well-enough that you know you can pull it off. I've already hinted at this, so I won't go too much more in-depth here. Suffice it to say: power-playing a taboo topic just to see how someone responds is fun. It's a useful skill to have. But as with awkward silences, taboo topics are the wrong tool for early-stage "get to know you" dinners.

10 - Think Beyond the Conversation

Are their glasses empty? Ask if they need more to drink. Did they eat everything on their plate? Maybe it wasn't enough and they want more, but are too "courteous" to get seconds without it being offered. Are they stretching their backs a lot? Maybe it's time to move from the table to the couch. Pay attention to the non-conversational aspects of what's going on in order to be a good host. This form of hospitality will be essential in leaving a good impression. Good first impressions earn influence later.

Women are GREAT at this. But if your wife is the only one doing it, you'll end up in dynamics like I used to be in years ago, where people would think, "We really like her, but R-C is weird." They have to see the leader/helper dynamic between the two of you as a healthy interplay, not as distinct functions. Lead by example in this way. Maybe you offer to refill their cup, but your wife stands up and says, "Oh yeah, I can get that." You led with the insight that they may be thirsty, she helped do the actual work of getting their drinks. If your wife picks up on something like that, play the, "Oh yeah, that reminds me" card and pick something else to lead into, like, "I might want to grab some seconds. Any of you want some while I'm up?" or "Now's probably a good time to pull out dessert anyway."

Activities are a great way to go beyond the conversation too - especially if the guy seems disengaged and his wife is doing all the talking. Most men prefer to do rather than talk. My wife and I are big on board games. We keep an assortment that are both complex and easy, so if there's ever a lull in conversation, we have an option for anyone - other board-gamers or people who just want to play a round of euchre. Lots of times the board game collection is even the context for inviting someone over, "Oh, we should totally do a game night!" 75% of the time when we schedule these game nights we never actually play any board games because conversation is great and it doesn't go there. But we're always ready. Other activity ideas could be

- Going on a walk around your neighborhood
- I know some of the guys around here like to use video games. I personally avoid this, as I'm not a huge video-gamer in the first place. But if there's something unique, like my son's VR, that can be a lot of fun. Party games on a TV/game system can also be useful.
- Sometimes I like to have my guests, when they're over, actually help with some aspect of the cooking. This is a bit riskier, but cooking new and interesting dishes is already a hobby of mine, so it's a small way to invite someone else into a world where I am competent enough to carry the activity while still making them feel engaged without an actual burden.

Very Basic "2-2 Dinner Party" Social Skills

25 February 2022 · /r/MarriedRedPill · Archived copy · Reddit

This one's for all you social auti--s out there. Some of this may seem overly basic, but I can think of at least 7 people off the top of my head who would benefit from at least a few of these - and every one of them is relevant for at least one of those people. I'm sure others are in that same boat, even beyond my 7, so here goes.

Social influence is one of the most valuable domains to keep a mastery on. Over the years I've gotten a number of questions about conversational strategy and social skills, as it's one of my strengths. There's a lot of different sub-groups within the broader category of "social influence," though.

Take cold approaches, for example. /u/TheChristianAlpha is probably the best I've ever seen at this, in-person. I randomly took him to dinner and half way through he had our waitress sitting at our table in tears as he's telling her how Jesus is the best solution to her life troubles. I thought I was great at cold approaches. He put me to shame.

Then there are group gatherings, professional functions, public events, and the like - all which require unique (though often overlapping) sets of skills, depending on your goals for the situation. Do you just want to have fun? Are you trying to build a relationship with someone in particular? Are you just trying to meet new people, generally? Are you trying to teach someone in your group a personal lesson or model a skill or trait for them? There are all kinds of goals you can have, and those should and will affect how you approach your time.

I have a dinner party with a new couple this weekend, and someone else asked about a similar situation (having another couple over for dinner) recently as well, so I'm going to stick with the dinner party context and assume the goal is simple: make new friends. What I do with that friendship later is a separate goal. For right now let's just make sure things go off without a hitch.

10 Dinner Party Tips

1 - Practice "Mayor Game"

Rather than going in crazy depth here, I'll defer a lot to Jacktenofhearts' comment here. Obviously it's a bit different because a two-couple dinner party is not a mass social outing. But in our context it will mean engaging in small talk, even if you don't care what it is. This small talk will be filtered throughout the evening between larger topics, which we'll get to later. The utility of your mayor game here is to make people feel like they're having a good time through subtle (or, on lesser occasion, overt) supportive gestures rather than trying to push an agenda for yourself. You are pushing your own agenda: "make new friends" and "advance my social network." The mayor benefits from mayor game. But he does it in a way that looks like you're the one benefiting from him. That's why he's so doggone popular.

2 - Don't Dominate

Yeah, I know all you alpha-wannabes think dominating is everything. Domination is a tool. 2-2 dinner dates where you're just trying to build rapport with someone aren't necessarily the best situation for that tool. Domination is great for building sexual attraction with women or respect from men in male-only spaces, but when you put yourself in front of another married couple, the dynamic needs shift away from brute domination toward charm. Mayor game is also highly relevant here.

The mayor isn't dominating the conversation. He's its catalyst. I like to think of my conversational style at 2-2 dinner parties as if I'm pushing one of my kids on a swing. They're the one on the swing, not me. It's not about me. At first, I may have to push several times to get her going, some hard pushes even. But once she's got momentum, it's just a few light taps here and there to keep her from slowing down. If I look away too long and she slows down too much, I push hard again, but it only takes one good push that time. In the end, my daughter had a great time and I didn't have to do much. She gets off the swing and is smitten with what a great time she had with me.

3 - Don't expect help

If I insisted that I be the one on the swing (i.e. dominated the activity) and that they should be priming the conversation for me to enjoy, I'll end up sorely disappointed. Why? Because my 4yr old isn't strong enough to push me on the swing. Even my 10yr old couldn't push me very high. I'm the strong one, not them. Your dinner guests may actually be better conversationalists than you - and if so, that's great. But don't expect it. I used to expect it and it backfired often. Go in expecting that they are conversationally weak and immature. You will be less disappointed and more on your game that way.

4 - Use your wife

She's there to help. Let her help. If she is sidelined in the conversation, (a) she's going to be upset afterward because of your crappy leadership, and why bring those tests and burdens on yourself? But more significantly: (b) your guests will notice and it will affect how they feel about YOU. They came to see both of you, not just you (in most cases). One of my common strategies is the "Have you met Ted?" play from How I Met Your Mother. I introduce a topic, put my wife on the spot (sometimes awkwardly, for hilarity) and say, "You've got a good story on that, babe. Why don't you tell them?" (if I know she actually does) or, "Honey, what do you think of that?" (if I'm being more general). This form of enabling someone else in the conversation is the best way to play mayor game in small settings, priming conversations without dominating them.

5 - Ask lots of questions

The goal is getting to know them and building a relationship. Excellent. Best way to do that is to speak with other people on their terms about things they enjoy. If they, on their own, raise a topic of interest to you, by all means: engage. Share your own thoughts. But always end what you say with a question. Whenever you talk, you should finish your portion of the conversation in one of two ways:

- You slowed down your speech enough, winding down your thought, that they cut you off with their own thoughts (ideal)
- They didn't cut you off, so you ask a question to pass the ball

6 - Avoid Awkward Silences

If you finish talking and one of the two above things hasn't happened, the ball is still in your hands. More accurately: the ball is rolling around on the floor without anyone picking it up, and because you're the last one who had it, it's your fumble. If it's not a natural transfer, asking a question passes it. Even if no one answers, instead of you fumbling, it's them failing to catch it. Sure, it can still be a bad pass if you asked a dumb question, but something is better than nothing. Without a question, you haven't passed the ball. It's still your ball.

They may break the awkward silence and steal it from you, but then the impression is: "This is boring. He's just holding the ball. I don't like boring, so I'll grab it and do something." To be fair, I LOVE awkward silences. They're great learning and teaching tools. But not when my goal is to get to know someone or build a relationship. Awkward silences are better when you're leading a workshop/teaching a class/giving a lecture/etc. Use the right tool in the right context. A first dinner party is not the proper context for the awkward silence tool.

7 - One Big Topic, One Backup

Not 5. Not 0. One or two. Your guests may have big topics too, but (per no. 3) don't expect their help. Big topics are things you know the group can spend 30+ minutes talking about before changing subjects again. This is hardest with new people. If I were chatting with one of you all, I know I can bring up anything red pill and we can go off for a while. With someone like /u/praxology, I can mention the topic of behavioral study and we're good for 30+ minutes. With my friend Ryan, it's home repair. With John, it's church discipleship. Big topics must be something you're either fluent in, or where you can fake fluency reasonably well. Ideally, your big topic will be something personally relevant for them. For example, if the person's dad is dying of cancer, ask about that and let that spawn big-topic ideas for conversation.

If you are really struggling for big topic ideas, just ask yourself, "What is everyone on the internet posting about?" If it's Ukraine/Russia, you can go with that. If it's some new BLM outrage, use that one. If it's a celebrity doing something absurd, that's another. The pop-event is not the topic. The philosophical questions and issues the event raises are your big topic.

Example: With Ukraine/Russia, I'd be asking questions like:

- Countries used to war all the time, but our wars lately have been against small factions, not whole nations. Have we really evolved as a people or did we just become complacent in a few decades of general world peace?
- To what extent should we, as individual citizens third party to what's going on, actually get concerned with political issues like this?
- Should the US intervene at all? Or is it better to let other nations figure out their own problems?

Notice how these are all questions. You will have opportunity to share your views, but not until after you let them share theirs first. The reason is no. 8, below.

The goal of your "one big topic" is to make the other people feel like you actually discussed something of substance rather than lots of small talk before going home. You need the small-talk too. Small-talk matters, especially when it's, "What's been going on in your life lately?" Showing them that you actually care about who they are and what they're experiencing matters. If you only care about their opinions on subjects, but not their own life experience, you will have an obvious gaping hole in the "get to know you" aspect of the relationship. But don't neglect the big-issues that will drive conversation through the evening too.

Put another way: small-talk lets you know what's happening in their life. Big topics let you know who they are as people. How you handle the "big topic" and which topic you selected is vital to them feeling like a relationship is being built. That's the topic that will make them go home and think, "We really got to know them." Without a big topic they will think on the drive home, "That was decent chit chat" and they won't give you a second thought.

8 - Read the Room

The first 20 minutes your guests are over are the prime opportunity to assess who they are. You'll be able to tell if the guy is passive or dominant. You can figure out if the wife runs the show or if she's a biblical helper. You can assess whether they are neat or sloppy. You'll pick up things about their lingo and style of speech. You'll figure out if they're socially competent or inept. Most importantly, you can use all of this information to assess what's safe to discuss and not. Trying to red knight the new co-worker and his wife on the first dinner date you have with him is ... not smart.

Remember, you have a goal: build a relationship/get to know them. Saying something that completely offends them is counter-productive to that goal, even if it happens to be true. AFTER the relationship is well-established, you will have room to say offensive/unsafe things and they won't care. But if they're at all like 99% of the world, you will not be given that level of respect up-front. You'll have to gauge their body language, facial expressions, times when they forcibly derail the conversation (especially if it's unnatural to the natural flow).

Another big aspect of reading the room is gauging how well they're responding to the things you're saying and doing. The reason you often want to ask questions about their views before sharing your own is not only because it (a) creates the trust necessary to get away with sharing some of your more "unpopular" views and opinions, but also (b) gives you valuable information about where they're coming from so you can present your "unpopular" views and opinions in a more palatable way, without compromising your goals for the evening. If while you're reading the room you notice that you're cutting them off more than they're cutting you off, you're not asking enough questions and they're going to feeeel disengaged with the conversation, even if they are actually engaging. From there, part of reading the room also means ...

9 - Avoid Taboo Topics

... until the relationship/respect is established well-enough that you know you can pull it off. I've already hinted at this, so I won't go too much more in-depth here. Suffice it to say: power-playing a taboo topic just to see how someone responds is fun. It's a useful skill to have. But as with awkward silences, taboo topics are the wrong tool for early-stage "get to know you" dinners.

10 - Think Beyond the Conversation

Are their glasses empty? Ask if they need more to drink. Did they eat everything on their plate? Maybe it wasn't enough and they want more, but are too "courteous" to get seconds without it being offered. Are they stretching their backs a lot? Maybe it's time to move from the table to the couch. Pay attention to the non-conversational aspects of what's going on in order to be a good host. This form of hospitality will be essential in leaving a good impression. Good first impressions earn influence later.

Women are GREAT at this. But if your wife is the only one doing it, you'll end up in dynamics like I used to be in years ago, where people would think, "We really like her, but R-C is weird." They have to see the leader/helper dynamic between the two of you as a healthy interplay, not as distinct functions. Lead by example in this way. Maybe you offer to refill their cup, but your wife stands up and says, "Oh yeah, I can get that." You led with the insight that they may be thirsty, she helped do the actual work of getting their drinks. If your wife picks up on something like that, play the, "Oh yeah, that reminds me" card and pick something else to lead into, like, "I might want to grab some seconds. Any of you want some while I'm up?" or "Now's probably a good time to pull out dessert anyway."

Activities are a great way to go beyond the conversation too - especially if the guy seems disengaged and his wife is doing all the talking. Most men prefer to do rather than talk. My wife and I are big on board games. We keep an assortment that are both complex and easy, so if there's ever a lull in conversation, we have an option for anyone - other board-gamers or people who just want to play a round of euchre. Lots of times the board game collection is even the context for inviting someone over, "Oh, we should totally do a game night!" 75% of the time when we schedule these game nights we never actually play any board games because conversation is great and it doesn't go there. But we're always ready. Other activity ideas could be

- Going on a walk around your neighborhood
- I know some of the guys around here like to use video games. I personally avoid this, as I'm not a huge video-gamer in the first place. But if there's something unique, like my son's VR, that can be a lot of fun. Party games on a TV/game system can also be useful.
- Sometimes I like to have my guests, when they're over, actually help with some aspect of the cooking. This is a bit riskier, but cooking new and interesting dishes is already a hobby of mine, so it's a small way to invite someone else into a world where I am competent enough to carry the activity while still making them feel engaged without an actual burden.

Stop Pointing the Finger

28 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

RP communities are a bit weird about casting blame.

- There's one camp (usually the black pill or MGTOW-sympathizers) who want to point the finger at women for everything going wrong in the world.
- There's another camp (usually those who have been invested in red pill communities for a while) who want to point the finger at men for dropping the ball and abandoning responsibility.

The former have good points because women have done a lot to screw our our world. The latter have good points too because men have let it happen and also done a lot to screw up our world.

There's a third category of people who love to point the finger. Know who they are? CHLIDREN. Everyone who cares about passing blame is acting childish.

PARENTING THROUGH BLAME

When has pointing the finger actually helped anyone? You know what I do when one of my kids tattles on another? I discipline the tattler every time. The accused only gets punished if I actually believe the accusation and it's not justified.

When these arguments come up, I have each kid give me their version of the story. I don't let the other kid interrupt while one is speaking. They'll get their turn later. I open with: "Tell me what happened." 99% of the time both kids will start with: "The other person did this ..." Often-times I'll cut that kid off right then and there and ask, "No, I want to know what you did." I'm less interested in the actual event of what happened and more interested in whether my child will be honest and own up to their own contribution to the problem. Fights big enough to make their way to me always have a 2-party contribution. If the kid insists in blaming before admitting their own fault, I cut them off, tell them they lost their chance to tell me their side of the story, and I move on to the other kid (if I'm feeling generous and the situation calls for it, sometimes I'll circle back).

I've resolved many parenting disputes among my 4 children. Them blaming each other has never helped a single one of them. My 10yr old son is smart. He's finally figured this out. When I ask, "Did you do something mean to your sister?" instead of trying to explain himself, he says, "Yes." When I ask him what he did, he tells me straight-up. Why does my son seem to "get it"? Because he's picked up on the fact that...

After he admits what he did, I ALWAYS ask the next question: "Why did you do it?"

Motive matters. But there's a huge difference between him trying to rationalize his way out of trouble and him giving me pertinent facts that I'm asking for. This is one of the most respectable aspects of my son and I love him for it (among many other things).

DON'T BE A CHILD

Christian or not, you should find use in this saying from the apostle Paul: "When I was a child, I spoke like a child, I thought like a child, I reasoned like a child. When I became a man, I gave up childish ways" (1 Cor. 13:11). Men put childish ways behind them.

According to Paul, if you still act like a child, you are not a man yet.

Yeah, I get it. This leads into the very shaky territory of trying to define a "true man." There are lots of opinions on that. I'm not going to go there in this post. But I can say definitively that a child is not a man.

DON'T BE A WOMAN

The other angle to this is that most people who point the finger do so for a few key reasons:

- They're emotionally upset and blaming is a temporary relief from guilt
- They want their feelings validated
- It averts accountability for one's own actions
- There's an internal pressure toward appearing perfect, and accepting responsibility shatters that projection
- A person's ego may be invested in their own self-image, which is broken when the "fault" rests with them
- A person doesn't want to have to change, and if it's someone else is at fault it excuses one's own imperative to fix the problem or become someone better

Again, not to try to define what a man is ... I can say definitively that a man is not a woman and these are traits most commonly associated with women (or at least ones that are more appropriate or expected for women to maintain and men to grow out of). Just as you shouldn't be a child, you shouldn't be a woman either.

FAULT V. RESPONSIBILITY: A BETTER PARADIGM

Back to my son - you know why I appreciate his approach to being caught in a fight? He accepts responsibility. Even when it wasn't his fault, he (in most cases ... he is still 10, after all) recognizes that he did something to contribute to the problem and owns up to that. I don't get very much, "But my sister this" or "But my sister that" from him (again, it happens, but rarely). Either my wife or I are aware enough of what's going on in the house to know who's really at fault. We also know our kids well enough to have a pretty good idea what happened, even if we didn't see it ourselves. We know where the fault lies. But my love and respect for my son, and the way I treat him, is based less on whether or not he was at fault for what happened and more on whether or not he's going to own up to it - whether he takes responsibility.

Likewise, the Bible is pretty clear that God forgives our sins - our "faults". But despite this forgiveness, he still expects us to "confess our sins." Even though I'm already forgiven, confession still matters. Why? Because God wants to instill in us a character that takes responsibility for our actions. Consider the following examples:

- Eve ate the fruit first. She gave it to Adam and he took it. Adam pointed the finger at Eve instead of confessing and repenting. God cursed him in addition to making him subject to death. I wonder how this story would have played out if Adam had owned up to it and didn't blame Eve for his own contribution to the problem.
 - Paul was a murderer(-helper?) who persecuted Christians and tried to hinder the work of the Spirit. After his conversion do we see him saying, "But, but, but ... God ... that was the old me. It's your fault for not saving me before that"? No. In fact, you'd think he'd try to hide that part of his life so other Christians wouldn't find out what he did, but instead he tells it as part of his testimony. His zeal as a Jew who persecuted the Church is something he boldly reminds the Philippians of (3:6). In 2 Cor. 12 he says he will "boast all the more gladly of my weaknesses" - and just a few verses before that we see that God had blessed him by letting him taste heaven before his death.
 - Joseph's brothers tied him up and sold him as a slave. Despite not being at fault for the situation, he accepted that he had to bear the responsibility that came with his new life as a slave - and God rewarded him for that, making him the second most powerful man in the nation. At no point do we see Joseph whining about how bad his brothers treated him. In the end, he forgave them, loved them, and blessed them.
-

YOU ARE RESPONSIBLE FOR YOUR OWN HOME

Let me add one more to the list above:

- We sinned and ruined the world. Jesus had to bear indescribable torture and suffering to save us. Did he ever say, "But God ... it's their fault, not mine! I'm innocent"? No. He took it as his own responsibility to fix the mess we created. Why? Because that's what leaders do who want their venture to succeed.

In a corporate setting, the CEO is responsible for the mistakes of his employees. A military commander is responsible for what his privates do on the battlefield, even if he's not the one who ordered them to do it. Likewise, a husband is responsible for everything that goes on in his household because it's HIS household.

It doesn't matter if your wife is at fault. The husband is still responsible. You're the one who has the burden of dealing with the mess. Too many men love lording leadership without recognizing the responsibility that comes with it. I don't just mean the "responsibilities" of leading (though that matters too). Yes, you have to provide, protect, produce, etc. But part of the responsibility is figuring out how to deal with other people's messes - that you are responsible for what everyone else in your household does. I'll put on my lawyer hat: if your 8yr old kid hits a baseball through your neighbor's window, who do you think is going to pay for it? You. Because he's your kid and you're responsible, regardless of the fact that your kid was the one at fault. Of course, if he has an allowance or a piggy bank, you can teach him to share responsibility, but you are still the responsible person as the parent.

Most things that go wrong in the world are due to failure of leadership. If the way a man leads is not getting the results he wants (regardless of fault), the logical solution is to adjust your leadership strategy. Her job is to decide whether or not to follow. Now, this could lead to a frustrating cycle where a guy keeps changing strategies as his wife doesn't respond to each one. This is insanely rare because AWALT and typically respond well to predictable sets of good leadership qualities. Nevertheless, while secular guys who happened to marry an outlier may actually end up here, there is no excuse for Christian men. Why? Because we have a standard of leadership to stop the cycle.

Jesus' leadership strategy is the optimal one. Changes to our strategy should always be to adjust what we do to conform more to what Christ did. I don't mean what you think Jesus WOULD have done. I mean what he ACTUALLY DID. Too many people are ignorant of just how much Jesus modeled for us, as found in Scripture. If Jesus didn't, God did - and we know that Jesus did what he saw the Father doing, so if either God or Jesus did it, we can do likewise. In the end, your wife may still leave you, but at least you can go to God on judgment day and say, "Yes, my wife left me. But I didn't know a better way to lead her than the way you showed me, so I stuck with that and did what you did." I have to imagine God will respect that answer even over the man who manages to abandon Christ-likeness in order to pacify his wife and keep her from divorcing him. "Marriage in tact, God!" is going to be followed by the question: "Sure, but at what expense?" If you had to let her cut off your balls for her to stay, God's not going to let you into his assembly (Deuteronomy 23:1 - yeah, I'm stretching the metaphor, but roll with it).

On judgment day, I don't imagine God is going to care who is to blame. God isn't judging fault. He's judging "each person according to what he has done." Do what Jesus did. Worry less about blame, more about Christ-likeness. Just make sure you're actually looking at how Jesus handled situations, rather than making up hypotheticals of what you think he "would have" done based on some stereotypical notions you have in your head about who you think he was. We have a model. Look to the model, as shown to us through the Bible.

53

UPVOTES

No, it's not okay.

25 July 2022 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

PREMISE

The phrase, "It's okay," has become the go-to saying to anyone who is struggling, even when the struggle is because of their own poor life choices. The phrase is usually appended by, "God loves you just as you are."

It's no secret that the world uses God's love as an excuse to justify poor life choices.

- Overweight? It's okay, God loves you just as you are. You don't need to lose weight. Be proud of your body!
- Unable to engage in social situations and make friends? It's okay, God loves you even if they don't. You don't need them, just him. No need to improve your social skills.
- Struggling to financially provide for your family? It's okay, God loves you just as you are. Even the apostles were poor, so you keep on playing those video games all day instead of working!

MYTH: God loves you just as you are.

FACT: God loves you, despite the way you are.

EXAMPLE

Let's start with body image issues. I heard someone share recently about her struggle. She was afraid that her husband wouldn't love her anymore because she's getting older and gaining weight. She had made poor life choices that put her in a bad position, just as I had earlier in my marriage.

Good thing mainstream churchianity was there to support her! She learned that "God loves me just the way I am" and "I am beautiful, no matter what they say." They're in the Bible. Look it up. <searches> Oh wait, that's actually a Christina Aguilera song, not a Song of Solomon.

The one that does often gets quoted is: "I am fearfully and wonderfully made." And that's true! When God knit you together in your mother's womb (i.e. the previous verse), you were fearfully and wonderfully made. But he's not the one who made you fat and unattractive. You did that after he made you. Just as with Adam and Eve at creation, God can make something good, but we have the power to screw it up.

BIBLICAL

The whole "God loves me just as I am" thing is a sham - especially if you're sharing it with non-Christians. God hates sin. Psalm 11:5 says plainly, "The Lord tests the righteous, but his soul hates the wicked." Psalm 5:5 - "The boastful shall not stand before your eyes; you hate all evildoers." Proverbs 8:13 extends this to us: "The fear of the Lord is hatred of evil." No, it's not a "love-hate relationship" with God. That's awkward human terminology to rationalize clinging onto destructive ties in our lives.

The Bible says that "God shows his love for us in that while we were still sinners, Christ died for us." Notice the tonality here.

- Many people interpret this to say: God loves all of me, including my sin, which is an unbiblical conclusion.
- The actual tone and context of the passage reads more like: Even though we were sinners and God hates sin, he loved us enough to do something to eradicate those parts of us so that we could be in fellowship with him again.

The primary function of salvation is sanctification, not a "free ticket to heaven," as some claim. The fact that God will not allow sin in heaven is very telling that he does not embrace our sinfulness, but wants it gone.

The irony, of course, is that the way we get "pruned" of our sin (per John 15) is not by trying to prune ourselves (per Galatians 3:3), but by "abiding in Him" (John 15), which the same author later says in 1 John 2:6 defines as "walking as He walked" - i.e. live our lives the same way Jesus lived. How do we do that? The three greats I've often shared before: (1) Love God, greatest command; (2) Love Others, second greatest command; (3) Make Disciples, great commission.

REBUTTAL

Now, I'm sure some people will want to argue semantics. "I am a sinner. God still loves me." That's dodging the point. You can't knowingly continue to sin without repentance and expect anything other than God's wrath. Hebrews 10:26-31 is clear on that - "For if we go on sinning deliberately after receiving the knowledge of the truth, there no longer remains a sacrifice for sins, but a fearful expectation of judgment, and a fury of fire that will consume the adversaries." Sure, you may slip up while being continually repentant, as sanctification won't be complete in this life ... but on the bigger picture: Do you really want to play the semantics game when that kind of judgment is on the line?

CONCLUSION

"It's okay, God loves you" is not an excuse for failing to change your lifestyle and behaviors. If you're a glutton, learn to control your diet (I know that's one I struggle with, which is why I run/bike so doggone much!). If you have no friends, learn some social skills and get out there. "I'm more of an introvert, so I don't have to," is not an excuse for failing to build the relationships that are necessary to advance the Gospel in your sphere of life. If you're financially struggling, get off the TV and video games and get a second job, or find a way to improve the career path you're already on. I had one friend who was in a tough spot working as a financial advisor. He was pulling 6-figures, but still massively in debt. He got his spending worked out to stop new debt, but the interest on the old debt was still killing him. Know what he did? He got a job working third shift at Steak 'n Shake for a year making $8/hr - an embarrassingly low wage for him - to make up the extra cash to pay down the debt. His wife was a school teacher and she actually got a summer job to supplement and help.

Whatever it takes, stop making the "God loves me just as I am" excuse and go do what you need to do, prioritizing first God's Work of building His Kingdom.

The Social Imperative Part 1 - "Don't Be Ignored" and Biblical Guardrails

10 September 2022 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

Parable of the Shrewd Manager

In Luke 16, Jesus tells a parable about a manager who's about to be fired. Concerned for his future, he uses his position to earn favor with his master's debtors so they will welcome him in their home after he is fired and he won't be destitute. The master commends him for this and Jesus concludes: "I tell you, make friends for yourselves by means of unrighteous [or worldly] wealth, so that when it fails they may receive you into the eternal dwellings" (v9).

While this parable raises several interesting questions, I'm going to focus on its imperative that we should be building relationships with others with eternity in mind. The epistles have no shortage of passages talking about our imperative to connect with others for the sake of advancing the Gospel. One of the things we hammer hard here is the importance of living on mission for Christ. It's why all advice threads require stating your mission. Most guys have caught on now, "I'd better mention sharing the Gospel/making disciples in my mission or the mods will be all over me," but even taking you at face value - for everyone who is serious about the mission to advance the Gospel and make disciples, social advancement is critical. Especially if you want to be someone of influence in God's Kingdom/the Church the Bible is clear that such people "must also have a good reputation with outsiders" - and those with no social presence don't even have a reputation at all, much less a good one.

The Basics of Guardrails

So, how does one actually build good social skills? The Bible has some general guardrails on this. For example, there are a lot of "don't do"s in the Bible about how we interact with others.

- Don't covet what they have.
- Don't steal from them.
- Don't lie to them.

These will ruin your relationships, not help them. The Bible also has a lot of "do do"s.

- Be patient.
- Be kind.
- Season your conversation with salt.
- Be gentle.

... just to name a few. Of course, it also has a stricter set of guardrails for unique contexts. For people like Cretans, for example, Paul implores: "rebuke them harshly." For others, certain disciplines are warranted. This is because as a social network expands, opportunity for conflict inherently expands with it. Guardrails are not only about how to build healthy relationships. They're also about how to keep them healthy when these moments of conflict arise.

It's important to know the biblical boundaries of how we should/shouldn't interact with others in various contexts - and we certainly won't be creating any exhaustive lists here. That said, Titus 3:1-2 provides a nice summary of some of the most critical interpersonal guardrails. But before we get there, we need to know the context for the passage ...

Let NO ONE Ignore You

Before we can get to Titus 3, we need to know how chapter 2 ends.

- 2:11 talks about God bringing salvation "for ALL PEOPLE." That's a lot of people!
- 12-14 then proceeds by sharing the Gospel and imploring us to live according to it. Are you living what you preach?
- Paul then continues in verse 15, "DECLARE these things." When was the last time you declared something in an "ALL PEOPLE" context? Me either!
- But he goes on: "exhort and rebuke with ALL authority."

Pause there. This is giving me Matthew 28:19-20 vibes when Jesus also implores us to spread the Gospel to "ALL nations," prefacing it with, "ALL authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me, therefore go ..." as if he is giving us that authority that Paul is now telling Titus to exercise. Another way I like to think of this is to imagine you work for a mega-company and the CEO calls you up and says, "Heyo Bob. Can you do me a little favor and get this report done?" Okay, imagine how you'd respond to that compared to if the CEO said, "I am the head of this company. There is no one higher than me. I have all authority over everything that happens with this company. Therefore, I'm telling you to get this report done." How do you think you'd respond to that request? Sometimes we treat the Great Commission like the "Heyo Bob" approach, whereas Jesus used the "All authority" approach, and Paul now refrains it here in the context of the Gospel bringing salvation to "ALL people" (parallel to "ALL nations") before finishing ...

- "Let NO ONE disregard you."

Okay, so you may be wondering why I keep capitalizing "ALL" here. No, I'm not a universalist - I vehemently oppose that notion. I'm drawing context to ALL-encompassing verbiage of who the Gospel is to be brought to and the impetus of Paul's charge to Titus to declare it to ALL people with ALL authority in a manner that NO ONE would disregard him. See the pattern now?

So, when it says not to let anyone disregard you, what does that word mean? Let's define it with a quick Google search.

English Dictionary | Disregard: pay no attention to; ignore

Greek Dictionary | Periphroneo: think beyond, depreciate, condemn, despise, look down upon

The ESV seems to be a bit interpretive here to say "disregard," but it makes sense in the context. If you've got a message you're meant to declare authoritatively to all people, you'd better do it in a way where people don't think so little of you that they ignore the message (remembering that YOU are the message, not just the words you speak).

With that said, how many people feel like you've been walking around the world being ignored all your life? How many of you have been "invisible" in the crowd?

I remember going to NYC a couple months ago for vacation. I love Broadway. Ironically, one of my favorite songs I heard (from the Beetlejuice musical) involved the line, "You're invisible when you're me. There's no one to see my truth." Times Square and Central Park are fantastically beautiful. They're also fantastically crowded. How long do you think you, men, would have to sit on a park bench in the Big Apple before someone would approach you and initiate a conversation? Quite a while, I can assure you. Everyone's bustling with things to do. Being ignored is the default state. You must make an active effort to change that. You can't just expect it to happen magically, all by itself.

Our imperative to get the Gospel to ALL people comes with an equal imperative not to let anyone disregard what we have to say - whether by directly ignoring us or ignoring our message because they look down on us with contempt.

Guardrails in One Verse

Okay, NOW we can get to the actual verse, now that we realize its context. Titus 3:1-2 ...

- "Remind them to be submissive to rulers and authorities, to be obedient, to be ready for every good work, to speak evil of no one, to avoid quarreling, to be gentle, and to show perfect courtesy toward all people"

Yikes. That's quite a bit there. Let's break this down, remembering that this is just a summary of some key guardrails, not an exhaustive list of them.

Remind them to be submissive to rulers and authorities, to be obedient

How did Paul do this? When the Roman Empire ordered Christians to be put to death, did he submit willingly and encourage believers everywhere to put their head on the chopping block? Nope. But when he was caught, he accepted his situation without fight. In fact, even when God allowed him an opportunity to escape, he and Silas chose to remain (Acts 16). In short, as one of my friends aptly and succinctly puts it: "submit to your rulers and authorities" = "don't run from the cops."

Why does this matter in the imperative to get the Gospel to ALL people? Because if you're being defiant against your "rulers and authorities" instead of submissive to them, do you think the people who are loyal to those rulers and authorities are going to give you much credibility? In their mind, you're as good as a criminal at that point and they will "disregard" or "look down on" with "contempt" anything you have to say. Paul just implored us NOT to put ourselves in a situation when they will do that. Now he's explaining the guardrails to make sure we don't lose that influence.

For an easy example, consider when Trump was elected and all the liberals were shouting, "He's not MY president." Now imagine one of those liberals, after rioting against Trump, were to come across a die-hard Trump supporter and try to teach him some new philosophy/way of life/belief system that he'd never heard before. Or imagine when Biden was elected and countless people were shouting, "The election was rigged. Biden isn't the legitimate president" - and a republican were to try, after shouting on the street corner about this - try to persuade a Biden-supporter to consider some new philosophy/way of life/belief system that they'd never heard before. Do you think they're going to be likely to accept what you have to say or treat your thoughts with contempt?

to be ready for every good work

Notice the wording here. It's not merely that you must "avoid evil." Too often we are focused on the "don't sin" part of living for Christ that we forget about the "do"s of Christian living. "Good works" can mean acts of service, speaking kindly of others, showing generosity, etc. - the standard "good works" we often read about. But one that's often left off the list: it can also mean the "work of the Gospel" that Paul frequently talks about, which he is engaged in, with several others who he calls into that work with him, and which we are all called into as well.

Even more significant in the wording is that we must be READY for EVERY good work. Both those words need emphasis.

- READY - They're already prepared for us. We just need to be ready for when the time comes. These are the "good works prepared in advance for us to do." It's no coincidence that IMMEDIATELY after saying this in Ephesians 2:10, Paul then describes the calling of the Gospel to the Gentiles, the ministry of the apostles and prophets, the "mystery" of the Gospel being made known by the Spirit of the Gospel spreading beyond the Jews into all the Gentile peoples and how "of this gospel I was made a minister," and that "through the church the manifold wisdom of God might now be made known" ... hmm ... I wonder what the "good works prepared in advance for us to do" might be. Could it have something to do with making sure the Gospel is spread to ALL nations? At least in part, yes. And we'd better be READY for when the opportunity to exercise this good work comes.

- EVERY - Can one lackadaisically pick and choose which good works we will do for God? Can we say, "Eh, God, I don't feel like sharing my faith with that guy today. I'll take the next opportunity"? No. Our imperative is to take advantage of EVERY good work, whether we feel like it or not.

If you feel like skipping one of the opportunities God prepared in advance for you, it's probably because you weren't READY. If you're not ready, it's probably because you don't think it's necessary to do EVERY good work God prepared in advance for you to do.

to speak evil of no one

Simply put, if you are a slanderer or gossip, people won't respect you and your influence for good will be shot. Sure, slander and gossip my increase your influence to do evil, but never to do good.

to avoid quarreling

Being a quarrelsome person makes people want to avoid you. Proverbs literally says that it's better to be stranded on a roof corner than be around a quarrelsome wife. Do you really think you'll fare much better in a broader social circle than marriage if you're a quarrelsome person?

to be gentle [epieikes: seemly, equitable, yielding, gentle, mild, forbearing, fair, reasonable, moderate]

Ah, gentility. The Bible has a lot to say about gentleness. There is certainly a time and a place for everything. As previously noted, Paul tells Timothy to rebuke some people "harshly." So, gentility is not always the only card to be played in conversation. But it's a massively important one and should be our default, unless you know the context demands otherwise. Ecclesiastes 3 tells us that there is a time for all kinds of opposing things - "A time to break down, and a time to build up" ... hopefully we're building up more often than we're breaking down. "a time to weep, and a time to laugh" ... hopefully we're laughing more than we weep. "a time to love, and a time to hate" ... hopefully we love more than we hate. "a time for war, and a time for peace" ... hopefully more peace than war. In the same way, if there is "a time for gentleness, and a time for harshness," ... let's remember that we ought to be gentle more often than we are harsh. There's a lot more in the Bible about the importance of gentility than harshness, even though they both have their place.

Simply put, being inappropriately harsh will callous people against you. That's no way to build a social life. Being appropriately harsh through a default of gentility will earn the respect of those who know you.

to show perfect courtesy [prauteta: gentleness, mildness, gentleness] toward all people

It's interesting to me that the word translated "gentleness" has one connotation, but the word that's more directly translated as "gentleness" is re-translated to "courtesy" (ESV) or "humility" (NLT, NKJV). Regardless, the point is doubly-emphasized. There is a common decency to be had. That common decency does not make you weak. Instead, it is a tool to strength your social skills and earn the respect of those around you, which makes you strong. As with all things, it's a tool in your belt - not the only tool, but a useful one. Consider humility and gentleness to be a hammer and screwdriver and a "sharp rebuke" or "harsh correction" like a nail gun. Nail guns are cool and fun. Some jobs absolutely require them. But they're not your default go-to for most home projects. You may be obsessed with it and find that it's more helpful than most people realize, even in projects some people wouldn't ordinarily think to use them ... but that trusty hammer is still going to need to be at your side, regardless.

TEASER

Okay, now that we've learned about the imperative to build Kingdom-minded relationships and the guardrails around doing that, something else comes to mind: You can follow all those do-s and don't-s and still not have a vibrant social circle who you're influencing for Christ. If those "do-s and don't-s" are guardrails on the path to a vibrant and Gospel-advancing social life, what happens if you stay in the guard rails, but drive your car in reverse? Or you've got a broken engine and don't move at all? Well ... staying in the guard rails still won't get you very far. In the next post, we'll hit more of those nuts and bolts of how to actually get off your butt and build kingdom-minded relationships with others.

The Social Imperative Part 2 - Fundamental Social Skills and Mindsets

6 October 2022 · /r/RPChristians · Archived copy · Reddit

Yikes - I had half of this written when I posted part 1, but only just now managed to find the time to finish. This post will focus on the very basic, fundamental things you'll need to know to improve your social skills. As I have time, I may include a part 3 with some of the more "advanced" strategies. But first, let's start with a critical question:

Why Isn't This in the Bible? Oh yeah: DISCIPLESHIP

I tried to keep the previous post on why social skills are important as Scripturally-grounded as possible because I knew this one was going to be more pragmatic than exegetical. Is that okay? If God wanted us to know the ins and outs of social skills, wouldn't he have put it in Scripture?

Well ... no. For one, unlike biblical guardrails for interpersonal interactions (which are timeless), social contexts DO change over time. Different norms from different cultures, time periods, locations, etc. actually impact whether any particular piece of advice is good or bad. That means this post may find itself quite dated sometime down the line or in some other country, so take that for what it's worth. Paul says to Timothy that Cretans should be rebuked harshly, but tells others to correct with gentleness.

What was unique about the Cretan culture that Paul gives different instructions for them? Social context. He basically calls all Cretans liars (imagine if a church-leader made a categorical statement about a nationality like that today!) and categorically denounces them as deserving of the same level of respect as anyone else. Weird, but true (Titus 1:12-13, if you want to read it for yourself). What he's saying is that sometimes you have to tailor your approach to your audience. Some people can handle a harsh rebuke – and even require it – whereas others may need gentility. Different social contexts warrant a different approach.

Second, and more importantly: God didn't mention social skills in the written Word because he expected this to be passed on through life-on-life discipleship. The Bible wasn't meant to be an exhaustive encyclopedia of everything we would ever need to know. For those more pragmatic skills, we see in Philippians Paul saying that he shared his way of life with others who would live in his example, and encouraged others to look at their example, and so on. To Timothy, he says he taught several things that Timothy should pass on - and then he tells Timothy to teach those men to pass it on to others. This "way of life" includes how we interact with one another.

I remember one time being at the house of a guy I was discipling when his wife came home. They started a conversation and she became furious. Plates-smashing-against-walls-level furious. I tried to coach him on conflict-management principles in an aside mid-conversation, but it was hard to get through. A few weeks later, I knew I was about to have a difficult conversation with my wife, so I suggested he come over to see how I handle conflict with my wife. His ability to watch me do it was something you can't get from Scripture because that "pattern of living" and "life skills" part of following Christ comes from the way the Holy Spirit applies God's Word in us, beyond just the text on the page. Scripture is the highest and only absolute arbiter of Truth, but the Holy Spirit is the one who shows us each how to apply that truth in our own contexts - and He uses us to be a model for others.

If life-on-life discipleship (not a typo) weren't so dead in the mainstream church, you would have direct access to skilled people to say to you, "Come alongside me and see how I share the Gospel with my neighbors" and "Come watch me pray so you can know how to do it like I do," and "See me cold-approach strangers to build relationships so you can become skilled at it too."

Because we don't have a pattern of this life-modeling in the Church and we only have "teaching sessions" (whether in a mass-gathering classroom or individually at a coffee shop – it's still all just words), there is a dearth of actual leadership in the mainstream church.

Yes, this post is more "just words." But it's based on lots of experience and numerous errors and successes I've had along the way. For those of you who happen to live near me, I invite you to come out with me sometime for a focused time of practicing these skills. In the 5-part discipleship model Jesus gives, I can:

- Tell you what I do (mostly through this post)
- Show you how by doing it in front of you, at a mall, park, store, etc.
- Let you try doing it in front of me, and I can give you feedback afterward
- Send you out to keep practicing without me, and I'll check in periodically, and
- Encourage you to pass it on so that others can learn the skills you develop and so you can master your own skills through the responsibility that comes with teaching others.

This is how I see Jesus discipling others, and social skills are a very easy way to practice this. Sadly, for those of you who don't live near me, all I can do is "just words" – which, I'm sure, is why Paul said in Philippians that they should look to those locally around them to learn how to follow Paul's example, rather than him trying to explain his lifestyle in the letter itself.

Now, onto the actual skills and mindsets useful to build early-phase social skills ...

1 - GOAL-ORIENTED

Before you can be good at building a relational network you need to know a few things. What kind of network do you want? Who do you want to be in it? How large do you want it to be? Will there be intentional tiers of relational depth (acquaintances v. casual friends v. close friends) or only a singular focus? What do you want to accomplish alongside your social circle? Do you intend to lead your social circle or merely participate in it? Are there certain hobbies/interests that you want to center your circle around? All of these questions matter.

For me, I remember hearing stories in my career about my clients or their exes who were "pillars of the community" - the type of people who knew everyone in town. I made that a goal of mine. Before I moved, I had achieved that goal. I could hardly walk into a grocery store without being stopped in conversation with someone. At the most recent disciplehaus (in-person meeting of men from this sub from all over the country), one of the guys I work with got to see a taste of that. We happened to be grabbing dinner near where I used to live ... at 10pm on a Thursday. Surely nobody would be out then, right? Sure enough, as soon as I walk in I saw some of my good friends from a small group I led. The next day, we went to a grocery store in my new home area and I met someone from a congregation I had attended and a conversation ensued.

I tell that story not to brag, but to show that (1) goals can be accomplished once you set them - even big goals, like being known and respected wherever you go (and this is even arguably required to be a leader in God's Kingdom), and (2) in reference to the discipleRship process, it's good for guys I'm working with to (2a) know my life is congruent with what I say it is, (2b) see how I do it first-hand in order to practice themselves, and (2c) be inspired that they can actually achieve goals too. Setting goals is massively important, but life modeling is the fast-track to accomplishing them.

For a quick biblical reference, Jesus blends these two by telling his disciples what their goal should be and then showing them how to do it. He told them from day 1 that their end-game will be to become "fishers of men," then he spent the next few years showing them how to "fish for men" so they could do it on their own once he was gone.

2 - IMMUNIZE AGAINST FAILURE

Let's face it, you're going to face a lot of rejection. The best thing you can do is immunize yourself to it. Most people experience rejection as a frustration they want to avoid. If you're clever enough, you can remap your brain to realize: "Oh, I got rejected once and it hurt. After the 10th time, I kind of got used to it. Having been rejected 100+ times, it doesn't phase me anymore."

Once you're properly immunized to rejection, you no longer have any social anxiety about approaching random strangers. Another rejection under your belt? No biggie. Move onto the next person.

Nobody faced rejection more than Jesus. He is still rejected by countless people today – not randos he doesn't care about, but children he deeply loves and passionately wants to save. He is rejected in the ways it hurts the most. He also tells us to remember that if the world hates/rejects us, it hated/rejected him first – and that we are blessed of we suffer persecution because of him. Don't shy away from this. Embrace that your effort to develop Kingdom-building relationships is a win-win-win scenario: either you (1) win by successfully relating with someone, or (2) win by being persecuted for your efforts to build God's Kingdom, and therefore will be blessed by God, or (3) win by glorifying God by proving He was right when He said we'd face rejection because of Him.

See how there really is no such thing as "failure" when it comes to attempting to develop Kingdom-building relationships? Let your rejections work for you, not against you. Immunize yourself against failure.

3 - BE POLARIZING

In coordination with immunizing against rejection: be a polarizing person. Jesus was, perhaps, the most polarizing person ever to have lived. Nobody has sparked more global controversy than Jesus. Some people devote every fiber of their being to him, while others absolutely despise him. He did this by expressing clear convictions and never wavering from them, and also by being public about them. As Mark Manson talks about the concept in reference to dating (Models), rejection from polarization is a GOOD thing, not a bad thing. You're very quickly weeding out the people who you weren't going to get along with anyway ... or, more accurately, you're letting them weed themselves out. By being a polarizing person, you're not rejecting anyone. Like Jesus, you embrace all who will come to you. But you're also not bending your convictions to get them to come; you let them decide for themselves and respect that choice once it's made.

The catch here is that we ALSO have an imperative to reach all people. No one person will literally reach everyone, so there's some give. I'm never going to reach people who only speak Mandarin Chinese, for example (unless my high test scores for the gift of tongues actually come true someday). But we do still have the obligation to "become all things to all men so that some might believe" (1 Cor. 9). This comes in the form of finding commonality with everyone where that commonality does not compromise the polarizing truth you're bringing them.

The goal of polarization isn't to cause the people who love you to love you more and the people who hate you to hate you more. That would be a foolish(-ish) goal. The real goal is to quickly find those who will be receptive to you and have no fear or shame when those who are unlikely to "click" with you reject you even faster. You're just saving yourself some time. Be respected by all, but embrace the reality that not everyone will become your best friend. I've had people say of me, "I respect you, but I don't think we'd get along." That's a perfectly acceptable place to be. Embrace it rather than trying to people-please everyone. As the old saying goes, "The fastest way to fail is to try to please everyone."

- Caveat 1: Being unskilled and turning people away because you're awkward, mean, have bad hygiene, etc. is NOT being polarizing. It's lacking self-awareness.
- Caveat 2: Polarization is a tool in your belt, not a default state. Sometimes there is value in avoiding being polarizing to a particular person whose relationship you find a unique value in. For example: my son is on a soccer team. It would be very bad for him if he polarized his coach against him. Best strategy here is to put the polarization tool aside and keep the coach happy (with some exception, when warranted). Similarly, polarization isn't a skill I want to employ with my kids. Unwavering in my convictions? Absolutely. Weeding out which of my children I can develop a quick relationship with and which I can't? Bad idea.

4 - PEOPLE ARE LONELY AND ISOLATIONIST BY DEFAULT

Research shows that this is the loneliest generation in the history of recorded data on the subject. Some say it's "despite" the internet providing so much opportunity for connection and relationship, though I often argue it's because of it. All the same, social media is designed to make us BELIEVE everyone else is at the top of their social game, while statistics show a COMPLETELY different picture. My legal education tells me that "statements against one's own interests are more reliable than self-interested statements" (hearsay exception). So, I have to assume the stats are correct: if people are admitting that loneliness is rampant on an anonymous survey, but publicly try to look like they have tons of friends and love in their lives ... the loneliness is probably more true than the "perfect life" projection.

Remind yourself of this regularly. If people are lacking meaningful relationships in their lives (even marriages don't count, if we remember the 60%+ divorce rate) and you are able to offer them a meaningful relationship, they should be EXCITED at the opportunity to be approached by you with the prospect of friendship. Framing this in your mind as the context in which you're going out to meet new people can add a boldness that makes building your social circle much easier.

In the end, if they accept your offer of friendship, you've accomplished your goal; but if they reject you, per the polarization principle, they're probably people who you'd have had to work so hard to get to like you that the point of diminishing returns would have warranted cutting off the effort as early in the process anyway.

From there, it's key to remember that our first-world culture is broadly isolationist (which is NOT true of many other cultures, if you're outside America while reading this). We live on our own plots of land with our own immediate family focusing on our own needs. When we do interact, it's usually at arm's length for general social niceties without actually building meaningful bonds.

Because of this, most people in our society aren't raised, much less trained or equipped, to feel any imperative to initiate relationships. This means that the burden is on YOU to initiate relationships if you want them. You CAN NOT assume others will approach you if they want relationships, no matter how lonely they may actually be.

5 – AVOID BLENDING IN

In the same way that "be attractive, don't be unattractive" is a non-repetitive, important duality to remember, so also is there an important difference between "peacocking" and "avoid blending in." I won't get into peacocking here. It's a useful strategy in some contexts, but perhaps more advanced or nuanced than this post will get into, so feel free to read up on it on your own. Avoiding blending in is a more fundamental concept that allows people to take notice of you, whether you stand-out or not.

Consider the numerous social norms out there and contemplate ways to deviate from them. For example, if someone asks how your weekend was, you could answer "Fine" or "Good" like everyone else. But you open relational opportunities if you find something different to say, like, "It was an interesting weekend." See how they respond (more on this in part 3, if/when I get there).

Or suppose you're waiting in line at a grocery store, amusement park, etc. You've just met the person next to you. Do you stick with a safe, "How about this weather!" or try a unique connection point, like, "You see any good shows lately?" I've said it before and I'll say it again: TV is a simple and easy way to build a fast connection. The way someone's eyes light up when I've seen one of the shows they mention they love ... it's like magic. That awkward weather conversation that they can't wait to run away from has now turned into a dynamic, engaging _____ discussion on what's going to happen to some guy named Luke in the next episode. Connection formed.

I remember having a case in front of a new magistrate who had quickly developed a reputation for churning cases in-and-out in 10 minutes at a time. Rocket-speed for a hearing. He didn't waste time on anyone ... until I showed up. He had cranked out 7 other cases before me by 10am after having opened at 9. Insane. Then I walk in with my case. We got through it in 4 minutes and he urged us out and to call in the next set of attorneys. On my way out, I noticed a TARDIS on his desk and simply noted. "I like your TARDIS. Who's your Doctor?" He shooed my opposing counsel away and had me sit down again as we continued to chat for 40 straight minutes about Doctor Who. He didn't give anyone else that time or attention - but something lit up when he experienced that shared enjoyment.

It doesn't have to be TV either. That's just something that 95% of people have as a common default pseudo-hobby. The key here is that you can't expect them to share your specific hobby. If you have a passion for playing the harmonica or riding unicycles - that's awesome, and that can be incredibly useful at some point. But it's not going to build an immediate connection. Intrigue, fascination, curiosity, etc. - sure. But not a connection. Ones others are more likely to connect with beyond TV are sports, music, hiking/biking/other exercise, travel, theater, etc.

When you stick to "safe" topics and "deflecting" responses, you'll never build a real connection. You just blend into the crowd. When you find different non-normative things to say, people are far more likely not only to engage with you, but also to REMEMBER you after the conversation, which is key to follow-up. Speaking of ...

6 – FOLLOW-UP

You may find this shocking, but you won't actually build a social circle if you only ever meet people. Follow-up is perhaps the most important skill to develop on this list. After you make the initial contact, if you want to have a Kingdom-building impact on someone's life, you have to keep connecting with them. Unless you are a Spirit-gifted contact-evangelist who can have someone on their knees in prayer during a 30-second elevator ride (and let's face it: even if you are, do you know if they're still following 2 years later?), the actual work of evangelism and discipleship will take time. That means you're going to have to meet up with them on other days.

This also means exchanging contact information. Learning how to number-close in social situations is critical to being influential, unless you know for a fact you're going to see that person again (ex. probably don't need to number-close the guy who sits next to you at work, unless he's about to get fired – or you are!).

Once you've exchanged contact info, follow-up is easy. Call or text a few days later and suggest hanging out. This is even better if you already talked about a shared interest you can do together.

This is made even easier by modern text-messaging apps. Learn how to schedule messages. Meet a new person on Day 1 at 10am. Finish talking at 11am. At 11:05am you type a text message to him and schedule it to be delivered on Day 3. If he reaches out to you before then, great: cancel your message. If not, you've already followed up with him and don't have to risk forgetting. This also works great for situations where you remember in bed at night, "Oh yeah, I should have texted so and so. Oh well, it's too late now." No it's not. Schedule the message to be delivered at 8:56am the next morning. If you let the moment go, you'll forget by morning and people who matter to God, and therefore you, will fall through the cracks.

7 – ASK GOOD QUESTIONS

I'm sure you've all heard of the 80/20 rule, right? Listen 80%, talk 20%. It's a rule for a reason. Yeah, there are some situations where it's okay to break it. Sometimes the other person just doesn't want to talk. Maybe they're shy. Maybe they have a well-hidden mental disorder that limits their ability to communicate. Maybe they are just having a bad day. But don't assume these are the case. Assume the 80/20 rule is the best default in a new conversation until you have some information or purpose that warrants deviating from it.

How do you maintain the 80/20 rule when people aren't particularly talkative? Ask good questions. It's really that simple.

Jesus asked great questions all the time. The Pharisees wanted to express themselves to others. Jesus repeatedly asks others to express themselves to him. Yes, he taught too. But even many of his teachings were rooted in directed questions.

When I disciple guys, I often give them a challenge: Teach me something you're experienced at that I'm clueless on – but do it by only asking questions. You may not speak any statements; only questions. Everyone I've done this exercise with has loved it. They have also found it extremely challenging. Most people aren't experienced at asking questions. I know I wasn't for a long time (and I still have to consciously remind myself at times). But I promise it's a skill you can learn, and when you master it, you will find it will make a MASSIVE difference in how quickly people grow to enjoy your company.

8 – ACTUALLY CARE

Questions are great because they communicate that you care about other people. It shows that you're interested in what they have to say. But it's not enough to communicate these things. You must ACTUALLY care and ACTUALLY be interested.

This may sound dumb and obvious, but it's not natural for many people. Especially among the types of guys who find these forums, there's a tendency to put on a show and go through the motions to accomplish your goals. Showing empathy can often-times feel like a means to an end rather than a genuine expression. Don't be one of those guys.

The Bible is filled with statements about how Jesus looked on someone who was lost and loved him, or wept at the death of a friend even though he knew the friend would be brought back soon, or that he looked on a crowd with compassion. He actually cared about people. If you want to be like Christ, you can't just pretend to care about people. You must actually care about them.

Many people are intuitive about interpersonal connections. As good as you may think you are at faking it, I'd bet more people see through you than you think. Don't assume you can fool someone. Actually caring about others is the best way to ensure a relationship is formed. If you don't actually care about them, you'll find it too easy to write them off and move onto the next person. Genuine care and concern for them takes "follow-up" from being a tool/strategy into being an internalized compulsion because you can't quickly ignore or forget about people you actually care about.

How do you show people you care? The simplest way is to give them your time and attention in non-attention-seeking ways. Being at the church picnic and talking to the one homeless guy who shows up is fine, but it could also be a show for everyone else around. I just had a client hire me today who said she had spoken to and met with more attorneys than she could count, but was absolutely convinced that I was the one for her. Why? She said it was because I maintained eye contact with her throughout the meeting, I engaged on the issues that were important to her rather than the legal direction I thought her case should go, and I gave her 3.5 hours of my time, even though she only paid me 40-minutes-worth of my hourly rate. She could see that I cared about her case and I cared about protecting her daughter. That genuine care matters to people and it is how relationships get off the ground.

9 – BE OPEN-MINDED

Isaiah 45 prophesies, "I will give you the treasures of darkness, riches stored in secret places, so that you may know that I am the Lord, the God of Israel, who summons you by name." You never know who God will bring into your life or why. Often-times these people are those you wouldn't expect to be "friend" material in your life. Maybe they're too mean, or too aloof, or perhaps they're too unintelligent, or too socially awkward, or too poor, or too mentally handicapped. Or maybe it's on the other extreme – they're too good-looking, too popular, too rich, too buff, too cool in their leather jacket and sun glasses, etc.

Don't make assumptions about who you can connect with or not. For those you perceive to be "above" you – read the poem of Richard Cory or the numerous novels, short stories, movies, documentaries, biographies of the rich and famous, etc. and you'll see quite quickly that those you think are "above" you still need real relationships that they're often-times not finding in the impressive facades they build for themselves. Yes, their wealth and good-looks may not be a façade (though in many cases it is), but their sense of fullness in life very frequently is. If you struggle believing this, go re-read the section on "people are lonely" (#4) and research the topic of loneliness and the struggles these "upper echelon" people go through.

For those you perceive to be "below" you, remember the types of people Jesus spent time with. Fishermen. Hated tax collectors. Prostitutes. The homeless. The lame. The blind. Lepers. To the tax collector Zacchaeus he even invited himself over. When was the last time you told someone, "I'm coming to your house tonight"? What an embarrassing faux pas! Yet Jesus did it. Want to know why? I can't say for sure, but I'd wager money it's because he knew Zacchaeus didn't have the guts, being a despised tax collector, to think the miraculous, famous, wonderful Jesus would actually be interested in spending time with him. To those you may see as "socially below" you, don't be afraid to make this move. Could you invite them to your house? Sure. That might work. But it could also have the effect of intimidating them even more with how much better you have it than them. Be willing to meet them where they're at.

But more than anything, don't write-off anyone simply because they're part of a demographic that you don't think you'd connect with. The polarization concept is to weed out those who will reject you because of your convictions. However, you DON'T want to weed out those who you think will reject you because of social status perceptions.

10 – DEVELOP AN APPROACHABLE DEMEANOR, THEN ACTUALLY APPROACH

I remember a guy in law school who I could swear never showered. I knew 30 seconds before he came near me that he was approaching because his smell hovered down the hallway well before he actually arrived. He didn't have many friends. Can you guess why?

I did befriend him. I actually shared Christ with him and he began reading the Bible with me. By the end of the year, he told me he started attending church regularly. But boy did he smell ... at first. Somewhere along the way I was blunt with him: "I have to ask, when was the last time you showered?" He answered, "In my country, we only shower when we need to." That was a hard conversation, but I told him he needed to start showering every day – and not just rinsing (as was his custom), but also to use soap and shampoo. The smell didn't completely go away after that, but it was better. Tolerable, even.

I remember early in my marriage I had made a similar mistake with my wardrobe. There was a time when I had gained a lot of weight (just shy of 300lbs at my peak), and even though I was the worship leader for the church I was attending, I was showing up with a nice sweater on top and fuzzy stretchy pants on bottom. It was comfy. Jeans were too tight and uncomfortable. What I didn't realize at the time was how embarrassed I should have been at wearing what basically amounted to pajamas when in front of a congregation – and it affected my social presence there. I was weird and unapproachable. People got the impression that I didn't respect them or God because I wasn't willing to dress in a socially acceptable way around them.

Don't get me wrong – again, I'm all for peacocking and not blending in. But peacocks are beautiful, not ugly beasts. Most people would be enamored if a peacock followed them around and approached. Nobody wants that from a warthog. At best, it's an ugly joke.

For other people, your base facial expressions make a significant difference. Some women have RBF (Google it if you don't know – I won't spell it out). Men have similar default demeanors that project an unapproachable presence. I'll refrain something I said above: YOU should expect to do all the approaching, DON'T wait for others to approach you ... but nobody wants to be approached by someone who isn't approachable themselves.

Develop a pleasant smile. Practice it in the mirror if you have to. Have a clean haircut. Practice good hygiene habits, including soap, shampoo, and minty toothpaste/mouth wash. Wear deodorant. Use cologne if you need to. Develop a firm, yet comforting handshake – not like you're trying to prove a point with your strong grip, but like you're naturally confident without the need to prove anything. All of these things matter.

COMPLAINING: Men v. Women in Scripture

Women complaining is a fact of life. Men too. But the response is different. For a man, your job is to figure out how to lead through the problem. Getting caught up in frustration at what other people are doing is the fastest way to lose frame and derail your leadership of the home.

Philippians 2:14 is clear on this: "Do everything without complaining or arguing." Sure, we could reasonably interpret this verse to apply to women too, but the expectations are going to be reasonably different. With a man, it's like God talking to a friend. You can be blunt: "Stop whining and move on." It reminds me of God telling Moses: "Why do you cry to me? Tell the Israelites to move on." Not surprisingly, this is not a spousal-like interaction between God and Moses; it's characterized in Exodus 33:11, "The Lord would speak to Moses face to face, as a man speaks to his friend." We see a similar pattern of "stop your grumbling and just do what I say" when Jesus interacts with his disciples over complaints or whiny requests.

But when we look at Christ's interactions with his bride (the Church-corporate) we see a different response:

- Cast all your anxiety on him because he cares for you ~ 1 Peter 5:7
- Trust in him at all times, you people; pour out your hearts to him, for God is our refuge. ~ Psalm 62:8 (in fact, many of the Psalms are David complaining about other people to God)
- Is anyone among you troubled? Let them pray. Is anyone happy? Let them sing songs of praise." ~James 5:13

Why does the bridal context seem to get a pass? Possibly the whole weaker-vessel thing, the same way that between men and Christ, we're the weaker vessel. Point being: when it's to a BRIDE (i.e. the Church/whole community), the implication is that it's appropriate to bring our worries, concerns, frustrations, complaints, etc. to our groom. Outside of that marital context, your male FRIENDS are best to be direct and tell you to "stop crying and move on."

HOW TO HANDLE IT

In light of the above, I expect women are going to complain to their husbands the same way Israel complained to God or Jesus' followers complained and grumbled at him. It's a fact of life. You have two primary options for responding:

- Pretend your wife is like a friend/man and tell her to get over it.
- Acknowledge she's a bride/woman and treat it like a comfort test.
 - "Oh, that sucks. Must be hard. I can't believe that happened. I still love you. I'm here for you. I can lead you through this."

What are the most common passages cited when Christians are frustrated/struggling and complain about it?

- "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want"
- "The peace of God which transcends all understanding will guard your hearts and your minds in Christ Jesus"
- "Do not fear, for I am with you; do not be dismayed, for I am your God. I will strengthen you and help you; I will uphold you with my righteous right hand."
- "And we know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose."
- "Come to me all you who are weary and burdened and I will give you rest."
- "God is our refuge and strength, an ever-present help in trouble."

- "Because of the Lord's great love we are not consumed, for his compassions never fail."

See the pattern? Yeah, God passes our comfort tests by showing compassion for us in the midst of the problem, but refocusing us on HIS strength and HIS love for us and HIS leadership. That's how you pass a comfort test - show compassion for the issue and refocus her on your strength, love, and leadership rather than her perceived problem.

IN THE REAL WORLD

My wife doesn't complain nearly as much these days as she used to. That's great. But it still happens, and I'd be concerned if it didn't. Why has it reduced? Probably because after she quit her job she's not around people in stressful contexts nearly as much. But when it does happen, instead of the annoying coworker or unreasonable boss, now it's the pushy soccer mom or the kid who treated our kid unfairly.

My gut always wants to tell her, "Nothing you can do about it. Get over it." But that's not reasonable. She's not a man and I shouldn't treat her like one. A concept that took me a while to grasp was when one of the MRP guys told me, "Women are like a steam engine. You can't stop the pressure from building. The best thing to do is to give it room to vent, and do so in ways that makes the engine work for you instead of blowing up in your face." Wow. What wise words! In fact, as part of Christ's bride, that's what I'm like when I get passionate about ministry - I've been told a few times I'm like a firehose and that I need God (or some spiritual leader) to hold me and point me in the right direction, otherwise I just end up making everything a wet mess.

When you tell a wife to "get over it" you're reinforcing the world's agenda of turning women into men (i.e. the companion agenda of turning men into women). Often-times the actual subject matter isn't actually the problem, which is why "fixing it" is rarely the solution (cue the "It's not about the nail" video). Women need to feel things. If she didn't have something to get worked up over: (a) she'd have no context to experience your strength, love, and leadership, and (b) she'd get bored, which leads to depression. This is one of the major problems with the modern world masculinizing women: undercutting their emotional expression stifles them, leading to blah-ness or feelings of failure/worthlessness when they aren't able to hold it in ... ergo, depression, anxiety, and a host of other problems many women today struggle with.

When women complain, it creates a context that elicits your ability to show her your strength, love, and leadership.

- If you don't show these things (i.e. you fail the comfort test), her emotions come from the complaint itself and are predominantly negative.
- If you do show these things (i.e. you pass the comfort test), her emotions come from your strength, love, and leadership and help you bond.

CONCLUSION

Instead of expecting your wife to hold it all in, let her cast her anxieties, frustrations, complaints, etc. on you the same way Christ lets you do for him. Does that mean you fail to set boundaries when it goes too far? No. Obviously the whole point is to give you a chance to demonstrate leadership, not door-mat-ship. Don't fall into the trap of thinking you need to control her emotions. Let her have them, but make them work for you instead of against you.

This book by Ichiro Kishimi and Fumitake Koga, based on the teachings of Alfred Adler, is probably the best work I've seen on the concept of developing frame from the ground up (although we may not fully get there in this post, as this is more foundational). The entire work is a process of deconstructing our preexisting notions of processing the world and reconstructing it from the standpoint of operating out of your own internal point of origin. Audio book is on Spotify (may require premium) and reads as a dialogue between Victim Vomit Victor and a Professor.

LIFE IS SIMPLE: I remember Rollo commenting, "If marriage is hard work, you're doing something wrong." This book extends that concept to all of life, and he's right. Imagine a 225lb bench. To many people, that's a lot. To others, it's easy. The weight isn't changing. You are, as you get stronger. If you think life is complicated, that's your fault, not life's fault.

The premise of the book focuses on Freudian Etiology (i.e. most modern psychology) v Adlerian Teleology. To explain the difference, let's look at a guy who is in a dead bedroom because he is too scared to initiate with his wife (applying the book to my own personal pre-RP experience).

- Etiology is all about cause and effect. He has been rejected by his wife numerous times. The modern psychologist would say that he has been traumatized by all of that rejection and as a result is now incapable of initiating sex, leading to his dead bedroom. Sure, other things may play in, but let's keep this simple and on him.
- Teleology is all about assigning purpose to our experiences. The man has the goal of not having sex with his wife. Wait, what?!? That's right, as absurd as it sounds. Actually having consistent sex with her breaks his mental framework for understanding the existing marriage dynamic and introduces new risks. If she suddenly began accepting his initiation - or even worse: accepting and rejecting inconsistently in ways he can't predict - that's new and scary territory, whereas living in the dead bedroom is the much preferred devil you know over the devil you don't.

In this, Adler denies the existence of trauma, saying that all past events are experiences we use for our present purposes, no matter how severe or mundane. If trauma existed in a cause-effect dynamic like modern psychology purports, we would expect everyone to have comparable reactions to comparable events. But that's definitively not true. People provably respond differently to similarly traumatic situations based on their own present purposes and frameworks for understanding life. In the above context, one person may be traumatized by constant rejection (i.e. old me), whereas another may view constant rejection as a training ground to build confidence (ergo my post: Initiate Often, Confident Always). You choose how to assign a purpose to the past experience, rather than it defining you. In fact, "it defining you" can't happen at all without your willful consent.

My post-RP purpose for my past rejection was to build self-confidence. But my pre-RP purpose was to use it as an excuse to stop initiating. In neither situation did the event change. I changed. My purpose changed, and that's what made the difference. Trauma doesn't make our lives complex. We make our lives complex. As you change, you can choose to see the simplicity of life and marriage.

EMOTIONS: Just as the past is merely a tool to further present goals, so are emotions. Consider a mother who regularly shouts at her children.

- The etiologist would argue: "You have an anger problem. This is probably brought on by something in your past that caused you to be this way, or perhaps even a genetic predisposition. It is part of your personality. But I can teach you coping mechanisms to deal with your anger."

- The teleologist would argue: "You manufactured the emotion of anger to justify your purpose of shouting. You wanted to shout because you have seen that it causes people to submit, which is what you wanted your children to do. You could choose other methods of accomplishing that goal if you believed they were equally effective."

At this, some people believe they have no choice but to react. "I didn't meant to be angry. She just did this and it set me off." Yet consider the mother getting a phone call while she is shouting at her children. She answers politely, chats for a minute, then hangs up and immediately resumes shouting. Was she really incapable of controlling her anger? No. She only used the tool in the context where she believed it appropriate, and used the tool of politeness where she believed it appropriate. In neither case was she controlled by emotional impulses.

From there, often-times when we weaponize our emotions, we might achieve the goal of momentary submission followed by "the revenge stage," where people passively aggressively (or even overtly) get back at us for compelling their submission. Socially, this looks like civil rebellion to overthrow a government. Personally, it looks like the mother's children becoming defiant, slitting their wrists, or tanking their grades as ways actually in their control which undermine her desires over them and her own public image. They now get special attention and the mother bends over backwards to address these concerns, making her submissive to them. If you respond to provocation, even if you win you may lose through inciting revenge. Better not to let yourself get worked up in the first place.

In all this, "False Freudian Etiology" tells us that our personality is bestowed upon us by nature or nurture and that we cannot change it; we can only cope and evolve it. Teleology rejects the concept of "personality" altogether and instead uses the word LIFESTYLE. Lifestyle is a choice. Our choices can change, and therefore we can change.

Why don't we change? Because the devil you know is better than the devil you don't. Change is scary. Even if you are unhappy, it's safer to behave the ways that are familiar to you than to choose a new and untested lifestyle and how it will affect our future finances, relationships, etc. Consistency is safe. Secure. People don't change because they prefer some discomfort and unhappiness in life in order to achieve the goal of safety and security from maintaining our current lifestyle choices.

If you are not satisfied with your life, Adler argues it is because "you lack the courage to be happy" (incidentally the title of the sequel book, which I have not yet read). If you can overcome your fear of the unknown of new lifestyles, you can change and develop any lifestyle of your choosing. Notably: lifestyle is defined by how you experience life in the context you create for yourself, not the possessions you have (more on that later).

ALL PROBLEMS ARE INTERPERSONAL RELATIONSHIP PROBLEMS

This phrase is at the core of human experience. If no human existed, we would have no context for any mental health struggle (only physically induced ones). Even loneliness would not exist because you wouldn't know what relationships were to miss them. Yet the minute we interact with others, that is when room for problems manifests.

Everybody has an innate drive for superiority. This is caused by a healthy feeling of inferiority - when we know that we are operating at less than our best selves and choose to strive to be better. However, this becomes an inferiority complex when we make the alternative choice: to give up, believing that past failures will only recur. Similarly, a superiority complex evolves when one feels compelled to publicly boast of themselves or shame others, assuming that they will be recognized as superior, and if others see them this way perhaps they can believe it of themselves too.

- Example 1: "I don't like myself." The book references a girl who is embarrassed by her blushing problem. She likes a boy, but is afraid of blushing in front of him, so she never talks to him. She asks the psychologist to solve her blushing problem. He says, "I could, but I won't. Your blushing causes you to find peace in the midst of your dissatisfaction with your present life. If I cure it and nothing changes, you will have no other excuse for your dissatisfaction, lose your peace, and will ask me to give you your fear of blushing back, which I could not do." He suggests the solution is to learn to embrace the outcomes of our desired actions, good or bad, and move on rather than living in fear of them (future) or letting them define us (past) [i.e. another way to say "outcome independence"].

- Example 2: "Women don't like me." Many men think this. The view is not actually a product of past experience. Rather, we use our past experiences as a tool to justify maintaining this attitude to meet our present goal: not pursuing women. Why is that the goal? Because one fears rejection. If you focus on your shortcomings rather than strengths, you can develop a belief that women don't like you, which justifies your lifestyle choice of not talking to them, protecting you from anticipated rejection. The problem is that you're living in the future (anticipation) and the past (pain of prior rejection) rather than the present. In this sense, people find it advantageous to not like themselves or to believe women don't like them, despite the unhappiness it causes them.

From there, all interpersonal interactions come down to whether we view others as competitors or comrades. Mental health problems evolve when we view them primarily as competitors. When our lives don't measure up to what we see in others around us, we make self-protective choices to justify the fact that we're losing The Comparison Game to other people. If they are comrades, we can celebrate their victories instead of taking it personally as a sign of our own inferiority.

OBJECTIVES: Adler proposes two core objectives in life: (1) To be self-reliant, and (2) To live in harmony with society. If one can accomplish these objectives, we will find peace and happiness and be free from mental health ailments. They are supported by two psychological statements: (1) "I have the ability/am enough" and (2) "People are my comrades." If we believe these two things, we are capable of accomplishing these objectives, no matter the life circumstances we are born into or what we possess. What matters is not what we are given or now possess, but how we use them to accomplish these objectives. He further breaks these two down into 3 contexts called "Life Tasks," which we have no choice in life but to confront in relational contexts on some level:

- Tasks of Work - Anything sustainable requires other people. Even the job of writing a novel, which seems entirely independent, requires an editor, publisher, marketing team, book stores, etc. in order to make it viable. As such, we are forced into some social context, as it is unfeasible to accomplish without others. These relationships exist only in the context of employment and stop outside the workplace. Even here, the problems are interpersonal. If a man is upset because of his poor performance review, it is not the work that upset him but the condemnation from his superior causing a feeling of inferiority via comparison.
- Tasks of Friendship - These are relationships outside the home and workplace. The number doesn't matter as much as the distance and depth. These are people you choose to value simply because of their existence, independent of whatever else they may contribute to your life.
- Tasks of Love - spouse, family, bf/gf. These are relationships involving bonds of consequence, making them difficult to break, making us more inclined to control rather than sever them. When we attempt to restrict them (i.e. mate-guarding, jealousy), it is a mindset of control, demonstrating that we view them as competitors and not comrades, undermining our ability to experience love in the relationship, leading to conjuring problems in our lives to justify our choices to control them ("I'm not a violent person, I just get so upset because I love you so much and can't bear when I see you being less than the wonderful person I know you can be"). When they behave in ways that hurt us, we must not run away; we must face it, even if we intend to cut it off regardless the outcome, otherwise we solidify a comparison (and resulting sense of inferiority or superiority) in our lives, for which we then make even more poor decisions to cope with it (unless one understands how to unravel it all).

Think of someone you dislike. Why do you dislike them? The etiological answer is, "Because of these bad qualities about them." Teleology says you have made a decision already that you did not want to be in a relationship with them (which is not a wrong decision, the book notes), but feel bad about that choice and therefore look for things to dislike in order to justify that choice. Developing a view of others as competitors gives us an escape plan for relationships we don't want to enter into or remain in, but simultaneously hinders our relationships and forces us to remain in The Comparison Game indefinitely.

- Example: Wife falls in love with a man. He does a lot of weird things, but she doesn't care/notice and things are great. Months later she's not as happy as she once was. She now wants to leave the relationship. Suddenly the things she did not care about before are reasons why she wants to leave the relationship. He did not change. She did. And these things are her excuses.

LIFE LIE: This is when we lie to ourselves and others about our own motives in order to justify our decisions. The student in the book protests, "You don't know me or my circumstances to call me a liar and blame me for my own life circumstances!" The philosopher answers: "You're right. I don't know x, y, and z about you. I only know one thing: That you are responsible for your own lifestyle."

This covers about the first 1/3 of the book material. The next 1/3 will delve heavily into the context of why a willingness to be disliked by others is essential to be free/happy in life, as the desire to be liked comes with social comparisons/expectations that are like chains which control our decisions away from what we would otherwise independently desire/process for ourselves.

This book by Ichiro Kishimi and Fumitake Koga, based on the teachings of Alfred Adler, is probably the best work I've seen on the concept of developing frame from the ground up (although we may not fully get there in this post, as this is more foundational). The entire work is a process of deconstructing our preexisting notions of processing the world and reconstructing it from the standpoint of operating out of your own internal point of origin. Audio book is on Spotify (may require premium) and reads as a dialogue between Victim Vomit Victor and a Professor.

LIFE IS SIMPLE: I remember Rollo commenting, "If marriage is hard work, you're doing something wrong." This book extends that concept to all of life, and he's right. Imagine a 225lb bench. To many people, that's a lot. To others, it's easy. The weight isn't changing. You are, as you get stronger. If you think life is complicated, that's your fault, not life's fault.

The premise of the book focuses on Freudian Etiology (i.e. most modern psychology) v Adlerian Teleology. To explain the difference, let's look at a guy who is in a dead bedroom because he is too scared to initiate with his wife (applying the book to my own personal pre-RP experience).

- Etiology is all about cause and effect. He has been rejected by his wife numerous times. The modern psychologist would say that he has been traumatized by all of that rejection and as a result is now incapable of initiating sex, leading to his dead bedroom. Sure, other things may play in, but let's keep this simple and on him.
- Teleology is all about assigning purpose to our experiences. The man has the goal of not having sex with his wife. Wait, what?!? That's right, as absurd as it sounds. Actually having consistent sex with her breaks his mental framework for understanding the existing marriage dynamic and introduces new risks. If she suddenly began accepting his initiation - or even worse: accepting and rejecting inconsistently in ways he can't predict - that's new and scary territory, whereas living in the dead bedroom is the much preferred devil you know over the devil you don't.

In this, Adler denies the existence of trauma, saying that all past events are experiences we use for our present purposes, no matter how severe or mundane. If trauma existed in a cause-effect dynamic like modern psychology purports, we would expect everyone to have comparable reactions to comparable events. But that's definitively not true. People provably respond differently to similarly traumatic situations based on their own present purposes and frameworks for understanding life. In the above context, one person may be traumatized by constant rejection (i.e. old me), whereas another may view constant rejection as a training ground to build confidence (ergo my post: Initiate Often, Confident Always). You choose how to assign a purpose to the past experience, rather than it defining you. In fact, "it defining you" can't happen at all without your willful consent.

My post-RP purpose for my past rejection was to build self-confidence. But my pre-RP purpose was to use it as an excuse to stop initiating. In neither situation did the event change. I changed. My purpose changed, and that's what made the difference. Trauma doesn't make our lives complex. We make our lives complex. As you change, you can choose to see the simplicity of life and marriage.

EMOTIONS: Just as the past is merely a tool to further present goals, so are emotions. Consider a mother who regularly shouts at her children.

- The etiologist would argue: "You have an anger problem. This is probably brought on by something in your past that caused you to be this way, or perhaps even a genetic predisposition. It is part of your personality. But I can teach you coping mechanisms to deal with your anger."

- The teleologist would argue: "You manufactured the emotion of anger to justify your purpose of shouting. You wanted to shout because you have seen that it causes people to submit, which is what you wanted your children to do. You could choose other methods of accomplishing that goal if you believed they were equally effective."

At this, some people believe they have no choice but to react. "I didn't meant to be angry. She just did this and it set me off." Yet consider the mother getting a phone call while she is shouting at her children. She answers politely, chats for a minute, then hangs up and immediately resumes shouting. Was she really incapable of controlling her anger? No. She only used the tool in the context where she believed it appropriate, and used the tool of politeness where she believed it appropriate. In neither case was she controlled by emotional impulses.

From there, often-times when we weaponize our emotions, we might achieve the goal of momentary submission followed by "the revenge stage," where people passively aggressively (or even overtly) get back at us for compelling their submission. Socially, this looks like civil rebellion to overthrow a government. Personally, it looks like the mother's children becoming defiant, slitting their wrists, or tanking their grades as ways actually in their control which undermine her desires over them and her own public image. They now get special attention and the mother bends over backwards to address these concerns, making her submissive to them. If you respond to provocation, even if you win you may lose through inciting revenge. Better not to let yourself get worked up in the first place.

In all this, "False Freudian Etiology" tells us that our personality is bestowed upon us by nature or nurture and that we cannot change it; we can only cope and evolve it. Teleology rejects the concept of "personality" altogether and instead uses the word LIFESTYLE. Lifestyle is a choice. Our choices can change, and therefore we can change.

Why don't we change? Because the devil you know is better than the devil you don't. Change is scary. Even if you are unhappy, it's safer to behave the ways that are familiar to you than to choose a new and untested lifestyle and how it will affect our future finances, relationships, etc. Consistency is safe. Secure. People don't change because they prefer some discomfort and unhappiness in life in order to achieve the goal of safety and security from maintaining our current lifestyle choices.

If you are not satisfied with your life, Adler argues it is because "you lack the courage to be happy" (incidentally the title of the sequel book, which I have not yet read). If you can overcome your fear of the unknown of new lifestyles, you can change and develop any lifestyle of your choosing. Notably: lifestyle is defined by how you experience life in the context you create for yourself, not the possessions you have (more on that later).

ALL PROBLEMS ARE INTERPERSONAL RELATIONSHIP PROBLEMS

This phrase is at the core of human experience. If no human existed, we would have no context for any mental health struggle (only physically induced ones). Even loneliness would not exist because you wouldn't know what relationships were to miss them. Yet the minute we interact with others, that is when room for problems manifests.

Everybody has an innate drive for superiority. This is caused by a healthy feeling of inferiority - when we know that we are operating at less than our best selves and choose to strive to be better. However, this becomes an inferiority complex when we make the alternative choice: to give up, believing that past failures will only recur. Similarly, a superiority complex evolves when one feels compelled to publicly boast of themselves or shame others, assuming that they will be recognized as superior, and if others see them this way perhaps they can believe it of themselves too.

- Example 1: "I don't like myself." The book references a girl who is embarrassed by her blushing problem. She likes a boy, but is afraid of blushing in front of him, so she never talks to him. She asks the psychologist to solve her blushing problem. He says, "I could, but I won't. Your blushing causes you to find peace in the midst of your dissatisfaction with your present life. If I cure it and nothing changes, you will have no other excuse for your dissatisfaction, lose your peace, and will ask me to give you your fear of blushing back, which I could not do." He suggests the solution is to learn to embrace the outcomes of our desired actions, good or bad, and move on rather than living in fear of them (future) or letting them define us (past) [i.e. another way to say "outcome independence"].

- Example 2: "Women don't like me." Many men think this. The view is not actually a product of past experience. Rather, we use our past experiences as a tool to justify maintaining this attitude to meet our present goal: not pursuing women. Why is that the goal? Because one fears rejection. If you focus on your shortcomings rather than strengths, you can develop a belief that women don't like you, which justifies your lifestyle choice of not talking to them, protecting you from anticipated rejection. The problem is that you're living in the future (anticipation) and the past (pain of prior rejection) rather than the present. In this sense, people find it advantageous to not like themselves or to believe women don't like them, despite the unhappiness it causes them.

From there, all interpersonal interactions come down to whether we view others as competitors or comrades. Mental health problems evolve when we view them primarily as competitors. When our lives don't measure up to what we see in others around us, we make self-protective choices to justify the fact that we're losing The Comparison Game to other people. If they are comrades, we can celebrate their victories instead of taking it personally as a sign of our own inferiority.

OBJECTIVES: Adler proposes two core objectives in life: (1) To be self-reliant, and (2) To live in harmony with society. If one can accomplish these objectives, we will find peace and happiness and be free from mental health ailments. They are supported by two psychological statements: (1) "I have the ability/am enough" and (2) "People are my comrades." If we believe these two things, we are capable of accomplishing these objectives, no matter the life circumstances we are born into or what we possess. What matters is not what we are given or now possess, but how we use them to accomplish these objectives. He further breaks these two down into 3 contexts called "Life Tasks," which we have no choice in life but to confront in relational contexts on some level:

- Tasks of Work - Anything sustainable requires other people. Even the job of writing a novel, which seems entirely independent, requires an editor, publisher, marketing team, book stores, etc. in order to make it viable. As such, we are forced into some social context, as it is unfeasible to accomplish without others. These relationships exist only in the context of employment and stop outside the workplace. Even here, the problems are interpersonal. If a man is upset because of his poor performance review, it is not the work that upset him but the condemnation from his superior causing a feeling of inferiority via comparison.
- Tasks of Friendship - These are relationships outside the home and workplace. The number doesn't matter as much as the distance and depth. These are people you choose to value simply because of their existence, independent of whatever else they may contribute to your life.
- Tasks of Love - spouse, family, bf/gf. These are relationships involving bonds of consequence, making them difficult to break, making us more inclined to control rather than sever them. When we attempt to restrict them (i.e. mate-guarding, jealousy), it is a mindset of control, demonstrating that we view them as competitors and not comrades, undermining our ability to experience love in the relationship, leading to conjuring problems in our lives to justify our choices to control them ("I'm not a violent person, I just get so upset because I love you so much and can't bear when I see you being less than the wonderful person I know you can be"). When they behave in ways that hurt us, we must not run away; we must face it, even if we intend to cut it off regardless the outcome, otherwise we solidify a comparison (and resulting sense of inferiority or superiority) in our lives, for which we then make even more poor decisions to cope with it (unless one understands how to unravel it all).

Think of someone you dislike. Why do you dislike them? The etiological answer is, "Because of these bad qualities about them." Teleology says you have made a decision already that you did not want to be in a relationship with them (which is not a wrong decision, the book notes), but feel bad about that choice and therefore look for things to dislike in order to justify that choice. Developing a view of others as competitors gives us an escape plan for relationships we don't want to enter into or remain in, but simultaneously hinders our relationships and forces us to remain in The Comparison Game indefinitely.

- Example: Wife falls in love with a man. He does a lot of weird things, but she doesn't care/notice and things are great. Months later she's not as happy as she once was. She now wants to leave the relationship. Suddenly the things she did not care about before are reasons why she wants to leave the relationship. He did not change. She did. And these things are her excuses.

LIFE LIE: This is when we lie to ourselves and others about our own motives in order to justify our decisions. The student in the book protests, "You don't know me or my circumstances to call me a liar and blame me for my own life circumstances!" The philosopher answers: "You're right. I don't know x, y, and z about you. I only know one thing: That you are responsible for your own lifestyle."

This covers about the first 1/3 of the book material. The next 1/3 will delve heavily into the context of why a willingness to be disliked by others is essential to be free/happy in life, as the desire to be liked comes with social comparisons/expectations that are like chains which control our decisions away from what we would otherwise independently desire/process for ourselves.

COMMENTS

Good Enough?

78 upvotes · 23 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

And this is where the upper-levels of dread backfire. The more you dread, the more you see the green grass on the other side.

Fact: Spinning plates will always give you greater sexual pleasure than monogamy

- It's often said: "If she's not having sex with you, you're just great roommates. Therefore, sex is what defines the marriage." Fair enough.
- But the other extreme is also true: If you can have a better sex life by remaining single and spinning plates, the marriage must be about more than sex.

Why did you marry her in the first place? My hope is that it's more than just, "She was hot and I wanted to tap that every day." If your answer is "because I was a beta turd at the time and didn't know any better; I wouldn't have married her if I knew all this stuff back then," so be it. You married for the wrong reasons and now realize you could have gotten what you were looking for in marriage without getting married. If there's something deeper going on (and I hope there is), do some soul searching, find out what it is, and rediscover your passion, not just your libido.

For many men, marriage becomes almost exclusively about sex. Why? Because they've been starved for so long that it's all they can think about. At a psychological level their perception of what's important shifts. It's like someone living in a third world country during a famine. Most of their day is just doing whatever they can to get some food to survive. Life has a heck of a lot more to it that can really give joy, pleasure, purpose, excitement, etc. than just the thrill of finding moldy bread to eat. But when a random missionary comes by with a bowl of soup, man that's like heaven - it reaffirms the misperception they developed that good food is the epitome of life.

In marriage, many men have been starved of a satisfying sex life - even when they get it, it's not the sex they want. So, they forget that there are other reasons why they wanted to get married to someone in the first place, always thinking of sex instead. If you're legitimately starved, that's fine. But you're not starved anymore. You've got a burger and fries on the table every day and you're upset that it's not filet mignon. What you really need to be doing is leave the restaurant and learn to go bowling or to see a movie. To cut the metaphor: go back to finding things to enjoy with your wife that aren't just about sex.

And STOP cheating on her. That's killing your motivation to keep leading your wife toward where you want her. You could brain-fap all the stuff these girls are doing to you; you don't need them actually doing it to you to know that's what you want or that you'd enjoy getting your fantasy played out. When you're getting that fantasy met through other people, you lose the internal imperative to experience that with your wife. Whenever an internal imperative is lost in a marriage, it is replaced with resentment. That's not very productive.

Now, these other girls are giving you filet mignon because that's what their body agenda tells them they need to do to lock you down (even if it's not conscious). If you were to marry one of them, you're going to start getting a burger and fries a lot more often. Sure, they'll still cook filet mignon every now and then, but that kind of meal is really expensive and not sustainable to have every single day. At the same time, your wife might not know how to cook filet mignon and if you've never asked her for it, she might never bother to learn how to make it. So, tell her you want it and teach her.

If she says, "I'm vegetarian. I don't eat meat, especially if I have to crawl on the floor to cook it," then warm her up to it. I'm still in that process myself, but I have noticed that starting small and working up has made some progress. For ages, my wife was a "missionary or cowgirl, no exceptions" person. Starfish must have been an exciting new position for her. Cue the blindfold. Then some food. Add in handcuffs. Rope. We're still working our way ... but I really couldn't expect her to just go wild without me leading her in it. That's your job, not hers. You want her crawling on the floor? You're responsible for it. But be patient. No one knows how to cook the perfect filet mignon without first learning how to turn on the grill, sear the meat, mix seasonings, butter-fry, etc. Maybe when she finally takes a bit she'll find she likes it. If not? Oh well, as long as it's still on the menu.

My wife is interested in a threesome, results or regret?

54 upvotes · 18 April 2019 · /r/askMRP

I had a client who started doing threesomes with his wife - both ffm and fmm. She used it as a chance to vet other guys. Guess what happened: she met another guy. What did the idiot think would happen?

I told that story to a buddy. He replied, "Nah, I'd only ever agree to ffm." Sure enough, We've been doing it your way a few times now. I want to try it with another guy now. He says no. Over. And over. And over again.

That's okay, I'll just keep on the lookout in case you change your mind. He never changed his mind. She looked anyway, then divorced him when she found the right guy.

"You shouldn't be looking," he often told her. "It's never going to happen," he said. Hey, if you're allowed to look, I'm allowed to look.

Why would you ever want to invite that risk? I suppose if you're divorce proof, go for it. Otherwise, I've never known a relationship where it worked out well. I have known at least half a dozen where it ended in divorce. Yay, more money for me.

Teenage Daughter Wants to Spend Time with Friends During my Parenting Time

44 upvotes · 4 October 2019 · /r/askMRP

It's literally my job to figure this stuff out. Legal issues aside, though, here's the practical way to win the fight without dealing with legal technicalities.

1. This is a fact of life, not just your ex's influence. Deal with it. You do have amused mastery and OI, right?
2. Make your house the central hub. Repeatedly offer for her to have friends over during your time. You triple down on the relationship with her, the supervision/oversight in her life, and don't lose your time. Also, she becomes the popular girl, if you know how to host a teenage party. You are a charismatic, conversationally talented man, right?
3. You know about hot moms? Girls do the same thing about each other's dads. Be the hot dad. This will make the other girls want to come over, making the plan feasible. Your daughter will pretend to be embarrassed, but secretly LOVE the popularity you bring her. Hypergamy, right? Let her leech off of your awesomeness like every other woman wants to. You do lift and dress well, right?
4. When you go to the mall, out to eat, to an amusement park, on vacation, etc. have her invite a friend to join you. Then gab it up with them like you're used to being in with the popular kids. You are a socially relevant, high value man, right?

Look. Your daughter was in your frame. Now she's leaving. That's part of life. It will happen no matter what, eventually. But you can control the phase out much better if you invite her friends into your frame instead.

DO NOT do this in response to one of her requests. "How about instead of you going over there, you invite them here?" is a tactless way of telling her she's winning and you're compromising. You be the one to come up with the idea and initiate. Make it part of your regular plans. "I have to go to the mall to buy a doohickey this weekend. You should invite Jenna and pick out a new top while we're out. Tell her dinner's on me."

If you want the legal angle, just ask. But I promise this relational strategy will be far more effective than anything you could do in court.

A movement?

42 upvotes · 28 February 2018 · /r/TheRedPill

There's a general process for how this always plays out:

1. Visionary: A visionary rises up
2. Growth: People like what he has to say and follow his vision
3. Organization: The followers must organize lest the vision be lost in the growth
4. Institutionalization: The vision gets lost in the growth; people care more about the institution and "movement" than they do about the original vision on which it was founded
5. Recycle: Someone rejects the institutionalization and starts the process all over again as a new visionary; the institution often back-pedals to the original vision to keep from losing members to the new visionary, but because their reason for doing so is not the vision itself, but to keep the institution alive, it doesn't do any actual good

What /u/Triadus3 (OP) is referencing is the fact that RP has organized (hence having a sub with moderators who police the content), but it has not institutionalized and hopes that it never will. Institutionalization is what killed first wave feminism and brought about a new visionary to start the second wave; which then institutionalized and died and a new visionary brought about the third wave, and so on - each more ridiculous and culturally damaging than the last.

By avoiding institutionalization and remaining at an organizational level, RP will not only continue to survive, but it will thrive and bring in by a natural grass-roots method something that would otherwise die if institutionalization had its way. That is, the focus isn't advancing "RP" as a concept - it must always be on the principles that founded RP in the first place.

Sex workers say they have been left out of Canada's COVID-19 response

39 upvotes · 20 April 2020 · /r/WhereAreAllTheGoodMen

I get the tax issue at play here - you don't pay into taxes, why should you get the benefit of them?

But there's something bigger: The article says sex work there is still ILLEGAL - that the women are protected from prosecution, but not arrest; yet the men who buy it are fully open to prosecution. In other words, SOMEONE (a man) has to break the law and risk going to jail for them to get money from their "job."

They're now complaining that their 100% ILLEGAL income stream is gone and the government should replace the money they were illegally acquiring until they go right back to working their job to get money in a way that makes them immune to prosecution, but the men have to risk having a criminal record.

Why not write up an article on how drug dealers and assassins are struggling and the government should pony up to pay their bills until they can resume dealing and killing again? Oh, and let's say that only the people who buy the drugs or hire the killer can be prosecuted, but the dealer and assassin get off Scott free once the arrest term ends. That sounds fair, right? Am I missing something here?

Now, if Canada is anything like many American states, the immunity from prosecution for sex workers should be relatively limited to those who were sold/forced into that line of work and not someone who voluntarily decides to make a buck off of it. But my legal expertise is limited to American law.

I thought you guys would enjoy this, seeing as it's the weekend and all. It pretty much sums it all up.

39 upvotes · 3 August 2019 · /r/WhereAreAllTheGoodMen

My dad described this mentality to me once a couple decades ago: "Does he have money and can I bear to look at his face for a few years?"

Girl In My Friend Group Keeps Talking About Threesome w/ Her Fiance and I Don't Think Its A Smart Idea

38 upvotes · 27 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Practicing divorce law, my perception may be a little skewed, but my experience observing other couples says that open marriages or inviting threesomes will pretty much always result in a divorce. Why?

- It subliminally (if not consciously) communicates to your partner that one-on-one sex with him/her isn't satisfying. So, what happens when options for threesomes aren't available? The subliminal message is that neither of you will be happy with your sex life.
- Feelings of jealousy always fester, as it's impossible to balance attention perfectly.
- The Comparison Game in FFM situations and hypergamy in FMM situations will totally screw with the girl's mind.
- You're essentially opening the door to your partner having an affair, testing the waters with someone new, with your approval.
- You desensitize your partner to the idea of having sex with other people so that cheating seems more of an expectation than a thing to be avoided.

Tons more ... out of time.

It finally happened to me- I'm being falsely accused of rape.

37 upvotes · 17 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

Lawyer here. I can't speak to every state's laws, but the best thing you can do is actually to establish an ongoing relationship with her, including additional acts of consensual sexual activity.

This is where something like fogging can really move in your favor. Agree with her about the times she said you didn't know how to please a woman, to the extent that you were obviously not successful when you tried. Tell her that you'd like to get to know her better, to understand what turns her on and her wants and desires, and that maybe after the relationship develops a bit you could get a second chance to prove yourself.

In reality, the best defense to a rape accusation is to show an ongoing pattern of consensual sexual activity. So, if you can get her to sleep with you again, numerous times even, she's going to have a really hard time arguing to a judge that the first time was rape but then she decided to come back anyway. It doesn't make logical sense. No jury will buy into that. Of course, this method requires you to be extremely delicate and cautious. If you can't pull it off or you think she might be counter-manipulating you in order to build a case for herself, don't try this.

If you don't think you can pull off the above, your best bet is to go with the standard preparation. That usually means documenting communications, ensuring all communications are through text message, or if you have to do it by phone that you get an app that will record your phone calls. You're also going to want to start telling your version of the story to two witnesses. Although this is hearsay, it can occasionally be helpful behind the scenes, such as if a prosecutor were to talk to the witnesses and they back up your story with the fact that you told them contemporaneously with the events the same thing that you're telling the prosecutor at the time of hearing, the prosecutor might have more leniency and willingness to believe you because your story has not changed from then till now. I would also journal your version of events so that you have it in writing, with a date on that journal, so that you have additional documentation that you our story has not changed since the time of the events.

If you are very clever and crafty with your wordplay, it might even be good initiating conversation with her in a way that you can record her acknowledging that there was no actual rape. However, many people are not as clever as they think.

If you really want to go extreme, I had one case where my client called the police in advance and told them that his crazy wife would probably be contacting them and filing false allegations. Then, when the police actually were called by her, they immediately treated the matter with skepticism. A forensic psychologist was eventually appointed on the case, who was very, very persuaded in my client's favor by the fact that he had so much confidence in his position that he was willing to contact the police preemptively about the matter. In addition, both the judge and the guardian ad litem were heavily persuaded by this fact, and all of the accusations were thrown out. That said, I've only tried this tactic one time, so take it at your own risk.

Question about my youth group

35 upvotes · 27 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Your story is very inconsistent in the comments and you come off as very whiny. Worry less about what he thinks and does and fix your whininess and ability to self-evaluate.

We're here to help YOU get your life figured out. Not to be your source of emotional validation when someone doesn't do things your way. Yes, the mainstream church is blue pill. That's a fact of life. Deal with it and work toward changing it.

Questions about RPW beliefs from a newcomer

33 upvotes · 26 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

ONE

- Submissive: Attitude of the heart that you're there to help your man. He sets the vision, you latch on and help make it happen. It does not mean strict obedience, but it does mean that his vision for the family takes priority over yours whenever there is a conflict. Once you understand his vision, you have free reign to move things in the right direction without him telling you what to do all the time, unless he reigns you in.
- Doormat: Strict obedience to everything he says, abandoning all sense of self and personal identity, developing absolute dependency on him for your physical and emotional needs.

TWO

- Requests/Reminders: You mentioning things when nothing else needs to be done.
- Nagging: You mentioning things when he has other pressing issues that require attention. Sometimes "I need a break!!!" is a pressing issue for him. Accept that and let him rest every now and then, particularly from when he gets home from work until dinner's over, or between two tasks. Never ask while he's actively doing something else, as that tells him: "What you're doing isn't enough. I don't even care about that, I really want you doing this." Even if you don't mean it that way, that's how it's often interpreted.

THREE

Your question presumes marriages are meant to be equal 50-50 partnerships. That's not an RP idea, so you'll have to get that out of your head. There are times when it will have that appearance; there are times when he'll have more of the burden; and there are times when you will. Does it ever perfectly balance out? Probably not.

Women tend to do most of the housemaking because they care more about it. I have a standard of cleanliness in my home that I find acceptable. Let's say it's a 7/10. My wife's standard is a 9/10. I do about 50% of the work to make it a 7/10. If she wants to go above that level to have it meet her standard, she understands that's on her because now she's doing something that only she experiences the benefit of. I experience no additional enjoyment out of my home when the floor is vacuumed 4 times a week as opposed to once/wk. I honestly cannot see the difference. I think she's wasting her time. But it makes her happy, so I let her do it. On the flip, while she's doing those extra things, I'm taking the kids out of her hair, usually bringing them to the gym with me, going swimming, going on a walk/jog, etc. This is a different kind of work. I'm not saying she doesn't value her time with the kids, but she certainly places a distinct value on having alone time without them around, and caring for them is a duty that is a high priority for me. So, I'm still taking some responsibility off her plate to do something I value (being with my kids) so she has time to do something she values (raising the cleanliness standard from 7 to 9). This works well for us despite the fact that we both work full-time jobs.

FOUR

The homemaking aspect is going to be there no matter what. One way or another, the house has to be cleaned, dishes need washed, laundry needs done, deck needs stained, walls need painted, that annoying chair needs WD40, etc. There is no option of not being a homemaker. If you don't do it, your husband has to do all of it. Per the above, the degree to which you balance the responsibilities is up to you and your SO. As a RP woman, though, your job is to follow his lead when he's setting out those priorities. If he's a nominally intelligent man, he will understand that your career and financial contribution to the family is one of those responsibilities. But if you put your own vision and dreams above the direction he's leading you, you've got to re-prioritize or tell him ASAP that he's not someone you can submit to and you'll have to go your own way. Stringing him along, constantly battling against him because your dreams are more important than living in a healthy, functional relationship will only make you both miserable.

FIVE

Trusting someone to lead doesn't mean zipping your lip and letting them do whatever you want. As a Star Trek fan, I look at it like a Kirk/Spock dynamic. Kirk is a little (okay, a lot) brash and makes impulsive decisions that seem right in the moment. He goes almost entirely on instinct and experience. Spock is a lot smarter than Kirk and usually comes up with the far more logical plan. In that dynamic we notice three key things:

- Spock always speaks his mind. He will tell Kirk when he thinks Kirk is making a mistake, and will often be unusually emphatic about it for a Vulcan, who isn't supposed to express any emotion.
- Despite being open and emphatic, he always accepts Kirk's plan regardless of the outcome. Sometimes Kirk accepts Spock's advice and commends him for sharing it; other times he rejects it and goes with his gut.
- Although Spock knows he's smarter than Kirk, he realizes that Kirk has separate insights that he and other Vulcans simply don't have and can't understand (usually a "gut feeling"). As a result, Spock rarely views Kirk in a condescending manner, and in the few times he does he always realizes it was a mistake to feel that way or have that perception.

Those three things are submission, in a nutshell. To answer your question, you can't "always trust a man to lead," especially at the start. But as you continue to give him your wisdom and insight and submit to his path anyway, one victory after the next will show you a pattern of living that you can really get behind. If he's really a total idiot with money and makes no victories and just squanders everything, then ask yourself why you're with him. A man like that might have money now, but if he's a garbage leader, he could very well squander all that money and you'll find yourself 55 years old getting a divorce because he blames you for all of his problems, and you've got no retirement to look forward to. As a divorce attorney, I see this happen constantly.

To put it more clearly and in a more RP way: If your man is a garbage leader, he's a garbage alpha. You might be attracted to him now because of reasons, but those reasons will not last when you get married and he never steps up to the plate. Vet him hard for his vision and leadership and decide fast if he's the kind of guy you believe you can follow. If not, find someone who is, even if it means a lower financial standard of living. You'll be much happier with less stuff and a great guy than with more stuff and a trash leader who expects you to sleep with him all the time.

[FR] STFU, just STFU

32 upvotes · 15 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

Less is more. In these types of arguments, the reason NI is one of my favorite WISNIFG tactics is because it's a lot like a cross-examination in court. It's a guaranteed way to avoid DEERing because you never make an argument yourself - you let the other person do it for you. I follow what's known as the Pozner Cross, which is summarized pretty well here.

Here's how this plays out in a marriage:

1. Be Brief. This isn't about getting all your feels on the table. It's about bringing closure to a conflict. You can get your feels out in the bedroom.
2. Be Selective. Pick your battles. If her position isn't hurting your interests, no sense fighting against it. Or if your position won't benefit from asking the question or making a statement, don't do it.
3. Use Plain Words. Don't try to be Einstein. If she doesn't understand what you're asking, she'll start asking you questions back which makes you lose control in the argument.
4. Ask Only Leading Questions. Never ask an open-ended question, only yes-or-no questions. In WISNIFG's NI terms, instead of asking "Why is it bad that I ___?" you switch it to, "Is bad to ___?" It cuts off her and shows that the conclusion matters more than the hamstering or excuses to try to get around the conclusion.
5. Never ask a question you don't already know the answer to. Asking questions to discover answers implies there might be unknown legitimacy to what she's saying. If you're in discovery mode, go for it. In a conflict, you're not trying to discover new information - you're trying to put the matter to rest.
6. Listen to the Answer. You know where you want the conversation to end. But she might say something that helps you get there faster. Pay attention to visual cues as well, as I often find that my wife doesn't even believe what she's saying, she just wants to argue a point so she doesn't feel like a total idiot for being wrong. Let her make her point and fog with any validity in it, but go back to your broken record and negative inquiry.
7. Do Not Quarrel. Basically no DEERing or tit for tat exchanges. Even more important: No editorializations. Editorializations are opinions that comment on a position. If she makes a dumb argument, don't call it a dumb argument. That's just your opinion and obviously not hers. Don't do that. There's very little room for adjectives in conflict.
8. Do Not Permit the Witness to Explain. This is kind of the whole point of the Pozner cross. The stereotypical example is a string of questions: "It was dark out, right? There were no street lights? You didn't have a flash light? You didn't even have your phone with you?" Then stop. Because inevitably every young attorney wants to ask the next question, "So how could you see what happened?" And the answer will come blaring through: "Because it was a bright full moon and I had full vision." I've often found that if I ask my wife pointed questions about what she's saying without giving her a chance to provide her own explanation, she eventually gives up on her explanation before she even gives it. The matter is over and I've won her respect because she sees that I know what I'm talking about, but I didn't force my opinion on her - I just asked her questions to get to the bottom of the best conclusion. Of course, if she is right, then there's no conflict in the first place. Why would I fight against what I know is right?

9. Do not ask the witness to repeat the testimony given on direct. This is all that, "Didn't you just say ___?" nonsense that people love to use. You don't ask them what they said. You tell them what they said, "Just a bit ago you said __. Just now you said __. Am I correct in understanding that you changed your mind?" This isn't accusing her of being contradictory - it's giving her an out to take whichever option you want her to take and not look like an idiot for doing so. Again, the best strategy for resolving conflict isn't to win an argument; it's to make the other side think there's no point in arguing anyway because your way was always going to be the right way and they're the good guy for finally realizing it. I've actually settled cases mid-trial because of cross-examination like this.

10. Limit Questioning. Covered above.

11. Save the Explanation for Summation. In law, this functions as, "Don't explain yourself until closing arguments." In marriage, since you're the judge and not the attorney, it translates simply to, "Don't explain yourself at all." You just say, "Thanks for all of your insights. I appreciate what you've said. Here's what we're going to do going forward ..."

Of course, the major difference between marriage conflict and court conflict is that if done correctly your wife won't feel like she's being cross-examined. Court is adversarial. Conflict within a marriage should take away the adversarial feeling. If one takes on the frame of "judge" in those moments (per one of my past MRP posts), it's not "me against you" - it's "I respect your authority, am making a request, and am happy to answer any questions that will help you make a wise and informed decision."

If you can elicit that attitude, you can do no wrong. If you agree she is right, then you are humble enough to account for the insights of your helper. If you go your own way, then you're a strong man who knows how to say no to get what he wants. That's a win-win.

More Whining about Sex Robots from the Gynocracy- They are Starting to realize that bitchy, sex denying harpy's can't compete. Time for shaming!

32 upvotes · 5 July 2017 · /r/TheRedPill

Many a psychologist has suggested that horror movies are merely a way for us to release our murderous rage, but in a more sophisticated and detached way than buying a ticket to the Roman colosseum or smashing in another caveman's head. This isn't the first or last time this logic has come up. Sometimes it's healthy, sometimes it's not.

Redpilled Christian marriage and pregnancy-bodies

31 upvotes · 18 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

"Charm is deceptive and beauty is fleeting," brother. From what it sounds like, your problem isn't keeping your dick wet - it's getting it hard at all. You want to get hard? Abandon your faith to watch porn and hook up with randos ... if that's your priority.

But if your priority is your commitment to God and raising a united household for the large family that YOU want to have, you're just going to have to deal with it.

I'd think with 6+ years in the red pill, you'd have learned stoicism by now. It's the art of maintaining frame - and possibly even enjoying life - in the midst of unpleasant or even torturous circumstances. Your question is like asking, "Guys, I signed up for the army and I love hanging out at base camp with the boys and target shooting, but when we actually had to go to war like we signed up to do, the whole thing kind of sucked and I know that's what I really want to get out of it, but I hate getting shot at. What should I do?" You deal with it because that's what you signed up for. There's no magic wand "abra cadabra" and poof it's all better now.

Remember: the purpose of marriage isn't to make you horny; it's to make spiritual offspring. If you signed up to the wedding for a different purpose, that's on you. If you're getting what you signed up for, learn to deal with it when accomplishing that goal goes through times of lackluster.

I suppose you could try hypnoses too. Good luck.

How do I let go of my slutty past?

30 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

This would be a great post for r/RPChristians. I'd answer here, but I don't know how open this sub's mods are to comments that are predominantly biblical in nature.

Does this sub find it a good idea to wait until marriage?

30 upvotes · 26 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This sub's official stance is that sex outside of marriage is sin. There is a post on the sidebar that specifically goes into this.

While we recognize that having many sexual partners can increase attraction, as the secular subs have found, it is almost never a necessary tool in order to have a fantastic sex life in marriage. Even on a pragmatic, non-spiritual level, it's important to recognize that a man should have a higher goal than the women he pursues, and sex outside of marriage and multiple sexual partners can, especially for Christians, be counter-productive toward those goals, even while having positive effects on attraction as a whole.

You get shamed for rejecting slutty girls because our culture glorifies women and believes that you should always love every woman and find her beautiful and attractive and value her no matter what negative character traits and attributes they have. Men who believe otherwise are deemed "toxic" and radical extremists or alt right misogynists. It's an unfortunate fact of life nowadays.

Nikola Tesla explains why he never married.

29 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/TheRedPill

The tendency of women to push aside man and

Then [God] said to the woman ... "You will desire to control your husband" (Genesis 3:16)

God totally called that one.

A letter my Fiance wrote me after I began implementing the red pill threatening to leave?

28 upvotes · 6 October 2020 · /r/askMRP

A Tyler engaged to a Taylor? Look at me gushing over the cuteness.

Where is your frame, brother? This isn't "partially operating in her frame." Literally 95% of your post is you telling us what she said rather than what you're doing. You want us to write a reply that you can copy and paste to her or something? I suppose I can give it a shot:

*Dear Taylor,

Thanks for your letter. It was cute, and I understand what you're saying. I'm going to the gym with a couple guys tomorrow at 6, then have some ideas for a good time afterward. Wanna join?

Tyler

For real: let's assume she's accurately reporting events. After all, you had a few comments throughout, but never denied the facts of what she's saying. Those facts paint you out to be a cold, rigid, idiot. I wrote this post for guys like you. Consider:

I am so glad that you tell me ... to be less irrational and emotional you are helping me to be a better person

You're trying to turn her into a dude? Funny enough, she equates this with being a "better person," but I'll let the MGTOWs have the commentary on that. She's a woman. Yeah, you can tone her down every now and then, but learn to love femininity for what it is. Embrace AWALT because, whether you like it or not, AWALT.

you tell me you wouldn't love me me if I gained weight

Idiot. You think this is how a guy with a good frame would handle this conversation? That somehow telling her blunt, insensitive reality is the "red pill thing to do"? Just like you're trying to manipulate her emotional sensitivities, here you're trying to manipulate her chances of gaining weight in the future. Yes, you can influence her and set boundaries. No, it's not wise to do so by threats of not loving her. Oak. You read posts on being the oak yet? You can't only show strength. You must also be a source of comfort, protection, peace, etc. If you can't learn to balance these two, your marriage will fall apart anyway.

you attached conditions to your love

Don't do that unless you're ready to blow things up. You attach conditions to your time and attention. The reality is that they're, for practical purposes, one and the same (especially in a biblical sense). But you're both operating with such screwed up definitions of "love" that what you mean isn't at all what she's hearing. In fact, I'd wager that the word "love" in these conversations has an amorphous, vague disembodiment that doesn't actually mean anything at all when you say it, other than generic sentiments that one can only grasp in an intangible, ethereal context without pragmatic application. Nevertheless, the word itself has a great deal of sentiment to her, however impracticable it has become in being understood during your conversations. Vague notions of her getting your "love" should be a carrot, not the stick. Your time and attention are the stick. In reality (biblically), that IS your love, but she doesn't need to know that. Instead, you're communicating in more practical ways that communicate what you really mean without violating her ability to get feels from you.

I know you don't like to sugar coat things but why make the medicine more bitter that it has to be?

By George, I think she's right. This is part of the evidence that your frame sucks. Instead of handling pain and difficulty in a fun, positive attitude, you seem to be acting cold and stiff, like a corpse. Yeah, corpses have a strong frame. Good luck ever getting a rise out of them (except Jesus, of course; he rose). But nobody wants to hang around a corpse, no matter how emotionally stable they are.

I get the impression that your frame is like a titanium fortress guarded by sentry guns and barbed wire. It's overkill. I mean, it's fine if you actually let someone inside, but she's basically saying, "Why would I actually want to be in your frame?" Her entire letter boils down to that simple question. That's what she's asking you.

My belief is that she pair bonded with you, then realized you're not a very fun person. She doesn't actually enjoy being with you; she just enjoys the feelings generated by having a guy like her. You jeopardized those feelings by acting cold in the way you approached communicating your boundaries and she's starting to realize that in the absence of her feels, she may not "love" (whatever that means to her) you after all.

- If you're cool with that, let her go.
- If she adds value to your life and you want her around, fix your frame.

In fact, if you want any girl to stick around you for any appreciable length of time, do the latter.

It is not un-masculine to ask rather than to order me

The fact that she uses the word "masculine" at all tells me she's clued in to the fact that you talk to her about being masculine. I haven't met many women who instantly assume a guy does something because he wants to be more masculine. In fact, girls go to great lengths to deceive themselves into believing guys AREN'T faking their way into masculinity. So have you spilled the beans about fight club? Are you telling her all your action steps for being a "more masculine guy"?

The impression I get here is that you've told her some of your thoughts on masculinity that you've been learning, and she gets the hint: "He wants to be a masculine man," and is now extrapolating it to this area. You'll fervently deny ever telling her: "Masculine men don't ask, they give orders," and I'm sure you didn't. But somehow you've screwed up in your head that this is true anyway - and she realizes it because girls see through that crap.

But again, this is all a frame issue. Do you want your frame to be the bossy guy or the guy that she and others enjoy being around? Figure that out first. Then figure out how you can get your way within your own frame.

- Wrong Conclusion: "It's not enjoyable when your behaviors have to be corrected, so if I want others to desire hanging out with me I have to give up my expectations over them." Idiocy.
- Right Conclusion: "I need to find ways of communicating my expectations to others without compromising the way I express myself and the image I want to project to the world."

This is why the red pill community has come up with tactics like AA, AM, cocky-funny, pressure-flip, push-pull, etc. They are all strategies for setting and enforcing boundaries and dealing with emotionally sensitive situations in a way that conveys what you really think, but without breaking frame to do it.

- Her: Will you love me if I gain weight?
- You: No. I will stop loving you if that happens.
- Dull (but for some reason recommended at times?): I do not love women who do not take care of their bodies.
- AA: I thought for sure you'd noticed the way I ogle all those whales on the street. I can't stop dreaming about the way my hands will melt into your folds like butter.
- AM: Aw, look at you getting all worried about our future together. You just keep following my lead and we'll never have to worry about silly things like that.
- Pressure Flip: [Pull up shirt; make her feel your abs/pecs] Would your panties still get wet if these were hidden by blobs of fat?
- Fogging/NI: I know how you're feeling. And we both know that's a difficult topic without easy answers. What prompted the question? Is there anything that's bringing out this insecurity right now?
- Push/Pull: Of course I'd love you. Nothing would ever stop that, honey. [pull] ... and I'd reminisce fondly about our love while screwing my hot, skinny second wife [push]

See all the better ways to handle this question? Some are serious. Others are funny. Still others show the absurdity of the question. But all these other tactics maintain positivity and productivity in the conversation while still giving you an opening to communicate your boundaries without killing her feels in the process. In fact, it's a GREAT opportunity to up her feels.

All of that said, I've been there. When I was blue pill as heck, my wife broke up with me for saying I would break up with her if she bought a pair of ugg boots. We got back together, mostly because I was a pussy who cried and pleaded for me to take her back, promising never to be controlling again. Even since my red pill days, that's a promise I live up to - because you shouldn't have to be manipulative and controlling about your behaviors. You do you. If she wants to follow, she follows. If not, that's on her. You can't make her stay skinny, and any ways you try might land you in jail. Stop trying to figure her out and start figuring yourself out. Get your frame in order before making any major decisions.

A 2021 marriage date is way too early for you in this process. I was married at 23. I love my wife and kids, but that was a mistake. If I knew then what I know now, I would have done things very differently - not necessarily in marrying someone different, but I wouldn't have been in such a rush. And I say that as a Christian who remained a virgin until marriage, as did my wife. "I want to get my dick wet" isn't necessarily the best excuse for "therefore it's okay for me to make premature major life-altering decisions without thinking on it for a few more years that could totally screw me over if I mess this up."

So much more to say, but that's all I've got time for. If you want to discuss the more biblical/theological aspects of this question, post it on /r/RPChristians.

"I don't feel so good today, so we won't have sex, ok?"

27 upvotes · 17 October 2018 · /r/askTRP

That's not mere theory. It is a very time honored, well established pattern. Ther only nuance is that many girls do this subconsciously as part of their nature and societal conditioning and not intentionally.

How betas manage to be bf ?

26 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/askTRP

The beta strategy is not bad at getting a girlfriend. Women have duplicitous desires: (1) sexual attraction and (2) life comforts. This is the essence of the AFBB dynamic. They want one guy to have sex with and someone else to provide the commitment and life comforts.

Women are dishonest with themselves about what they find attractive - and have been for so long that they often don't even know this is happening. They genuinely believe that they will be (or should be) attracted to a "nice guy." Why? Because they predominantly focus on the BB side of the dynamic. They assume that if a guy is capable of giving them all the life comforts they want, then he is a great catch and she should naturally want to be with him. But in practice she only wants to be with him, not sleep with him. This is why so many women find themselves sexually uninterested in their husbands, developing a common misperception that women are generally less sexual than men. That misperception then filters into women's minds so that they believe it, which actually does affect their sexuality because then they feel free to reject sexuality, creating a negative feedback cycle.

So, women want to be in committed relationships with the "nice guy" (aka: beta) because they don't know any better. Nice guys see how well this works at getting the "girlfriend," so they play that role, totally blind to the long-term ramifications of this strategy. In essence, they believe what women say about their sexuality, not realizing that women don't understand their own sexuality.

The alpha comes along and presents as somewhat of a dismissive jerk. She's totally aroused by him, but off-put by his non-committal nature. In her mind, he can't provide the types of comforts she wants long-term, so she might not want to settle down with him. So, she rides the CC for a while before finding her beta to settle down with. This is the other half of the AFBB dynamic.

I run the r/RPChristians sub and wrote a post about all of this over here. If you're not a Christian you can ignore the religious aspects of it, but the dual nature on the "man v. stuff" section is pretty applicable to your question.

Dread for women

25 upvotes · 22 May 2018 · /r/RedPillWomen

Insightful and very well written.

FR: The Spousal Support Scam

25 upvotes · 28 January 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

That would imply you added less sexual value to the relationship. Are you the prize or is she?

I had an epiphany this week

25 upvotes · 4 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

This is solid advice. RP tells us that attraction is fostered when we see someone of the opposite gender who is capable of fulfilling their role in a relationship. So, a strong, muscular man is seen as being capable of providing and protecting, and things like his income, leadership skills, social status, etc. all play onto his attractiveness because they show he can fulfill these roles. Attractive qualities in women follow the same pattern.

But, I've noticed another force at play. We also find people more attractive if they express the ability to let us fulfill our role with them. As a result, women become more attractive to us if they let us lead, protect, provide, etc. Similarly, a woman will find a man more attractive if he expresses the ability to let her nurture him, help with daily tasks/needs, show off her beauty a little, is willing to have kids, etc. If we try to stifle the biological imperative of our partners, we are left wondering why we're even with them in the first place. Nobody likes feeling useless.

More to the point of your post, I get frustrated when my wife asks for help in menial things all the time ... but if I offer to help and she accepts my offer, it makes me very happy :) I usually make this offer when I feel I can add value to the situation - like carrying heavy bags that would be easier for me to handle than for her, or cooking food (I'm the superior one in the kitchen by far).

But when we're watching a show and she asks me to get her a snack ... she's equally capable of getting her own snack. There's no better value if I do it or she does ... it's not something where I have a natural advantage - I actually have a disadvantage because I don't know what she feels like eating and I list off 5 things before she picks one. So, those requests I'm shutting down now. I'm not happy to help there, and I'm not going to be her door mat either. Not sure if that distinction makes sense, but I hope it helps.

Need help pulling my life together after rape charge

24 upvotes · 9 August 2017 · /r/askTRP

Unless there's something you're not telling us, there's no way you should have taken a plea bargain. Lawyer here - your attorney got lazy, took your money, and ran off giving you the best deal he could rather than actually doing what you were paying him to do. Criminal attorneys are most notorious for this. They scare the heck out of you to make you pay a huge retainer ("You could be in prison for the rest of your life! ... You'd better get me that money fast if you want a chance!"), then realize that once they've already milked several thousand dollars (sometimes tens of thousands) out of you, you're not worth the hassle of going to trial, so they scare you into taking a plea deal that's really crappy, but telling you how amazing they are for getting the main charges dropped - knowing full well that with the kind of evidence you described you'd have been off the hook completely if you went to trial.

Sorry, I get really ticked at those kinds of attorneys.

How do you move on? My guess is you don't have a purpose in life ... or if you do, it's some half-baked American dream cop-out (hot wife, great sex, lots of money, cool house, etc.).

Find something beyond your life from which you derive your value and satisfaction - but not a girl or anything that won't last. For example, if you orient your life around the weather, even if you move to a place with the perfect climate, you're going to be disappointed. If you make a girl your emotional center, she will always let you down (just as you'll always let her down - that's life). I don't recommend a career either.

Personally, I go with the spiritual - my faith in Jesus. This works for me, and I believe it would work for everyone too. But at the end of the day you have to be the one to decide what you want to value in life and then fix your eyes on that goal, taking steps to make it happen.

Without this sense of being part of something bigger than yourself, you'll get lost in your own misery. People who are living in fortunate (or even "acceptable") life circumstances have the luxury of being self-focused, as is the case for many people on this sub. But you're not there. If you became self-focused it will only reiterate on eternal loop all of those aspects of your life that cause you to not like your life right now. Get out of yourself and find a purpose in life. When you do, you will realize that these false allegations mean nothing.

After all, one of the most godly, Christian men who ever lived - the Apostle Paul - wrote most of the new testament of the Bible while sitting in prison after being arrested for false charges. What was his response? According to Acts 16, he was singing songs - and even when he had the chance to escape, he stayed in his cage and kept praising God. In fact, in Philippians 1 he starts talking about how going to prison on false charges was actually a great thing. You - you actually have the fortune of having escaped those charges. But if you can find something bigger than yourself (whether that's Christianity or whatever else you can invest your life in), your attitude can be the same as Paul's, where you're rejoicing and confident even if you would have been convicted.

Promiscuity and pair bonding

24 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Seriously ... it makes me angry just thinking about it. The sad reality is that it's not just coming from peers, but from some parents even! I handled a divorce case where the mom was on websites (still married, mind you) where she would find men who would pay her money to go on a date with him with an option to pay more to guarantee the date included "time at a private residence" - as if we don't all know what's really being paid for.

The sick thing, though, was not that the mom was doing this or even modeling this behavior in front of her daughter or exposing her daughter to dozens of strange internet men with no vetting (usually 2-4 per weekend), but that she was actually bragging about it to her 13 year old daughter suggesting that it was a great way to earn money and figure out sexual compatibility with a man at the same time. I can only imagine where that daughter is going to end up 5 years from now.

Getting your wife back after a separation

23 upvotes · 12 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I was very red pill (unknowingly) when we were dating, but then thought that I needed to be blue pill as a married man

I'll assume this is poor terminology. I expect what you mean is that you had alpha qualities while dating, but became beta in marriage. There is no going back once you're red pill. You cannot unlearn the truth once you know it.

However, my wife didn't know how to process these changes and wasn't getting the comfort that she needed from me.

Ah, so your initial run at the red pill was to strengthen your frame rather than improve it. A common mistake.

you need to focus on getting HER back

I very much appreciate the "don't go through her friends/family" approach. But I wouldn't make this a focus either. It's very out-of-your-frame.

It might be tempting to immediately call up your cute, flirty, recently divorced coworker and get drinks but it's not a good idea

Well, it's not a good idea if you're going to be tempted. What if I want to share the Gospel with her? Or what if I just want to expand my social circle. You're viewing everything too heavily in the framework of a co-dependent need on having your wife in the same house as you. That's the bad idea I'm seeing.

Unless you're calm, don't call or answer her calls. Take a few minutes, calm down, then call her back.

Ah, so you're learning the art of STFU.

You want each phone call to bring her closer to you

... and then you ruined it.

My wife didn't end up coming back because I logically convinced her to come back, she came back because she wanted to.

Solid. You figured out that she makes decisions on feels.

She came back because I showed her I was changing.

... and then you ruined it. Totally in her frame again. The way you wrote the post comes off as: "I started reading the red pill and it changed me, so she left me because of those changes. Then I started changing in ways that she approved of and she came back. Just do whatever makes your wife happy, guys, and she'll come back!" Please no.

It's easy to blame her and tell yourself that you've been perfect and she's been the cause of all the problems

Fantastic. You're figuring out OYS!

Take a brutally honest look at why she left

... but you'd already ruined it before you even started. Instead of "take a brutally honest look at yourself," it's "why SHE left." Always about her frame and seeing things from her perspective. Let her be the one to set the parameters for understanding how your marriage should operate and fail.

For me, I realized that I'd been way too alpha and that my wife needed some beta comfort that I wasn't giving her.

... and you kept ruining this point. To be fair, even the seculars use the "balance alpha/beta" lingo. But what they really mean is: "balance a strong frame with a comfortable frame." You can be 100% alpha all the time and still be a fun, comfortable person to be around and know how to handle her feels appropriately. The more accurate thing to say would be that you want to remain alpha while learning to incorporate into your frame certain qualities that are associated with beta males - but without actually being beta while doing so. It sounds like you did not take this approach, but it worked for you - and more on that later.

Be agreeable with what your wife wants ... Any time you say the word "no" to her, it's a reason for her to be done with you

Are you not reading yourself here?

When you're not separated this would be a terrible idea, but the rules are different when you are.

No, they're not. Vaginas and female psychology don't magically change during a separation.

Instead of outright telling my wife "no", I instead told her that I was open to looking into that and that it might make sense. Then once we weren't separated anymore my wife looked into it, ran out of steam, and now we're fine.

Ah, so you deceived her into thinking you'd go along with her plan, all the while hoping and expecting that she'd give up on her plan if you gave her several of the other things she asked for. Win for her.

My wife left me because I was too dominant, had a temper, and wasn't comforting

Right. She left because you misinterpreted "improve your frame" to mean "fortify it with barbed wires, turrets, and titanium plating." People like you are why I wrote my "Merry Christmas" post. Learn to have FUN in your marriage. But do it on YOUR terms in ways that YOU enjoy. Chances are, she'll have fun because you are.

You definitely do not want to let yourself go! Become the best version of yourself you can be and when she sees that it will draw her back to you.

Gotta do it all for her, right? Everything is for her, for her, for her. Point taken.

Prayer is absolutely critical when separated

Finally - a point I won't dispute.

1. There are no rules.

Except you just gave a list of 9 of them.

We just celebrated our 4 year anniversary and I can tell that she's much happier than she was

Ah yes, because her happiness levels are the true metric of your life's success.

My uncle followed all the same patterns you referenced when his wife left him a few months back. It worked! She moved back in around Thanksgiving time. So, you've got something going here. In his case, he has to pay her spousal support in the amount of 65% of his paycheck (yes, HIS check, even though she also works and keeps 100% of her check), plus pay all the housing and vehicle expenses (except her gas - she can pay that one; but he buys all the groceries still) - and all that for the privilege of living in the basement and not allowed upstairs except to use the bathroom. She was kind enough to throw a fridge down there, but he has to keep his clothes in a pile in the corner because there are no closets.

But he got her back. WOOHOO! He did it guys!

In the meantime his mission is completely shot. He's so focused on appeasing her that it's literally impossible for him to do give attention to anything else. Even his prayers allegedly "to God" are really prayers to her that only God gets to hear. Transference and all.

When my red pill ex pastor was going through this situation with his wife I asked him a simple question:

- Would you prefer to stand before God with your wife at your side and say, "God, I know I compromised on my mission and didn't do all those good works you prepared in advance for me to do. But I had to keep my wife happy, and that took a lot of time, work, effort and energy - especially after the separation to win her back. But I'm proud to report that despite not doing what you wanted, I was victorious in getting her to stand by my side while reporting to you on the fruit-ish from my life!"
- Or would you prefer to say: "God, I was committed to the work - oh, hi Bob! - you prepared for me. I wanted my wife by my side, but she wasn't on board with that work or the way I was leading to get it done, so she left me. - Dave, you made it! So glad, after all those conversations we had. - I gave her many opportunities to come back, but just as Jesus let people he loved walk away, - Grant! So awesome to see you here, brother! - what was I saying? Oh yeah, just as Jesus let people he loved walk away, so did I for the sake of the mission. I don't know what the right thing to do with my wife was, so I defaulted to what I saw Jesus doing - and Paul affirmed that those of us with wives should live as if we had none. - Isn't that right, Steve? I'm overjoyed to see my labor for you guys wasn't in vain. - So, God: my wife isn't at my side today, but Bob, Dave, Grant, and Steve are here because I didn't let that stop me from building your Kingdom."

I'll go with the latter every time.

Now - I've been pretty hard on you in this post because it's generally HORRIBLE advice for 99% of men. But the reality is that it's advice that I've given before and will continue to give again in very select circumstances. If your marriage is crumbling, that's not the time to strengthen your frame. Instead, I've told guys on MRP years ago: "If you want to save your marriage, burn your frame to the ground and spit on it. Hop into her frame and live there for a few months. Do anything and everything you can to placate her. And then - only after doing all of this for a time to re-develop stability - should you begin working on your frame again, this time focusing on quality first before strength."

You've figured this out on your own. I'm sorry you had to get there the hard way. But in a world where you couldn't function for the Kingdom without her - however weak that may make you - that's the choice you made and I won't fault you for that. I just want to make sure other guys reading this realize that the advice you're giving isn't good advice. It's just effective advice at achieving a mediocre goal in a very finite, specific set of circumstances.

Submissive behaviour

23 upvotes · 12 March 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

I always teach that the best qualities a man should look for in a woman are:

Faithful - That she is diligent with her responsibilities and puts into practice the things she learns, whether from her own self-improvement efforts, things her man tries to share with her, what she learns from life experience, etc. If a woman is not faithful to practicing what she preaches or what she learns, she is not submissive and is only interested in expressing herself rather than respecting others' expressions toward her.

Available - She has to have time to feed into the relationship. In an ideal world, the captain is steering the ship and the first officer makes herself available to him. How backwards would it be if, for example, Spock refused to show up on the bridge when Kirk called, instead expecting Kirk to change his shifts around to suit Spock's needs? If your man is on a mission beyond his pursuit of you - and he's not a good one if he's not - you should be willing to adjust your schedule to meet his needs, not demand that he meet yours. This is a point that many women miss out on, as most women are so self-entitled and flooded with male attention that they're used to the idea that men should bend over backwards to be with them. Healthy relationships are not built this way.

Teachable - Simply put: let your own beliefs be challenged and be willing to admit when you're wrong. Even if you're very confident in your belief, recognize that you might only be 98% confident and not 100% confident and respect the fact that there's still a 2% chance that you're wrong. I'd play the lottery a lot more if I had a 2% chance of winning every time. It's improbable, but still significant. Being teachable doesn't mean you cave all of your beliefs to whatever he teaches. It does mean that you're willing to give him the benefit of the doubt, entertaining his ideas and trying to understand them from his perspective BEFORE you start arguing against his points - and then, if you still disagree, believe and behave as you will. But if you insist on your own way all the time and are never willing to change your views to account for his perspective and a broader view of the world than your own individual view can see, this will be a serious hindrance and make a guy feel like he has no real authority in the relationship and that you don't respect his views or opinions.

Beyond those three core virtues, whether you believe everything it says or not, the Bible does have some good lessons to teach on the subject of submissiveness. While it's talked about in several places, I'll break down just one passage into bite-size sections, and hopefully this meets your request for a "set of points/ rules/ instructions." This is from 1 Peter 3:1-7.

Wives, in the same way submit yourselves to your own husbands

While this passage is only binding on the married, men often won't marry a woman who isn't displaying wife-like qualities before marriage as well, so there's a message here for single women too.

so that, if any of them do not believe the word, they may be won over without words by the behavior of their wives

Most women use the phrase "strong personality" a sugar-coated way of saying they talk too much, much like the saying: "women don't sweat - they glisten." Sweat is sweat. Talking too much is talking too much.

Most often, the reason "strong personality women" talk too much is that they have an agenda and they want to persuade others of that agenda. This passage is suggesting that a better way to persuade a man is through your actions, not your words. Sound familiar? Basic RP concept: Watch what they do, not what they say.

[Bonus Points on doing over saying: Matthew 21:28-32]

when they see the purity and reverence of your lives.

That is, the specific behaviors that are going to win a man over to you are purity and reverence. Purity, in this context, does not mean sexual purity - after all, he's talking to wives who absolutely should be having sex with their husbands. He means a purity in the way their lives are clean. If you talk with crass words constantly, or smoke a pack a day, or grind with numerous random dudes on the dance floor - while you're welcome to do these things, instead of communicating "I'm soft and submissive" it communicates "I'm bold and edgy." Bold and edgy might be a way to get a guy interested in you in the first place, as it can set you apart from other women and certain bold, edgy traits can accentuate your SMV - but it's not going to keep him on the hook for very long, and you just might find yourself more likely to hook up over one night stands than attract a viable candidate for a long term relationship.

As for reverence, this is talking about the way you honor others around you. If you try to dominate the conversation or be the center of attention all the time (some of the time is fine), it reeks of self-centeredness and entitlement and often shows little respect for those around you. Rather than stepping over others to dominate the floor, try empowering others. Two key things that can really help show your reverence for others:

- When you have an opinion you want to share, 2 out of 3 times try stopping yourself, pick someone else in your group of friends, and ask that person: "What's your thought on that subject?" Bonus points if it's someone who doesn't share as much as others in the group.
- Learn to manage your silence threshold. Everyone has one. It's the length of time a conversation can stay silent before you feel compelled to break the silence with your own talking. For some people it's 2 seconds. If they hear 2 seconds of pause, it feels uncomfortable for them, so they just speak up, feeling like they're keeping the conversation going. But if someone else has a threshold of 5 seconds, that person will rarely ever speak up because the 2-second person keeps interjecting before the 5 second person ever feels there's enough room in the conversation to share her thoughts. This used to be a big problem for me, as my threshold was 1-2 seconds for a long time. I intentionally started counting to 10 before answering questions in group setting in order to become better at listening. Surprisingly, while I thought that my "charismatic conversation skills" were winning people over to me through wit and banter (and it did), I had even better relational results when I started employing this technique, as others in the conversation felt like I respected and revered them rather than as if I was trying to impress them.

Your beauty should not come from outward adornment, such as elaborate hairstyles and the wearing of gold jewelry or fine clothes.

That's not to say these things are bad - they're wonderful. But if you rest too heavily on these things, it comes off as vanity.

Rather, it should be that of your inner self, the unfading beauty of a gentle and quiet spirit, which is of great worth in God's sight.

Again, this doesn't mean you should ignore physical beauty. It simply means that if you have no inner-beauty, your physical beauty won't get you very far. You'll be setting yourself up for a string of one night stands, never managing to maintain a guy in a relationship.

Inner-beauty here is defined as a gentle and quiet spirit. The whole "silence threshold" concept is one tactic of developing a quiet spirit. Avoiding coarse, demeaning, or insistent language is a way to develop gentility in how you communicate.

But even beyond talking, a gentle and quiet spirit is communicated best through mannerisms. Are you constantly waving your arms around or nudging people or making faces or rolling your eyes? Or are you respecting others' physical boundaries, maintaining composure through conversation, even when you hear things you don't like, and using softer means of physical contact? For example: if you sense that someone needs a hug, do you shout out: "Aw, come in here. You need a hug!" and then bear hug them, or do you walk quietly over, wrap your arms around and say, "It's okay, I'm here for you"?

For this is the way the holy women of the past who put their hope in God used to adorn themselves.

That is, this is a time-tested and proven tradition for female behavior.

They submitted themselves to their own husbands, like Sarah, who obeyed Abraham and called him her lord. You are her daughters if you do what is right and do not give way to fear.

In more historically remote cultures, they would have used the term "lord" instead of "captain" - the concept is the same. You ever watch a movie about King Arthur or Game of Thrones? You see this all the time: wives saying, "Yes, my lord" to their husbands. It is an acknowledgment of the authority structure in the home, communicating reverence for his leadership. I don't know many women who would even be willing to say, "Yes, my husband," with a straight face, much less "lord" or even "captain." But this was commonplace years ago - an aspect of historical culture that is lost in a modern feminized world.

More interestingly, though, is the final comment - that you must not only "do what is right," but also: "do not give way to fear." This is where most women slip up and start taking control. Instead of trusting their man to meet their needs, they feel they must take the reigns and get it done themselves. The idea of putting one's entire life on the line in order to "submit" to someone else's plan and trust for their provision is quite daunting. What fears are we talking about?

- Can he put food on the table and pay the mortgage without you insisting on maintaining your career?
- Will he ever actually take out the trash if you don't nag him?
- Will he really treat you well if you choose not to reward yourself?
- Will he provide for your emotional needs if you don't remind him to?

I'm sure you can think of many more, but I'm out of space. Hopefully this helps some.

Divorce Incorporated

23 upvotes · 2 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

keep the Blue Pill chump husband around the house for as long as it takes to build him up as a stereotypical 'man' and then escalate the most marginal conflict as a 'typical' domestic violence incident and he's gone.

I recently went to trial on a case where I represented Father. Mother's attorney coached her that in order to get my client out of the house she had to stage an altercation. During that altercation she had a phone recording the parties yelling at each other, then my client turns his back to her and walks into a room, gently closing the door behind him. She dives in, then repeatedly slams the door on her own arm several times (her phone "conveniently" cut off just before she did this), calls the cops, and shows off the bruises to get my client kicked out of the house. Result? My client is temporarily disadvantaged, but through skillful lawyering, he ended up with the lion's share of the parenting time and paying no spousal support (despite the fact that she was SAH). There are certainly ways to overcome these types of scenarios.

I refuse to fabricate evidence like that. But I do employ what I call the "set them up to fail" method. When you know you're on the losing end of a custody battle, especially when it's a close call, give the other person more parenting rights than they are actually asking for. In the short-term you lose that time with your kids right away, but you make it up a year later. Just make it clear in the order: "This is a trial period to see if she can handle it" (with more legalese and obfuscation, of course). If we've appropriately sized up the other side, we set the stage so that there's no way she can handle the responsibility, as most women are not as capable as single mothers as they'd like to think of themselves. As soon as things start falling through the cracks, we're back at court asking for custody and the judge is all too quick to grant it. "You had your chance and failed. Now it's Dad's turn to try." Statistically, single fathers who are granted custody are far more reliable and have a far more positive impact on their kids' growth and development than children raised by single mothers.

All of that said ...

He says woman. I say, you're f-ed; start planning your exit now.

I've worked with over 30 marriage counselors over the years (that's how I get many referrals). Most of them like me because I'm anti-divorce (I know, I get crucified in the manosphere for this - I accept it as an inevitability for many, but prefer to save marriages if the option exists), so they know I'm not just trying to profiteer off of their clients. That said, of the marriage counselors I've dealt with there is only and exactly 1 who I will refer clients to - because everyone else (all 29-ish) preaches covert contracts as the solution to marriage problems. This fosters obligation, which leads to burn-out, which leads to worse problems exactly 3 weeks after you stop going to counseling. The 1 counselor who gets it happens to be a woman - and of the several people I've referred to her, all of those people have concluded counseling and are still together (last I knew: happily) today. Statistically, this is a rare commodity, so I still get the wisdom in what you're saying, but I did find the conflict interesting. I have yet to meet a trustworthy male counselor who isn't preaching beta garbage to his clients.

Interestingly, the clinical counseling arena is mostly feminized, but forensics is really darn fair, for the most part. You just have to find a psychologist who relies on objective tests rather than his or her subjective impressions of an examinee. This is the fastest way for men to win custody cases. Why? Because, as it has been said many times before: All women are crazy. And my mentor adds: The Court actually knows all women are crazy. Your job is to prove to the judge that the wife is crazier than normal woman-crazy.

The common refrain to this is always "just don't get married"

Interestingly, this is the conclusion of the man who wrote most of the new testament: "Those who marry will have worldly troubles, and I would spare you that ... So then he who marries his betrothed does well, and he who refrains from marriage will do even better" (1 Corinthians 7:28, 38). It is also the way I counsel most Christian men: Trust me: it's better just not to get married. Although my counsel goes well beyond the reasons typically discussed in the manosphere.

it is precisely this system's goal to disincentivize long term commitment between the sexes

Interestingly, my state has a Supreme Court decision on point saying point blank: "18 years is not a long-term relationship." The conclusion is that courts in my state may not set "indefinite" as the support term for marriages 18 years or less. So, they're telling women, "If you want the big bang for support, you've got to convince him to hang on even longer."

The laws and the social imperatives that crush men are symptoms of a deeper problem that requires a bottom up changing of men's minds about women and themselves.

This is what I advocate to the men I counsel. Yes, the system is screwed up. Although there are exceptions, it is, on the whole, biased toward women. The government will never fix the problem. The solution goes back to my typical strategy of mental aikido - take what your opponent does and redirect it for your own purposes. In this sense, that's where the manosphere teaches, "Fine, let women have their way. Let the divorce laws be what they are. We'll just choose not to get married then." They respond, "But you can't do that! Marriage has been a fundamental part of culture for millenia!" We answer, "Not the way the government defines it today - since 1969, in specific. Let's go back to the marriage laws that existed for those millenia you mention - that's the kind of marriage a guy can commit to." We don't even need to go that far back, but you get the idea. When you can successfully aikido their tactics, they are forced to change their tactics, usually to a compromise.

Sexual Addiction v. Sexual Starvation

22 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/TheRedPill

Yeah, sorry for that confusion. The ability to have sex on demand came with "lift, sidebar, STFU, etc." In essence, improving myself as a man. Even after this improvement, when I still viewed myself as a sex addict and tried to fulfill an ideal that I had created when I was starved, all the while not actually enjoying living up to that ideal.

There have been many guys who have posted about this phenomenon - giving field reports about how having all of their sexual fantasies met still wasn't satisfying them: because a man needs a mission in life beyond his own sexuality.

Clinging to ideologies we had in our beta days - even if we're now fulfilling them - merely means we remain in the same crappy beta frame we came from. It does not prove that we are any better on an ideological or internal level than we were when we first crafted those fantasies. In short, that only makes for a blue pill man who's deceptive enough externally to get laid. Such a man will still be controlled by his ongoing beta frame - the frame of who we once were when we were weak and starved.

By making the mental transition from an "I'm an addict" frame to "I just wasn't getting my fill," we are able to regain control over our sexuality, lessening our ability to be influenced by society or the women we're sleeping with in the first place, and also by the old men we once were.

Sex and Sin

21 upvotes · 4 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm going to cut you some slack because you're new to the faith. You've clearly got some screwed up ideas about what the Bible says, no doubt from stereotypes rather than the Bible itself. Let's set this straight.

sexual pleasure and pursuing "alldom" is sin

False. Source: entire book of Song of Solomon. Also: Proverbs 5:19 - "may her breasts satisfy you always, may you ever be intoxicated with her love" ... among many other passages.

Salvation demands ... direct their wills away from attaining pleasure.

False. "A man can do nothing better than to eat, drink, and find satisfaction in his work. This too I see is from the hand of God." Ecclesiastes 2:24 self-hate ... necessary to secure grace and salvation ... Christianity demands self-hate and love of God only

False. "Love your neighbor AS YOURSELF" Mark 12:31

For example, lifting weights and building a muscular body are vanity.

False. 1 Timothy 4:8 - "For physical training is of some value, but godliness has value for all things." No condemnation; rather, the implication is that we should seek both, but prioritize godliness.

Sex is lust

That depends on if it's duty sex or desirous sex. Either way, lust isn't a sin. Adultery is a sin. Lust in certain contexts is considered adultery in the heart. The Bible never once outright condemns lust or general sexual desire.

A powerful and wealthy position in society is greed and pride.

False. They can also be a gift from God. David avoided his position as king, obviously having no greed to overthrow Saul or pride to consider himself better than, as he often said, "the Lord's anointed." Yet God made him king anyway. Moses was called the most humble man on the planet (Numbers 12:3) yet was the leader over Israel who made a fool of Pharaoh and all of Egypt. In fact, in the parable of the talents, Jesus implies that positions of leadership are a reward for those who are faithful (Luke 19:17).

Have you been able to find a happy medium?

There is no "happy medium." The secular red pill is merely discovering through observation how God created the world. They get it right most of the time. There are a few things they get wrong from time to time. At the end of the day, if they keep discerning what is true (rather than what they want to self-affirm), their conclusions will end up the same because God's Word is consistent with his creation. There is no medium because we're both exploring an identical dynamic. RPC simply has more information available. The secular world has observation; we have observation plus Scripture.

Vaguely speaking, is there a way to agree with TRP's doctrine of self-love while also maintaining a denial of the temporal world?

TRP doesn't advocate self-love. It advocates a man being able to set his own mission and priorities without being manipulated or influenced by a feminist culture - and then to do with that knowledge what he will. This is why Rollo often says that the red pill is about understanding the truth, not about prescribing a set of behaviors or attitudes. A man can decide for himself what he will do with the knowledge he gains. If he chooses to use what he learns to advance God's eternal Kingdom, as we do here, then he does well in God's eyes.

What does this look like?

Discerning God's mission and frame and living within this fully at all times. Per our sidebar (especially 210 - Mission Matters, Nothing Else and /u/Deep_Strength's recent post addressing prioritization of a man's mission), this mission-oriented lifestyle will lay the foundation for all other things RP says is attractive to women, including the fact that a man should not pursue women as his mission in life.

Passages from scripture or canonical works that address this matter would be much appreciated.

See above - among many more that I simply don't have the time to look up.

The thing is ... even just reading the "core principles" section on our sidebar would have told you as much, which is literally a recitation of verses that undermine virtually everything you've written here about what it means to be a Christian. And yes, I intentionally withheld these from my examples above just to show that there is a plethora of more content even beyond what I've listed here. Going any further on our sidebar would re-bolster this again and again, all of which is heavily rooted in and substantiated by Scripture.

Alternatively, if you had googled for 30 seconds, you also would have found that virtually all of your views here are wrong. What's very concerning in this is that you come in admitting to being a brand new Christian, yet rather than asking what the Bible says about these things, you just make a bunch of false assumptions as if you've already got this whole thing figured out. I don't blame you. The church has screwed you up, as it has many of us. CHALLENGE EVERYTHING. Even the things you read here. Don't take anyone's word for it - especially not your pastor's. Be an Acts 17 Berean and always look things up for yourself. Read the Bible for yourself and get an idea of what it really means to follow Christ.

Should I look for a christian boyfriend?

21 upvotes · 14 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The Bible is absolutely clear that we should not be in potentially sexual relationships with non-Christians (unless you already were when you were saved). If he's not a Christian, it must be ended. Period. I see no room for Scriptural disagreement on this issue. One passage says that this is like trying to make Jesus have sex with Belial, a false idol.

Stern warning aside, I feel for you. The dating culture is rough. Non-Christians, especially, are going to try to pressure you into breaking boundaries. Odds are, if you're with the wrong men you're going to end up having sex before marriage, even if you are absolutely convinced right now that you'd never do that. Get with the wrong guy, emotions kick in like heroine, you're so high your inhibitions go away, and you just flow down the river of pleasure.

Get with the right guy and this risk is still there, just greatly reduced. You can both have clear enough boundaries that it never gets there.

How do you pick the right guy? Read a lot of the stuff /u/RedPillWonder has written geared toward women. Perhaps he'll chime in here too.

Little help - having bitch moments

21 upvotes · 25 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

This stems from irrational oneitis. For religious purposes, I was very resistant to the anti-oneitis talk for a long time, but I've finally caved. I've never believed in soul mates, but I'm mostly anti-divorce. I'm also 9 years and 4 kids, so not too far off from where you're at, but I'm seeing the turn-around.

When you make her your emotional center, everything she says and does matters to you. You try to break it off, but you're subliminally looking at her as the judge of your life. If she's acting like a hyena getting whipped every time you're in the room, just smile and say, "Aww, that's cute." Pat her on the top of her head a couple times, if you have to. The goal here is to show her: (1) that she can't get a rise out of you anymore, (2) that your newfound emotional core is not her, and (3) that you're going to have no trouble moving on from her, if it comes to that. She doesn't have to know the fact that you'd prefer it not come to that.

My guess is that the first time you do something like this, it's going to get real awkward and she's going to explode even more. "Don't treat me like I'm a pet or a child!" Rant ensues. She gives a bigger reaction because she's stuck in the "more of the same" mentality. She doesn't know another way to break you than to go on an emotional assault. So, when she finishes the second wave, you smile [and this part is key] WITH NO APPEARANCE OF SARCASM and say, "So rarely is the sequel better than the original. But ... do you really think you can pull off Return of the Jedi?"

At this point, she'll probably cuss you out and storm off. Why? Because she knows her tirade didn't affect you ... at least that's what she believes.

YOU'RE IN THE BOX!

Here's the thing: you're so invested in what she thinks of you that I don't think you're psychologically capable of just shutting that off. Women have a way of putting men into boxes. Think of it like being in high school as the pudgy nerd who stutters around women. So, you hit the gym, develop some confidence, practice some game, and by the end of Sophomore year you're a stud. So, you ask a girl out and what happens? She laughs at you because you're the kid who used to be a pudgy nerd who now thinks he's all macho [I mean, this didn't happen to me or anything :p/s]. You are macho, but she (and everyone else in the school) created a psychological impression of you and they won't let you out of the box they put you in. Try the same man-up techniques during a summer so you go from fat, stuttering nerd to alpha guy with game from one time they see you to the next and all of a sudden they're all thinking, "Woah, what happened to Ders? He's a total hunk now!"

Your wife put you in the same box those high school people utilized to maintain their popularity. She keeps a position of power if you're not allowed to rise to power. Since you care what she thinks about you and how she treats you (and she knows this!), she has a huge incentive to make sure she keeps treating you like you're in the box, even when you're not in the box anymore. She might not be aware she's doing this, but like the first example of the high school kid, you're not gone for 3 months and coming back a hunk ... it's all gradual, making the impact of your change spread out over time and not a major whammy in her face, so she doesn't take it as seriously, unless she stands to gain something from acknowledging what she has noticed all along (and I'm making a huge assumption that you've actually been changing).

CHEATING YOUR WAY FREE FROM THE BOX

The best answer for getting out of the box is simply to realize you're not in the box anymore and to stop caring that she treats you like you're still in the box. Unfortunately, for most guys, "Just do it" isn't as magically helpful as the person saying it likes to think. "Just stop caring." You've got 11 years invested into this. It's not that easy.

So, there's a cheater method I used to implement long before discovering RP. Here's how your combined logical-emotional salvation path plays out (with RP terminology for ease of translation):

- I can't stop caring what she thinks about me. I feel powerless to this fact.
- If she thinks it of me, that's emotional validation that I actually am that way, even if my logical senses know better.
- I must convince her that I don't care what she thinks about me, even though it's not true.
- If I'm successful, then what she thinks about me is that I DNGAF about her tirade.
- If I can convince her that I DNGAF on a consistent basis, she will think I'm a DNGAF person.
- Since that's what she thinks about me, I am now validated in the fact that I DNGAF.
- I must actually not GAF anymore.

Congratulations, you've just escaped the box!

How did you get out? By pretending that you were already out for long enough that her perception was that you're not in the box anymore. Since her perception is what matters most to you, you're actually willing to accept it as true of yourself, as opposed to your previous faking. Since that new perception is that you DNGAF about her perception of you, and that perception is now internalized by you as true of yourself, you never have to revert to going back in the box again. You're welcome.

I am choosing to "revirginize" myself until marriage...

20 upvotes · 22 August 2019 · /r/WhereAreAllTheGoodMen

I hope you enjoy being single

The real problem is that she won't actually remain single. Some beta bux white knight is going to be swept off his feet at the chance to have any girl because he can't get the ones he really wants. In the end, she'll get a free ride while he works for the privilege of hoping to have sex with her someday, and she'll secretly be dying inside, wondering how she got stuck with that fat loser while all the younger, prettier girls managed to get hunks even though she's just as young and pretty at heart as they are.

Monogamy

20 upvotes · 10 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The question of monogamy was debated here a lot in the early days of this sub. It might be worth taking a trek back to read those posts, doing a search for "polygamy," specifically.

Biblically, there's never a condemnation of polygamy and many of the great biblical figures were polygamous.

- Abraham had 3 wives: Sarah, Hagar, and Keturah
- Moses was married to Zipporah and an Ethiopian woman
- Solomon was famous for his hundreds of wives

- Gideon had many wives and 46 sons born from them.
- 2 Samuel 12:8 says God gave David numerous wives and offered to give more, if he wasn't satisfied. Moreover, God chose to bless David's line through Batsheba, who bore Solomon, rather than his previous wives.
- God seems to condone Jacob's polygamy with 4 women by using all 4 of them to birth the patriarchs of the 12 tribes of Israel, rather than having them all born from his first wife - and most of the way they got together was from sinful motives in the first place.

In all of this, it's clear that there are obvious blessings on polygamous relationships in Old Testament Scripture and scant little condemnation against it.

What does the New Testament have to say? Not much. It says that elders must be "the husband of one wife." So, being polygamous disqualifies you from the role of elder. Some people (and with good reason) believe we should all seek the role of Elder rather than being content on the sidelines, and therefore should all seek to be monogamous. I can buy into a lot of the logic behind this reasoning and dare say I agree. In this sense, it's not a choice, but a consequence. You don't intentionally choose: "I want to be polygamous, and therefore I will voluntarily give up my right ever to be an elder." Rather, you make this pursuit, but if you happen to become polygamous along the way, you are prohibited from becoming an elder.

The NT also says that you should avoid engaging in sexual relationships at all, if possible, but that if you're about to sin, you'd better marry her first to sanctify the sexual relationship. In this sense, sex with someone who isn't your spouse is always viewed as sin, but it can be sanctified by marrying the person. The suggestion here is that a 3-way would be, hypothetically, condonable if you're married to both women.

Then there's the matter of Romans 13, which suggests we must submit to our governing authorities. If you live in America, it's unlawful, and therefore you'd be living in defiance to your governing authority to engage in polygamy, thus it's wrong and you shouldn't do it. But what if you and your wife became missionaries in a country where polygamy was perfectly legal? Romans 13 doesn't give the same restraint. Biblically, you'd still have to marry her before you could have your 3-way, but the relationship seems to be technically okay.

A lot of people will point to biblical examples of polygamy and say that it's "unwise" because "the Bible rarely ever shows polygamy in a positive light and there are usually negative consequences to the men who engage in polygamous relationships." That might be true for the men who let their sexuality control them, but there didn't seem to be much negative consequence for Jacob when he birthed the 12 tribes, or for Gideon who got a lot of sons out of it. Even with David and Bathsheba, the punishment wasn't because of his polygamy, but because he took another man's wife - she wasn't single - and then murdered that man, as made clear by Nathan's parable to him. I would say it's incredibly unwise to do something that would disqualify you from having a greater role of influence and authority in God's Kingdom (i.e. becoming an elder - though this means something very different from what modern churchianity calls "elders" in congregations that aren't actually "churches"), so I agree that polygamy is unwise. But is it sin? Only under Romans 13, which is different for each country.

Oh, I should also note that there's a difference between a country that criminalizes polygamy and a country that merely refuses to recognize polygamous marriages. If the government says, "We won't send you to jail over it, but we're not going to give you tax benefits for the second marriage either," then I don't see Romans 13 being a hindrance.

A few more things on poly-sexuality:

First, I assume you're talking about MFF, which are the only forms of polygamy that are actually addressed in Scripture (at least without condemnation).

Second, even under an MFF arrangement, it'd be easiest to justify this if you're having sex with both of them, but not them with each other.

Third, if part of the tryst would involve the women doing it with each other with you watching, there's the question of whether this is homosexual sin or not. If so, then all forms of trysts (which are different from polygamy where there are only ever 2 people at a time) would involve homosexuality, and therefore be sin. Interestingly, the Bible is always clear about two dudes doing it being sinful, but it never says that two women doing it is sin.

- Leviticus 18:22 - two dudes, no reference to women.
- Leviticus 20:13 - two dudes, no reference to women.
- 1 Cor. 6:9-10 - "Do not be deceived: Neither the sexually immoral nor idolaters nor adulterers nor men who have sex with men nor thieves nor the greedy nor drunkards nor slanderers nor swindlers will inherit the kingdom of God." ... no reference to women
- The word "arsenokoitais," which is translated as "homosexual," generally, is also translated as "sodomite," and some translations, such as the ESV in 1 Timothy 1:10, go so far as to say: "men who practice homosexuality" rather than condemning homosexuality for both sexes.
- The closest I can think of that might imply condemnation of FF relationships off the top of my head is in Romans 1, where it says, "Even their women exchanged natural relations for unnatural ones" - but this is an exchange. It is an abandonment of MF sexuality in favor of FF sexuality. That leaves open the question of whether MFF would be permissible because there's no exchange - especially if they're engaging in FF interactions for the purpose of pleasing their husband.
 - Yes, this is weird. No, this distinction between MM and FF sexuality in the Bible is not talked about often. I don't know what to make of it all, nor will I pretend to be an expert, nor will I even suggest that I have even remotely researched this. I'm speaking almost purely off the cuff, so go do the research for yourself before drawing conclusions.

Third, MMF relationships would be prohibited outright. While the Bible does give indications of favorable disposition toward MFF type polygamy, it never references the reverse, and any situation where the Bible talks about a woman having many lovers it's strictly condemned.

Fourth, it's important to bear in mind that marriage is always a parallel between Christ and the church. This can be interpreted a number of ways, but here are the relevant points off the top of my head:

- Some people say that Christ has one bride: the church, and therefore because Christ is monogamous, we must be as well. Polygamy is therefore sin because it communicates a false reflection of Christ to the world - that if Christians have multiple brides, then Christ must have multiple brides too. We must always maintain this reflection. This seems like the most sound conclusion to me.
- Other people say that we are each Christ's bride. Many people personalize it: "I am the bride of Christ and adopted child of God." If that's the case, then yes, Christ, the groom, has multiple brides who are collectively called "the church." In this sense, "the church" is often referred to by Jesus as his Kingdom, not his individual bride. In the same way, a man can have his kingdom in which his many brides will reside. In this interpretation, polygamy is perfectly appropriate (subject to Romans 13).
- The church is prohibited from having other spiritual spouses than Christ, and therefore any form of polyandry is a direct defiance of the image of Christ and his relationship with the church that we are meant to reflect. It would also be clear idolatry and sinful. Women may never have multiple husbands under any biblical framework I'm aware of.

CONCLUSIONS

1. I will never become polygamous because I don't want to compromise my influence in God's Kingdom, which is my mission, which is more important to me than women. If that means taking on the role of "elder" (if I don't already function in that office anyway), then I want to keep that option open.
2. If you really want to have your 3 way, that may be fine, but you're going to have to marry the second woman first.
3. To marry her would involve moving to a country (or state, if any are out there) where polygamy is not a crime. Last I knew, even Utah criminalizes polygamy, but the cops are inclined to look the other way as long as it doesn't involve minors, human trafficking, or violence.
4. This marriage could be spiritual-only and not necessarily legal, and therefore you could get around the potential Romans 13 issue, but you would still have the spiritual obligations of a husband to his wife, which is a life-long commitment.

Take this all with a grain of salt. It's mostly a thought exercise and not based on in-depth research or study. Again, I'm merely speaking off-the-cuff for most of this. Be an Acts 17 Berean and do your own research.

My husband is now TRP

20 upvotes · 9 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

If you do, make sure it's a male therapist. Maybe even insist he chooses the therapist (after all, if he says he's RP, he should be decisive on this, not deferring to you). If it's a female therapist, he's going to go blabbing about how it didn't work to other RP guys and they're going to say, "That's what you get for going to a girl." Of course, if it's a man and he doesn't like the results, he's going to frame it with bias and they're all going to blame the male therapist of being a beta chump who just wants to side with the feminist agenda. So ... your best bet is to insist on therapy, but let him take the lead on it. Set hard deadlines and consequences before you escalate your response to how he's treating you.

Sure, he's going to interpret this as you making him enter your frame - and you are. But if his frame is full of nails and broken glass, he can't really expect you to enter his. /u/jacktenofhearts once wrote up a really good post on this ... something about making a titanium frame that's so barren and uncomfortable that nobody could live inside of it. Search his post history and see if you can find something like that ... you'll find some great stuff in there either way, even if you don't find it.

How do I differentiate friendliness with sexual interest with foreign girls?

20 upvotes · 28 June 2017 · /r/askTRP

I think the other commenters are missing this line:

we have a lot of the same friends and if I f up, it might tarnish my social circle

Why do you care about what these friends think of you so much? As is often said: you're the captain of the awesome train. If she wants on, let her on. If she wants off, let her off. If your friends want off, let them off.

Stop trying to manipulate your way into keeping friends. If they stop liking you because you tried to kiss someone that they happen to be mutually acquainted with ... I'm not even going to finish that sentence because it's so ridiculous.

How to evaluate sexuality compatibility as a Christian with no pre-marital sex and only chaste behavior

19 upvotes · 14 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

There is certainly value in this list. The one caution I'd give is that AWA still LT. If you become unattractive, whatever "compatibility" you think you had will go down the drain.

More to the point: women are often intentionally deceptive, especially when it comes to the lure of their sexuality before marriage. They will make promises that they will not keep (even if they actually intended to at the time). For those of you who know my story, I'm a prime example of that - and I've met many others in that situation as well.

Just because she checks all the boxes doesn't mean she'll turn out the way you think, or that she won't change after you're married.

From there, I go back to the same 4 qualities I have been telling guys to look for in a woman: FAST - Faithful, Available, Saved, Teachable. If you can find a FAST girl, you can instill any other quality in her, including that she will ultimately follow your lead when it comes to matters of sexuality. That is, even if you're not eye-to-eye on sex up-front, if she embodies those traits, you can get her there in time anyway.

So, definitely address the things in this list, but also look for the FAST qualities as your overarching imperative.

Listen up you pricks, we have work to do.

19 upvotes · 16 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I endorse this.

Opinions: Do you ask a woman out to begin dating?

19 upvotes · 13 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Don't "Ask Her Out"

Most Christian guys will say, "You're the man. You should initiate. That's how you lead." While technically correct, this is usually interpreted as: "The man should ask the girl out." That conclusion is something I heavily disagree with.

First, it gets the orientation of the pursuit backwards. Christ makes himself available to us, but the persistent command throughout Scripture is for us to seek God. I did a word study once on every instance of "seek" "pursue" "chase" "draw" and all kinds of variances. For every 1 example of God pursuing us, there were 22 about our imperative to pursue him. Yes, God does "initiate" the relationship, but the Bible is clear that his initiation is an open invitation, not a singling-out. In the same way, a guy should present an open invitation: "Ladies, I'm fair game. I'm going this way, you're welcome to come along." From there, each individual woman must make the choice of whether or not she will accept that invitation.

Second, if a man initiates with, "Will you be my girlfriend?" he is offering commitment freely, which cheapens its value. Stuff I get for free I usually end up throwing away. But if I pay a high price, you'd better believe I'm going to treasure it and keep it around for a long time and make use of it. Modern blue pill dating insists on men offering commitment for free without the promise of anything in return - and even when they do get something in return, women have no problem cutting them off for the next best thing. Because something that's free has no value. Don't cheapen the value of your commitment.

Third, if the man asks the girl out, he feeds into her thirst for validation. Instead of him being the prize, she's the prize. Instead of him selecting his girlfriend, she's put in the position of power to say yes or no, selecting him. This sets up a harmful authority and power dynamic in the relationship from the get-go.

Fourth, pre-marital monogamy is simply an ineffective strategy, and asking a girl out is assumed in most relationships to imply exclusivity. This cuts a man off at the balls and turns the entire relationship into a huge waste of time if it doesn't work out. As Rollo suggests: use the shotgun approach, not the sniper approach.

Fifth, asking a girl out in the socially scripted manner implies that the relationship will follow a socially scripted result. My guess is that you want to defy social scripting in your relationships and follow a more biblical, mission-oriented approach to your life. Instead of setting the tone of a standard cultural relationship through a standard cultural initiation, defy the social script from the get-go in order to set a new context for how the relationship will be maintained.

The "Join Me" Approach

Bad approaches out of the way, I really liked /u/OsmiumZulu's approach, which wasn't all that different from what I suggested privately to you before you posted this. Not only does it show outcome independence, as he suggested, but it also refuses to provide commitment up-front. He invited her to spend time with him. That's it. Time. Not emotions. Not exclusivity. Not high-priced dates. Time.

I recommend guys begin by inviting a girl to join him in something he's already planning on doing, which mitigates this even further - now you're not even giving up your time because you're just doing what you'd already be doing anyway. She's just along for the ride.

If you invite her on a traditional socially scripted "date," like going to the movies or out to eat, you're making her the focus. It's all about exploring "the relationship" and if the two of you will work out. As /u/helaughsinhidden mentioned, this plays into the imperative culture gives for women to get their feels for free. Instead:

- Suppose you're on the worship team with your congregation. Maybe ask her to come to practice with you and you can hang out afterward. Your focus is on your activity and worshipping God.
- Maybe you're discipling a guy and you suggest she join you so she can see your mission in action, and perhaps learn a thing or two as well. Your focus is on the guy you're discipling and on the mission God gave you.
- Or perhaps you were planning on going to the gym or on a run or biking and you suggest she come along. Your focus is on that bar and how many times you can pick it up, and on honoring God with your body.

She is peripheral to your life and mission. By taking this approach, you're not derailing your life to focus on her for a time. You're inviting her to join you in your life, establishing a clear: "I'm going this way, you can come with me" dynamic, which is what Jesus does with us. There is no room for reversed leadership roles in that type of a relationship.

 When to Commit?*

As for the commitment component - yes, that will come in time. But as /u/RedPillWays said, this is for her to bring up. Don't offer her commitment freely. If she wants it, she'll ask for it. And you can decide how much you give and don't. The more you give, the more you undermine your own authority and attraction in the relationship, but as you become more confident that the relationship is leading toward marriage (i.e. you can't stop thinking about screwing her and you're not getting red flags), there's no problem with communicating long-term possibilities (not expectations). Just be elusive about short-term obligations.

Suppose she's been hanging around you for 3-6 months and she finally brings up the DTR talk - "Can you define the relationship for me? What are we doing?" How do you respond?

- Don't: I know we haven't said it officially, but in my mind we're a couple - This communicates to her what she thinks about "couples," not what you mean by the word. Her understanding will be highly influenced by cultural norms.
- Don't: Woman, I'll tell you when there's something you need to know about the relationship - This approach shows no tact. With the right frame, it could actually be pulled off extremely effectively, but I'm not going to suggest that. It's like shooting an apple off of someone's head with a crossbow. If you hit the apple, it's truly impressive and wows everyone around. But the risk is incredibly high that if you miss you're either going to look like a fool or cause serious damage.
- Don't: I'm still trying to figure that out myself or I don't know - This shows your own weakness, insecurity, and lack of leadership, vision, or intentionality.
- Do: I like you. I enjoy spending time with you. I'm not ready to propose yet, if that's what you're asking. God's got me doing some pretty important stuff right now, and that's my highest priority. When I am ready to propose to someone, it'll be to a girl who not only won't distract me on that mission, but actually proves herself indispensable to it. I suppose I'm just trying to figure out if that's you or not. You can even elaborate this with an explanation about why all of your "dates" are non-traditional and focused on things you already have going on in life and not focused on her.

Notice: you're not committing to exclusivity. You're keeping your options open. You're throwing her a bone with the potential for the relationship, but doing it in the context where the pressure is on her to live up to your standards. It's kind of like Jesus saying, "If you don't this or that, then you cannot be my disciple," or, "If anyone would come after me, he must this or that."

That's the conversation you're having with her. You're saying, "Here are my boundaries. It's up to you if you want to be in them or not. It's not up to me to figure that out for you. But yeah, I'm only going to marry someone who is already living in my boundaries."

The Push-Back

If you take the advice above, she's inevitably going to let her cultural conditioning come to the surface: Well, I want to be in those boundaries. I love what you're doing for God and I want in. So are we dating now? What do you do?

Now is when you teach. You whip out all that Scripture you've been memorizing on evangelism and start explaining how Christ lived and what inspired others to follow. You bring up the way his followers, like James and John, wanted specific commitments from him and he basically responds, "Back off. You're thinking like the world. I don't think like that." You share with her your concerns with the cultural dating process - a process you're not okay with. You teach her about the feminization of the church and the way cultural has become so backwards in its approach to male-female relationships that you're committed to rejecting the world's model and following what Christ did with his followers. This culminated in a marriage with his bride, but his bride trailed around him for quite a while before he died for her and became one with her.

In short, when she tries to conform your obscurity to cultural concepts she can wrap her mind around, you unwrap her mind in the first place and let her know what you're really about. You don't say the words "red pill," but you let her know what you believe about it all the same, at least insofar as biblical relational dynamics are to be maintained (don't teach her about fitness tests, dread, etc.).

Why do that at this juncture? Because when she's asking for you to define the relationship, she's already committed. You're early enough that you're not wasting her time if she can't be on board. But you're also late enough that her investment in you has already softened her like clay getting ready to be pressed around a mold. You're also at the perfect juncture where for your own purposes you're going to want to know if she's worth investing any more time in, or if she's a plate you've got to put down because if she's not willing to conform at the peak of her interest in commitment from you, then who knows if she ever will.

Good luck.

Lessons from two divorce cases

19 upvotes · 15 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

The court cares more about what you do than what you look like. OYS, for example, plays out super well. Having rippling muscles can give them the gut impression that you're an abusive douchebag. WISNIFG stuff comes off like pure gold to a judge - especially fogging and negative inquiry. A DNGAF attitude will likely lose you your case. It's all hit or miss and knowing how to paint yourself. Moderate charm works wonders. Too much and it backfires, too little and they think you're just disinterested.

It's important to remember that your judge is 95% or higher likely to be a career beta man or an empowered feminist - both groups who are incredibly resistant to RP attraction methods. The men just don't function like that biologically, and the women judges (although preferable to men judges) will resent you and themselves that they're attracted to what all their peers would call chauvinism when they see it. Either that or they just legit don't like guys like that. The courtroom is a lot like the stage. You have to know your audience and play the part they want to see.

I'm dating two MGTOW.

19 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

I don't think these guys are actually MGTOW. They seem like normal guys who have been wounded by women in the past, so they're a little more cautious than average about getting close to a woman. This is a very common post-traumatic-break-up phenomenon that we see everyday.

With that in mind, if I'm wrong and they really are MGTOW your solution is to reject both of them because marriage isn't in the cards at that point. You're spinning your wheels with no end goal.

If I'm right, they may still need more time than is worth the investment to get over their wounds, so it still might be a better idea to look elsewhere. If you're committed to making it work with one of them and you think they can get over their issues timely, pick the one you think is more likely to make a full recovery.

LTR had nudes in her laptop from her phone dated June/July. Pussy and ass pics. She has never sent me nudes in our 9 month relationship.

19 upvotes · 28 August 2017 · /r/askTRP

More to /u/throwawayantman, rather than backing yourself in a hole that you'll eventually have to get out with the IT "you got hacked" excuse, I'd start with an opportunity to increase game.

OP should just randomly start sexting her. Send some dirty texts for a bit, then up it to a photo of himself. Se if she reciprocates with the old photos or tries to send something new. If she's with Chad on the side, those old photos are most likely for his eyes only so she'll send something new, hoping that the previous evidence never gets out in the first place, much less her being the one to let it out. If she refuses to send pics at all, that creates an even more interesting conundrum.

At that point, he should take some pics of them together on her phone. Then, when they're together, he can go on her laptop to dig up the pics, explain how the auto-sync works, and then magically discover the racy ones she took much earlier because they'd be in the same folder as the pics he has a legitimate reason for looking up.

In both instances (sexting her or taking pics together and looking it up) he's doing things to enhance the relationship, so he's actually moving forward while getting answers rather than the more neutral/deteriorating option of saying he found them online and then having to explain stuff away that might not come off as believable. Always stick to a plan that seems highly probable/normal over the one that involves unlikely circumstances like a random phone getting hacked out of nowhere.

Your wife is a whore and you should divorce her

19 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

there's more to life and marriage than pussy

This. OP's statement that "You will be happier" makes the false assumption that all men assess their happiness levels based on the same criteria he does.

If a man lives in a dead bedroom, his happiness with sex might be a 2, but his happiness with other things might be 10/10. If sex is the most important thing to him, then what OP suggests makes sense. But if he's really low libido and just doesn't care about sex (maybe he's actually the one who's causing the dead bedroom), then how will getting sex with more/different women increase his happiness? Or what if a guy cares about sex a lot, but the totality of other factors that he enjoys about his marriage outweigh the mediocre, yet satisfying sex life he's getting with his wife?

A younger girl. Is this an opportunity or a disaster waiting to happen?

18 upvotes · 14 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

What's your mission? At least you vaguely skimmed Rule 2. But seriously ... I put "MISSION" at the top of the list for a reason.

As for your post, imagine me asking this community:

- I want to buy a house. It was built in 2002 and has some of the issues you'd expect from a house built in that year. But I like it a lot. It's a really fine looking house, and the seller's agent gave me some indication at the open house that the buyer might like me to put in an offer. What do you think, should I buy this house?

There's really nowhere near enough information here to make that assessment. Like ... not even close.

Instead, I'll defer to /u/OsmiumZulu's timeless quote here: "If it's not a hell yes, it's a hell no." In other words, if you even have to ask whether it's a good idea, it's probably not a good idea. Maybe it's not because of anything in her ... maybe you're just not ready because ... I don't know ... maybe you don't have a MISSION yet, so there's nothing for her to follow you toward in the first place.

Sexual Addiction v. Sexual Starvation

18 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/TheRedPill

I like this story. It's part of why I emphasize an undervalued aspect of RP praxeology: a man must have a mission that transcends his pursuit of women.

TRP in the Bible vs. Pop Christian Culture

18 upvotes · 29 July 2017 · /r/TheRedPill

This is why I started the sub RPChristians a few weeks ago. It addresses the low hanging fruit as well as high level concepts and the nitty gritty. I think you'll like it over there. I'd love to see you post this and other high-quality, Scripture-supported posts there :)

So... you got the "I love you but I'm not in love with you" (ILYBINILWY) speech?

17 upvotes · 12 March 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The list of examples is certainly proof that guys need to be cautious when hearing this phrase. That said, I've also known marriages to recover after the phrase and remain in-tact for a decade after (and going). Some of these guys figured themselves out. Others learned to be bigger suck-ups than before.

But if there's true value in this post, it's this:

When your woman gives you this speech it usually means that all of her feelings for you have not only been drained, but she is also actively seeking to get feelings from someone else

From what I can tell, women don't actively distinguish between "love" and "in love" until something else reignites their passion and they remember what it feels like to be "in love" again. Now, that thing isn't necessarily another dude ... but it usually is. It also doesn't mean she's actually screwing another dude ... but it certainly could. But you can be assured that if she's thinking about the difference between "love" and "in love," it's because something else has triggered the "in love" feeling to remind her that what she passed off as "love" for you isn't what she really wants.

I can see someone arguing, "Maybe she's just bored and remembering the good times." Possible, but not likely. I've talked before about how women have retroactive memories - they project their present emotional state on past situations. I can give numerous examples of how this plays out - and most women even admit they do this. If she doesn't love you today, she never loved you. If she's passionate now, you've always been her hunk. So, if she's not "in love" with you now, don't count on it being because she remembers past passion. There's something else triggering it.

Leave and Cleave

17 upvotes · 22 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

No mama's boys. In that culture, it was already understood that women were property and left their parents' house once they married. But because of patriarchal lineage, there was more confusion over whether boys were still subject to their father's house or if they created their own independent family under their father's name and banner.

This passage shows that it was always God's intent that children grow to become independent of their parents rather than eternally dependent.

But aren't we always supposed to be dependent on God for everything we do?

Glad you asked. No, we're not. Total dependence on God is a state of being, not a lifestyle. "Jesus take the wheel" is not healthy theology.

We are dependent because God empowers literally every breath and twitch we make. We would cease to exist if his power did not hold us together. In this, yes, we are always dependent upon God. But transformation means nothing if we depend on God for our character and obedience equally before as after we are transformed. God gives us ownership and agency over our lives through our union with his Son, Jesus Christ, as empowered by the Spirit. We are no longer children in his house subject to his constant badgering. We have a form of independence by virtue of our relationship with Christ, even as the Spirit matures us.

Notice how when our bridegroom came on the scene the Father seemed to bow out of his role of prominence among his people? We are still his children, but Jesus as our bridegroom took the prominent role in how we related with God - because we're not children anymore. That is not to say that Jesus abandoned the Godhead, leaving the Father; rather, it is to say that a husband and wife creating their own bond independent of the husband's household, while still under his father's name, is meant to model the unique way God's people would relate with him through marriage to Christ rather than through prophets of the Father. We bear God's name, but our relationship with the Father is through the Son, and not directly of our own accord.

Potentially Getting Engaged. Asking for Guidance.

17 upvotes · 25 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This seems like a disaster marriage waiting to happen. As OZ often says, "If it's not a hell yeah, it's a hell no." But I suspect the deeper issue here is that you're misreading her.

Let me ask this: how would she respond if you said that marrying her was contingent on her getting a boob job?

You say:

- She is faithful. Will she faithfully honor this request?
- She is teachable. Will she accept your instruction on why it's important to you to have a wife with bigger breasts?
- She is a strong Christian. Will she submit to her leader's instructions?
- She will basically do anything you ask her to do because she loves you and wants to serve you. Will she do this too?

My guess is she'd probably chew you out for being so insensitive and call you shallow, and likely cry about how she could have been so blind about how her boyfriend was really feeling. You even admit this when you say, "I know it would destroy her if she knew this."

So, when you're describing all of these wonderful traits about her, what you really mean is: "She's so wonderful and perfect in all these different ways! ... when it's easy for her to be that way."

You are experiencing selective perception in your relationship. Your emotional connection to her, most likely because of the pair-bonding you experienced from premarital sex, is causing you to perceive things in a distorted manner. You're seeing weak evidence of certain positive traits and expounding on them as if that's definitive evidence of some grandiose measure that she'd never actually live up to in real life.

I'm not saying you should actually ask her to get a boob job. There's a whole host of personal preference and scriptural issues that would have to be ironed out before you go there. What I am saying is that her reaction to questions like that would be very telling about how great of a catch she actually is.

What's even more concerning is that she's not even respecting you in small ways. For example, you say she has ...

a juvenile tendency to do gross/inappropriate things around her friends (she refrains when around me, but she doesn't have the intention to stop this)

If she's not going to be "faithful," "teachable," a "strong Christian," and "basically do anything you ask her to do because she loves you and wants to serve you" even on something so small as juvenile mannerisms, how much less when it comes to something big and important like a boob job ... not to mention everything in-between.

The bottom line is that you don't seem all that into her, so why are you still investing in the relationship? You marry her, I promise - 100% guaranteed - that around 10 years from now you'll see all the other 22 year olds you could be pulling and how much better looking and more respectful and honoring they would be ... and you'll be wondering why you were so foolish as to have gotten married so soon.

Then again, there is the whole thing that you've already had sex ... so I understand the reason to want to justify your sin by saying, "At least it was with my wife."

Also, why do you want to get married in the first place? Being so new to the manosphere, my guess is that you still have lots and lots and lots of blue pill ideologies about marriage and relationships that you've only begun to scratch the surface on. This really concerns me. Until you've fleshed out all your blue, you're probably not in a right frame to be making a wise decision in the first place.

The blue pill in you is particularly evident in all of your questions toward the end:

Is this normal? Can/should this desire be extinguished? If I did find a more attractive woman, would I even be satisfied then? When does the chase end? I really thought I was ready to marry her. What is keeping me from being content. Should I go through with it? Will these feelings go away eventually? Is this a sign I shouldn't propose? Am I being a huge jerk? Or am I just scared of being locked in for life? I feel like I shouldn't be doubting this. When it's time, shouldn't I be itching to marry her? Or is this all just a consequence of having sex early? I don't know. I need guidance.

These questions show me that you're still being controlled by social expectations on what the "right" thing to do is.

Needless to say, this is expected. That's why you're here! That's why we're here! - to help you weed out the blue. You're right to be asking these questions because that's how you bring these latent ideologies to the surface. But you won't be ready to propose to her until you're at a point where you don't have these types of questions anymore. When you have your own mission and a strong enough frame that you don't care what these other guys in your church - or even the people on this sub - have to say about your life decisions (with confident humility, and not because of stubborn obstinacy) ... that's when you'll be ready to decide for yourself whether or not you should propose to someone.

Until you're at that point, I'd recommend taking a step back.

Should I change my name?

17 upvotes · 7 August 2018 · /r/askTRP

OYS. Own it. It's more glorious when you prove the stereotypes wrong.

FR: The Spousal Support Scam

17 upvotes · 28 January 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

We were defense, so they already presented their case and did just that, and they wouldn't get the chance to present new testimony afterward. That's why the setup worked so well.

And so my journey must begin

17 upvotes · 30 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This seems more like an askMRP post. Nevertheless, as /u/UEMcGill says, if you want any chance of saving the marriage, you need to make it clear you're not going to help her.

I'm a divorce attorney. I constantly see guys saying, "I don't want to get divorced, but I can't stop her. So, I just want to do right by her and help her get her new life started." I literally had a client of mine tell me this morning that he's willing to give up over $750,000 in assets to her, leaving himself with nothing and taking on all the debt "just to help her out and get this whole thing over with" - this from a guy who has consistently said that he wished he could save the marriage. These are two totally inconsistent thoughts and if that's what's running through your head (your post didn't give enough information to tell), go re-read NMMNG. Being "nice" probably made her want to leave in the first place. Being "extra nice" now that she's ready to leave will make her "extra happy" about leaving. It's that simple.

Now, it seems like maybe you really don't care to save your marriage. So be it. Figure out what you're okay with and stick to your guns. If your lawyer tells you you're being unreasonable, listen to his advice; otherwise, make it clear to her that she will not dictate the terms of your divorce.

Now, I can't speak definitively as to all states or how every attorney practices, but here's how this will typically go down:

1) She's going to file the case and have you served at work. Embarrassing, but you can deal with it. You'll have to file an Answer and Counterclaim and pay a small filing fee. You'll also need to prepare a series of affidavits that outline all of your assets and debts as well as each of your incomes, and sometimes your monthly budget as well. The assets/debts section will be the most important for you - get this right up-front. You'll also have to fill out a UCCJEA affidavit, which is a national thing (assuming you're in the USA) affirming that no one else has custody rights in your children and stating where they've lived for the past 5 years.

2) She'll have requested temporary orders. That hearing will be about 30-45 days after the case is filed if your court is on the ball. You'll have a quick hearing, or they may ask for written statements instead of an oral hearing. Either way, she's going for temporary custody, debt allocation, and possibly support. The Court will likely issue its order 2-6 weeks after your hearing. Best way to prep for all this is to write up a 3-5 page outline of: (1) her shortcomings as a parent; (2) the day-to-day things you do for your kids; (3) each of your income levels; (4) any opportunity she has to boost her income, if possible; and (5) any ways that she's screwed up the family finances and how you're trying to get things back in order. In each of these, give clear, specific "who, what, where, when, why" details - generalities are not persuasive at all. Saying, "She's an alcoholic" or "she's financially irresponsible" means nothing to a judge. Telling about how she blew $2,000 on a binge-drinking session at the bars last month gives them something they can work with.

3) After temporary orders are issued (or while the decision is pending) you'll likely get a status conference with the judge or magistrate to talk about the case as a whole. Nothing gets accomplished at these pretrials or status conferences. They're mostly just a judicially mandated way for attorneys to make money and for the judge to remind you to keep working on the case. The biggest help you get out of it is that the judge can give his feedback if you're stuck in your settlement negotiations. If it's legit and good feedback, great. The judge wants to see you settle. The problem is that the judges are often so interested in settling that they'll lie about their own opinions of the case just to push a settlement. So, even if the judge would never actually grant spousal support on a 5-year marriage, he might say something like, "5 years isn't a long marriage, but I might do 6 months or a year of support," just to get you to pony up some money and lower her expectations a tad in order to resolve the thing. They pretty much never say anything totally one-sided unless the law is clear and unambiguous - which in domestic cases it never is.

Usually at one of these pre-trials, if custody is at issue, the court will appoint a guardian ad litem. This person usually has to meet with each parent, observe them with the kids, and meet with the kids privately (if age appropriate), then make a recommendation to the court. The best way to set yourself up for success with a GAL is to give a long list of names of people who can be witnesses in your favor. If the GAL calls them all, maybe he/she'll be more persuaded in your favor. More likely than not, the GAL will fail to call all your witnesses and if you get a good recommendation anyway, no worries; but if you get a bad recommendation, you can now ream the GAL for doing a half-hearted job when a kid's life is on the line. It's a win-win. Other than this, I could write a series of posts on how to communicate with a GAL, but the gist of it is to be honest, avoid the blame-game, and if you're seeking sole custody to throw in the phrase, "In a perfect world, I'd love to see shared parenting with 50/50 time between us, but right now that simply can't work because ..." If the GAL doesn't see shared parenting, 50/50 time as an ideal in your mind, you'll get crucified.

4) You're going to spend most of the time with your attorney on discovery or settlement negotiations - sometimes both. Figure out early if the case is likely to settle so you're not wasting your money trying to settle when it never will, or litigating when it could be a quick resolution. 99% - a 5-year marriage case should settle. Dealings with the kids will be the difficult part. If they were born before the marriage, you'll have to make sure to have proof of paternity via a vis the birth certificate or an affidavit of paternity, otherwise you get no rights at all. If they were born during the marriage, you're fine. If you meet the following requirements, don't back down from shared parenting with 50/50 time as your bare minimum: (1) you have no serious addictions to drugs or alcohol; (2) you've never committed a provable act of violence against anyone; (3) you have no mental health issues; (4) you have been actively involved in your kids' day-to-day lives for at least the last 12 months (i.e. PT conferences, doctor's appointments, attending extracurriculars, etc. - not just "I feed them dinner, bathe them, and put them to bed"). If she fails in any of these, you might want to consider going for sole custody or at least shared parenting but you getting the lion's share of the time. If it's really bad, go for supervised visits. If you fail in any of these, be prepared for a grueling battle to get the best you can.

5.) If you can't reach an agreement, get ready for trial. Pull together every exhibit you have that you think might actually be usable and put it into a 3-ring notebook organized in order by: (1) income-related exhibits, (2) asset-related exhibits, (3) debt-related exhibits, (4) documents proving separate property (i.e. pre-marital, inheritance, or gift assets), although these can be mingled in with 2 if appropriate, (5) dirt on her (i.e. her cussing you out by text/e-mail, pics of her drugs/alcohol use, social media posts, etc.), (6) things affirming you're a good parent (i.e. e-mails with teachers, records when you took kids to the doctor, pics of you having fun together, etc.), and (7) information showing how well your kids are doing - if they're doing well, explain how you've contributed to it; if they're doing poorly, explain how your spouse is screwing them up and you're trying to fix the situation, but acknowledge your contribution to the problem as well (anyone who is 100% blame is totally not-credible). If you can pull all this together on your own, you'll be saving your attorney a butt-ton of trial prep work, possibly amounting to at least $3,000 and as much as $10,000 in work. Of course, let him (and I don't mean him/her - female attorneys are a monster of their own; go with a "him") tweak and adjust the book as he believes is necessary. The better job you've done on your own, the less his tweaking and adjusting will cost because it won't take as long.

Good luck.

Why do college girls lose interest quick?

17 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/askTRP

every time I meet a college girl at a party/bar, and hit them up the next day, they seem way less interested than the night before

Because they're not drunk the next day.

Younger 14 year-old sister is turning into a hardcore feminist SJW. What the fuck do I do?

17 upvotes · 27 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

men raping and sexually abusing young girls

The feminist agenda depends predominantly on fear and shame to control its populous. The fear comes from this type of garbage. They will say: If left unchecked, all men would be rapists and abusers. That's why society has to set restrictions on men, to help them become functional members of society. If you don't help us, you might get raped too. Oh, and you BP guy over there? I'm not worried about you raping me, but that's because you're a model citizen, exemplifying all the ideal qualities of what a tamed man should look like. Keep being good and maybe I won't shame you for being so disgusting when you fantasize about me alone in your basement.

How do you help your sister avoid this fear and shame based strategy? More time = more influence. She might take a lot more time than a normal person might, so it might get to a degree when the effort outweighs the benefit, but that's your call to make. But point out the hard truths about life whenever you see them - not in movies, but in real life. If she gets an orbiter, show her what she's doing - that she has a lizard brain too. If she dates a nice guy and she's not long-term happy, point out why she's dissatisfied and help her do some soul searching. These type of people don't change until they're able to internalize the message to their own life circumstances.

My ex starting to deny me seeing my daughter?

17 upvotes · 29 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

With respect, I'll have to disagree with /u/BluepillProfessor on this one. You absolutely want to present a DNGAF attitude while simultaneously lawyering up - and don't go for some pansy push-over lawyer either just because he was cheap (don't go for the most expensive one either, they're 99% of the time not worth their salt). Source: I'm a divorce/child custody lawyer.

The DNGAF attitude isn't about not seeing your daughter. It's about not caring whether or not she's going to let you see your daughter. That's a huge distinction. You need to take charge and communicate with your actions (not your words): "I don't care if you want me to see her or not. You deny me what I want, I'll get someone with higher authority than you [the judge] to make you back down and he'll see how crazy you are in the process."

Most states use a "best interests of the minor child" test for addressing custody/parenting time issues. Within those tests there's almost always a factor that says, "The parent more likely to facilitate parenting time with the other parent" and/or "The parent more likely to foster a loving relationship with the other parent."

The principles found in TRP/MRP are going to help you in court. OYS, don't be a slob/dead-beat, manage your finances well, and show upward social mobility. Do those things and the judge will respect you. He will compare you to all the other dead-beat dads out there and say, "I give custody to moms on so many cases where there are real problems like molestation, violence, drug/alcohol abuse, etc.; if there are no real problems with this guy, why shouldn't I let him be an equal contributor in the child's life?"

Now, if the mom is actually mentally screwed up too, you've probably got a good shot at sole custody. File a Motion for a psych eval, take some practice MMRPs to prep for when you're tested (I found one for free online once) and know the outcome in advance, and condition her to fail it (buckle her frame a day or two before she meets with the psychologist ... or even that morning, if possible); and in the meantime, follow the gold rule of custody cases: DON'T DO STUPID THINGS. Seriously, I'm amazed at how many people (usually on the other side) think it's okay to do stupid things and that the judge won't care.

Be prepared to pay a few grand to the psychologist to do this, but if you come out looking way better than her, it's the fastest track to custody or at least having the dominant role in a shared parenting plan. I call this "Covert Custody Plans." You call it "shared parenting" to appease the other side, but add a clause that if there are any disagreements, you get the final word. This really means you have custody, but the words "Shared Parenting" appear at the top of the page to feed the other side's ego.

My firm specializes in cases involving psychological issues, so I can say quite boldly that at least in my state this is the path to victory and also to (1) force her to work within your frame throughout future parenting interactions, and (2) make her want you back, so she'll be a lot nicer to you while holding out the hope that maybe something could happen again someday.

Just make sure you've got your stuff together and you're not going to come out having serious mental problems. Most RPer's would likely come off as narcissists, which is a devastating diagnosis in a custody case. Maintaining frame doesn't mean the world revolves around you. Humility is a very masculine trait when expressed from an accurate sense of self rather than an effort to undermine yourself.

Most people incorrectly define humility as "thinking less of yourself" or "acting as if others are of higher worth than you." This is not. Humility is best defined as: "Knowing exactly who you are in relation to the rest of society and living in light of that rather than trying to appear better/higher status than you actually are." From what I've seen in my limited experience on this sub, this is a very RP mentality that often gets overlooked or even swept under the rug. But my guess is if you ask directly, people will say: "Stop pretending to be higher value in the marketplace and do things to actually become higher value." That's another way of saying, "Quit being proud and arrogant and develop an accurate sense of who you are in society (i.e. humility)."

Genuinely curious about your philosophies. Not looking to debate just want to listen.

16 upvotes · 21 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Very well said! Given that this is going on the sidebar, for future readers, there are a few things I want to clarify:

1) My personal view is that the feminization of the church started much sooner than 100 years ago. I believe the first woman was ordained in 1815, but it really started picking up by the 1850. But I'd go even further back into the middle-ages when romanticized concepts of love crept into the church and began glorifying women through literature, skewing church interpretation of Scripture with the cultural philosophies of the times.

6) It's worth noting that it's more than just that their "teachings" and ours overlap. When an archaeologist uses scientific methods to confirm that a biblical event did, in fact, occur (such as the overthrow of Babylon by the Medo-Persian empire, as one of MANY examples), we don't say they "just happened" to come to the same conclusions as the Bible about the downfall of Babylon. We say that what God said is true and they, through secular means, have explored the evidence of God's written truth within the observable world. This is how it is with the secular RP's examination of intergender relational dynamics. They are studying the reality that God created without cultural filters that create bias in most "scientific" studies. They're literally just asking, "What actually closes the deal, and how can we replicate it?" Of course they're going to come to conclusions that line up with the way the Bible says God created men and women. God authored sexuality, hormones, etc. They're just studying God's creation to figure out what we learn through Scripture.

7 and 8 are spot on.

To answer /u/stupidspoonerisms' questions more directly:

How would you categorize your philosophies/theology to someone unfamiliar with RP?

We believe what the Bible says. That's really it. We are grounded on theology and not philosophy (a topic on which I have written much). We don't force any one hermeneutic. There are people from all denominations/branches here. We do not aspire to be a particular "denomination" with our own isolationist claims about what the Bible means. We recognize that there are many different valid interpretations of a number of passages.

If you want to say something sets us apart, it's our complete and utter rejection of liberal theology. That is, when people try to infuse cultural philosophies into the way they interpret Scripture, that's where we draw the line.

That said, the most commonly held Scriptural foundation here (which is by no means unique to us) is the view that the Christ-church relationship (and in some aspects the God-Israel relationship) was given to us as a model for the way husbands and wives ought to interact. We look not only at what Jesus teaches, but also at what he does. This is, perhaps, where we tend to part ways with the mainstream church culture, who focuses more on the words than the actions of Jesus.

Would you simply say you're an RP Christian?

Not any more than I'd say I'm a Christian lawyer or that you'd say you're a "Christian reddit user." Your use of reddit is a fact about you, not part of your identity. So, when I attend "Christian Legal Society" meetings they say, "We are Christians who happen to practice law." Here, I'd say I'm a Christian who happens to be RP-aware.

RP is not part of my identity or branding. It's just a context - and a useful one to communicate at various times.

Or is there another overarching name for this type of theology.

Not that I'm aware of. Again, we don't have our own unique brand of "theology." We are just normal Christians who have paid attention to parts of Scripture that others in modern culture haven't given much thought to (for a variety of reasons) - and with a particular emphasis on actually APPLYING what we read rather than just ingesting it for academic value.

Personally, I had never heard of RP and it's hard to find online resources or commentaries on your interpretations of scripture.

That's because very few believers have delved into the Bible's views on sexuality enough to produce content exclusively focused on it that aren't tainted by serious cultural baggage. This, of course, makes a lot of sense when you consider how it was culturally inappropriate to speak openly about explicit sexual matters for all but the last 75-ish years of the world's history. It is the feminization of the world that brought on the sexual revolution, so it's not surprising that the content that's been generated on the topic is feminized as well.

To go from a different angle, if I were to write a "red pill commentary" on the Bible, it would look extremely close to a blend of many other commentaries already in existence. I'm not going to read the book of Nahum or Daniel and try to force some "RP lens" into how the book should be interpreted. But there are some passages where a proper interpretation has been lost on those who have been conditioned by culture to have a butterflies-and-rainbows view of who Jesus was and feminized notions of marriage and sexuality. That is:

- We don't put on an "RP Lens" to Scriptural interpretation. We take off the "Feminized Lens" that everyone else is wearing, then interpret Scripture without that bias. This leads to many similar conclusions, but a few extremely significant different ones too.

To be abundantly clear: there are MANY commentaries that will preach the same things we do. But again, one of our principles is relevant here: Watch what people do, not what they say. This is a twist on the "Do as I say, not as I do" motto that's become a popular joke about churches - because many pastors will not live out what they preach. In this sense, you may READ many commentaries that preach proper principles of marriage, sexuality, headship, etc. - but good luck finding a body that actually practices them. Congregations will pay lip service to Scripture, but conform their behaviors to culture.

In this sense, let me make one more thing clear:

- RPChristians is NOT merely about what we believe, but about how we live.

This is what separates us from the rest of the flock out there. We are committed to living out what we believe about the Bible, whereas many "pastors" and congregations are content to pay lip service, while living their own lives (and leading their flock) on their own philosophies, which happen to be "inspired by the Bible" in the same way many movies are "inspired by a true story" - they will draw from the source content, but put their own spin on it, taking great liberties with the final product.

Is this isolated to reddit?

No, there are a series of bloggers out there who teach similar stuff. The use of secular red pill terminology is probably what most segregates us from the rest of the manosphere Christian bloggers (though each blogger/website/organization/subreddit is going to have its own unique spin on things).

Do you meet up with groups or attend churches with those who adhere to these same beliefs?

Some people do. I have personally led a small group with a handful of guys from this subreddit (primarily over zoom due to geographical issues). But the goal would never be to congregate. My personal missiology involves a DECENTRALIZED Church, not the mainstream centralized model. To over-simplify, this means I prefer to send people out into the world rather than trying to get them to congregate in one place.

I let my LTR show me her DM's after she asked me about it. Does that show weakness on my part?

16 upvotes · 21 October 2019 · /r/askMRP

"Sorry, not into MMF. Let me know when another chick DMs you and we'll talk."

Rachel Held Evans, Influential "Christian" Feminist Egalitarian, Dead at 37

16 upvotes · 5 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

My thoughts are always mixed at these types of things. On the one hand, we have passages like ...

- Ezekiel 33:11 - "As I live," says the Lord God, "I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live."
- Ezekiel 18:23 - "Do I have any pleasure at all that the wicked should die?" says the Lord God, "and not that he should turn from his ways and live?"
- Proverbs 17:17-18 - "Do not rejoice when your enemy falls, and do not let your heart be glad when he stumbles; lest the Lord see it, and it displease Him, and He turn away his wrath from him."

But then we have passages like ...

- Psalm 58:10 - "The righteous shall rejoice when he sees the vengeance; he shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked."
- Proverbs 14:32 - "The wicked is banished in his wickedness, but the righteous has a refuge in his death."
- Proverbs 11:10 - "When it goes well with the righteous, the city rejoices, and when the wicked perish, there is shouting."

I suppose there is cause for both reactions. Any exegetical thoughts on how to distinguish when rejoicing in these types of things is appropriate and not?

Sexual Addiction v. Sexual Starvation

16 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/TheRedPill

In my experience, most people on this sub are not red pill. They crafted certain fantasies during their beta days and merely change their external behaviors pursuant to red pill advice in order to gratify those blue pill fantasies about what type of sex life they always wanted.

This post is for those men who believe they have "arrived," but who still let their old blue pill fantasies about sexuality control their behaviors. They have not yet become their own men, as they're living in the same frame that they allegedly came here to escape. A crucial step in swallowing the pill that many seem to skim over is regaining control over our sexuality and sexual ideology.

Wife wants to take Girls Weekend to Tahoe

16 upvotes · 31 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

all of these things were her idea

I.e. I'm blaming her for my garbage leadership.

Why the heck are you paying that much on rent before your student loans are paid off? My wife and I collectively earn around a quarter mil ... and our mortgage is under $1,300. Set a budget and enforce it. Learn to tell her no.

I'd just tell her: Go for it. Have a great time! Take away her credit cards and remove bank access. "I thought you said I could go?" Of course you can, babe. You're just not going to use my money to do it. Have a good time on your trip. Then give a big, but not sarcastic smile. This isn't a joke or a game or a punishment. It's a boundary.

She's getting chubby...

16 upvotes · 26 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

I honestly don't like the idea of dreading her. I want her to find her way to happily, healthily, moving towards a lower weight

This equates to: "I want her to magically stop being a woman and just start having motivations that she's never really had before."

More to the point, what makes you think women don't like dread? At least for the first several levels, it's really only improving their quality of life. Then there's the fact that women don't judge men on their own - they defer to other women to judge their man. So, if she never experiences dread, she'll never appreciate you. When she feels dread, it makes her feel good and happy because she knows she has a man that other women want, and this wins the comparison game (noting that this post also more fully explains "positive dread").

Even if I was to institute slow-burn dread, how?

All of the things you listed are you and her in isolation. Dread is about getting other women to vouch for you that you're hot and desirable - because your wife will trust what these other women say about you more than she trusts her own impression (which is usually always wrong due to complacency, among other things).

What you need to do is get out in public more. Screw the farm. Take her for a night on the town and let her watch as the waitress tries to flirt with you in front of her and the girl next to you at the bar keeps checking you out. If you're bold, feel free to initiate these things yourself, but it's far more effective if she sees it "just happen" even without you trying.

Doing more work around the house and farm is great. It shows her that you're a real man - a leader. But it's not going to increase dread if you're not out in public. Go. Do. Be.

A month out from the wedding... Finds TRP... Do I call it off?

16 upvotes · 15 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Many people affirm: Marriage is RP on hard mode. I suggest: Marriage to a Christian girl is RP on hell mode.

I am a Christian man married to a Christian girl. Christianity puts so much anti-sex garbage into a girl's mind that most of them never fully recover, or it takes far longer and far more effort than for non-Christians. This is not biblical. It's just how it is. My wife was raised this way. When we were dating, she passionately promised (sometimes even in tears) that once we were married she would be crazy sexual with me, jumping all over me, experimenting with every position, etc. Never happened. I called her out on it several times over the years, but her answer was always, "I thought that's how it's supposed to work - you get married and all of a sudden you're supposed to magically be okay with sex, but it didn't happen. All the negative programming has stuck with me - and I know it's wrong, but I still can't get over it."

Think about it. She's been told for the last 20+ years of her life: "Don't do it, don't do it, don't do it, don't do it, don't do it, don't do it, don't do it ... until you're married." But she's not married yet, so that "until you're married" part doesn't register in her brain. She only internalized the "don't do it." It's the rare miracle that gets over that from the morning of the wedding to that night. She will still feel like sex is something dirty. If you're worth it, she'll hamster her way into some justification for doing it, but it will still feel icky to her until you can undo the psychological garbage the church has done to her (mind you: I'm saying this as someone fully committed to God, the Church, the Bible - all of it).

Long story short: if you're going to marry her, it's going to be for spiritual purposes, not for "awesome sex with an awesome woman." You have to assume you're going to get garbage sex out of her for at least the first several years - if she ever gets over her psychological conditioning at all. Since you're not a Christian, you're not going to be marrying her for spiritual purposes, so your best bet is just not to marry her.

Add to this the fact that if she continues maturing in her faith, she's going to discover hard and fast that the Bible is clear: Don't date/marry a non-Christian. You've only made it this far because she's still very, very young in her faith to the point that she either doesn't know this or isn't mature enough to exercise self-control in her emotional decisions. So, by marrying her you're going to do her a huge disservice and she will live to regret it and resent you for it, unless you come to faith also - and even then you're going to have to mature in your faith faster than her so you can lead her in it. The only other alternative is that you pull her away from her faith, risking sending her to hell for eternity in the process, so that you can get her to satisfy your wishes instead of God's. That'd be a pretty crap move and about the most hateful thing a person could do - so why would you consider doing something so viciously evil to someone who you'd be professing to love on that wedding day? Conclusion again: don't marry her.

FR-Old Man at Church

16 upvotes · 7 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I get terribly annoyed when my pastor says during a sermon, "We all know who wears the pants in the family." He says it like it's a joke, and people laugh, but it's more of a Jerry Seinfeld, "You ever notice how ...?" kind of joke, not a "this is ridiculous" joke.

The church has feminized men for centuries. I have lots and lots and lots of thoughts on this subject, but suffice it to say, I'm really close to starting /r/RPChristians in the hope that (1) we can make some progress in developing a positive masculine identity within the church and male leadership in Christian homes; and (2) have a place where every third comment isn't, "Get a divorce; ditch her if she doesn't want to respond."

To /u/chachaChad - As much as it pains me to say it, you're right. Feminism is not the culprit of creating beta men. The church is. There's a long, long history to this (including why it's wrong), but suffice it to say something needs to be done. The best way to fix a problem is to begin with where it started.

Hey guys check out this really neat 3 h YouTube video I watched!

15 upvotes · 14 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, I almost removed this post because of the title, then saw your username and clicked through. Then I thought about side-barring this to give an example of how link posts should be done ... then realized that, while having value, some of the points aren't on-point enough to warrant being on the sidebar because it might confuse some people into thinking that everything in the video is endorsed.

The main point of contention I'd have with Fr. Chad is his idyllic views on masculinity. He says men "should" be this and "should" be that in very broad terms that could, in many circumstances, deny men the right to operate within their own frame.

I believe /u/coachdad8 and some of the ECs on MRP got into it over this a few months back - he taking the view that a man's mission must conform to idyllic standards (grandiosity, external, etc.), whereas the MRP guys say a guy can make up his own mission however he wants, even if it isn't externally focused and it's something trite. Both methods have value in different contexts - the MRP guys will make a guy happier, whereas u/coachdad8's method will generally make a man more attractive and give him a context for developing orbiters and to be viewed as the prize whose frame everyone wants to be in.

But from a biblical worldview, the answer seems quite simple: non-Christians cannot have a godly frame (Hebrews 11:6), so we should expect them, in one way or another, to have lesser pursuits. For Christians, we must be continually sanctified toward Christ's frame (not as an external pressure/imperative, but because a failure of this calls into question the authenticity of the title "Christian" over such a man), which will inherently cause his own frame to become those things which /u/coachdad8 describes.

For more reading on the coachdad8 view, here's his post on the subject, which was generally well-received even though we haven't seen him around ever since:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/gatn5d/every_christian_mans_mission/

(Yes, this was a pseudo-meta way to do a write-up on coachdad8's post with a link at the end, mirroring what you did for Fr. Chad's video :)

An Interesting Study Indicates Men and Women Sin Differently

15 upvotes · 17 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I bet they're defining "lust" as "having sexual thoughts and feelings toward a woman," haha. Even with a biblical definition of covetous adultery, it probably still makes the list for men, but certainly not ahead of gluttony or sloth - but I'm also a lot harsher on "sloth" than most people.

Where to go from here? Red Pill SO abandons animal in park

15 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

This is illegal behavior in most states, but I know many people who legitimately don't realize this type of stuff is wrong. This is likely particularly true for him, as he may be thinking: "I got the cat from the wild, it didn't work out, so I put it back in the wild." He may not realize the way domestication can ruin a pet's ability to survive in the wilderness thereafter.

Personally, I'd find out if he was ignorant or heartless before making a judgment call.

"I think I was just raped"

15 upvotes · 8 October 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I didn't think until writing this post: "I should have sent her out to talk to the cops anyway" for this exact reason.

Desiring God Says Feminism Wants to Silence "Real Men"

15 upvotes · 19 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is ... incredible. I never would have expected as much from desiringgod.org. That's not to say they're always right. I still see two core issues that men should be wary of:

The manly intentionality that had pursued these women during dating had dwindled.

I've never been a fan of the notion that men must pursue the women. This is a weird ideology to me - one that the church espouses en masse that I just can't get past.

If men are supposed to lead and women to follow, what happens if you're moving toward the woman? If you're pursuing her, doesn't mean that you're behind her? Doesn't it mean that she chooses the direction and you keep pursuing after her down that path?

No, a man should lead. The woman should pursue the man. This is 1 Cor. 11:3 plain as day. Christ follows God. Man follows and pursues Christ. Woman follows and pursues man. This is how it ought to be. Yet somehow the church has flipped these. As beautiful as this article is, it misses the point on this one.

'Marriage is 50/50'

This whole section is true ... but he singles out the men. What about the obligations of their wives? Why is it okay to tell a man the burden that he must bear, yet even in the midst of the audacity it must have taken to write this article, he still is too scared to tell women what they must do.

Bonus:

'Your Spouse Is Your Best Friend'

In this section he brushes against the edges, but never quite says it: she is your one-flesh partner. Ever hear the age-old debate about whether or not a guy can be "just friends" with a girl? The debate doesn't stop when you get married, as many women seem to think it's perfectly acceptable to be "just friends" with her husband. Even "friends with benefits" doesn't do the marriage bed justice.

All in all, though, I'm impressed at the bold nature of calling out these lies for what they are. Bravo, John Piper's blog ministry, bravo.

FR: The Spousal Support Scam

15 upvotes · 28 January 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

No, he didn't. But she had already presented her case reaffirming* how she did everything around the house and he did nothing. We didn't bother trying to set the record straight, as that would have worked against us.

Do you guys ever explain to your women why they are the way they are?

15 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

In an intellectual: "Let me help you understand who you are" way? No. In a, "Hah! You're kind of like this right now" way? All the time.

When she's complaining about one of her friends or family members doing well in life, I'll pop out the crabs-in-a-bucket analogy. By now she knows what it means when I make pincer fingers at her. When she comments about liking a certain TV character, I'll drop some jokes about her being so into alpha males.

But what you're really getting at is: Maybe a nice psychology lesson will fix my wife. It won't. Don't try. If anyone's going to fix your wife it'll be you, not some new (to her) social dynamic theory that she probably won't buy into.

You also talk about RP aspects of women as if they're supposed to be fixed. Most of this is biology. You don't fix biology except through genetic manipulation. If you want to marry a man, turn gay. Otherwise accept your woman as she is and lead her through her troubles rather than trying to turn her into a dude. [Legit mental health issues aside, of course.]

Thought I found a unicorn and reality came crashing down...

15 upvotes · 3 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

A friend of mine used to say, "All women go into a relationship hoping to change the man, and men hope women will stay the same; both are always disappointed."

Divorce

14 upvotes · 16 August 2025 · /r/RPChristians

I'm going to be super blunt on this and say: this seems like useless victim puking. You said you already made the decision to file for divorce. The Bible doesn't list that as an exception to the "no divorce" principle, so it's a sinful choice. Either own it and follow through or repent. But bringing it up the way you did looks like you're just looking for validation from this community.

To soften up a bit, I get it. I see this situation constantly in my career - where one spouse goes mental. And yes, it often happens at accelerated rates at ages 50+, even without any history of dementia or alzheimer's. I've literally got 2 cases right now where parties are seeking divorce because the other developed paranoid delusions. I see the intense struggle my clients have gone through and the massive pain they've endured trying to "hold it all together" for so long, being the one to do 95% of the effort on that front.

But contemplate your own understanding of life, maturity, wisdom, etc. Think about your own emotional status and how it's affected by your perspective on life. Compare that to God's. In the whole "Christ // Groom and Church // Bride" context, how does He see your mentality compared to his own? He sees clearly, but my guess your own concept of reality, morality, spirituality, maturity, emotionality, etc. looks like you're a lunatic to God because you don't see as clearly as He does. Your brain literally can't process all of these things at his level, and so you make constant stupid and foolish decisions, just as we all do - even far beyond what you realize because, as I'm sure is also true of all of us, we tend to think we're far more God-minded than we really are.

Okay, so in that context, how does God deal with us? Does he say, "u/Dazzling_Result1090 - you've gone psycho, so I'm going to bail on my promise to stay faithful to you"? Nah. He bears the weight of our sin, knowing we're helpless to do any better.

Now, if you are worn down so heavily that remaining married is likely to cause an even greater sin (like murdering your spouse, or physically abusing her, etc.) ... then probably better to take the lesser sin of divorcing her and sending her on her way. I won't fault you for that ... it's between you and God if He will. Your call. We're all stuck in lose-lose situations sometimes. But if you can bear through it, just read Hosea and contemplate how much pain and suffering he bore through on behalf of his wife - all for the sake of being able to understand better how God relates with His people, and you'll find that your wife being a nuisance perhaps gives you the same blessing of a commonality with God that few others get to tout, just as Paul proclaimed that he would boast about his weaknesses, and you can boast about how your suffering gave you a unique insight on the person of Christ that you can bond with him over, and in ways that few others get to bond over such shared commiseration.

Clever ways to share the gospel

14 upvotes · 29 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is a useful post. None of these are what I'd call "sharing the Gospel" by any stretch, but they are certainly non-forceful ways to let other people know that you're a Christian, which has value. To that end, in light of my 304 post on evangelism, I'd consider this post a great extrapolation of the Aware of Messenger's Spiritual Beliefs section. The activity that leads up to this awareness is described in that post:

The Christian's job during this phase [...] is to start gradually exposing the non-Christian to your spiritual beliefs. This is best done passively at first. "Sorry, can't hang out Tuesday. I have a Bible study. How about Wednesday?" It's as simple as that. Because they already like you, when they realize you're a Christian this will begin to challenge their stereotypes about Christians.

Why You Must Be Willing to Nuke Your Nuclear Family

14 upvotes · 6 May 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Solid post, brother. I didn't get this for the longest time. I remember my first ever post on askMRP (6/26/17) making the comment that "divorce is not an option for me" and getting reamed for it. Initially, I ignored those comments on the principle that "they just don't understand my Christian faith." Truth was: it didn't matter if you all understood it or not. The cold, hard truth is the cold, hard truth.

So, 2.5 months later (8/15/17), after sufficiently eating my ego on that point, I ended up writing Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape. This one ended up becoming a double-whammy after my wife snooped around and found my account, then started reading all my stuff. Not only was I not afraid of divorce rape - she became actively aware of it, and I didn't have to go Rambo or autistic by telling her.

Of course, I felt like a fool when I actually started reading what the Bible had to say on the subject, as this conclusion was there all along:

- "From now on those who have wives should live as if they do not" - The concept of the marriage or, as you put it, the nuclear family shouldn't control how we live.
- "But if the unbeliever leaves, let it be so. The brother or sister is not bound in such circumstances; God has called us to live in peace." - Elsewhere the Bible says that if someone is unrepentant (such as insisting on divorce), then we treat them as an unbeliever. So, if she doesn't like my boundaries and insists on leaving ... don't let the door hit you on your way out.
- "If anyone comes to me and does not hate his own father and mother and wife and children and brothers and sisters, yes, and even his own life, he cannot be my disciple." - I've got bigger things in life to worry about than someone who's going to distract me from what actually matters. My priorities are higher than my nuclear family.

These are all actual quotes from the Bible - and there are more. The point is, even people who have the most adamant positions against divorce should still be willing to put their finger on that button. There's no excuse, and everything short of this undermines everything else you're trying to accomplish.

Am I in the right place?

14 upvotes · 28 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

everyone there will only ever see me as the beta billy I used to be

I hate to break it to you: if you're worried about how everyone sees you, you're still beta billy.

This probably deserves a post/video sometime, but this idea that your historical impression in someone else's mind is a hindrance to you is 99% psychological. You've put yourself in a box that you're unwilling to break out of because of what people will think of you. It's self-generated pressure to conform to previous patterns in your life.

If you start acting different, will people notice? Probably. But if you're not getting the results you want now, don't you WANT them to notice that you're not the same person who got those bad results?

I used to make an intentional effort of doing things out of character in front of others at least once a week. Sometimes it would be saying something unusual. Others times it was doing a different body mannerism. More commonly, it was putting my arm around someone when I usually respected others' personal space. Yes, people acted weird ... then they got used to it and I effectively acquired the power to re-create how others saw me into whatever I wanted it to be.

In reality, I had this power all along because nobody actually forces you into the box you force yourself into. Break out of that box. Next time you see a cute girl, put your arm around her, raise an eyebrow, nod your head and say, "What's up?" with a cheesy grin. You'll get some laughs. She may even call you weirdo or gossip about it behind your back about how "weird" it was that you did that. But she and others will start to think differently of you. And as you continue to show consistency in whatever new person you are, the more they will embrace it.

"But I can't do that! It would be too weird and out of character. I don't think I could work up the confidence to do that." See now that THEIR perception of you isn't the problem? It's YOUR perception of yourself that's the problem.

The advice to change locations is if there are no good options where you're presently at. You're in a mega church. I guarantee there are options. New people are flowing in every week. The baggage you have that's holding you back here will follow you somewhere else. Don't think that changing locations will make your problems go away. Everyone thinks "starting fresh" will be easier. It's not. You lose a lot with it too.

Does anyone here have recommendations?

Yes: get out of your own head. Live in your own frame instead of worrying about how others perceive you.

Teacher reflections on behaviour management

14 upvotes · 26 April 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Penalties and negative consequences do not change future behaviour for the better ... Rewarding the 'right' choices is the most powerful strategy of all ... ignoring the negative if possible

This dynamic is the exact opposite of the more recent testing and experimentation that is coming out. What you're speaking about is the traditional preference for positive reinforcement over negative reinforcement, which is based on the theory (that until recently had minimal actual field testing) that negative reinforcement would harm the positive attachment with the authority figure, ultimately losing respect. The exclusion of negative reinforcement as a viable strategy for parenting was birthed primarily from the liberal agenda that everyone should just be nice to each other all the time and never say or think anything bad about anyone else and the world would be a better place full of butterflies and rainbows.

I'd have to dig it up in my office, but the last time I cross-examined a forensic expert on the stand in defense of my client still spanking his kids, I had the guy admitting that there was ultimately very little tested research to back up the long-term effects of positive reinforcement as a parenting strategy, and that, instead, the long-term studies that have been done ultimately show that negative reinforcement is a much more powerful tool toward successful long-term behavior conformity.

The study itself looked at dozens of marital relationships as well as separated parents and how the children ultimately behaved and interacted with each parent. The results were identical between the married and non-married parents. In the majority of cases, the father was the sterner disciplinarian than the mother, who was more about being loving/cuddly with the kids. In the overwhelming majority of cases, the children's basic way of life and viewing the world was more consistent with the sterner disciplinarian, and the children exhibited a stronger bond with the disciplinarian. Compared with the relationships where neither parent was a disciplinarian, those where one or both parents were disciplinarians had children who were far superior in their school grades and behavioral reports than those whose parents were averse to harsher forms of discipline.

My personal take, after being a parent of 4 kids, studying the matter independently, and facing it daily in my career, is that negative reinforcement is the best tool for conforming behavior and positive reinforcement is the best tool for building trust and affection within a relationship. You should not have one without the other, and you need to know the appropriate place for when to use them. But suggesting that negative reinforcement is useless and shouldn't be employed is ridiculous.

It does seem like you've incorporated a few mixed theories in here, but overall it sounds like you've drunk a bit too much of the liberal cool-aid they've been shoving down your throat in all those "how to deal with kids" seminars I'm sure they make you attend or view online in the guise of "teacher training" (aka "let's condition them to be liberals" sessions).

The world we live in

14 upvotes · 9 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Avoiding marriage altogether is an even more sure way to reduce every risk ;)

Trust me when I say that a girl with a "strong Christian background" is still AWALT.

Two traps of the red pill

14 upvotes · 1 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Once you identify with the red pill framework you begin to interpret everything through that lens

You're right, but what we endorse here is slightly backwards from what you're implying.

- We don't endorse viewing the world through a red pill lens.
- We do endorse viewing everything through a biblical lens, which happens to validate the things that those with red pill lenses happen to see.

With this in mind ...

Stand firm in your identity as a Christian as a co-heir with Christ, not a red piller or any other identity of this world

This is spot on. This would assume that a man receives his validation from acceptance within a red pill community. Ironically, the red pill teaches the exact opposite: don't look to anyone else for validation - especially not strangers on the internet.

As Christians, we have a slightly different take. We know that there is One who does validate and whose opinion matters more than our own. 1 Corinthians 4:3-4 is incredibly on point here:

- I care very little if I am judged by you or by any human court; indeed, I do not even judge myself. My conscience is clear, but that does not make me innocent. It is the Lord who judges me.

So, when we read in WISNIFG that "you are your own judge," it's useful advice to the degree that it helps us stop looking for validation from outside sources - including a red pill community. But it is lacking in that our own judgments and validations on our lives are ultimately worthless because we will be judged by God's standards, not our own.

However, in this process, as a man becomes sanctified, God's character becomes intertwined with his own. His natural inclinations become godly rather than ungodly, and therefore his self-assessment becomes more accurate in comparison to God's judgment. In this, we should never encourage a non-Christian or baby-believer to be their own judge, but once someone is fluent in Scripture and walking in godliness, the Spirit within them does give them that authority.

To bring it back: you're absolutely right (and even the secular world would agree) that you should not get identity-based validation from the red pill community. I'd even extend this to your local congregation, or even your own internal senses (unless you are mature). Rather, it is perfectly appropriate to seek validation from God and living in alignment with His Word.

From there, the question is: with all the misinformation about Scripture found from one congregation to the next, where should a man go to learn the standards the Bible gives for men and how they ought to live and model their lives after Christ? This is a community that seeks to be the answer to that question. The validation we give is not one of acceptance into our community, but one of whether or not men are living up to the example set by Christ. I believe this is a perfectly appropriate thing for men to seek and find, for this is the very essence of iron sharpening iron.

I cried when I watched a video about seeing loved ones in heaven

14 upvotes · 15 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

My wife and I had a miscarriage. A year or two ago I had a dream. A middle-eastern man wearing nice clothes showed up at my front door and said, "We don't normally do this, but she really wanted to meet you." A little girl walked up from behind him and gave me a hug.

She was about 7 years old - the age the miscarried child would have been. She also had dark, curly hair like my wife (my 4 other kids all have blonde hair like me) and a bright beaming smile.

We chased each other around my living room, tickled each other, had a pillow fight, and laughed a lot.

After about 30 minutes the man said it was time to go. She didn't seem sad - like she was excited to go back just as she was to come in the first place. She gave me a great big hug and went back to the man, who she seemed incredibly comfortable and affectionate with. He asked her, "Isn't there something you wanted to tell him?"

"Oh yeah, I have a friend and she wanted you to deliver a message for her. Her name is [name] and she wants you to tell her parents that she remembers them, and that she loves them very much and can't wait to see them."

About a year before my wife and I had our miscarriage, the guy who disciplined me in college had a child born with hydrocephalus by that name, who died after only a couple months. It had been years since I'd ever given that (or even my own miscarriage) a passing thought, so the idea that my brain would randomly concoct any of this in such absurd detail is unrealistically improbable.

I am firmly convinced I met my miscarried child, and yes, I did deliver the message.

I may have messed up (F/R)

14 upvotes · 7 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

"I was already going to, we already talked about this you don't have to give orders the second I walk into the house"

This is your first mistake. You broke frame from the moment you walked in the door. This is what we mean by STFU. Her telling you to do something like that shouldn't bother you.

- If you weren't going to do it, then just don't do it. You don't have to tell her you're not or call her out on anything.
- More applicable to this case: if you were going to do it anyway, just do it anyway. Yes, it looks like you're obeying her command. Oh well. Let her believe that if she wants.

Your goal isn't to convince her that you're alpha. It's to be alpha. That means you do what you want regardless of what she says. What she thinks about your behaviors or why you're doing them doesn't matter - her perception will come in time, but it has to happen naturally, not by you trying to persuade her that you're your own man.

The proper frame when you walk in the door is to have a smile on your face and not get butthurt by any commands she gives. Personally, if it were me, I'd have AAd - "Yes, your highness. Shoes at the door, your supreme majesty." Then take your shoes off and go do whatever you were going to do anyway.

I voice this to her then the hamster starts.

i.e. You got butthurt. No, her hamster didn't start. Her feels started. Hamstering is when she rationalizes away poor choices or irrational feelings. Her feelings in this moment are perfectly rational: you're getting pouty and angry at her and she's getting angry back.

"No I just don't know why you have to waste money on food,, and it's not the first time, it's like the third time this month. We are supposed to be saving money so we can get a house in a year or two."

You started DEERING. Don't DEER.

She then gets up in my face and pushes me.

Totally not cool. This is the first time I see her really crossing a boundary. Everything else she did is AWALT stuff. You should just expect everything before this as normal female behavior. She needs to be rebuked for this.

Instead of reacting with anger I go to the couch and sit down.

Wrong. This is still anger. It's just passive aggressive anger instead of physical violence anger. And then you start verging on physical when you start pushing her with your foot.

(they were not, my old ones soles were falling off so they were needed)

Don't DEER to us too.

Nope I needed those for work, food and things I need for work are two very different things...then I continue to STFU

This is the opposite of STFU. You bobble between DEERING when you get angry or passive aggressive silent treatment when you run out of things to say.

She then starts pulling stuff out of left field talking about stuff from months ago

If she's harboring resentment over those things, they're not from left field. They're very current in her mind because she stews over them daily.

She then rips my phone from my hand and we start wrestling on the ground.

Why not let her have the phone? Do you think that wrestling with her is somehow a display of dominance because you can overpower her?

"I want an apology now!!!!" "We'll you arnt getting one."

Yikes.

I eat a wrap with ham and mayonnaise then get in bed.

Is that what she bought? Or are you passive-aggressively trying to shove something in her face by refusing to eat the food she bought?

We do the devotion and she goes back to normal and admits she was acting crazy.

Good on her for being willing to shift to a submissive stance. You're incredibly lucky. Your actions this entire exchange were completely out of line and yet she was still willing to take the fall for it.

We talk and came to the agreement ...

i.e. You broke frame even more and made all your hard-nosed negativity and anger worthless in the end because you still ended up giving her what she wanted out of the exchange. If this was going to be your result, why not just cave to her up-front and not have to go through that mess? If you're going to go through that mess, at least stand your ground at the end.

When I STFU my wife literally goes bonkers.

Correlation and causality, my friend. Imagine a guy saying, "Every time I come home from work, my wife ends up crying. I guess I should just never come home from work anymore." Then you watch him come home from work and every single time he punches her in the face. Was coming home from work what made her cry? Should he really stop coming home from work to solve the problem? No. He needs to stop punching her in the face.

STFU isn't your problem. It's that you didn't STFU and when you thought you did, you were doing it out of butthurt and passive aggressive anger, which is what made her go bonkers.

there are other tools

You need amused mastery. As I often say, this is not a tool. It's a mindset. At some point you need to learn to stop getting upset by her antics and be able to maintain a positive, uplifting frame no matter how harsh she gets toward you.

I get it. Right now you are emotionally incapable of that. I was too when I started. It's hard to have your wife screaming in your face and not have a negative emotional reaction to that. Do you have kids yet? It sounds like you don't, but that helps a lot. Imagine a little 3 year old talking about how he hates you because you didn't give him a cookie. Are you going to get all mad and butthurt over that? Are you going to passive-aggressively give that kid the silent treatment? No. He's just a kid. Are you going to do that to your wife? No. She's just a girl. Don't expect more from a kid than a kid can actually do. Don't expect more from a woman than a woman can actually do.

Idk if my wife is a special case or what

Not at all. Everything you described here is EXACTLY what we mean by AWALT. This isn't proof that she's a special case. It's proof that she's just like every other woman.

me going quiet not rewarding bad behavior just makes her lose her mind even more

But that's not what you did. You DEERed. You acted with passive aggressive anger. You did reward her bad behavior by caving at the end. And even before then, you weren't merely withholding reward: you were actively punishing - and not from a place of strength or authority, but from emotional instability and weakness.

Then watching her lose it makes me laugh which makes her think I don't respect her

Even though you never once mentioned this happening in this exchange, I'll readily admit that you probably had very brief moments when you laughed or felt like laughing. But ...

- You weren't laughing when you argued with her about taking your shoes off
- You weren't laughing when you complained about her buying dinner instead of cooking

- You weren't laughing when you stormed off to sit on the couch
- Or when you were kicking her away with your foot
- Or when you were wrestling her for your phone
- Or when you stormed off to your bedroom
- Or when you got the spare sheets to sleep alone

Or any number of other incidents. You can't have a few isolated moments of amused mastery and think: "Well, I felt like laughing for about 3 seconds right there, so I must have been in a right mindset." That's not how it works. If you laughed it off when she tried to take your phone, you wouldn't have had any risk of DV charges being filed against you.

Honestly Idk what I need to do when these situations occur

Until you can get your emotions under control, the minute you feel yourself getting angry - even slightly - before making a snide remark or complaining about anything, you need to tell her with a smile on your face - even if only a fake one: "I can feel myself getting upset. I don't want to say anything that might hurt you. I'm going to step away for a few moments to pray, then I'll be back and we can continue with our night." Then go into another room and pray.

If she asks you what was making you mad, do not deflect, which will come off as you hiding and repressing anger for her and taint the rest of your interactions that day. Instead, you need to open with: "It's really silly, but ..." and then explain. Conclude with, "There's no reason for something like that to make me angry, and I didn't want to ruin the evening over something like that. There's nothing to worry about now."

If she gets defensive, let her get defensive. Just go about your business with a smile and don't be angry. If you must, refrain: "Like I said, it was silly. You don't need to defend yourself. I'm past it and recognize it wasn't worth getting worked up about in the first place." More likely than not, after you do this 3-4 times she'll stop getting defensive in the first place and there won't be any real issues.

Let me be clear: this is not an ideal way to handle the situation. But it is an acceptable middle-ground until you develop a stronger frame.

I have told her about boundaries

Like /u/redwall92 said, don't keep talking about your boundaries. Once she knows them, don't talk about them. Just enforce them. My kids know not to tilt their chairs. When they do it, I don't remind them not to tilt their chair. I send them to time-out. They know the boundary. I'm not going to repeat it. I just enforce it. Do the same with your wife. Talk way less. If she crosses a boundary, until your frame is stronger you just say, "I need some space. I'll be back later." Then you go to the gym and work out.

The only tool I feel I have in the moment is to withdraw time and attention

Right. But you're doing this as a reaction to her behavior. You can never react. Ever.

If your withdrawal of time/attention is seen as a punishment, you just come off as a controlling jerk. The goal isn't to make her feel ashamed or punished for her behavior. It's to make her want to act in a way that would evoke your desire to spend time with her again.

Female Pastors - Some thoughts about it

14 upvotes · 14 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'll preface by saying that I agree with your conclusion. That said, your backing is weak. Consider this comment less a personal dig at you and more a way for me to openly process some ideas I have on an upcoming post on effective communication.

preacher's wife ... didn't do much for the church

What about all the preacher's wives who actually do hard work? You can't generalize a few anecdotes onto everyone. That's a poor way to make a point.

atrociously bad sermons

I've heard many excellent sermons preached by women. If one of your main excuses is that "women aren't as good at preaching," then you're going to get a lot of objections on that ground alone. At that point you're arguing probability: women are less likely to preach good sermons than men. That isn't a very persuasive leg to stand on for most people, and it does nothing to address the crowd who follow the women who actually do preach good sermons. Once again: you can't generalize a few bad women preachers that you've heard onto everyone. This is fallacious logic.

And to be clear: that's all you're arguing at this point: logic. You've only made philosophical and observational arguments, which are inferior to theology, which you rightly moved on to ...

Somehow the modern church decided to stomp over a bunch of verses ... doesn't even care about the Bible at all.

Ah, just like you probably stomp over verses that disobedient children should be put to death and alleged cheaters should drink a vile concoction to determine if their claimed virginity was authentic or not?

"But those are all just Old Testament laws; I quoted New Testament verses" ... Right. So do you let women speak during small groups, which were considered churches in the early days? Do you demand your wife and sisters wear hair coverings? Do you eat rare meats that still have blood in them? Do you check to make sure the animal whose meat your eating wasn't strangled first? These are all NT commands.

"But I can justify why I don't follow those verses!" ... as do those who support women in church leadership. There are many strong cases that can be made. That doesn't make them right. It just means that you're arguing from a position of weakness.

Again, I'm not saying you're wrong - you're just being irrationally dismissive. When you can't understand and articulate from your opponent's perspective, you lack credibility in your own perspective and it sounds like you're just another ignorant extremist, the way the liberal media likes to portray us.

Another brief note on quoting verses without context: wrong application happens this way all the time. After dinner one day, I said it's time to clean the kitchen, and I assigned my son the job of cleaning the table. He put the dishes in the sink then wiped all the spilled food on the floor. I scolded him for this and he didn't understand: "You said to clean the table, and the table is clean. What did I do wrong?" He focused on one isolated thing I said - the part that was to him - and ignored the context that we were cleaning, not making a bigger mess. His application, while technically correct, led to the exact wrong conclusion about what to do. When we quote verses in isolation, without contemplating the greater context of what God is saying and doing throughout His Word, we run the risk of doing the same thing - and if we get the right conclusion, it is merely a matter of accident, not proper interpretation.

Another point: your post mistakenly assumes that preaching is the primary role of the pastor. There is a phrase that gets thrown around in Christian circles every now and then: "the primacy of preaching." It's not found in the Bible. But somehow this concept has caught on as if preaching is the primary job of pastors. A more biblical approach would be to consider "shepherding" as a whole to be the primary job of pastors. Preaching can be one part of that, but if that's all a pastor does, or if that's seen as his primary role, he is grossly misleading his congregation and I would never follow such a man unless he were open to correction on that point.

So, if a woman is a bad preacher, what if she is excellent - even better than the men in the congregation - at all the other responsibilities of shepherding? Now your preaching argument loses even more weight.

Rather than quoting a few verses without context, the easiest solution is to take the same approach Paul does: point to Genesis. God created men to lead and women to follow. This is something that was not only true in the beginning, but remained true in the New Testament. There are plenty of posts already up on this, so I won't re-hash it all here. By pointing to Genesis, Paul is saying that his teachings were on the order of creation, not on what was most effective in the present culture. When women take roles of leadership within the church, including positional authority over men, they are violating that order of creation.

Simply put: it's wrong because God said so, not because women are lazy leaders or bad preachers. Why did God say so? Because it falls within the design of how he created men and women. Why did he create men and women that way? Because humanity needed a tangible leader-follower structure on earth within a gendered context in order to be able to grasp the leader-follower structure on a spiritual level with Christ within our spiritual marriage context. It all points back to how God wants to relate with us. When we allow women into leadership over men, it leaves the implication that the church can be a leader over God too - and God simply wouldn't have that. And yet in the age when the church lets women lead, we also see the church trying to control what God does and doesn't say, what he does and doesn't act on, etc. The church thinks it IS God rather than being an ambassador. That's the danger.

I unknowingly married a BPD... and I need advice.

14 upvotes · 9 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Ah ... good old BPD: my speciality. I wish I had time to do a full write-up. For know, you'll have to settle with this.

BPDs, depending on the severity, have the emotional maturity level of a 7-11 year old girl. They will never grow out of this. Ever. Don't expect her to. The solution is that you don't treat her like an adult. You treat her like a child. I know that sounds degrading to say, but it's the cold, hard truth - and while most psychologists won't put it that bluntly, if you were to talk to a therapist my guess is that the advice she'd recommend would be the same type of advice one would give to raising a child.

"you're amazing, I'm sorry I'm struggling" to "you are the reason for everything that is wrong"

This is true of all women. They will always look to blame someone else for their problems. This is not just a BPD thing. My wife does it too. How I respond: "I'm here for you as your husband, not as your scapegoat. If you want my help through what you're feeling, let's address how you're feeling, not how you think I'm failing." If she continues to blame, I leave. If she shifts to talking about her feelings, I console.

While my wife doesn't likely have BPD, the pattern in these (for me rare) situations is the same as BPD. Rather than passing a fitness test, for BPDs you have to go the next step by converting the fitness test into a comfort test. You do this by redirecting the conversation away from her accusations and toward her feelings. The most essential way of doing this is by holding frame and keeping a smile on your face (but not a smug type smile - a genuine expression of happiness in the face of her emotional assault). Simply put, don't get butthurt. See my 100-level post on an anatomy of butthurt for more on that.

My wife's theory was that Canada just sucked, it was way too dark in the winter and the town we were in it was impossible to make friends

So in addition to blaming you, she's blaming God and the rest of the world for her problems too. Does she recognize that there are countless people who live in Canada who do not struggle with the same emotional issues she has? Point that out and it forces her to grapple with the reality that she might be the one with the problem, not the weather.

so loooooong story short, we moved to California

Lose frame much? ;) My goodness - that's a huge beta move. It's going to take some time to recover from that.

The sunshine DID help. So did the new church. But only really for a spell.

No. The newness helped, not these things. She points to the new sun and church for her renewed emotional state because that validates her previous statements of blaming them for the bad state. The fact that it was "only really for a spell" is your evidence that sun and a better church aren't really what were causing or fixing her problems.

I tried, I suggested, I offered ... she refused, she didn't want to, it didn't work for her

Do you see how far in her frame you are? And then ...

Once my wife started the medication, the rage stopped. The suicidal threats stopped. She wasn't crying and screaming every day or two Right. She didn't want to do it. She rejected, stalled, ignored, etc. to get out of doing it. Then she did it and it worked. As is often said: women don't know what they want and aren't always the best judge of what is best for their life. Again: she has the emotional maturity of a 7-11 year old girl. I wouldn't trust my kids with making these kinds of decisions. They're too emotional and only think about what they want and not what's best for them. In the same way, YOU SHOULD NOT BE TRUSTING YOUR WIFE WITH WHAT SHE THINKS IS BEST FOR HERSELF! Hear her out. Weigh her suggestions and how different courses of action might make her feel. But at the end of the day, you're the leader in the family and you need to lead her in what you believe is best for her.

It's easy to say that she's responsible for her own life. But as her husband, biblically you are responsible for her even more than she is responsible for herself. Take up that responsibility and hold her to it.

BUT it didn't fix the fact that she still has a hard time getting out of bed, still has no purpose, no job, no strong friendships..

Her purpose comes from you. You have to give it to her. Biblically, a married woman's purpose is her husband's purpose. What's your mission? That's Rule 2 for a reason.

She also just got clear of all that other stuff. She's lying in bed all the time because she doesn't have a purpose because you didn't give her one. She has no friends because she was emotionally screwed up for so long that she never made any - and now she has to start from scratch. I'm not surprised that it didn't solve these things instantly. I'd be surprised if it did!

My wife is a beautiful person who has some amazing qualities - She's just also got BPD

Reportedly, sex with BPDs can be great if you know how to work their emotions. So, that's a plus. They are highly emotionally charged. The way to make their emotions work for you is by getting them in your frame.

Frame is exceptionally difficult with a BPD because they have a tendency to view their lives from the outside - as if they're watching things happen to them rather than personally experiencing it themselves. This is because most BPDs have a history of sexual or physical abuse (or other trauma) and their minds fracture their consciousness from their present reality in order to cope with their painful experiences. Because of this, when you're interacting with her she feels like she's watching a movie about a woman interacting with you and she's shouting at the actress what to do and how she should be feeling. It's hard to enter your frame when she's not even inside her own body in that way. Life isn't real to her.

So how do you get her into your frame? You evoke emotional responses. This is different for most men, as we tend to be a source of emotional stability, not emotional volatility. For a BPD you have to do the opposite. At times, intentionally make her mad. At least then she's mad on your terms and in a setting you can control. Other times, be exaggeratedly happy and let it rub off. Tickle her. Tease her. Give her high-fives throughout the day. Jump up and down and do a happy dance when something good happens. There are a number of ways to communicate emotional positivity.

If you are instigating her emotional state, then she is reacting to your instigations rather than you reacting to her default emotions. This puts her in your frame. The stronger the emotions she feels, the more tied to her own reality she becomes. The emotional deadness is when she begins to separate from reality again, and it becomes harder to communicate anything or get through to her when that happens.

The most important thing in all of this is not to dance or tip toe around problem spots. You might be afraid of setting her off, especially with all the emotional problems she already has, you don't want to compound even more on her, right? Bad strategy - and this holds true for all women. The better option is to look at the egg shells on the ground and start jumping all over them, laughing as you do so. At first she'll be mad that you broke her egg shells. And at some point your happiness and laughter will cause her to join you in jumping on the egg shells too and she will have been restored to your frame. Feeling mad for her is better than feeling depressed and a faster route toward her feeling happy again.

Also ... make-up sex is a staple on the shelf for BPDs, but you can't actualize that result if you always tip toe around her prospective anger. She wants to feel angry because she wants to feel something. Let her get it out - just don't let her point it at you. Ideally she points at herself - how angry she is about her emotional situation, about her behaviors, about the fact that she has no friends, about her lack of motivation. Let her express all of that. But if she starts pointing the finger at you, you walk away until she's ready to get down to business again ... unless, of course, there is a genuine issue you need to address. But her evaluation of what genuine issues you may or may not have is not very reliable. Listen to what she has to say on that for a very brief time, but ultimately evaluate with yourself and other trusted men before just taking her word for it.

OK, so I covered more than I planned, but I hope it was worth it for you.

Cuddles are required

14 upvotes · 29 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

My thoughts exactly.

FR: The Spousal Support Scam

14 upvotes · 28 January 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I did say it isn't a groundbreaking argument. Just one that was new to this judge. These types of arguments are usually made to legislators, rarely in court.

fun free date ideas for after work?

14 upvotes · 25 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Here are a few things my wife and I have enjoyed:

- Going on walks [cliche, I know; but it's classic for a reason]
- Get some drinks and popcorn, put a Netflix standup comedian on instead of your typical show, and pretend you're at a comedy club
- Arrange a city-wide scavenger hunt; leave clues around your neighborhood, and make the last one end in your bedroom; this doubles as going on a walk if you hide some of the clues in the middle of a park, away from the parking lot; lots of great relational time along the way. For even greater fun, have a friend write the clues and hide them for you so you can both do it together. Offer to return the favor so they don't feel like they're getting jipped.
- Dust off an old board game. Play it on a picnic table in a park with some sandwiches.
- Lug your mattress into the living room, shut off the breakers and tell him the power's out, so you're going to have a living room camp-out for the night.
- Head to a busy street, bring a snack from home, find a park bench, and just people watch for hours. This makes for great conversation.
- Most urban cities have a local theater group that'll do free outdoor plays a couple times a week.
- Go to the mall and put a bunch of ridiculous outfits in your cart and take turns trying them all on without any intent actually to buy any of them. Bonus points if you both agree to put a few items of lingerie in there.
- Go to a playground that doesn't likely have kids everywhere and just bring out your inner-children and nostalgia.

Girlfriend wants to start smoking cigs

14 upvotes · 14 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

That sounds manipulative and controlling. It also implies too much investment on your part. I'd be more flippant: "If you want to smoke, that's great! I'm sure some guy out there will be really into that."

Don't aim for perfect game, the bar for sex is not that high!

14 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/seduction

Doesn't "above average" mean the top 50% by definition? Maybe you mean that it's like a switch and only 10% of men know how to flip the switch into the "on" position, thus the "average" position is off.

HillSong Pastor Carl Lentz' Lover

13 upvotes · 12 November 2020 · /r/RPChristians

In retrospect, Ranin said their relationship was likely a product of the pandemic — “He hadn’t been doing anything for so many months, he hadn’t been onstage, what else was going on in his life?”

You say "spreading the gospel wasn't enough." The problem is: he wasn't even doing that. He was preaching sermons. Mostly preaching to the choir. That's not spreading the Gospel. And certainly none of this rings anywhere near making disciples, even if the Gospel was preached and a few non-believers were trickling in.

This is yet another example of structural churchianity mentality ruining things. The guy is so hung up on the stage being his role in God's Kingdom rather than the field.

RPC Chat - Episode 4: Christian Dead Bedrooms

13 upvotes · 17 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

is duty sex really better than no sex?

That's up to each man and the way his wife approaches duty sex. Is she star-fishing with a frown on her face or fulfilling her duty with a smile on her face? Huge difference between the two.

Think about it - prostitutes give duty sex all the time. There's no way they're actually into it with many of their clients. Yet that wouldn't prevent them from giving their client a wild ride anyway, right?

From there: if a prostitute will do it for $100, and yet your wife says she loves you and you pay for virtually everything for her ... why should the prostitute who is paid much less and who doesn't love you actually give you a better time than your wife, when it comes to obligatory/contractual sex?

I still have sex with you because I know it is important to you and I know you need it. I may not be super into it but seeing how you are into it I can still do it for you.

Can you imagine a prostitute taking that attitude with one of her clients? How quickly would she be put aside?

My point here isn't to say wives should be like prostitutes. My point is that prostitution should be the lowest form of sex - and yet when wives treat their obligation to their loving, providing husbands, no matter how unattractive she finds him, worse than a prostitute does, how much does that say about the reverse angle of the wife's love/respect for her husband? It means she loves him LESS than the prostitute does, despite getting more from him.

That's insane to me. There are very few excuses I would find acceptable for this type of behavior.

How is one to navigate as a biblical masculine man in a female-dominated workspace

13 upvotes · 4 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Jesus lived in a pretty depraved society too. The Romans were chock full of false idols. Prostitution was commonplace. After his ascent, the apostles lived in a time when the government was ordering the execution of all Christians and literally hunting down and killing the Jews.

Imagine them asking that same question:

Can I really call myself a man following God if I see all these things and do nothing?

The thing is: they were doing something. They were doing exactly what Jesus did and told them to do. They were making disciples.

Discipleship is God's plan for how to sanctify the world. Sure, on rare occasions he can use martyrs, grandstanding moments against a cause, big-name figures, etc. But for the most part, none of the apostles had any claim to fame, and yet their work throughout the world not only put an end to the mass-murder of Christians throughout the Roman empire - by the 300s AD, they actually turned the tables and got the Roman empire to mandate that all people must be Christians. What a crazy turn of events! That couldn't have happened if people weren't making disciples.

... and then they stopped making disciples and the church has fallen apart ever since. Every now and then someone will rise up and restore the vision that Jesus modeled. But on the whole, when we see the church start to crumble and go the way of the world, it's usually because people are more interested in engaging with the words of Jesus than living in the model of the life of Jesus.

You want to do something about all this? Stop fantasizing about grandstanding and getting yourself in trouble. Go find some guys and disciple them not to be like that - and train them to do the same with more guys, who can do it with more. That's your strategy.

No / Bad Sex - Always His Fault?

13 upvotes · 28 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Been there, done that. In worse of a context than you're describing. I had the same questions and concerns you did. Turns out AWALT, even my special snowflake of a wife that even MRP guys told me was an outlier.

So, is there a possibility that she has a problem?

Of course.

Is it possible that many Christian women have psychological issues about sex being dirty, shameful, or taboo, and that this causes unhealthy sex lives in marriage?

Absolutely. My wife had these exact problems and deep-seated psychological reservations too.

Is it possible that not every marital problem boils down to the man not being "alpha" enough?

Absolutely.

What you're missing in the above questions is that you're ultimately trying to force yourself into a box where you can psychologically accept your fate instead of actually doing something about it.

My kids break things in my house. It's annoying. It's 100% totally their fault. I don't get to have my house free of broken things the way I want. How useful is it for me to say, "Welp, it's not my fault; it's my kids' fault. I guess I'm just going to have to deal with a house full of broken things"? That's not at all useful!

Instead, I'm going to have to take measures that other people may not have to deal with. Why? Because as much as AKidsALT, mine are UNIQUELY like that in a way that surpasses what others have to deal with. So, I I I I I I I I I I (not them) have to take UNIQUE measures in my own house hold to achieve my own goals.

Why? Because it's not my kids' goal in life to avoid breaking things. It's not your wife's goal in life to figure out how to make herself horny. If you want her to figure out how to be horny for you, that's on you. Yes, she's got problems. What girl doesn't? No, this doesn't even sound like a unique problem. It sounds like an incredibly common one. You just haven't figured out that part of your life that isn't measuring up.

Heck, when I first started on MRP, people were telling me over there that my wife was one of the true unique hopeless cases because she was so psychologically damaged about sex by her parents and had so heavily ingrained the "sex is painful" mentality in all of our sexual experiences for the first 7+ years of our marriage that there really was no hope for a turnaround. I was told that she was what Rollo called "outliers" - the few girls who simply won't respond to normal red pill tactics.

It turns out I just wasn't as awesome as I thought I was. A couple months later, everything turned around. Her "this is definitely 100% absolutely a physical pain, not a psychological issue" vaginismus turned out to be a psychological issue that she hasn't complained about once since I'd red-pilled myself.

So, you're in one of two places:

1. Your self-evaluation is off and you're really not as awesome as you think you are; or
2. You truly are among the Channing Tatums and Chris Hemsworths of men and she's got unique problems that she doesn't care to fix on her own and even Brad Pitt coming onto her wouldn't make her horny, so you're going to:

- (a) accept it and deal with the problem for the rest of your life,
- (b) compromise your faith by divorcing her in the hope Wife 2.0 is more easily aroused than her, and that this doesn't come with some other trade-off, or
- (c) consider the path toward her sexual recovery a journey of unknown duration that you will choose to lead her along.

That being said, because you're so hung up on "she will do this, she won't do that" and "she thinks this or that," I'm about 99% confident you're still living in her frame, and thus the first option is 99% likely. Even if you're in your own frame, she's OBVIOUSLY not in your frame yet. Why not? There's clearly more to this story that we're missing.

EDIT: Also, you ever look into Madonna-Whore Complex?

[FR] Unstoppable Emotional Inertia

13 upvotes · 13 September 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

As I recommend men should be.

Help with over-controlling parents?

13 upvotes · 21 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You sound like a whiny teenage brat. How is refusing to clean up a table going to make you more manly? Or more godly for that matter?

Part of being a biblical man is learning to respect the chain of authority you're in - whether that's in a military setting or a family one. I don't get the impression they're abusing their authority over you. I do get the impression that you just have trouble with authority and your dad is doing his job trying to beat that out of you. Take his cue and follow his lead.

When you move out and you're not under his authority anymore, you're free to become a loser who doesn't clean up after himself. Or you can learn to put garbage in the trash and dishes in the washer. It's really not that hard.

Caught wife cheating, she backed out of mediation

13 upvotes · 28 June 2018 · /r/askMRP

To u/medic_jajs, don't involve the kids. Why would you do that to them? Because you want to spare your ego in front of them? Screw that and any guy who does that ... unless they're all 16+ and reasonably mature enough to take it.

Of she makes more than you, you're probably going to win. Have fun screwing her over. She'll plead for you to settle "for the kids." That's where it's a lie. Don't worry about the kids when they're not there. If she wants to hold out because you won't settle, as long as you've given her a reasonable proposal under your state's laws, then it's her refusing to settle.

NC is one of 3 states that retains laws for statutory interference with a marital relationship. Research it and use that. Some lady got a multimillion dollar verdict against her husband's mistress several years ago. She'll never be able to pay it, but it can be nice to stick your thumb up her butt like that.

Hire the Rosen Law Firm if you're near Raleigh, or at least have a consult with them so they're conflicted out.

For those who are married or want to marry: Why?

13 upvotes · 21 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

You're obviously young, inexperienced, and fairly immature in your understanding of RP praxeology. Many of the things you've said have been specifically rejected by even secular RP. It sounds like you're a TRP guy rather than an MRP guy. TRP is about 90% infantile wannabes who simply don't get it. In MRP that number is much lower and the content is much better. I may not agree with everyone there, but I respect them and acknowledge that in a secular world-view, their way is usually the best way.

As a single guy, I can't expect you to have personal experience with the claims you're making. I've seen MRP mods call guys "autist" for blindly citing a concept while ignoring practical reality in how that concept translates to the real world. You simply don't know because you haven't lived it. That's the danger in being a TRP guy. To that end, I'm sure that's a big point in why you're asking. You see all of this negative propaganda about women and marriage and can't reconcile that with the fact that people - even RP men, and Christian ones at that - are still chasing women and getting married.

That's a question with merit. It's one that deserves to be answered. But your post is like, "I know for a fact that all black people are rapists. So, let me ask you: why do you have black friends?" The foundation of the question is based on a faulty premise, so the way you receive the answers given is going to be skewed by your faulty worldview - a worldview that even secular RP rejects.

TRUTH 1: Women aren't unconditional about their attraction for you.

I think this is what you really meant. A woman's attraction is dependent on what you have to offer her. If you have nothing to offer, she has no attraction. This is, of course, different from love, affection, beneficial behaviors, etc.

When the secular RP world says that a woman "can't love you like you want to be loved," they're: (1) using a different definition of love than the Bible uses, and (2) assuming that men want love in a different way than the Bible prescribes. From a secular worldview, they're absolutely correct. Just remember that they're talking about a different concept altogether than what Christians mean when we talk about love. The fact that you use the phrase "feeling love" tells me that you're processing "love" under the secular definition and not the biblical one. When Paul says "husbands, love your wives," he's not saying, "Have feelings for them."

The Bible says God is love. Expressing God to someone else is sharing love with them. This can mean living in godliness toward someone else, or it could be sharing your faith with someone, or it could be praying for them, etc. Anything that lets your relationship with God flow to another is an act of genuine biblical love.

Without God, genuine biblical love is impossible. This means that even secular men are incapable of expressing biblical love, which is why they have to use different definitions of the word to make a claim to "love" in the first place - and yet many RP men would rightly acknowledge that in a secular context the concept of "love" doesn't exist in the first place.

So, while my wife may not have the secular concept of unconditional feelings and behavioral patterns toward me that secular definitions of love reference, she is 100% fully capable of expressing godliness toward me - and she does. Biblical love is absolutely possible between spouses. But biblical love does not mean "she will want to have sex with me even if I'm a lazy slob with no direction in life and nothing to offer her." That's a somewhat blunt example of what most men want to be true in their flesh - and that is the sentiment that the secular RP world rejects, as do I.

Truth #2: She is not yours. It's just your turn.

In the Christian world, this simply means that your wife really belongs to God, who has entrusted His daughter into your care. She's not yours; she's on loan.

But even secular RP doesn't mean that women will always branch-swing. They acknowledge openly that she might remain faithful for life. The concept isn't to prove that women will cheat; rather, it's to say that you have no right to demand or expect her to stay with you indefinitely. You do not own her. She can leave whenever she wants. But she might stay anyway, and a lot of that is dependent on how attractive you are to her. That is all that is meant by this concept. You're taking it further than even the secular world would.

Truth #3: All women can be like that (AWALT).

To say "there are no exceptions" makes me think you're trolling. This concept has been discussed and debated ad nauseam on MRP. The conclusion from every mod and endorsed contributor (which is also my view) is that "AWALT" doesn't mean "no exceptions" - it means that all women have these innate tendencies, but that different women have differing degrees of being able to suppress these tendencies or express them in different ways. As Christians this is generally and obviously true on a number of levels, the most significant being our sinful nature. We all have an inherent sinful nature that causes us to want to sin. But because of Christ in us, we have been freed from sin and now have the ability to deny these impulses within us in order to do what is right and godly instead. In the same way, just as Christ saves his bride from her sinful impulses, so also can a high-value husband give his wife freedom from her "AWALT" impulses - even among non-Christians. That said, for Christians it's much, much easier for women to deny their "AWALT" impulses because even apart from a high-value husband, they have Christ who is the highest value husband and leads them into righteousness. They may still fail (particularly if their "faith" is fake or weak), but their capacity to succeed in overcoming these innate tendencies is much, much, much higher than in the secular world.

CONTEXT CORRECTION

Let me be clear about one more thing. The context of your question seems to come from a place that assumes the point of marriage is love and/or happiness. This is a modern convention. Prior to the last couple centuries (pretty much when the feminist agenda started creeping up), people did not marry for love. Love was something that had to be expressed after the fact of the marriage, not the reason for the marriage itself.

The Bible says that the reason for marriage is to produce godly offspring (Malachi 2:15). In a post-Gospel world, we understand that physical offspring are paralleled with spiritual offspring. So, today we understand that the point of marriage is to reproduce our faith in others. Period. Marriage is not about love; it's about discipleship. Love is an obligation within the marriage. Feelings are a beneficial byproduct of living out the purpose for which God created us. But the answer to your question won't make any sense if you don't understand this context for marriage. As long as you think marriage is about love, you'll never be able to understand why people would marry.

Now to your questions ...

How can a self-respecting man who understands all this go ahead and get married anyway?

Because what you think they should understand is a false rendition of these concepts that even secular RP rejects.

For sex? ... companionship? ... family and/or children? ... love? ... God?

Of course not. It's for discipleship. God designed marriage as a roadmap to understanding how we are to connect with him and reproduce spiritually through him. This is what marriage and sexuality is all about. Most people simply cannot understand discipleship until they have a wife and kids first. But marriage is merely a roadmap, whereas discipleship is the destination. Once you're at the destination you don't need the roadmap anymore. But very few people find their way there without the map - they might find the general region where the destination is, but never the exact place.

Of course, I should also note that "That's just a lack of self-control" is the EXACT REASON that Paul says a person should marry. Further, Jesus says in Matthew 13 that "not everyone can accept this [never marrying] ... but those who can should," meaning that God has designed several people so that they MUST marry because of their lack of self-control - that he keeps them from having that degree of self-control so that they will marry.

So, why do you do it?

I married while blue pill and for the wrong reasons. I stay married because I am more effective at fulfilling my obligations to God with my wife than I am without her.

And, for those who are already married - if you had your time again, would you have married anyway?

If I knew all that I know now, I probably would not. But the reason for that is that my marriage was much of the roadmap I needed to acquire the knowledge I have now. Although I had already had the vision for discipleship before marriage, I did not fully grasp all of the issues necessary to make me an effective disciple-maker until after I had my own wife and children. I did not understand how God wanted to connect with me until I had a wife and saw how I wanted to connect with her - for better or worse.

So, if I could retain my knowledge of disciple-making and go back, I would not repeat my marriage - I would remain single. Self control would not be a problem. But if marriage was necessary for me to acquire that knowledge and master this art of disciple-making, I would choose to do it again every single time. Why? Because MARRIAGE IS NOT ABOUT ME. You seem to make the assumption that marriage is about enhancing your own life in some way. But what if you embraced the fact that marriage is really meant to enhance God's purposes instead? I think that could totally revolutionize your perspective and open your eyes to the answers to these questions.

Be the Judge

13 upvotes · 19 December 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Every ruling implies consequences for failure to comply. BPP often suggests a withdrawal of attention and affection. I'm sure you would suggest withdrawing commitment vis a vis cheating or divorce as possible penalties after escalation in the offense. Personally, I just do things my own way and my wife eventually follows along, even if she rejected it at first - the relational disconnect of living and moving in two separate directions is its own deterrent for her.

Bottom line: there's tons of information already on MRP about what to do if your wife won't follow. I wasn't intending to re-hash that. This post is more about developing a man's own mentality of his position and authority within the home - one of judge and decider and not of opposing counsel or peer. In my view, this addresses much of the issue many men have with misapplying stoicism and maintaining frame - they think it's about being a stubborn, immovable rock, rather than rising above the argument altogether.

Friend needs immediate help

13 upvotes · 6 November 2017 · /r/askMRP

married 10 years ... He was already wealthy and owned his businesses prior to marrying her

That "royally screwed" bit really isn't so bad when the duration is 10 years or less. He's going to have some solid separate property claims, and support won't likely be any longer than 3 years - 4 if you get a really bad judge.

That's something he can recover from, given that he still has 28 years left of work in him - and his highest earning years are yet to come. Child support will be a pain, but even that can be marginalized if he plays his cards right on the custody/time part to get a decent deviation.

her mental sexual hangups brought on by her strict religious upbringing

Been there, done that. The "beta nice guy personality" that you say only compounds on the problem actually is the only problem. Yes, there is legitimacy to the whole sexual repressiveness in many Christian women, but a solid alpha who actually understands the Bible will know how to lead her out of it. This is on him. Send him to r/RPChristians.

One of her biggest complaints is that when he does have free time he is always in the gym.

She's treating him like one of the girl. Crabs in a bucket mentality.

she has even "crashed on his couch" on nights when she was too drunk to drive home.

First, I'm pretty confident now that she's only a cultural Christian and not a genuine one. So, if your buddy is a Christian, 1 Cor. 7 applies if she wants to walk away - he's welcome to let her.

Second, she's cheating. Let her go.

What if a s--- test cannot be ignored?

From what you describe, he's been letting her act like a sole custodian in the marriage, so he really can't complain when she starts acting like a sole custodian now. He's got to take ownership of this and fast.

That said, if the kids start missing school because of her emotional reaction to being told off, that's not going to bode well for her in court. If she does get them to school, he needs to take half the day off, pick them up when they get out, and be the one to start caring for them like a single dad. Married or not, if you want sole custody rights as a man, you need to act like you're a single dad. Period. If you just want shared parenting, then learn to communicate and share the responsibilities during the marriage. But shame on him for letting his housewife become a stay at home mom. Those are two different concepts and the latter is particularly empowering toward women.

sit her down and start calmly but firmly laying out boundaries

That's workable. I'd start by taking her car keys. She doesn't have a job. He can figure out where the kids need to be and get them there. If his job is so bad that he can't take care of his own kids, that's a problem he's going to have to figure out for himself or else deal with the consequences. A man must prioritize. Maybe his job is more important to him. Great. Let him focus on that and lose his control in the home. But if he wants his home life figured out, he's going to have to start hiring some more employees to handle his crap for him at the work place so he can handle his own crap at home.

do not know the appropriate RP response....should you simply default to STFU?

Yes.

that's not always possible

I'm not sure how your wife is forcibly manipulating your vocal chords. Are mutant powers for real now? The blue pill in you is what's still telling you, "I have to say something" in the first place - that her actions can force you to do anything you don't want to do. If you want to remain silent, remain silent. You might look like an idiot, but — seriously - what's she going to do to you? But her emotions are too much! Won't that just make her more mad?

Screw her emotions. Do what you want. Period.

Now, is it wise to just sit there in perfect silence like a total idiot? Probably not. Fogging is the easiest place to start. Just agree with everything she says without expressing your own opinion on the matter. "I can see how you feel that way ... I understand what you're saying ... That makes sense ... I suppose my actions could come off that way ..." This can go on forever and is better than just plain silence. Anyone who has read WISNIFG knows how to handle these conversations with fogging and other tactics. That should be the second book you read after NMMNG. Get it done.

she has him over a barrel

This is really just a magic trick - it's a bluff. It's like a random stranger walking up to you on the street and saying, "I have your wife and kids tied up in a van down the street and my partner is going to shoot them if you don't give me your wallet." It's a bluff. His wife and kids are safely at home. But through mental and emotional pressure, the robber convinces the man to act without having to use any actual force. No matter how physically strong the guy is compared to the assailant, the nature of the threat mentally subdues him.

When someone swallows the pill, he becomes aware of these con artist schemes and knows how to shut them down.

He didn't get a prenup so he stands to lose everything to this bitch

Not as much as you may be thinking. A lot? Yes. Not everything - and he has a lot of years left to make it up and more.

How does dread in marriage work when the man clearly has more to lose and that's clearly evident to both parties?

How the living heck does he have more to lose?!?!? If they divorce, she lives high on the hog for 3 years and he has the next 28+. Whoop-ti-doo. If he stays married to this shrew (i.e. she gets her way), every additional year of marriage increases his future losses if they eventually do divorce ... and if they don't, then he loses his chance at a satisfying relationship (given that he won't swallow the pill). So, who stands to lose more? That one's a no-brainer: it's her.

half of everything he owns

None of the premarital stuff. You said he was self-made before the marriage started, so that's going to be pretty sizeable. Any appreciation in value from the date of marriage to the present will be divisible, sure. But he bought himself into that mess. He'll still walk away with the lion's share due to the premarital components. Hopefully he's not dumb enough to have trashed all his records, though.

and likely his kids

That's his own fault. If he abandons his kids for the job, that's a choice he made and will have to deal with. Now, chances are that if he starts stepping up his parenting game now, he'll still end up with 50/50 rights and a sizeable reduction in child support because of it. But he's got to prioritize and figure out his schedule.

She's still young enough (early-30s) and certainly attractive enough to retain a high SMV

Great, so she'll remarry eventually and won't need support for long anyway.

Divorce would mean total and utter destruction for him and hitting the lottery for her Remaining married is hitting the lottery for her. It means she gets to keep playing queen of the castle, bossing him around, doing whatever she wants, and spending his money while she's at it ... unless he swallows the pill.

Divorce puts a clear end to her payday. It gives her a one-time payout, but she loses all the years and years of future income and growth from him that she otherwise would have had. It also puts a hard cap on how long she'll get spousal support. Sure, it's a nice immediate boost, but she has every incentive to stay with him and keep screwing her friend without getting caught.

You can't hide that fact. You can't fake that divorce wouldn't hurt you.

Does it hurt? Yes. But it will hurt less now than at any other point in the relationship. He's really in a spot where it's not all that bad, comparatively.

He's businesses are family businesses he inherited

Then it's all separate property and she has no claim to them whatsoever (except to the degree of active appreciation during the marriage; even passive appreciation would be his separate property). I'm pretty sure every single state has a law affirming this.

Single Father v. Single Mother Stats

13 upvotes · 2 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Are male clients better off with female attorneys or male?

Male. Most female attorneys seem to have a stick up their butt. They're constantly trying to prove something to someone, but they don't know what or to who, so they just come off as arrogant without cause most of the time. Even when they do have the stronger facts on their side, they don't know how to play it cool. They ham it up stronger than it is, and end up losing credibility, losing ground with the judge, putting the case on more equal terms when they already had it made and they just needed to chill. To be fair, both sexes do this when they're new to the practice ... but I have yet to see a female attorney learn to play it cool even several years into her practice.

This is where RP concepts of stoicism really help in a legal practice. If you can listen to a judge ream you and your client, maintain a stiff face, and walk away saying, "I understand. Thank you, your honor," you just gained a ton of points with that judge, even if she was mad at you before. But for some reason most women can't keep their mouths shut. They try to argue back with the judge (especially if it's a male judge), or they'll roll their eyes (you just won your next motion if the judge sees this), or they'll be whispering to their client while the judge is talking to them as a passive-aggressive "I don't need to listen to you" kind of thing. Eye contact, stoic expression, admission of weakness, and courteous departure (preferably with a smile) are the way to set the right tone for your case. This tells a judge you have nothing to hide and that you can be trusted with how you present your case, not getting personally invested in the matter, and not feeling like you have to over-compensate for weaknesses or inflame your strengths.

As to that "admitting your weaknesses" part - I've only ever met one female attorney who was capable of doing this with any tact. Most of them say, "It's true that we have ___ and ___ and ___ working against us, BUT - here are all of our strengths." This is not an admission of weaknesses. This is an assertion that your strengths outweigh your weaknesses.

Sometimes I walk into a judge's chambers on a case and start the conversation by saying, "Your honor. My client's an arrogant butt hole. The other side has her problems too, but seriously ... this guy really thinks he's the king of the world. And I'm not saying anything he wouldn't tell you himself - he knows he's arrogant." Everyone in the room has a good laugh as they wait for the "BUT!" When it doesn't come, the judge finally asks each side to present their case. Guess which side the judge usually trusts and believes? The guy who knows how to own his faults.

I've only ever found one female attorney who is the exception to this rule. The problem she had was that she was so much of a pushover that I got everything I wanted out of the case anyway. I don't think girls know how to play it in the middle in a professional context. They're either hard-core fem-nazis or you get the rare overly-submissive pushover.

Would it affect the calculation if the wife's attorney were female or male?

Well, I always size up the other side before I size up their attorney. Why? Because the client ultimately calls the shots and even though I can't speak to the other party, my client can. So, if my client can get through to his wife, we've got a much better chance of settling the case, even if the other attorney plays hard-ball.

That said, if the client is a tough-nut, then the attorney really matters. A good attorney can get his client under control, but a bad attorney will fuel his client's rage because he can make a ton of money doing that.

As for gender roles in opposing counsel, I'd always prefer to go up against men over women - not because I get better results (I usually get better results going against women), but because they don't take everything so darn personally, they're not threatening to report you for garbage that you never did, they're not trying to prove anything to anyone ... you can just chat and have fun with them, and when it's time to do battle, you do battle, straight and easy.

I used to be indecisive, but now I'm sure...

13 upvotes · 20 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

In the past, when she asked what I wanted for dinner, I'd respond once with an open-ended, "Where do you want to go?" If she was indecisive, I'd narrow it down and say, "Here are 3 options. Do you have a preference?" If she still didn't answer, I'd pick (although 90% she'd pick one of the three).

Nowadays, if I actually have one that I want more than the others I won't even wait for her to ask about dinner: I'll just tell her, "I'm picking up Piada on the way home. Do you want the fried chicken or grilled chicken this time?"

If I really don't have a preference, I'll still revert to the 3-options question as my first line (instead of second) and make sure they're all options I'm okay with. If she picks something off the list and I'm into it, I go with it; if I'm not I'll say, "That's a great idea ... for Saturday. Let's do ____ today."

She actually got ticked yesterday when I did this. She started thawing chicken to make a chicken parmesan bake, but didn't have time to cook it. She asked me to cook it and handed me the recipe. I said, "I like chicken parmesan, but I hate cooking it. I'm grilling the t-bones I bought the other day." She got all huffy and complained about the chicken already being partially thawed (read: still 75% frozen). I said, "Great. If you want chicken parmesan for yourself, go cook it. I'm making steak either way. Would you like one or not?" She ate it and savored my grilling mastery. We had chicken parmesan today ... it was done by the time I got home from work and quite delicious ... and I didn't have to cook it.

My boyfriend likes that I'm smart

13 upvotes · 11 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Here's the deal: dumb women who aren't submissive are the worst. There is no good reason to insist on their ways.

Smart women who lord it over their men (i.e. aren't submissive) are slightly better but still a pain. 99% of men will hate this unless the man is clearly intellectually superior and both partners love the thrill of the debate.

A dumb woman who follows her husband's lead is acceptable and does not present a hindrance to attraction. Some men actually find the "dumb blonde" thing, for example, quite attractive - the ditsy factor.

A highly intelligent woman who uses her intelligence to support her man rather than control him ... that's entering unicorn territory.

My wife is extremely smart. I'm smarter (she agrees). Her intelligence used to make her compete with mine, which was very frustrating. When I started following biblical and RP leadership principles, her position has changed to respect my decisions even when she thinks I'm wrong or doesn't see the bigger picture (on most financial decisions, for example: she rationalizes an immediate need quite well, whereas I also balance in long-term planning). This has become an absolutely beautiful thing in our marriage because I can delegate things to her with no worry or concern, knowing that she can handle very complex situations, difficult communications with third parties, and on the fly decisions when I am unavailable.

In short, my trust in her capabilities is through the roof, but I have not lost respect or leadership in the process.

A nice quote from my former pastor: It's not submission until you disagree. Otherwise you're just doing what you would already do anyway.

Edit: I should also note:

submission is letting him be right even when he's factually wrong

Not all situations are clear cut fact. It's more about perception of fact. For example, suppose you both reach for something on the table and somehow water spills everywhere. Who did it? In your mind, it is undeniable fact that he knocked over the cup. In his mind, it's the reverse.

Submission involves accepting the possibility that you might be wrong even if everything in you says you're right. You'd be surprised how often people are fully convinced of something that is just factually untrue. It happens on the witness stand all the time. They swear under oath up and down that their version of events is true ... then a video comes out that shows the opposite and they are genuinely floored.

There are some objective facts, such as in your example. Submissiveness there is not about ceding to a false reality, but about how you communicate actual reality to him.

How to bring out the Alpha in a Beta man?

13 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

It is certainly possible to bring out the alpha in him, but at some point he has to want it. Your job is to make him want it and give him an opportunity to practice. Here are a few tricks to try that worked when my wife (sometimes unintentionally) did them on me:

FIRST - Tell him bluntly. Also, explain that, physical characteristics aside, you aren't attracted to a man who defers to you all the time.

SECOND - Let things fall apart. He doesn't lead because he's grown comfortable with you doing it. Break that comfort. Escalate the discomfort if it doesn't work at first. Here are examples in escalating order:

- Stop cleaning/vacuuming/doing the dishes. Let them pile up until he asks you to do them. If he gets mean about it (releasing his harbored resentment - a classic beta trait), just say, "All you had to do was ask," and go do it with a smile.

- Beta guys don't know the difference between being assertive and being a jerk. So, although it sounds counter-intuitive, you have to reward him when he's being assertive in any capacity, even if he's being a jerk too. When he learns that it's okay to be assertive around you, that's when you start helping him filter his jerk qualities out. His re-calibration will demand that he leave one extreme for the other extreme before he is able to find a balance. He is incapable of going directly to that happy balance.
- Stop doing the laundry. When he doesn't have clothes to wear to work, just say, "Oh, I didn't know it needed to be done," and toss him something from off the floor.
- Stop keeping the calendar. If friends want to hang out, forward the text message to him and make him answer it. Don't remind him when the day comes. If you miss it, then you miss it. Your friends may be upset, but you can always pass it off: "He was in charge of setting everything up."
- Toss the bills on his desk and if they don't get paid, let them go unpaid until he gets it done. Yes, you will lose some money by doing this, but consider that the cost of a much happier future together.

THIRD - Fuel his desire to be an initiator. Start with something you know he wants: a physical relationship. Wear something mildly provocative and doll yourself up a little bit more than normal, but act like you're wearing a nun's outfit. Don't get so dolled up that he thinks it's you passively initiating, though, because then he's just responding and not leading. The slight provocation will start spinning his wheels, but your non-initiation will force him to step up his game if he wants any actual action.

FOURTH - Don't start conversations. If he's not willing to initiate a conversation, let there be very, very, very long silences until he decides it's time to talk. My guess is he's used to you being the one to ask him questions and get the ball rolling. If he asks if there's a problem, just say, "No, I feel great today," and go about your business.

FIFTH - Do your own thing, not the default thing. Netflix and phone-scrolling are specifics, but the broader category is just chilling. He likes chilling with you. That's fine, but he has to lead you in that. So, get up and do other things around the house during the time you would normally watch Netflix. When he's all confused why you're not just automatically doing what he expects, he'll ask you, "Hey, are you coming down to watch?"

SIXTH - Flip conversations. If he asks you a question, put the onus back on him. For example, with that last question ("You coming down?") reply: "Do you want me to?" He asks: "What do you want for dinner?" You reply: "Thanks for asking. I'd rather you pick today."

SEVENTH - Master the art of fostering subtle curiosity. This is a very tricky concept to implement, but when a person becomes curious about something, it can consume them until they get answers. This, in itself, doesn't translate to leadership, but there are a great many alpha qualities that come out with this one-track-mind drive. If he's not typically a curious person, making him curious about things more frequently might get him practicing alpha traits without knowing it. For example, something as simple as turning off his facebook app to google the answer to a question (ex. "What else has that actor been in?") gives him a mini-goal and lets him practice immediately accomplishing that goal. Escalate this into bigger things down the road, like making him curious about why you wore that outfit in the third point, above, or why you put on lipstick just to hang around the house, when you almost never do that.

EIGHTH - If all else fails, as a last resort start commenting about situations at work, among friends, on TV, etc. where you see a guy take charge and how you respect that. This can really make beta guys insecure about the possibility that you're cheating, and RP guys are 100% going to tell him you're cheating when you make comments like that ... but sometimes a little reverse dread, highlighting the things you find attractive in a man, could do him a little good.

I hope this helps.

Wife goes on a sex journey to 'find herself'. Is shocked when husband leaves her

13 upvotes · 6 July 2017 · /r/TheRedPill

This is how I interpreted it too. She realized after-the-fact that all of her guys were overseas and not marriage material; his girls were at home and don't have to be marriage material (only guys need to be marriage material, for the most part) ... she put herself in a bad spot and had to ex post facto rationalize why he ended up better off than her as a result of her living out her fantasy.

Christians and divorce

12 upvotes · 26 May 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Make disciples.

Abstinence till marriage (Advice/Discussion)

12 upvotes · 23 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians prioritising my career and hoping to start a family in the near future

and

Mission: I want a big family, with a loving wife and children.

This is what's killing you. I'm with /u/redwall92 on this one. You're wasting your life here.

I get it, though. You're relatively new to the faith. The concept of "mission" is something the Church won't teach you (lots of reasons for that), so you probably won't hear it from many other places, unless you get to know the Bible directly. Anyone who actually reads the Bible for themselves can't miss it.

The long and short of it is: God has given you a purpose. It's clearly stated in the Bible. It is unambiguous. One reason I put "mission" as one of the required stats in the sidebar is because it tells me IMMEDIATELY if a person is oriented toward following Christ or just wanting to do their own thing. You are the latter. I have no doubt that you want to follow Christ, but perhaps you just haven't figured out how that looks, so you treat your "faith" as a background thing while your career and family goals are primary. That needs to change first. When you do, everything else follows.

Some of this stems from this problem:

Reading: RPC

This tells us absolutely nothing. Are you saying you read whatever random posts go up? Cool. At least you should read my latest, which I put up just last night and it pseudo-tangentially addresses this mission problem (I wrote it ambiguous enough that I could put it up on the secular sub too, but this Christian crowd should know more clearly what I'm getting at).

Are you saying you've read the sidebar? Then you've probably read Mission Matters, Nothing Else, right? If so, you probably forgot what you read. Go back for a re-read.

Or what about This Sidebar Post or This One?

Or what about even the secular subs' sidebars? I quoted from the 16 Commandments of Poon in my last post, where he says, "You shall make your mission, not your woman, your priority." You've gone even worse and made your hypothetical woman AND your hypothetical children your priority, who you don't even have yet.

How can you lead someone when you're pursuing them? De-facto, that makes them the one leading you. One major reason millennials became so doggone screwed up (and it's getting worse) is because there was a shift in child psychology that happened in the 1980s in mass-proposed parenting models that emphasized, "Children come first; they're the top priority above everything." This is where our court systems are, it's where most non-PhD counselors/therapists remain, and it's what our churches still teach. It's only been in the last few years that PhD-level research has started showing that making your kids the center of your universe turns them into spoiled brats. Some of the emerging trends are now consistent with what I had been teaching biblically for years: Parents need to focus on pursuits outside the home to model for their children that there are more important things going on in the world than them.

Parents who fail this by making their children the center of their universe teach their children to think, "I am the most important thing there is. My parents oriented their lives around me. Others should too." When children don't get the attention from others that their parents gave them, they go to great lengths to get it. Enter Instagram. Twitter. Tinder. All of the post-sexual-revolution mentality that was heightened by the age of the internet. All of this stems from crappy parenting - parenting that put the family first without an actual mission outside the home.

Don't make that mistake. Listen to /u/redwall92 instead of arguing with him on stuff like this - especially when there's a broader cultural adoption of a concept within this community, such as the importance of having a mission beyond your wife and kids. Frankly, I'm surprised /u/Deep_Strength didn't mention any of this in his comment to you. Start reading the sidebar. You'll get there.

NMMNG married sex pause vs 1 Cor 7:5

12 upvotes · 3 March 2021 · /r/askRPC

I agree with /u/SkimTheDross - this isn't something you should have done openly. MMSLP also holds a much more valuable principle: never reject an initiation from your wife.

Now, if your whole marriage is falling apart and sexual issues are behind it, then yeah, it might make sense to say: "Let's just stop trying to force it, take a break for a couple days [1 Cor. 7 says SHORT TIME, not 3 months] to pray about the situation, then try again." I'm not opposed to that.

But you haven't told us nearly enough here to know why this moratorium is necessary in the first place, so I can't vouch that you made the right choice at all. If anything, without the context it sounds like a horrible choice.

23 year old woman desperately looking for help.

12 upvotes · 9 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I don't share my faith, as no one cares

Practice the art of invoking curiosity. It's the best skill you'll ever learn. Our obligation is to make disciples. If people don't seem interested, with all that meditating you do, meditate on how to make them interested.

has no job (like most men currently) ... Everyone under 28 yo is in the same boat.

Stop making excuses for him. Lots of people in that age-range have jobs and are continuing to find them.

knows just about everything

Except how to get a job, apparently.

I would say he is the epitome of what you praise here (obviously not perfect)

With rosy emotion-smothered glasses on, I'm sure this seems true. What you're describing, though, doesn't seem to fit with what you're saying.

His only weakness is that he is a very depressive and pessimist person

Ah yes, the man with no frame is the epitome of a red pill man. Now I see what you're saying.

How do I express my concerns and worries to him without being a burden and a weight on him?

Ask him to lead you in ways that will make him contemplate his own issues. If he's struggling with depression, on a day you're feeling depressed (don't make it up or just lie about it), tell him: "I'm struggling with this. I know it's something you deal with too. Can you help work with me on how to overcome this in my life?" He, if he's at all wise, will find value and help in his own struggle through the process of helping you.

All (literally all) the churches and priests here are what you can expect of your typical heretical, feminist, God-loves-you-for-everything, feel-good, wishful thinking kind. No spirituality, love songs, no teachings. You know the deal. So me and my boyfriend resent it. We want to get married but there is no priest that to us, is a man of God and has authority to marry us.

Believe me - no one else holds this sentiment here as strongly as I do. Not even /u/praexology (though he may come close at times). But it's immature and unwise to forsake the best resource you have for finding people to disciple. Wait ... what's that? You and him aren't actually discipling anyone yet? If that's the case (and I assume it is, as is true for most people), you need to step back and reassess how you discern maturity in the faith.

Back to the point: no person "has authority to marry" anyone anyway. There's no verse that says, "When two people get married, it must be through a pastor/priest." People today get super hung up because it's social custom to marry that way. But for literal millennia common law marriage was a legit thing, and only recently in SOME (not all) jurisdictions has this been abolished ... and suddenly churchianity wants to pretend that it was never a thing in the first place. Screw that. Common law marriage was when two people acted like they were married for long enough that the state just deemed them married, even without any other legalities to support that conclusion.

As I think /u/rocknrollchuck alluded to, your presently-existing exchange of vows and sexual activity already makes you married in God's eyes. I often say that in a biblical view there are only two conditions to create a marriage: (1) covenant, (2) sex. You have both. This is not an "engagement," as you say. It's a marriage. It's just a common law one, in the state's eyes, rather than a statutory one.

What to do? We are already engaged and feel like we are married.

Suppose you do want to legalize it before the state. If it's just a legal technicality to get tax benefits, why does it matter who the officiant is? Like chuck said - go to the courthouse. Or use a crappy congregation leader. For all I care, go have a mormon or scientologist officiate the ceremony. Just because they're cultists doesn't mean their ordination isn't recognize by the state. As I've already said, the ceremonial officiant doesn't change the fact that you're already married before God if you've made that covenant to be so, and had sex to seal it.

I know you will hate me for this ... We are not stopping, and we feel we are actively defying God in that regard. My doubt here is: how to deal with sex if marrying is so difficult?

Nah. We don't hate you for it at all. The only thing this affects is that it gives further confirmation that he's not the mature epitome of masculine Christianity that you seem to think he is. So, you're both fallen sinners. Welcome to the club. The only question is: what are you going to do about it going forward? Embrace marriage (whether already created or soon-to-be) or continue in what you believe to be sinful conduct? Mind you: Romans 14:14 states clearly that even if something isn't sinful in actuality, if you believe you're sinning when you do it, it's still sin. So, if you and him are "married," having sex isn't sin ... unless you believe it is, then it becomes sin. But if you embrace a "spiritual marriage," even if it's not solemnized by the government, why would you still condemn sexual interaction?

But let me be clear here: When you embrace SPIRITUAL marriage, you have to recognize that you are ACTUALLY married. The fact that you're not technically subject to CIVIL divorce laws doesn't mean you can change your mind several years from now and pretend you were never actually married. That's why I reference the common law marriage stuff above, even though it really shouldn't matter. Because you have to recognize that this is still just as binding as if you did the whole song and dance.

every church is against God (like we are currently, with sex...)

Right. Hypocrite much? Why be so against pastors who "get it wrong" when you're condemning yourself by the same standard (or perhaps even a harsher one)? This is just making up excuses. I have no idea how you reconcile this cognitive dissonance. Either have grace on these other pastors as you do on yourself to insist that you will continue in what you believe to be unrepentant, sinful conduct ... or deny them your grace and resolve to repent.

But even then: Have you actually gone to these pastors to correct them? I'm really put-off by the way you condemn every "pastor" (I know: biblically, they're not really pastors at all), yet abdicate yourself from any responsibility for setting them straight. It's like you're just abandoning any involvement in local congregations at all. Even with your reservations, this is an absurd conclusion.

until me and my boyfriend finish our studies and are able to get a qualified work as engineers (at 29 yo), it's impossible for us so being a family

You're making tons of excuses. The bottom line is this: It's more important to you (plural) to have the careers you want than the family life you want. That's the decision you're making. Either embrace that and stop worrying about when you'll have kids, or change your priorities, drop out of school, and get a part-time job sufficient to pay the rent so you can begin the family life you want. Realistically: once you have a few kids, do you plan on continuing to work full-time anyway?

I don't know what my doubt here is, other than, what can I do to stop feeling so defeated about it?

You pick your priorities and embrace them. Stop expecting some magical wand to come in and give you conflicting goals in perfect harmony. Once you embrace the conflict and resolve in your own heart that you will pursue the higher priority to you, the "defeated" feeling should subside. The only thing that's "defeating" you at all right now is your quest to make the irreconcilable reconcilable.

my country will have a collapse in some 5 or 10 years. Widespread unemployment ... How am I supposed to feel good about raising a family in such dire conditions?

Now your job comments make more sense. But they're still just excuses. Your country sucks? Move to another country. I know, I know, "But I can't because of this excuse and that excuse." Don't whine. Let's go back to the prioritization issue. What you're saying is: It's a higher priority to me to avoid the challenges of relocating to another country than it is to raise my children in better conditions. Are you okay with that? If so, embrace it and move on - because you're getting what's more important to you anyway. If not, change your priorities and move.

Do I just "enjoy the decline" and keep to myself and family and friends, forming a tight community? That seems like the best course of action...

Ah, yes - the old "get everyone you love and hide in a cave to watch the world burn" strategy. Screw that. You want the world to be a better place? Your country? Go make disciples. That's how it's going to get better. If I'm right about preterism, it's LITERALLY the way things will get better. If I'm wrong and futurism is true, things aren't going to get better, so why not save as many as you can before it dies completely? Either way, the conclusion is the same.

Hopefully my bluntness doesn't result in hurt feelings. I do think it's necessary to jar you a bit into realizing the unhealthy framework you're approaching your problems from.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/02/20)

12 upvotes · 2 September 2020 · /r/RPChristians

PHYSICAL: Home gym set up. Dieting has gone great lately. Losing some of what I re-gained after the close of gyms. I'm also realizing that my strength isn't what it used to be. Instead of 275x5 I'm stuck back at 245x5 with 265 as an ORM instead of my former 305. I'm hoping this comes back quickly, though while dieting I'm sure this will take longer. That said, I did cut back on the dieting because it was causing serious fatigue, which I can't have right now because ...

MENTAL/EMOTIONAL: Hardest thing to do in my life is walk away from my son in the hospital in critical condition. He had a chest infection that was mis-diagnosed as corona (similar symptoms: chest pain, shortness of breath, fatigue, headache, runny nose, etc.). Because it was misdiagnosed for so long (didn't help that his corona test came back positive), the infection was allowed to spread for far too long with the doctors repeatedly telling us to "just let him relax at home until it goes away on its own." Basically malpractice there. We took him to the ER when he started growing a lump in his chest, thinking it was a blood-clot (corona-symptom), and that's when they realized it was an infection. It had gotten so bad it went through his sternum, covering over the bone, and spread throughout his bloodstream.

The doctors did surgery on him the next day to remove as much of the infectious tissue as possible. He still has a giant hole in his chest with a vacuum attached to it to suck out the infection as it spreads so that the antibiotics can kill it faster than it reproduces.

In the beginning, I was at home caring for our 3 girls while my wife sat in the hospital with our son. The intent was that this would keep her stress level down, as being at home and not knowing what's going on would have been more worrisome to her, especially with 3 other kids to figure out. Well, that plan failed. Two days after the surgery, my wife had a vagel response and passed out and got herself shipped to the ER, leaving me to deal with my 3 daughters at home, her in the ER, and my son with no one in his room.

Also, the positive corona diagnosis meant that our household is under quarantine per the health department, so I couldn't take my daughters anywhere near the hospital. My wife and I were the only ones authorized to be with him - no other family allowed. So, my sister-in-law took the risk on the covid issue, hoping my daughters turn out to be negative, and picked them up so I could stay with my son and my wife could recover.

She felt a bit better the next day and decided to stay with my son again so I could get some work done. That failed once again, as the very next day she about passed out again and was sent home to get more rest.

While there was some hope that my son could come home later today, per the infectious disease specialists, the surgery staff just tossed that idea out because my son's digestive system isn't back to normal, meaning he might not process oral antibiotics properly, thus has to stay on the IV at the hospital. They may still let him home in a few days with a home-IV, but it's more probable they're going to hold him at least another week.

- CONCLUSION: This is why stoicism and maintaining frame are so important. In all of this, it's obvious my wife can't handle the stress. Yet because of my self-improvement I've been able to maintain the house, keep up with the daily calls from the health department regarding the COVID issue, get in my full work load, cover my son, give my wife the time she needs to rest, keep up with friends/social groups, continue my mission to make disciples ... oh yeah, and still get a full SL 5x5 routine in, as well as running 5-7 miles 4 times in the last week. Every time a new emergency comes up - whether it's with my son, my wife, work, etc., I just smile and whisper to myself: "Bring it on." Instead of feeling stress, I feel like Superman. I am the prize.

I attempt to empathize with my wife a bit more by acknowledging stress and difficulty at times. I do know that my emotional expressivity dips down when I'm in crisis-mode like this, so it's not like there's no impact at all. But on the whole, I'm feeling good and mentally stable. That's my mental state right now.

SPIRITUAL: Still making disciples. Still getting time with God. Prayer is through the roof. Bible study is down. Those are the only substantial shifts - and a welcome trade-off, given how long it's been the reverse.

EDIT/UPDATE: For anyone who comes back and reads this, my son came home from the hospital a week and a half ago. He still has a vacuum attached to his chest and a picc line in his arm to get his meds, but the picc line should be coming out on 9/17/20. The wound vac was initially planned to come out in 2 weeks from yesterday (9/15), but the appointment showed the tissue is taking longer to heal than we'd hoped, so it'll be at least another week beyond that. I've had some major things revving up at work again, so my wife's been a great help taking over with the kids, who are all now back in our home and in school again. Her busy season will be picking up again very soon, so there will be some interesting balancing happening soon, but overall we're in a good state and my son is recovering, even if it's taking a bit longer for his chest than expected.

Religious Gf of 4 years broke up with me a month ago. Messaged me today that she wants to get back together. But she doesn't not want any sex during the relationship. Need advice?

12 upvotes · 2 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Locked until Rule 2 information is added.

Until then, know that when a woman breaks up then wants to get back together, it's her way of saying, "I'm not happy with you, but realized I couldn't do any better, so I'll settle with you and rush back before I lose my chance and you're with someone else."

Also, THIS SUB DOES NOT ENDORSE SEX BEFORE MARRIAGE. No advice will be permissible here that supports your apparent intentions of continuing in a sexual relationship outside of marriage. If you believe you are already spiritually married to her because of your intentional sexual relationship, then her "break up" with you is not legitimate and you are bound to her.

What are your views on prenups with Christianity?

12 upvotes · 1 June 2020 · /r/askRPC

I'm a divorce attorney. I HATE the "prenups are planning your divorce" argument because it's absolutely false. It's really the opposite. Since no fault divorce became virtually universal, the default laws of most states encourage divorce, making it easy and painless to get divorced. Prenups add consequences to get divorced, making it less likely that either party will want to. The deterrents usually include things like penalties for cheating on the other spouse, filing without just cause, financial exploitation, etc. It basically penalizes people for doing common sense things that Christians shouldn't be doing in the first place.

You would be an idiot to get married in the modern climate without contractually imposing penalties for basic decency that the default laws of the state will allow people to do without consequence.

If you do get a prenup, the best approach is to tell people: "The laws of our government are not godly. I don't want to subject myself to an ungodly set of laws. So, we're going to use a prenup to create godly boundaries for our marriage and deterrents to ensure we are never motivated for divorce."

Response to "Why Men Hate Going to Church"

12 upvotes · 19 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I thought about removing this post, but there's enough value in the comments to keep it up.

I could do a point-by-point analysis about why this guy's response is chock full of half-truths, but /u/RedPillWonder and others have already done some of that. I agree with /u/DeChef2 that all the ways he's wrong isn't really the point.

The point here is that YOU are deferring responsibility to someone else. This is why I tell guys not to read commentaries when they are learning to study the Bible. Yeah, commentaries are useful. Yeah, asking your elder what he thinks about something can be insightful from time to time (though not necessarily on this occasion). But at the end of the day, you're only hearing what someone else thinks God told them. Get in the Word yourself and learn to discern what's true and not - and I often encourage people to do this even against my own teachings here.

One of the main points on this sub is to teach guys to take responsibility for their own life, thoughts, beliefs, frame, etc. rather than living in someone else's worldview/frame. You haven't shared a cent about what you believe on the issue or why you believe it. That's what I'm more interested in. I have accepted the fact that most churchianity leaders are more interested in maintaining the status quo than actually challenging the man-made ideologies they've created about who they think Jesus was. I don't care if your elder agrees with a certain point or not. You're the one who's here. What's YOUR take on this? Then let us help YOU figure out what SCRIPTURE says, and not just what a cog in the churchianity wheel says.

But I do want to address this, as it hasn't been stated clearly enough:

He was gentle, kind, meek and lowly. He was a friend of tax collectors and sinners. He was merciful and tender and compassionate. He was in every way the meekest and most gentle and loving human that ever existed. And he LOVED his father with absolute passion and perfection

It's not JUST that they're isolating out individual traits. It's that the traits he references are, in themselves, contextually applied and balanced within the framework of a man on a mission. Let's break them apart. If your elder actually read Scripture without the lens of the sissified Jesus, it would become obvious that ...

- "He was gentle" to some, but harsh with others. To the needy, poor, sick, broken, depressed, etc. he showed gentleness. To the religious leaders, defiant, double-hearted, and even his own disciples, he was often extremely harsh.
- He was "kind" to some, but straight-up mean and offensive to others. Can we really say it was "kind" of him to call Peter satan or to call the Syrophoenician woman a dog? Is it an act of kindness to discipline those we love? Sure, but the more we start expanding definitions beyond their common use, the more our words become useless - and if one starts to do that, there's no point disagreeing purely on word choice.
- He was "meek" in some situations, but proud and boastful in others. Now, one might say, "But he's Jesus, therefore he has the right to be boastful." Yet even Numbers says we have the right to boast that we understand and know God, and Paul boasted of his disciples, and he boasted of the things God did through him, despite the weaknesses of his flesh.
- He was "lowly" in appearance and in his humanity, but also completely divine and of the highest of highs in his status and authority over humanity. Even though he was poor in a financial context, even during his human life he was a leader who had the ears of everyone wherever he went - both friend and foe. He had authority and influence and he used it for God's purposes. So, yes, he was lowly in some ways, but the exact opposite in others.
- "He was a friend of tax collectors and sinners" just as much as he is their enemy and will ultimately be the source of their eternal condemnation if they don't repent. He also drew a clear line on a number of occasions regarding who he refused to associate with. "Anyone who does not hate his father, mother, brother and sister, wife and children, even his own life cannot be my disciple." He sent away the guy who wanted to say goodbye to his family and the man who wanted to bury his father. He didn't let the rich young man follow him if he wouldn't sell all of his belongings. So, can we really say he was a friend to everyone? Certainly the Pharisees wouldn't have thought so.

- "He was merciful" to some people, yet judgmental and condemning to others.
- "...and tender" to some, while strict and abbrasive to others.
- "... and compassionate" to some, while hostile toward others.
- "He was in every way the meekest and most gentle and loving human that ever existed" in certain contexts, yet embodies the exact opposite of these traits in other contexts. It's not hard to find them.
- "And he LOVED his father with absolute passion and perfection." Of course - and being like him in ALL ways is how we express a comparably applied love. Being like Christ in only a select few ways, while ignoring his likeness in other ways is still un-Christ-like.

Imagine a piece of bread covered in two kinds of mold/fungus. One is red and the other is blue. You scrape off all the red mold, but leave the blue. Would you then hand it to your children and say, "Here, I cleaned off this bread for you. Go ahead and eat it"? Of course not - it's still moldy and disgusting. Just because you figured out how to remove half the mold doesn't mean the bread is any more valuable.

On the topic of Jesus being loving and the "embodiment of love," as many like to say, it's important to remember that the passage actually goes that "God is love." Jesus, of course, says, "I only do what I see my Father doing." While God is love, he also lovingly ordered the deaths of women and children. He lovingly required countless animals to be slaughtered in his name. He lovingly opened up the earth and killed numerous of his own people. He lovingly withdrew his presence from Israel when they turned on him. He lovingly sent plagues on Pharaoh and the Egyptians. He lovingly did much, much more.

So, are we going to expand our definition of love to include a heck of a lot more than what churchianity wants to portray as a sissified sunshine and roses view of God/Jesus, or are we going to use more modern feel-good definitions of love and conclude that God/Jesus is sometimes loving and other times not? Or do we not acknowledge that there are numerous things that the Bible says God hates - including sinners (not just the sin itself - Psalm 5:5, for example)?

Anyway ... enough rambling.

Being a servant sexy?

12 upvotes · 13 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed. Also, churchianity is so hung up on looking for opportunities to serve. But how often do we see Jesus telling his disciples, "Let's go find someone to serve today!?" It doesn't happen. Jesus primarily helps those people along his path who are in need and who call out to him. I don't support the "let's go out of our way to find service opportunities" approach.

Instead, I see Jesus out making disciples, and his drive to do so brought him across so many people in need that his compassion caused him to help those who would ask.

This is consistent with James's verse saying, "You do not have because you do not ask." So why should we, as believers, go around giving to those who don't ask? I'm not saying it's bad to do so (though maybe it is!) ... just that it's not at all what Jesus modeled.

This is also consistent with the concept that Jesus's service and blessings were primarily directed to those who had faith. We don't see him serving the Pharisees or asking if Pilate had anyone who needed healed. Instead, we see that in his hometown he could not do many miracles at all - because of their lack of faith. So, why is churchianity putting so much effort toward serving non-believers when we don't see Jesus modeling this? Rather, Jesus focused his service toward those who would believe in him.

Again, not to say it's bad to serve non-believers (though maybe it is! if Jesus didn't do it, I can't say). But I do know that a life that most directly mimic's Christ's won't include non-believers as the primary target of that service. From the non-believer standpoint, why buy the cow when you get the milk for free? But if you see a community of people who care for each other and have something powerful in the way the community builds each other up - that's something people might want in on.

Tag: /u/pm_me_great_quotes

The Philosophy Side of The Bible

12 upvotes · 19 February 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Non-Christians find value in reading the Bible all the time. Even if they don't go into it for the purpose of developing a belief system, there are numerous non-Christians who recognize it is a valuable source of human history, poetic intrigue, and food for moral and philosophical thought. Given that many moral debates throughout the world today involve the Bible on one side of the line or other (sometimes both), it would probably be of great interest for someone like you to want to know what it actually says so you can tell when one side or the other is misrepresenting the actual words (which happens insanely often).

That said, don't go in with the intent of trying to find validation for red pill views. Yes, you will find it. But it's better to read the Bible for what it is rather than through a particular lens of what you want to find in it.

The Second Kiss of Death

12 upvotes · 18 June 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Different wavelengths here. My wife will do the same - and always has, even when she wasn't attracted to me. But there's a difference between her directly responding to specifics and making broader life changes.

- "He told me to shift to x position, so I will," isn't the same as, "Hmm, I really want to please my husband, so I'm going to look into new positions and sexual techniques so I can be a better sexual partner to him."
- "He said I look hot in this outfit, so I'll wear it more often" is different from "I haven't been dressing to please. I need to up my wardrobe so he likes what he sees whenever I walk in the room."

sex... bwfore marriage?

12 upvotes · 7 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Props for your patience. This guy's an obvious troll, as evidenced by his post history.

Unrealistic expectations

12 upvotes · 27 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Find a woman who is faithful, available, and teachable. Yes, I know that acronym spells FAT - and it's one that I've been using for years. But if you can find someone with all the of these qualities you can instill any other quality or value in them.

For example, suppose you find someone who is already thin, fit, and has a regular pattern of exercise.

- If she's not faithful in following your lead, she may veer off into laziness after a pregnancy, for example, and use that as an excuse to avoid getting back in shape.
- If she isn't available, she'll never set aside the time necessary to do what you're leading her into.

- If she's not teachable, then she won't accept correction from you when you talk to her about her weight.

But suppose you find a chubby girl who is strong in all of these values.

- If she's faithful, she'll join you at the gym and workout alongside you.
- If she's available, she won't use work, tiredness, time with other friends, etc. as an excuse not to go with you or even on her own.
- If she's teachable, she'll accept help and instruction on how to lift, what goals should be, when her progress is not satisfactory, etc.

I've met both kinds of women. It's interesting seeing the stark contrast. If you can find a FAT woman who is already somewhat and has a great set of personal habits to maintain this, all the better. If not, find someone who is willing and able to learn. But you obviously have to be willing to model it first.

Does your religion go well together with rp?

12 upvotes · 19 July 2018 · /r/RedPillWomen

I have done an incredible amount of writing on this very topic, most of which is posted in the sidebar content of r/RPChristians. Although the vast majority of our users are men, we do have a few women who comment regularly, and it was my original vision for the sub to include both men and women who were willing to embrace biblical truth, which is the original "red pill."

To that end, I have made sure to include a post on our sidebar specifically devoted toward women, and most of the theory posts hold value for both genders toward understanding the original biblical basis for many of the red pill dynamics the secular world has discovered the hard way. It's much easier when we have a textbook that literally tells us how God designed the world. But to your interests in particular, the post I'm referencing that's geared toward women was written by one of our moderators (/u/RedPillWonder) and was originally posted on RPW to give advice to single women wanting to know how best to prepare themselves for a future husband.

The one thing that I would say that may be a significant distinguishing point is that the RPW endorsed contributors have consistently stated that an RPW woman merely embraces the realities of the "red pill" functionings of intergender relational dynamics, but does not necessarily mean that a red pill woman wants a "red pill guy." Our position on r/RPChristians is that when a man is living in light of complete godliness in his masculinity, then he will embody everything that any woman would desire - RPW or otherwise. To that end, we seek to make godly men first as the solution to all the other issues and problems that get brought up in the midst of the loneliness and longing the singles endure and the brokenness and sexual strife that the married men are seeking to rectify.

That's not to say we're without our problem users. After all, anything with "red pill" in the name tends to attract a certain type of man that the church often frowns upon and rejects. Rather than telling them to stop being men, I'd rather take them with all their rough edges and refine them. Instead of smoothing the rough edges, as the church tries to do, I want to give them a purpose that couldn't be fulfilled without a rough edge. So, just be expectant and patient with that as you read through some of the questions and advice threads. Focus more on the comments in reply to these people than on the posts themselves - that's where I believe the community shines :)

Tag: /u/CleburnCO, /u/19_LadyScarlet_90

27/m virgin, want to lose it

12 upvotes · 7 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Your post expresses a fundamental perception problem in how you view your sin. You assume it is about our offenses against other people. This is a rational position, given that human laws are meant to protect other people and it's easy to think of God's imperatives on our lives the same way. That said, the two don't translate.

God's imperatives on us aren't about protecting other people, though they can certainly implicitly have that effect. Rather, God's laws are about us becoming the types of people he wants us to become. It is about us reflecting his image to the world. In my 112 post on the sidebar I go a lot more into detail about this - that it's just rules for the sake of rules, but that God wants us to be his image-bearers and to develop the strength necessary to do his work.

If you adopt this view, you will notice that it doesn't matter whether or not it's fair to you or her for you to lose your virginity or for your wife to have lost hers before meeting you. That's not the point of why God condemns sex outside of marriage in the first place. God's purpose is to establish through our lives a model for how the world can understand the relationship God wants to have with his people. Sex before marriage is getting all the benefits without the commitment. This implies to the world that they should also be able to get the benefits of a relationship with God without actually having to commit to Him - that they should get all of his blessings and joy and eternal life and all that without binding their lives to him. This is not how salvation works.

Notice that universalist tendencies - the notion that God will just give everyone the benefits of marriage to Christ without them actually having to commit to Christ - this started becoming a far more popularized doctrine at the same time that premarital sex was popularized and encouraged openly and in the media. This is not a coincidence. Human sexuality reflects to the world how God is to relate with his people. That's why it's so important.

Now, as to you specifically, it'd be easy to say, "But I'm just one drop in the bucket. My influence on the world is so small that it shouldn't matter." But if everyone who ever thought that had gone the other way and made the right choice, that tiny influence would become massive. That's why at every election we see people on both sides of the line trying to get voters off their butts, telling them, "Your one vote does actually count."

Moreover, your life, especially if you identify yourself as a Christian, has a significant impact on how others in your sphere of influence know you. While your conduct might not have a noticeable impact on the world as a whole or on some random person overseas, it will have a noticeable impact on those who God has placed in your sphere of influence. Do not let your behaviors compromise your ministry to these people.

Now, it's easy to argue that you could just hide what you're doing, so as long as your friends don't know it shouldn't negatively impact your ministry. But this is a clear cop-out that doesn't account for:

- The fact that you will know you've sinned, and that you have compromised your faith. In your own knowledge of this, even if you don't intend it, there will be subconscious psychological ramifications on how you communicate with others. For example, you may be more reserved in your willingness to share the Gospel or to reveal to them their own sinfulness, not wanting to feel like a hypocrite yourself.
- It also affects your general spiritual maturity and orientation. When you know that you have compromised your faith in order for worldly pleasure, there is a separation that you will experience from God - one that the Bible says exists, even for the believer. This separation will hinder your fruitfulness and God's ability to work through you on a broad level. For more insight, just take the one example of praying. Do a short study on whether or not God answers the prayers of those who haven't repented and see what you come up with.
- Another thing to worth noting: the more you compromise your faith, the less interested you are in the purpose God has for utilizing that faith within you. You will have less internal compulsion to witness to your neighbors in the first place.
- It also compromises your self-control, causing you to be more likely to commit similar sins in the future - or even different sins altogether once you develop the mentality that "sin doesn't actually matter as long as I'm not hurting anyone."

Long story short, don't view sin like it's just some set of rules to regulate humanity. It's never been about fairness among human's. It's been about getting God's message of the Gospel of Jesus across the world. You have an important role to play in that to numerous people. Don't darken the corner of the world that God has given you to be a light in.

Re: /u/rocknrollchuck's comment - I agree with a lot of what he says. Just know that when he says it's about whether or not we honor God, there's more to it than that. God has a reason for his commands beyond just "I want you to obey for obedience's sake." Understand that reason behind the command and you can much more easily follow the command. In fact, you won't even have to worry about the command anymore because if you adopt the underlying principle into your worldview the command becomes second-nature. This works for all sins and not just sexual ones.

Re: /u/palmorwrist's comment - He's right, you're still young. I advise most men to wait until they're in their 30s before getting married, which implicitly means I'm advising them to stay virgins until then. Your SMV keeps rising until around 35 anyway, so you're just improving your odds of finding a top-notch girl. Lots of people marry young - even 15 years young. Finding a 30 year old virgin girl might be tough, but doable. Finding a 23 year old is still pretty easy - and if you're 33 when you meet her, that's still a more than acceptable age-gap. You've got plenty of time.

Re: your reply to /u/OsmiumZulu - You definitively compromised your values in order to see if she would be weak enough to compromise hers? How does that make any sense? What if she had rejected you? Then she would have proven that she's better than you because you would have made her go through with it (which your actual actions proved), whereas she wouldn't have complied. How would that help? The fact that she went through with it doesn't prove that she's any worse off than you. At the very best, it only shows that she's a woman who followed your lead into sin. I'm not sure how you thought anything good would come from that test. It certainly doesn't prove your quality of being worth a higher value woman, right? I'm so confused at what you were thinking by this and it would have made a lot more sense if you'd just said, "I lusted, I was weak because I'd never had that chance before, so I went for it."

First date advice

12 upvotes · 9 May 2018 · /r/RedPillWomen

This is what I'm seeing: "I'm crazy about this guy! He's amazing in all these different ways" right next to, "What if he doesn't like the way I dress? Or what if the conversation is dull?"

Realistic worst case is there's no second date. All that means is you met a guy with some really good qualities, but it wasn't a great match - maybe he couldn't lead you in a conversation or didn't care much for your fashion sense. Which is more important to you: the handful of good qualities you saw when you first met him, or dodging a bullet by not wasting time on someone who ultimately might not be a great match? You're putting all the pressure on yourself as if you are the one who has to impress him, but remember that you're supposed to be vetting him too.

Here's the deal with first dates. People feel like they have to make it work. There's some implied subconscious imperative that we want the date to end well and everything to work out. I understand where this mentality comes from - because we all assume that we're going to get married someday, so someday we will meet that "right" person, so we hope on each new first date that "this one is the one!" That's also a pretty counter-productive mentality to have. In reality we should go in with the intention of discerning whether this person is marriage material or not.

The first mentality (the bad one) stems from ONEitis and an unhealthy idealization of marriage as a concept, which is at the core of most divorces. It causes people to act outside of their ordinary decision-making patterns in an effort to impress the other person, lest you lose the chance to be with someone because he doesn't like who you are. Even worse - you're doing this before you even know what his likes/dislikes are, and thus you can't even say you're catering to your man. When you have that mentality you're quick to miss a lot of important red flags. Long story short, this is how people wind up in long-term relationships that ultimately fail and either are married and get divorced or never marry and think to themselves, "I just wasted a year of my life on that guy."

The second mentality shifts the pressure. It puts you in a position of wisdom, able to discern more clearly whether or not you actually want to be around this guy. It also gives you the sense to look for cues that you might otherwise miss. Most importantly, it lets you evaluate the original good qualities you saw in him against other things that might be important to you, like whether or not he can lead a conversation or if he appreciates your fashion sense or would make you change your wardrobe. You don't want to be with a guy who makes you become a totally different person just to be with him. But you do want to find a guy who is so great that it inspires you to be more like him. I'm not sure if that makes sense, but that type of mentality can't be had if you're stuck in the fantasy land that he might actually be your future "grow old together husband" (I practice divorce law, so I distinguish between those relationships and people who might actually marry you, but you end up divorced anyway). If he is, great. If not, better you find out at the first date than years later.

As for the practical stuff, the only time clothes really matter on a first date is if you are intentionally trying to get him to sleep with you at the end (which I don't advise). Otherwise just wear what you want as long as it's socially appropriate in light of where you're going.

Don't worry about conversation material. He should be leading the conversation. If he can't, then ask him questions to get him going. If he doesn't ask any questions back and doesn't seem to have anything interesting to say to you, ask yourself: "Is it really worth being with such a dull guy just to get some of the other positive qualities that he might have been faking when we first met?"

All of this is why the advice /u/JStheHammer gave makes the most sense - by relaxing and having fun you'll be in a much better mental state to see if you actually enjoy being with him. If you're tense about the date one of two things will happen: (1) you won't enjoy yourself, he'll probably notice and feel some reservation and be less into you; or (2) your tension will be oriented toward fantasies about what could be that might be lost if you screw it up, so you end up assuming the guy is way better than he actually is - and who knows how long it takes you to realize your first impression was off (it's hard breaking first impressions).

Looking for someone to help with looking over divorce papers

12 upvotes · 16 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

I don't mind giving general commentary ... but I can't actually give legal advice to anyone in another state. If he wants, I'll give OP a 15 minute scan and 15 minute write up. He's got to put it on a public document share site though, as I won't dox myself by giving away my email.

Be the Judge

12 upvotes · 19 December 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Good point. This is blue pill ideology at its finest - "I'm only worth what a woman says I'm worth."

Ok ASKMRP, riddle me THIS!!!

12 upvotes · 17 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

This is why we have monk mode - something I went into before even coming here. I stopped initiating and just focused on improving myself. When I came out of monk mode, I was much better off.

Think of it like being in high school. There's a hot girl you've been wanting to ask out for a long time, so you butter up to her frequently, but you're fat and geeky and she kind of laughs you off. So, you start lifting, practicing game, and OYS and all that. 3 months later you're a genuine stud. During those 3 months you were still buttering up to her and at the end she's still turning you down.

Same situation, but the 3 months of change happen over the summer when you haven't been around her. All of a sudden, it's not, "Why won't he leave me alone?" Now it's, "Woah! What happened to him! Where did this come from?" You're a whole new person. Why? Because the change is seen all at once, it's not gradual.

Now, that's not a license to go Rambo and apply everything all at once. Rather, it means that before you start trying to reignite your sex life, you've got to change the relationship culture between the two of you first. So, you gradually implement RP, but stay in monk mode sexually while you practice your game on her and lift, sidebar, OYS, etc. She's not thinking about your SMV when you're not having sex. So, when you come out of your shell, it's like you just came back from summer break and "Woah! Where did that come from!?"

But if you're pressuring her for sex constantly before then, she's evaluating your SMV everyday ... so the impact of the change is going to be squat. It's like, "Up .2 here, another .1 there ... did something dumb, so down .1, but up .3 for that ... his body got better, up another .2, but then he said that stupid thing, so down .2, then up some more." These small increments won't wow her and she won't realize the trend because she's not charting them on a scatter-plot graph. She'll notice ups and downs, not the overall pattern of up.

TL;DR - Go monk mode for a while.

Also, don't leave it up to her. She wants you to hand over that power. Screw that. You stay in charge of your sexuality. Go read the post from /u/reddreadwolverine a bit ago about intentional discomfort. Handing her the reigns is a DLV.

How marriage changes things

12 upvotes · 14 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWives

This would be great if most marriages worked as you're describing. You seem to have lucked out there :)

In reality, once commitment is secured for the woman and sex becomes an expectation instead of a pursuit, both parties have a natural inclination to ease off on how hard they've been trying, rather than stepping up their game.

I'm in the same boat you are - early 30s, married 9 years - and this is what happened in our marriage. I'm also a divorce attorney, so I hear story after story every day about how people start to slack off and "he/she isn't the same person I married - after the wedding everything changed for the worse."

Now, I'm anti-divorce - more so than 99.9% of the country, and even more than 99.9% of Christians, and more than anyone I've known I believe firmly in the value that marriage adds to a relationship and life purpose. So, I don't mean any of this as bad-mouthing marriage; but it's a practical reality of how most marriages flow. The conclusion out of that is, as you say, to make sure you're affirming and appreciating the positive aspects whenever they come along to fuel them to keep coming, and not to reward the bad behavior when your spouse does slack in a few ways. There are ways of doing this without the guy becoming a total control freak or the wife becoming a nag :)

As noted above, there are often exceptions to the rule (and your situation might be one of them), but the lower-left graph of this chart illustrates the general trend of how a relationship develops. Marriage is usually the initial pinnacle of the relationship, then as responsibility sets in the emotional fuzzies start to fade until you hit a really low point and wonder, "Was this even worth it?" Then, after you figure out your purpose together (and not just individually, which helps not at all), being on a common mission will foster that excitement for each other once more - even to the emotional degree felt during the engagement/honeymoon period and beyond. But, when I counsel couples I always advise that this "purpose" cannot be something like, "Make $____, buy our dream house, have 3 kids, and retire at 60." It has to be something bigger than you - and if it's not, it won't last or have the same sense of fulfillment.

How to get my wife into RPW?

12 upvotes · 11 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

She could be so much happier! What do you think?

No way. She's happy enough doing whatever she wants - and she's getting a better husband out of it too. She might not know why or how, but she doesn't need to know.

Finding RPW isn't going to increase her happiness. Entering the RP world is going to decrease her respect for the changes you're making because she's going to start seeing through the magic show for what it actually is. Anything with the label "red pill" on it is bad news for you - even if you never tell her you swallowed the pill (if you have). She's going to start moralizing things and telling you about all the RP stuff she's reading about that she disagrees with.

If you give her a copy of The Surrendered Wife, that's going to come off as you telling her she has a problem and she needs to fix it. She won't believe you're interested in her happiness. She also won't believe she can maximize her happiness by doing something you told her to do - especially if it means giving up power. Culture tells her otherwise and I don't get the impression you're far enough along to have deprogrammed her brain to the point where she'll be willing to accept these things.

If you absolutely insist, find one of her girl friends who you absolutely trust to keep your secret, then have that girl friend be the one to recommend the book to her. If she blabs and says, "Your husband wants you to read this," you're screwed. But, if she's solid, she might take it seriously and you can get away with it.

More to the point: STOP TRYING TO FIX HER. Get something like 3-4 years into your journey, then if she's not happier, revisit this idea.

How Did I Become the Last Single Person in My Friend Group?

12 upvotes · 2 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWives

As /u/tintedlipbalm and /u/StingrayVC alluded to, many modern feminists are at the point where they are starting to realize that their ideologies won't make them happy.

Modern feminism ideals started popping up in the 40s when men went off to war and the women stayed behind to run the country (ish). When those men returned, the wives wanted to stay in charge, but didn't have the cultural pull to do it yet, so they started the movement, which took hold in the late 60s. By 69, the first state (CA) had adopted divorce laws that started shifting the marital power balance back to women and this continued well into the 70s.

With that marital balance shift, women were then incentivized to join the workforce and pursue their own dreams and ideals, which we really see happening through the 80s. In fact, this chart from the US Department of Labor verifies this shift in the 70s and 80s.

During that 70s and 80s boom (let's go with a flat 1980 as a nice, round average), the working women were still having kids, but they were raising the kids with the new ideals that had been popping up.

- Guess how old those kids are today? Late-30s, early-40s.
- Guess which age group of women are starting to realize that their feminist ideals aren't making them happy?

Late-30s, early-40s.

Their parents didn't care. Why? Because they were already adults when the boom happened. Most of them were already married and their husbands relished the idea of the wife earning some extra income for them while the kids were at school. So, they never saw this downside - it's their children that have been crippled by this idealism. "Thanks a lot, Mom!"

Who else here communicates with ALL women (not just the hot ones) to improve your game/speaking skills?

12 upvotes · 21 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

Yeah, I don't know about that. I get what /u/rangamatchstick is saying, but showing too much interest in those of lower SMV can be a display of lesser value.

It's like being extremely confident in your skills at putting on a clip-on bow tie. Sure, you're super confident, but it's also super easy and not very masculine. The hot girl sees right away that it's a clip-on and has one of two possible reactions: (1) he must not be man enough to tie a real bow tie, or (2) he's confident with the clip on, but I have no way of knowing if he would be equally as confident with a real bow tie, so his confidence doesn't prove anything to me. There is no third option where her opinion of you is boosted by this display.

That said, showing minor interest or teasing with those of lower SMV can actually be very helpful. This can cause the hot girl to think: He's not shallow. He seems like he knows how to help people relax and have fun. But he also seems to know he can do better, which is why he isn't trying real hard. Maybe he really can do better. I should test him and find out.

Sometimes I resent my pregnant wife because of her past

11 upvotes · 15 September 2021 · /r/RPChristians

This advice is so bad I'm going to issue a 1-day ban just for shock value.

Announcement: Red Pill Christians will now exclusively be a male only space

11 upvotes · 23 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Seriously?

Christian 'Red Pill' books

11 upvotes · 12 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

/u/Deep_Strength wrote one - and that's about the closest you'll find on the market. I know there's one other out there somewhere, but I haven't read it and the link is buried somewhere in our content history.

You have to be careful with calling books on biblical masculinity the same as "red pill." There may be some overlap, but they are still separate venn diagrams, and many authors on masculinity get a lot of things wrong. Consider ...

- Biblical Masculinity Books: Talk about being strong, leadership, conquering challenges, and even valuing male sexual desire, etc. ... but can still talk a lot about pedestalizing your wife, ~~servant~~ subservient leadership, etc.
- Red Pill Books: Talk about passing fitness tests, expand on concepts of dread and pre-selection, give advice on how to build and maintain frame, etc. - all toward valuing and expressing male sexual desire, among other godly purposes ... and also includes stuff on strength, leadership, challenges, etc.

Also, one of my pet peeves is when someone says, "My pastor/favorite book author/blogger/etc. is RED PILLED." I ask why they say that. "Because he teaches male headship and submission." I ask, "Oh, really? Great. What does he teach about frame? What does he teach about amused mastery? Has he shared the art of agree and amplify with you yet?" The answers are a blank stare. Because he's not "red pill" at all. Celebrating masculinity and teaching headship is not red pill. It's certainly a good starting point, but still not even a tenth of the journey.

I thought I could get over it

11 upvotes · 23 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent reply.

Are there any good podcasts or YouTube series that you guys would recommend?

11 upvotes · 24 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

There are no official RPC podcasts/youtube in existence. There are many secular ones, but you have to filter through Scripture. There are many generic Christian ones on the topic of marriage/relationships, but you have to filter them through what Scripture actually says, which is difficult because they'll tell you screwed up interpretations quite often on what they think Scripture says.

While I haven't gone into it much, u/OsmiumZulu has pointed out to the mods the existence of <https://itsgoodtobeaman.com> - which directly references the red pill from a Christian perspective. OZ notes: "we have far more in common than we have differences." I have not listened enough to endorse them, but what I've heard definitely intrigues me.

If you're interested, go listen to their stuff, then write up a report on it.

Here's the specific one OZ linked to us: <https://www.buzzsprout.com/266333/1056727> - I will note: I'm a little miffed at the fact that they spend a good chunk of time in the beginning whining about the fact that they want to be able to talk about "Truth" without having to cite the Bible and they get annoyed by people who expect them to cite the Bible all the time. They say, "Scripture is the final authority, but it's not the only authority" - which is technically true, but if leaning too heavily on the second half, it can have severe negative repercussions in their belief and effectiveness. I need to explore them more before I can endorse or nix them.

[ADVICE] My LTR started distancing herself from me for no apparent reason

11 upvotes · 11 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Locked until you update with stats.

Until then: LDRs are NOT actual relationships. You are her emotional tampon, beta fall-back. She gets all the feels from you she wants, but without having to express any actual sexuality toward you - and I'm not even talking sex, but seducing you into wanting to marry her in the first place.

So, what you really mean is: "I have a friend who uses me for emotional validation, and now something happened and she's not using me like she used to. What's wrong?" That's your question.

/u/RunawayGrain is being generous - I give it 90/10 that she cheated on you.

She wants you to wait a week because if she talks to you now she'll feel like a slut - having sex with one man, then immediately going back to her ~~boyfriend~~ emotional tampon. Her hamster won't allow that. But if she waits a week she can say, "I repented, it's behind me. You can take me back now" and suddenly she feels morally justified in this because somehow it's better to confess a week later than right away ... you know, makes the repentance feel more believable, even to herself - "Look, I went a whole week without cheating on you, so I must be all better now!"

FR: The Spell is Broken

11 upvotes · 9 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Great story, brother.

A huge part of my sexual desire was actually misplaced spiritual desire

This right here summarizes about 90% of the spiritual framework I try to teach guys here. You figure this out, you figure out both your marriage and your mission at the same time. Physical reproduction and spiritual reproduction are inextricably linked and should never be viewed apart from each other.

Every time I wanted sex, I would bring it to my wife. Every time I would let it be her decision whether she turned me down.

Consider:

- She says yes, so you start pumping to get yourself warmed up. Eventually you finish by pumping on her. No sin in people who do this, right?
- She says no, so you start pumping to get yourself warmed up. Eventually you finish by pumping (doesn't have to be on her, of course). She's fully aware and watches you doing this. Sin or no?

Same behavior. Same intention on your part. The only difference is in one situation she says yes and the other she says no. What makes her decision the arbiter of your sin?

And if it's not, then, sin to masturbate in front of her (again: your concept of open sexuality, just taken a bit further), then wouldn't this be a top-tier ultimate alpha move to show her that you're going to do your thing regardless of how she reacts to you and that you're not afraid or ashamed to show it?

I thought masturbation and porn were really my only sin

I can't tell you how many times I've see this mentality from guys in the church - especially on places like r/TrueChristian. I wrote a post there once a long time ago comparing sinfulness to a garden maze. You can walk around a few walls, but you end up back-tracking if it's just a dead-end, and the wall is still in your way if you pass by again. But if you just knock down the wall, you'll find that there are dozens more behind it as you continue to journey toward the center - but you couldn't see them because the one immediately in front of you is blocking them from view.

The response? "That's absurd. I know my porn problem is my biggest sin and you're just wrong. If I could beat this, I'd be sinless and you're just ignorant if you think I have other sins." I kid you not - it was frustratingly vicious.

The disillusionment with sex hit me hard.

Part of this is because she's just re-entering the game. On a scale, porn taught you sex is to be in the 8s to 10s, and she's just a sexual infant starting from 0. You have to train her - and then it gets exciting again. But yes, the disillusionment is necessary and appropriate, and even secular RP guys who have the most wild and exciting sex-lives ultimately come to this conclusion. I made a post about how an Endorsed Contributor on TRP explained why making sex his god ultimately failed - check it out.

Now for the advice ...

You're fit, so you're already playing on easy mode. Good for you. When a guy is playing on easy and still isn't winning, it's usually because he has no skill. In sexual relationships, your skill is your frame.

You talk way too much. You want her to understand you. She won't. Period. Stop trying to get her to understand you. I gave up trying to get my wife to understand me long ago, and my life has been so much better off for it. She still wants me to understand her, but that's another conversation.

Understanding is a negotiation game. You cannot negotiate desire. As others have alluded to already, even if she did fully understand you, this only leads to an intellectual adherence. Do you want consensual sex or horny sex? You engage the mind to get consensual sex, you engage her attraction-triggers to get horny sex. Conversation engages the mind, but does nothing for attraction.

Another problem: you get angry way too fast. When you snap back at her, you're butthurt, and that's unattractive. You need to become the kind of guy who can take all of her yipping and yapping, even if it's not true, and crack a joke about it rather than defend against it.

My guess is that because she's your wife you give incredible weight to her opinion of you. I'm also guessing your cultural deconditioning isn't complete yet - you still have some work to do. That's why when you read that article the other guy posted, you had a strong reaction to it - because it clicked together pieces in your brain that you'd never connected before. Is it somehow wrong for Christ to want to use his bride for his own spiritually reproductive purposes? To use us for his glory? Shouldn't we be eager and excited at the opportunity to be used by God as objects for his ends? Yet feminism tells us this is wrong because it hates the relationship between Christ and his bride, so it insists that physical brides must rebel against the way a spiritual bride is to feel toward our spiritual groom.

So, when she accuses you of sexual objectification and you get angry, it's because you know she's right - that you do want to use her for your sexual gratification, but the blue in you somehow still feels guilty for wanting this. Eradicate the blue and finish your cultural deconditioning so that you can read Scripture with a clear mind.

[FR] Straight from the horses mouth ?

11 upvotes · 12 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

My wife is in the same boat. She'll say all kinds of stuff like this. Interestingly, when I'm on my game and the subject comes up, she thinks arranged marriages (i.e. where the father picks a groom for his daughters) are a good idea. When I'm slacking, she'll make comments about how she thinks our girls should date several guys to learn what they want before settling down, which my wife didn't do (I was her first boyfriend). Go figure.

At least on a political level she's always been hard-nosed against feminism. But that doesn't stop her from wearing the "I am woman, hear me roar" shirt on occasion.

Share your experiences with fasting

11 upvotes · 7 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Fasting is great for losing weight, but I'm guessing that's not what you're talking about (and if it's not accompanied by broader concepts of diet management, the weight will come back anyway).

Spiritual fasting is something that's been contorted by the church to feed into the emotionalism agenda pushed by the mainstream church. Rather than a discipline, it's now a way someone can go about feeling "closer to God." This idea of "closer to God" warrants a broader look, but suffice it to say that the passages I can reference off the top of my head that use this type of imagery are usually talking about non-Christians. As believers, God is already indwelling within us. We are as close to him as we're ever going to get and it's just a matter of what we're going to do as a result of that relationship. The book of James is super on-point with this, as it's mostly written to address the situation of non-believers within the church causing confusion over what it means to be a believer.

So if fasting isn't about becoming "closer to God" what is it about?

OT EXAMPLES

- 1 Samuel 7 - Israel uses fasting as a means of demonstrating the sincerity of their repentance to God after serious idolatry and while they were in the middle of a terrifying war.
- 2 Samuel 1 - Fasting was a way for David and his men to express the sincerity of their mourning at Saul's death, even though he was their enemy.
- Esther 4 - Esther asks Israel to fast for her, demonstrating the seriousness of what she was about to do in approaching the king against his law, and building a communal bond behind this purpose.
- Exodus 34 - Moses fasted while getting the second 10 commandments, which solemnized the Mosaic covenant.
- Joel 2 - God commands fasting and weeping as an expression of repentance at the threat of what the armies of the Lord can do.
- Nehemiah 1 - Nehemiah fasts as an expression of the sincerity of his mourning as he prays for God to let him restore the wall of Jerusalem.

NEW TESTAMENT EXAMPLES

- 1 Cor. 7:5 - Paul commands us to fast whenever a married person stops having sex in order to make sure we don't fall into sin. [How radically would marriages and sex lives be changed if we all followed this imperative?]
 - Note: the "and fasting" part isn't in all translations, but it does exist in the Young's Literal, so I include this one.
- Acts 13 - Paul and other early church leaders fasted while petitioning God to help them understand their next assignments.
- Acts 14 - Paul and Barnabas fasted before choosing which elders to appoint over the church.
- Luke 2 - A prophetess and widow fasted constantly leading up to her recognition of Jesus in Mary's womb, prophesying about all he would do.
- Luke 18 - A pharisee prays in bragging about how he fasts twice a week. This is the only example I see of fasting being a somewhat flippant thing that someone does just to do it, and it's condemned by Jesus here.
- Luke 4 - Jesus fasts in the wilderness while being tempted by the devil. This immediately preceded his public ministry, and can be assumed he was fasting to prepare himself to go public. It's also the only recorded time we have of Jesus fasting.

There are lots and lots more examples, but these should suffice. Some observations and interpretations from these and other passages:

- Fasting is never mentioned as something we do just because we feel like it or merely because it seems like a religious thing to do or because some religious leader (like a pastor or a pharisee) told you to do it. The only example of this is the Pharisee in Luke 18 and Jesus says it did him no good.
- Fasting is always associated with a demonstration of our seriousness and passion behind a specific cause. If you don't have a specific cause you're fasting for, don't fast.
- Fasting is often done in community with others, but it doesn't have to be. Fasting alongside others works in tandem with passages that talk about the power of praying in community rather than alone.
- Fasting is often associated with a need for heavy repentance after a time of seriously nasty sin in our lives. If you've gone complete dark, it may be a good time to fast to get yourself reoriented - not that the fast is what reorients you; rather, it's what expresses the sincerity of your heart.

- Fasting is often associated with seeking understanding. If there's something you really want to discern, especially if it's mission-oriented and life-altering, that's a great reason to fast.

None of this precludes fasting for dietary reasons. It's not sinful to engage in a secular dietary fast, as long as you're not passing it off as a religious exercise when your real goal is to lose weight. At that point, you're only trying to deceive someone when Jesus says in Matthew 6 that we shouldn't go out of our way to let others know we're fasting in the first place.

Personally, I fasted for 3 days and prayed for 6+ hours a day, totaling hundreds of hours in the few weeks before deciding to ask out my wife. While I appreciate her in my life today, all that fasting and prayer didn't change the fact of all our struggles for the first several years of marriage or all the serious lies she told me about her faith, interests, sexual interests, etc. while we were dating. That doesn't mean I came to the wrong conclusion after fasting and praying that much or that God was telling me wrong. It could be that God was looking ahead to all that would be accomplished through me because of her and decided it was worth it. I just don't know.

My point is simply to say that we don't see anywhere in Scripture that fasting will give us some magical answer or supernatural clarity over what we should do. What it does show, and what I have experienced, is that fasting is an expression of how seriously we're taking an issue, and then we go make decisions and act on them afterward and let God do what he will.

It's like when I was first learning to drive and had no clue how to get home. My dad was in the passenger seat. "Dad, should I turn left?" He stays silent. "I think I'm going to turn left up here. Is that okay?" Still silence. I start pounding on the dashboard, "I just want to make sure you're paying attention. I don't know where to go. You better not let me screw this up. Should I go left?" He still doesn't answer. I turn left. Turns out that was the way home all along.

Would my dad have stopped me if I started to turn right instead? Probably. Did my pounding on the dashboard change which direction would have led home? No. Did my pounding on the dashboard change my dad's mind about how I should drive the car? No. But it did help me - it was a way for me to express to my dad how serious I was being in wanting to know which way to go. It didn't mean I got my answer, but in expressing my sincerity, I somehow still had a better resolve that my dad wasn't going to let me go the wrong way, even in the midst of his silence - because I knew he heard me. "And if we know that he hears us - whatever we ask - we know that we have what we asked of him" (preceded by "If we ask anything according to His will, He hears us") ~ 1 John 5:15.

That's my take on fasting. It's less about changing God's mind or doing a religious exercise, and more about expressing ourselves to God on a specific subject.

What are practical things I can do to be more manly, masculine?

11 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Here's my list for where you're going to find the answer to your question:

- Read the Bible
- Develop a clear, concise mission that incorporates making disciples through intentionally modeling your life for specific people you're trying to influence
- Spend time with other men who you want to be like
- Ask someone to disciple you who you believe embodies biblical masculinity in a form that you want to live up to

- Try new things and see if they resonate with your spirit - go hiking, take up fencing, attend a car show ... just new things you don't normally do.
- Take risks. The more risks you take, the more you will feel your heart oriented toward certain directions, and the more faith you will be developing, particularly as you see God pull through. Just don't take idiotic risks, like betting your life savings on 100-1 odds.

Again, these are not things to do to be masculine. They are things to do to discern the way God wants you to express biblical masculinity in your own life.

I could give you a list like:

- go hunting
- wrestle a bear
- participate in drag races
- wear camo
- smoke cigars
- drink dark beer

These things all sound "manly," and certainly men who embody biblical masculinity do these things - but many men who are appropriately biblically masculine don't do many of these things. I hate camo and the thought of going hunting repulses me (not because I care about the animals; I'm just not a wilderness guy), nor will I ever smoke a cigar. That doesn't make me less of a man in God's eyes.

So, I'd be less concerned with what you DO to become a biblical man and more interested in what God has designed for you. What's your mission? That's where you've got to start. Figure that out, then figure out the requirements to fulfill it to your maximum potential. That's going to be your best guide to figuring out what type of man God has created you to be.

There are certain traits that are going to be common, though. A guy who isn't confident isn't going to express the Gospel clearly to the men he disciples. A guy who isn't assertive will shy away at the first sign of disinterest in the message God has for him to share. But you'll learn these things as you follow the above advice anyway, and these are more attributes than practices - and you mostly posted about things you can do.

The submissive wife

11 upvotes · 12 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I like this line of thinking. I may use that.

Submissive behaviour

11 upvotes · 12 March 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

Only the weakest of beta males is ever intimidated by women.

If the large majority of men in the world fall into this category, sure ;)

Men being intimidated by you is a myth spawned from our gynocentric feminist culture.

Nah, I know countless men who are truly intimidated by even mild-mannered women. This is certainly the norm.

Men being intimidated by women certainly isn't a myth - the fact that they believe they should be intimidated in the first place is a product of the feminist myth.

Addressing the Blue Pill Hate: Manipulation

11 upvotes · 18 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I wouldn't characterize femininity that way. Femininity is just as godly for women as masculinity is for men. Men can pervert masculinity to be expressed in toxic ways, but in its raw form it is good. Women can pervert femininity to be expressed in covert, negatively manipulative ways, but in its raw form it is good.

I want my wife to be feminine. The fight, in this context, isn't against femininity. It's against feminism and the feminine imperative. That distinction is critical.

Counterproductive Desire and the Fallacy of Unconditional Love

11 upvotes · 14 January 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Ok, I'll just do whatever my feelings tell me from now on.

New to Christianity

11 upvotes · 17 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Hi there! Thanks for your post and raising your concerns. Many people would simply object in silence and not have the balls to bring it up in the first place. Props for that.

The way you're framing yourself begs the question: who is your god? It's either Jesus or masculinity and I can't tell which, though it seems the latter.

Let me be clear about this: If Jesus told us to be beta sissies who live every day to serve the feminine imperative and wait on our wives hand and foot for our entire lives, I would do it. Period. Masculinity is not my god. It is something I am, not alongside my faith, but because of my faith - because my God compels it.

Mark 8:36 says, "For what does it profit a man to gain the whole world and forfeit his soul?" This could, in context, read: "What does it profit a man to get all the sex he wants and be alpha with bulging muscles if he forfeits his soul?" What's good for the soul is good for the man.

So, make a clear decision: who is your god?

Alternatives to Captain/First Mate

11 upvotes · 1 October 2018 · /r/RedPillWomen

There is no such thing as an "equal power dynamics" relationship. It's not sustainable in the long-term. The closest I can see is post-divorce when I'm drafting shared parenting plans for my clients and we say, "Dad gets to have final decision-making authority over these 3 areas, and Mom gets final decision-making authority over those 3 areas." At that point, they feel like they have equal authority over their children, but (1) this only actually works in divorce, and (2) it's not actually equal authority - it's 100% authority, but divided by category. Plus, each person weighs each category differently, so you can't really compare them that way in the first place.

The fact that you want "equal power" says a lot about your frame of reference. You still hold onto a fantasy that another model can work on a large scale. It can't. That's why as soon as egalitarianism was introduced into modern marriages the divorce rate skyrocketed. There are a few exceptions, but it's usually because they have something else going for them beyond their power structure. That is, the power structure isn't why these exceptions are successful - they're successful despite their power structure.

How do you reconcile TRP with Christian values?

11 upvotes · 6 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

As /u/Deep_Strength said, you don't. There is no reconciling the things of God with the things that are not of God. There is a hard line that is not to be crossed. Jesus said, "If you're not for me, you're against me" (Matthew 12:30). We don't adopt things that are against God.

I wrote a post a while back about how there is no "Christian version" of anything. That includes anything RP. RPC is not a "Christian version" of the red pill. It's the reverse. The red pill is a secular version of the things the Bible tells us.

As is often said on TRP and MRP, secular RP is merely "men swapping notes." They observe the world, see what works and what doesn't, then share their stories until they come up with doctrines and philosophies that account for all of their various findings.

Imagine I created a computer program to do a ton of really cool things. Now imagine there's a team of experts who are using my program, experimenting with it to figure out all the really cool things I coded the program to do. They start a subreddit to share all the amazing things they're finding about my program. Now suppose I go on that subreddit and start an AMA saying, "I'm the guy who wrote the program. I'll tell you everything it does - what you've got right, what you've got wrong, etc." ... and everyone says, "You're not real. There is no programmer. This code just created itself over time." So, that guy leaves and goes to one of his friends (me) and says, "They've found some really cool stuff, but they're missing it. I actually wrote a manual for all this, but they don't want to read it - they think it's hogwash. Will you start another subreddit that teaches about my program from my manual instead of the piecemeal things that those other guys figured out?"

That's what RPC is. That's why I started this sub. We don't bring secular concepts here. We look at the Bible and explain from the manual how the world works. We use the same terminology the secular folks do, not because they figured it out first or because their way is right, but to reach them. Everywhere the Bible goes, it needs translators to speak the language of the target audience. Just as there are national languages, there are also cultural languages, something like a unique dialect. So, when an RP person says "amused mastery" or "dread," there's a defined meaning there that the rest of the world simply won't get - and if you try to use language from the rest of the world while reaching them, they'll view you as an outsider and not one of them.

Indeed, we are "one of them." We are two factions of people trying to figure out how to use this program that was put before us. The rest of the world isn't interested in doing that. They just want to ignore that a program exists at all, treat it as random happenstance, or even attempt to rewrite the coding, which often results in critical errors in their life. To that end, secular and Christian RP are brothers on a common mission. Our method of executing that mission is where we differ. The secular crowd says "only experimentation." The Christian crowd here says, "Look to the manual first, then experimentation when we can't find the answer quickly enough."

What's most interesting to me is the fact that "the red pill" has stolen its name from The Matrix when the true analogy being developed by those movies is not about male/female dynamics, but about the parallels between the physical and spiritual world, which is only actually addressed by the Bible.

All of that aside, when secular RP says something that we know to be sinful, many people want to say, "Take the good parts of RP and leave out the rest." This is an incorrect reply because it looks to secular RP as the baseline of truth, from which we pick and choose based on our external moral standards from the Bible.

In reality, if RP is about truth, then the Bible is the baseline. When secular RP says anything sinful, it's not that you just ignore that part of RP - it's that those parts aren't RP in the first place. They got it wrong. The manual tells us what's right. The experimenters misunderstood the results of one of their experiments or haven't taken it to its natural conclusion - like when science deems something to be safe, then finds out decades later that prolonged exposure is highly cancerous, such as cigarettes ... and then everyone scrambles to fix their original recommendation.

Lessons from two divorce cases

11 upvotes · 14 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

Every. Single. Day.

How do you "hear God's voice", the non-cucked way?

11 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It's the massive contrast between an unnecessarily harsh tone and a claim of being Christian.

Covert contract?

11 upvotes · 7 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Let me remove the invisible plating from the elephant in this thread so far: Life isn't fair. Whether or not you watched the kids before shouldn't have any bearing on whether or not you go out with the guys after. These are entirely unrelated incidents. If she tries to connect them, your acknowledging this in any way is stepping into her frame.

She seems to think life has to be fair. For some reason you're believing her. Is that how you got ahead in life? By making sure you treated everyone else equally all the time? Or maybe you never got ahead. Maybe you're too busy making sure your co-workers have an equal and fair chance at getting the promotion as you do. "Um, hi, Mr. Lumenthol? I know you're really considering me for the assistant to the regional manager position ... and I really want the job. But I also want to make sure you're considering Teddy too. He's such a great guy and equally qualified." Screw Teddy. Screw your wife. Or to be more accurate: Screw Teddy = Screw your wife.

Tangential explanation aside, you need to get this 50/50 marriage relationship garbage out of your head. It's 100% you. You're responsible for the direction of the marriage. That's a lot of pressure. You need a night out with the guys every now and then. Of course, if you're cheating your wife (and yourself) by putting half the responsibility on her, then yeah, she gets half the say in how you spend your time.

Go OYS. Take responsibility. Get done what you gotta get done, then go spend a night with the guys. If she doesn't think it's fair, good! She needs to learn that life isn't fair just as much as you do. Just don't pass off the responsibility - even passively. You leave the house a mess when you go with the guys and you know she's going to clean it. You've just given her the martyr card to play against you. Don't invite tests you're not ready to pass. Take care of the kids, take care of your home, take care of your business, then go take care of yourself with the guys. Keep it up and maybe she'll take care of you. Maybe not. Either way, where does her perception of the situation factor in? It doesn't.

Do you believe that women hate each other?

11 upvotes · 17 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Definitely not hate. I describe it as a game - The Comparison Game, to be precise.

Other people describe it as a "crabs in a bucket" mentality - where every time one crab tries to climb high enough to escape the bucket (stepping over other crabs to get there), the other crabs grab it and pull it down so no one ever leaves. When women try to ascend social circles, other women have a tendency to do things to knock her down a few pegs so instead of ascending she remains within the existing circle of friends.

Most social women have a close bond in communal settings to the degree that anything that threatens their circle of friends is addressed immediately and with full force:

- If one gets a new boyfriend who is poisoning her against the group or is just taking all her time from the group, he is bad-mouthed until she leaves him, or she is shamed or excommunicated until she returns
- If one girl is acting in a way that makes the group look bad, they hold an intervention or shame her or try other behavior-modification tactics

- If someone in the group is depressed and not spending time with the group, they rally around her to lift her spirits
- If one member of the group isn't pulling her weight toward the advancement of the group's purposes, the group eggs her on so she can become more like them

One way or another, women most often do what's best for their social circle, not just what's best for them individually. We don't see this behavior happening among male friends, who are usually far more focused on individual efforts rather than what's best for the group.

If you're interested, I wrote more about the comparison game aspect of this in another thread on this sub here.

Waiting for Engagement before having sex. Unrealistic?

11 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWives

This would be a question worth asking on r/RPChristians. You'll probably be told a few times, "don't have sex before marriage" (and I agree), but if you can move past that you'll get a decent impression of how many guys might be out there who would be willing to wait, as the Christian world is where you're going to find most of them.

Outside of Christianity, it's going to be highly unlikely - and as /u/Irisandoleander said, if you expect him to be a virgin already too, your dating pool is almost exclusively Christian guys - and beta ones at that. Fortunately, with the right resources Christian men are more likely to be able to grow into their inner-alpha because despite feminization within the church, the Bible still ingrains the basic concept.

I don't mind. I usually just assume most men I meet have had previous partners

I wouldn't cave on this too quickly. If waiting is important to you, you'll do better by a man who finds it important to him as well - independently of you. If he's waiting because of you, that's setting a bad precedent that you're the one who will have to draw all the boundaries in the relationship. So, per RP, you'll likely lose your respect and attraction to him quickly. If, however, he values waiting independent of you, he's operating within his own frame and you will respect him more for being a noble guy. Sure, the pool of men will be smaller, but still not impossible to find.

Stop Being Sitcom Dad (Practical Guide)

11 upvotes · 28 June 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

It's probably worth remembering not to try to fake-alpha things.

For example, beta-me would have told my wife, "You go to little Johnny's birthday party and I'll cut the grass," and then would have done a quickie job cutting the grass and spent the rest of the time lounging around the house in my underwear until about 10 minutes before I thought she'd get home. Sometimes I'd even fake-alpha instruct her, "Call me when you're on your way home so I can start getting everything ready for kid #2's basketball game." In reality, I was telling her, "Give me a warning so you don't see how pansy I'm being."

Then, when she comes home and sees that I've been home for 3 hours and the grass is mowed, but not great, I didn't weed whip, didn't take out the trash, probably straightened up the living room but didn't vacuum or dust, etc. ... she's thinking (and some cases bold enough to verbalize): "What the heck have you been doing all day, you lazy turd?"

This is why the OYS stuff is so essential, and I've only been really engaged in that aspect of things for the past few months - not enough time for her to notice (she has been super pregnant, so there was an implied understanding that I'd pick up the slack while she was incapable, and still is for another couple weeks in post-c-section recovery).

I was too beta to answer, "I took some me-time." Instead, I'd DEER, "Well, the lawn-mower was acting up, so I had to spend some time looking at it and cleaning out the old grass; then a neighbor stopped by to chat; then this and that happened." Most of it either wasn't true or was exaggerated ... but even if it was completely honest, it was a horrible answer that only came off as excuse-making.

Basically "666" and still no genuine desire from wife

10 upvotes · 23 June 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Mission is doing my work and helping as many people as possible while praying and seeking to speak the gospel boldly. My wife has helped me with this by challenging my thinking and helping me build a household that motivates me to provide.

Let me open with saying this is one of your big problems. Your mission is so vague and useless that you're not actually doing anything, and I'm sure she sees that. This type of mission lends itself to a lifestyle of just living day by day in the work-eat-sleep cycle. The fact that your wife has to "motivate you to provide" for her is a problem too. But I'll assume your mission isn't the problem for the rest of the comments, because maybe I'm misreading something here. But I really see absolutely nothing biblical about this mission. "Pray every now and then, and serve a few people" is NOT a biblical mission. They are normal things you should be doing in your day-to-day life, not the long-game driving force of your life.

You can play games to put her "in the mood" momentarily at various times, but the goals you verbally say you're shooting for aren't the ones your actions are aiming to achieve.

Sidebar/reading

It's very telling that one of the first two sidebar books you read was SGM - before getting to all of the other more foundational books. You then hopped straight into trying these "methods" without having the foundation/frame to pull them off. SGM only works without frame if you're single wanting a bunch of one night stands. In a marriage, SGM only works AFTER you have the foundation for it.

Also very telling is that the RPC sidebar isn't mentioned at all in your reading.

Also very telling is that you completely skipped the "spiritual" section of our sidebar stats requirement.

With that aside, I've been where you're at. "Burning desire" while we were dating turned to, "I was just pretending in order to get you to marry me, I was never actually attracted to you," to discovery of the red pill leading back to desire. In your situation, you're trying too hard to play games to win her over and you haven't actually changed on anything. You're acting like a PUA rather than a man who is evolving. Women can smell a fake a mile away.

You started this road 4 months ago. You've been married for 10 years. If we use the rule of thumb that it'll take 1 month for every year of marriage, you're not even half way to making any actual progress yet. You're expecting her to come around when you haven't even had time to come around yet. You're just playing games at this point and upset that she isn't playing with you - both literally and figuratively.

Here are a few things to work on:

- FRAME - You're so invested in what she's thinking and feeling and how she'll respond that you have absolutely ZERO chance of internalizing attraction, which means you have ZERO chance to become attractive to her also. You've been reading RP content for months now and know frame is a big deal to us, yet you still write up a post that's obviously all about her ... how much more when you're interacting with her!

- STFU/STOICISM - Stoicism is about being able to bear through pain and difficulty without letting it phase you. It doesn't mean becoming an emotionless robot. STFU isn't about awkwardly remaining silent all the time. It's about not getting yourself into trouble by saying stupid things before you think through them. The changes you're making in these areas are so far from the norm for you that it just comes off more as you trying new games and not as a believable character change - and the whiny way you write makes it clear that she's right for thinking that way.
- ASD - You seem to completely lack an understanding of ASD, especially with a Christian wife. You're stuck in the dichotomy of Madonna-Whore Syndrome, where you want her to be "bad," but both you and her also want her to be "godly" too and neither of you know how to reconcile that in your heads - especially her. Just like you're only playing games and haven't actually internalized anything yet, so also is her playing around with being the "bad" girl just an in-the-moment game and you're equally dissatisfied that it hasn't become internalized to make her a nympho. Psychologically, "good Christian girls" aren't sex-craved maniacs in her mind, even though she has those cravings and has communicated clearly that she wants you to learn how to evoke it from her. Figure that out.
- OI/DNGAF - You have no OI. You're only 4 months in and still sharing the same whining, complaining crap that you did on day 1. That's like trying to drive from NYC to Oklahoma and asking 5 minutes on the road, "Are we there yet? Getting close yet?" and hearing, "No, it's going to be a while," so you wait patiently for another 5 minutes then ask again. More to the point, you're super hung-up on her responsiveness to what you're doing. You're the opposite of DNGAF.
- VALIDATION-SEEKING - Instead of talking about sex itself, you're talking about her thoughts and desires toward you. This makes it clear that you don't want sex from her. You "want her to want sex" with you (and I think you as much as said so in this post or another). This is literally the definition of validation-seeking. You're not trying to fix your sex life; you're trying to feel like a man by getting your wife to treat you like one. The cruel joke of life is that the more you try to obtain this type of validation the less you actually deserve or will ever get it.

Let me be clear: you're doing some things right. You're just doing them out of order. You think that because you're in good physical shape, somehow you should be able to skip all the groundwork and go straight to the end-game strategies. This plan will never work. Back to the drawing board with you.

BPD wife - I need a miracle from God

10 upvotes · 20 April 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Why the heck are you still on drugs? Stop that. IMMEDIATELY. I don't care how hard it is. If you won't give this up today, all other advice you get here will be pointless because your drug abuse will undermine whatever other protective measures you take with the court - both in falsified criminal charges (which will become actual, not falsified, when they discover your use) and in the domestic court.

This is the dumbest decision you could possibly make. If you think anything can get better while you're using, you will never accomplish any of the goals you're obviously hoping for. And she will know it, because as long as she has something to dangle over your head like that, she will have power over you and that will undermine any pressure for her to be the one to change because she can do whatever she wants and knows that if you ever try to retaliate against her, she'll just dangle the drug abuse and your custody rights are gone, whereas she'll never get into criminal trouble for all the violence because the courts won't believe that she could actually hurt a guy who is as jacked as you report yourself to be.

What does it mean that Christ is the image of the invisible God and the firstborn of all creation in Colossians 1:15?

10 upvotes · 21 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I fail to see the relevance of this post to this sub. So, let me create one for you: if we are designed to reflect the image of God, then Jesus is the first man since Adam to show us what that looks like in human, tangible form. As such, he is the prototype of all we, as men, aspire to be.

Be cautious going forward to remember what sub you're on and that you keep the content relevant.

How much do you share here on this subreddit regarding your personal beliefs about women?

10 upvotes · 24 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

How much do you care about the reputation of this subreddit from the vantage point of other Christian communities here on reddit?

We've had lots of people hate on us. r/Christianmarriage, for example, will ban anyone on sight who has any affiliation with our sub. Oh well.

At the end of the day, we have to ask: Is our primary ministry to save the lost or fix the saved? We attempt both, but Jesus focused very little attention on the religious haters. They may be saved, but if they want to have incel, dead bedroom lifestyles before they get to heaven, that's on them. It's not at all a reflection of Christ to the world, but there are some people you just can't help.

That said, if I'm engaging with people on other subs, I just don't use RP lingo. It's INCREDIBLY EASY to communicate RP concepts tactfully enough and with enough biblical backing (read our sidebar for that) to receive applause from those communities for preaching what would otherwise be condemned if you accidentally slip up and say "hypergamy" even one time.

How much do you share here on this subreddit regarding your personal beliefs about women?

Everything. And that's even with knowing my wife reads all my posts. I have nothing to hide.

I assume the mods struggle with this because they are looked up to by members of this community and they probably don't want to say anything that would upset a significant portion of the community

That's laughable. I can personally guarantee you that not a single one of our mods cares enough about anyone else's judgment of them to withhold what we believe just because some pussy might be offended. What you're suggesting is literally the definition of being in someone else's frame - and I will not let anyone be a mod who breaks his own frame so easily.

That doesn't mean we won't be tactful with how we word things. Certainly there are more effective strategies in varying situations to communicate one way or another.

I know if I were a mod here I would heavily "test the waters" to get a feel for what this community is comfortable with rather than go out on a limb and risk alienating like-minded Christians.

That's why you're not a mod here. What you're describing is a leadership that exists to placate the masses. We are a leadership to direct the masses. People follow us; we don't follow the people. That's not leadership. And I guarantee we're producing much greater spiritual fruit through this community than other subreddits that are 8x our size.

No, your congregation does not preach "biblical headship"

10 upvotes · 12 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Is that not exactly what Christ did for the church?

Hmm ... I'd have to think on that. My gut is to say no, he didn't. He took the punishment for our sin, but not the blame. Otherwise, why would God require that we confess our sins as an "if" condition to his being faithful and just to forgive us our sins and purify us from all unrighteousness? (1 John 1:9, of course). The confession bit is an acknowledgment that we are to blame before we are excused of the penalty associated with that blame.

It's like a parent saying, "I will forgive you and I'll be the one to pay for the window you broke - I just want to hear you admit that you're the one who broke it."

That said, there's a difference between receiving blame and accepting responsibility. In the leader is responsible for his subordinates, it's his obligation to bear the responsibility for their failures, even if they are the ones to blame. After all, it's his fault that he let the situation get to that point in the first place, as more effective or "hands-on" leadership may have prevented the problem. The same would apply for the wife. She's still to blame, but the man is still responsible for how his ship runs, regardless of what mistakes she makes. The same applies to the Church - God is responsible for the Church, regardless of our blame in screwing it up all the time.

In marriage, how much control should the man have and act upon?

10 upvotes · 1 August 2020 · /r/askRPC

how much control should the man have and act upon?

How much does Christ force and control his bride, the Church, to do things his way? The very fact that we have a churchianity culture today is a testament to Christ's red pill nature - that he does not control his bride; he merely invites her to follow, then goes about his business. If she follows, he engages; if she doesn't, he withdraws and does his own thing.

I'm not sure if this problem could have been averted if proper vetting was involved and/if the husband was top tier.

The fact of churchianity culture also shows that even a perfect groom can still have a rebellious bride, no matter how well-vetted or high-quality he may be.

When is control good and when is it bad?

The only times I see God controlling anyone in Scripture involve non-believers or those outside his Kingdom. In this sense, I could see employing a sense of authoritarianism over your employees if you're a manager or own your own business. Beyond that, the goal is to make people want to follow you; don't force them. Force rarely results in anything valuable.

But what can we do to not be in this position?

Orient your life in a manner that you don't need others, but you do find them helpful.

New Sidebar Compilation!

10 upvotes · 21 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is great, brother. Thanks for putting it together.

How I Communicate Now, Without Words

10 upvotes · 7 July 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I know that even when I was trying to STFU, I wasn't really doing so

Over the last few years I've worked with some guys in real life on this. They had the same problem. Their version of STFU wasn't actually STFU ... it was "I'll shut up about the things I'm really thinking and only talk about things that affirm her and make the conversation go away." Idiots. So now instead of showing her how whiny you are, you're showing her how supplicating you can be and how much you pedestalize her and will meet her every whim. Good job, boys.

At first you really care about them, but after developing Outcome Independence and Abundance Mentality, it changes your entire outlook on giving a shit about them – because you just don't fucking care anymore. At some point you will start to see them for they are... they are just woman things

Like the way women feel when a guy talks about having sex with her. This was my test for the week (day?). My son wanted to hop on Zoom to talk to my mom. My wife insisted I go change the name on my Zoom account because I still had "(Red-Curious)" in my name last time she saw me online. She's embarrassed because I talk about having sex with her on the red pill forums. "I don't want your family reading any of that. That's part of my personal privacy. I have a right to insist on that!" Smile and STFU on that one rather than trying to come up with a witty comeback. I thought about AA ("Oops, too late. I already posted some gifs of us having sex on our family text chain") ... but sometimes STFU is still the preferred option even over a natural AA inclination.

This form of "nobody else is allowed to know how sexual I am" is one of this "girl things" that guys need to get over. A sexual guy is going to talk about sex. She should be so lucky that I'm talking about sex with her. At least that means I'm not talking about having sex with anyone else ... yet.

But if I let her believe that she made the right choice by ravishing her later that night it encourages and trains her to take initiative to please me through positive feedback loops

You're right. This all sounds more magical than it actually is. The reality is that as you become a more competent leader within the home, she learns to fill in the grooves you leave behind. After a while, this becomes second-nature to her and you don't even have to tell her to cook dinner certain nights because she's attentive and aware to what's going on.

Which leads to another aspect I've developed along my journey that virtually never gets talked about: reverse "fitness testing" your wife. She has a role within the house, but women don't always like living within that role. Some have alternative ambitions. So, every now and then I test her submissiveness with tasks that I would ordinarily do myself, but pass on to her instead in order to test her character for taking orders and following direction.

For example, the other day it was something as simple as changing our daughter's diaper. The girl says "I'm wet" and my wife starts walking into the room as if pretending she didn't hear it. "Change her, Babe." She answers, "But I don't want to" and starts walking back toward her room again. Then she stops for about 10 seconds, does a 180 and changes the diaper anyway. In some sense, she was testing me - seeing if by her walking away I'd step in and change the diaper instead. It was a silent, passive fitness test toward me in response to my testing whether she'd fall in line. I believe she realized she was in the wrong (not that I was testing her about it) and decided to make the right choice anyway - but only after she saw that I wasn't caving to fill the void. In this, she realized she had to prove her value to me.

How did I pass this one? Not through AA. Through STFU.

How did she pass my test? Through her behavior falling in line.

Sparking a Husband's Sexual Desire (RPCW)

10 upvotes · 23 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm a sucker for a girl in a skirt. And the long hair worn down is 100% on the money. My wife has curly hair, so it's a bit harder for her, as wearing it down does get frizzy, but she's put a lot of work into it and she looks gorgeous to be able to have hair down her back again. She used to do short shoulder-length hair to make it easier to manage and I just lost interest.

So, it's very possible that, as you say, a reason a guy loses sexual interest in his wife is her short hair. It happened to me, for sure (though, admittedly, I'm sure there were other factors at play as well).

Actual Conversations With "Abuse" Victims

10 upvotes · 4 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right. That's why I specified twice that actual abuse is real and I explicitly limited this post only to those issues where it was never substantiated so as not to conflate actual abuse with these other absurd remarks.

Actual conversations with "abuse" victims.

10 upvotes · 4 June 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Admittedly, a couple of these things are from my own wife during our "dark years." Completely agreed on not letting them define you.

Leading your wife in Scripture Memory

10 upvotes · 20 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I can't up-vote this hard enough, brother. EXCELLENT break-down of the intersection between discipleship and marriage/dating. I'm adding this to the sidebar series. (Here)

Daily Game Plan For Quarantine

10 upvotes · 24 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Solid, brother. I assume it's implicit that people should create their own checklists and this is just a springboard to get them thinking. But the point is: be intentional with this time, don't let it just pass by idly - which should apply even when we're not on quarantine.

I am not sure if I should marry my fiancé - advice needed, new to RPC

10 upvotes · 15 March 2020 · /r/askRPC

To say in slightly longer fashion what /u/OsmiumZulu already said: However you're feeling now, expect it to get worse after marriage - especially if your guy doesn't know how to generate the types of feeling and support you will need long-term to remain attracted to and interested in him. If you've got some buffer on the low end and are willing to take that chance that even after the emotional fade-away hits you'll still want to be with him ... that's your call. But if you're already questioning things now, that's not boding well for things and it's not a chance I would want to take.

Looking for advice, Need help. +Apology.

10 upvotes · 15 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Okay, first thing's first: whether you're in favor of arranged marriages or not, AWALT applies to whoever your parents set you up with as well as whoever you would have picked for yourself.

Your mission is total trash. You say you have read the sidebar here, yet you have still made the idea of finding some good Christian wife your primary mission? You say you've read TRP sidebar, yet the third commandment of poon is: "You shall make your mission, not your woman, your priority." This is extremely basic 101 level stuff.

I'm inclined to believe you were lying about reading the majority of these sidebars in order to get us to take you more seriously. Don't do that. And if you really did read all you said you did, then none of it sank in. Go back and re-read.

Once you've got your mission on straight (hint: as a Christian it MUST incorporate the great commission from Jesus), only then will you have the ability to be truly attractive to a woman. Everything before then is new relationship excitement. If your mission is your woman, she can never follow you because you'll be chasing her. There is plenty on this sub about the orientation of the pursuit, including in the sidebar - especially the content for singles. Go read that.

u/SeasonedRP certainly did a good job describing the mainline atmosphere in churchianity in first world countries. Bravo to him. This is primarily because mainline churchianity is not biblical. There are large pockets of men who do follow biblical Christianity. This sub is one of them. Our marriages and sex lives prove the effectiveness of the Bible's methodology, which the secular world has learned not from our textbook (the Bible), but through trial and error. Props to them. But don't think there are no exceptions among Christian men and women. There are, and I'm living proof of that, as are many other men here.

Let's get to the point here, though. What it really seems like you're struggling with is a conflicting desire between money and having ownership over your own life. How much are you as a man worth? If you're worth $300,000, as you said is your grandfather's potential inheritance, then sure. Sell ownership of your life to your mom to get that money. If you are the prize. If you are priceless. If you have the riches of God at your fingertips and just don't realize it yet. Then $300,000 means nothing. Screw that money and go be yourself. Make your own fortune rather than riding on the coat-tails of others. $300,000 isn't even a lot of money to begin with. I know countless people who bring twice that much home every single year. You mentioned the possibility of a 6-figure income. Great. You don't need that $300,000.

As a lawyer who has done a lot of estate and probate work, let me tell you also: if you aren't in the will you aren't getting jack squat. You really think your mom is just going to hand that money over to you if you play nice? Don't kid yourself. My dad and uncle got almost $750,000 from my grandparents. I'm not going to see a dime of it. Ever. Oh well. I have my own financial course that doesn't depend on that.

how can i shape the girl i am going to marry into the woman i want in the next 3 years

With your current mission, you can't. It's literally impossible. Get a better mission.

From there, don't get so pent up on changing her. Maybe you can. Maybe you can't. Some women will simply never change. Are you okay with that? AWALT, after all.

But at the same time, you don't have to change her. AWALT, remember? All the sexual desire and expression you're looking for are already inside of her. It's just a matter of unlocking it. And yes, sex outside of marriage is sin. But as someone told you yesterday, if you're having sex with an intention to marry, then that creates your union already. So, having sex with her at that point creates the marriage. Your parents may not understand that, but that's how God views it.

All the same, you're really hung up on the inheritance from your grandfather, but what about your inheritance from God that you're putting at risk due to your insistence toward premarital sex? I mean, you explicitly said in your TRP post that you're sexually active, then tried to back-pedal that when you did your first post here, presumably to try to keep us from pegging you on that issue.

After the whole mission and spiritual maturity issue (i.e. thinking you have a license to sin as long as you pretend it's not sin), the next biggest issue is the obvious blue pill framework you're stuck in that's controlling your life.

- Your mission is to "achieve a solid LTR with a good Christian woman" ... and live happily ever after, right?
- You're incredibly hung up on what your parents think about you.
- You feel trapped in your decision-making by the social frameworks you live in.
- You think you're some unique special snowflake because apparently no one else has ever been in a position of losing out on a financial prospect for becoming their own man.
- You have fantasies of changing a woman
- You're clearly engaging in mental masturbation over what you think things will be like if you can only be RP enough.
- You're looking for a quick fix: things you can "act, speak, and do" that accomplish your goals, rather than becoming and embodying what you pretended to have learned.

Your goals for a relationship are certainly appropriate ones. Don't get me wrong on that. But you've got bigger things to worry about in life than these concerns, and those bigger things are actually prerequisites to addressing your peripheral concerns.

But I think you have this notion in your head that the red pill is defined by a highly sexual male-led marriage. These things are a byproduct of the red pill. Not the red pill itself.

The red pill is all about understanding the true nature of intersexual relational dynamics. You do not seem to understand these yet (presumably due to a lack of reading or comprehending or both), because if you did you would already know the answers to all of these questions.

While you're probably not going to like this, you just started your journey and it's going to be a long one. Develop a godly mission first. That is step number 1. If you figure that out, the rest will follow MUCH more quickly. This is clear not only from the RPC sidebar, but even from the TRP and MRP sidebars. No mission, no attraction. Period. Don't make a girl your mission.

If you're in this for the long-haul rather than looking for a quick fix, come back in 3 days after (re-?)reading all the mission posts here with a mission of your own (that incorporates disciple-making) and make a post about it, discussing its viability and your vision for how you'll fulfill it over the next few decades (yes, your mission might change in that time, or be refined, but at least start with something).

After that, spend 3 months taking massive strides toward accomplishing that mission, and report back with a field report on the impact that vigorous pursuit of a mission has had on your life.

Once you've done that, you'll be ready to talk shop about many of the other things that you think you're ready to talk about now.

Oh, and don't forget to lift. Lifting is not a suggestion.

Young Guys Today

10 upvotes · 13 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I normally wince at sport-hero analogies because of how cliché and sappy they often come off ... but this was a good one.

The "Closer to God" Myth

10 upvotes · 2 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

u/thechristianalpha, u/rocknrollchuck and I have all discussed just this. Maybe someday.

116 - God is a jerk.

10 upvotes · 25 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This question has come up so many times that I needed a post on the sidebar to point to. Feel free to add your own thoughts, but if someone asks you, "How do I be confident and assertive and look out for my own interests, while also being a Christian?" ... here you go. The answer, as always, is to follow in God's image rather than try to make up a solution for yourself.

Husband had an affair - seeking feedback

10 upvotes · 23 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Guilt says I did something wrong and need to change

That's actually conviction. Guilt is something a Christian should never experience post-salvation. I wrote more on this in my 406 post.

He is complicated than most men, in my opinion

I'm going to take the other opinion.

Most men would jump at the chance to have their wives desire them and initiate sexual intimacy. He does not. He looks at me cross-eyed like what is wrong with you.

Just because you're a girl doesn't mean you are exempt from Rule 2 and the scrutiny we give to the men around here. What are your stats? That's likely going to say a lot. Weight? Muscular tone? Body fat? Height? Age? Spiritual Disciplines/7 Basics (see 300 series)? How well-read are you on RP relationship material?

AMALT is just as true as AWALT. Yes, there are women who are able to maintain control of their hypergamy to varying degrees, just as there are men who are able to maintain control of their polygamy to varying degrees. But the fact that he actually consummated his polygamous desires shows me that he's more down the AMALT spectrum than you might think. The problem, then, with his wanting sex from other girls and not from you must come from you somehow.

We say to guys all the time: "She's sexual, just not sexual for you" when there is an attraction issue. The wife who rejects her husband constantly would jump all over Chris Hemsworth if he came onto her. /u/Deep_Strength wrote The Brad Pitt Thought Experiment post to demonstrate this very point (among others ... my wife's just more of a Chris Hemsworth gal than a Bad Pitts girl). The point is: he has proven that he's sexual, just not for you.

Part of this disconnect is that guys want variety. Our polygamous drive makes us want different women and not just better women. It's why in my job (divorce attorney) I see guys leaving their moderately attractive wife for significantly less attractive women all the time. It's weird. But even worse is when the option to date-up exists too. The totem pole is something like: same person < different less attractive < different & hotter. You'll note that even if you are generally attractive - say you're even a 9 - you're still the same person. After a couple years of marriage, that puts you on the bottom of the polygamous totem pole. A guy will always be more sexually attracted to a different woman - even a less attractive one - than he is to his wife.

The good news is that "different" can be hacked through significant variety, and "hotter" can be achieved through significant work. But even in all of this, guys have basic standards. If you (generally, I have no idea about you specifically) are a chubster who he sees as a 4 or 5 in his mind, trying a new position or doing it in a new room of the house probably won't get him much more excited than cutting his grilled cheese in triangles instead of rectangles. You have to figure out his threshold first, then cross it, then the game actually begins.

Just becoming "hotter" to the point that you cross his threshold doesn't mean much on its own. He already expects you to be at some base threshold of what he finds sexually attractive - and if you're not, then dysfunction exists. If you've just crossed his threshold, you're still in the "same" category. Nobody gets a prize for not murdering anyone this year. That's just normal. Expected. You being on the positive side of his threshold is what he deems should be just normal and expected, otherwise he wouldn't have married you. If you fall below his threshold, that's grounds for dissatisfaction, but crossing to the positive isn't grounds for reward.

But consider the driver who goes 50 mph over the speed limit on her way home from donating $10,000 to the local food bank. Is the cop going to be proud of her and give her a free pass? Probably not. Yes, she went above-and-beyond in one area, but it doesn't matter if she's still on the wrong side of his speeding threshold. In the same way, you've got to cross the threshold for your efforts toward variety to start mattering. Once you're on the right side of that line (and maybe you already are), then you start spicing things up with things that he never thought you'd do.

I remember reading a post by Rollo where he's responding to a guy whose sex life was vanilla, then he found his wife's old sex tapes where she's in orgies and doing all kinds of things that she never did to her husband. He wasn't even mad that she'd been with those other guys - what got him was the fact that she was so enthusiastic with those guys and would do things with them that she never offered to her own husband. What are those things that you'd do with Chris Hemsworth that you haven't done for your husband? Those are the types of questions that will add the variety back in. And then be bold enough to act on them. Risk the rejection in a big way.

One last thing on the topic of thresholds - where you are now is already his threshold, with the exception of basic aging. Guys know their wives will get older and will adjust their threshold for that (subconsciously). But beyond that, if his threshold when you got married was a 6 and you were already an 8 and you're still an 8 ... well, now his threshold is an 8. Yeah, there's less room for improvement on your looks, which just means variety is going to play a bigger role.

But if there's one big take-away on this whole comment it's this: Just as RP tells men to embrace female hypergamy and make it work for them in a relationship, so also should you embrace your husband's polygamy and make it work for you in a relationship.

When we tell men to embrace hypergamy, we don't mean he should let his wife look for better men to screw. We mean that he should become the best man so that hypergamy causes her to desire him. In the same way, embracing his polygamy doesn't mean letting him look for other women to screw. It means that you should diversify your sexual repertoire so that his polygamy causes him to keep desiring you in new ways.

Tag: /u/helaughsinhidden (since this is your comment thread I'm piggy-backing on) and /u/TheChristianAlpha (just because)

The word "nice" comes from the root word "nescire" in Latin, which means "to not know"

10 upvotes · 18 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Twisting language has been discussed here a lot, but I wasn't aware of this one. Common ones I bring up:

- I use C.S. Lewis' example of "gentleman" originally meaning "owned land and had a coat of arms" and being twisted to mean a "good man," and thereby society no longer has a word to describe a man who owns land and has a coat of arms. But we added to one of the plethora of words that mean "good man."
- Christian today means "good person" and sometimes comes with the "and attends church" condition. It no longer means "Christ-like."

- "Tolerant" used to mean "able to coexist peacefully with those of opposing views or demographics." Now a person is "intolerant" if they refuse to support someone else's views.
- Most importantly to me right now: "Church" used to mean "the Kingdom of God on earth." Now it means (a) a house of worship: "that church across the street", (b) a Sunday service: "I went to church this morning", or (c) a group of people who attend a particular service: "a guy in my church."

There are many, many more. "Pastor" is another one that's been bugging me lately - that all these preachers want to call themselves pastors, despite the fact that they're not living up to what the Bible means by that word. But I'll let you keep adding to the list as you find things.

The shocking truth: Betas not only live hell in this life, they often go to hell too. Defining the christian alpha.

10 upvotes · 15 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This post is ... interesting. You start solid and end passably, but there are so many points in the middle that I wish you'd just have ripped out. My biggest concern is that you present a LOT of your own ideas using christiany-sounding words, but I see almost no Scripture to back up these ideas. This leaves the impression, whether it's true or not, that you are more influenced by culture than the Bible. Even if this sub is the culture that you're being influenced by, you need to stop that. Be an Acts 17 Berean. Don't try to learn the best parts of different church cultures to create your own ideal Christian utopia notions. Stick to what the Bible actually says. Be prepared to give a verse to support the things you say.

They ask how can i benefit FROM the world and not how can a powerfully and spiritually serve THE world

This one's backwards. The standard blue pill man is all about devoting his life to serve others. They're all about sacrifice and will say, "You're not a real man unless you know how to use your strength for others' good." The standard red pill philosophy (especially among seculars) is that there is no moral obligation to use our strength or manliness toward some greater good - that men should serve themselves and seek their own agenda.

At first glance, this seems counter-intuitive to the Christian because we are called to become the "servant of all," just as Christ was, and to serve Christ's agenda after sacrificing our own, right? But if Christ is in us and we are transformed into the likeness of Christ, then Christ's agenda IS our agenda. Seeking our own good, if our desires are completely aligned with Christ's, is the same as seeking Christ's good because our purposes and what satisfies us and makes us happiest in life are the same things that will satisfy him and make him happy with our lives.

From there, serving the world comes down to a simple question: did Jesus serve the world because he had a moral imperative to do so or because that's just who he is and what he wanted to do? If he was doing it because he was trying to live up to an intangible moral imperative of being a good person, he would be beta and certainly not God. His service was an outflow of his character, just as my buying my wife a gift at times is an outflow of my position of strength in the relationship - I don't do it to live up to some standard that I judge myself against or to manipulate my wife into having sex with me, but because sometimes I just feel like buying her a gift and I enjoy taking care of those who have submitted themselves to my leadership.

divine pyramid of authority God--->priest/apostle--->emperor--->patriarch/man--->woman--->kids

Wait. What? Where did God ever say this? The closest I can see is 1 Cor. 11:3, which is much simpler: God -> Christ -> Man -> Woman. Don't stretch the Scriptures.

unconsciously some Luciferian elites that seek a lukewarm pansexualist zombie new age race, maleable for their upcoming Global leader the Antichrist

Huh? Where'd you get this from? You had a good start to this post, but it seems to be spiraling into wacko conspiracy theory rage garbage pretty fast.

The christian alpha or simply man on a "red pill aware" repenting journey tries to bring forth his best elements to serve God and humanity

See above. Maybe a clearer example, are we (1) supposed to be generous, or are we (2) supposed to BE generous?

The first suggests that we have an obligation toward those in need - that we must use our strength to help others who don't have all that we have been given. This is wrong.

The second suggests that we have no need to try to meet some standard of generosity. We have no obligation to the world. Our generosity is an expression of who we are - something we do as an outflow of our identity in Christ, not to fulfill an external moralistic standard.

See the difference?

The secular alpha answers only to himself. The christian only to God, his conscience and to those he wronged

So much wrong here. If God is in us and we are in him, we are one, right? If I am one with God, as Jesus suggests, then answering to myself is answering to God. The only distinction at that point is if I'm identifying more with my flesh or my spirit, as my flesh is that part which is not one with God.

We don't answer to our own consciences either. Yes, our conscience can be a WITNESS (i.e. piece of evidence) against us (Romans 2:15), but Paul also says that it is not his JUDGE (1 Cor. 4:3-4).

The secular alpha guards his frame ... The christian holds his frame

Frame is not a boundary that protects us or a core identity that we create defense mechanisms to guard. It is the way we project our worldview onto the world. In this sense, it is less a boundary and more a weapon. It is how we influence the world for Christ, or non-Christians for their own agenda.

This amount of non attachment to even his own wife and kids is what the christian is called for.

While I may dispute your conclusion as to how to attain this, I'll say that this statement is a polished gem in the midst of an otherwise coal-filled post.

Chose a celibate faithful christian woman

Huh? So he "married" a woman that he'll never have sex with? I'm so confused. What's the point in marrying her then? If there's no sex, is it even marriage?

I'm assuming you meant she was a virgin. Huge difference from being celibate.

He teaches by example. Always feeds his kids and wife first, keeps the worst portion for himself, and is content with little. Stoic and minimalistic.

I'm curious why you present this as an example of a "red pillled" man. I'm not saying it's a bad thing to do, but it also implies you have a blue pill notion of "servant leadership" in marriage as some ideal to strive for, which is quite unbiblical - and even some blue pill blogs, like Desiring God, have recognized this fallacy of servant leadership.

How do I let go of my slutty past?

10 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

I'll warn: while we do have a few female regulars, it's mostly men. But there are a handful of posts directed toward women and u/RedPillWonder will be writing one soon on what Christian women should look for in a man regarding relationship market value (as opposed to SMV).

Advice for a girl

10 upvotes · 14 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Ok, I said I'd come back so here goes.

ONE

The first and most important thing to remember is that you're not married to him. This means that you don't owe him anything. Until you're married, your focus shouldn't be on doing things "for him," which can come off as deceptive if it's not a practice you intend to retain for the rest of your life. Instead, you should be living "for God," which will give you an indefinite and life-long, sustainable motivation for living a certain way.

TWO

There's a saying on r/RPWomen that the "red pill woman" doesn't necessarily want the "red pill man." Their goals are different. Among the secular subs, the red pill man's goal is to maximize his sexuality, and the red pill woman's goal is to maximize her relational satisfaction. There is some overlap where a sexually satisfied man also has incredible relational satisfaction to offer, but this is generally very narrow. Even on MRP, where the focus is for men in marriages and LTRs, it has been said many times that they are not pro-marriage, they're merely anti-divorce-rape. So, they're not really the best candidates for a woman who is looking to get married and remain in a committed relationship.

RPC is different. The goal here, as I have written about on the sidebar, is not merely to maximize a man's sexuality - it's to maximize sexuality in the context of refusing to compromise on higher priorities. Those higher priorities are the things God would have us pursue. Likewise, the RPC woman (though such a forum doesn't yet exist) shouldn't have relational fulfillment as her goal - it should be about maximizing her relational fulfillment in the context of refusing to compromise on higher priorities to God.

For a woman, this is slightly different than for a man because a woman's obligation to God is also to her man - and this obligation triggers on the day of marriage. That is, the way you serve God is by helping your husband. But there is massive confusion when your man is not actually pursuing God the way he ought. To that end, you must choose between serving your husband as God instructed or serving God against God's instruction to serve your husband. Either way is a lose-lose. To that end ...

THREE

The most important thing you can do for yourself is to vet whether or not the guy you're with is actually going to serve God the way he ought. One day you and your eventual husband will be standing before God on judgment day, giving an account of all you have done with your lives. Who do you want to be standing next to on that day? That should drive your selection of a husband. Do you want to be next to the guy who tells God he squandered his life and then makes up a million excuses for him and then you say, "I helped him do it"? Or do you want to be next to the guy who can give a bold account of all he has done, and then tell God, "I helped him do it"?

Now, there are many godly men in the world, and there are many attractive men too. Your job is to find someone who meets both criteria, not just one or the other. If you find an attractive man who is not godly, you will be miserable and have wasted your life or otherwise disobeyed God's imperative for you to serve your husband in order to make something of your life. It's a bad catch-22 that I wouldn't wish on any woman. If you find a godly man who is not attractive, you'll also be miserable. You may accomplish something of importance for God's Kingdom, but there's a better chance that your lack of attraction to him will be a greater distraction and mitigate or even altogether nullify the good work that God has otherwise prepared for you both in advance to do.

To that end, as I always do, I'll bring you back to the concept of having a mission. Is your boyfriend an RPC guy who has a godly mission, the fulfillment of which he would be proud to present to God on Judgment Day? Or is it something worldly and narrow-minded that doesn't really make an eternal impact on God's Kingdom?

A man can do many things to make himself more attractive to you - especially if he sticks around here and applies what he learns. But if that man refuses to adopt a godly mission or is too small-minded about what God could use him to accomplish, run away fast. Read my sidebar posts on developing a mission and engage in some of the conversations on the help-request threads where we discuss good missions and bad missions and whatnot. This will give you a better feel for how to vet the aim of the marriage. And make sure it's not just a mission he's saying for now, but that he won't care about long-term. You should see him making progress in this mission while you're dating so that he can taste the fruit of progress, or else he may abandon the mission after marriage and responsibility sets in.

Likewise, even if he has a solid mission and imperative to carry it out, look for signs during the relationship to demonstrate that he's a man who wants to work on himself. If he cancels a date with you because he didn't get enough time to go to the gym, that's a good thing! That shows that he has priorities in his life and that he will not idolize and worship you over his own self-improvement. This is counter-intuitive to most women, who think that they want to be the center of a man's universe. But you don't want your man to pursue you, you want him to pursue Christ and for you to pursue him.

FOUR

To that end, let me actually answer your question: your primary duty to him right now should be to pursue him. If he is a high value man with a good mission and who is attractive, any actions or attitudes that try to manipulate him into pursuing you will only backfire on you later on - especially if you get married.

The church has long put out this lie that men are supposed to pursue the women they desire. This isn't biblical. At best, when one of God's sheep wanders away, he'll go reign it in, the same way a husband should reign his wife when she wanders. But go find a single example of God chasing down a non-Christian. I guarantee that for every one of those examples you'll find at least 20 more where God says it's the non-Christian's obligation to seek him. I'm serious: do a word study on "seek" and look for all the times it says we are to seek God as compared to the times it says God seeks after us. Your jaw will drop when you compare it to what the church actually teaches on the matter.

Part of that seeking means letting him set the agenda. If he doesn't want to see you on a particular day, that's his prerogative. That might not make you feel the emotional fuzzies a woman gets when a man makes her his idol, but those aren't fuzzies you should be longing for in the first place. You don't want to be his idol. You want to be his helper. You should want him having an agenda apart from you, and those emotional fuzzies should come from the honor you get in being able to pursue that agenda alongside him - that he chose you of all women in his league to walk alongside him.

Now, obviously if he's an unattractive man this won't mean much. If he couldn't get any other women, then the best you could do is at least squeeze out some idolatry from him because he's not a man of many options, so you could abuse that. But why would you be with such a man in the first place?

Anyway, I'm out of time. I hope this helps.

May her breasts satisfy you always...

10 upvotes · 5 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

married sex life can be great. Still it is a struggle (for me at least) to find my full satisfaction there

Don't say this as a statement. Turn it into a question. Investigate this more. Why is that a struggle for you? What is it about your married sex life that makes you want to look elsewhere? What aren't you getting that you think you need? I agree that "ultimate fulfillment is to be found in Christ," but that can also be easily used as a cop-out by those who (1) don't actually experience ultimate fulfillment in Christ, but need some theology phrase to give them a blind hope, and (2) who also have no plan for fixing the more pragmatic concerns that make them want to rely on that vague phrase in the first place.

What have you all found to be useful in maintaining intoxication with your wife?

Dwelling on some of our better sexual encounters from the past or contemplating what things I want to do to her in the future. I've been off porn for a while now and this re-orientation of my thoughts is part of what made the transition surprisingly easy (see the 400-level stuff on the sidebar for the ultimate cure in a less-vague way).

Another thing that helps is just to do what you want to with your wife in the bedroom. For years I was concerned that if I tried certain new things my wife wouldn't be into it and it would ruin the sexual experience. Something important I learned from MMSLP: by definition, at least 49% of the sex you'll have with your wife will be below-average sex. Once I embraced that concept, I decided it was okay if we had a bad sexual experience by trying something new, on the chance that it might turn it into a great sexual experience. It's failed for me about 3/4 times. Whatever new thing we tried, I ended up not liking it, and my wife didn't care for it much either. But for the other 1/4, it's been great and worth it. Learning new things like that raises the bar so that the average changes. On a scale of 1-10 instead of the average sexual encounter with my wife being a 3 (from years and years ago), it's probably closer to a 6. Instead of our peak capacity being a 6 or 7, like it was for the first few years of our marriage, it's probably up to a 9. There is still some room for improvement, but I know we're getting close to peaking out on how much sex can be enjoyed. From there, once we've raised that peak enough times, if we can get the average up to a solid 7, that's about the next step.

We just have to account for time-constraints. It's not always possible to have a 3-hour edging session with multiple positions. So, then it's just a matter of figuring out how to maximize the rush in shorter amounts of time, which can be done through interesting games. One of my favorites is "Who Comes First?" - you both try as hard as you can to get the other off before you. The only rule is that you're not allowed to intentionally shut off your libido to win. That would obviously defeat the point of the game, as the point isn't to win, but to have sexual fun. Women have a biological advantage in that it's generally easier to get a guy off. But men have a strength advantage in that I can often pin her down to prevent her from doing anything to me, while I have it on her - and this display of dominance usually ends up revving her up enough that I can win every now and then (though admittedly she wins more often than me).

Whatever the case - my point is that there are ways to keep raising the bar, even if you're fairly time-constrained. Sex within marriage only becomes stagnant if the bar gets too low and you see no hope of raising it. But even if it does stop raising because you're at a rational peak level - like your average is a 7 or 8 - although I'm not there yet, I'm guessing things would be satisfying enough that I wouldn't care if it stagnates. After all, there would still be variety, as even great sex would get boring (lowering the bar) if it was done the exact same way every single time.

MRP pushes the idea that you need to "turn her into your slut" but obviously that doesn't jive with our biblical mandate to be her spiritual leader.

Why not? MRP is just using bold and catchy language for "train your wife to satisfy you in the bedroom and to see this as a valuable, important role for her in the marriage." It doesn't mean to train her to sleep around from guy to guy, cheating on you. After all, then she wouldn't be your slut. My guess is more that the word "slut" doesn't sound "Christian" so it's easy to assume that Christians shouldn't do that. I disagree. I'm 100% on board with the "train your slut" mentality - at least as I understand it.

When to work on MRP

10 upvotes · 15 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

You've got some poor word choice here. The reading and processing isn't the work. The doing is the work. You work on it 100% of the time, non-stop. If you mean when we figure out what work needs to be done, that's a combination of reading stuff here whenever you have the time and just not being an idiot.

Sleeping Naked

10 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I just use the tub.

My dad keeps shit testing me what to do?

10 upvotes · 15 September 2017 · /r/RedPillParenting

I doubt he's s-testing you. The purpose of s-tests is for women to see if you're a strong enough man to be worth their attraction (usually subconsciously). Your dad isn't trying to get attracted to you. He doesn't want to have sex with you.

He's used to having a position of authority. You becoming your own man defies his position. He's testing your frame, but it's not the same type of test as women throw because it's for different motivations. Likewise, you don't respond the same way because you don't want to make your dad sexually attracted to you.

Also, you need to respect the fact that he has legitimate power over you. If your boss starts giving you crap, you don't try to out alpha him the way you would a girl. Again, you're not trying to have sex with him (unless you're working for a hot chick and you really are). You don't want to risk your job to prove a point. Your dad is a resource to you. Trying to out-power him is a quick way to lose what favor he might give you. Instead, he'll probably say, "Fine, go your own way. Don't come crawling back to me until you've learned some humility."

Long story short: Communicate your positions clearly, but respect his authority. If he's giving you crap without a legitimate basis, let him know - but do it with a smile, not in an argumentative way. Master the art of fogging. But perhaps the most important thing you can do is to show him how to be the type of man you want to follow - someone you can respect. Do this through your actions, yes, but don't be afraid to have a conversation with him about why you have trouble respecting him. Don't mention RP, but do let him know: "If you want to get through to me, this is what I need to see in you to know you're worth listening to. If your life is headed a direction I don't want to go right now, I'm not going to follow your lead."

Owning My Shit: My Marriage Is Over

10 upvotes · 3 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

In my state, you can't be sued for divorce while on deployment, and in some circumstances for the first 60 days after return. Any retirement benefits are managed at a federal level, so they should be consistent throughout all states and you wouldn't owe her anything because you haven't been married for 10 years yet. You wouldn't owe any spousal support due to the short duration of the marriage, but you would owe an ordinary child support amount.

Unfortunately, because you cannot control your deployment and it seems frequent, it's unrealistic to expect you could get sole custody, but shared parenting is still very common with military fathers. The courts don't want to penalize someone for serving our country. That said, depending on how hard you went Rambo, that could really work against you.

I'd imagine as a military man this can be really freaking hard because when you're on deployment she calls all the shots and isn't willing to give it up so easily when you return.

As to your questions, there's a split: (1) if you really want to save the marriage, and (2) if you're okay with giving up.

SAVE THE MARRIAGE

(1) Screw your frame. You had a crap frame to begin with. Burn it to the ground and start over - without going Rambo this time. Trying to assert your frame before you were ready is what got you into this mess. Monk mode for you. I know some people here don't like it for marriages, but desperate times call for unconventional measures. Give her several months to a year to recover, and at around the 6 month mark very slowly start reasserting your frame. In the meantime, until she's fully on board with trying to resume the relationship, keep everything in writing and if it has to be verbal record all of your conversations.

(2) Own it. Period. Why would DEERing even be an issue at this point? That's like you're trying to explain away what you did. "I'm sorry, I screwed up ... but" is not an apology. Let her run her mouth and hurl molotov cocktails at you. Sit there and take it. Don't make excuses or rationalize your behavior. When she's done, just tell her, "You're right. These last few days I've been doing a lot of thinking and prayer [even if you're not religious, just say it anyway] and I had an epiphany. I screwed up and was blaming you for everything." Then go into the ways you screwed up, mentioning things that she didn't even list in her rant. That's about the only way she's going to take you seriously again. Remember: the only way this works is if you burn your garbage frame to the ground and start with a new one. And even then, I only give you 10% odds you can salvage something.

(3) Build the best relationship with your daughter that you can now. If she won't let you see her, you can't do much without filing something with the court. In that event, do it as a legal separation. This shows her that your daughter is a priority, while also affirming to her that you really do want to save the marriage, hence not filing for divorce. The legal separation route really goes a long way to showing her how committed you are to saving the marriage. It's backwards logic, I know, but that's how people tend to take it. Legal separation = we need legal intervention, but I really want to reconcile down the road. Divorce = screw you.

LET IT DIE

(1) Resume Rambo again until the divorce is over - but be a tactful Rambo. Blow crap up with her to make her look like the crazy one while you stand your ground and take it. Instead of shooting bazookas at a wall, shoot a pistol at an oil tanker. Mini-jabs that cause massive explosions look great to judges - her reaction won't be warranted in comparison to the stimulus you put in. I recently suggested this to a client whose wife is an alcoholic. He made one small jab: "The kids still don't want to see you because of how much your drinking hurts them. I need to know that you're getting better so I can assure them it's okay to start some supervised visits." Instead of getting her to set off her ankle monitor (which is all we expected or planned - her parents are supposed to be keeping her on lockdown), she gets plastered, crashes her car, is arrested, and now has a new criminal date 3 days after our hearing. Case closed.

(2) Ignore the other people here - you have to apologize. This looks great to judges. Someone who denies their faults in a relationship is totally non-credible on the stand. You lose a lot of pull with the judge. Make that apology, just don't admit to anything that could hurt your case. Don't be too general or else it will seem like a shallow/hollow apology and won't earn you anything. Pick very specific things that won't affect litigation. Set context if you have to. "I'm sorry. I failed you as a husband. I didn't thank you for the little things like when you _____. I didn't give you a hug when I could see you were down. I should have encouraged you when your mom said that stupid thing. I got so hung up on being a dad and loving our kid that I forgot to make you a priority too. I know this won't repair things, but I do want you to know that I'd like to be friends for the good of our child." Judges eat that crap up when she tries to talk about how awful you are. It shifts the "awful" stuff she complains about from important matters to common marital problems that make her look like she's just overreacting. There is no stipulation on the stuff she'll allege, but she won't deny this stuff, so the judge, rather than choosing who to believe, just goes off of the things that you did agree to, putting you in a much better spot than if you just denied that you were a crappy husband. So, you gain credibility and you also distract the judge away from some of your more serious faults, if the judge falls for the smoke screen.

(3) File for temporary orders and request a psych eval. Then find a practice MMPI test online (there's an old version available - 560 or so questions) and take it repeatedly until you've learned to master which questions cause which results. Find out when she's taking hers and give little toothpick pokes the day before or the morning of. If you really want to get her creeped out, have a friend she doesn't know follow her around the day before. Have him try to be inconspicuous, but intentionally get caught. You have plausible deniability as long as she doesn't know who the person is, but she'll still think you hired a PI. This will set her off and start answering some of the questions in such a way that it presents as mild paranoia.

How not to show butthurt when turned down

10 upvotes · 21 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

I'm having a hard time when getting a no to sex to hide that im mad.

They key is not to be mad. If you're not mad, you won't have trouble hiding anything. How do you do this? Abundance mentality.

I try and act cool and coy but my wife seems to know when im mad.

I was turned down last week. My wife then got into "Oh no, he's probably mad at me!" mode and decided to offer pity sex. I told her, "I don't want sex if it's going to be like that; that's not fun." She answers, "But you're mad!" I said, "If I was mad, would I do this?" then I proceeded to make out with her for about 2 minutes. Then I walked away with a "goodnight." She was smiling the whole time I walked away. Next day? She turned her attitude toward sex around.

Now, the next day didn't go so well because she was impressed at how I didn't get all butt-hurt. It went better because she knew I wanted sex the night before and she wasn't feeling it. So, she decided to gear herself up to feel it. Avoiding being butt-hurt doesn't necessarily increase attraction; rather being butt-hurt removes her imperative to think about sex positively. You're training her to think that sex is a source of stress, frustration, anger, etc. Don't let her associate sex with those emotions - even if you're the one feeling those emotions and not her. If she thinks you're feeling that way, then she falls into shame and guilt and sex (or even the thought of it at that point) conditions her to feel those things.

When he doesn't do what he says he will, when do you just do it yourself?

10 upvotes · 24 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWives

"I'll take it to my buddy ... tomorrow." Yay! Except it's been 3 months.

Most men operate on short-term memory. Compartmentalization in our brains forces this. We put something in a box, then don't re-open that box until we've got the freedom to sit and look at all of our boxes and prioritize which one to open next.

In my marriage, what often happens is that my wife will ask me to do something "tomorrow." When tomorrow comes, I'm picking up the kids from daycare, cooking dinner, picking up after the kids' mess, responding to some work e-mails, and then with the last hour or so, my wife and I cuddle up to a TV show or just sit and chat. All of these things need to get done every day, including that relational time between us. Since those are also fairly immediate needs that cannot be put off, when I'm scouring my wall of compartmentalized boxes, the ones falling off the shelf are the ones I'm most likely going to pick up and deal with. The result? I don't get done that "extra thing" she asked me to do. It never even crosses my mind.

What's the solution? When I get off work, if my wife has already picked up the kids and started dinner, and the house is in somewhat acceptable shape, I can start focusing on the other boxes that I might have forgotten about. First in mind is that thing she asked me to do - and I actually have time to remember it. If, however, a ton of stuff is done and I find her putting a TV show on, my natural inclination is to think, "Oh, good, we can skip straight to relaxing time and have more of it! Yay!" It also tells me, "She knows other stuff needs to get done, but if she's cool with skipping it for now to relax, then it must really be fine." Frame issues aside in how I'd handle the situation, the reality is that she's mad that I'm relaxing with her and not doing what she asked, but her actions aren't showing this. Instead, if she goes off to do her own thing for a while, I know that she's not ready for relax time, so I start to process my list of to-dos.

Nagging is like tipping those boxes to the edge of the shelf. One thing at a time here and there isn't really a problem as long as you are confident that all of the other boxes are safely where they should be. But if you see several other boxes about to fall, nudging another one closer to the edge is just going to cause insane stress and backlash.

So, here's a quick rule of thumb:

- REMINDERS happen when nothing else pressing needs to be done.
- NAGGING happens when a non-pressing issue is forced into being viewed as more important than actual pressing issues.

That said, remember that sometimes, "I NEED A BREAK!!!" is also a very, very pressing need if he is over-worked (not just from his job, but in all areas). From the way you describe it, I doubt he is, but I'm only seeing the things you're listing and not the things he's actually doing.

If the issue is that he's just too passive and not owning his home, he needs to develop some beta traits. The best advice I can give is just to let some things fall apart.

- Let the grass grow until you get that fine - then he'll deal with it.
- Let some bills go unpaid - let him worry about the late charges.
- Your computer needs fixed, so you can't play games with him? Stop using the computer altogether. Go find another hobby for a while. He'll get confused and you just remind him: "The computer's broken. I'm not going to use it until I know that playing on it won't make it worse." Don't nag about it with more demands that make him fix it. Just tell him up-front, "This is what I'm doing."
- Your car's breaks? That one you're best just doing yourself - don't compromise your safety because of his laziness. But if it's your car, there's no harm in you taking responsibility for it anyway. My wife handles appointments for her car, I handle them for mine. Why? Because I don't know when her car is making funny noises. I'm rarely in it. I trust her discretion and have delegated that task to her.

I wrote a much longer response in another thread about how to bring out the alpha in a beta man:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RedPillWomen/comments/6m4e5d/how_to_bring_out_the_alpha_in_a_beta_man/djz7a41/

The biological step-mother.

10 upvotes · 7 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Would it be beneficial to the individual, as well as apply feedback to the system, to immediately request the case be heard by a different judge?

This is pretty much holding a gun to the head of your case and pulling the trigger. Clients request this periodically, but there is no worse decision you can possibly make.

- No judge voluntarily recuses himself from a case unless there is an ethical conflict of interests. It is an inappropriate abdication of responsibility and can get them in trouble with the state supreme court.
- Asking them to recuse themselves is taken as a joke. "I don't like how you think. Can I reroll and get someone better?"
- The other side always opposes it because if you want to switch judges there must be a reason that would help them.
- Once you insult the judge that way, he's going to ruin the rest of your case, taking it out on you personally in some way.
- It's professional suicide for the attorney who has to practice before that judge in future cases.

I've only once ever gotten the job done, and that judge now holds a vendetta against me (I only did it because it's a county I rarely go to). I went for it because it was a bullet-proof case and I could have gotten the judge disbarred if he didn't recuse himself. Your evidence has to be bullet-proof.

father convinces the mother of this through emotional abuse ... different maternal structure develops interesting to see this expanded to go with the other categories you've covered

It's really not as interesting as it sounds, and is exactly what you'd expect. The mother sees the husband/father as a threat and becomes a protector over the children. Rather than her being attracted to his display of authority, she's repulsed by his being a douche. As a result, she doesn't respect him, he doesn't get sex, the relationship falls apart. Although women cheat on men more than the other way around (at least in my cases, it's 60%W to 40%M), this is the one scenario where guys end up cheating about 80% of the time because mom's too afraid that if she gets caught dad will get angry and carry out his threats of stealing the kids. The threats are believable because dad is so charming (that's how he swept her off her feet in the first place) that she believes he can manipulate the courts, and so does he. Dad is so psychologically aggressive and manipulative that mom feels trapped with no way out ... until ...

After his infidelity the woman thinks she has more leverage in the divorce because courts will look down on him for it. She's sorely mistaken because the courts don't give a crap who anyone screws, but she ends up with custody anyway because dad's a douche and everyone can see it. 9 times out of 10 these dads can't keep their mouths shut, so there are clear text message and e-mail logs of them cussing mom out or belittling her. Even if dad is a charmer and smart enough not to leave evidence behind, mom eventually wises up (through legal counsel) and starts audio/video recording him, saving his voicemails, recording phone conversations, etc. all without him knowing, which is legal in my state.

Long story short, these moms become incredibly defensive and withdrawn. They passively-aggressively start building evidence until they can take the guy down, sometimes even intentionally starting fights and arguments to manipulate him into saying dumb stuff to make herself look sweet and innocent to the courts, playing the victim card. It works.

There's no point going into how these men can re-ignite passion with their wives because they don't want passion in the first place; they want fear and control, and they already have it. Sex is all a power play for them, and not about expressing inner desire.

They don't seem to have a normal bond with their own children ... Do you see these cases in divorce court, or do you think they dissolve the bonds by forfeiting upon branch-swinging, thus aren't seen much in your day to day court work?

Being that I deal almost exclusively in cases that involve psychological issues, I see this literally every single day. What you're describing is a woman with either borderline or histrionic personality disorder (or possibly a combination). These women also often have a mood disorder of some type, usually with depressive features. This combination of the mood dysregulation (i.e. inability to control mood swings, illogical mood patterns not grounded in reality) creates a positive feedback loop with the histrionic personality disorder (essentially: addicted to drama), whereby the mood disorder creates drama, the histrionic personality plays off of that drama to cause chaos in their lives, the chaos further disrupts their mood, etc., etc., etc.

The reason I mention borderline personality disorder in there is because borderlines are detached from reality altogether with much of their lives. They almost literally experience life as if they are a phantom in the astral plane looking down at their bodies watching the show with a bucket of popcorn. Most borderlines have been severely abused as children and develop this reality detachment as a defense/coping mechanism, but later on in life it impairs their judgments and prevents them from being able to develop sustainable meaningful relationships, even with their children, and they're often the first to give up their kids in favor of the latest fling in their lives. I have a case right now against a mother doing just that - she abandoned the kids to a schizophrenic father, and I'm representing that father's parents (i.e. the child's paternal grandparents) in getting custody back from the mom.

Here's the thing, bipolar women are usually (1) extremely good looking, and (2) extremely passionate. (1) Because their history of abuse caused them to believe that their body is what everyone wants, so they take care of it and flaunt it. (2) Because, frankly, they're crazy. Because they are incapable of developing long-term relational connections, all of their emotional and relational energies get concentrated in short bursts. These are a serious, serious problem for RP guys because they're exactly what most RP men are looking for: hot and incredibly passionate in bed, usually into all the kinky stuff. They're dream girls for the first few months. But when the depressive mood disorder sets in or she swings away from a passion phase, they'll key your car and screw Chad for no reason at all. Despite much of RP thinking, some of these girls go to Chad not because he's alpha, but because she's literally crazy and incapable of sticking it out with any one guy for too long. Besides, the histrionic nature can't handle the reality of daily obligations in a stable, safe environment.

Not sure if that's what you were looking for, but that's the word-vomit that came up when musing your question :p

Announcement: Red Pill Christians will now exclusively be a male only space

9 upvotes · 26 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Biblical structure. I understand that you're not a Christian, so you don't agree with the Bible. But that's how it is. I believe u/Deep_Strength and Dalrock have written posts on some of the concerns with women being in total authority over each other without a man involved. u/AnnaAerials, who was the original mod/co-founder of RPCWomen was also clear that she did not want herself or another woman as a head mod and believed the men should continue to have authority.

That certainly doesn't mean lording that authority. For the most part, we contribute and have never had a situation where we have objected to or undone a mod action one of the women there have taken. But that general oversight is still biblically appropriate.

The Church

9 upvotes · 15 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

The Church is not a lost cause. The local congregational structure is. There are many "congregations" that are popping up nowadays, abandoning the traditional structure for something more biblical - and they're finding FAR more converts than the norm. Bryan Sanders' book Underground Church is an example of this, though it's far from perfect.

If you want to build something biblical, and you agree that Jesus is the head of the Church, then you agree we should follow Jesus' model, not the historical model that evolved from 300AD onward, right? So let's look at what Jesus did and emulate that.

Example 1: Jesus had a large crowd constantly following him, so you should try to build a large crowd to follow and listen to you too, right? Wrong. Jesus didn't try to build a crowd. He disciplined 12 guys and was so influential in his community engagement that the crowds wouldn't leave him alone. I can't remember one single passage where Jesus told anyone, "Go get some people together to hear me preach." I do see numerous times where he leaves the crowds to focus on his 12. If you want to live in the model Jesus gave, don't neglect the crowds when they come, but don't make them your priority.

Example 2: In the same vein, Jesus' core ministry model was to disciple 12 guys and let them do all the ministering for him outward from there. So, if you want to follow in his model - who are the 12 guys in your congregation. Are they your elders? Close friends? Either way, are you spending time with them the same way Jesus did? Or are you just trying to drive content to them? Too many so-called "pastors" get hung up on teaching content that they forget that relationships were the vehicle through which Jesus gave that content. Are you hanging out in the upper room with your buddies in your congregation? Are you chatting with them while you walk from place to place? Are you giving them opportunities to watch your life and then to try practicing in front of you the things you've modeled for them? These are all things Jesus did.

Example 3: If you really want to stick out from the crowd and go biblical, ditch the "3-5 songs, 30-45 minute sermon, then announcements" ritualism that didn't exist until the 300s AD, and also abandon the "NOBODY better talk while I'm preaching!" lunacy and recognize the fact that (a) most times Jesus teaches crowds, he's interacting with the crowd and asking questions - and there was a culture that KNEW this was acceptable rather than feeling awkward and uncomfortable about it, and (b) when the apostles are engaging with crowds and even local communities in peoples' homes, we see them interacting with the people and not just preaching at them. The very fact that Paul has to tell women to be silent during meetings is evidence, in itself, that people were talking openly during these meetings - he just wanted to make sure family authority structures weren't undermined in this process, as is happening readily today.

Example 4: If you catch on to the whole "focus on your 12" (or however many is feasible for you) and "make disciples" concept, are you teaching them to pass on what they see in your life so that they're not only living it in their own also, but they're also passing it on to their friends, wives, children, etc.? Remember Jesus' prayer in John 17 - "My prayer is not for them only, but also for those who will believe because of them." Jesus was always looking generations ahead - and I can quote several other passages where Jesus and the apostles affirm this concept.

Really, the best thing you can do is to look at what Jesus did - not through the coloration of cultural norms that you're used to because that's what everyone else does. Really look at the Bible and ask yourself: "Did Jesus sing songs before he preached a sermon? Did the disciples do this or even request or expect it? Or is that just something that seemed to work for some, but isn't necessarily a biblical mandate?" And if it's not a biblical mandate, REALLY second-guess yourself on it, because my guess is that if you find yourself wanting to do things that aren't biblically necessary, it's most likely because you're trying to draw a crowd, which will only be a distraction for you, drawing your attention away from living out what Jesus actually did. The entire Sunday service structure in itself is founded on cultural premises without a biblical foundation - and ironically so when people who bash Catholics for being married to tradition are guilty of the exact same thing in the way they structure and organize their regular meetings without looking to Jesus and the apostles as their foundation.

Lots, lots, lots more to say on this. I'm going to encourage you to hop into the discord for more chat on this topic (invite link in the sidebar). Perhaps we could even have a walk-and-talk that I could post on the YouTube channel so everyone can benefit from such a conversation, as I think this discussion is more significant than just you or me. And I've already got a few congregation leaders who are starting to catch on to some of these things and adjust their models.

/u/TheChristianAlpha, for example, connected me with his congregation leader at one point. In the chat we discussed discipleship and structure, who concluded that instead of rows to face a singular speaker, they create circles and the meeting is a conversational event. I know a congregation leader in my own area who has done the same thing. I shared with him a lot of the same things and now his body is focused on engaging with one another rather than listening silently to a singular speaker. Yes, there are still teachers. And it's obvious in these types of bodies who the "endorsed contributors" are (i.e. who has authority to teach) from those who are merely sharing their experiences, and yet even others who are there to ask questions, learn, and grow (as all, theoretically, are doing also). It's beautiful to watch these congregations - and I've seen it happen even in bodies of 500+ - it doesn't just have to be small little plants. It just takes more effort to create an artificially small atmosphere in a genuinely large gathering space. But is that effort worthwhile to you?

Again, lots more. Let's keep the chat up, if you're interested.

Post-Divorce Reports

9 upvotes · 21 September 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Go for it.

Decoding towards a better world?

9 upvotes · 6 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

if someone knew how to decode the word and translated some aspects into our modern way of thinking

You're going to have to explain what you mean by this. The Bible isn't written in code. It is meant to be understood. Yes, there are debatable issues, but there are already LOTS of resources out there for understanding both aspects of the debate and how each are reconciled with our understanding of the world, science, human nature, etc.

to show that there are no contradictions between the sciences and the word

Again, those resources already exist in mass quantities.

could give some humans a key to understand it in a more abstract way

I don't follow. Why would we want a very practical, relevant, understandable book to become more abstract? Or do you mean to say that the way you connect other people to the Bible would be "unconventional"?

e.g. scientists, such that they could potentially start the journey of exploring the word themselves and then might be able to see the truth themselves

As above, there are tons of resources that are designed to help justify the Bible through scientific means. I don't support those books, personally, as it puts the Christian in the scientist's frame rather than God's, trying to use their worldview as the foundation for proving God, which God never purports to do. But many people have gone and done just that anyway.

Would this help to turn the world into better place? Or would it open Pandora's box, since it would enable anyone smart and powerful enough to even more evil manipulation?

What I'm reading in this is: I can make the Bible say whatever I want it to say by interpreting it in unique ways. Is it good to eisegetically interpret the Bible for someone in a way that makes them more agreeable to what it says, or is that dangerous because other people would use the same interpretive method to make the Bible say all kinds of horrible things that it doesn't actually mean?

That's what I'm hearing. The answer is simple: NEVER EISEGETE THE BIBLE. Thank you.

Should some things better be only found by those that seek them instead of being given away for free?

Now that's a fascinating question. /u/OsmiumZulu and I have long held the view that when things are free or cheap, they are not valued. Participation in a congregational unit, for example, is free. It costs nothing. They exist in abundance. If you get kicked out of one, you just go to another. As such, there's little to no personal investment in seeing it expand when differences occur. But something that you're invested in and which will cost you something to get, keep, or you'll lose it if you leave - that has a power that's valuable.

But if you're implying that we refrain from preaching the Gospel unless someone specifically asks to know it ... then I disagree.

The Perversion of Critical Theory: Nadia Bolz-Weber

9 upvotes · 15 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I like this post. I don't share the same "gospel of works" concern that ENTPunisher did, though I can see how he'd get there through your post. Rather, I see you saying that this "critical theory" concept is allowing faith alone to be segregated from any imperative toward holiness.

That said, I get a lot in this about why "critical theory" is dangerous, but you might want to expand on exactly what it is. I don't see that in this post, which can make it hard for someone to know how to avoid it. Are you suggesting it's bad to be critical of authorities at all? I suppose we need to shut down this sub, if that's the case, for challenging numerous authoritative structures - not the least of which is the congregational, institutionalization of churchianity that self-professes to be God's Kingdom on Earth.

FR: Potty Train Your Toddler

9 upvotes · 22 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Fantastic. While you didn't lay it out as clearly, this reminds me of the same process of 208 and /u/chaddownunder's recent post ...

I talked my wife through what I was going to do

You told her what.

I just asked her to watch while I give it a go.

You showed her how.

I took on the role of mentor and instructor, teaching my son how to use the potty and teaching my wife how to potty train a toddler

You let her try.

By Sunday night, my wife was equipped, empowered, and ready to pickup where I left off.

You sent her out.

... and while you didn't mention it, it's only a matter of time before she meets some other mom struggling to potty train their child and she's teaching them what you taught her. She'll be passing it on.

This is discipleship. Sure, it's not on a subject you'll find in the Bible. But that's the point of life modeling. It's not just about biblical disciplines. It's about the discipler's entire way of life that gets passed on. And now you know how to repeat that process for such things as having quiet times, better sex, sharing her faith with the neighbors, etc.

whenever she asked for my leadership, direction, or help, I took it as a sign of her weakness. If she was actually a good mother - I told myself - she wouldn't need my help

This is key that you recognized this. I went through that as well. But the reality is that God didn't design her to function without your leadership. It's not that she's incompetent without you. She's incomplete without you. And your emotional stability in the midst of the situation is what gives her strength to be stable.

Now ... what are the actual potty training tips? I didn't have much problem with my first three, but my 4th and final child (daughter) is 2.5 and seriously struggling with consistency. She'll go if we make her, but she won't tell us when she has to go. We've tried the trick of making her run around the house with no diaper or pants ... still doesn't work with her just yet.

Is it worth it?

9 upvotes · 29 April 2020 · /r/askMRP

It takes two to argue. So how are they happening often if you're STFU?

You sound very in her frame too. You care too much about what she thinks and "keeping the peace." How fluent are you with amused mastery? It helps you enjoy the tension rather than being stressed out by it.

Some people hate the pressure of tip-toeing around egg shells. Others find it a fun game to see how long they can go before cracking them. My 4yr old is the type of person who would stomp all over them just to watch them crack, giggling all the while. Be at least the second, if not the third ... but definitely not the first.

Ultimately, only you can decide if it's "worth it."

Need some advice, long post. And apologize for the scatter brain

9 upvotes · 26 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

she usually doesn't want to. And I don't know when to ask

Are you only allowed to ask when she wants to?

Women respond best to sexuality when they feel sexual. They feel sexual when you express your sexual desire toward them. The stronger your sexual desire, the more sexual they feel. A sexual desire that's turned away by,

"I'm not feeling it today" is so weak it's hardly going to make any panties wet.

This is all on the sidebar. Have you read it? 104 ...

One of the most powerful libido-stimulating factors for a woman is believing that she's irresistibly sexy to the point that people will fight for (or even against) her ...

Corollary 2: Your wife needs to know that she is so irresistible that you will fight through any barrier to get in her panties - even barriers that she herself puts up.

She barely touches on me unless I point it out. She has recently figured out what she likes in bed, but it's only in bed and never out.

Once you have kids, most women are over-stimulated with physical touch. Their kids are touching them and hanging on them all the time and they just want to have their bodies back to themselves for a while. This is normal. Your kids are still pretty young. It gets better as they grow older and become less clingy.

I often invite my children to cling onto me instead. This serves a few purposes, not the least of which are: (1) reducing the amount of physical touch that over-stimulates my wife, and (2) building a stronger bond with my kids through physical touch. Yeah, you're gone a lot of hours. So am I. When you get home, deal with it. You have to be a dad too.

Right now she's bored. She's getting too much of the same. You have to change it up and make her interested again - and part of doing that is pushing past comfort zones, like learning to say yes when she puts up a soft no.

I want her to feel free to ask for sex of me and me of her

Hormones fade over time. Women start to get them back sometime in their mid-late 30s or early 40s (or so reports go) before menopause kills them again. The real problem is that you were enjoying the high-hormone phase where she was spontaneously horny and expecting it to last forever, whereas women, on the whole, tend toward being sexual responsive, not spontaneous. This is a new dynamic you're going to have to figure out. She's not going to change. You will. Yes, part of that can turn into her initiating again once she's not bored with it anymore, but she's probably so off-put by how disinterested you seem when she puts up the slightest barrier that she's just not attracted anymore.

I'm rather skinny ... with a slight belly

I'm not sure how this makes any sense at all. You mean you're overweight in your abs, but have scrawny arms. Also, why aren't you lifting? You seriously don't understand how huge of an impact that will have on your sex life. It's not a magical cure, but virutally every guy who goes from skinny or fat to jacked seems to think it's magic because of how effective it is.

Not looking for judgement, just helpful advice.

Part of helpful advice means people weighing and measuring your situation - which IS JUDGMENT. We have to judge what you're doing wrong and right to help you figure out how to improve. This is a really bad attitude. Hope and expect judgment. I love the attitude of one of my clients when going in for her psych eval: "I don't care if they diagnose me with all kinds of crazy problems. I'd rather know than not know so that I can get help and be a better parent for my kids." She WANTED to be judged, even if it meant a barrage of negative criticism. Expect it and embrace it.

What you're really saying, though is, "I'm too weak to take insults, so please go easy on me." To that, learn to toughen up. There's no situation where developing a stronger ability to handle difficulties is going to make your life worse. There are lots of situations where failing to do this will make your life worse.

Emotional connection

9 upvotes · 25 April 2020 · /r/askMRP

A woman feels emotionally connected to a man when she is attracted to him and he gives her the tingles. It's really that simple. All the other stuff around here is a playbook for giving the tingles. Things from my playbook that make my wife feel "emotionally connected" to me (in no particular order):

- Teasing her
- Tickling her
- Kino
- Picking her up off the ground
- Really good sex
- Rubbing my hands through her hair or scratching her head while sitting next to her
- 10 second kiss

Should I keep going? You get the idea. Notice that none of these requires talking. Conversation does not generate emotional connectivity unless it's an emotionally charged conversation. You can't create a positive emotional charge from conversation alone because conversation is a medium for emotional exchange, not a generator. It might be able to enhance or shred apart whatever positive momentum might have been there before, but you'll need action to be the initial generator.

Also note: if you're an unattractive guy, all of these things are going to come off as creepy or disgusting. They're things she tolerates, not things she enjoys. You lifting? Wearing cologne? Decent deoderant? Getting regular hair cuts? Trimming your nails? Reasonable fashion sense? You should be figuring all that stuff out independent of her anyway.

How would you ask out a girl if you are always around friends when you see her?

9 upvotes · 2 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Why do you need to get her alone in the first place? Are you too nervous/shy/embarrassed/whatever to communicate your thoughts in front of other people?

"What if they reject me?" is a question TOTALLY in their frame. So what if they reject you? Do you not have abundance yet? If you don't, you have no business getting worked up over asking out a girl in the first place.

Also, check out my post: "initiate often, confident always." It'll really help you out here.

Also, hone in on what /u/TheChristianAlpha and /u/RedPillWonder said - good stuff there. Just don't leave room for confusion or interpretation in how you ask or make it seem like a joke or any other type of self-defeating defense mechanism.

How would you ask out a girl if you are always around friends when you see her?

9 upvotes · 2 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Don't make it humorous. This leaves room for plausible deniability, which is a display of weakness/low-value. A strong man just says what he wants. If it doesn't work, he doesn't play it off as a joke to "save face" - he owns it and moves on.

Also, if you leave any room for it to be taken as a joke/ironic/sarcastic/humorous, you're making it easier for her to reject you by creating the plausible deniability FOR HER. Why do her work for her? LMR, ASD, certain types of fitness tests - these are all founded on women utilizing plausible deniability as their primary strategy for doing what they want. Don't be like a woman.

Teenage Daughter Wants to Spend Time with Friends During my Parenting Time

9 upvotes · 4 October 2019 · /r/askMRP

Good insights. Better than letting her slip from his frame into her friends', though, is to bring the friends into his frame too.

Using RPC principals as a last resort for my sex starved marriage.

9 upvotes · 17 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Mission first. You didn't mention your mission, which tells me you either don't know what it is or it's not important enough to your life to be worth mentioning - and this also means that she doesn't know what she's following you toward. Life becomes mundane like this.

I'm in the process of moving right now. I'm literally taking off the next 2 days to pack and ship. The last month has been stressful, exciting, difficult, fun, crazy, nostalgic. These are all powerful emotions - and having something BIG going on in life produces all of these. Byproduct? Horniness levels are up.

A few months back, there was drama at our congregation causing us to leave. This brought in a host of good and bad emotions dealing with the exit and the prospect of finding a new congregation. Result? Horniness levels were up.

I could keep going on with examples like this. Women are addicted to THE NEXT THING. If they don't know what the next thing is, they go crazy with boredom. First she wants a man, then she wants to get engaged; then it's getting married; then it's to have a house; then kids; then she wants them in all kinds of fun activities; and on and on. If there's nothing to look forward to, she's mad. Women have retroactive emotions, so if she's in a bad mood now, her memory of past events will be as if she was in hell.

I was planning a Disney World trip with my wife once when she was in a bad mood. We were talking about our last time there: "It was awful. The heat was unbearable. The lines were so long. The kids were obnoxious. I want to go again for their sake, but this trip is really going to suck." The very next day she's in a positive mood, talking to my sisters and suddenly: "Oh, we had so much fun eating at Cinderlla's castle. And I remember how great it was when the kids did this and that. I can't wait to go back."

It sounds like your wife is presently in emotional blah mode right now, so her entire frame of reference for the past, present, and expectations for the future are blah too. Blah is not sexy. In her mind, "blah has its moments," so she'll still seem happy in short bursts during blah mode, but if the excitement about the next thing is gone, "blah" is going to keep being her general context for life, which generates no tingles.

To get out of "blah" mode, you need to have something major that's creating a combination of stress and excitement for her. Ideally, this should be related to your mission. If your mission is disciple-making, start a team at your congregation, get her in it, and share the ups and downs that come along with this. Every time each of you finds a new person to disciple, and you chat with each other about the progress your guy/gal is making and what you want to cover next - and then eventually see them branching out to disciple someone new, these are exciting conversations to have, and ones that she knows makes a difference for eternity. Instead of "we bought another house," which can feel like a big deal in one context, it's "souls are being saved and we're building eternal relationships," which she knows matters in every context.

If your mission is something else, get a better mission. In the meantime, actually do something about your mission and invite her along. Maybe your mission is to write a book. Actually write that stinkin' book and have her give you feedback on it. Maybe your mission is starting a company. Get it off the ground, start making sales, and ask her to help you run the books. Maybe your mission is to become the world's best bowler. Start going to the bowling alley and take her with you to get feedback on your form and to be impressed by how many times you can gutter that thing without throwing a hissy fit. Whatever your mission is, get off your butt and start doing something other than work, eat, sleep, repeat.

Once you've got her moving alongside you on a mission that's both stressful and exciting, step up your dread game. Get physically fit, dress better, wear cologne - and the faster these changes happen the better. Eventually, become more social - and not just with guys. Chat with girls and guys alike. Christians have a tendency to view women they're not married to like they have a plague. Call it cooties or whatever, but it's not real. Go talk to them. Get IOIs. Develop your own confidence in talking to women - and as you develop that confidence, you'll be more confident in the way you initiate with your wife. If she sees that it's authentic confidence and not a face you're just putting on, she's going to respond to that. Or not, but you feel great about your life anyway because you're on top of the world at that point. Besides, you've got more important things to do with your mission than worry about whether or not some girl is going to spread her legs.

If you're at the point where you realize you could cold-approach and close in a matter of hours, if you wanted, her sexual denial will feel petty to you. You will be able to start having some conversations with her that would break other marriages into pieces. Indeed, she may want to break away entirely, deciding that avoiding sex with you is more important to her than keeping her marriage together. Oh well. You've done everything in your power at that point, and if she wants to leave, let her leave. Otherwise, if she's willing to start making some changes, great - and most often, if you're attractive enough and she knows it, those changes will start happening faster than you'd expect. Some guys mistakenly assume that their own improvement should automatically start causing her to improve too. It doesn't. Some guys think the 1,000 foot rope should start reigning in with enough time. It doesn't. You actually have to grab the rope and start pulling it at some point. You have to compel her to change before she'll start changing. But once you put the imperative to change on the table, let her take it from there. And for the love of all that is good in the world: be tactful in how you communicate all of this. Don't be Rambo. Be silver-tongued.

But right now I'm guessing you feel a lot of pressure to make things work. You feel like you're stuck with her and blew your one shot at marriage. If you tried to develop that type of confidence now, you'd fool yourself into thinking you were genuine, but she'd sniff out the insecurity anyway. After all, she's a woman. She has a pretty good idea of how many other women want you. In fact, she has a pretty darn pessimistic view about that because she knows you better than those other women do and she's already past the NRE phase, so she's probably going to scoff at the idea of other women wanting you, thinking, "That's hilarious. If they only knew what I knew about him, they'd be singing a different tune." That's why you have to become so authentically desirable first before any of this actually works - and that's not just from your physique, although physique is the biggest help. A man with a desirable mission and a rock solid frame with your basic stats should have no problem pulling her attraction at will.

So, while your stats are not ideal, and you should certainly follow /u/rocknrollchuck's advice, I'm more persuaded that your issue is related to your mission and your frame, mixed with some lingering blue pill ideologies. Get those straightened out alongside your physique and you'll be well on your way.

Based on what I know of red pill thought it seems like this sub recommending marriage over living as Paul did being single is illogical.

9 upvotes · 4 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This sub recommending marriage

Please point me to the post where any mod did that. The closest you'll get is /u/OsmiumZulu's rare comments that marriage and child-bearing is an easy way to populate the world with more Christians. But even that is a far cry from recommending or promoting marriage. As /u/Deep_Strength noted, this sub (at least insofar as the leadership is concerned) consistently maintains a 1 Cor. 7 approach to the benefit of singlehood over marriage.

when data point's to women often losing all interest in their man after 4-6 years in a relationship

The data I've seen and even personally collected points to 6-24 months - much faster. Divorce most often happens at the 7 year mark. That aside, these stats are looking predominantly at blue pill men because 99% of the people surveyed are blue pill. Take the same metric exclusively of red pill men and I'm confident you'll see a very different result. I say this as someone who has been married for almost 11 years and has 4 kids.

resentment due to the woman not really wanting to have sex

Again, only applies to blue pill men.

due to the choice of women %80 of time

While that stat was true in 2011, most people have misinterpreted why that's the case. Not worth getting into here, though ... just know that I'm a divorce lawyer and it's not as simple as women being the ones who want to leave all the time.

quarrelsome wife

Unless you're a red pill guy who knows how to get his wife in line.

marriage is a concession of God to provide an outlet for sin

Wait ... what?!? Marriage was created by God before sin entered the world. I'm not sure where you're getting this, theologically. Also, while I think I know what you mean, sex within marriage is certainly not sin.

often leads the Christian to put their spouse above God

That's the risk, per 1 Cor. 7, and why we/Paul recommend against marriage. But for those who are already married or will inevitably be married, being red pill sufficiently mitigates this risk.

how marriage can be recommended as the default life goal for Christians

I assume you haven't read our sidebar. I have written REPEATEDLY that the default (and only worthwhile) life goal of EVERY Christian should be to MAKE DISCIPLES. Marriage and child-rearing is a road map that can be tossed in the trash once you've arrived at this actual destination - though some people keep it around because they enjoy amateur cartography anyway.

marriage gives woman most of the power

Marriage doesn't. Marriage laws do. We've had many conversations here about the difference between spiritual marriage before God and legal marriage under the state's laws.

by default makes them head of the household

Not sure how you reach that conclusion in a biblical context. Are you assuming every woman will abandon her faith? Or that women aren't hypergamous?

Red pill guy's can try holding frame all they want, but women know they have the final word granted by the power society gives them

So much ignorance here. This is only true if hypergamy is false.

she will see herself as the actual head of the house due to the legal power's marriage grants her

Let's be clear: marriage in America is not pro-women or anti-men. It's pro-lesser-earner, anti-higher-earner. Simple solution: make sure your wife has a job, like the Proverbs 31 woman did. The more she earns, the less teeth divorce rape has. I've helped many men divorce-rape their higher-earning wives. It's a gender neutral system (at least insofar as finances go). It just happens to be that there's a disparate impact on men because on the whole there are more men, culturally, who are willing to invest their lives to build high-earning careers than women.

it's become clear to me that women like the power the legal contract gives them

Wouldn't you? That's the same thing as the masses of people supported by welfare saying they will vote for whichever candidate will keep giving them their welfare checks. Duh.

it's not honestly possible for a man to be actually the leader as the sidebar here suggest while in bondage to a contract that gives the woman all the real power

You misunderstand marriage laws. More importantly, I get the impression that you have no clue how hypergamy works. That's okay. You can learn. While some women can overcome certain behaviors that hypergamy would push them toward (ex. riding the CC, cheating, attention-seeking, etc.), no woman can eradicate the underlying hypergamous desires. That's like saying a man can somehow stop himself from ever wanting sex again, even when a supermodel is reaching down his pants.

As is often said, red pill men don't try to change the system. They make it work for them. In the case of a red pill man, hypergamy isn't a threat to his marriage - it's the tool he uses to keep his marriage and sexuality in tact. Hypergamy is what keeps his wife from looking elsewhere. If she's already got the best guy she can ever get (i.e. a red pill, high-quality man), the thought of doing anything to lose him (i.e. the power of dread) would only degrade her to a lower quality man outside the marriage, so she becomes submissive and sexually devout to her husband as a way of keeping him happy with her. She's the one trying to hold the marriage together - not him. That's how a red pill marriage works - and how it should be, biblically.

the woman will lose all interest in the man she now controls

Except she never controls a red pill man.

some will suggest the Girl that has actually been transformed by the holy spirit as a unicorn

Nah, the Holy Spirit only transforms the spirit/mind, but the flesh remains a slave to sin (Romans 7:25). So, I often reject guys who make this claim. Also, there's no way for a man ever to know if his girl is actually transformed by the Holy Spirit or just faking it (intentionally or otherwise).

Now, it sounds to me like you are pretty new to actual red pill theory. That's okay. So, when you say you don't fully believe red pill theory or "AWALT," I take it to mean that you reject your own perception of what you think the red pill is all about.

Spend some time around here and I'm guessing you'll end up agreeing with a lot more than you'd think - especially as you see the Scriptural groundwork of everything we discuss. As I often say, we aren't trying to reconcile secular red pill theory with the Bible. We just look at the Bible and nothing else, which happens to say the same thing that the secular world has discovered about creation through observation and testing. Application of what we learn is where the room for conversation opens up. "If this is true, what should we do about it?" And the possible realms of application are as vast as there are people - though the good ones are always produced from what we know to be true and are not merely tangential.

1920s were not an evolution of justice, but the beginning of our end. Take women's votes away.

9 upvotes · 1 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with a lot of what you say, but your attitude is very disturbing. The cause for downvotes was probably not "feminine brain washing and conditioning," as I'm sure most of us would agree with the underlying philosophical premise you're taking; rather, it's the way you approach the issue that warrants down-votes. You have no tact or eloquence. Develop these skills and you will be incredibly more effective at getting people to rally behind you instead of against you.

As the Bible says, do not give power to women and children.

Chapter and verse, please. I'm not saying it's not there - only that such bold claims must always be supported with ACTUAL references. From my recollection, it takes a few theological steps to reach this conclusion and there is no verse directly on point that says, "Thou shalt not let a woman or child vote."

We also have to be careful not to assume old testament Israeli culture was somehow always ordained by God as his way of doing things. Just because the Israelites in the Bible did it doesn't mean it's godly. They defied God all the time. Sometimes he punished them, sometimes he didn't. Focus on what God said, not on what people did.

All in all, you've got some good points, but it's buried beneath so much anger that it's hard to take you seriously. A post on conversational tact is warranted. You make an emotional appeal rather than an intellectual one. You're treating men like women, and in some ways acting like a woman yourself. Calm down, take a few deep breaths, and process your thoughts before writing on controversial matters. You will be far more effective.

[F/R] That escalated quickly...

9 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

You stop chasing her and start pursuing Christ and see what happens? Now she's pursuing you. But it sounds like your model is still pursuing women, generally, if not her specifically. This still seems a problem to me. You should be meeting women through the pursuit of your mission, not as a separate and distinct thing from your mission. Go share the Gospel with women. Ask other women in your church to share the Gospel alongside you. Lead a small group and ask a woman to help you do it. There are all kinds of mission-oriented ways of connecting with women. I'm not sure why you'd still follow the pussy-chasing strategies of online dating.

I don't ask girls what they want to do or when they're available. I project that I'm a busy guy (because I am) so they should already know that my time is limited; if they can't fit themselves into my schedule, or at the very least offer another day/time they're available, then their interest in me isn't where I want it to be.

Amen. Glad to see you're getting it.

I did a poor job with kino

On a first date with an allegedly mature Christian woman, this is perfectly acceptable - even a good thing. You don't have to use every tool in your box on the first date.

I continue to talk to other girls and set up a second date with one I had met previously

Why is that girl not getting as much attention in this post as Samantha?

so kino was next to impossible

Again, it's just a second date. Don't ramp up physical escalation too fast with an allegedly mature Christian woman.

She laughs and says "I wouldn't do that, I'm just a tease." ... she even mentioned being good in bed

This is all ASD and plausible deniability. She's saying: "I'll totally have sex with you right now, but I don't want to feel like a slutty sinner, so I'm going to overtly communicate my boundaries to feel good about myself, but create the conditions where he's likely to cross my boundaries and I can conclude: 'It just happened. I got swept away in the moment. I'm not a slut - I told him my boundaries, but he just pushed me too far.'" She will never take responsibility for the way she encouraged you to push her fake-boundaries.

"he's the first guy I've gone out with that wants to talk about Jesus and it's a breath of fresh air."

That made me smile. This is something I don't think the secular world will ever understand.

"to sober up"

Okay ... so apparently the parts of the Bible about being sober-minded and not getting drunk don't matter to the two of you? Gotta own up to that and work on it.

"You can trust me, I'm only like this at first until I'm comfortable with you. I would never cross that line."

I don't track with your assessment. You know her better, of course, but everything you're writing tells me that she's not merely looking for sexual validation. She's trying to get you on her hook and she plans on chilling out after you're wound up in her web. She wants you chasing after her pussy and she's using every sexual tactic she has to get the blood rushing to your head so that you can become her beta bux who will do anything to get what she has to offer.

Does she legit want it too? Absolutely. You're clearly a high value guy to her. That's why she's trying so hard. Does it make her feel validated? Yep. But she can get that validation anywhere. This is a power play, not just a validation trip (though validation needs are always inherent in these exchanges for women). That's just my interpretation, though. Maybe there's more going on than you've mentioned here that would change my mind if I saw it.

Based on some of her comments after, it was clear she needed validation from me in a sexual capacity. In her mind, we didn't need to have sex, but she needed to know that I wanted to have sex with her.

Look at your preface there: "Based on some of her comments." Don't give too much stock to what she says, even if you think you're playing psychologist. This woman has already proven she's intentionally deceptive. She claims she has boundaries, then she crosses them. She claims to be a mature believer, but is chasing dick instead of Christ. I've heard scant little about the women she's discipling or the non-Christians she's sharing the Gospel with or the small group/Bible study she's attending. It's like the conversation went far enough to check off that a few spiritual things are happening - but even in your own recount, you're not emphasizing any of these aspects about her, probably because they're not prominent enough in your impression of her to be worth mentioning in your description. I all-too-often hear, "She's a mature, godly woman," about someone who happens to be quite the opposite - and you've even as much as said so in this post:

she was a devout Christian. How she was behaving was completely contrary to that.

You follow?

"Am I going to see you again soon? I really want this to work."

Translation: I want to see you soon. Instead of me bending to your schedule, why don't you start ponying-up to mine. I want more of the validation you have to offer, but I want you to start giving it to me on my terms instead of yours.

PUMP THE BREAKS GIRL

Correct response.

"Work's more important than me?!"

Translation: You're supposed to pedestalize me now that I've given you a taste of what sexuality with me could look like.

"Ugh, you're the worst."

Translation: I can't resist you and you're going to make me work for this because the freebie attention I get from other guys just won't compare.

Now, let's get down to business.

First, I have no idea why people are saying to "next" her or stay away. AWALT. They're basically telling you to go find a unicorn. Screw that. Unicorns don't exist. Could you vet for someone better in time? Sure. But that doesn't mean this woman is a bad find simply because she has several of the same traits that all women have.

Second, you've got to move out of her-focus with your dates and onto mission-focus. Going to a restaurant or bar are her-focused. Your attention is entirely on her. She's not following, she's soaking, like a sponge. She says she does service projects. Maybe you're going to do one too, and you invite her to join along. Maybe you're discipling a guy and you invite her into one of your meetings so she can see what discipleship looks like and he can see how you interact with women. Maybe you're in a Bible study and you ask her to join you. I don't know the specifics about your life, but right now all of your attention during your time with this girl is on her. That's what's feeding her validation and giving her power to keep you on the hook. Shift your gaze from her toward your mission and bring her along and see how well she follows then.

Third, and this should go without saying: you need far clearer boundaries. Don't be a girl. Don't fall into the "it just happened" mentality with her. You know well in advance that she's a temptation to you. Are you going to run toward temptation by stage-setting your dates in such a way as to facilitate more sexual activity, or are you going to stage-set them in a way that is non-conducive to physical contact?

Fourth, it appears that your temptation-threshold is quite low. You feel like it's high because you managed to say no to further escalation with her, but you also have your hands up her crotch and are hot-and-heavy at only the second date.

Fifth, you're not enforcing your boundaries, communicating to her that she can do whatever she wants with you. You had your hand on her thigh, she shoves her vag into you. You pull away, but instead of enforcing the boundary you keep making out with her, rewarding her with more endorphins for her effort rather than cutting her off. If you can't enforce your boundaries and you reward her efforts at trying to break them, she's going to keep trying harder and you will be the one to break, not her.

Sixth, and most importantly: you have mentioned nothing about her willingness to follow your mission. I have no clue if she's just looking for relational validation or if she's looking for a leader to give her a purpose in life and a pathway to living it out. Clearly your mission has nothing to do with the interaction between the two of you, other than very vague notions that you both are willing to talk about Jesus - and you're also both quick to forget him when it's convenient.

All in all, this sounds like an exciting prospect. With better direction in how you lead the relationship and clearer enforcement of your boundaries, I'd be interested in seeing where this goes. Don't blame her for breaking your boundaries. Expect it. It's on you to lead in physical contact, not her to withhold. I get the impression that you're looking for excuses by creating contexts where it's easy to drop your boundaries. Don't do that. Stay strong and this could be a decent prospect. What about the other girls? Why all the attention on this one?

WOTSM - Withholding Ejaculation?

9 upvotes · 31 January 2019 · /r/askMRP

Goodness ... and people say I'm the one who over thinks things.

How to date "evenly" as a Christian

9 upvotes · 1 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm somewhat disappointed with the answers in this thread so far. /u/YayLove came close when saying that relationships aren't an exchange - but then she (he?) blew it by saying to focus on giving.

Exchanges certainly happen in relationships and marriage, but that exchange is not the point. It is incidental. The fairness of these exchanges stops mattering when you contemplate the larger things at work.

This faulty "exchange" concept, I believe, comes from the "love tank" model of relational counseling. This view says that each party has a "tank" and that if someone's tank drops too low, they will be unhappy and want out of the relationship. It teaches that each party must fill the other's tank for the relationship to work, or else the other person won't be happy and will want to leave. In this model, each person is responsible for the other person's love tank. Given that each person's experience of the relationship is based exclusively on his/her own tank, it also fosters a highly competitive nature. Rather than ensuring the other person's tank is full all the time, it incentivizes each person to keep the other person's tank at a mediocre level - just enough that the negative consequences don't kick in - and then do whatever else they want with the rest of their time.

In another model, people view relationships as having a joint tank. Each party fills it with a different color - one red, another white. It is a joint effort to keep the tank full, but the color inside the tank is a good indicator of who's doing more to keep the tank full. This isn't an accurate picture of reality, though, because there is no collective emotion - each party has their own emotions, though they do influence one another.

A better way to look at it is the biblical way, doing away with tanks altogether. God gives the man a mission. The man's mission should be big enough that he recognizes the value of having help. He invites others to help him. At some point he starts wanting to have sex with some of the people helping him. One of them it gets so intense that he decides to marry her to legitimize their sexual relationships.

Here's the deal: if you're off actively looking for a relationship, you're already in a state of subservience. In today's deregulated sexual marketplace, women by default view themselves as the selectors. They sit back, let men come to them, and they decide if the man has enough to offer her to be worth the effort of locking down his commitment. If you're actively looking, you're just another man in their queue - unless you're going after unattractive women who don't have anyone in their queue.

Now, if you enter that woman's queue, she thinks (reasonably, in light of the sexual marketplace) that her very existence is the exchange you get for all your effort. The value of her time and attention is the "equal exchange." If you don't buy her dinner, so be it. She won't give you her time that day. If you don't pay for her movie ticket, she'll find another guy who will. If you don't give compliments or massage her feet or whatever, she doesn't need you. Women operate on a tank-filling relational mentality and assume that your tank is always full just by virtue of her being around you, but that you must actively make effort to fill her tank.

This is where hypergamy is actually a beneficial thing to men. If women were not hypergamous, then there would be no recourse for a man. He would simply be compelled to keep playing this game, vying for her attention, filling her tank only to be left in the cold when his runs empty.

But because women are hypergamous, they always want what is better. If a man is pursuing her, he is, by default, viewed as being lesser. If a man is present in her life, but shows no clear signs of interest, it indicates that he is greater. That's how the hamster rationalizes his disinterest. After all, there are a million guys who would be interested in her, but not this one, so he must be capable of achieving a higher standard than all those other guys; and if he has that capacity, he must be a better guy than all those other guys, and therefore she wants him more than the other guys.

So, when you intentionally pursue a relationship with a woman, you are telling her: "You are in demand, at least to me, therefore I am willing to pay a price to get you." At no point in this transaction is there a communication: "You must pay a price to get me" or "You must pay a price equal to the price that I'm paying you." See how the transactional "equalizing" view of relationships makes no sense in this model?

If you don't pursue her, though, she is left thinking: "I am not in demand to him, but he is now in demand to me. Therefore, I must be willing to pay a price to get him." That price is her submissiveness, following his leadership in the relationship. At no point should she be thinking, "Now that I have paid him my submissiveness, he must pay me back something so that we're paying equal amounts to each other." Instead, the man is rightly in the biblical position of being the head of the relationship.

To be clear, in biblical times, virtually all men had more value to offer women than women had to offer men. They were very sexist times, by modern standards - and I'm only commenting on the actuality of it, neither in a condoning of all their practices, nor condemning them. It is what it is. So, the man was always the prize because men had more rights. They were capable of earning an independent wage. They were capable of owning land apart from inheritance. They were given positions of decision-making in tribes and councils. Women were excluded from these things, and thus the sexual marketplace always presumed that the man had more to offer the woman than the woman did the man.

Deregulating the sexual marketplace through countless feminist political victories has shifted this balance away from what we see in the Bible on a pragmatic level, though the theological fact of God's intentions - which Paul reasons from creation and not from culture - remains unchanged. This is where most confusion now lies because as Christians we have a proper theological framework we must follow (which is the red pill praxeological understanding of how a sexual marketplace best functions) compared against the pragmatic reality that women can easily create their own value apart from a man, and therefore have no societal incentive to follow the theological framework the Bible lays out for intergender relational dynamics (i.e. essentially, the leader/helper dynamic).

Nevertheless, the red pill view is still to make women chase you rather than you chasing them. This is the biblical view, as we are to chase Christ rather than waiting for him to chase us down every time we stop our feet and slam the door in his face. It is also evident in the order of creation, as Paul explains.

To that end, the pragmatic solution for you is simply to make yourself as attractive as possible, make yourself available to women who you want to notice your attraction (preferably through inviting them to join you on your mission, apart from actual dates, as the opportunity to get to know each other and foster attraction), then let them start sending IOIs your way as you flirt back.

I've heard story after story of guys who employ this type of methodology and find that their girlfriends are actually the ones who are paying for their meals, buying them clothes, new TVs, stereos, etc. That's not to say you should be attracting women just to get these things from them; but the point is that you don't have to be stuck in the "equal exchange" model or the "I must give, give, give" model - you can make the sexual marketplace work for you by being in high enough demand that a woman, now being able to self-generate value, would spend that value on you just for the right to say she's your girlfriend. Again, what you should do or actually do is up to you - but be the guy who can do that if he wants.

Tag: u/deep_strength u/redpillwonder - as this is a theory-heavy comment and I wrote it in a rush, so feel free to correct any mistakes.

The Consciously Crazy Wife

9 upvotes · 29 October 2018 · /r/askMRP

Thanks for the reply. This is good. I love the nail video and have shared it with many people as well. It's a safe way to communicate a somewhat fundamental RP concept that people would reject if you gave it in more direct terms.

I've been suggesting she change jobs along the lines of what you suggested for years, but I haven't escalated it beyond anything more than a mere suggestion. Honestly, her busy seasons are some of the best times for me. I get all the time with my kids, it reinforces in her mind that I'm the leader in the home and can run the ship without her - and therefore she's there not to run the ship for me, but to help me do it - and yet I still get sex at the end of the day ... and don't have to deal with her craziness 4 months in the year (2 for each busy season). So, I'm a little hesitant to have her switch jobs with how much I enjoy the busy season dynamic on my end and these weird blow-ups are only about twice a year anyway - especially when she's adamant that she doesn't want to change jobs either. But perhaps it would have greater value in the long-run.

Oh the irony...

9 upvotes · 3 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I have been probating an estate where a guy fraudulently stole a bunch of money from the estate. I've been garnishing him for years. Two months ago he fled the state, canceling our garnishment and leaving us with absolutely no way to find him. He could be anywhere in the country. He essentially got away with the other $79,000 we never got to collect from him.

One of the beneficiaries of the estate lives on the other side of the country. His wife got rear ended on her way to work two days ago. Guess who hit her ...

The frame of Christ

9 upvotes · 9 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This simple sentence is ther foundation for why I started RPC in the first place. I like your concise way of putting it.

Sous vide starbucks eggs at home.

9 upvotes · 18 July 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Is this RPW? I'm so confused. I tried to look for some hidden metaphor, but must be as dumb as my neighbor's mom if there actually is one. Ok, let's roll with it. Cooking is one of my hobbies too. Best meal: T-bone with my homemade jabenero cilantro lime sauce over brown garlic rice ... and golden honeydew melon for dessert. That melon ... I have a weakness.

Seriously though, I cook because I want to control what I eat. I do cut and bulk. I started a cut this past Friday. Didn't tell the wife. Wife drives through fast food today and asks what I want. My golden honeydew melon, of course. Response: "Wait, now I feel guilty. Am I allowed to eat anything if you're not?" My reply: "You can eat whatever the heck you want. I'm eating my melon." Guess who suddenly decided she needs to diet and tone up?

RP Christians Sidebar "Handbook" (Download Links)

9 upvotes · 10 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is actually ... far more professional-looking than I was expecting. Well done, sir.

New SBC President JD Greear Urges Evangelical Men to Apologize to Hurt Christian Women for 'Toxic Church Culture'

9 upvotes · 19 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

If it's really only about physical abuse and rape, I'm fine with this. What's frustrating is the broad and widely unclarified extent to which his words can be taken. If a husband is beating his wife and the church stands by knowingly and allows it to happen, they're right to apologize and repent. But that doesn't mean the rest of us should bear the burden of false assumption because of these few outlier cases.

Lessons from two divorce cases

9 upvotes · 14 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

It seemed too niche for MRP. It doesn't have mass appeal - only to those who are self employed and contemplating divorce. I used to clog MRP with lots of stuff like this, some even lower quality. I'm trying to avoid that nowadays.

Plate hides that she has a boyfriend, he finds out she was cheating with me, and now he's harassing her and me to speak to me. Should I even bother speaking to him?

9 upvotes · 14 March 2018 · /r/askTRP

So you make a play against his masculinity ...

Finding a RP Church/Fellowship

9 upvotes · 20 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is the answer. And if you're truly alpha, people will follow your lead naturally anyway. You will earn influence with the leadership and transform your church by the example you set.

To OP: don't try to find a red pill church; make one.

The most feminized holiday of them all ... what to do, what to do ...

9 upvotes · 10 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's a solid answer. I'm not a fan of Covert Contract Day either.

Wife had abortion without telling me

9 upvotes · 4 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

There aren't even words for what had happened here. Unfortunately, on Reddit all we have is our words. So how can we use them to help you?

My gut reaction is to use them to knock some sense in you for marrying an unbeliever and getting lost in you blue pill ideologies. But I know that speech would probably be more than your heart can handle right now. We're here for you.

How can a man not be a beta bux if the woman is traditionally supposed to stay home and raise children, buy groceries, etc.? Doesn't the man have to provide for her to take care of the family?

9 upvotes · 5 December 2017 · /r/askTRP

Having a wife who doesn't work is the easiest way to set yourself up for long-term divorce rape. Either go MGTOW or marry someone who will contribute financially as well (preferably where you earn no more than 50% more than her - i.e. you make 60% of the joint, combined income or less). That said, even with a wife who is a financial contributor, there are still roles with regard to housework. I usually break it up into two categories:

- Improvement: Things that will show a lasting impact, like fixing the deck, remodeling the bathroom, fixing the law mower, etc.
- Maintenance: Things that will need done again in another day or two, like dishes, laundry, picking up clutter, dusting, vacuuming, etc.

Now, guys should be doing some maintenance stuff too, like mowing the lawn and opening tight pickle jars. Likewise, wives tend to like painting walls. Oh well. Figure out your own balance. The improvement/maintenance dichotomy works well for my family.

But at the end of the day, if you're married you want to treat the house like it's yours. Not "our house" or "your house, but she has rights too." It's your house. Legally this is an insane position to hold, but that's what's going to keep her interested in you. Women want to "have it all together" and they get jealous when they see other women who "have it all together" and they don't. They tend to marry men who they think "have it all together" so they can latch on to his success. Great. This is actually a good thing. That's hypergamy at its finest working for the betterment of the high-value men.

But what women fail to realize is that nobody "has it all together." That standard is a phantom that simply doesn't exist. If a guy imposes too much responsibility on his wife, she will buckle under the weight of it. That's why beta husbands are so frustrating and end up with crappy sex lives and a nagging wife. She feels responsible for all the work and since you're not getting it done, she starts nagging and complaining for you to do it.

Solution? OYS. Treat the house like it's your house, not "hers" or "ours" or anything of the sort. Notice how most girls get excited when the guy invites her: "Move in with me"? It's not, "Let's get our own place." Sure, that exists, but it's rare. It's usually him asking her to move in with him - to join in on his life. Act like the marital home is your bachelor pad and you just happen to let her and the kids live there. Of course, moving in with you means taking on some responsibility, and you'll delegate that to her as you see fit - but it's your responsibility, not hers. That's how you continue being the guy who "has it all together."

And when she notices a butt ton of things that aren't meeting her expectations you simply say, "You're here because you want to live with me. You don't have to live with me if you don't want to." To that end, if my wife comes up with something she wants done that isn't important enough for me to act on or delegate to her (example: re-painting the kids' rooms when the current paint is perfectly fine), she runs the idea by me. If I say no, that's the end of it. If I approve the project, I make it clear, "Go for it, but getting it done is on you, on your own time." She's okay with that. Result? The sheer quantity of "extra projects" we had immediately reduced to realistic levels, as opposed to before my RP days when she'd start a million things and never finish any of them and I'd get roped into doing it all for her. In addition, the house is now conforming to my expectations of what a house should look like. But of particular significance is the fact that my wife is no longer stressed out of her mind trying to "have it all together" because I'm the one responsible for figuring out what needs done and delegating tasks - not her.

If your wife ever has to ask you, "Honey, can you take out the trash and mow the lawn?" (or even worse - creates a "honey do list"), it's because she sees herself as the one responsible for the house and delegating tasks. How often do you give her a to-do list? In most marriages, that almost never comes from the guys. At best, it's usually, "Can you hand me the hammer?" If you're not telling her what to do, she's telling you. You decide which end of that you want to live on, and that sets the tone for who she sees as the leader in the relationship.

She's not your's it's just your turn

9 upvotes · 17 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

But ... but ... but ... that's what the Bible says. Of course, not necessarily the way RP means it, but this is a truly biblical concept. If you're both saved, you'll both be in heaven. There's no marriage in heaven to one another because we are the bride of Christ - and that is our identity for eternity.

Your wife is on loan to you. She's not yours for eternity. She's just yours for right now. She has been entrusted to you by God, just as the servants in the parables of the minas/talents were entrusted things by their master. And eventually, when the master returned, they had to return what was given to them to be his once more. You are a steward of what God has given you - and that includes your wife. Are you going to return her in the condition you found her, or are you going to lead her into being fruitful upon Christ's return?

Parallel aside, let me clarify what I think the MRPer's are trying to say. They don't mean that all women will cheat or divorce you, as your post suggests. They mean that there is no absolute guarantee that she won't do those things. Because that capacity exists, however remote, you can operate on one of two assumptions:

- Useful Assumption: She'll leave you for a better man if you're low-enough value and she gets the chance.
- Non-Useful Assumption: She'll stay faithful to you no matter what.

There are, of course, gradations in-between, but the further you get toward the latter, the more you'll put yourself at risk of proving the former.

Now, I'm speaking speciously right now. The latter assumption is not actually "non-useful." It has positive aspects about it, just as the "useful assumption" has negative qualities. The "useful assumption" can be a serious hindrance to pair-bonding and developing the type of intimacy that husbands and wives are meant to experience in order to model the intimate love between Christ and the Church (note: if you've read SGM, this is the E in DEVI). The "non-useful assumption" is actually useful in fostering this.

But like I said, there are gradations in-between, or even ways where you can fully embrace the useful assumption without compromising your ability to be authentic, vulnerable, and intimate with your spouse - all things that, to some degree, need to be implemented in order to become the oak. The primary draw-back of assuming your wife is yours and will never leave you is, of course, that it compromises your internal imperative to be a better man - if maintaining your marriage is a significant motivator to you. As to whether or not that should be a motivator to you - that's a different question that depends heavily on how you interpret 1 Cor. 7.

The point is: the benefits of following the useful assumption drastically outweigh the negatives, particularly when taken in the context of all other principles, and even more so outweigh any limited benefits of making the non-useful assumption. So, even if you know it's not true, sometimes it's worth telling yourself something anyway because of what it helps you become. It's like my son, who is 6 years old in 3 days and terrified of the dark - so he tells himself, "I'm brave; nothing will hurt me," to overcome his fears. Both of those claims are mildly false, of course. He's a little brave, but his bravery is outweighed by his fear. Something very well could end up hurting him. Like in Donnie Darko, a jet engine turbine could fall into his room with no warning. I can't promise that won't happen. But telling himself something that's technically not absolutely true, he's creating a psychological - even spiritual - condition for himself to become what he needs to be. There is value in this. So, even if "all women cheat" or "she's not yours, it's just your turn" isn't technically 100% accurate for every relationship that ever existed across time (except to the degree of my starting explanation of this comment), sometimes we just need to tell ourselves something to help us get to the right frame of mind.

This will be addressed in much greater detail in the "circles illustration" in 400-level content (if/when I ever get around to writing it), which emphasizes making the shift in our frame from finding our satisfaction from worldly things which fail us and into Christ, who will not. "She's not yours, it's just your turn" is a way of saying, "All things human will fail eventually - accept that as a reality of life" ... and when we accept that as a legitimate possibility - and from the perspective of eternity, an actual, genuine, biblical reality - only then can we truly stop relying on human conventions for our satisfaction and begin looking to Christ, who is the only source of eternal, unending life and fulfillment.

Lastly, I'd love to quote all of Micah 7:1-7, but suffice it to say that he's referencing a society where sin is generally rampant around. He's still talking to God's people - Israel, but he says to them, "Do not trust a neighbor; put no confidence in a friend. Even with the woman who lies in your embrace guard the words of your lips ... a man's enemies are the members of his own household."

Romans 3 comments that even back in Jesus' day, Paul describes their society the same way Micah 7 does when it says, "The faithful have been swept from the land; not one upright person remains. Everyone lies in wait to shed blood ..." and so on. As for the part above, even Jesus talks about how his coming would cause strife in the household (Luke 12:51-53). In other words, Jesus is saying what RP is saying, "Don't put your trust in people - not even your own family; learn to put it in me instead."

Tag: /u/XReverenceX and /u/Whitified - for some Scriptural umph to what you're saying.

[FR] Shit tests are for fun

9 upvotes · 12 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

What's more amazing is the fact that women say no all the time with no remorse, yet men still seem to think this is hard or wrong somehow when they try doing it themselves.

Delete Your Social

9 upvotes · 26 September 2017 · /r/TheRedPill

This goes along with the concept that women have retroactive emotions. How they feel about something in the present affects how they felt about something years ago.

My wife actually admitted this to me. She absolutely loved when we took the kids to Disney World 3 years ago. She had a blast and was glowing with how great the whole vacation was, seeing the kids' reactions, etc. Several months ago, she was frustrated by a lot of things in life. I tried to remind her that there are good days as well as the bad, and brought up how great the Disney trip was and how much our kids loved being there with her. Her response: "That was a horrible trip. It was too hot and muggy, we waited in line forever, the kids were whining and screaming the whole time. It just wasn't fun and I'd never do that again."

Well, that's a faaaaar cry from how she was feeling while actually there. What happened? She retroactively applied her present emotional state to her past experiences. What a horrible way to live.

Yet just this past weekend she was happy and having a great time. My sisters brought up the idea of going to Disney and she was once again beaming with how great of a time we had before and how excited she is to go again, and was even asking me if we could schedule to go next year.

Point is: however a woman feels at present affects how she feels about the past too. If you were a garbage beta, but can convince her in the present that you're someone new without directly telling her you've changed, she'll start to interpret your past behaviors in a new way. Truly idiotic beta moves you used to pull will now be viewed as heroic sacrifices that you made for her good. This is one of the bizzarrities of the female hamster, but it does work.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepillled to answer)

9 upvotes · 11 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

WHERE'S YOUR FOUNDATION?

Let's remember that the Bible is God's word. We don't try to justify what God says to what RP says. It's the other way around. So, if God says, "Gynocentrism is good and you must all be gynocentric," then so be it. We must obey. Of course, if God had said this, he would have wired men and women differently to a point where RP wouldn't exist in the first place. I just want to make clear which is your foundation: the Bible or RP praxeology. You can only pick one, and it sounds like from the way your question is worded that you're picking RP. Fortunately for you, although conflicts certainly abound, this is not one of them.

OWNERSHIP

Women were considered property. Their rights were typically derivative through the men who owned them. When a woman was left a widow, she was scorned in society unless/until she remarried. At the time, the term "widow" even became a derogatory term for any person who was marginalized or impoverished. This is why God had to make specific laws for their protection (Ex. 22:21-22; Deut. 14:29, 16:9-15, 24:17, 19-21, 27:19). These protective laws are not signs of gynocentrism; they are a safeguard against abuse.

The same was true of female children as for adults. Male children, however, were not "owned" as property. Jewish culture believed in an age of accountability. Prior to this age, a child must be completely subject to his parents and could not be held responsible for his own decisions. After that age he gradually became his own person. That said, even prior to the age of accountability, male children had more rights than most adult women, except in rare circumstances.

When the old testament uses the word "slave" you really have to look at the context. There were two primary types of slaves: (1) conquered people of foreign nations who worked for you, and (2) indentured servants.

- The first kind were not typically owned at an individual level. They were owned at a governmental level. It would be akin to Pharaoh owning all of the Israelites using them to build bricks for governmental buildings, etc.
- When an individual owned a slave, it was usually because the "slave" could not live independently. He would offer a life of labor in exchange for provision for life (a parallel to the church). Consider: God established the "year of jubilee" which involved freeing every slave. Yet slavery continued after this. Why? Because they were there voluntarily, not by force.

Lastly, it's important to note that "ownership" of a person did not mean the same thing as "ownership" of a hammer. Women were certainly viewed as lesser, but they were also loved and cherished so long as they remained faithful and dutiful. Modern feminism would have you believe that "women were property" = "women were treated like toilet paper to use and throw away." This is an idiotic position.

CONTEXT FOR CIRCUMCISION

The whole of the Bible is about God building a nation for himself; the Gospel is the key that makes this possible. His plan for this has always been discipleship. His physical nation was always meant to parallel his spiritual kingdom. Physical reproduction and child-rearing were to parallel spiritual reproduction and child rearing.

God's first command to Adam and Eve was: "Be fruitful and multiply; fill the earth." Jesus' final command before ascending was: "Make disciples of all nations," basically meaning, "Be spiritually fruitful and fill the earth with my disciples." Connect this with all the times Jesus talks about bearing fruit or the way he talks about "disciples" as people who have been "born again" (John 3, for example) and how the apostles took this pattern and called their disciples their "children" and referenced themselves as "fathers."

Interestingly, when humanity first started filling the earth God still wiped it away. Malachi 2:15 explains why: he didn't want any offspring; he wanted "godly offspring," and that verse says that this is the whole purpose of marriage.

- The entirety of the Bible is about filling the world with disciples - and the Gospel of Jesus is what makes that possible.

With that understanding firmly in place, you'll see now why throughout all of time sex has been considered the epitome of human existence. God designed the human body to enjoy physically reproductive acts more than any other type of physical pleasure in order to point us to the reality that in our marriage to Christ, spiritual reproduction (evangelism) and child-rearing (discipleship) is where we should find our greatest pleasure and ongoing joy.

WHY CIRCUMCISION?

The Basics

Given the whole of the biblical narrative, it makes sense that the covenant would have to do with sex. You seem to mistake God's intent in utilizing circumcision being "painful and might potentially have numerous negative consequences" as God's rationale. Bearing in mind the fact that it actually has far more positives than negatives, this misses the point of what God's trying to do.

Circumcision today is taken as a given in many parts of the world. So, a circumcised man does not look down at himself while having sex and think, "I'm weird - I'm different from the rest of the world." In ancient Israel, this is exactly what they would have thought. They knew they were unique among the nations. Every reproductive act would have been a reminder that they belonged to God - and that their reproduction was to be for God's purposes. Remember, God wanted "godly offspring" (Malachi 2:15), and circumcision was a reminder that their reproduction was to be consecrated to God for that purpose. Malachi was only verbalizing what the Israelites were meant to understand all along.

Circumcision, then, is a physical representation of what God does to a person's heart. It's easy to reference Romans, where Paul talks about this, but let's not forget that he's really quoting Moses (Deut. 10:16; 30:6) and Jeremiah (4:4; 9:25-26). The physical act of consecrating a man's reproductive function to God is meant to highlight the way we are meant to consecrate a spiritually reproductive lifestyle to God. Jesus then says in Matthew 7 that the fruit we bear (i.e. spiritual reproduction) is how we can discern who is in Christ.

RP Rant

This is the crying shame in finding people who are genuinely "low libido" and why having a sexually denying spouse is so detestable. It breaks down the very core of what God is trying to exemplify to and through the church on a spiritual level, telling them instead that reproduction is not important; we should be more focused on simply maintaining the internalized relationship between spouses instead.

Is it any wonder, then, that the church cares so little about training people up for evangelism and instead we focus exclusively on "how to have a better relationship with God," just as many women ignore sex, focusing only on "having a better relationship with her husband" not realizing that sex is the key to making that happen?

Also, when is the last time you've seen a church teach men or women how to improve their sexual technique? Compare: how often do you see churches teach men and women how to improve their spiritually reproductive (i.e. evangelism) techniques? And even if they do preach evangelism technique: how many actually make a lifestyle of it who don't already have a healthy physically reproductive lifestyle?

More of the "Why"s

Why something so private? - Because it is meant to be internalized as between God and each person. It creates a communal identity, but simultaneously emphasizes the personal nature of the commitment within that community.

Why a sexual part? - In addition to the reasons above, remember that most other religions were using sexual practices as a core religious rite. When one was circumcised and would attempt to engage in a religious sexual rite apart from God, that reminder was present and would be noticed by all and a direct condemnation to the man who ignored it in favor of such idolatry.

Why cutting off flesh? - The shedding of blood has long been associated with covenant-making in the old testament. Also, the foreskin literally covers up the most important part of the reproductive organ. Circumcision takes a man from a pseudo-hidden reproductive member to one where the tip is bold and prominent - and it does so by cutting off the flesh. Likewise, our spiritual reproduction should be bold and prominent within the spiritual body of Christ and this happens by cutting off the flesh (i.e. sinful nature).

Why not women? - Because Israelite society was a patriarchy, regardless of what your atheist friend may believe. The Bible shows that God typically sets up a chain of command: "I'll relate with you, you relate with them." This is discipleship. A clear early example is Exodus 4. Moses tries to defer to Aaron and God says, "No, I'm going to communicate to you; you to Aaron; and Aaron to the people. This happens in discipleship relationships all throughout Scripture.

We see this same setup occurring in a marriage context as well. In Genesis 2 God communicates with Adam, who then relayed to Eve. In 1 Cor. 11:3, "The head of every man is Christ, the head of a wife is her husband, and the head of Christ is God." We also see that God views sanctification (as opposed to salvation) on a familial level, where the faith of the husband/father is imputed over the home so that he wouldn't be considered "unclean" in his relationships. In essence, God works through the man, who then works through his family. This is also evident in 1 Cor. 14, where men are to engage in the church directly, but women are to learn and engage through their husbands (v. 35, specifically).

So, it makes sense that God's covenant would be with the man (circumcision), and the man would have a covenant with his wife (head coverings, per 1 Cor. 11).

Can RPChristians use real dread?

9 upvotes · 5 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

In moderation, lower and mid-levels of dread are perfectly appropriate. Upper levels (like actually cheating) are totally prohibited.

Healthy dread is really applying preselection to your marriage. Preselection is the concept that a woman perceives a man's SMV as higher when other women are attracted to him because she assumes that these other women know something about him that she doesn't. This is usually a way for women to vet a guy before ever meeting him. But in a marriage context, if a man has been changing it can cause his wife to think, "If those girls take notice, maybe there's something more to his changes than I've realized," and she will become more attracted to her husband as a result. If the man is not substantially changing, she will only think, "Hah! Those foolish girls. If only they knew what I know about him."

If you check my comment history and scroll through a few pages doing a search for "dread" you'll find a lot more on the subject.

hurt her so much that I would look at other women like that and think those things

Were you telling her you wanted to have sex with the singer? What were "those things" and how did she know you were thinking them? Otherwise, it's an unreasonable request to assume you'll never think another girl is attractive, so shut that down right away. That's not a dread issue, it's a frame issue.

followed me into my marriage

Yeah, I had that too. Hopefully you're past that now. If not, be open and honest and deal with it. Ask this community for help (read 201 and 202 first), but also find people in real life to help you with that.

according to Jesus it was lust and therefore adultery

Possibly. It depends on what you actually thought. "I thought was really hot" is not lust in a sinful sense. The word Jesus uses for "lust" is epithumeo (coveting), which is not moicheia (adultery). It's not lust until your heart is at the point where you would act on it if you had the opportunity. Again, check out 201/202.

bouncing one's eyes away from anything sensual that is not your wife ... made my wife hotter

This does work. I tried it for a bit. But it's also unrealistic. Sometimes I have a super hot client and I can't just never look at her. Other attorneys I practice with are like that. There are countless people you have to interact with. I know there are tricks to get around this, but you also don't want people to think you're totally awkward. That's going to stunt you in other areas.

Plus, I'm a major advocate for the notion that avoiding sin is not the same as conquering it. We should run from temptation, yes. But we should not let fear of temptation control us, or else we're still giving sin the power to be a slave-driver over us again. You run from temptation you can't resist, but plow through with perseverance that which you know you can conquer. That's how you get stronger.

how can that mindset be compatible with traditional, red pill dread?

You'll note that the first 6 levels of dread are all within your marriage only. Many people have commented on MRP that a healthy marriage should hover between levels 5 and 6 and you should only have to go higher if you've got an exceptionally difficult situation. Nothing in the first 6 levels contradicts the practices you're trying to apply.

All of that said, I agree with /u/shr3dthegnarbrah - dread isn't about her believing you want other women; it's about her believing that other women want you (again, a variant of post-wedding preselection).

Why do girls love pop singers with beta male blue-pilled lyrics like Shawn Mendes?

9 upvotes · 23 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

Let me add this:

You have to remember that these lyrics are usually sung by hot celebrity guys who are in peak physical shape and dominate the room wherever they go. Because of their celebrity status, they have all the confidence/alpha/physique that would ever be needed to fulfill most RP criteria, and their SMV is so high that they don't put up with crap - they find someone else.

Now, when the hot alpha guy who gives them the tingles is singing all this beta stuff ... that's like a double whammy. It's tingles and fuzzies at the same time in extreme measure.

To be clear: when girls listen to these songs, they're not getting pictures of the geeky orbiter in their head, as if the words were coming from the drooling classmate who stands out her window. She pictures them coming from the guy she has the hots for, combining the best of both worlds.

Critique my wife's ultimate shit test

9 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

MRP principles are supposed to foster attraction and increase your SMV. You are obviously having the opposite effect. From what she describes (if her perception can be trusted), you're too alpha. MMSLP talks about this.

/u/cholomite said it best:

Tingles without fuzzies won't last. Fuzzies without tingles are worthless.

You have built your entire relationship on tingles. This is the biggest issue I've seen since coming on MRP. Most people are from TRP where fuzzies don't matter at all, or they're beta guys who have already mastered fuzzies. As a result, most of the stuff that gets pushed here is the need to alpha-up. Your need is to beta-up, and you're not going to find many posts about that.

Learn to give her some fuzzies and she'll settle down. Go re-read (assuming you already got through it) MMSLP's chapter on good beta qualities and report back.

How do I get a life?

9 upvotes · 28 June 2017 · /r/askTRP

I'll ditty /u/chachaChad. As a former porn, video game, and food addict - those things only breed complacency. Give up your coping mechanisms and you'll have nowhere to turn but the real thing.

- You want a good life? Stop trying to live vicariously through a pixelated character by giving him a good/exciting life for you ... doesn't matter if it's RPG or FPS or sports games. Everyone condemns living vicariously through your children as a cheap way to happiness ... it's even cheaper when you're living vicariously through a fictional world - and also leads to a bigger crash when you realize the futility and total lack of long-term value in your life. Do I still play games every now and then? Yes, there's nothing wrong with it. In fact, I still play all kinds of stupid apps on my phone during mandatory pauses throughout the day (bathroom, waiting in line, etc.). But as /u/chachaChad says, you do that out of your excess, not to avoid responsibility. For now, you need to go cold turkey so that you control your gaming instead of letting it control you. Use those pauses to start reading content on the sidebar instead (my app-ing cut down by 90% when I discovered TRP/MRP and it's going to stay that way until I'm done with the side-bar) - not just the top posts, but the actual books. I just started. Join me.
- You want a good relationship? You didn't say you did, but I'm 99.9% sure you watch porn fairly regularly. It's fairly inevitable for guys with your MO. If you're placating yourself with fake relationships, you're never going to see an urgency to make something of a real relationship. Believe me, I did this in my marriage for far too long. I'm new to RP thinking myself, but just being a rational human being led me to these conclusions long before I made it to this sub. Guess what ... when I gave up on porn, I actually started wanting to have sex with my wife again. Weird, huh? I've still got a lot to learn, but it doesn't take much to realize that porn is probably the number one thing in your life placating your drive to have the life you want. "If things go back, I can always jack off to feel better about myself." That's a sure-fire way to beta-land.

- You want a high, but you're not happy with weed? That's because weed is a substitute. I mean this literally. Your brain has receptors for different types of chemicals. Weed puts chemicals in your brain (THC, namely) that mimics the substances those receptors are meant to bond with, causing the synapses to start firing as if the real thing were there. The problem is that it starts changing your brain chemistry to prefer the fake thing over the real thing. Your brain was designed for the real thing and the fake thing promotes complacency. Stop it.

See the pattern? Can't get the real thing, go fake this, fake that, fake over there, fake here. You're trying to live a fake life, get fake pleasure, feel fake emotions. I'm not going to pretend that the real thing is the answer you need, but for now it's the answer you want. When you get that and it's still not satisfying, then there's room to go deeper and find out what your life is really missing.

The one thing I'll note that's probably different from the advice you'll hear from other guys is this: stick it out with your parents for that two years.

Why?

- I'm in decent shape, and most people are still telling me I'm 2 years away from having the body necessary to make RP theory actually feasible in the context of a committed relationship (I'm married). So, it'll give you time to get in shape.
- It's going to take you a while to get through the side-bar. If you can't jump straight into the RP life anyway, you might as well give yourself time to learn and start practicing in small ways before diving in head-first and wasting a ton of money on an apartment, utilities, etc. in the process.
- Most importantly, (as alluded to in the last point) you know your life sucks right now and it's going to take a lot of money to jump-start you in the direction you want to go with your financial situation (i.e. saving for retirement, paying down debt, buying a decent house, car, etc.). Living with your parents gives you an opportunity to save what you otherwise would be paying for rent, which should ideally be set aside for a down-payment rather than blown on weed and booze. Let's say you would have gotten a crummy apartment for $500/mo in rent. Save that for 2 years and you've got $12,000 just from rent savings alone. Add in another $3k for utilities, food, and other misc. self-living expenses you'll be saving and you've got a nice $15,000 for a down payment. This goes up when you're not buying new video games as soon as they're released, a couple grand a year on pot, alcohol, etc. Maybe even only put $10k into a house and $5k on a car and you'll be in great financial shape, hugely boosting your confidence, and you might even have some excess if you cut those bad habits.

Now, you say your parents live in the middle of nowhere, so here are some suggestions:

- Find the nearest big-city and become a regular somewhere. Use this as a place to practice RP stuff while you're getting your finances in order. It's safe because you won't really know anyone there, and yet it sounds like you want to be back in a city eventually, so you'll be getting practice in a context in which you intend to live when you have your brand new "Grand Re-Opening Day."
- Don't want to drive that far? You've probably got a butt ton of woods around. Buy a gun and shoot squirrels and raccoons and stuff. I can't stand hunting, but I've never been a FPS gamer either. You like FPS, do the real thing rather than the fake thing (just don't shoot at actual people - stick to non-protected animals and make sure you follow the law with what you can/can't kill).
- Far from the city = lots of grass and streets to take up running/jogging/hiking. This kills two birds with one stone: exercise + hobby.

Saying "my parents live in the middle of nowhere" is the same as saying, "I'm incapable of making the best of a crappy situation." That's the same as saying, "I'm a pansy beta who can't take ownership of my life or figure out what I want to do." Stop making excuses. Just do it.

It's probably also worth mentioning: your life WILL NOT get fixed overnight. That's why I recommend you stay with your parents. If they want to give you a free ride for a little longer, take advantage of it until you're ready to have the "Grand Re-Opening" of your new life. But in the meantime that means you have to trudge through being a little bored, then learn to be okay with being bored. Placating yourself with weed, porn, and x-box is your way of saying, "I'm too weak to overcome boredom. I might as well give up."

Seriously. What would Jesus do.

8 upvotes · 27 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

STFU. It takes two to argue, dude. She doesn't respect you because you DEER like crazy and don't have a mission she's actually excited to be on.

My mission in life is please God.

What you do to please God is your mission. This is just a vague statement.

How I am going about that mission is by becoming the best version of myself.

Good - you took it the next step to something active. I respect that. But do you see how your mission is so introspective that she has no actual place in it? How will she be able to boast to God on the day of Judgment about what you two accomplished with your lives if all you accomplished is, "I got better at being me," and she says, "Yeah, all I did was help him be himself better."

All I really want to achieve in life is to know my fully and know God as much as he reveals to me.

Very low bar. Once you've read the Bible once, you will know what God has revealed to you about himself. You may not understand it all at once, but that's not even the point. The point is that God's going to judge you by what you've done. 2 Cor. 5:9-10 says that even the believer will be judged by what we've done: "so that each one may be recompensed for his deeds in the body, according to what he has done, whether good or bad." God's going to care a lot less about how much you know him than he will in what you did with that knowledge about him.

Consider the man with the talents. Matthew 25:24 shows that he knew and understood his master: "I knew that you are a hard man, harvesting where you have not sown and gathering where you have not scattered seed." Okay, so what did he DO with that knowledge? Verse 25: "so I was afraid, and I went and hid your talent in the ground. Here, you have what is yours." He did nothing with it.

Your mission, as worded, is to become this guy right now - to know God, but not a single speck of what you're planning on doing with that knowledge. Are you going to produce in others what God gave to you? Or are you going to keep what God gave you, hide it so you don't lose it, and hope that knowing your master and not losing what he gave you is enough. Because what happened to that guy in the end of the story?

I assume you should know better than this. But, again: as-worded, your mission is not a mission at all, or it's a worthless one at-best. Your mission is really more like a first checkpoint on the way to what your mission actually ought to be. Read Matthew 28:19-20 for more insight on what your mission should be, because Jesus gave you a mission.

Okay, with all that out of the way, I'm with /u/rocknrollchuck. You would be a FOOL to go to this party. Don't do it.

Right now, she's wearing the pants in the relationship. You say you're "definitely a leader amongst my peers," but you're clearly not in your own home. She has absolutely zero respect for you. That is the problem you need to fix first. Nothing you do will help until you start earning respect. That starts with becoming respectable.

This is the reason I opened my comment the way I did - because learning how to STFU, stop DEERing, and getting on board with a mission that actually matters to eternity are all great starting points for you to become a respectable Christ-follower.

Until then, what good can attending this thing actually accomplish?

Part of me feels like I should go because Jesus gives us grace especially when we do not deserve it.

Jesus actually told a parable of a wedding banquet in Matthew 22. A king invited a lot of people. They disrespected him and wouldn't come. Did the king have grace on them? Nope.

- "The king was enraged. He sent his army and destroyed those murderers and burned their city" (v. 7)

You're caught in this blue pill mainstream churchianity mindset that "Christians should be nice all the time, and anything we do that could possibly upset someone else - especially someone we are supposed to love - is automatically sin."

Horse crap.

You know what Jesus said when some guy wanted to say goodbye to his family before following? "No one who puts his hand to the plow and looks back is fit for the kingdom of God" (Luke 9:62). Do you think Jesus did the "nice" thing and waited for that guy so they could all go on their way together? Do you think he said, "Oh, I should love your family too and even go with you while you say goodbye"? No. The impression the story gives is that these people ended up not following him - or if they did, it's because they relented of their position.

Doing the "nice" thing here is not the "Jesus" thing in this situation.

You need to start doing with your life what Jesus wants you doing. Figure out how to make disciples. Join the discord here and get involved in conversation (i.e. voice chat). Share what you're learning. Tell us what relationships you're trying to develop with non-Christians or younger believers and we'll help build you up. We WANT to build you up. But right now you need to be torn down a bit because the way your life and marriage is built at this point is damaged enough that instead of a few minor tweaks, you need to start from the ground up.

Once you're doing something meaningful with your life and you've developed a solid frame (again, things we can help you with), you will be in a better place to re-engage with your wife. Until then, your primary job is just to keep the peace. This is best accomplished through STFU and avoiding DEERing. Minimal contact, if possible. Give us 30 days with you and we'll get you to the point where you can engage in a healthier way (any longer than that and your separation will seem too status-quo and make it harder to recover).

Abstinence till marriage (Advice/Discussion)

8 upvotes · 23 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Okay, you're way too emotionally invested in this. You do need a time-out.

Is it crazy that I actually want a kind of "controlling" husband and do the stereotypical "woman's place" stuff?

8 upvotes · 9 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Plot twist: OP never identified as a woman ;) Now re-read the post, haha.

How to vet for virgin woman quickly without wasting time?

8 upvotes · 20 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Some good advice on this thread, but this hasn't been hit on yet.

- I could ask a girl on a first date: "So, are you a virgin or are you slutty trash?" and have her begging to come home with me later that night, regardless of the actual answer.

The reason? I have the frame for it. You don't. You attempt that and people will think you're "a judgmental repulsive woman hating jerk for even asking." Put an attractive guy with a strong frame and high social charisma in front of her and she gets a completely different response: Oooh, this guy's making me horny because he's so bold to ask something like that. See how that works?

As /u/FrRustyShackleford said:

Keep reading the sidebar and learn social skills, like not asking right up front if a woman is a virgin.

This is key. You need to work on your frame, starting with social skills. Just because you find out she's not a virgin doesn't mean you can't find other value in maintaining an ongoing social interaction with someone - and you don't have to "break it off" right then and there like a moron, the timing of which certainly evokes you to write things like:

I learned it seems to offend a ton of women if not all, probably even virgins, because it's kind of a thing where they will think I'm a judgmental repulsive woman hating jerk for even asking that would "throw them out like trash, based off their sexual past that they were forgiven for and move on to the next girl and that I lack grace and understanding of it because I want a virgin," as one girl put it.

As /u/praexology would say - even if she's not someone you intend to marry, there's still value in engaging in male-female energy exchange (MFEE - I'll encourage the use of the term here), not to mention the social circles she might open up for you through all of her friends and connections that you'll be exposed to. The broader your social circle becomes, the easier it is to find what you're looking for.

The reality is that you seem to lack any serious social skills. Not only is your fitness completely out of whack, but if you don't even have the charm and charisma to compensate for it, you might as well give up before you even start. Unless you're a millionaire - then your beta provision might get you someone who will sell her virginity to you for a shot at collecting half of your millions a few years after your wedding.

Other than that, I endorse what /u/OsmiumZulu wrote. Short and to the point. Don't ignore good advice just because it's succinct.

Loving my wife like Christ loves the Church

8 upvotes · 17 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Stats: 30 years old, 6'0", 185, bench 100, squat 100

As /u/OsmiumZulu noted, this is where you've got to start, brother. If you're so fixated on making your wife happy all the time, don't you think she'd be happier with a more attractive/in-shape husband?

Yes, I'm picking on this one peripheral issue that you think isn't the point of your post because it shows the problem with your post: you're only focusing on the areas that are culturally acceptable to discuss openly.

Consider ...

That means if I meet all her needs

You don't think she needs a husband who's strong enough to open the pickle jar? Or protect her and the kids from threats? Or carry a bag of rocks from the car to the garden out back?

and expectations

Doesn't she expect you to be physically fit? If not, why does she expect so little of you? Do you really think it's healthy in your relationship for her to have such low expectations of your physical fitness?

If I'm the best husband for and to her

Imagine the first day you met her. Sitting next to you is an identical clone of you with all of your life experiences, memories, personality, etc. ... except he's extremely physically fit. Between you and this hypothetical clone, who do you think would be the better husband for her? The one she's more excited to be with? The one that makes her happy to see sitting on the couch waiting for her to cuddle up into his arms? And if that guy is the best husband for his wife, shouldn't loving her partially mean becoming more like that man?

Now, I'm saying this on your terms. But your entire way of thinking is completely in her frame. Do you really think it's best and most loving to do whatever makes someone else happy and meets all their expectations all the time?

- Would God be loving to humanity if he always met our expectations and did whatever we asked of him? He doesn't. Does that mean he's not loving?
- Would I be a loving father if I gave my kids candy and junk food every time they wanted it, never made them do any homework, and let them play video games and veg out on TV all the time - because these are what they perceives as their own needs and expectations and as what makes them happiest?
- Are you a loving husband if you try to give your wife everything she wants and make her happy all the time and you orient your entire life around her expectations?

Obviously not. Show me in the Bible where it says anything remotely along these lines. The Bible does compel husbands to love their wives. You've got great answers from /u/Deep_Strength and /u/RedPillWonder showing that "love" in the biblical sense isn't what you're describing here. Figure that out, THEN you'll be on the right path.

The reality is that Jesus doesn't sit around and pine over whether or not he's making us happy enough. He has purposes that go beyond us, the fulfillment of which has the passive byproduct of his grace and blessings toward us. I often ask people: Who did Jesus die for? Us or the Father? Scripture is clear: he died to glorify the Father and as an expression of his love and duty to the Father. Yes, we are third party benefactors of his death and resurrection. But it was the Father's love for us that sent his son to die; whereas it was the Son's love for the Father that compelled him to follow through with it. The Father sets the rules, but he gave the Son to be our example - to live as one of us that we might know how to live toward the Father.

Jesus does not love the Church the way you describe in this post. Let me emphasize this:

- You're confusing modern cultural relationship philosophies with biblical love.

Don't do that.

My story. Am I on the right track?

8 upvotes · 14 September 2020 · /r/RPChristians

none of my beliefs had come from a personal study of the Bible and that almost everything I believed involved me simply accepting another human's interpretation of scripture without checking it for myself

So you identified the problem. How long ago did you actually start trying to solve this issue?

hour of church before the preacher even opened the Bible. When he did read the scriptures, it was usually no more than 10-15 verses that seemed to be handpicked to support the sermon

Yeah, that's pretty much every mainstream congregation. It's partly why I don't even call them "churches" anymore. Instead of teaching God's Word, they're teaching their own philosophies and using God's Word to support it. Be cautious. The only way to safeguard against this is to know the Scriptures inside-out for yourself first. This is why I often don't even encourage people to attend a congregation until after they're already mature enough to start discipling people. I address this in my second "walk and talk" with /u/paexology on YouTube. It's posted on this sub somewhere, if you want to listen in.

I'm still not as consistent with my Bible reading as I should be, but I'm taking responsibility for my own faith now, and trying to become the man I need to be.

Great. Post in OYS and join the discord. It's a more interpersonal means of connecting with this community in a way designed to help people in your situation flourish.

You're on the right track. Keep it up. Just don't get enamored with ONEitis for this new congregation. Learn HOW to study Scripture first (see my 304 post on the sidebar) and then start working it out for yourself rather than assuming this congregation is going to give you all the answers just because they preach chapter by chapter rather than topic by topic.

As men, you need to do better

8 upvotes · 22 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm on the edge of my seat: did he get what he asked for?!?

RPC Podcast Episode 6: Fitness Tests (and a crucial announcement)

8 upvotes · 30 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

We do have a Voat site reserved, if needed. We are obviously not using it yet and have not migrated our content at this point.

Sparkling a Husband's Sexual Desire (RPCW)

8 upvotes · 23 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

The "RPCW" tag in the title means it was written for the women over there. I just know there are some women at RPC who haven't migrated there too yet. It's probably better to say nothing, but if you want to show it to your wife, that's your call, just exercise extreme caution in how you do so.

Instead of, "This is from a blog I read. Read it," it's better to go round-about: "Someone sent me this link and asked what I think of it, but I'm not a girl so I don't really think that's my place to say. What should I tell him?" That's generally much safer and distances you from the sub ... and yes, by saying this in the comments I've now screwed over every guy who already used that excuse to show this to his wife! - so use the actual RPCW version of the link that doesn't have this comment in it or you'll dox yourself to her.

So you're being honest, I'll be "that guy" - Dude, here's a link to an article. What do you think?

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPCWomen/comments/he0fcl/sparking_a_husbands_sexual_desire/

OYS - Where Progress is Made (06/10/20)

8 upvotes · 10 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

PHYSICAL

1. 6'0". 230lbs. 19% BF (higher than a couple months ago). Current lifts are unknown; immediately before corona lock-down I was doing BP: 275 x5, OHP: 175 x 5, SQ: 335 x5, DL: 335 x5, Row (dumbbells): 200 x5.

All lifting (including body weight) has stopped pending work on the playground I'm building for my kids. I'm usually too exhausted to do much more once I'm done for the day (11-12hr days on weekends; 2-4hr days on weekdays after I'm done with work and feeding the kids dinner). On the plus side, hauling lumber, torquing wrenches, squatting to drill stuff, etc. is taking the place of a lot of that.

It's also easier to diet when I'm so busy. I'm less inclined to snack at night while I'm so tired. I'm also working through lunch to get back to the playground project, then working on that through dinner. Unfortunately, this means eating a mid-sized dinner at around 10pm, which is never great to eat that late at night in the first place.

MENTAL/EMOTIONAL

Working on the audio series has been fun and engaging. Less thought has been going into content than I'd have hoped, and more toward the nuts and bolts of editing and uploading the videos.

I do still make time to hang out with my guy friends each week, which has been stimulating. I disciple one guy who comes over every Tuesday and we go on 7-8 mile walks while chatting about Scripture, sin issues, marriage, masculinity, and, of course, making disciples. Those conversations, and others like it, keep me on my toes with exploring how a godly man lives in light of the life circumstances that come up.

I did lose frame with my wife a few weeks back. Something was out of line and I took the cold shoulder approach so as not to deal with it, focusing on other things. While normally the behaviors were fine, this wasn't a case of, "I've got more important things to do than deal with a shrew," rather, it was more: "I'm mad at you, so I'm going to go do other things now." Huge difference. Glad that hasn't resurfaced in a while, nor has there been cause for it to.

My Tuesday guy came over yesterday and helped us put up the tube slide. He's a solid handyman - built an entire addition on his house by himself without plans. He commented on how impressed he was with what we were building and that we were able to do it together. "My wife and I get along great - no arguments ever except in one situation: when we work on stuff like this together. Do you guys have that problem?"

My wife answers, "We used to. John would never do things my way, and it used to make me so mad. Then at some point a few years ago I just realized: if I just stop and let him do what he's going to do, it always gets done and I'm always happy with the final result, so why am I fighting him on this?" That is what we call the wife entering her husband's frame.

SPIRITUAL

- AoS: 10. Never a problem here. The fruit God has given me is well recognized.
- QT: 4. I have not been spending much time with God. When I do, it's more focused than being present.
- BS: 6. Not as high as past months, but still present. The focus has been less on diving into a particular passage in solitude and more on meditating on applicable passages that come up or going in-depth on certain things with my brothers in Christ.
- SM: 2. I'm not in a season of prioritizing this. I intend to bring it back when the playground is done and I'm back to extended times of running/walking with my kids. In fact, I'm looking forward to having my son help me review verses during our running times, and my daughter when she finishes learning how to read (she's on the brink).

- Prayer: 3. Little to no effort here. I pray at meals and occasionally when a request becomes apparent. This goes in with QTs being low - I've set aside time with God for the moment.
- Evangelism: 7. I'm building new relationships with people in my neighborhood and advancing conversations with existing relationships.
- Fellowship: 10. My social game is on-point right now, especially in light of the corona situation. I recognize the support I have from fellow believers constantly and am encouraged to grow and doing the same for them.

My mission is ongoing and not faltered. That said, I've certainly back-slid in my efforts to stay in touch with my pastor, who I had intended to get to know better in order to get him on board with making disciplers too. Corona hasn't helped that process, though we were still texting occasionally for a while. I need to follow up. Gotta do that today.

If you are struggling with repetitive sin, especially if you're a coomer, you need to commit to scripture memory.

8 upvotes · 19 February 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Often-times people will find immediate freedom from an issue and be incredibly excited about it for weeks, believing they have discovered some secret that has eluded the masses for centuries. Most of the time, these same people regress, discovering that their miracle solution wasn't quite as miraculous as they thought.

Scripture memory certainly helps. I would even say it's essential in overcoming certain sins. But as /u/Cloudy_Pirate noted, it is not sufficient in itself if unaccompanied by other things. I have addressed addictive sin issues more thoroughly in the 400 series, giving a more solid theological foundation for addressing these than the more common "churchianity-approved" behavioral modification fixes.

That said, the post still adds value and I am grateful OP is encouraging others to memorize Scripture. As I noted in the 300 series, I believe it is one of the most under-appreciated of all the spiritual disciplines.

How would a turnaround for the church look like? Making it more RP than Feminist.

8 upvotes · 21 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

You can't convert a modern congregation to biblical principles because modern congregations aren't even a biblical structure in the first place. You'd have to close shop and start something completely new.

That said, you can start something new within an existing congregation. That's the best route.

[Serious Question] What is the proper way to treat a female these days?

8 upvotes · 30 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

u/fictitiousfishes once commented that 99% of God's will for our lives has already been told to us through scripture, so there's really no point getting hung up on praying constantly for some divine revelation of your purpose. If you're in a bizarre or unique situation, sure. But why do you think you're so special that God would give you special revelation for your life to tell you the same thing he's already said in the bible that you're not yet doing in the first place?

Start making disciples. Do the things you know God wants you doing first. Then if there's some other unique purpose to augment the underlying mission of disciple-making, let God tell you that in his own time. But if you aren't doing what he's already told you, why would you expect him to tell you more things?

It's like when my kids say, "I want to help. What can I do?" Clean your room. "I don't want to do that. What else can I do?" Clean your room. "I know, but how can I help you with this other thing you're doing?" You don't. Clean your room. When that's done, come back.

The goal for Christian husbands whose wives deny them should not be sex but their wife's repentance

8 upvotes · 30 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

So much gold in this. Well done! One thing that needs to stand out more than I expect people will give it credit for:

Yes, sin is offensive to God, but God is not hurt by any man's sin.

So much guilt, shame, self-condemnation, etc. could be overcome if people could just understand this. It's one of the driving principles behind the entire 400 series.

I mean, I hope 99% of guys here understand at a very basic level that frame means a guy isn't upset or hurt by the ways other people try to offend him or rile him up - and how much more when they do it without meaning to hurt him! And if we, as mere humans, can have that kind of frame and God is the epitome of frame, wouldn't it make sense that God is even more masterful in his ability to express these traits and therefore be authentically immune to our efforts to disappoint him - or even more so when we believe we have done so unintentionally?

Point being, anyone who believes they've somehow hurt, upset, or disappointed God through their behaviors is frustratingly arrogant to think they have that kind of power over God's emotional state.

Are there any good podcasts or YouTube series that you guys would recommend?

8 upvotes · 24 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The first two might hack you off but they are more criticisms of secular red pill than of what you're doing here.

We discussed those posts as a mod team. Anyone who has spent time here can see that they simply aren't familiar with our content, and that's okay. I see this on r/TrueChristian all the time - and I always openly invite people to dialogue with us when these situations come up.

The fact is, there's not a lot of good content for Christian men out there. If these guys are trying hard to put out biblical content, I applaud their efforts, even if we don't see eye to eye on everything. As always, be an Acts 17 Berean no matter whose content you're reading - even my own. But if Christ is preached - and I mean the real Christ, not the feminized version culture puts out - I rejoice.

[FR] Unstoppable Emotional Inertia

8 upvotes · 13 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

60 hours a week is only 4 weeks a year. She normally works 28. She also gets 8 weeks of PTO (8! ikr?) each year that I don't get (I get paid by what I bill, and soon will be a partner in my own firm). Between us, she has the easy end of the deal and she knows it.

I see you mention occasionally to various guys - including to me on some of my past posts: "she's trying to work AND has to deal with kids" as if all working moms are playing the single mother, but adding a job as well. Our situation is the reverse: I play single dad, but with a full time job.

She knows it too. One of the places where I dropped the ball was over the weekend. She was working. I was scheduled to be in the office all day to prep for that second trial. She couldn't handle it, so I resolved to stay home with the kids all day and just work from 8pm when they go to bed until 4am, then get up at 8 and repeat.

She comes out of our home office for the first time at 6pm with her jaw dropped and says, "I think you missed your calling."

I said, "At being a stay at home dad?"

She got furious and stormed right back into the office without a word. After the kids were down she explained that the comment upset her because: "I feel like I'm just a paycheck right now - and a pointless one at that. You're the dream dad. You're better with the kids than I am, better at keeping up with the house than I am, better at maintaining the calendar and connecting with friends and meeting the neighbors and even at making money, which is the one thing I do really well. You're better than me at everything and I just feel useless."

I replied: "Yeah, you married a stud, but everything I do would fall apart if I didn't have someone helping me do it. It's not a competition over who's better. We're on the same team. Michael Jordan was like a one man team, but if he was actually just one man, he'd lose every game. You're the forward who passes the ball and I'm the point guard who scores the baskets and gets crowned MVP. Do you want to fight to be MVP against me or win the game?"

She said she wanted to win and felt a lot better to know it's a team effort.

For some, your framework makes sense. But the red pill man bears a heavier brunt of the load and we shouldn't passively assume his wife handles everything for the kids and the house and all he does is work. That's likely true of most blue pill marriages, though, as the husband hasn't taken ownership of his house and kids yet.

Who Are You?

8 upvotes · 3 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good question, brother. It reminds me of the time my mom pressured me in college about studying more. I kept talking about my spiritual endeavors rather than my academic ones. She said, "Just don't neglect your studies; that's why you're at college in the first place."

I replied: "Mom, even if I flunk out and became homeless, the other homeless people will still need Jesus."

You see, even long before my red pill awakening, I had some base awareness of the mission-focused imperative of the Christian life. Even with a wife and kids, I'm perfectly fine having everything stripped away - because my identity is not in any of that stuff in the first place.

What is my identity? I'm a child of God, bride of Christ, and apostle of the Spirit. These will never change, no matter the context.

Rethinking about MGTOW as a Christian

8 upvotes · 26 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm an attorney in those very courts as well. Bear in mind that nobody in the courtroom knows what actually happened, much less the stenographer or translators. Simply put:

- I see many cases where actual abuse has occurred.
- I have seen many cases where the woman is making it up. The most obvious one is when she admitted to 7 witnesses shortly before trial: "None of that actually happened. My attorney just told me I had to say that in order to win custody of my kids."

The stenographer didn't actually witness the man doing these things. He didn't jump over the table to attack his wife (though yes, I have seen that happen too). What she means is: she heard a case and believed the wife over the man. Notice you're talking to a woman. Who's she more likely to believe? Innate bias gets in the way here.

More to the point, there's no absolute proof of anything. Most of "science" and "statistics" on the subject are based on asking people questions and hoping they give honest and impartial answers. But if a woman feels like she was abused by her husband without him actually hitting - how will she answer that question?

I've had numerous of my own clients tell me they are domestic violence victims and that they have suffered physical trauma due to their husband's abuse. Then later they tell me he never laid a hand on them. How can they reconcile this? "I felt like I was being physically abused." or "He was so mentally abusive that it made me sick to my stomach and had a physical impact on me." This is not physical abuse.

But because this is all question and answer and the answers are subjective to the feelings of the women answering the questions, there is no science that will give you a clear answer.

But if you check my ancient post history (I'm too lazy to dig it up), you'll find that men are actually victims of domestic violence more often than women are. They just don't report it. Men are actually likely to suffer physical harm at the hands of a woman than a woman is at the hands of a man. They just don't report it.

The only place where men do beat out women on the domestic violence scale is in the seriousness of the physical harm. The instances that involve "serious bodily injury" (which usually means overnight hospitalization) are statistically higher for men against women than women against men. But the instances of cuts, bruises, being hit with a baseball bat, etc. are higher for women against men.

But there's a deeper underlying problem to your philosophy here. You're allowing culture to dictate your views on gender and sexuality. DON'T DO THAT.

Let the Bible inform your view. If you're going to be a "MGTOW as a Christian," as your post identifies, look to Scripture. Let 1 Cor. 7 and Matthew 19 inform your position rather than cultural statistics.

The more I think about it, the more genius that God's creation of man and woman becomes

8 upvotes · 12 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Someone's finally starting to understand the theological framework of most of my writings ;)

Well done, brother. And this extends not only through the Christ/Church marriage, but also the Father and his children parallel as well.

Audio: Matt & Lauren Chandler

8 upvotes · 29 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I was going to remove this for being a low effort post, but I think it's worth keeping up just so people read your reply here.

Need Opinions from Married RPs: Is My Wife Gaslighting Me?

8 upvotes · 23 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I told her I loved her and I would seek counseling for the behavior and be try to be conscious of it

You beta up and ...

Since then she has been pushing me away

She becomes disinterested and unattracted. Not surprising at all.

My wife lists some things I did, then they ask me or tell me what I could have done differently, I agree, come up with suggestion on doing things differently

More beta, beta, beta.

All of that seems normal conflict resolution

Which is why the norm is to get divorced. Because normal conflict resolution is BAD conflict resolution.

"marriage isn't about keeping score"

Have you read MMSLP? He talks about the prisoner's dilemma game that gets played in marriages. Yes, it's absolutely about keeping score. Notice the one who advantages by hiding the score is the one who always says it's not about keeping score. You get ahead and suddenly she's going to lash back with all your faults and score-keeping is right back on.

"you need to chase after her"

Have you read 109 - Pursuit, Seduce, Initiate or the Orientation of the Pursuit section of this sidebar post?

"you need to be the strong one"

I love this double-standard. Men are described by their physical strength. Women are known for their emotional insightfulness. Ask any women who is more attuned to their emotions and better with comprehending emotional issues? Most women will unanimously shout out: "WOMEN!" But when it comes to emotional issues, it's right back to, "Well, you men should be better at handling that than us." They want all the glory of claiming to be more emotionally inclined with none of the responsibility.

But yes, you are to be the emotionally stronger one. You're acting like a pussy with the way you're dealing with this emotionally. Oh well. Regardless, being "emotionally strong" doesn't mean you tolerate anything and everything she does to you. It means you stand up to her and have the emotional fortitude to withstand the way she lashes out at you. That's what emotional strength means.

and never get an apology or some kind of indication she wants to change the behavior

You get all butthurt because she didn't say she's sorry? Saying sorry is something I make my kids do because they're children. But I do it for the sake of the humility of the one who needs to say it, not the emotional fragility of the one who hears it. No kid actually cares when someone says sorry. They think "sorry" is a joke and a cop-out to avoid punishment - and it is. I actually don't do this with my kids anymore because it's childish and nobody functions that way in the real world - and I say this as someone who works in the legal system where people are actually screwing up in ways that matter all the time. Forget about ever hearing, "I'm sorry." It's a worthless phrase.

As for getting indication of her efforts to change, that's a legitimate request. The problem is that you're chasing her so hard that there's no imperative for her to change. The Cardinal Rule of Relationships says that the one who needs the other the least is the one with all the power. Right now you're communicating to her that you need her desperately and you'll do anything to keep her at your side. She doesn't give any indication of needing you. Result? She holds all the power and everyone sides with her.

You back off and create a hard stance. Yes, she may leave you. But you have to decide if it's better for her to go in order for you to get your life and a shred of dignity back or if you're going to keep pussyfooting around her every whim to avoid dealing with your abandonment issues.

Every time we talk to resolve conflicts we can never get to a point where we both come up with things to do to improve

Because talking doesn't solve problems. Doing does. You're too indoctrinated into the modern psychological model that talking and reaching an understanding and all that garbage is the answer to everyone's problems. That's why the second rule we teach after lifting is STFU. Yes, there needs to be a sidebar post on this. Talk less. Do more.

When you're doing to the point that you're insanely attractive compared to any other guy she could get, the dynamic will shift. But right now she's trained by society to believe she could get another comparable or better guy at the drop of a hat. At 8 months into the marriage, she's not very invested, so it's not a big deal for her to leave - and it certainly sounds like spiritual maturity is high, so I wouldn't bank on that being what keeps her around.

but I certainly do not bear 100% of the blame

Sure, but blaming her does you no good. You can't control her. Your pastor can't control her. Your counselor can't control her. Heck, half the time she's so hyped up on hormones that she can't even control herself, and even when she can control herself, she's not self-aware enough to know what she wants that she'd control about herself in the first place. So, you do you. Act as if you are 100% to blame and go fix it - not the way she wants you to, but to get the life that you want. If she follows, she follows. If not, you can't control that.

It has gotten to the point now where she and the mentors have basically implied I'm the problem, and I need to make all the changes, and if she's unresponsive and doesn't feel like participating in the relationship on some days then that's somehow my fault too and I should just be grateful she hasn't divorced me already.

Yeah, because you've already been screwing up and if she were a more worldly woman she probably would have divorced you already. Be a man. Not the one she says she wants, but the one her vagina actually wants.

at this point I think I'm being gaslighted

No, you're just subjecting yourself to blue pill authorities as your mentors and guides. The blue pill ruins lives. It is strong and they will not change their teaching. Get out from garbage mentors and figure out from Scripture how to be a man.

I wanted some MarriedRP opinions

Married 11 years. I went through everything you mentioned in your post and more. I found the RP and the dynamic changed, exactly as everyone here predicted.

Do you agree, or do you think I should stay in the marriage and accept more responsibility for the state it is in?

Remarriage after divorce is sin. So, let that be your guidepost if you're contemplating divorce. Are you okay remaining perpetually single? Go for the legal divorce and honor the spiritual marriage that remains afterward. You want to make things better? Man up. Become attractive (again?). Let her tail you around or walk away. You've got more important things to worry about in life than whether or not your wife leaves you. And if you believe otherwise, then you have a crappy perspective on life priorities and your role in God's Kingdom.

Older female Virgin

8 upvotes · 15 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

You've already got plenty of the validation you came here to get, so I'll not refrain that bit. Let me simply say that it's okay to be validation-seeking. This is a very feminine trait and it's natural for women to seek validation. When we push men away from validation-seeking it's because they're men and the expectations on them in this regard are very different.

Another thing worth noting: while I advise men not to seek relationships with women (they should focus on their mission), my advice toward women is extremely different: your focus should be seeking a man, not your own mission. "But God gave me a life purpose to blah blah blah," sure. Even if you filled in "make disciples," as I've met many single women who would - that still doesn't impress me as a mission to put over finding a man. Why? Because God created women to be a helper alongside their man. Christ sought God, men seek Christ, women seek men. This is the order of things in 1 Cor. 11:3. So, while I would likely give a guy a hard time for making a post about wanting to find a wife (as I often do), as a woman this is a perfectly appropriate thing for you to be concerned with.

But here's the deal: you could get married tomorrow if you wanted. That's the reality of being a woman in today's world. But you don't get married tomorrow because you have standards over which guys you'll marry. You want a high quality man, not a loser living on the streets. Somewhere in the mix, you're going to come head-to-head with the fact that what you have to offer is fading, while what you expect is staying stagnant.

The cold reality is, as most of RP talks about, that women hit "the wall" at around age 28 - this magical age when a woman's looks have been at a plateau for some time and are about to start dropping down-hill. Guys base most of their initial impressions of a woman on her looks, so this is significant in finding a spouse. Women get about a decade (18-28) when their looks are at a life peak. However, very few women are emotionally or mentally ready to get married during the first several of those years, leaving them a peak marriageable time between ages 22-28 before things get difficult. If you want to date for 2 years beforehand, you should start a relationship between ages 20-26 with the guy you'll eventually marry (preferably sooner). You're beyond this, which means you're going to be fighting up-hill on the dating market.

That doesn't mean things are hopeless. "The wall" isn't a cliff that you drop off of when you hit the other side. It's more of a hill. You went up hill. You walked along the summit for a while. Then it's a gradual journey back down the mountain. You're not jumping off the edge, so you still have time to look.

Here's the thing, though: you acknowledged, that you were overweight during some of your peak years. This means that you may not have actually hit your life summit yet. You've missed the chance to optimize your life-potential, but your present-potential might still be higher than your pre-wall years - and that can really work in your favor. So, if maximum primping could have gotten you to a 9 at age 23, after age 28 maybe your max is now an 8. If you were a 5 or 6 during your early 20s, there's still room for improvement and to open up a sector of the marketplace that was previously closed to you. Most guys would beg to be with an 8 and virtually all guys would be happy to marry a 7. You just have to put in more work to get there than the younger crowd will - not just because a slowing metabolism makes you literally have to work harder, but because you have to take advantage of the features you can control to a degree that makes up for the ones you can't (facial development, elasticity, perkiness, etc.). You can't rely on natural looks alone, you've got to accentuate - and be willing to keep this up through marriage if you don't want your guy feeling tricked or deceived. I will note: I believe that in the absence of deformities any girl can become and remain at least a 7 through age 35.

Now, all of that is more just to catch a guy's first interest. We all say you shouldn't judge a book by its cover, but the fact is that 99% of people will judge a book by its cover anyway. So, do you want to follow the advice of what you philosophically believe should attract a person or the advice of what actually will attract a person? That initial hook matters. I've spent literally dozens of hours working on a singular hook for some of my larger writing projects in the past. Why? Because the hook matters more than the substance of the story. You can write the best book the universe has ever known, but if you don't have a good hook no one will ever read it or care to discover what they're missing. And here's the thing: they won't care, but you will. A high horse attitude about it doesn't change the fact that you're the only one left in the cold.

After the initial hook, this is where you can really shine. You're late enough in life that by now you should have a reasonable direction in a career, which means you should have a financial incentive for a man to stick with you. Even if he wants you to be a housewife, knowing that you could go back to work if the situation called for it is a huge bonus. It also means he's going to be less afraid of divorce rape because you have an earning capacity, alleviating some concern toward marriage. It also means that you should be close to debt-free and won't come with the baggage that many other women will have. Being a "strong, independent woman" type is certainly going to push guys away, but if you frame yourself as a woman who has been trying to store up wealth to enjoy with her husband when she meets the right man - well, now you've just become a good bit more appealing as a long-term relationship candidate. Attitude is everything here.

/u/TheChristianAlpha already linked to the post that I would have, so reference that again - but try to find the qualities that give you an advantage over younger girls and really play those up. At the end of the day, if you want to pursue marriage with a man, if you can't offer the prospect of increasing beauty post-wall, maximize your present beauty first, then wear on your sleeve all the other things that you have to offer a relationship. Don't hide the draw-backs, as you want to maintain honesty and integrity in the process; but certainly let them know you're bringing something to the table even beyond your looks. At the age of the guys you'll likely be dating, they will most likely be able to get looks from a number of girls. And that's going to be one of their primary criteria, so you certainly have to have those too - but what you have to offer beyond that is what will make you stand out from the crowd in a post-wall dating market.

From there, your virginity is one of those things that absolutely makes you stand out from the crowd. There have been countless posts in the last couple years on this sub about whether or not Christian virgin women even exist after the age of 25. And there's always an assumption that if they do exist, it's because something's wrong with them. Be the woman who has overcome whatever was holding you back so that you have both a clean slate and virginity to offer. For a mature Christian guy looking for a girl in a narrow age-range (i.e. instead of looking 10-15 years below, he's looking 2-7 years below), virginity can be a huge asset that makes you stand out from the crowd.

But remember: the odds are always working against you. Say 15% of self-identified Christian men in the world are actually mature believers (I'm being unbearably generous; it's probably really less than 2). Suppose 25% of them are still single and 80% don't have kids yet. Now suppose (being generous) 50% of them are acceptable to you from basic appearances. Now suppose 10% of them are still virgins. And let's pretend that 25% of them are generally a good relational/personality type fit with you. That means if you're not set on virginity, about 0.375% of men are marriageable. In a church of 1,000, there would be 3-4 guys who might fit this criteria. If you did want a virgin, the church of 1,000 might not have anyone to offer, but the church of 10,000 would have 3-4 guys. The only other place to compromise that would seriously boost your odds is in spiritual maturity. Are you okay with marrying a guy whose faithfulness is limited to attending Sunday service, maybe leading a Bible study, and praying over meals? Or do you want a guy who is actually going to make a difference for God's Kingdom?

Remember, someday your husband will be judged before God and you'll be standing next to him saying, "I helped him do it." More important than who you want to help is what you want to help do. Most women think, "Well, I just want to be with this guy because we love each other. We can figure out all the Christian stuff later. I can coax him to church enough times until he gets it." Which would play out great if the Bible ordained women to be leaders in relationships and congregations actually "got it" in the first place. But I wouldn't bank on this philosophy of dating. I know too many women who have a passion for advancing God's Kingdom yet who are stifled because they married a man who couldn't care less or is perpetually stagnant in a safe, comfortable place in his faith.

But now I'm rambling, so on to your questions:

Is it more of a red flag to be a virgin at my age than not be a virgin?

Not among mature Christian men. This is an asset you should take advantage of when putting yourself out on the marketplace.

How should I discuss my standards as far as waiting for sex?

Date 2 or 3. Be clear.

"I have never had casual sex"

Don't sell yourself short. You're catering your appeal to spiritually immature men. If that's what you bait, that's what you'll get.

Recent Christian, about to just give up on women.

8 upvotes · 2 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm extremely low on time, so let me just hit this one point:

I've asked god to bring me a good wife

The responses so far are, essentially, "be patient." Sorry to those other responders, but this is garbage advice. There's extremely little premise in Scripture for the view that God is just going to make a wife magically appear on your doorstep saying, "Here I am. Propose now and we can be happily ever after!"

I don't see any reference in your post to having read the sidebar. Check Rule 2, as that's really vital to our ability to help you. There are plenty of posts on here that address what you're going through.

it just makes not want to ever bother with women again

This is the anger stage. You have expectations of women. They're not met. You're mad because you can't find a woman who isn't a woman. Does that mean you just give up on women altogether? That's definitely one conclusion - and one I often recommend.

But at the same time, my kids can be awful brats a lot of the time. They don't love me for me. They love me because I do fun things with them, or because I buy them candy, or let them play on my lap. I've asked them directly before: "Why do you love me?" None of them responded "Because you're my dad and I value you as a person." Know what they said? "Because you give me things. Because you buy us good food. Because you have candy."

I knew kids would be like that too. I guess I should just tell people to give up on kids because they are stressful and won't love you for you. Right?

No. Because we still like having people around, even if they aren't everything we hoped and dreamed they would be. Even guys who "get it" are still going to want to get married. It makes no logical sense, but it's a reality of life.

They know the true nature of women, yet are after them anyway. Sigh. Accept it or don't. But there's no point getting mad about it.

A tree is a tree.

A kid is a kid.

A woman is a woman.

I don't expect my kids to be adult philosophers. I don't expect my wife to love me like I love her. But I can enjoy their company all the same.

The world we live in

8 upvotes · 10 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

miss out on having children and sex

I understand ... and this is perhaps the hardest line to help people cross when moving from blue to red. They (you?) still have these fantasies in their heads about wanting things that culture has told them to want.

When did Jesus and his purposes for your life stop being enough? Or maybe you never tasted them as enough in the first place - I really don't know.

Children, sex, companionship - these are all things that are good if they happen, but they should never be your life goal. And if you have a higher life goal, they become a distraction, as Paul mentions in 1 Cor. 7, which is his primary Spirit-inspired reason for urging people to remain single. And yet cultural norms toward marriage/family life seems to hold more influence in people's lives than the Holy Spirit these days.

If you insist on getting married, limit it to a spiritual marriage and not a legal one. This is the best way to mitigate the risks. The legal risks are certainly still there in a variety of ways, but at least you're giving it your best shot. A "relationship contract" could also help, of course. You couldn't call it a prenup because you'd never have nuptials in the first place. But I'll let your lawyer figure that out.

Care to talk about any individual instances or theories you have about AWALT?

I've shared my story here a number of times, but I'm a shining example of this. I don't mean to imply that my views are tainted by my own story - I assumed I was the exception to the rule for a very long time and was only sufficiently persuaded otherwise after hearing countless similar stories.

When I was dating my wife, she seemed a solid believer. She knew a lot more about the Bible than 95% of the other women I'd met. She disciplined other women. She faithfully attended Christian meetings and Bible studies and even led women Bible studies of her own. Other women looked up to her and wanted to be like her.

While we were dating she would talk about our shared passion for making disciples. I was on staff with the Navigators at the time, a ministry organization focused on disciple-making. We discussed what things might be like if she joined staff with me, which was a real option at the time. She would tell me of her daily quiet times. We'd pray together. She'd talk about the women in her life who she was trying to share Christ with. My discipler, who had led her in ministry team meetings for 3 years and knew her well, said that she was a rare find and that if he wasn't already accounted for, he might have pursued her himself. As far as "mature Christian women" go, every outward sign from the 5 years I knew her before I proposed pointed to her being an actual unicorn.

Oh - and the physical passion. I made it clear to her up-front that once we were married, I expected sex to be a frequent and passionate thing. She responded, "Don't worry. When we're married, I'll be jumping all over you!"

She talked about trying various positions. Oral. Toys. Bondage. You name it (except for anal - never been an interest of mine). Like I said: unicorn.

Sounds great, right?

A couple years into marriage and I notice she's not living up to any one bit of all these things she always talked about - either spiritually or sexually. I confront her about it and she makes excuses. She's not even living even remotely close to what she was like when we were both single - before we were even dating. It's like everything went out the window and she was a totally different person. We had that conversation many times: "What happened?"

After years, she finally fessed up: "All that 'make disciples' stuff - it was all a lie. I had been faking it for years to try to trick someone like you into marrying me. Part of me wanted to believe it all, but it's just not me." The same thing came out at about year 7 of our marriage regarding sex: "I'm just not attracted to you. I never was. Even when we were dating I wasn't attracted to you. I just said that stuff about sex because I knew you wouldn't marry me if I didn't say that and act that way." I remember one point around the same time when she was even in tears over how our marriage had been falling apart, saying, "I look back at our pictures from when we were dating and first married and you were incredibly attractive - I don't know why I didn't see it then, or why I didn't care. I ruined everything by faking the foundation of our marriage and nothing we have is real."

She has also had times throughout our marriage - especially early on - when men have hit on her and she openly acknowledged that she was more romantically interested in them than in me at the time.

Those revelations were devastating to me. Here, I had prayed literally over 200 hours in anticipation of asking this girl out and vetted what I believed to be better than any man had ever vetted a woman in the history of vetting. As Paul bragged of his pre-Christ accomplishments as being "a Hebrew of Hebrews" and lists his other accomplishments - I could brag the same way of my vetting prowess. And yet AWA still LT.

It doesn't make me mad or upset anymore. I just shrug, chuckle inside my head and think, Yep, AWA truly LT.

For the record - that's not how things are now. While I didn't go into as much detail about some of this stuff, I did write a lot about the turn-around in my marriage after discovering RP in this thread, where I share my testimony and "RP-imony". I'll let that post finish the story for you.

Women Feeling Threatened by Hyper-Sexualized Social Media

8 upvotes · 30 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

We cater to biblical truth, not the feminine imperative. Just because we allow women and want to raise them up in godliness doesn't mean we're catering to their cultural interests. Teaching godliness to a woman is inherently against the feminine imperative, which seeks to trample over what God has said.

Open Letter to a Christian Incel

8 upvotes · 28 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

How does a Christian guy interact with women?

As people who can help you fulfill your mission.

I'm in a tough spot here, do we go out and interact with women in general (ie day or night game). Or do we sit back and only try and date in the Church with the hope of marriage?

This is still coming from a blue pill mentality. You have a desire to meet a wonderful girl and get married and have kids with a nice house and cozy Christmas mornings in front of a tree.

The red pill isn't about giving you strategies to meet your blue pill fantasies. You have to kill those fantasies. If they happen, great. But you can't be blue, sprinkle some red on your life, and hope that works.

To that end, the whole "hope of marriage" and the insistence on pursuing "day or night game" or "try and date in the Church" stuff just makes no sense. Why would you TRY to do that in the first place? The only rational conclusion is that you are still clinging to some ideal of marriage as a primary pursuit in your life. This comes from culture, my friend, not the Bible.

My question is how do Christian men interact in the dating market?

By not interacting in the dating market. Dating is woman-focused. You go to a restaurant, all your attention is on her. You go to a movie, it's just the two of you. You play putt-putt, everyone else gets ignored. Traditional dating exists to spur on romantic feels. The secular RP world, which only pursues sexuality, has concluded that the best thing to do is to fuel those feels to get sex. It's an effective strategy.

But if you have a priority of waiting until marriage to have sex, the focus entirely changes. Female emotions are fickle, so the emotional investment you get from her on the first date won't remain two weeks later, much less two years later - or however long before you're married. Result? Every time you date a woman without the intent of having sex at the end of the night, you're fueling her feels without getting anything in return. So, while this works great for the secular world, who does intend to bang her before the night is out, dating is quite different for the Christian because you can't cash-in on those feels you're fostering, making dating almost exclusively a form of female-worship.

Now, some guys will say that they just enjoy the company of women too - that they get feels from it also, and therefore it's worth it. Go for it. You do you. Just be cautious that 99% of the time those guys aren't getting the feels because they genuinely enjoy her company (though they certainly think that's what it is). They get their feels because they enjoy the validation of knowing that an attractive woman enjoys their company. This validation-seeking is extremely counter-productive and will ultimately kill her attraction to you in time.

Lastly, some men will go into the dating world thinking, "I want to have sex eventually, which means I have to get married, which means I have to date around to find a wife." This is their big excuse for saying that it's perfectly appropriate for Christian men to actively seek dating relationships.

I'm not buying it. First, it falsely assumes that sexuality in marriage will live up to your expectations. You cannot be outcome independent in this type of a situation. What if the girl you marry decides that, no matter how much red you sprinkle into your life, she's just not interested in sex? Sure, it's sinful rebellion. But it happens. You can't control that. And now you've either just committed your life to someone who will be a constant disappointment to the reason you married her in the first place, or she's going to end up leaving with half your stuff.

Second, most men who make this claim haven't even started making their first disciple yet. They haven't won anyone to Jesus, and they're not individually discipling any new believers into spiritual maturity. So, if you're pursuing dating before you're pursuing the great commission, what does that say about your true priorities?

Third, even if men do have their priorities in order, by making an intentional pursuit of dating a second, third, fourth, or whatever priority - as long as it remains an intentional pursuit, you are making it hard for a woman to follow you. If you are chasing after her, she can't be following behind you. The only way that works is when you look like a dog spinning in circles chasing its own tail. That's lunacy.

Fourth, the goal of "I want to have sex someday" inherently assumes that sexuality has some power over you, rather than you being master over it. Deny yourself and take up your cross. Don't tell God, "I'll follow you, but only if I get to have sex someday too." If you're doing what God wants you doing, and God wants you to have sex, then you're going to end up married. That's why I say in my posts that even if a man specifically avoids looking for a wife, as long as he remains dutiful to God by being a godly man who cares for his body, leads God's people well, efficiently runs his home, etc. - 99.9% of these guys are going to end up getting married anyway, even without looking. Why? Because so many girls are going to want them that they're going to end up in a compromising situation where they eventually say, "We're going to need to get married before we go any further."

These guys aren't trying to find a wife. Potential wives are trying to find them - and they will chase such a man to the ends of the earth if they have to. And these women find out about those men because those men are making disciples through a vision that includes the need for women to help him. The more he invites along, the more women are exposed to him, the more are attracted and will try to tempt him, which is when marriage becomes a viable option.

This is all on the sidebar too: How to Find the Girl You Can't Keep Yourself From Banging.

How do/will you raise your kids?

8 upvotes · 26 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

There's a lot to be said about parenting. But to stick to the limited issue of electronics, I agree with the other guy that most people have grand ideas that rarely last when they actually have kids.

I'm less interested in bubbling away my kids from cultural norms and more interested in teaching them how to live balanced and disciplined lives within culture. A main goal of parenting is to teach your kids to be able to thrive on their own when you're not around. They need to taste life in the real world to do that. The bubble method is extremely counterproductive to this goal.

[FR] The importance of the basics

8 upvotes · 16 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I was close - got down to 14% body fat, everything else covered. I bench 290 at my most recent ORM test. I earn 6 figures. I disciple guys regularly. I wear nice cologne everyday. I stay well groomed. My lounge wear around the house could use some improvement, but I'm in professional and business casual attire most of the time my wife is around anyway. I wouldn't suggest this if I wasn't willing to live it myself.

What I will note is that there are still times when my wife will turn me down. It's rare anymore, but it does happen. I could muse for hours about what the possible reasons might be, getting wrapped up in the psychology of her frame ... or I could rule out my body fat % as a contributing factor and try again. If the problem goes away, I saved myself all the trouble of mental masturbation over the issue. If it doesn't, at least I've ruled out a possible cause and am in better shape for it, making it easier to get past whatever the actual cause might be.

The point is: difficult or not, don't worry about what your problems are until the basics are handled. I'm not super hung up on 12% body fat like some people are - I just want the 6-pack. I've got 2 showing, but I'm more about the aesthetics than the numbers.

The same thing applies to /u/saveTheFirstWorld's comment - 250 or 225, I don't really care. If your muscles show, you're good. My wife recently commented during sex, "I love holding onto your bicep while you do that," and at another time, "It's really amazing how you can just pick me up and pin me against the wall like that." Is a 225 bench going to get you that kind of strength and bicep size? Maybe. It depends on your height and your wife's weight. Again, I'm less worried about the exact numbers than the concepts of what I'm addressing. The same thing can go for income (where budgeting and planning are bigger factors than the threshold itself) or disciple-making (where the fruit produced by your disciple is more important than the quantity of people you disciple).

EDIT: I should also note that the guy I referenced in my post was single with no kids. These goals should be INCREDIBLY attainable for a single guy without kids. Get married and add 4 kids (i.e. me) and I agree that they're much harder to attain - but still not impossible.

Question on leading someone into becoming quality wife material

8 upvotes · 12 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I truly admire your consistency and growth, Phil. I really enjoy reading your updates, even if I don't respond to all of them.

How do I approach this as a brother in christ

Invite her to do things that are mission-oriented, not romance-oriented. Are you leading a Bible study? Ask her to join you. Are you discipling a guy? Get her input on something you're discussing with him (whether or not you take her input seriously is up to you) and ask her if she's discipling any girls. Are you interested in feeding the homeless? Ask her to meet up at a soup kitchen with you to serve together.

I know the drive can be a bit of a pain, but if she's truly interested, she'll join - and you'll be processing in a context that isn't leading her on because there is a bigger purpose to what you're doing. You can even tell her up-front, "This isn't a date. It's a service/ministry/whatever opportunity. But it's also a chance to get to know each other a little better as a result."

effectively determining the answer

This sounds like you're saying: "I want to know if this is God's will before I start something." You won't know, unless you have the gift of discernment of spirits. Have I shared the frame illustration here yet? I don't think so. Here it is, for reference: <https://i.imgur.com/z2I84a2.jpg> if the answer ends up being no from me, I can be as blameless as possible.

She's going to blame you no matter what. She's already emotionally invested. When her emotions come crashing down - whether it's by you rejecting her now or by natural descent after marriage, she's going to blame you. Period.

I think what you really mean is that you want to do it in a way where her blaming you won't be justified. To that end, always be blatantly transparent. As long as you communicate overtly and tell her exactly what you're thinking, she can never get hung up on you and claim you were just stringing her along.

What steps can I take to see if she's someone that can be led and molded?

Invite her to follow you, per the above.

Essentially, if I can show her christ, and live/encourage in such a way that she becomes closer to him, and as a result, lives less for the world, and more for God.

That's a great sentiment, but it's also such a vague standard that there's no way for you to really get the answers you're looking for. How will you know when she's "closer to him" or "lives less for the world"? What if it's a temporary phase she's going through in order to attract you? What if it's real? What if your standards for judging closeness to God are actually off in the first place and you don't discover it for years?

Stick to specifics. Invite her to do things that are outside of her sense of normalcy and see if she's willing to follow and learn what you have to offer. Be very practical.

is there any ways or signs to determine if this is happening?

I think I already answered this, but the answer is yes and no. There are all kinds of signs to indicate one thing or another. But no, those signs are valueless if they're not tied to practical observation and reality. They become mere wishful thinking. Never trust signs. Trust consistency.

I'm approaching this situation from a level-headed and God focused perspective for the first time in my life, and my feelings are not the ruling or deciding factor

That's great to hear, brother. You should, of course, have some feelings. It would be ridiculous to start a relationship if you didn't. But it's good that those aren't what's controlling your perception of the situation.

That said, in your level-headedness, are you evaluating how anything in this situation will be advantageous to your mission? What's the answer there?

Initiation Conversion Rates

8 upvotes · 7 November 2018 · /r/askMRP

Geeze ... and I thought I was over-analytical.

It's not either/or. Beta behavior can certainly contribute to the issue, but the fact that she's still recovering from pregnancy is almost certainly contributing to the issue as well.

Women are more prone to want sex when they feel sexy. They put an incredible emphasis on their weight toward feeling sexy. Until the baby weight is almost completely gone, she's going to feel insecure about her looks and be less interested in sex.

Don't fall into the trap of false flattery here. Your job isn't to tell her she's gorgeous even with the extra lbs, secretly hoping it'll make her feel sexy again. It's to live in your own frame. If you're skillful enough (which I wouldn't assume is the case), do something to draw out her insecurity, then AA it into oblivion. Works like a charm.

In the meantime, delete your app and just do what you want to do. If she says no, do something else you want to do. It's not that hard to figure out.

Boldly sharing the Gospel - is it unloving?

8 upvotes · 30 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

1/2

This comment probably won't be what you want to hear, but I think you're man enough to take it. There's a difference between being tactful and pussyfooting around the truth. So, when you say:

"But Chuck, can't you soften it up a bit? Can't you just tell them 'Jesus loves them' and leave it at that?"

you're creating a false dichotomy that shows either (a) your lack of understanding of viable alternative models, or (b) an intentional strategy of straw-manning to prove your point.

I know you're a big fan of the Ray Comfort model of evangelism, and we've had many conversations about it early in this sub's life. The concerns you're bringing up are among many on the list of why I've told you in the past that I don't think it's a good method and that it's a pretty off-putting model of evangelism. That said, I don't have any data to back up my conclusion other than my own experience - and I know that many people have had different experiences with the Ray Comfort model. So, I can't say with authority that you must stop using it, except on theological grounds. I can say, though, that the push-back you're receiving here is consistent with my experiences with that model.

The Gospel of Sin Management

Perhaps a more serious contention against the Ray Comfort model is that it emphasizes only one aspect of the Gospel - something Dallas Willard, in The Divine Conspiracy, calls "the gospel of sin management." This is when someone preaches the Gospel as if Jesus' primary function on the cross was to save us from sin, leading to the unwarranted, yet natural logical next step that the goal of the Christian life after that is also to manage sin - the less sin, the better a Christian you are.

In reality, sin and the law don't matter anymore. And while one might preach this as part of their Ray Comfort presentation of the Gospel, the foundation of the person's salvation in that model still falls back on: "I have sinned. I can't overcome my sin on my own. I need a savior to save me from my sin and the consequences thereof."

The gospel of sin management is a gross misinterpretation of the Gospel itself. My red piller pastor even argues at times (though he himself is not yet convinced even) that those who follow this interpretation of the Gospel may not actually be saved at all. I believe a more biblical view of the Gospel is that it's not about what we're being saved away from, but what we're being saved toward. Yes, that inherently means turning away from sin, but the goal isn't to turn away from sin. That is merely an inherent byproduct of turning toward righteousness.

An easy way to picture this is that you're standing in the center of a circle with 360 doors around you - one for each degree of the circle. Only one door is righteous, all of the others are sin. You're facing and walking toward a sinful door. You recognize that it's sin, so you turn away from it. Which way are you facing now? Well, you could be facing toward the righteous door ... or you could be facing toward any number of other sinful doors. Turning away from sin doesn't actually put you in any better a spot than when you were walking toward it. The only way to ensure you're not turning toward another sin is to find the door of righteousness and start walking toward it. Turning away doesn't help; turning toward does. And when you do that, it's impossible for you to be walking toward a sinful door.

Now, if the door at 46 degrees is the righteous door, then as you approach it you're also going to get closer to the sinful doors at 45 and 47 degrees - deviating your course can still result in sin. But as long as your eyes are set toward righteousness, you can stay the course. If your plan is simply to move away from sin, you're just going to keep spinning in circles until by pure luck you happen to face the righteous door. I don't want to base anyone's path toward salvation on pure luck. We shouldn't be teaching merely that "Jesus saves you from your sin" as the foundation of the Gospel because it still fails to give people an actual purpose and pursuit - and "follow Jesus" as the usual tack-on appendage to the Ray Comfort model, or the misunderstood recitation of "go and sin no more," as Jesus said, simply doesn't do anything to help people figure out which door is actually the righteous one.

Sin Management and Assurance

Now let me be clear about this. There are two versions of the gospel of sin management:

- That the primary reason Jesus died is to save us from sin, and this is what we should communicate most emphatically through the Gospel.
- That the point of the Christian life is to avoid sin as much as possible.

The first lends itself to the second one as the natural conclusion, but even if it didn't the first is still an incomplete gospel in itself. The Ray Comfort model of evangelism pushes this incomplete picture by using the following steps: (1) get them to admit that they're sinners, (2) show them that their sin dooms them to hell, (3) share Jesus as the solution to their sin problem, and (4) invite them to repent of their sin and believe that Jesus saved them from that sin.

Some people are wise enough to add a step 5 - point them in the right direction. But this still leaves sin management as the primary foundation of the gospel and their faith. You submit to type 1, but assume it's okay because you're at least pointing them away from type 2, although the "point them in the right direction" bit is usually underwhelming and uninformative in any practical measure.

In the reverse, some people rightly recognize a more complete picture of the Gospel - that Jesus came to do a lot more than merely save us from sin. But then they get stuck in a horrid rut of only preaching sin-avoidance after that anyway. Why? I can only speak from my own experiences (especially among the Catholics), but I get the impression that it stems from the whole "man looks at the outward appearance, but God looks at the heart" dichotomy. Because we can't see the heart, we create outward appearance indicators to discern who is saved and who isn't.

This is actually appropriate to do. After all, in Matthew 7 Jesus recognized that we couldn't see the heart of a person (on which grounds he would tell even those with great outward appearance "I never knew you, away from me you evildoers"), so he gave us a clear external test that wasn't based on sin, but on fruit: "By their fruit you will recognize them." By now on this sub it should be painfully obvious that my interpretation of what Jesus means by fruit is not (a) the fruit of the Spirit, which Paul hadn't written yet, or (b) general good works, which Jesus condemns as a model in the very next few verses, but (c) the same thing he always means when he talks about fruit in every other parable: evangelism and discipleship - that is, when the Gospel springs up within us and starts producing seed (a defining characteristic of fruit) that will fall to the ground and be planted in new soil.

This all, of course, leads me to the conclusion that sin management is a horrible indicator of a person's salvation; rather, the fruit (evangelism/discipleship) blooming from a person's life is that external indicator. It is not what actually saves a person, but it is the only outward sign we can have to develop an assurance in someone's salvation, which is why Jesus gives it as the exact test for discerning whether or not a prophet is true or false.

And if this greater mission of disciple(r)-making is Jesus' prescribed model for finding assurance in our salvation, why would we resort to a sin-management presentation of salvation in the first place? Should we not, instead, communicate to people a broader view of the mission that they are being called into - that their lives can have purpose and a meaning and that this purpose, when pursued, has the answer to all of their problems? After all, the Ray Comfort model only addresses a person's sin problem. It won't address his loneliness. It won't address his fear of rejection. It won't address the way his uncle molested him when he was younger. It won't address his anger at the world. It won't address his feelings of insignificance. It only addresses their sin and leaves little hope for anything else.

This is why I present The Lens Illustration in the 400 series as my primary means of sharing the Gospel nowadays. It connects deeply with something that matters to most people, then ties the solution into the greater role that they have to play in God's Kingdom. Instead of preaching the Gospel as a means of eradicating sin, it emphasizes (without ignoring the eradication of sin) the reconciliation we have with God as the foundational cure to a person's present felt needs. Instead of re-focusing them on a need that they don't perceive they have yet, it hits them where they're already feeling it and gives them hope where they most need it.

The Bigger Picture

The gospel of sin management is dangerous not because it's false (it's not), but because it's only a half picture that presents itself as the full thing. Jesus didn't only die to save us from sin; rather, saving us from sin is the natural consequence of opening the "righteous door" for us to live by. In an overly simplistic and still limited way, we must at least present that the point of eradicating sin wasn't for sin's own sake, but to reconcile us with God. God had a bigger purpose than just defeating sin. Defeating sin was only the necessary means through which that purpose could be accomplished.

I'm a big advocate for the importance of having a mission. What do you think Jesus' mission was? In my view, "save people from sin" was merely a necessary step in a larger purpose that God had in mind when he first sent his son.

Was recommended to cross post from MRP.

8 upvotes · 29 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Points 3 and 4 don't really influence much of your post. It seems like you're just trying to brag for the sake of bragging, then asking a question on a totally unrelated issue from your lifting/boxing history. There's no reason for those to be half the post. "I'm in incredible shape and do competitive kick boxing" would suffice.

As for your wife's tantrum, they're always going to come no matter how far along you get. My sister commented to me once that she does this kind of crap on purpose because she likes it when her husband stands up to her - and that she does it more often during times when she knows he's more likely to do so. That is, the more alpha he is, the more bratty she acts. Not every girl plays it that way, but just accept this as the norm. It's not always a sign she wants to divorce you.

Now, my wife just pulled something similar yesterday. Instead of your game/rules comment she just called it out directly. Conversation starts on the way home from church with her saying she wanted to talk about her work hours. I said "OK." She got upset that I just said "OK" and didn't follow-up with more. I set a boundary: "The kids are in the car. I don't want to have that conversation in front of them. Let's feed them lunch first." We enter the driveway and just sit in silence for 2 minutes (I was answering a work e-mail). I ask if she's ok and she doesn't answer, so I get the kids out of the car and start cooking them lunch.

She comes in 5 minutes later screaming her head off about how I'm not supportive of her. Now, this is totally out of left field and not consistent with the facts, so I use some negative inquiry: What did I do that was unsupportive? Her answer: "You just said OK." NI again: What's wrong with agreeing to have a conversation with you about your hours? She had no answer and spits back: "I know I'm being crazy and I have no rational basis for feeling this way. I just know I don't feel like you're supporting me right now." I agree: You're right, and I have no intention of supporting bad behavior.

She got even more heated after that, so I just STFU and let her talk. It's all "you this" and "you that." The last one was, "You're so mean!" That one actually made me laugh, as I replied: You're right, I'm the big bad wolf. Want me to start huffing and puffing? She rants some more. I STFU, smile, and nod. That set her off: "You're so manipulative. You have this power over me. It's all one big power play and you're just flaunting that you have all the power and I hate it. You know I have no power over you, but when you just stand there like that, it's like you're waving all your power in front of my face."

Now that was bizarre to me, as I hadn't said anything in something like 3 minutes (the wolf comment). So, I employ some more negative inquiry: What did I just do to manipulate you? Her: "That look. You just act like everything's normal. This is not normal!" Me: I'd be happy to smile some more to brighten the mood. Her: "No way. I know that smile. I hate it when you smile while I'm feeling like this." Me: Fair enough. But I'm not going to yell and scream at you either. That wouldn't help anything. And apparently having a positive attitude or just being normal are manipulative. So, there's no way to win. Conclusion? I smile again: If I can't win, I'm just going to do whatever I want and you can come back whenever you're ready. Then I went back to making the kids lunch. She storms out of the house saying she's heading to the mall to buy some new work clothes. I don't chase after her. Note: I used to chase after her when she did that. Then I stopped and she'd get furious that I didn't chase after her anymore. Now she knows this as the norm.

Literally two minutes after storming out, she comes right back in, acting much softer. Her vernacular changed gears. Instead of "you ... you ... you" it becomes "I ... I ... I." Once she started describing how she was feeling (comfort tests), I walked over, held her in my arms, kissed her forehead, and said, "Everything's going to be fine. Just trust me. I got this." Honestly, I have no idea what "this" is that I said I "got," other than life in general. It didn't matter. She just needed to hear some catch-phrase that sounded emotionally uplifting. That was the end of it. She was happy and fine the rest of the day.

Did I handle this perfectly? Probably not. But my wife's "You're so manipulative. You have this power over me" line is probably coming from the same place as your wife's, "I don't know what game you're playing or what the rules are, but I'm going to find out" line. She's recognizing at a conscious level that there's a power struggle at play and that you're winning. That's a good thing.

The fact that she doesn't know the game is a farce. She knows the game. She's just so used to winning all the time that when you start taking the lead, it feels to her like you started playing a different game altogether because her playbook isn't getting the same results. It's not a new game; you're just a better opponent. She's used to a clear pattern of "if I do x, I get z result." In reality, the equation was: "If I do x and he does y, I get z result." You had been doing y for so long that she thought it was the first equation - that your response was a constant. When you changed y into f, $x + f$ does not $= z$ anymore. The same rules still apply as have always applied. Math hasn't changed. Hypergamy hasn't changed. But the man changed.

So what's going to happen from here? She's going to try to figure out what your new variable is. And when she gets that you switched to f, she's going to change herself to get z as a result - because that's always the conclusion she's aiming for.

Math aside, what do you do from here? Whatever the heck you want. That's the bottom line. And if she's got your number figured out, you can either accept that she's figured you out, but stay that number because you like it ... or you can keep changing your number to keep her on her toes, always adapting to suit you. Either way, you're doing what you want.

Is there a chance she may just walk away, giving up if she can't find a way to "win" or get to z again? Sure. But you seem at peace with that. That's her sin, not yours. The Bible may not give you grounds in this situation to file for divorce, but it doesn't say that you have to prevent her from filing for divorce either - other than the general Matthew 18 process of confronting her of her sin and asking her to repent (in a peaceful and loving way, of course).

On Biblical Justice and Rape

8 upvotes · 10 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

As /u/OsmiumZulu alluded to, this is a misunderstanding. The passages usually referenced to support this conclusion are Deuteronomy 22:28-29 and Exodus 22:16-17, neither of which references rape specifically. In deuteronomy, it says, "and they are found out," implying that she went along with it too. Likewise, in the Exodus passage, it references when a man "seduces a virgin," implying that she was allured by him. I'm not convinced that either of those passages are talking about rape victims - at least not exclusively.

More to the point, God didn't command that she marry her rapist. God's position remained consistent as with the rest of the Bible: she is under her father's headship and should do as her father instructs. If her father instructs her to marry the guy, so be it. If not, then not. The presumption here is that a father loves his daughter and would not marry her off to someone if he didn't legitimately believe that was best for her. This is affirmed by Jesus's assumptions on parent-child love in Hebrew culture in Luke 11:11-13.

"I think I was just raped"

8 upvotes · 8 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

In the end, it's not a "some skepticism" thing. Even if everything she said were true, there is no evidence of rape whatsoever.

When she first knocked, I shared healthy concern and empathy, despite any skepticism. It was after my wife told the story of what really happened that my attitude changed.

That change was not toward contempt for my neighbor, who I long to see find Christ. I encouraged my wife to use this as an opportunity to love her and eventually share the gospel with her. Rather, it was joy at my wife's discernment and not just blindly empathizing with another woman's false allegations just because she's a woman.

Should I keep this girl around to potentially LTR later??

8 upvotes · 16 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

What you want out of a relationship is something that most women cannot or should not give. The women who do challenge their husband's behaviors are the ones who are doing it to control them. It is very rare to find a woman (even to the point of non-existent) who challenges her husband purely to help him strive to be better. You're not meant to follow her lead in becoming the man she wants you to become. 1 Cor. 11:3 is clear: you follow Christ, she follows you. That's it. Your challenge and conviction should come from the Spirit and other godly men as you continue to read and engage in the Word.

Now, that's not to say it's wrong to have a wife who challenges you either. This can be beneficial if you're a strong enough guy to maintain frame in the midst of it, which you might be. But I promise you, you're looking for trouble if you actively seek that in a relationship. As /u/TheLZisTooHot said, you've already got a unicorn. If you try to fly any closer to the sun, like Icarus, your wings will melt and you'll get burned.

Why do I say this? Because of the obvious reason: you have ONEitis. Your ONEitis is preventing you from viewing the "other girl" accurately. You're only seeing what you want to see. Now, she may be a wonderful option too. But it's also clear that she's into you and all this crap about her prioritizing you over her friends or dropping what she's doing to go help you at 3am - that's her trying to get in your pants. That's not who she is. It's who she is when she's trying to impress you.

ONEitis is very deceptive. It will cause you to think and feel things that will eventually fade away and become untrue. Could this "other girl" be better for you in the end? Sure, it's possible. But right now you have a choice between what you know to be true and great about girl 1 and what you think might be true and even greater about girl 2, but you don't really know because you're clouded by ONEitis and can't trust your own thoughts/feelings. Between the two options, which sounds wiser right now?

Let me also reaffirm what /u/pizzalover24 said, as it was very insightful: you're clearly two different people, depending on which girl you're around. As he said, the dynamic was pretty clear to me too: "feeling content to be led by your friend whilst you lead in your LTR." Which dynamic is the biblical one? The one where you're leading the relationship or the one where you're being led by a girl who uses her position of strength to coddle you when you fall? The latter is incredibly tempting because subliminally it seems like it'll be an easier life. She's got it made and you want to leech onto her successes. In reality, you've got to be the man who's got it made and have a girl who wants to leech onto your successes, not one who is independent of you.

Women are meant to mold to their man. This means the relationships that work best are the ones where the woman adopts her man's identity. That's why she changes her name to his. It's why people start calling them Mr. and Mrs. [Groom's first and last name]. It's why men introduce themselves by their mission in life (which for most is their career), but most women introduce themselves by their relationship to other people (wife, mother). It's why women usually moves into the man's house. Seriously, when's the last time you talked to a guy who introduced himself as a husband - or even as "so and so's husband"? But I do hear women regularly introducing themselves as a housewife or just a wife in general or as "so and so's wife." If you're looking for a woman who will not mold to you and who isn't wanting to adopt your identity, you're asking for trouble.

Now let me be clear, I'm not telling you who the better option is. I'm giving you principles to help you make a choice. In my mind, it's clear who that choice should be - and you should darn well stop nagging the girl for being a girl. Praise her for it and go get some male friends to challenge you, rather than trying to turn your girl into a man. /u/rocknrollchuck is spot on here. But at the end of the day, you know the ins and outs of your own circumstances, your own standards, your own desires, etc. better than we do. So, maybe there's other stuff factoring in that you haven't told us. I'm fine accepting that and if you want to go off with girl 2, that's your choice and I support you in that as well.

But here's the thing: you need to make a decision and make it now. You can't wait for girl 2 to break up with her LDR and string girl 1 along all the while. If you want girl 2, let girl 1 go and either go for girl 2 now and cause her to breakup with this new guy, or wait it out and see if she ever leaves him (not a great option).

But when you're making that decision, weigh heavily any ways your ONEitis may be affecting your judgment, and look to biblical principles about what a wife should do and be, not what you want her to do and be. In the end, your present motivators will change over time, but biblical principles for marriage will remain stable. I'd bet my life on biblical principles over my own perception every time. And to be clear, "biblical principles" doesn't mean who knows more about the Bible or who lives it out better. It means who is more willing to live within the roles God has prescribed. If a woman is faithful, available, and teachable, you can disciple her into becoming anything you want. But if you're looking for someone prefabricated so you don't have to disciple her into anything, then you should never expect to get more than what you buy.

The Role Of Your Wife (Assuming You're OYS Already)

8 upvotes · 13 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is partly why I believe Paul recommends people not marry. Before we had the Spirit, marriage was meant to be a parallel to help humanity understand their relationship with God. Post Gospel, that only becomes a necessity for people who don't get it right away. For example:

- You ever get upset or bitter that your wife won't sleep with you? How are you doing at evangelism? Maybe God's showing you how he feels.
- Ever get frustrated that you do the lion's share of the work around the house while she sits around? What are you actually doing to contribute to the church and advancing God's kingdom?
- She spending all your money and not acting grateful? Are you receiving God's blessings and not thanking him?

You should get the point. The primary spiritual purpose of having a wife is to help us understand where we're falling short with God. 9 times out of 10 if your wife is doing something you don't like it's because she's following your lead and the example you set for her based on how she sees you interact with God. That's a huge function.

In all this, note the funny way the creation of woman is worded in Genesis. God knew all along he would create her, but for some reason still words her almost as an afterthought. It's like God did intend for man to be on his own, but then decided there were some things that would necessitate help after all. You're living in that. You're mostly doing it on your own and are just now trying to figure out what those other things are.

My best guess? Sex. God gives the command in Genesis 1 to have so much sex that they fill the whole earth with generations of glory-bearers for God. That's what Adam couldn't do alone. Today, in the wake of the gospel, Malachi 2:15 and a populated world, that job has transitioned to our spiritual imperative in the great commission to produce spiritual offspring and raise them to do likewise through a ministry of discipleship. If the command to fill the earth has been fulfilled in a physical sense (and I believe it has), then woman's job has transitioned, as with all things, to the spiritual parallel of disciple-making.

Your wife's primary job is not to keep the dishes clean. It's too help you on your God-given mission to make disciples.

How can she do that? Here are a few ways my wife does that for me:

- covers things with kids and house when I'm meeting with guys
- preps the home when I'm at work and she knows I've invited people over
- works off and on full/part time to ease some financial constraint so I have the capacity to meet with more men
- builds relationships in the church and community to expand our joint social network, as these people ultimately join our small group or I end up disciplining the husbands of the women she meets
- she discipless women herself, thereby directly enhancing my mission for the family by reaching a half of the population that I cannot otherwise reach safely.

Apart from these mission-oriented things, when it comes to day to day living, like others have said and will keep saying, delegation of tasks is huge. But I do not advise simply creating a consistent, set pattern.

Consistent set patterns will give her a sense of equality and ownership. You're not the leader over her, you're the guy who is responsible for the stuff she doesn't have to do. This then fosters a sense of competition over who does more around the house. It doesn't matter if you're the sole or primary breadwinner; in her mind if she's doing more at home, it's unfair. This is exasperated when you have kids and she begins to view herself not as a housewife (a title defined by her relational context to you), but as a (part time?) stay at home mother (a title whereby her self identification is independent of you). This is not a trite semantic thing. The word choice here actually does present significant psychological implications.

In one of my first posts on MRP I talked about dealing with the stressed wife. My recommendation, which worked for me, was to tell your wife: "For the next week you are to do nothing productive unless I tell you to do it. If i don't tell you anything, then you are just to have fun. Watch Netflix. Go out with the girls. Whatever. Just nothing productive." Then just assign her a list of tasks for the day.

It doesn't matter that your list of tasks is just as much or more work than she used to do. She will be much happier. For women, thinking about what needs to get done is more stressful than actually getting it done. By taking this approach, you are forcing her to let you take the reigns back.

If you succeed, she will be impressed and recognize that you're more capable than she previously believed. Women have an inflated sense of self worth. I have made it clear to my wife many times that I'd be just fine without her. "I don't need you in my life. But I do want you. If I need you, you'd have no clue whether I keep you around because I love you or because I need something from you. The fact that I don't need you, but that you're still here should mean something to you."

Of course, if you fail - a kid goes to school without lunch, the electric bill doesn't get paid, etc. - she'll scoff and marvel at her own self worth. But if you maintain fake and rightly express you failure as a necessary part of learning what needs to happen and how to lead the home, you'll be back in the "if you succeed" part again.

Setting expectations for fat loss and muscle gain

8 upvotes · 27 April 2018 · /r/askMRP

True gains are not achieved in a linear fashion, so I'd be cautious on that. You want to go through cycles of bulking and cutting. This is much more effective at body-sculpting, whereas linear gains usually develop more of a runner/swimmer build. That's cool if you want to be the skinny guy who pops a few veins. But if you want to be impressive and stand apart, you're going to want actual muscle mass and not just weight loss.

I started with 28% body fat just under a year ago and am sitting at 14% today. So your template going from 29% to 17% in a full year seems to be selling yourself short. But I also don't know what your schedule looks like and how much time you have to commit to this or how devoted you can be to dieting. I eat like crap most of the time, so my improvement is even with only about 2 months of actual cutting. If you can diet more consistently, I'm sure you could do much better.

As far as lifts go, starting from a bench of 135, for the first 6 months I saw my bench press go up by about 5-10lbs per week. After 6 months I had a series of illnesses and a surgery that made me go in a cycle of having to constantly rebuild up to my previous max again. I presently bench 285 as my ORM. My goal for next month is 300, after which I'll start a heavy cut-diet again.

Similarly, my squat started at 155 and my deadlift at 135. I upped those incrementally until now, where I'm sitting at 365 for a 3-rep max on each. For some reason illness and surgery really don't cause me to lose much in the way of leg strength, so that wasn't much of a problem and I have been able to increase steadily.

I mention the lifting side more because given your starting weight most of your improvements will come not from losing weight, but from gaining muscle. It's doable, just be committed. If losing weight is a priority to you, though, then add a bit of cardio at the end of each lifting session. I try to run 2.5-5 miles after my SL 5x5 routine, which functions as a calorie dump to offset some of the trash I eat with my kids ;p

Steven Anderson on women's roles according to the bible.

8 upvotes · 31 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

He was posted here the first week this sub was up. I've listened to most of his stuff on YouTube. His gender role views are decent, but he also has a lot of heretical and bad theological views that this sub should not support. Tread with caution.

How do you stay interesting with a child?

8 upvotes · 23 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

Rule 1: Don't let the kids dominate your life. With my clients there's countless stories of people who cater their entire lives to their kids through numerous extracurricular activities, meeting up with friends, controlling what you eat, when you go out, what movies you see, etc. Obviously a modicum of caution needs to be employed, like not watching a horror movie with the kids around. But on the whole, don't let the kids dictate who you are as a person and how you interact with the world.

Most child psychologists agree that exalting kids above yourself is detrimental to their eventual perception of their place in the world. This is why so many males are now man-children and it's why we have millennials who don't know how to toughen up and get a job done. You need to teach your children through your lifestyle that they are not the center of the universe. This will help them later in life and help them see what it will take to at least become the center of their sphere of influence, rather than just assuming it will happen naturally before the crash and burn. Main point here: invite your children into your world at least as much or more than you enter their world. This is massively important for their psychological well-being long-term and also keeps you from being boring.

Rule 2: OYS. You have no greater ability to flaunt your newfound OYS powers without verbalizing them than when you have a kid. If you follow Rule 1, you're already doing a lot of the same stuff with kids that you were doing before kids. You're still going out to eat. You're still going to the movies (I have 4 kids: 6, 4, 2, 6 mo - don't tell me it can't be done). You're still chilling at the mall or making weekend trips to the amusement park or whatever. But all of this only works if you have your act together.

If you rely on Mommy to take care of the kids you're going to develop serious Madonna-Whore complex and find that all these activities aren't fun because rather than enjoying the activity, she's going to be worried about whether or not you packed diapers, the baby has a change of clothes, how to deal with whining and crying, etc. More concerning, if you make her do everything with the kid, she's just not going to have the energy to go, and if she does go she's not going to be into it and you're going to get bored. Be a man. Be a dad. Don't separate the two.

Rule 3: Frame. Don't just maintain frame. Manipulate everyone else's frame. No matter what you're doing, you be the one to set the atmosphere. My dad did this with me constantly when I was growing up. At sports games, he joked with my friends alongside me. When I had friends over, he played video games and watched movies with us. On field trips, he chaperoned and set the agenda in both active school activities and the down time/filler time. I loved that about him. My house was the popular place to be, not because of me, but because people loved being in my dad's frame. Friends always wanted to come over. Even after I went off to college, my dad maintained lasting friendships with many of my friends far longer than I did.

In the midst of all of this, my dad's real agenda was to influence the people who were influencing me so that I wasn't led astray. In many ways, he was parenting the entire neighborhood just for my sake (along with my siblings, of course). This took some effort, but his influence trickled beyond the kids to their parents as well. Not only was he having the time of his life just enjoying spending time with his kids and our friends - he was also positioning himself as the most popular guy in town, who everyone else wanted to be around also.

Where Is The Good?

8 upvotes · 12 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

The good is definitely there. I came from a true DB. Between 2014-2016 my wife and I went 18 months without having sex at all. I was obese. Other areas of life notwithstanding, with respect to my marriage I was probably more beta than anyone you've known or heard about. I mean that seriously, not as an exaggeration. I took pride in being the most beta guy out there and tried to out-beta all the other betas. I got some sense of validation out of knowing how "nice" of a guy I was and that I was truly unique in the world.

Starting mid-2016, shortly after nominal starfish sex returned, I decided to start making some improvements. It began primarily with taking steps toward my life mission, economic gains and spiritual growth - mostly fixated on understanding biblical masculinity, which was the source inspiration for everything thereafter. In December I added home leadership skills to the list and being more assertive. Then in February 2017 I added cardio. In April I added personal grooming and taking care of the house. In May I added dieting. In June I added lifting. Mid-June I discovered RP for the first time and started reading like crazy and started implementing OI and refining prior things into a more clearly defined frame. In July I added gaming my wife, 10-second kisses, AA/AM, abundance mentality, etc. In mid-August I started implementing a dominance mentality, and you can chart some of my progress from r/RPChristians since then. In all this time ...

- Lifting: I went from benching 160 as a soft max to 285 as a hard max (just hit that this past weekend)
- Body Fat: I dropped from 28% to 15%
- Frame: I went from serving her every need and never asking for anything in return to (1) being comfortable saying no, (2) not budging on life decision issues, and (3) having her in a position of serving my needs, while also (4) demonstrating appreciation, attention, and affection on my terms and not when she asks or demands it
- Sex: I went from none at all and being a resentful, butthurt moron to 90% "yes" when I initiate and weak initiations by her (still can't figure out if I should try to improve this or just accept being the only initiator - too many conflicting opinions on this sub on that topic). Even after her c-section and me really not expecting squat (due to the several months of sexlessness before the birth and the 6-week doctor recommended recovery period), after implementing a few basic RP principles on top of the foundation I'd already laid, she was ready to go (albeit while maintaining the doctor recommendation to avoid PIV).

- Kids: They used to be clingy toward their mom, loud, and obnoxious and I'd have to ask 10x before they'd do anything (they're ages 5, 3, 2, and 0), but now the three oldest (even the 2 year old) do things the first time I ask - and on the few times they don't, they know the consequences and I follow through rather than being the "fun dad" who gives them chance after chance and makes their disobedience a joke. Result? Wherever I go, that's where they want to be.
- Work: This has always been pretty solid, but I've increased my income about 20-25% in the last couple years.
- Mission: More progress in the last 9 months than I made in the 3 years before that.
- Influence: I used to be a failed extrovert who tried to engage with people and just couldn't connect. People just want to be around me now. Men and women alike, whether from church, work, at the courthouse, in the neighborhood - they just come up and chat even when I don't initiate, and sometimes all it takes is eye-contact and a nod and someone will cross the street to talk. I've been asked to teach classes at my church. I've had men ask me to disciple them. When I ask people to do things, they do it.

All of this is probably somewhere between that $1,000 win and the $32,000 win /u/GargantuaBlarg29 mentioned (great comment, by the way). I feel great - better than I have since I've been married. In minor vanity, it also makes me smile to know that in every way I'm stronger than I've ever been in my life (previous max bench was 275 in college) - this alone makes me feel like I've conquered the world, and everything else is just icing on the cake that keeps getting added on layer after layer.

That doesn't mean frustrations don't come or that I don't have questions or confusion about how to take things to the next level. I need to use lifelines every now and then and am not too proud to do so. I also try to avoid bragging about how good things are for me all the time (biblical humility and all that), but I must say: life is good.

beginning of the end?

8 upvotes · 15 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

i am fully aware that we need to supply SOME beta to our partners in order to let them know we care.

What you really mean is an alpha expression of qualities that are more commonly employed by betas.

fell off the ship in a few areas

If this is happening at all, she's going to take those "SOME beta" moments not as comforts, but as signs of weakness.

i feel like i havent made any of her needs a priority

This is where you need to learn alpha expression of beta-associated qualities. Going to her family's events isn't inherently beta (or alpha). Going for the purpose of keeping her happy because you're afraid she'll leave is what makes it beta. Going because you want to do good things for a girl who's good to you is alpha. Reward good behavior, withdraw from bad behavior.

she feels like i dont care for her / love her

Because you don't. You're clearly a selfish brat who doesn't understand the reward good behavior, withdraw from bad behavior dynamic. You're sucking her for all she's worth and prepping to move on to the next girl. If that's your play, that's fine. But "i don't want to just throw the relationship away" implies that's not really your play.

Axiom: Tingles without fuzzies won't last. Fuzzies without tingles are worthless.

You're only going after tingles. You sound like you've gone Rambo, trying to apply RP too much too fast when you're not ready. She's mad because she has, by your own admission, treated you great. But you act like her "great" treatment is the norm, so you're not rewarding it - but when she stops acting so great you punish her. If she thinks she's only ever going to get the stick and the carrot doesn't exist, she's going to go find someone else with a carrot.

what is a man to do at this point?

Learn to reward good behavior.

do i continue to fight?

If you want to, yes. If you don't, no.

do i need to focus on her needs and be more empathetic and hope i earn her trust back?

This is the beta mentality I referenced above - "I'll do anything because I'm afraid I'll lose her." Screw the "hope I earn her trust back" and find another motivation for "focus on her needs and be more empathetic" such as: "I'm a powerful guy and I like to use my power to reward people who are good to me."

it seems like the bold-RP alpha i have portrayed myself to be has caused more harm than good or was i simply not leading in an alpha way by disregarding the needs of my significant other?

You haven't portrayed "bold-RP alpha" at all. You've portrayed "insensitive, self-centered jerk."

Spot on.

i am hear to listen and hopefully save this.

Screw that. That mentality is what's keeping you beta.

Internal dialogue: OYS vs. What would Chad do?

8 upvotes · 7 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Cut the 50/50 attitude. I just wrote this in another thread to /u/alwaysdoubledown82 - and maybe this comment can help him too.

"If she cooks, I'll clean" is garbage thinking. It's your house, your food, your dishes, your sink, your time. For legal divorce purposes, yeah, it's probably all 50/50. But it's a crap life worrying about divorce laws all the time. Plus, if you're a high value man why would she ever leave you? And if you're leaving her, you have the forethought and context to prepare.

My point is, unless you're in a divorce, treat everything as if it's yours. You clean the dishes because they're your dishes, not because she cooked and you're trying to be 50/50 fair. It's 100% you. If she wants to use your stuff, what value is she contributing? If she wants to eat the food you buy, what value is she contributing?

If you change your mentality from 50/50 to OYS, that's going to be your biggest step forward, not asking

WWCD.

OYS as a Mindset

Let me be clear about this - and I invite other MRPers to reprimand me if I'm stretching this concept too far. OYS in my book is not just about "owning" in the sense of taking care of it and being responsible. It's a mentality. When we see OYS threads, they're often about what a guy does to take care of his house and improve his lifestyle. That's a small part of it.

The real value of OYS (and the only way it's indefinitely sustainable) is when you view it more as a literal ownership, not a figurative "I should take care of OUR stuff" sense. It's not "some things are hers, some are mine." It's not even her and your stuff (i.e. co-ownership). Unless she contributed value to get it, it's your stuff. And even then, if you already paid her for that value, she can't double-dip and get your payment plus still identify with a thing as hers.

EXAMPLE 1

My wife did a great job during last busy season at work and earned herself an extra $500 bonus. I rewarded her by buying her a new oven, which cost well over $500. When her bonus check came in she handed it over to me, understanding that the family finances are mine - even what she earns. She contributed an extra $500 in value to the family with her hard work.

I could have let her keep her $500 bonus as her reward and done nothing else for her, in which case she's happy to her company for rewarding her.

Instead, I took the credit for rewarding her, channeled how I wanted her to be rewarded for that value rather than how she would have spent that check, and now she's overjoyed with appreciation to me at the new oven I BOUGHT HER (as opposed to her company) and I still get the $500 check to spend however else I see fit. Plus, since I do most of our cooking, extra benefit to me (hence spending more than $500 on it).

If I wanted to, I could have also just taken her bonus check and given her nothing, and I've done that before too. But most of the time I like to reward good behavior so she keeps up the good behavior. This will remain true for the $3,500 bonus she's about to get in her next paycheck. I'm not going to go out and buy her $3,500 worth of crap. I'll find other ways to reward her for adding value. But if I reward her with my love, affection, gifts, appreciation, etc. and then still let her spend her own bonus money - she's double-dipping, getting twice the reward for the same work, and at my expense.

Contributing Value

The bottom line in my example is that I see everything as my stuff. If you continue to see it as "our" stuff you're subconsciously going to revert to a 50/50 mentality. You'll expect her to do half the chores, half the cooking, half the cleaning, etc. If you see it as your stuff, you'll realize that all the responsibility is on you, but that if she wants to make use of your stuff she has to contribute value to you.

How does that value work? Maybe you do 100% of the work around the house and contribute 100% of the income and she just lays around all day waiting to give you the best sex of your life every single day multiple times a day. Maybe sex alone isn't enough value for you, so if she wants to keep living in your house, eating your food, and watching your TV, while scrolling social media on your phone that you let her keep in her purse all day - she needs to start contributing other value. So, she cooks you breakfast every now and then. She vacuums the floors. She cleans up after the kids. She works a job. Is this enough value to you?

Sex as Value

Or is she thinking she can add enough value to you that she can ignore sex? If she has the 50/50 mindset, sex ends up not fitting into the equation because she doesn't see it as the same as all the other household chores (nor should she treat it like a chore). She'll expect you to do your 50% around the house, but since she's already contributing her 50% (or she probably really thinks she's doing 80%) she sees herself as a high-value contributor in the home, so why should she care about sexually gratifying you or herself even? That's a separate matter to her.

If you deviate away from the 50/50 mentality to an OYS mentality, you're the one who dictates where you find value. Right now she's following a pseudo-objective standard. "You do this, I do that." In her mind, this has the same objective value as that. But what if this has more value to you than that?

EXAMPLE 2

My wife constantly tries to get affection and appreciation for doing things that she values and I don't. I've had to communicate to my wife repeatedly (sometimes even verbally), "That's great that you vacuumed the house three times this week. I'm glad you find value in that. I don't. I'm fine if it's only vacuumed once a week. You did the work, you're reaping your own reward from it. But don't expect me to pamper and reward you for something I don't value. You want pampering and rewards? You know what I value in the marriage. Go do those things instead."

She usually gets all huffy at me and says, "Well, you should value it!" I ignore her. Sometimes she'll add, "It's not fair, though, that if I do that extra work you still get the benefit of it even if it's not something you would have cared to do yourself." Sometimes I'll ignore her and go about my business. Other times I'll note quickly: "I honestly can't tell the difference between vacuuming the carpets 1 or 3 times a week. You're the only one who experiences that value."

In the past, she still harbored bitterness over this for me because I was still flawed in my execution. After refining things since discovering RP, she hasn't brought this stuff up once. Instead, she's focusing more on the things that she knows I value. That's a huge win.

Effort v. Value

It's worth noting briefly that effort $\neq$ value. If something takes 8/10 effort for her to complete, but I only get 3/10 enjoyment out of it, that's only a value of 3/10. She feels like it should be an 8/10 because of all of her effort, but over time is now realizing that value is based on the result, not the work put in.

Decent sex might have a value of 7/10 for me, but only has an effort level of 4/10 for her. Great sex might be an 8/10 in effort, but gives 10/10 in value. When she's contributing less effort than the value her effort produces, she's in golden territory.

The problem is that most women don't understand this effort-value dynamic. Why? Because they're living in a 50/50 dynamic, not an OYS/value-based relationship. If you succumb to the 50/50 mentality, you'll never be able to pull her out of it.

I'm dating two MGTOW.

8 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Just posted another comment - but I don't think they're actually MGTOW. Have to jet right now, but I might come back to this question to actually answer it instead of deflecting for now :p

[FR] I'm getting on top of this... Still need to work harder

8 upvotes · 28 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

sharing the load 50/50

In a woman's mind, you will never be "sharing the load 50/50." She'll always assume it's 51/49 at your very best case scenario. In reality, you should be responsible for 100%. Delegate to her as necessary, but the responsibility is yours. I just linked this for someone else too, but here's for more reading.

I didn't do it for you. I did it because it needed doing.

This response has worked well for me too (see here).

I'm still not getting the AA/AM to work properly for me. STFU only works for so long until they learn that play and go harder at you.

If those are your only two moves, that's why. Add fogging and negative inquiry into your routine. They're far, far easier to pull off with little/no experience, but can go a long way in taming a conversation rather than letting her escalate it by being totally aloof with STFU.

An added bonus: If AA/AM aren't natural, fogging and negative inquiry buy you some time for her to keep talking until she sets you up for an easy AA. Once you take a few easy openings for a quick AA, you'll start to notice responses quicker and quicker.

Could I have defused this hamster faster? I'm not sure I could ... need to improve AA/AM

Yes, fogging will be your best friend for a while here while you figure the rest out. Go back and re-read WISNIFG. Camp out there for the next month while you're lifting.

Also ...

SO: attitude ... Me: [attempt at hug, shrugged off]

Why are you rewarding bad behavior? My wife has come home with a bad attitude a few times. My response? "Cool, you're home. I'm heading to the gym. Be back in a couple hours." I don't like going to the gym late at night, but it beats dealing with her bad attitude - and it doubles as a fix to her attitude. I get home, she sees that I got stuff done while she was gone (i.e. applied OYS), I come home and her attitude is gone and she's buttering up to me.

Never underestimate the power of withdrawing your presence.

Your wife is a whore and you should divorce her

8 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You might be surprised how many LL guys are here for reasons other than sexual strategy, as I've gotten PMs from a handful and would wager there are many more who haven't been inclined to PM. Otherwise, good points :)

Your wife is a whore and you should divorce her

8 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This only makes sense if you value things outside the marriage more than you value things inside the marriage. I'll grant that AMALT in their desire for sex with different women. But for some men this isn't their highest desire. So, I'd chalk this up to the "leave the rest" in the "take what works for you and ..." conversation.

That being said, what you're really getting at here is comparing a useful mentality against a non-useful mentality. Assuming your wife will never leave you or cheat on you is not useful. If anything, it's a self-fulfilling mind-set because the way it causes you to act increases her desire to leave/cheat. Assuming she can and probably will cheat on you at some point is useful. It compels you to improve your life.

So, religious issues aside, if you can be happier outside the marriage, leave the marriage. But if you're happier in the marriage, stay in the marriage. Telling other men that their greatest happiness can only be found in what makes you happy ... no thanks. I'll decide that one for myself.

Do the majority of people you know cheat on their spouses?

8 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

Cheating happens in a lot of relationships, and that number is increasing regularly ... but it's certainly not the majority. As you've noted, TRP plays this up, but I think you're misinterpreting why it's portrayed the way it is.

TRP takes the view that one should promote useful ideas and ignore ideas that aren't useful.

- Useful: Live as if your wife might potentially cheat on you someday. She may not, but if you accept this as a possibility, you'll be more motivated to keep working on yourself to foster your relationship with her and her attraction toward you instead of other men.
- Not Useful: Assume you've got a catch who will never cheat on you. It may be true, but you have no way of knowing 100% for sure. So, if you take this as a given, many guys will be fine, but others will be seriously hurt when their expectations of fidelity are crushed.

100% of guys can derive some benefit from taking the first view, whereas some guys will get crushed with the second view. Most people on TRP, of course, won't explain it this way. Because of how people are sociologically conditioned, if you leave any room for the non-useful view, they will give others the benefit of the doubt and slip into that, taking the risks that come with it. So, TRP pushes the useful view as a means of defraying people from slipping into a non-useful frame of mind. Because most posts on TRP or askTRP come from relative RP-noobs, they don't realize how this agenda works, they just see a bunch of guys pushing the useful view as if it's an absolute, so they start believing it's an absolute and it develops into the actual definition of a factoid - something that's not necessarily true, but gets repeated so often that people start believing it's true.

In reality, the "useful" and "not useful" views are not the only options - there are any number of positions to take in-between, where one can maintain a healthy view of humanity (thereby rejecting the TRP-pushed "useful view" as an absolute) while simultaneously taking caution to guard one's heart against the harsh realities that cheating does sometime happen (thereby rejecting the social stigma that we must all have blind faith in our SOs).

As a dating mechanism, it's probably wise to lean much more heavily on the useful view. But once the relationship develops, the useful view has the unintended side-effect of generating phantom stress in a long term relationship. The guy always has subliminal concerns that prevent him from growing into commitment. TRP doesn't care about this negative view; most people there are fine with abandoning marriage and any interest in LTRs, which is why the useful view is still 100% advantageous in their eyes. For the rest of us who actually do care to maintain consistent LTRs (including those in MRP), the balance is weighed differently.

Question about fogging

8 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

Her: you're a piece of sh-- for flirting with X you know that?? Why would you do that?

Start with fogging:

- "You're right, I do act that way sometimes, don't I?"
- "I can see why you'd feel that way."

- "I guess what I did would look like that, wouldn't it?"

If she won't let it go, move into negative inquiry:

- "What is it about my actions that caused you to think I was flirting?" [not quite NI, but a reasonable precursor, pressure flipping to make her be the one to explain herself/justify her accusations, not you]
- "What is it about my flirting with other people that makes you react that way?"
- "What is it about my flirting with other people that you think is bad?"

Keep the string of NI up until she either caves by revealing her actual insecurity or acknowledges that you're not "bad" - you're just doing things she doesn't like, thus it's a personal preference difference.

Her: "It's bad because I'm supposed to be the only one you give that kind of attention to!"

You: "What is it about my giving attention to other women that is bad?"

Her: "Because I'm your girlfriend."

You: "Why does you being my girlfriend make it bad for me to talk to other girls that way?"

Her: "Because it might cause you to cheat on me, so I don't feel like I can trust you."

Personally, I prefer to save AA for this moment. If you pull off AA right away, over time she thinks you're just being evasive all the time and she can never be intimate with you. But when you use negative inquiry to get at the root of her insecurity, she's opening herself up to you - and then you give her the affirmation she needs in a playful way.

You: "You really shouldn't trust me - I've been hiding lots of things from you ... <move in close and whisper> things I'm going to do to you someday that I just can't say out loud."

In the alternative, you can treat her depth of response as a sincere comfort test, telling her what she wants to hear [i.e. avoid the "agree" part of AA], but still keeping it playful.

You: "Cheat on you? <grab her neck-line and look down her shirt> Who could cheat on that?!?"

Your confidence in the delivery is what matters most (I've found this out the hard way). If she feels like you're making a joke, you will have abated the issue, but she won't believe you and you'll have done nothing to quell her insecurities - her jealousy will fester. Sell it right and she'll drop the issue and start getting all tingly.

Advice on living together

8 upvotes · 2 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Shouldn't the captain analogy be reserved for married/engaged men and women?

Married, yes. Engaged, no. Engaged is the same as saying, "In contract." Like when you buy a house, it's not really your house, and you can technically get out of the contract at any time by giving up your deposit money. So, yes, being "in contract" is a step-up in commitment from just flirting with the idea of buying a house, but until closing day, the deal is not sealed.

Any of you ever had enough SMV to tell an annoying woman to fuck off without social consequences?

8 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

I'm confused ...

I helped her for a while because it was my job

...

she even rationalized it was my job to help her

If it's your job, that's not her hamster. I'm guessing what you mean is that her expectations went beyond your job requirements.

Look, I have a job where I have crappy clients. Being a divorce attorney, nobody is happy. Ever. It's my job to help these people no matter how much they whine and complain - and every single phone call is whining and complaining. I have to maintain frame because (1) that's how I win cases, and (2) that's how I build trust with my clients.

I get fed up with it sometimes, especially when they cross some lines that most other clients don't cross. Instead of cussing them out, you develop your interpersonal management skills, set clear boundaries, and inform them of the consequences of crossing those boundaries. When they still cross them, you don't chicken out on those boundaries.

Instead, you lost frame by letting her get to you. Frame isn't just about picking up girls. It applies to numerous areas of life, including your career. Your boss will not respect a pushover. Whiny co-workers will not respect the boundaries of someone who can't draw a clear line and enforce it.

Sectarian issues finding relationships?

7 upvotes · 25 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

First, if you're still in "I gotta find a wife" mode, your thinking is off. Read my "finding the girl you can't keep yourself from banging" posts on the sidebar.

Second, sectarianism within the Church is stupid and unbiblical.

Third, women will adapt to your frame if you're an attractive, competent leader. Who cares whether they think differently from you before they're in your frame?

Children before marriage

7 upvotes · 25 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

This is the way. I have spoken.

3 Year RP Field Report

7 upvotes · 25 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Without taking a firm stance, how would you reconcile that view with 1 Timothy 3:4-5 - "for if someone does not know how to manage his own household, how will he care for God's church?"?

Matchmaker, matchmaker, make me a match

7 upvotes · 18 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

It's super blue pill to expect someone else to go find you a woman.

Like most of the arranged marriages in the OT times? Genesis 24 comes to mind. I don't think the distinction you're making is a red/blue one.

I think the laziness in the online approach is the blue pill problem. And even that can be red pillled if you're using the online marketplace not as a substitute for in-person approach (or even your primary approach), but as a low-cost, high-opportunity resource at your fingertips for expanding your social network and increasing your number of orbiters/plates.

But I do agree with the bottom line: the options in online dating are going to suck compared to the options in person.

Loving my wife like Christ loves the Church

7 upvotes · 17 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

when I hear things like this...

OP is not a mod or endorsed contributor. He doesn't speak for the sub. What you've expressed is more along the lines of what we hold to. If you find a mod or EC who has posted anything along the lines of what OP wrote, let me know and I'll personally deal with it.

Don't Be Autistic

7 upvotes · 24 September 2020 · /r/RPChristians

If there wasn't clear data showing that women prefer muscular men over runner/swimmer builds, I'd agree with you. But you have to remember that the red pill is still a praxeology of intergender sexual dynamics. So, what attracts women inherently has to be part of that dynamic.

Do you have any concerns about how it seems like this view errs on the side of control of your wife over her personal growth and freedom?

7 upvotes · 15 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

you don't care about God or his vision only yourself

Founder of the sub here. If you spent even 10 seconds looking around, you'd see that about 90% of what is taught from myself and even several other mods/ECs is about living up to Christ's mission: to make disciples of all nations.

This level of ignorance makes it abundantly obvious that you are not actually reading what's taught here; you just wanted to stereotype and rile people up. No trolls permitted here.

I feel stuck

7 upvotes · 12 August 2020 · /r/askRPC

My mission is to start my own brand of outdoor clothing/equipment and to act in films in order to influence culture in a more positive way instead of culture influencing us.

Here's your first problem. Your mission sucks. Yeah, it's your mission. If you claimed to be a non-Christian, I'd say go for it. But if you're in Christ, that should change.

When guys like /u/Praexology and I ask what your mission is it's not because we want to change your mission or see how disciplined you are in fulfilling whatever it is you're doing. It's because we want to see how far of a gap there is between what you want for your life and what God wants for your life.

I have not hidden from men what a narrow/non-existent gap looks like - and many men have taken the hint and give me a fake mission for themselves just to appease, because they know what we're looking for here. But let me reiterate this again: "Go therefore and make disciples of all nations." Got it?

Now, if that's what Jesus wants from your life, why does your mission not reflect this? Because you want different things from your life than he does. This is where guys like /u/redwall92 hit the nail on the head. You clearly have blue pill fantasies about what your life should look like that aren't aligned with reality. And 99.99% chance: the reason you're not getting your blue pill fantasies fulfilled aren't because they're unfulfillable, but because you make them your goal instead of Scripture.

Matthew 6:33 - "Seek first his Kingdom and his righteousness and all these things will be added to you as well." It's not that hard. What are you doing for the good of the Kingdom? It sounds like you're only focusing on the righteousness component and ignoring the Kingdom-building aspect. You can't seek your own righteousness and ignore seeking God's reign across the earth and think you're still going to get the promises afforded to those who do.

Watch sermons about 4 times a week. I don't read the Bible as much as I should Seriously - this is another huge problem. Stop being a sermon junkie. You ever see the hand illustration? Here's an over-simplified version. Working from pinky to thumb, your engagement in the Word becomes deeper and more alive. At best, you're hearing and maybe reading on rare occasions. I'm extremely doubtful that you're actually studying the word. I'd wager what you'd call "study" is really topical research, and the two aren't even close to the same. You've already said you're not memorizing, which inherently means you're not meditating on the Word either. The full illustration would involve asking you to hold a Bible with just your pinky and (if we're being generous on your self-assessment, we'll also let you use) your ring finger. Can you even do it? If you can, how easily will the Word be snatched away from you if that's all you've got? Add in the others and your grasp on the Word becomes more firm and can't be stolen away.

Stats: 5'11" 25yo. 155lbs. Deadlift 180 squat 195 bench 185 triceps 45 both arms bicep curls

These numbers are extremely awkward. /u/OsmiumZulu - you ever see someone who benches more than he can deadlift? Or who squats more than he can deadlift even? This is all kinds of backwards. And you're curling 45s? Stop working those biceps and get the rest of your body in shape. You've been around these parts for a minimum of 8 months, brother. My bench went from 135 to 250+ in 6. What's the holdup? You say you're hitting the gym. I'm guessing you go, do your comfortable routine, then hit the showers. Do you actually have mile-markers you're striving to accomplish or not?

STFU in real life goes well. Maybe that's why I'm posting here so much. In regards to STFU with women around, I used to be quiet a lot but lately I've been trying to open up and socialize to learn what it's like to communicate. I feel like an autistic sometimes

... no, it's not because you didn't go the college route. It's because you are conflating STFU with being socially incompetent. STFU doesn't mean you withdraw from social situations to reddit, only making time for the friends you knew when you were 5 years old. I'm glad you're trying to open this up. You say you attempt number-closing for practice every now and then. Shift gears for now to broader human relationships. Instead of number-closing, try friend-closing. Get some new people in your sphere of influence. My guess is that these people you chill with either (1) aren't a good influence on you, hence why you're stuck in a rut, or (2) they're fantastic role models, but they don't have enough of a voice in your life to influence you for the better. Either way, the solution is to move away because if whatever good influence they have to offer (if any) isn't working, find someone else who can help you.

After Christ revealed himself to me was when my life changed in a positive more successful way but I became this hermit.

That's because you caved to churchianity idiocy that tells new believers to cut off everything from their old non-Christian lives and start fresh. Total garbage. A good book to counter this mentality: The Insider, by Jim Petersen and Mike Shamy. It addresses the way believers should be encouraged to maintain their "insider" role with non-believers rather than ditching everyone for Christ, which pushes non-believers further away.

I guess I need some encouragement?

No, you're validation-seeking. You want to know there are other guys in your shoes so that you feel less bad. "See? It's not just me!" Just because someone else's life sucks worse than yours doesn't mean your life is better than it is. Don't look for comparison. Don't look for validation in camaraderie over lowliness.

What you need is a kick in the butt. Start focusing your life on something that matters. Get your mission figured out above all else.

No, your congregation does not preach "biblical headship"

7 upvotes · 12 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

If a guy wants to take the more physically demanding tasks, go for it. That's his prerogative. But good luck finding a verse that obligates him to do so. Besides, mowing the lawn is hardly what I'd call physically demanding. If you're talking about hauling bales of hay, that might be a different story - but even then I'm sure u/willow-girl would have some words for you. Even my own wife, who has practically never lifted in her life, has proven a competent helper on major construction and home remodeling jobs - enough that she'd be capable even without me. But you show me a routine household job that's too physically demanding for a woman to complete reliably and I'll be happy to reconsider.

A picture of a relationally solid church community

7 upvotes · 11 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is some scary stuff here - and holy cow do you have rosy-colored glasses on. This is about the most blue-pill congregation I've heard of lately ... so why are you promoting it here? I mean, I can see how your leaders thought this was a good idea, just like most blue pill churchianity leaders think they have some fantastic ideas ... but there are HUGE concerns that I expect will have massively negative long-term consequences. I started writing up a long response to individual points, but deleted it and opted to go for a more categorical reply, as there's literally so much wrong with this that even I can't write at that length. Enough other people like /u/RedPillWonder have done that well enough.

First, many of my concerns would fall in the category of skepticism. Frankly, I call BS on any implication that the congregants are actually living up to even half of what you're describing here - and you already acknowledge so much wiggle-room in the post itself that I'm more inclined to believe that you're speaking from a place of "congregational pride" (the churchianity "I love my congregation! Everyone should praise my congregation for how great it is!" view) than of actual objective information. And you even acknowledge in a number of places that you're basing your information on subjective observation rather than being privy to the backroom discussions (I've been in both and they rarely line up).

In this, most congregations tend to keep things that would negatively reflect on the structure hush hush. I'm not surprised you have a rosy view because you've probably been fed a rosy view the same way North Korea has its citizens believing they're following a physical deity who happens to be a fat idiot, and that they're the greatest nation on earth, despite being totally screwed up.

What I really hear about all of this is: The pastor preaches a lot of really strict rules and "cultural expectations" about relationships from the pulpit, which gives the impression that people are actually living them out in their private lives outside of Sunday services, without any actual objective evidence that they're doing so.

These conversations always lead to the same result: "You can doubt the veracity of what I'm saying if you want, but the fact is that I'm here and you're not and I know what I see is true." Then, of course, you give no reference to anyone to visit the congregation and confirm for themselves if it's all you say it is.

Second, most of the descriptions you give for your congregation are no different than any other congregation, especially if there's an absence of enforcement ... which you wobble wobble on, not wanting to commit either way because either answer would call out BS on many things you've said. If there is enforcement, then it's a pharisaic culture. If there's not, then it's identical to every other congregation that preaches a high purity culture. So, instead, you vaguely say that "some things are rules and other things are culture," and only give an example of the one thing that's obviously cultural without sharing which ones are actual enforceable rules.

Virtually every congregation I've ever attended encourages physical purity, setting curfews, being marriage-minded in relationships, use of accountability software, marrying young, short engagements, etc., etc. I see nothing special or unique in here, except in regard to some rather extreme concepts that, if enforced, would really shed a negative light on the congregation from a biblical standpoint.

Third, the other chunk of concerns I had were because there are a number of things that are directly contrary to the red pill.

1. Sniper mentality is encouraged. Any effort to maintain a shotgun approach is condemned.
2. Husbands are encouraged to "help" their wives. You claim they teach "headship," but all I'm hearing is the same weak complementarianism every other congregation pushes.
3. They're trying to "keep hypergamy in check" by controlling women's behaviors rather than making hypergamy work for a man.
4. They encourage "long distance relationships." Long distance relationships don't exist. This is literally Rollo Year 1 stuff.
5. Encouraging people to marry young - i.e. when a woman is at her SMV peak and a man is at his lowest, rather than the man is at his peak. This puts men at a huge disadvantage and far more prone to marital dissatisfaction by his mid-late 30s, and especially by the mid-life crisis age-range (mid-late 40s).
6. A complete opposition to any mystery in the relationship because husbands have to make sure their wives know every single thing they ever text to another woman, or can never be alone with someone of the opposite gender.
7. "Serious spousal conflicts" still exist at all. Seriously, that's the biggest red flag that shows this congregation's views on marriage are less effective than the red pill concepts we teach from Scripture here. I know Rollo has written that he can count on one hand the number of "serious conflicts" he's had with his wife. Since becoming red pill, I can count them on ... well, I can't because it hasn't happened yet. How about you, /u/OsmiumZulu - any conflicts for you? I know you've commented on that before.

There are others I'd mention that are less "anti red pill" and more "unbiblical" - like the idea that "children are raised collectively" (seriously, that's some BLM garbage right there).

Fourth, and MOST IMPORTANTLY: I don't see any indication that anyone is actually discipling anyone else. In fact, every time you talk about discipleship within this congregation I started to cringe because the context makes it clear that you're using the same watered-down garbage that countless other congregations do. To be fair, the watered-down version is still better than nothing at all, which is where many are still at.

The biggest trigger phrase for me was: "centralized babysitting a few days a week at night, so that couples could go and do evangelism, discipleship, etc." This language represents a complete misunderstanding of how Jesus made disciples. Again, to be fair, I get more vocal at congregations that come up with these half-measures than those that don't do it at all ... the whole "be hot or cold, but not luke-warm" concept. Jesus didn't make disciples by casting the kids aside and having one-on-one conferences with someone to discuss the topic of the week. The children ran around and he prohibited them from kicking the kids aside. When I disciple guys (especially those who are local), I actively WANT them to see how I interact with my kids. How else are they going to learn to interact with theirs? Through a lesson and filling out a worksheet I prepared? That's a joke. Discipleship is from life-modeling.

You said you're single, so you may not get this yet. But when you do have kids, do you imagine that the way you'll raise them is through weekly one-on-one sessions for an hour or two where you teach them everything they need to know for life, and then you send them on their way to be by themselves until the next meeting or the random call-ins you might have throughout the week? Of course not. You'd go to jail for child neglect. And many jurisdictions (for court purposes) are now even acknowledging purely psychological issues as grounds for child neglect, even when you take care of their physical needs.

CONCLUSION

What you've described is exactly what Robert Glover talks about in NMMNG - that when a Nice Guy's strategy doesn't work, instead of changing it he doubles-down. He tries even harder at the exact same thing that's failing. Your congregation has done exactly that. They have doubled-down on all the same blue pill garbage that all the other congregations tried and failed at.

I'll note: there's very little discussion in this post about how hot the sex is among the married couples. Of course, you can't - because you're not allowed to talk about that ... especially as a single guy, that kind of conversation might tempt you. I'd bet money it's no better - maybe even worse - than the typical congregation.

Tag: /u/rocknrollchuck - I see you didn't comment in this post, but I'd be curious of your thoughts.

Make it easy for your spouse

7 upvotes · 14 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm always glad when you put a post up because I know it's going to be good.

making it easy for your spouse to do what God commands

Part of this is actually giving them an opportunity. For the longest time, I thought that by having no expectations over my wife I was making life easier for her. In reality, by having no expectations or commands for her to follow, she had no ability to do what God called her to do in our marriage: submit and follow. This was incredibly unsatisfying for her and infuriating for me when she was acting upset with me and couldn't explain why because it doesn't make logical sense for a woman to be upset with a man whose primary goal is to make her life easier. Yet that's biblical truth for you - always confounding the wise.

So, part of making it easier for her was to start giving clear direction in our life/marriage so that she actually had the opportunity to be a submissive follower in the first place. Taking away those things literally made it impossible for her to fulfill her role.

If they see their spouse improve, they assume it's short-lived ... And in the end, as at the beginning, they reap what they sow.

I just want to point out that this is often self-fulfilling prophecy. For most people who don't understand the 1,000 ft rope scenario, they assume their spouse should catch on quite quickly to the self-improvement trend you're trying to start. When it doesn't happen right away and the negative-spouse is skeptical about it all, they refuse to catch on, discouraging the positive-spouse and bringing them right back down. In most of these cases, if the negative-spouse had a positive-attitude and assumed that the changes were for real, a positive feedback loop could be started rather than negative normalization occurring.

Do you think God has a good grasp of human psychology and behavior?

Do you think the Creator understands male and female nature and all of its expressions?

Do you think that when He gives commands to each spouse, that He's doing it because it's not only right but because it works?

Or do you think He just likes seeing each spouse jump through hoops and act all crazy and get out of sorts at times?

Fantastic logic here, brother. Well said.

Another layer to all of this is to make sure you're not improving FOR your spouse. Yes, it is good to make things easier for them, but if your goal in doing so is to conform their behavior, you're living in their frame. The story is about them and the climax your life is building toward is whether they will change or not. If, as a man, the big even that you're working for in life is getting your spouse to change, you have a lame life. For a woman, this is somewhat the reverse, especially if your man is spiritually weak. For those women I know who are more spiritually mature than their pseudo-Christian husband, the single most powerful thing that they can look forward to is the transformation of their husband - because that sets them on the proper path without having to play the God v. spouse game. But for men, we have bigger fish to fry than figuring out if she'll change or not. Yes, encourage that change. Work toward her sanctification. But Jesus's goal as a groom was not to sanctify the church - it was to get the Gospel to the nations. Sanctifying the Church was one of the things in the process of accomplishing that goal, but it's not the goal itself. Don't make it your primary goal either. Instead, let the sanctification of your wife be a waypoint that, while not necessary, is substantially helpful. Yet even Jesus said that if the Church wouldn't, the rocks would cry out.

RPC Podcast Episode 7: The Importance of OYS

7 upvotes · 10 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Fair enough. You could go without your video if you want. Or do a non identifying picture like oz.OZ. Your call when we get there though. Just know the invitation is outstanding.

Feeling discouraged with many churches' support of the Black Lives Matter movement, including my own.. Are there any truly alt-right/conservative churches left that don't buy into this?

7 upvotes · 2 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is what I've been trying to tell people. I have a degree in statistical methodology, which is the study of how statistics are gathered and what they mean when applied to real-world conclusions. It's incredibly disappointing to see how so many bad statistics are put out - not that they're false. Many of the statistics the media references are true. But they only investigate far enough to confirm their biases and then stop. They never ask the questions: "Why might this be happening?" or "Is there something more at play?" unless it advantages their liberal purposes.

Corona is a great example of this. I just had a conversation with another user who was quoting death rates in the 5% range, which is ludicrous, as it causes most of the 20-49 year old people on social media to think that 1 out of 20 of them who get corona will die. Yet that statistic is true, so why shouldn't they believe that? Because out of those 5% virtually all of them are 80+. Anyone between 20-49, according to one study, really only has a .0092% chance of dying. Whoop ti doo. This is what misreporting statistics does.

You're finding the same truth being uncovered by looking deeper into the half-truths to discover the other unreported half, and that's an essential work that modern liberal media journalists are uninterested in doing because it crushes their narrative and loses them viewers.

While I wasn't a very big fan of them either, I was very sad when Fox News was bought out by Disney, as there is now no major network that doesn't have a liberal boss.

Anyone else frustrated with their church leadership re: COVID?

7 upvotes · 30 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm going to reiterate what I just said on another thread:

- YOUR LOCAL CONGREGATION IS NOT "THE CHURCH"

It's a dangerous mentality to confuse the two. This mixup between congregations and The Church is what shifted CHRISTianity to CHURCHianity, which was the pathway to the feminization of mainstream congregations.

The Church in Scripture is the whole of God's Kingdom. The congregation structure we have today is a tool that The Church has utilized to aid in the spread of the Gospel. It's a good and useful structure. But it's not a necessary one. It's one we could leave in the dust and never look back and be perfectly fine.

I wrote this post a couple months ago, sharing my frustration with the "let's get our Sunday services back!" obsession that has occurred with the coronavirus shutdowns. The premise is simply that too many people have become so obsessed with the structure of the church (i.e. the congregational tool) that they have abandoned the mission of The Church and believe it can only be accomplished through that tool. This is the same thing as a plumber who worships his pipe cutter so heavily that he uses it for everything, even in ways it was never meant to be utilized ... and the result is a total disaster.

Explaining the Double Standards around Sex

7 upvotes · 14 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

If by "train wreck" you mean "mods and ECs have drastically improved their lives, marriages, and sex lives and are making more of a difference for the benefit of God's Kingdom than they were before," sure. In the meantime, trolling isn't permitted here - and yes, that rule does apply to you insofar as this sub is concerned. You're welcome to read, but your commenting rights are being revoked.

Explaining the Double Standards around Sex

7 upvotes · 13 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Hysterical. The blogger uses the exact same mental gymnastics women use in order to avoid saying the church is feminized. So cute.

How do I approach my husband about this issue?

7 upvotes · 18 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Please make your comments in a single comment. Clogging the thread with 4 different comments won't be permitted going forward. If you think of something after you make your original comment, except in rare circumstances, just hit the "edit" button and update your original comment.

Bible Studies for Men's small group

7 upvotes · 22 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Why are there so many Bible study groups, but no Scripture memory groups? Try something unique. Pick a book of the Bible and try to memorize it together. Talk about it as you recite it to each other.

Philippians has 102 verses. That's 2/wk. Say your group is 1/4 of a year. That's 8 verses/wk to memorize. Very doable. I GUARANTEE you will find more value out of this than everyone showing up after reading the passage once, pretending they actually studied it in-depth, and proceeding to BS around some ideas they had on the spot about what a few things mean.

Raise your expectations and see if they follow. Make it a challenge. Be better than the rest of churchianity.

Was gonna go on mission this year, and now they changed the staff. I don't feel like going

7 upvotes · 14 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Was gonna go on mission this year

Huh? You're not on mission every day?

It is wrong for me to think this way? When it comes to serving in mission

YES! Because your mission isn't about where you go. That's just context. Your mission is to make disciples wherever you are. Some people go to do that, some people stay to do that.

The reality is: you can't actually make a disciple on a 2-week mission trip. It took 3 years. Are we so arrogant to believe we can do in 2 weeks what he spent 3 years doing - and it took him that long even with his top picks of all the people following him at that point. You're going to go among strangers and think you're somehow going to meet someone brand new, not really have much selective option in who you meet with, and think you can accomplish anything at all?

Short-term "missions" trips are not about the people you're going to meet. Every pastor I've ever spoken with about this issue ultimately agrees with me on this (often begrudgingly, as they like to hold onto their fantasy notions for as long as possible). That's not to say they're bad or fruitless. The fruit just isn't in the people at the destination. It's in what happens in your own heart as a result of you going. It's about you seeing that there's a broader world out there that needs the Gospel and how you can have a global vision through even local mission.

You don't want to go on the trip? Don't go. Or do. It really doesn't matter. Whether you go or not doesn't change the fact that you have a mission right where you are. Are you going to accomplish it or not?

Why Men Hate Going To Church

7 upvotes · 14 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Solid, brother. I had been meaning to write a post parallel to this, focusing primarily on the idolatry of the congregational structure, made even more plainly obvious by the present lockdown. Maybe I'll hold off a bit to let these words here settle in for guys.

For now, let me piece together something for you that might even further enhance your ~~church-going~~ Sunday-service-attending experience:

As a Bible believing, Jesus following, hardcore Christian man who's mission in life is to evangelize and make disciples of ALL people, I'll admit I attend church mostly for my family

Great. Perfect mission. Now, part of making disciples is helping the spiritually dead/young learn to be like Jesus, then follow him just as you do. So, what if I told you I wanted to help you on this mission and I could gather for you dozens, hundreds, or even thousands of people who are:

1. Hopelessly lost and misled, desperately needing someone to help them follow Jesus.
2. The people I would find for you would have already communicated at least some desire to want to follow Jesus, so you don't have to worry about filtering through hundreds of people to find a few who are ripe to disciple.
3. Many of them will be non-Christians, but who still have a desire to become saved (some perhaps already thinking they are).
4. I could also find for you others who, with a little guidance from you, would enthusiastically help you disciple everyone else in the group.
5. That I'd make sure this group would be conveniently located within a reasonable driving distance from you and others in the community so there would be no geographical barriers.
6. That I would already be priming these people to want to go out and make a difference in the community, so that when you're ready, after training them, to send them to make more disciples, the foundation will already be there for them to do that.
7. The only catch is: because I gathered them, they'll be loyal to me and you'll have to build some relational clout with them before they'll follow you. Don't worry, though. I may not be discipling them alongside you, but I'll certainly support your effort and encourage others in what you do.

If I could create such a place for you, and you wouldn't have to exhaust any effort at all in gathering such people or finding them, wouldn't that be a fantastic resource for advancing your mission so you wouldn't have to start from scratch?

This should be your mindset walking into Sunday service every week. It is a tool. Someone has done all the hard work of creating it for you, saving you countless man-hours of relational networking social discerning, heart-orienting, etc. Take advantage of his misguided hard-labor for your Christ-guided missional efforts. Now go.

When do you know that they're the one?

7 upvotes · 10 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I was fascinated when a former pastor of mine mentioned at a small group once, his wife at his side, her hand on his leg: "I love my wife. If she died, I would be sad. But my life would not be over. I have bigger things going on in my life than her, and she knows that - and those are the things that keep me going. I'd mourn for a time - it might be a few weeks, it could be months, but I'd ultimately be fine. Why? Because I don't need her. I need God. I want her, but my emotional well-being does not depend on her."

He was one of the earliest precursors to the red pill in my life. He eventually left full time ministry and opened a cigar/dark beer shop (seriously: no light beer permitted; it was one of his rules). I was very sad when he relocated to do that.

Don't use a virus as an excuse

7 upvotes · 20 March 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I just wrote this in another thread:

My setup ...

- A stationary bike. This is the one I use; goes for $200.
- A bench. This is the one I use. $100. Note: I don't have the bar, I just use it with dumbbells.
- Some dumbbells. Highest I have are 45lb. They're $90 for a ste at Walmart. That said, I probably need to get a couple more sets - 45s aren't enough to curl with anymore, but 100s would be perfect for doing heavy sets of the standing row and high-rep sets on the bench.

Now, I've bought these things over the past few years, not all at once. But even if you do have to buy it all at once, the point is that you can get basic crap for pretty cheap that will get the job done. The things I mentioned here should be enough to at least do maintenance work and collectively would be around $400 (with tax). I'm paying $75/mo for my family gym membership that we can't use anymore. If yours is comparable and this lockdown ends up lasting into summer, like some people are projecting, you could easily break even. While you might not get AS good of a workout as you will in the gym, you'll have access to keep using these things indefinitely even when you do go back to the gym. At that point, you have options. If you don't have time one day to drive to the gym, you have alternative things to do at home that knock off the 20+ minutes on your round trip.

I should add - the stationary bike is a great way to multi-task for a slow calorie burn while watching movies or playing games with my kids. I've been able to get a lot of work done on it too - phone calls (as long as I keep the pedaling slow), setup a laptop on a nearby TV tray, text and e-mail clients from my phone, etc. For reference, I usually bike an average of 30 miles a day 6 days a week during these times I can't go to the gym, plus anything to do with dumbbells and body weight.

The Truth About Porn

7 upvotes · 5 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with u/iseeitnow7. Your thoughts here only apply to the degree the wife is actually willing. Your question implies that her obedience to God should appropriately depend on her getting what she wants from her husband first. This is a wrong framework.

I do agree that a man should not look at porn and that this will have a negative impact on his marriage. My point in this post wasn't to prove otherwise. It was more to show that there are other more damaging things to marriage than porn use and porn is simply the church's go to scapegoat for blaming men so they don't have to blame women.

At first glance it might sound like I'm trying to point the finger at women, but that's really peripheral. I'm more interested in relieving men of the pressure and stress of beating all that risk and blame because that in itself is a lot of what's keeping them on the hook with porn in the first place, among many other unattractive qualities in their life.

The Truth About Porn

7 upvotes · 5 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Haha. In fairness, I edited that in at the end after realizing I didn't have time to edit the whole post.

[FR] "Happy Life, Happy Wife" & Empathy Theory

7 upvotes · 17 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I can't prove this, but at least in my life it's the trend

When you give the examples in your life to go with it, we call those field reports. Individually, they are only anecdotes. En masse, we get enough of a sample size to start understanding with statistical reliability how people actually function. This is the essence of the red pill's method of discerning its praxeology. Don't just state your conclusions: give the stories to back them up as field reports. This is where the true value of posts like this come in. Skipping to the conclusion causes skepticism - a thing I was guilty of early in my RP journey.

Women, generally speaking, are more empathetic than men. (meaning they are capable of feeling what other people are feeling without the original stimuli.)

With your given definition of empathy, I agree whole-heartedly. But there's a reason I call them "emotional empathys" rather than "more empathetic." Empathy in modern culture doesn't mean the technical definition you gave; rather, people take the term to mean that women care more about how other people are feeling and wanting to help them without selfish interest. Among women, this may very well be the case. Women are highly caring toward other women. Women do not share the same affection for men - (especially?) even ones they are in romantic or marriage relationships with. Conversely, men have a very strong track record for showing great concern for the well-being and feelings of the opposite gender, and men tend to be slightly more affectionate toward the plight of other men than women are. On the whole, by the way culture uses the word, men are actually more empathetic in the sense of being caring and sensitive toward others, but women are more prone to your definition of the word. So while your definition is correct, be cautious on how you word yourself when speaking of this term, as it's going to cross signals if you don't include your definition next time the way you did here.

Women both empathize consciously, but they also emphasize unconsciously. Or better said they are not always in control of their feeling empathy for others.

Correct: and they may resent others for the way they empathically experience negative emotions that they don't want to pick up on, even when the person communicating those emotions had no intention of doing so.

Empathy works negatively. "I'm sad because you're sad." But also positively "I'm happy because you're happy."

Spot on.

Women typically value group success over individual success and will dampen personal ideas/feelings/motivations for the sake of the group.

This is only true among women. It is not inherently true when their grouping is their husband or boyfriend, as their sin nature for control takes over as the default, unless they are highly mature or naturally/conditioned with discipline to reign this in.

she unintentionally empathizes with my mood: relaxed, calm, and jovial

I'm curious how much of this was her just not wanting to do something to increase her stress or rock the boat. In my experience neutral emotions, like "relaxed" and "calm" do not communicate through empathy as well.

Women like to feel something over nothing whenever possible. So, if they have the option between frustration and anger v. calm and relaxed, they will exhibit calm and relaxed. So, the positive vibe you put out has to be stronger than her frustration/anger for her to side with it. Again, though, that's just my experience.

I told her "I'm planning on being in a good mood tonight ... try it out and let me know

Personally, I'm not a fan of verbalizing this. But if others want to test this and find similar success, I'm happy to change my mind. My wife's response, though, is typically that she can't just flip a switch and change how she's feeling, and suggesting that she do so only makes her more furious. If I just do what I'm going to do without telling her to follow, she follows anyway, as her mood subconsciously adapts to mine. Telling her what I'm doing undermines the process because bringing it to the conscious defeats the value of the subconscious process. At that point she must consciously want to be in a better mood, and many women would prefer to revel in their frustration, believe it or not.

she was in a significantly better mood, I could tell she was still stressed

This makes me more persuaded that she's in a "don't rock the boat" frame of mind rather than true empathic absorption. You were there, though, not me.

"I don't know how you always have a cool head when I'm like that. It's frustrating." (Here she is trying to get me to feel her feelings. Nope, sorry girl, no can do.)

Good on you. That's something my wife gets frustrated about too. I wrote about it about a year ago here: https://www.reddit.com/r/askMRP/comments/9sfxb/the_consciously_crazy_wife/. That's also the first post my wife read when she snooped into my reddit account, haha. Fun times.

If I'm worried or anxious, she's allowed to be. (But I would never show it on purpose/in my right mind.)

You're missing out on a good opportunity here. You're also forcing your wife to bottle up her anxiety when in reality you should give her small outlets here and there to blow off steam before the pressure builds too greatly. Her emotional levels will certainly match yours over time, but the capacity of her emotional system is much smaller than yours. So, while you might be able to go through a few doze cycles before hitting a maximum pressure capacity, she might be able to handle 10 before she's ready to blow. You'll discover this after you're married. When you're ready, you'll also learn the art of strategically getting her angry so she can release that pressure.

Happy Life, Happy Wife

When people mention the actual cliché, I often word my response: "You're right, a happy wife does make for a happy life. But a happy husband is what it takes to make a happy wife."

Overall, solid field report. Thanks for sharing!

Hey there @mgtow_judge, here's another profile for your Instagram, and while you're at it we'd appreciate you mentioning our sub every once in awhile. Thanks!

7 upvotes · 12 October 2019 · /r/WhereAreAllTheGoodMen

I just assumed she was punctuationally illiterate and didn't realize commas went between those words.

Is there a subreddit for people who are real christians but don't go to church?

7 upvotes · 1 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Since this is only locked and not entirely removed, let me be clear on a few things:

- Sunday services are not "church." Take them or leave them at your discretion.
- The Church, proper, is God's Kingdom on earth, which includes every believer you are in fellowship with.
- Every time I meet with other believers who I have a meaningful relationship with through Christ, I am "going to church," whether it happens to be in a building on a Sunday morning, in a coffee shop in the afternoon, or in my dining room on a Wednesday evening.
- Despite this difference between biblical and mainstream vocabulary, mainstream congregations still have immense value and a man would do well to assess the value they can add to his mission and make use of it.

- It would be virtually impossible for a man to have a thriving discipler-making ministry in the absence of local congregations doing the hard work of gathering together hordes of people who are willing, at a very base level, to say they want to follow Jesus.
- If you cannot find people worth discipling on your own, or in the event that you still need to be disciplined, if you can't find someone to disciple you - then you need to be part of a local congregation to help you find these people.

Finding a women in California

7 upvotes · 16 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm also [blah, blah, blah]. I'm trying my best atleast. But every relationship I've been in has failed

Translation: "I've got some great qualities. Why can't women just love and respect me for that?" Because women don't love men the way men love women. Men are okay with women who are genuinely trying, even if they fail. Women are only interested in men when they actually succeed in being able to offer them something that they get out of it. Men love idealistically; women love opportunistically.

The only legit, submissive women I dated was ... every last one of them. All women are innately submissive. They've just conditioned themselves out of it. It's like Romans 2 saying that all people have a conscience, but some people have calloused their conscience (per Romans 1) to the point where it's not even recognizable - but it's still there, hidden underneath all the sinful conditioning of the fallen nature.

Never forget the fact that all women are, by default, designed to be submissive. It's just a matter of drawing this out of them. As /u/Deep_Strength noted, teachability is critical. Finding a non-selfish, non-opportunistic, non-feminist woman who doesn't feel entitled to boss men around - who is also attractive ... well, that's virtually impossible. But in my estimation, about 1/3 of people I meet within biblical congregations meet the FAT criteria (faithful, available, teachable). That's much better odds than looking for what you're looking for.

I stopped praying for a good biblical women 2 years ago and just accepted that I might be single forever.

This is a false dichotomy. Did Karl Benz run around saying, "I've been looking all over for years to find a car naturally existing in nature, but having not found one I accept that I may be without an automobile for the rest of my life"?

No, he went out and invented the flipping car and revolutionized the world for all of us.

Some guy along the way from Adam to the PUAs to the TRPs to the MRPs to here has figured out how to invent a unicorn (hint: I'm pretty sure it was Jesus) and then taught other show to recreate the process that we now talk about here on RPC. You don't find a unicorn, you make one. But if you insist on looking, then you're right: expect to be single forever.

It's better than being stuck with a controlling self obsessed women like the last few I've dated.

If they stay this way for longer than a few dates, it's likely that you're not attractive enough to demand their submission. There are stories upon stories told on the RP forums of even the most heinous feminazis bowing in submission to attractive men. I don't know where you are in Cali, but if it's LA, then you've really got to go above and beyond due to pretty much everyone being in top physical shape all the time. Hypergamy is a comparison game, not a quest to find a self-actualized man. If you're around other highly attractive people, expect to have to be more attractive than them to get hypergamy to work for you.

I

Confronting the myth that you have to “earn sex” in marriage, and that if your wife deprives you, or worse, cheats on you with another man, it is completely your fault as a man for not being “red pill’d” enough to stop her. This attitude is blue pill’d, and takes away responsibility from women.

7 upvotes · 11 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Are you kidding? You talk about real world scenarios, but then give totally fake examples to prove your case.

Orthodox Jews and Muslims absolutely do have these problems. I haven't researched among Muslims as much, but I know several (usually my clients - I just had a hearing with one this morning) who tell me the ins and outs of their marriage and culture. After all, it's my job to see this stuff. The women are just as rebellious in American Muslim culture as they are in American Christian culture.

For Jews, research the concept of the moredet. Here's a good article:

<https://jwa.org/encyclopedia/article/legal-religious-status-of-moredet-rebellious-wife>. They had to create whole legal systems to deal with their "untame" women.

The difference here is that we don't live in Israel or under Jewish/Israeli or Sharia law. We live under American law. If the legal system were to be different, then sure, compelled submission is different. Go change the legal system then. Good luck. If you want to be subject to a better legal system, go move to one of those countries that have better marriage laws.

The problem is that you want the best of all worlds, but you don't have the power to create what you're looking for. Go to a country with better marriage laws and you're going to find all kinds of other problems, like dealing with the Taliban or horrible economic structures.

At the end of the day, we don't get to create our own ideal government unless we ourselves are the revolutionary. Otherwise, we're stuck among the options we're given and the consequences that the laws of those options brings. So you decide what's more important to you: better marriage laws or decent economic structure and not having to worry about Muslim terrorists bombing your city? It would be great if we could have the best of both worlds, but that's not the choice we get.

So either be a revolutionary, start your own country and dominate the world until you have respect to earn a seat at the UN ... or make do the best you can in the country you're in and stop wishing that you were in another country that you really don't want to live in in the first place.

Tag: /u/rocknrollchuck

Monogamy

7 upvotes · 10 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I

getting my wife to buy into the idea

Frame, frame, frame.

Does she trust you to be a man?

7 upvotes · 17 June 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

While it's an interesting exercise, this list could be replicated for pretty much any virtue other than trust. For example, I could say MRP is all about conquering fear:

- Drunk Captain: fear of the ship crashing
- Doesn't clean up after himself: fear of living in a pig sty forever
- Fat and lazy: fear that she'll never be able to brag to her friends about him
- Finances a mess: fear that the mortgage won't get paid

You get the point. That's when you say, "Ah, but isn't fear just based on a lack of trust?" Sure, so let's pick something more bizarre to continue the list: MRP is all about comedy ...

- ONEitis: When you're pathetic, she's laughing at you, not with you.
- Not growing/developing: You have to be making progress for her to feel relaxed enough in the relationship to laugh with you.
- Not OYS: Too much crap to get done to have time to laugh.
- Whining: instead of laughing.

Or what about dancing?

- Not setting or maintaining boundaries: Without proper boundaries you step on each other's toes too much to dance effectively.
- Can't pass fitness tests: She dances her own way and won't follow your lead.
- Can't identify fitness tests: You can't tell when she's stealing the lead from you on the dance floor.

Trust is certainly a tool that you can use to work for you. But I don't think it's as central as your post implies.

New York state lawmakers introduce bill to decriminalize sex work...

7 upvotes · 11 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

While your conclusion sounds good in theory, and I'd love nothing more than to believe you're right ... I think this is one of those situations where the practical impact of a thing doesn't turn out like theory would predict. I may respond more fully if I find the time.

Two Principles for Younger Men...

7 upvotes · 8 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good post. Two things come to mind:

First, "pursue excellence" makes sense from a general secular perspective on getting women. "Make disciples" works better from a biblical framework. After all, that is what we should excel at. Being effective at making disciples will, of course, involve excellence at many other areas of life as well.

Second, there seems to be some disconnect between "pursue excellence" and "don't do things to make yourself more attractive." Pursuing excellence intrinsically makes you more attractive, which you even acknowledge. I think what you meant to say is that you shouldn't try to be more attractive to women to get more women because then you're living in the frame of women. "What do women want from me in order to find me attractive? Let me go do that." That's the female frame. "Let me do what matters most to me. Oh, women happen to find that incredibly sexy?" That's your own frame.

How to take women's votes away to save them and society.

7 upvotes · 2 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Many men seem a bit scared and desperate.

Sure, about half a percent. Yes, that's still many, but the overwhelming majority of men are blind and supportive. Be careful not to give false impressions about the status of things - it really ruins credibility.

"since women affect the market as the main consumers they can boycott entire governments etc vote or not)"

This is ludicrous. People will always need to buy clothes, food, etc. Even at its best, feminism couldn't undermine the value of human entertainment and the way that people will compromise their values to keep spending money on going to the movies, buying TVs, eating out at restaurants, having nice furniture, etc. Again, don't overstate your position - this loses lots of credibility.

The point is to present and manifest patriarchy as benevolent patriarchy.

While I don't disagree, let's remember that the overwhelming majority of the world is non-Christian (even if they self-identify as believers). Without Christ transforming their lives, do you really think unbelieving men are capable of maintaining Christ-likeness in the way they would express patriarchal authority? Paul tells us the answer in Romans 3: no. "No one does good, not even one." Apart from Christ, there is no hope of anyone making the right decisions. That's the whole point of the Gospel - it's why we need Jesus in the first place.

So, a predecessor to anything you're suggesting is that men must be saved before a patriarchal society can work, right? Without Christ it's doomed to fail. And if you were a woman, would you rather your fate in your own hands or in fallen man's hands? For that matter, as a man, do you think other men want the responsibility for the fate of all women on their shoulders, or do you think they're more likely to take the easy path and let the women take responsibility for themselves so the men can breathe easier? From a non-believing perspective, that's a no brainer: take the easier life without the responsibility.

red pill men can boycott women

No, that's what MGTOW men do. There's a huge difference. I agree that men should avoid marriage whenever possible - focus on your mission for Christ first and above all. But I would never deny men the right to get married. Paul says in 1 Timothy 4:1-5

- Now the spirit expressly says that in later times some will depart from the faith by devoting themselves to deceitful spirits and teachings of demons, through the insincerity of liars whose consciences are seared, who forbid marriage and require abstinence from foods that God created to be received with thanksgiving by those who believe and know the truth. For everything created by God is good, and nothing is to be rejected if it is received with thanksgiving, for it is made holy by the word of God and prayer.

Don't be that guy.

Also, and u/OsmiumZulu can expand on this more if he likes - how do you think boycotting women is going to play out in the long term? Suppose you get a huge following - Christian men en masse stop getting married, so they stop having sex, so they stop having babies to raise up as more Christian men. To quote OZ elsewhere, "Sure, Christian man, don't reproduce. The global leftist elites would love nothing more."

1920s were not an evolution of justice, but the beginning of our end. Take women's votes away.

7 upvotes · 1 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This reminds me of a recent conversation I had with my wife. She's a staunch republican, through and through. She gets incredibly worried about liberals ruining our country, often making comments about moving to some other more "traditionally conservative Christian country" (as if such a place actually exists without incredible other sacrifices).

I showed her the stats at one point - that 56% of women identify or lean democrat, while only 37% identify or lean republican. That is, there are over 50% more women who identify/lean democrat as compared with republican.

I asked, "With this in mind, would you give up your right to vote if you knew it meant getting your republican candidate into office?" After all, 48% of men identify/lean republican as compared with 44% who identify/lean democrat - and I bet those numbers would be even more disparate if there wasn't an existing political agenda influenced by women voters.

She didn't have an answer. She said she wouldn't want to lose the right to vote, but she also believes in what's best for the country, and tried to argue that there must be some other solution.

1920s were not an evolution of justice, but the beginning of our end. Take women's votes away.

7 upvotes · 1 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting observations. Now interpret them for me.

Where can i add some dread?

7 upvotes · 29 April 2019 · /r/askMRP

The point of dread isn't to make her think you're screwing around with other women. It's for her to know that you could if you wanted to. The thought that you could get a better woman than her at the drop of a hat keeps her motivated - it means that you're the desirable one in the relationship, which affects her desire for you. Jealousy for jealousy's own sake doesn't do squat for your sex life. Even if you were actually cheating on her, that fact alone isn't what makes her attracted to you - jealousy just makes a person emotionally hysterical. The attractive factor that accompanies jealousy isn't the jealousy itself, but the reason why the jealousy crept up in the first place. That's why we don't call it jealousy game. Dread encompasses more than the dread of what you might be doing when you're gone - it's the dread of recognizing the relational imbalance and the fact that you can get all your needs met elsewhere, making her either (1) expendable, or (2) step up her game so she becomes indispensable.

Thoughts on Tim Keller Book Excerpt

7 upvotes · 9 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Our intense relational capacity, created and given to us by God, is purposely not fulfilled completely by our "vertical" relationship with him.

I'd like to see a reference for this line. He won't have one because it doesn't exist. I can provide several, though, that say that God is sufficient to satisfy us. This line may have been true before the cross (ex. if he tried to use Genesis 2), but certainly not once the veil was torn. Conclusion: This is blue pill cultural conditioning.

marriage is for helping each other to become our future glory-selves, the new creation that God will eventually make us

While it may have this impact, this is, again, not a scriptural conclusion. At best, one could argue that God created all the members of the body of Christ to be united as one spiritual body, and that marriage is the closest thing we see on earth to what this might look like. However, Jesus' saying that marriage will not exist in heaven proves quite definitively that physical marriage on earth does not inherently reflect our future heavenly state better than if we were to remain single.

So, then, he must mean that it causes us to become spiritually more alike to God's intentions for us, a la sanctification. But what about the countless relationships where two people actually pull each other down and destroy the purposes of sanctification in each other's lives? He'd have to be kidding or pretend that these relationships don't exist - and they are far more common than the sanctifying kind. So, once again, he's got to be in a blue pill fantasy land to believe that marriage is what causes people to become more godly, as they will eventually be in heaven. The marriage is not what does that; the interaction patterns expressed through godly marriage are what do this, and you can have those same interaction patterns with others outside the context of marriage to be sharpened into Christ-likeness, otherwise we would have to explain away Paul's sanctification process, or any other disciple who remained single.

As for the purpose of marriage, Malachi 2:15 proves him wrong, as it clearly identifies "producing godly offspring" as the purpose of marriage, not sanctification. While sanctification can certainly happen in marriage, it is no more the purpose of marriage than it would be to say that God's purpose for the church is to be sanctified, not to make disciples. In reality, sanctification is the refining process for the disciple-making mission, just as sanctification of the spouses is a refining process for their mission to make disciples.

One must be able to say "I see your flaws, imperfections, weaknesses, dependencies. But underneath them all I see growing the person God wants you to be."

Absolutely. Agreed there.

This is the essence of true spiritual friendship, eagerly helping one another know, serve, love, and resemble God in deeper and deeper ways.

Again, where's the reference for this? Let me provide a reference for my definition of "true spiritual friendship" - Philippians 2:2 - "Being like-minded, having the same love, being one in spirit and in purpose."

- like-minded: that is, we share the mind of Christ as the operative framework from which all we think, do, and believe flows.
- same love: that we love God together, both in a corporate and individual sense.
- being one in spirit: that we have the one Holy Spirit that unites us, creating a common spirit of the koinonia oneness we have with one another.
- and in purpose: that we share the same commitment to the great commission - the purpose Jesus gave to each of us before he ascended.

True spiritual friendships must incorporate each of these.

Sanctification is a group project, and most intense between two spouses

It can be, yes. But it doesn't have to be. When it is between two spouses, it certainly can be intense, though I have found a greater intensity of sanctification with my brothers in Christ than I have from my wife - and as a man I believe this is appropriate. Ephesians 5, on the other hand, indicates that this should be reversed for wives: that the husband does have the primary role of sanctifying his wife, as Christ does the church.

experience of marriage will unveil the beauty and depths of the gospel to you. It will drive you further into reliance on it. On the other hand, a greater understanding of the gospel will help you experience deeper union with each other as the years go on

I could not agree more with this statement. This is excellent. As I always say, physical marriage between spouses parallels the spiritual marriage between us and Christ. The one true advantage of physical marriage over singleness is that it gives us a clear road map to better understand the relationship we have with Christ through the Gospel. Amen to this point!

Everyone comes into marriage with an idea of gender roles and expectations.

To make a small jab, a couple of my fellow mods, even, aren't immune to this ;) I prefer to break all such roles and let the man, who is the head of the household, decide for his own house what those roles should be, within very broad boundaries prescribed by Scripture (i.e. headship, husband sanctifies wife, etc.).

God originally intended men and women together, in full participation, carrying out God's mandate to build civilization and culture

Goodness, sounds like the church's job, right? Oh yeah, because that IS the marriage God always intended. Funny that he says "originally intended," but leaves no room for God's changed intent to have this function fulfilled through spiritual marriage with Christ rather than physical marriage.

Neither sex has all the characteristics necessary to fulfill this alone, only in complementary union can mankind achieve God's purposes

Correct. Like our union with Christ.

The gospel calls both women and men to "play the Jesus role"

WHAT? THE? ACTUAL? FUECERSLLEKREJSLEFJSIFSDK? How does he justify this with passages like Ephesians 5 et seq. and 1 Cor. 11? Again, I want to see his references.

men modeling sacrificial authority and women modeling sacrificial submission

Theoretically, yes. But based on what I know of his other writings about what he means by sacrificial authority, ABSOLUTELY NOT.

Here's the thing. Most men look at everything their wives have been nagging them to do for the last several years and when they finally do it, they say, "Look, I sacrificed for her and got it done." Keller would applaud this. "Good job. You finally set aside Sunday football or afternoon video games to serve your wife." In reality, most men are just crappy passive leaders. They should be doing these things not as a sacrifice to serve their wife's interests, but because it's their freaking house, their dishes, their lawn, their broken-down car, etc.

Now, I know you - you own your own business. You want to see your business grow, right? So, when a client hires you for a project and you do the project, do you say, "Look how hard I sacrificed for you!?" No. That'd be idiotic. He paid you. It's your responsibility to do it. That's not a sacrifice. That's the job.

In the same way, God forgave us all our debts and gave us a ticket into heaven, then says, "Now I have a job for you." Paul says in Romans 1 that he is "obligated." How else do we understand obligation than a responsibility that comes with salvation? Responsibilities are things we do because it's part of who we are in light of what God has entrusted to us. We do not "sacrifice" anything when we live up to these responsibilities; rather, we are acting appropriately in light of all that we have received, just as if your client were to pay you the money up-front. Your position is still better than you started. There is no sacrifice - you have not decreased your status when you live up to responsibilities in honor of an arrangement you agreed to enter into. Enough on this tangent.

All of that aside, this is further verification, as I wrote to u/StrivingforTruth16 over here: "Tim Keller is a brilliant apologist and philosopher. He's not the best theologian." Notice that virtually all of his arguments in this excerpt are philosophical, springing from Scripture, not an interpretation of Scripture itself. That's a very dangerous sandbox to play in.

Submissive behaviour

7 upvotes · 12 March 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

Glad to help. r/RPChristians might be a good place to get more red pill information within a Christian context :)

Boyfriend of 2 years having issues with going to work

7 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

You're battling the dilemma between present feelings and future fruit. Right now, he's a tree caught on fire. You've decided to rest in his shade, as you'd expect to do from any other tree. To some degree, the fire makes things a little exciting. You want to know if the tree will burn down or somehow it'll come through and prove all those fantastical underdog stories we see in the movies. But probabilistic reality is that the tree will burn down. It will not bear fruit. And if you're resting in its shade without concern for the fire, you're going to burn with it.

You say, "I know he loves me." How is he expressing that love? Is he expressing it as a provider? As a leader? By modeling a lifestyle that you would want to follow? No, he's probably expressing it with words and professions of emotion. Watch what he does, not what he says. Saying he loves you means nothing if he's not doing anything to prove it.

While I'm open to hearing more information, if I go solely on what you've expressed here, he most certainly does not love you. At best, he's using professions of love toward you because he'd rather burn with someone, taking them down with him, than burn alone.

Does becoming more feminine attract men?

7 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

Your look is like a modern art gallery - it's impressive and I enjoy looking at it from the other side of the glass, but I'd be content to move on to the next piece until I find something that takes my breath away. You look cool, not sexy. Sexiness is what will attract a man, cool can contribute to keeping him. You're going to have to find some balance in your look and when you express different aspects of your fashion.

Also, don't change to a sexy look just to attract a man and think you can go back to your original look all the time. A guy will leave pretty quickly if he feels like he was deceived and the sexual attraction factor is gone.

My Anger Phase

7 upvotes · 24 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

For many this may be true, but there are also a lot of church leaders who are very anti-sex but still glorify women. Their goal isn't sex. They're just genuinely screwed up by feminism and think that's what will put butts in their seats.

Learning to Let Go of Doubt and to Trust in a Partner?

7 upvotes · 22 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Why do I always envision the worst from a partner?

Probably too much time reading TRP without understanding TRP. Lots of guys there - and on any RP forum - tend to play the "don't trust women" card too much, without balancing it with what you should do instead. That's right: be more interested in what you do than what you don't do. That's a general rule of life. In reality, when one understands and internalizes the red pill, the question of trusting a woman shouldn't even come up.

That is, you don't have to worry about whether or not she's cheating on you, or if she doesn't have feelings for you, or whatever - because her actions and emotions don't control you. If you're that emotionally invested in what she feels or thinks or does, then you're investing your emotions in the wrong place. Invest them in Christ, not her. Period.

- Suspect your girlfriend is cheating on you? No biggie, you've got 3 other girls you've been priming who are all into you.
- Wife is screaming her head off over something stupid, like not taking out the trash? Oh well. You've got amused mastery, so you recognize how childish she's acting and don't get wound up in her emotional hurricane.
- Not sure if the girl you like will say yes or laugh at you for asking her out? You've got more important things to worry about - like disciple-making - so it's really just a fun game to see which reaction she gives you.

There are no "but"s here. This is really simple stuff. The point of RP isn't to get you to distrust women. It's to get you to a point where you don't rely on your trust in women. That's a huge distinction.

Question: The perscription

7 upvotes · 22 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Lots to say on this, but for now let me just note: the red pill is truth and understanding. It is not a lifestyle or set of behaviors. There are behaviors that truth compels. If you discovered that bread suddenly has a 90% chance of giving you cancer and you don't currently have cancer, what would that knowledge do to your diet? Or if you discovered that eating raw brussel sprouts every day for a year would cause a leprechaun to show up at your door with a pot of gold, a wish, and a funny little dance, you'd start eating brussel sprouts, right?

The prescriptions we do give are not exhaustive possibilities, but they are common sense sense things once the truth is discovered.

- what if you discovered that having a 6 pack and bulging pecs would make your wife horny for sex with you all the time - would you do it?
- what if you discovered that learning to tell her no and laughing through her temper tantrums and emotional outbursts would cause her to respect you - would you do it?
- what if you discovered that disciple making would give God more glory than anything else you could possibly do and God would increase your influence on this earth because of it - would you do it?

See the point? Some of these things are no brainers. But like u/rocknrollchuck said, the specifics are going to be different for each person and their situation - and the list of general responses to every possible situation would be so long that we simply couldn't write it all. If we do give specific suggestions, it's in response to a specific situation. Even at that, Rule 2 is there for a reason.

It's like I say to all those people who ask incessantly: "Pray that God helps me learn his will for me today ... and tomorrow ... and the next day ... and for those random times that I just don't know what to do ... and ... and ... and ..."

God is less interested in telling you his will and more interested in helping you become the kind of person who doesn't need to ask in the first place. That is, your character will be so aligned with God's that your natural inclinations will be the right choice, whether you have divine prophecy about it or just pulled the idea out of your butt.

We are doing the same thing with men. We don't give men behaviors to follow. We develop character. We create the foundation, not the structure atop it. Every man can make his own temple. We lay the concrete for him to get started.

HOW TO GET YOUR NEW YEAR OFF TO A GREAT START

7 upvotes · 27 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well done, brother.

Christian Redpill books

7 upvotes · 25 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

If it helps, I'm breaking my book into three parts.

1. The first part will be conceptual in nature, much like The Rational Male.
2. The second will be practical advice for singles.
3. The third will be practical advice for married men, much like MMSLP.

My writing style in book format is much different than on reddit posts. It is far more personal and story/analogy driven with significantly less verse by verse proofs of my points, though that is still there when applicable.

All books will be written to the uninitiated, on the assumption that those already well versed in the manosphere would be in less need of such a book in the first place.

Book 1 is about 60% done and on hold for further development until late January. It is divided into three parts currently titled:

- (a) Fantasy Land - an in-depth look at the misguided state of dating and marriage relationships. The focus is less on broader cultural issues and more on specific destructive beliefs and patterns people wind up in.
- (b) Welcome to the Real World - an in-depth look at many fundamental biblical and sociological concepts that the church has blinded itself to - the truth behind the idealism that was explored in part a.
- (c) Transitioning - what it takes for a man to open his eyes, moving from fantasy land to the real world.

These are all subject to change. I'm done with a and part way through b.

Worried about never being in a relationship

7 upvotes · 20 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'd give more, but u/RedPillWonder really gave a great reply already. So let me say this instead:

You're still living in blue pill fantasies. That's ultimately going to be your biggest hindrance to making any real progress. You give too many flips about dating and relationships. Your post reeks of having fantasies of finding some great girl and getting married and having kids and putting them through college someday, like your dad did for you.

It's not wrong to want these things, but you're too emotionally invested in them. I'll leave this to /u/sic_redditr cruiser to post more on, but emotional investment isn't all that different from financial investment. You take your money, give it to someone else to control, and hope that they do better with it than you would have. With emotional investment, you're placing your emotional state at any given time in another person or ideology or institution and hoping that they will do better with your emotions than you would. If you're investing your emotions in God, that's a wise investment. I'd do that every time. If you're investing them in the hope and idea of getting married someday, that's a bad investment. Ideologies don't care about you. They're not looking out for your ultimate well-being. They will not give you the return you're looking for, except by chance and accident.

How do I know you're struggling with this type of blue pill emotional investment problem? Two factors: (1) your depression issues, which almost always come with bad emotional investments; and (2) your statements on college being your "light at the end of the tunnel." That is, you had an emotional investment in the idea that college would be better than high school. The thing is, that investment didn't pay off. You only think it did. In reality, your college experience is not better because you invested so much emotion into it. Chances are, you probably would enjoy college even more if you weren't emotionally invested in the outcome. Or at best, you're getting the same experience you would have gotten even if you hadn't emotionally invested yourself in that ideology of what you thought college life would be like.

Now you're doing the same thing with women. Don't do that.

Be your own man. Be in control of your own emotions. If you aren't a good emotional manager, just like some people aren't good financial managers, the solution isn't to outsource your emotional stability to others, which always comes with a price and a risk. The solution is to become a better emotional manager in the first place. Be the king of your own world. Don't invite someone else to come into your world to rule it for you just so you can feel better. Feel better by liking the world you rule and making your kingdom a land you like in the first place.

But at the end of the day, if you're emotionally invested in ideologies and not managing your emotions on your own, the depression will continue and whatever girl you end up finding will learn to despise you - especially if you trick her into marrying you while you're like that. With this in mind, to answer your questions:

Is it a problem that I have never been in a relationship or kissed a girl?

No. It's only a problem if you make it one. It's not a flaw, it's an opportunity. Some girl wants to laugh at you for it? Own it. "I just haven't found a girl worth my time. I still haven't, honey." Move on.

But to break down and start kissing girls just to get over the stigma so that you can appease what others think about you and not have to worry about admitting you've never kissed a girl ... that's about as beta blue pill as it comes.

should I pursue women or give myself some more time to work on myself?

What's your mission? Don't work on yourself. Work on your mission. That might mean preparing yourself more adequately to pursue your mission. But don't make a girl your mission. Your mission has to be bigger than you and your hypothetical family. In the meantime, until you have a mission, you have nothing to offer a girl anyway. So no, don't be pursuing girls until you know where you want to lead them. Otherwise you're inviting them to follow you on an exciting adventure chasing your own tail. No girl wants that.

My worry is that if I continue to not have been with a woman it will be a red flag for the lady I'm pursuing in the future

Not if you own it. Right now you're in a scarcity mentality. You are in "I feel like I need this" mode. In reality, your mental state should be, "I'm the prize. I haven't found anyone worth my time yet."

The thing is, you might not actually be the prize yet, which is why you're stuck in need mode instead.

- Need mode is like coming out of a fast. It's been days since you've eaten. You're hungry. You see some food that's not particularly your favorite, but any food is better than no food, so you eat it anyway. Sure, they're dead calories, but at least they're calories.

- Abundance mode is like coming out of that same fast and realizing that the reason you were fasting was to drop your body fat. So, when you see that same lump of dead calories, you snub your nose at it. You don't need that in your system right now - it would be counter-productive to your end-goal. You're going to wait until you can make it out to a nice steakhouse to get a T-bone and broccoli, savoring the deliciousness of protein and green - the meal you really wanted, not the dead calories you would otherwise have placated yourself with.

You don't need to be with a woman. You do need to figure out what you really want to accomplish with your life - something you'd be proud to tell God about on Judgment Day - and then start taking steps to accomplish that. The journey there is where you're going to find her. More about that on the sidebar in posts you've allegedly already read ;)

Hosting a Board Game Party

7 upvotes · 1 November 2018 · /r/RedPillWomen

Party Game: Imaginiff

Strategy Game: Diplomacy

Team Game: Pandemic or Forbidden Island

One v/and Everyone Else: Letters From Whitechapel; Mystrium (two best board games in existence, IMO)

Group Interactive Movie: Hidden Agenda (PS3) - it's basically a movie that you collectively influence by voting through an app on your phone to reach one of several endings

Nibbles: Chips and Queso

Queso Recipe: 1 brick of Velveta, 1 regular size jar of Pace thick and chunky, 1 cup of green olives, 2 cans drained Rotel tomatoes and green chilis, 1 can hormel chili (only thing that might not be gluten free, if that's an issue), red hot (to taste)

The Consciously Crazy Wife

7 upvotes · 29 October 2018 · /r/askMRP

Yes.

"I think I was just raped"

7 upvotes · 8 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

"We made sure she was okay until the police arrived- I hope justice is served fairly. It was a bad night."

I would hope the dangers of false rape accusations would elicit a greater concern than this awful neutrality. If she was actually raped, I'm sure your take-away would be very different. But given that the story ends with her talking to the police about getting a guy arrested on a false rape charge, suddenly neutrality is better than an impassioned defense of the victim. Interesting.

Married Red Pill - Husbands submit yourselves to your wives...

7 upvotes · 3 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The idea of mutual submission is very new in human history. Even after the rise of literacy, when people became able to read and interpret the bible for themselves and the varying denominations started coming up for every new theological concept ... male headship persisted as their nearly exclusive way of interpreting the bible. Then culture changes and all of a sudden their meaning of the bible changed to ... hmm ... smells fishy.

I'm not as concerned with one wrong interpretation (though this is certainly a big one) as I am with the fact that you just assume in your original post that mutual submission is biblical without even questioning it - and that your trust in this particular man, who you've likely never met, puts you in a position of blindness. Read Acts 17 and tell me what it says the Bereans did when Paul - author of most of the new testament - tried to teach them. Tell me if they were scolded for this or commended.

Just some things to think about :)

Preachers your listen to

7 upvotes · 25 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Just me, God, His Spirit, and His Word. That's not to say preachers don't have value to contribute, but I always find myself more interested in what God wants to tell me than what he told other people.

Suitable Mates in Church

7 upvotes · 14 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You've got some impressive stats, my friend. Physically and monetarily it seems like you're in the prime of your life to find a top-notch girl. It's nice that you have a big pond, but if you're not attracted to anyone in your church, it's time to start looking outside your church.

What's your mission in life? It sounds like the American dream is that mission for you. Whatever you end up deciding, your mission will help you better target your pool of candidates. "Church" is an easy default answer because it's where most Christians are found, but by developing a clearer mission you can expand your social network to a degree that both advances your mission and puts you in contact with other women who you might not otherwise have gotten to know.

OZ wrote a fantastic guide on your exact question, which is posted on the sidebar here. In that post, he references some pretty dismal stats about finding the right girl in church. It's rough. So, he gives some great suggestions for ways to tilt those odds in your favor:

- Relocate
- Change your social network
- Lead something at church
- Look outside your own denomination
- Get involved in non-church groups and activities
- Improve your perceived abundance
- Use the internet
- Import
- Be willing to date younger

These are all great.

Another thing I always recommend is to raise someone up. Unicorns don't exist in the wild, but they can be made. Secular RP talks about "training your slut" ... on RPC I'd call it "evangelize and disciple your godly slut" or whatever tamer language you might prefer.

To be clear, I DO NOT recommend evangedating. Don't engage in romantic relationships with non-Christians on the hope that they might become saved. But you can evangelize to a non-Christian on the hope that she might one day become date-worthy. The distinction is which comes first. In evangedating, the relationship precedes salvation. In evangelizing-to-dating, the focus is on a woman's salvation, which precedes any actual relationship. This can be quite delicate, but I'll tell you that I know many, many, many truly godly men and women who are only saved because an attractive person invited them to a Christian event. For many of these people, they never even ended up in a relationship with that person, but the invitation alone was enough to get them moving in the right direction. This includes the guy who disciplined me.

Ultimately, my best recommendation is to expand your social network. Make good use of meetups.com for an easy way to filter people without the feel of online dating. You can either join bible studies through there or you can join a writing group or an ultimate frisbee game or whatever. It's a great way to build your social network in a low-commitment environment and scout for potential people without the impression that it has to hop immediately into a romantic relationship, which happens with online dating or asking someone out who you met at the bar or a coffee shop.

I hope this helps. Good luck and God's blessings, brother.

Pre-Marital Sex

7 upvotes · 8 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm pretty sure I'm the one you read posting that theory. To be clear, I predominantly proposed it only as that: a theory. I was ultimately not persuaded in full. I am now convinced that marriage does require an active covenant, just as the Church's relationship with Christ is covenant-oriented.

To that end, I would ask: did she have a covenant with these other men? If not, she has merely engaged in a reproductive act with someone other than her would-be husband. This is troublesome, but it is also not unusual for Christ to accept the same from his bride.

Throughout history God's people - whether through Israel or the church - have engaged in idolatry, even to the point of proselytizing (spiritual reproducing) in favor of those foreign gods. Many people today still engage in spiritual reproduction with other gods, yet Christ welcomes them with open arms.

For example, suppose Bill Nye, a prominent proselytizing atheist who has made an intentional effort to convince people away from Christianity - imagine if he broke down and decided to submit himself before Christ. Do you think Jesus would say, "Sorry, but you've done too many bad things with your old gods, so I refuse to accept you"? No, he accepts us with open arms.

That doesn't mean we are obligated to accept non-virgins. God still preferences the pure. But it does leave the option open for those in your situation to marry one another.

Of course, this all comes crashing down if she had a legitimate covenant with any of the previous men.

[Discussion] Love After MRP

7 upvotes · 22 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

This would be fun to discuss on r/RPChristians - but from a purely secular vantage, love means something very different and that definition often differs from person to person.

The RP position is generally that women cannot love men the way men want to be loved. Their love is not for him; it is for what he has to offer her. Sometimes that can be emotional alone. Other times it requires some modicum of tangible contribution - good job, good sex, good parent, good physique that she can show off to her girl friends, etc. 99.9999% of the time, once the guy stops offering what she expects out of the marriage, he gets the famous line: "I love you, but I'm not in love with you." This womanese translates to: "I don't love you, but I'm going to tell you I do in vague terms because I don't want to feel like I'm a bad person."

Now, I could go on for pages about how the ancient Greeks and philosophers of old define love, but in all my studies I find three core principles:

- PASSION - Some people like to define love as a feeling - an emotional excitement at being with someone else. In my view, this is one component of love, and most likely the least of the three. I have yet to meet a relationship that can maintain NRE for longer than 2-years post-marriage. After that, the passion always converts to the practical, but comes back in waves. One of the most beneficial things RP does for men is teaches them to set aside this illogical passion (which is always the source of ONEitis) in favor of a more grounded perspective on relationships - one that can still involve passion, but is not dominated by it.
- COMPANIONSHIP - You've probably heard people say: "Everything about the other person is perfect, except the sex!" Despite the fact that they're lying to themselves, those on the more honest end of the spectrum are the people who probably do have a genuine love through their companionship. Their expression of love is not through emotion and sex; it is through their behaviors. They like doing things together. They laugh at each other's jokes. They comfort one another when they're down. Their love is not defined by how they feel; it's defined by what they do and how they act toward the other person.
- COMMITMENT - The final expression of love is on the strength of the bond in the face of adversity. We see story after story of adventurers who are in love and will travel across a world, fight dragons, and sludge through swamps to be with a woman, despite the fact that he's nowhere near her and thus isn't getting the emotional bubbles and they're not expressing companionship with one another. In modern marriages, these are the people who have been dealt a raw hand in life, aren't particularly excited about the relationship, but who will never give up.

Everyone works through some combination of these. Here's how those combinations play out:

Singular

- People who are only passionate and have no companionship or commitment are basically just hooking up for one-night stands or short-term relationships. If they do get married, it won't last for long.
- People who are only seeking companionship often find themselves in dead bedrooms where they tell themselves, "I have a roommate, not a spouse," and they get divorced.
- People who are only committed end up in miserable long-term marriages and wish they weren't so afraid to commit suicide.

Double

- If you lack passion, but have the other two, you fall into the "everything's great but the sex" relationship. That causes a lot of internal bitterness that starts to taint even the well-intentioned interactions you otherwise have with your spouse. These people stay married, but something is forever lacking and disappointed.
- For others, companionship is what's lacking. They live totally separate lives, each doing their own thing. The fact that their lives are oriented in different directions often even gets in the way of their otherwise mutual lust. There is a sense that the relationship just isn't going anywhere and even great sex and a strong commitment can't fix the problems in their day-to-day lifestyles.
- If you lack commitment, people end up cheating on each other and getting divorced as soon as times get hard or when the next best thing comes along.

Scales

In my view, the ideal is, of course, to have some balance of all three. The problem is when a person weighs too heavily on one of these at the expense of the others.

- An over-emphasis on the commitment aspect of a relationship can make you become a weak and needy beta that kills her passionate feelings toward you. Over-commitment also makes a man disillusioned about how committed his spouse might be. But under-commitment keeps people out of LTRs altogether, which often-times might not fit within a man's MAP. For example, there are countless articles explaining why it's difficult for single guys to get certain jobs or go into politics as compared with married men. Fun fact, there have only ever been 2 guys who were single when elected president ... and one of them married while in office.

Marriage/LTRs provide a distinct social advantage that can provide value to a man's life, but it also means the commitment scale can't be set at 0 if a man wants to reap those advantages. A 2 or 3 out of 10 might be more appropriate - more if the threat of divorce rape is particularly strong under the facts of a marriage. And note that "marriage" is not the same as commitment (despite mistaken female beliefs) - it predominantly exists to give an incentive for those in the advantageous position in a relationship not to break their commitments.

- An over-emphasis on ...

... and I'm at work and ran out of time.

Need help with possible divorce.

7 upvotes · 16 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

So you married a sugar mama and got all whiny when she didn't act like you're the sugar daddy. Seriously? What did you expect when you married a woman 5 years older with a more established position in life and you're still in school?

I understand women behave like children

That's for other people. Your girl doesn't behave like a child. She behaves like a man. Why? Because you're not behaving like a man. Just look at how you describe her:

- She's the one who makes the demands and sets the expectations
- She's very smart
- She's very hard working
- You expect her to support you
- She employs overt dread on you
- When things are hard she STFU and walks away

Here's how you describe yourself:

- You disagreed with TRP philosophy and idolized marriage
- You're the one to receive the demands and live up to her expectations
- You're lesser in intelligence than her and obviously (from the context of your post) more emotional
- You look to "love" as what defines your relationship with your wife
- You expect her to support you rather than you being the supporter
- You're complaining that you're not appreciated

No wonder neither of you are happy ... she's a woman stuck acting like the man in the relationship, and you're the actual man, but you're acting like a little girl. Nobody can be satisfied in a marriage like that.

reading TRP since I was 18 ... TRP is basically engraved into my brain

This is all that comes to mind

You have learned absolutely nothing. You have applied absolutely nothing. Your post reads like your 3 years or TRP reading can be summed up as: "Get buff and express no emotions whatsoever under any circumstances." The first part is true, the second part is not ... and even though you seem to think that's what TRP is, you still fail at that. It's not about expressing no emotions - it's about controlling which emotions you express and presenting your emotions in the most advantageous way to your interests.

Get divorced if you want to, but your problems are going to go with you. Start reading the sidebar again, but pretend you're on day 1 and you've never read any of it and assume everything in it is describing you perfectly, even if you would otherwise think, "I've already mastered that." You didn't.

Is there anything we as young men we can do to slowly dispel a Jezebel spirit with RP principles?

7 upvotes · 29 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not sure I understand the problem. You dated a girl at work. It didn't work out. You've got some lingering oneitis you're not quite willing to admit to, so you can't really let her go. Everything else is unnecessary detail and musings.

If you read someone else's post that simply said, "I still have a little oneitis for my ex. What should I do?" how would you answer that user?

Now, you're going to deny it's oneitis and claim you're fine with moving on, right? Then just do it. If there is no oneitis, this shouldn't be bothering you.

Matthew 16:24-26 interpretation by RPChristians?

7 upvotes · 5 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

How should one interpret this as a Christian that is RP?

The same way every other Christian should interpret it: the way Jesus meant it.

Let me break this down:

If anyone wishes to come after Me

I.e. you can't claim to be a Christ-follower (or "Christian") if you don't meet the following ...

he must deny himself and take up his cross and follow Me

I.e. he must set aside his own ambitions, put them to death, and adopt mine instead. In the context of the first part above, it's clear that Christ's ambition is to get people to follow him, just as our ambition should be to get people to follow us as we follow Christ (1 Cor. 11:1), ergo discipleship.

For whoever wishes to save his life will lose it

I.e. if you're only concerned about maximizing your own earthly life, you'll eventually lose your earthly life anyway

but whoever loses his life for My sake will find it

I.e. if you set aside your earthly life for my purposes, having killed your own ambitions in exchange for mine, then you'll actually find life for yourself

For what will it profit a man if he gains the whole world and forfeits his soul? Or what will a man give in exchange for his soul?

I.e. worldly pursuits mean nothing; only that which has eternal consequence matters

SUMMARY: The RP Christian should abandon his own mission and adopt the mission of Christ to make disciples of Christ. We should model that mission for others, just as Christ modeled it for us. We should be leading the next generation in such a way that they learn how to lead the subsequent generation.

Also, how would one tie this in with boundaries and frame when it seems to be emptying of the ego (kenosis)?

This passage is not about humility, ego, attitude, etc. There are other passages for that. This one is simply about whose mission you're following. It suggests that men should abandon their own worldly pursuits and follow in the example of Christ, adopting his mission for our lives instead of our own. It says nothing of ego.

Now, if you want to get to passages like Philippians 2:3, that's a different conversation.

What do you think? Shit test or not?

7 upvotes · 6 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

Girls play with narrative crafting. Don't be a girl. Your response was fine.

Personally, I prefer positive emotional responses over neutral ones. A month ago my wife asked the same of me: "Can you go warm up the car?"

Answer: Sure thing, babe. She goes off to do something else. She goes outside and comes back in after finding the car still off.

Her: "I thought you were going to warm up the car for me!"

Me: I did. In fact, I did you one better. I pull out two hot wheels I was sitting on and tossed them to her. I warmed up two cars for you!

Her emotional reaction went from ticked to playful angry. No lingering issues when she got home.

FR: The Spousal Support Scam

7 upvotes · 28 January 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

It's more that attorneys don't typically think this way when crafting arguments. Our job is to interpret the law for a judge, not argue why the judge should ignore the law or change it. So, once a status quo is developed most attorneys argue to maximize what the status quo would give their clients.

The documentary commented that the reddit incarnation of the red pill differs from the MRA incarnation in that it doesn't seem to change the system, rather we want to use the system to our own advantage.

That's what got me thinking about how to utilize the existing laws to work for men rather than against them, without actually changing the law, which I doubt I could accomplish. This type of thinking is unnatural when it defies the status quo ... and as smart as I sometimes think I am, even I didn't think of it on my own without inspiration from others who vie against the status quo - how much less is someone trapped in a blue framework going to think up red positions/arguments on his own?

TL;DR - judges will listen to arguments like this, and I'm sure I'm not the first one to use this argument, but it's rare for them to come up in the first place.

Preempting the DV charge.

7 upvotes · 14 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The federal wiretap act only applies to active/ongoing communications, not past communications on a server or in an e-mail database or otherwise saved on a computer. The Electronic Stored communications Act does protect people from third party disclosures (i.e. Google can't share the contents of your e-mail), but does not protect any information to the degree that it is stored privately (i.e. can be accessed by a home computer).

That said, people do have a reasonable expectation of privacy. When a person conducts themselves in a manner that leaves their privacy knowingly vulnerable, they no longer have an expectation of privacy. So, if your wife frequently lets you use her phone or laptop (as mine does) or otherwise shares her password to access those things (as mine also does), then she has no expectation of privacy for your use of those items until she changes her password and declines to tell you. Moreover, if she leaves her password for her e-mail saved on the device, the use of which is not private, then utilizing those passwords is also not a matter of privacy.

To quote a popular case, Hazard v. Hazard, a wife entered her husband's e-mail and read communications between him and his attorney. The Court noted: "Husband voluntarily placed this content in the computer to which Wife had access. This effectively allowed the contents of the letter to be communicated to Wife the same as if Wife had overheard a conversation of Husband with his attorney."

That said, although there are likely no federal implications for violation of constitutional privacy rights, individual states may impose their own restrictions. I can only speak to my state, which does not have any such additional restrictions beyond the constitutional right of privacy. To be cliché: consult an attorney in your locality for more relevant information to your own state's laws.

EDIT: This article is insanely helpful in figuring out marital privacy rights, if you're concerned.

found this on facebook

7 upvotes · 31 October 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

This was my gut reaction. If they are having sex even, my guess is that she just lays there soaking it all in, making him do all the work to get her off, and then she looks at him with a condescending smile and says, "Well, go ahead ... get on in and finish yourself up too, I guess."

[For Singles] Getting Laid Like a Christian (part 1)

7 upvotes · 31 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Haha ... that's pretty much the exact reason this sub exists. 99% of content out there for Christians falls in the "sold short" category. I've known at least a dozen marriage counselors, I've talked to pastors about their views on things, heard sermon after sermon on the topic, read numerous books ... and it ultimately all fails.

From what I gather, the reason they mostly fail is because they tend to treat marriage as its own box in isolation from the rest of everything else men and women are to be doing in life. When we do that, however well intentioned we may be, we're at least subliminally (if not directly) communicating that marriage is an end in and of itself - that marriage for the sake of marriage is worth pursuing.

That's why I try to hammer home the idea that men need to have a purpose in life outside the marriage. If he makes his wife his purpose, how can she fulfill the reason God created woman in the first place: to be a helper?

Another big problem with marriage advice in the church is that it tends to put all the responsibility on the man.

"You're the leader. You're supposed to sacrifice for her like Christ sacrificed for the church" - and then they only look at the crucifixion as the only example of how the relational dynamic should work. "See? Christ died for the church because he loved his bride so much. Women, shouldn't you respect him for his willingness to sacrifice so much for you?" But this attitude fails to realize all the other aspects of what Jesus was doing in his life. The Gospel isn't just about how awesome Jesus was in sacrificing for the church - it is a call for all people to lay down their lives for the sake of something bigger - to advance the cause of a Kingdom where we're going to spend the rest of eternity.

If a husband and wife are too nitpicky over who does the dishes more often, they've already lost. If we have a full, eye-opening perspective of what God is trying to do through marriage (Malachi 2:15), the trite things stop mattering. We care less about whether the deck is swabbed to perfection or the cabins have been dusted and more about navigating around icebergs and keeping the ship on the narrow course to our destination, picking up as many passengers adrift at sea as we can along the way. This is the only way marriage can truly work - when we're living out the purpose for marriage that God gave us.

Edit: I should also add that it's not just general "marriage advice" here. Most people here are in marriages that have suffered at one time (if not currently) severe sexual dysfunction or dead bedrooms. This is pretty much the opposite of what God expected from marriage. In fact, being "one flesh" is how he defines marriage in the first place ... so marriage without sex is kind of self-defeating.

So, a lot of stuff here is also targeted toward resolving that problem. But getting a mission beyond pursuing your spouse is always going to be the first step to success, even in that context.

[For Singles] Getting Laid Like a Christian (part 1)

7 upvotes · 31 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Rule 1: You are not seeking to befriend, date, court, or even marry a woman. Those are simply the means to an end: sex.

Well, the primary purpose is to find a helper to assist you in fulfilling your mission. But given that Paul says in 1 Cor. 7 you'll be more capable of this if you remain single and the primary reason to marry is if you "burn with passion for one another," I see your point. To that end, if you're married and not having sex, this will totally cripple you as a person and be the single most influential thing in preventing you from fulfilling God's calling to make disciples. But once you do have a stable sex life, the real goal of the marriage is toward spiritual reproduction - the thing that sex (physical reproductive acts) was always meant to point toward in the first place.

purity is not the same thing as asexuality

This is a solid line that I wish more single Christians understood - my old self included.

You should be teasing her, dropping a neg or two if she is especially attractive or full of herself, and holding concrete frame as she throws tests at you

I do want to clarify:

- Negging employed as a means of playful teasing is constructive. This is done best when your negging isn't actually true or only has a hint of truth and she knows it. Most women actually like this and desire it.
- Negging for the sake of calling someone out on their sin and getting their pride in check can also be constructive. This only works if the negging is actually true. Most women (or people in general) don't like this or desire it, but it's necessary for spiritual maturity anyway.

- But negging for its own sake, as a rote display of dominance to inflate your status over hers ... I would be far more cautious there and really examine your motives and the potential psychological harm you may be causing - particularly if there's no actual truth to the negging or it's not connected to a sin issue. For example, if she doesn't have an inflated ego about her looks, negging her about having a big nose (especially if it's a normal size) isn't going to be constructive and would probably not be a godly tactic to employ.
 - For fun, the Seinfeld episode The Andrea Doria addresses this issue perfectly - showing how a man who negs can be really attractive to a woman, but how unhealthy certain types of negging can be if done in an ungodly or inappropriate way. One of these days I might write up a post on all the truths inherent in Seinfeld that many people just seem to miss ... or not.

Should you test for theological compatibility? Should you verify she is "wife material"? Yes, of course. But that can be later down the line. Start with getting her attracted to you.

I used to object and think, "No, you're better off figuring out if you're theologically compatible first." There's merit to both sides. But I do now see the value in developing the attraction first, as this is more difficult to foster and lends itself to greater influence in discipling your girl. The more attracted she is to you, the more likely she will be Faithful, Available, and Teachable in a relationship with you. Simply put, trying to find a girl who is already theologically and spiritually where you want her to be is going to be a one-in-a-million shot. You're better off finding someone who's Faithful, Available, and Teachable and leading her into godliness.

I explained that my mission was more important than her.

This is another central key that most Christians miss. Why? Because most don't have a mission in the first place.

Failing to resist temptation is simply breaking your own frame and succumbing to hers.

Well said. Let me extend this to all sin: Failing to resist temptation is simply breaking your own frame and succumbing to the enemy's - Satan's, demons, 'rulers and principalities' and all that.

You don't want a shrew without a sex drive of her own.

Ah, but this is what many Christian men get anyway. It's how the church raises women to be - my wife is no exception. When you say, "They want sex," I know that at their core, this is true, but that for many, many, many women in the church this desire is so heavily repressed and shamed and criticized that it may never rear its head again ... particularly if the husband isn't competent enough as a leader to help her overcome the repression.

I am simply explaining why it is so alluring for men Exactly. That's why SGM references the emotional aspects of sex - that it's not just rote physical pleasure; it's the need to feel wanted and desired. 2 seconds of skimming r/deadbedrooms will affirm this as well.

So how do you find these magical unicorns (hot Christian women who want sex for their own pleasure's sake)? That is a subject for a future post

I'm eager to hear your thoughts on this one. This thread from a couple years ago always amazes me and is worth researching - especially this comment coupled with this addendum. Good research for that upcoming post! The top comment by /u/3kindsofsalt is also well worth a look.

Wifey misses the feelz

7 upvotes · 23 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I have dealt with this exact conversation. In fact, my wife brought up this notion again last week. Here are a few things to note:

FIRST: You can't control how she feels, therefore you're not responsible for her feelings. Assuming you're OYS and living out your faith, you're ...

- giving her a good life
- giving her the means to have an impact on eternity through your God-given mission
- faithful
- happy and fun to be around

There is no commandment: "Thou shalt open your heart to your wife and tell her everything so she can feel good and intimate." Don't try to take personal responsibility for her inability to feel intimately connected to you. If you want to be vulnerable with her, go for it. It may actually help. But you are not Scripturally obligated to do so.

SECOND: Stoicism doesn't mean walling off emotion. I'm not sure what it used to look like when you were vulnerable with her or what that word means to the two of you, but "be stoic" is not the same as "be a cold, emotionless robot." Stoicism is more about exercising restraint and self-control during unpleasant or painful experiences. It's about maintaining self-control, rather than letting your emotions get the best of you.

THIRD: The only real biblical basis for emotional intimacy being part of a Christian marriage is the example we see in Song of Solomon. But that's not a command: "Your marriage must look exactly like this!" It's more an example of a relationship from which we can draw principles. That said, we do see that physical intimacy is what creates the marital bond between husbands and wives - both at a physical and spiritual level. Genesis 2 references the "one flesh" concept as the defining concept of a marriage, and 1/2 Corinthians 6 both talk about the spiritual bond that is formed during sex. If your wife wants an emotional connection to you (again, something you can't control), it's her responsibility to work that out based on who you are rather than trying to control you to become the type of person she thinks she can have that connection with.

The first time my wife mentioned this I was still pretty new to the RP world, so I mostly just fogged and STFU like you did. She kept hammering the, "Why are you being so cold?!?" line and I just kept fogging and pressure-flipping, "You're right, I am being cold. Do you have any ideas on why that might be?"

Rather quickly, I started adding back in all of the positive emotions that I should have been expressing rather than being robotic. Of course, I thought I was expressing those before, but it wasn't coming out as clearly as I believed at the time. Expressing the positive range of emotions abated the issue, but even then this past weekend my wife brought the issue up again - this time slightly differently.

Instead of complaining about my emotional state, she began by affirming all of the ways that I have improved and that I'm generally a more fun person to be around ... but this time was complaining about how being told "no" on occasion and me taking the lead on several major life issues was making her feel powerless and controlled, and that she couldn't feel connected to me because she no longer understood what was going on in my head. She said, "You're changing so much that I just don't know who you are anymore and I don't know how to be your wife." I was expecting her to say that she didn't like who I was becoming - but that line never came.

Then she went somewhere weird [noting that at this point in the conversation I had yet to actually talk]: "I want to follow your lead and be the submissive wife God calls me to be, but I don't want to feel controlled either. I also don't know what it means to be submissive - I see that word talked about a lot in general, but there are no clear examples to show what a submissive wife does or what it means to be submissive. Nod to [/u/slipknot_is_metal] I want to know you and feel close to you, but I don't know how to do that if you're processing everything yourself and then just doling out responsibilities to me and the kids to put whatever it is you're thinking into action. I want to be part of that process."

I interpreted a lot of this as a good sign, but also as a fitness test. It tells me the 1,000 foot rope is reeling in more and more, but also that she's finding some kind of angle to dig in for more power. To that end, I'm happy to give her some. After all, Jesus delegates decision-making authority all the time - and I had been doing that. But what I'm not okay with doing is feeling like I have to spill my guts every time I have a thought about how to lead the family or stay on track with our mission.

The easy solution, which I implemented over the weekend, was simply to ask her lots of questions - get her feedback on the things that I'm processing. I then filter what she tells me and lay out a plan of action. For example, we're part of a team that's organizing a church conference in February. I have a lot of ideas for this and the group looks to me to develop most of the content. I know this stuff inside and out, whereas my wife is brand new to all of it. So, although I have a ton of stuff planned out to share at our meeting this Thursday, I asked my wife for her thoughts and input too.

Although I won't be implementing most of what she said, where she had valuable things to contribute, I will give her credit for these things. The group doesn't need to know that I thought of these things first. I want my wife to feel like part of the team, so I'm letting her take the credit for her ideas, as I have enough of my own to contribute that she never mentioned.

Interestingly, this put the whole issue to rest (so far, at least). What I've found (and I knew this before, but have seen it now again in a new context) is that "emotional intimacy" for a woman isn't about getting to know you deeply; it's about getting to share herself to you on deep and important issues. She wants to feel like you include her in your deep, processing core - that she matters to you there. It doesn't mean you're opening up the side panel and letting her inspect your harddrive, video card, and all the nuts and bolts or test them to see how they work.

So, long story short, my advice is to start finding important life issues and ask her questions about it. Probe deeply and ask her to really think long and hard. When her deep emotional core is engaged and she's expressing that to you, that's when she will feel that emotional intimacy, regardless of how transparent or vulnerable you are. If what she says aligns with what you think is best (whether you already thought that or she legit changed your mind, it doesn't matter), implement it and give her credit for it ("That was a great idea!"). For everything else, just do what you think is best anyway, and if she complains, just say, "I heard what you had to say, I thought about it, and I decided to go a different direction. Thanks for giving me some things to think about - I appreciate your insights and look forward to continuing to talk about these things."

Now, there is room for vulnerability on top of this. If you legitimately need help - invite her to be the one to help you. If you're struggling with sin, ask her to keep you accountable. If you're feeling sad and can't get out of a funk, ask her to cheer you up. Don't make her responsible for these things. She doesn't want to be responsible. But she does want to help. The husband is the leader and responsible one; the wife is designed by God to be his helper. Let her fulfill that role (see 102 for more information on that).

Fucking Divorce

7 upvotes · 26 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

We have no legal documentation written up yet that says she can move out

She doesn't need a legal document granting her permission to move out. What you're talking about is a motion you'll have to file titled: Motion for Exclusive Use and Occupancy of the Premises. These are only granted (1) if one party has already moved out voluntarily, (2) if there is violence between the parties, or (3) if there are children involved and the hostility between the parties is affecting the well-being of the children.

That said, here's some advice.

1. If you're going to chew her out, as /u/JDRoedell said, don't do it over text. This makes you look like a wuss. Be a man. Say it to her face. Also, why would you chew her out in a written forum that she could then show to a judge? Idiocy. If you say anything negative or try to address these issues, either pay an attorney to draft it for you (because you obviously can't write tactfully yourself) or do it in person to minimize the risk of being recorded.
2. How do you get from "Sure it could be nothing" to "I'll talk to my lawyer"? It sounds to me like you got butthurt with no real evidence of anything happening and she's thinking, "Geeze, that idiot's so insecure ... maybe I should hook up with his friend. He's probably a much higher-value man anyway." Let me re-word that to make this clearer: You're the one who is causing this problem. She's just being her normal self. You've given her nothing to work with and decided to chew her out and lawyer-up for her being a girl. If she actually cheated and you have proof, great ... I get it. But you're flying off the handle over nothing.
3. Upvote to /u/SteelToeShitKicker because I get the impression that you've made no progress here. Since February? In 3 months, from June to September, I pulled my bench up by over 100lbs. You've had 7 1/2 months. The internal confidence from getting buff should, even with no other improvements, have put you in a stable enough spot to handle this crap, yet here you all getting butthurt. Even if your lifts have gone up, you've made no progress in any other area. Why? Because this vent session proves it:
 - Can't AA (or you would have told us about it when you responded to her crap excuses)
 - No amused mastery (butthurt = the exact opposite)
 - No abundance mentality (because you say you want her gone, yet care way too much that she's leaving)
 - Haven't read WISNIFG (if you had, you'd know how to fog/broken record through this stuff) ... or if you did, you didn't understand a single word

As far as divorce input goes, I don't nearly have enough information to provide any help. Length of marriage? Kids? Incomes for each of you? Assets? There are just too many variables not given. The best I can say is to file your motion for exclusive use and occupancy right away so she can't move back in part way through.

"I dream women will one day have the same rights as guns!"

7 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

What was the person even thinking in the first place?

Love and Respect Bible Study (semi-RP)

7 upvotes · 11 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm pretty familiar with the book (been a long time, though). My recollection is I was very disappointed because it seemed to be imbalanced in how it approached relationships. Specifically, in the dichotomy between (1) sexual attraction and (2) emotional comfort, it focuses almost exclusively on the emotional comfort angle. Although it brings up sex, it's more of a passive thought than a main point.

In my experience, most men come to believe their wives respect them through sexual submissiveness and desire. If a wife doesn't desire her husband sexually or isn't responsive to his sexual advances, that's the leading cause of a man feeling disrespected. It communicates to the man: "You're not enough of a man for me to want you." The book then talks about how to fix a man's feelings toward his wife by fixing the relationship without really getting into the nuts and bolts of the sexual attraction aspect.

The result is that if "men are the gatekeepers of commitment and women are the gatekeepers of sex" - it's teaching both men and women how to enhance their commitment while doing very little to enhance their sex life. The result is that if one were to apply the book steadfastly, the relational commitment ("ahava" love in the Hebrew) might improve by 5 points for every 1 point that the couple's sex life might improve.

To that end, there is an implicit (and if I recall, maybe even an explicit) covert contract being promoted: When husbands love their wives and wives respect their husbands, you'll get great sex. But what if the wife, who doesn't actually respect her husband, doesn't care to get better sex? She has even less motivation to respect her husband - or if she does, she channels her respect into things that feed into the "emotional comfort" part of the dichotomy, while the couple is left without anything that actually increases sexual desire between the two of them. It is a false assumption the book makes that men loving their wives will somehow prompt respect (by ending the crazy cycle and ushering in the rewarding one), and therefore sex will abound. The book is right about shifting from a crazy to rewarding cycle, but the "sex will abound" implication is misplaced. I have tried these tactics repeatedly throughout my marriage to no avail, leading me to a different path, which ultimately got me to RP.

But I openly accept any correction here, as my memory may be hazy and I read it at around the same time I read 5LL, which has a host of similar issues.

I'm dating two MGTOW.

7 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

I keep feeling like people are making a big deal out of them telling me what happened with their ex-girlfriends.

Well, the title of your post implies that this is the most important element. But from what you've described here, they are absolutely NOT MGTOW.

They seem like men who have learned their lesson as to how to vet women and looking for better qualities, does that make sense??

Perfect sense :) That's not MGTOW - that's just normal men who have some baggage. Most people have some baggage from past relationships, theirs is just a little above average - not even to the point of being an outlier.

From that end, your post is really: "I have two guys who are interested in me, which do I choose?" That's a much easier question to answer because the psychological implications of them being MGTOW aren't at issue. It's simply: which do you want more.

As for the other question you asked, you might naturally attract guys who have a history dealing with troubled women because maybe you have some trouble and baggage to yourself as well. No More Mr. Nice Guy talks about how certain types of guys love to find women with a problem and then try to fix them or be the solution. It makes them feel important and needed (but is also very unhealthy, even though they don't do this consciously). I don't know enough about your life to verify this, but it's the best guess I've got without more information.

Weak pastor comment

7 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

believe that their duty has been fulfilled

This. I hate this attitude with a fiery passion. Evangelism is not a duty - it's a lifestyle. As soon as it becomes a box that we can put a check mark in for each day or week or however infrequent one thinks is appropriate, we have lost the intimacy and ecstasy God intended evangelism to produce. It's duty sex in the context of spiritual reproduction instead of physical reproduction. God doesn't want duty sex with us any more than we want it with our wives.

Which reminds me of another interesting point: starfish sex. Most people think that God wants us to just "stop and be completely empty" so he can do whatever he wants to with us. This couldn't be further from the truth. "Let go, let God" isn't a call to spiritual starfishing. It's a call toward active submissiveness. Men want their women to let them take control in the bedroom - to be able to do with her as we please; but we want her to be an active participant in that, not dead weight.

Your wife is a whore and you should divorce her

7 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Fair enough. At one point that was true, as I'm sure is the case for many (most?) men here.

Ok ASKMRP, riddle me THIS!!!

7 upvotes · 17 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

Simply put, monks are celibate. Be celibate. TRP uses it most often when guys are so sex-obsessed that they can't rationally focus on improving themselves. So, they're told, "Stop all efforts at trying to get sex and just work on you." In TRP that usually gets applied as "avoid trying to pick up girls," because it's almost impossible to keep sex off the brain. That said, practicing game is impossible if you do this, so a total "closing off" is not helpful.

In MRP terms, I understand this more to be that you shouldn't be forcing or expecting sex for quite some time. If it happens, great, but don't necessarily use it as an opportunity to practice all kinds of new things - just enjoy it for what it is until you've improved yourself enough that you can try something new with the confidence you'll need to pull it off.

In my life, my wife and I went 18 months without sex. For the first 6 of that I kept trying in all the beta ways I knew how. Then I just gave up. Giving up is NOT monk mode. It became monk mode for me when I realized I could potentially start re-engaging with my wife, but I intentionally declined to do so because I realized I had a lot more work to do before she would be doing it out of desire rather than obligation. I didn't want obligation sex. So, even after sex eventually happened again, I didn't pursue it - I just worked on me. At the tail-end of this phase, I discovered RP and started implementing things, which jived with all the self-improvements I was already making, but helped me focus my efforts. Almost immediately, things started changing with my marriage/sex life.

I described it best like traveling from CA to Pike's Peak in Colorado. Everything I had done before RP was like traveling the horizontal distance. Then, as I was already at the foot of the mountain, RP is what it took to start my ascent. That's when my monk mode ended. Monk mode is the horizontal distance to get to the mountain. If you try to ascend before you get to the mountain, you'd better have magical wings or you're just going to keep jumping and falling right back down. Get to the mountain first, then ascend. That's the purpose of monk mode.

Fogging, Amused Mastery, Agree and Amplify

7 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Good write-up. But did something happen to make the third section get all choppy?

Either way, this is a nice trifecta. With my particular wife I find that these actually work well in succession in a single conversation. AM gives me the mentality needed to hold frame, perceiving what she's doing/saying in a right context. Whatever she's complaining about, I'll usually start with fogging coupled with a technique I call "repeat and clarify" to demonstrate that I fully understand what she's saying (mastery), but my attitude still conveys that it is not as big a deal as she is making it out to be (amused), yet without belittling her in that process.

From there, she usually is happy just to be understood and she'll pick up on the AM and say things like, "I'm being silly, aren't I?" That's when I'll AA - "Sure you are. Let's both get a little silly tonight." Having been understood and given a fresh perspective predominantly by my body language (I barely say anything during most of her rant), she's in a good mood again and receives the playfulness well.

If she insists on posing whatever she's ranting about, I like applying negative inquiry repeatedly to get to the core of the matter, then AA it away (if I know I can pull it off in confidence at the time, otherwise it's back to fogging and STFU). By waiting until she reveals the core of the issue, instead of her feeling like I'm being dismissive she gets validation where she really needs it, even though she was clueless about the core issue initially herself.

If I'm really on my game, I know her better than she knows herself, so my line of negative (sometimes mixing in positive) inquiry leads her down a path where I already know the conclusion - I just need to get her there without blabbing the answer to her up front. It makes a huge difference if I can help her figure it out I her own ... which is probably akin to amused mastery anyway.

Career beta...just took TRP.

7 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

I believe in God. You don't have to for this to make sense, but read Job 38:1 to the end of the book. For context, Job is stuck in a really crappy place in life. His family dies, his entire fortune is plundered, his body is covered in boils. If anything could go wrong, it has gone wrong (and this was part of an intentional plan). Job starts questioning God with all that "Why?" garbage. God's answer to Job is the ultimate RP answer. It starts ...

Who is this that obscures my plans with words without knowledge?

Your plans are what matter; she can't tell you what to do.

Brace yourself like a man; I will question you, and you shall answer me.

Pressure-flipping.

Where were you when I laid the earth's foundation? Tell me, if you understand. Who marked off its dimensions? Surely you know!

Amused mastery - God's getting playfully sarcastic about how trite this issue is in comparison to the bigger picture, and ultimately refuses to answer Job's questions.

[God:] "Will the one who contends with the Almighty correct him? Let him who accuses God answer him!" Then Job answered the Lord: "I am unworthy - how can I reply to you? I put my hand over my mouth. I spoke once, but I have no answer - twice, but I will say no more." Then the Lord spoke to Job out of the storm: "Brace yourself like a man; I will question you, and you shall answer me."

God's pressure-flipping and amused mastery worked. Job STFU and gave up, even though God never answered his accusations. So, God pressure-flips some more:

Would you discredit my justice? Would you condemn me to justify yourself?

This is what most wives do: they spin their hamsters to find a way to make you the bad guy, even when they're the one making the unreasonable request. She can do the whole ebay thing herself, but she doesn't. Instead of faulting herself for her laziness, she faults you to justify her not doing it.

Job's final conclusion?

Surely I spoke of things I did not understand, things too wonderful for me to know.

Become that wonderful to your wife - become that high-value and display that same sense of amused mastery at how trite this "ebay purchase for your wife's mom's friend" is in the grand scheme of your lives.

Of course, in the end, God doesn't do this just to stifle Job as some peon. God loves Job and ends up blessing him greatly beyond pretty much anyone else alive in that day. In the same way, bless your wife ... just don't put up with her garbage or feel like you have to answer her questions and challenges. Bless her on your terms, not hers. She'll value it more that way anyway because people value what they can't control. If she can control what you give her, it's cheap - she knows she can get what she wants when she wants, leaving it with no value to work for. If you decide when and how you're going to bless her, then your goodwill gets its value back.

Got married prior to discovering TRP. Now having sadness over the feeling of "not having had sex with enough women."

7 upvotes · 10 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I know what you're feeling - as I think should be the case for any Christian who has ever watched porn. The fact of watching porn is often one's "safe" way of acting on the desire to be with other women without many of the associated risks. So, wherever you hear of Christian men struggling with porn, know that you are not alone.

Personally, my n-count is 1: my wife. Yes, I have had the thought of having "missed out" on things before, but it doesn't take me long to remember where that thought is coming from - and it isn't God. My wife has actually expressed the same concern, although relationally and not with sex. I was the first guy she ever officially dated (also the first she ever even kissed), and at one time she said she wished she had been in more relationships to see if I was truly the best guy for her or if she just settled (that was several years ago - she doesn't think this way now).

Here's the deal ... and I'm going to be blunt with the rest of this post, so feel free to tell me off if I'm way off base. You make a few allusions to this "strong conscience" thing and express some fairly legalistic tendencies with the way you talk. I'm sure you'll want to get defensive about this, but roll with me for a second.

In the prodigal son story, you're the older brother. You see all the younger brothers who got to squander their inheritance - and indeed you did squander some of yours too (two brief excursions, to be exact), just not as much. Then you see how they got invited back into the fold and became fully-equal heirs again. This leads you into conflicting emotions: (1) that you deserve something for your faithfulness (i.e. a more satisfying sex-life), even though you did have two other Ns before marriage, thus weren't actually fully faithful (you seem to justify this with some modicum of pride in how low that number is and how long it took before you lost your virginity); and (2) a resentment against your younger-brothers who got to squander what God gave them, and yet still be welcomed back with open arms, wishing you could have gotten away with that too.

But your legalism won't let you get away with it. You know better now. You've seen younger brothers come and go and you know what's right and wrong, so you can't go cheat on your wife to get your fun days in anymore. I mean, really - if you wanted to, that's your answer. Go cheat on your wife with dozens of girls. Get out all your fun, then be welcomed back by open arms. But your legalism tells you that this would do some irreparable damage to your relationship with God and you wonder whether or not you would be welcomed back at all if you so blatantly defied him after such knowledge of the truth - and these are legitimate concerns.

The bottom line is that your behavior of faithfulness is likely not a product of abundant love for Christ - it's a product of legalistic self-entitlement coupled with resentful jealousy.

If I'm right, knowing the cause of your problem is 90% of the way to figuring out the solution. The other 10% is always the same: preach the Gospel to yourself daily.

I don't have time to get into it now, but I utilize something called "The Lens Illustration" to help people see how the Gospel applies to specific situations like these. That's probably still a couple months out, as far as my post series is concerned, but maybe I can accelerate it a bit or share in a PM, given that these types of things are coming up all the time.

Another thing that is probably worth noting, which is a clue as to the legalism and self-entitlement attitude I'm picking up is this:

It's obvious that God wants me to remain faithful to my wife, and only my wife, and it's something that she honestly deserves.

Any time I see the word "deserves" I immediately think: "The only thing we truly deserve is hell." We don't deserve God's grace or mercy. We don't deserve each other's affection, attention, loyalty, provision, etc. We deserve hell.

Get that "deserve" thought out of your mind and you'll start to overcome some of the female-worship mentality you seem to have toward your wife (also evidenced by the way you distinguish her from American girls - as if she's better, therefore is a beautiful snowflake).

Why is this significant? Because when you worship your wife as a female, yet she's not satisfying you - what's the natural conclusion? Worship other women. Maybe if you had more females in your notch count, you'd be satisfied, right? Have a healthy view of your wife and you'll have a healthy view of other women as well. This will lead you to the conclusion that only Jesus satisfies, not women.

Again, I may be totally off-base with all of this. So, take it for what it's worth. But as someone who's been where you're describing, take it from me that the Gospel is ultimately the solution - learning how to apply it in specific situations is what seems to confuse most people.

Divorce Incorporated

7 upvotes · 2 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The US abolished common law marriage some time ago. Some states will still presume joint ownership of certain assets of actual ownership is ambiguous, but things like retirement accounts, spousal support, etc. are off the table.

Of course, the real answer is a well crafted prenup - best of both worlds.

Prenuptials

7 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

Divorce lawyer here. In my state, pre-nups are usually a solidification of already existing rights, except as to spousal support. So, if you want them to have real value, you need to know what types of issues are significant and negotiable where the court will actually let you get out of the statutory default. You cannot pre-nup custody or child support issues away, so that just leaves property division and spousal support.

Property Division

Property division is usually split into two categories: separate property and marital property. Marital property is usually defined as "anything that's not separate property." It's always split 50/50 unless such a split would be impossible or inequitable. For example, if the parties have a house worth $250k (paid off) and a retirement account worth $250k, you can't just do a this for that. The retirement account likely has tax-consequences to withdraw the money, so has to be tax-effected. The house isn't liquid and an attempt to liquidate the money from it would cost realtor fees, brokerage fees, transfer tax, etc. So, although they technically have equal appraised values, you have to deal with all that stuff in the prenup or otherwise accept the fact that any marital components will have to be divided like-for-like. This gets ridiculous when one person insists on keeping the house, but has no resources to pay your half of the equity.

Separate property (in my state) is defined as (1) anything owned before the marriage, (2) received as a gift to one spouse only, even if from the other spouse, or (3) received by inheritance. Your pre-nup had better have an exhibit at the end identifying all of your assets and all of hers, otherwise you're wasting your time on the property division section. Really, preserving separate property is 90% of the value of a pre-nup.

It's also worth noting that you'll need some provisions on conversion of separate property to marital and vice versa, as well as a statement on how to deal with commingling. For example, suppose you have a paid-off $75,000 starter home you're bringing into the marriage. You live there for a while, but after having kids you sell it and use the money to pay for a down-payment on a $250k home. You then proceed to pay the mortgage out of the marital funds. By the time you're getting divorced a decade later, the house is worth $300k. How do you want your separate property component calculated? $75k flat (the court's assumed method)? $75k + pro rata value of the appreciation? Or did you screw yourself because the new house has both your names on it, making it look like you gifted the $75k to become marital property?

The third key property division factor is passive v. active appreciation of separate property. If you are bringing $250k of your 401K into the marriage and 10 years later it's worth $500k, who gets the $250k of growth? If all of the growth was from passive (i.e. market fluctuation) appreciation, it all remains separate under most laws. But what if you kept contributing to that account after the wedding day? Now you have no way of knowing how much is market growth and how much is from the dollars you put in that are technically marital. You screwed yourself and will likely get stuck with only $250k as pre-marital.

Also, the FIFO rule says that the first money in (which is your separate property) is the first out. So, if you pay $50k into your 401k during the marriage, then withdraw that $50k later, the presumption is that the $50k withdraw came from the $250k of separate property, not the $50k of joint property. Pretty awesome, right? /s

Spousal Support

Every state is different, so I can't comment too much here. Most courts will not enforce a "no spousal support under any circumstances" clause. In my state, if the court determines a clause to be unconscionable or predicated on a lack of information, then that clause is stricken and the court does what it wants. How does this play out?

Suppose at the time you're married you're earning $25,000/yr working as a manager at McDonalds. 10 years later, you're running a couple dozen franchises in your city and banking a cool mil/yr. The court's going to nix that "no spousal support" clause without batting an eye. Why? Because the wife was ill-informed at the time of the true earning capacity you had, and therefore was not competent to make an informed decision.

So, you've got to put qualifiers on that crap. "No spousal support for so long as husband earns $500,000/yr or less. If he earns more than that, only the excess beyond this may be calculated as income for spousal support computation purposes."

Also, duration and modifiability are key. In my state, it usually works something like this:

- 0-5 years: no spousal support, 1 year if the court feels for her
- 5-10 years: 1-3 years of support depending on the judge's feels
- 10-20 years: about 1 year of support for 3 years of marriage (rule of thumb; flexibility based on feels)
- 20-25 years: about 1 year of support for 2 years of marriage (apply previous rule if the judge doesn't like her)
- 25+ indefinite

If you want to constrict this stuff and just go with a 1/3 rule flat, put that in there. Don't give the option of indefinite support. That said, be prepared that a judge can strike that clause to smithereens if your wife ends up being a 60yr old woman with no education, no work experience, and is really struggling with her health. Bonus points if English is her second language and she's good at faking a lack of comprehension.

As to modifiability, my state presumes that support awards are non-modifiable. This means that even when you retire, you're stuck with the same support amount. Sometimes this can work in the guy's favor, like if he gets a decent number for a short duration and he knows he's going to get some raises and promotions in the near future. But for the most part it sucks and there's relatively little risk that the court will ever modify support upward anyway. They tend to take the position that if you earn a promotion after the marriage, she didn't contribute to that promotion, so you keep the raise rather than it going into support calculations all over (this doesn't apply if it was something anticipated at the time of the divorce). So, it's usually best for the guy to stick with a modifiable order, especially if the marriage is long-term (note: in my state the supreme court said that 18 years is NOT a long-term marriage ... go figure).

NEVER EVER EVER EVER EVER FORGET: A pre-nup is almost always void and unenforceable if she does not have her own private, independent attorney review the document and sign off on it. Do not think you will just manipulate her into signing it over a fancy dinner. If her attorney doesn't sign it, it's almost certainly getting thrown out of court. Her attorney will review it carefully. These negotiations aren't fun and I've seen people call off the wedding over prenup issues. If she doesn't want to get an attorney involved because she trusts you ... screw that, give her someone's business card (without you calling them first!) and make her dial the number right then and there.

What does TRP say on women's orgasms?

7 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

I have experienced this with my wife. Women's feelings are always "in the moment." They often even impute their present feelings on past events. For example, many women totally love the first 5 years of marriage, then things slow down, then they're bored and angry ... then by year 10 suddenly they never loved you at all and they were just faking it with all-star acting skills those first 5 glorious years.

In the moment that was the best thing ever. Out of the moment she wants breakfast and to get the laundry done. That's all. Get her back in the moment and she'll be ready again. My wife has told me before, "I really love having sex when we're actually having sex ... but when we're not I just don't think about it or care. You have to get me into it. Once I start getting wound up I'll keep going."

Why do men ditch their friends when they get a GF?

7 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

Your theories probably all have a hint of truth for different guys. But, as /u/dr_warlock said, the bottom line is that they're all junk reasons regardless.

A guy should not ditch his dudes unless those dudes are really bad masculine figures as well. He will not be able to maintain masculinity to keep her attracted if he doesn't have male influences in his life. Big-4 addicts do not count as "male influences." I consider the big 4 to be: (1) porn, (2) food, (3) video games, (4) drugs/alcohol. Avoid being one of those guys and avoid spending time with those guys if you want to have a chance. Otherwise, get better male friends or be a better male friend.

In addition, the girl will get sick of his smothering at some point, even if she likes it at first because of the mutual honeymoon phase. Smothering will destroy an LTR. Also, a girl needs to know a man has his own world that he can invite her to join. If he's joining in on her world all the time and not maintaining his own, he's entering her frame instead of her entering his.

If a guy ditches you for his girl, he's not the type of male role model you want to seek to be like. I don't care how hot his girlfriend is - don't look up to him and think, "If he could get her, I need to be just like him!" No. Find a guy who's actually a guy and can keep his world together despite having a girlfriend.

Should we get married?

7 upvotes · 3 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'm a divorce attorney, so if anyone is ever interested in an AMA (either here or on TRP/MRP) on the whole "divorce rape" thing, let me know.

Obviously no one here can tell you whether or not it's good to marry this particular girl. We don't know her, you do. But as far as the institution of marriage ... in general, I'm 9 years in and despite sexual issues (which is how I got on MRP), I do believe marriage is well worth it - but only if you're truly committed and it's not just a tax thing while you still act like it's single. You'll get a lot of junk here about, "If she doesn't like it, she can divorce you." If you go into marriage with that attitude, you will most likely end up divorced. Even if the sex is great and you click well, a few big fights and one mental break-down and your relationship is over ... let the "divorce rape" commence (whatever that means to you).

"The Red Pilled"

7 upvotes · 29 June 2017 · /r/TheRedPill

Jesus was a pretty smart guy. Christian or not, this is good advice all around.

In Matthew 12 he says that when a harmful spirit comes out of a person it goes away for a while, wanders the desert, then realizes how much better things were when it was in the person, so it returns. When it finds the house empty, it re-inhabits it, bringing 7 others with it, each more worse than the original.

I'm not saying video games are demonic or anything of the sort. I play video games sporadically when I have excess in my life. Nevertheless ...

Lessons to learn:

- You probably internalize your addiction as your problem. What if you took the mentality that something external is trying to coerce you to play video games? For many men, this creates a much clearer sense of urgency. Instead of a will-power struggle as someone like /u/mallardcove accuses, it becomes a battle against a force in the world trying to destroy you. It's a man test. Are you going to fight against it or succumb?
 - If it helps, I'm sure we've all seen TV shows or movies that reference this concept: the villain uses some kind of technology or power to placate the world to his advantage. I'm sure there are more recent examples everywhere, but growing up I loved the movie Batman Forever (1995), which explains this perfectly: the Riddler builds a machine to sap everyone's energy while they watch TV to use it for his own nefarious purposes. You're Bruce Wayne. Are you going to suit up and fight him or are you going to glance at the tele and feed into his scheme?
 - Externalizing the problem awakens a competitive drive; keeping the problem internalized forces you to beat yourself up which can be good if you have the right mentality, but can be very harmful if you have a lot of guilt, shame and self-loathing in your life, which will also greatly reduce your chances of developing your motivation.
- Most people can't beat addictions because they keep the house empty. They succeed for a while, but they've left a hole open in their lives and never filled it with something new. As a result, temptation toward the addiction will keep coming back and back and back, and each time it will get harder to kick it out again because you're conditioning yourself for that exact pattern. You're blasting out your steel-frame vault and turning it into a revolving glass door.

- Even when you do invite something new in, you don't let it make its home there. It's just a guess and you're testing the waters. You're not letting it blast down walls, remodel bathrooms, and paint the living room. You're telling it, "Come on in for now and let's see how this works," but secretly reserving the possibility that it might not last. Why? Because your addiction keeps knocking at the door saying, "Don't worry, I'll be here when you realize you don't like your new guest as much as me." If someone's hung up on their ex, it's impossible to buy all-in with a new relationship, even if the new one is way, way better than the garbage your ex threw your way. This is no different.
- The "7 others even worse" is all the baggage you develop from failing. By having given up on your efforts to kick out your addiction and letting it back in, now you (1) have proof that you are weak-willed, (2) are ashamed of your failure, (3) feel guilty for doing something you know is wrong, (4) become insecure in the belief that other people judge you for your failure, (5) have to hide yourself to avoid that judgment, precluding the development of real relationships, (6) hate/are angry at yourself for not following through, and (7) have persuaded yourself that if you try again you're likely to fail again, so "What's the point?" ... or otherwise that if you try again, it's okay to fail because now you've learned to deal with the first 6 things I just mentioned and every time you get more and more numb to them.
- The "new" thing has to be healthy that's going to kick out that harmful crap. If you kick out a harmful habit for another harmful one, those dudes are best bros and are going to willingly open the door for one another, so you've just done nothing for yourself. Giving up gaming to take up pot smoking or porn is a recipe for disaster and failure.

Now, at the end of the day I don't believe it's possible to defeat addictions without Jesus (I'm currently writing a book on this). But I do believe it's possible to control addictions or redirect them. So, take that for what it's worth. Go find some other positive thing to re-focus your addiction into, like lifting, healthy dieting, productive hobbies, improving your career, etc.

Vaginismus & Concerns About Wedding Night

6 upvotes · 6 October 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Mission - Excel in my career as an actuary, raise a healthy, God-fearing family, live out my heritage, and constantly improve.

If you're at all familiar with me, you know I can't let this go. Read Matthew 4:19 - "Come, follow me, and I will make you fishers of men." Now, re-read your own mission. Jesus said if you follow him you will become a fisher of men. Is that part of your mission or not? In secular red pill, trying to "excel" and "constantly improve" sounds like a good mission, but it's ultimately aimless. What standard are you comparing yourself against to know you've improved? If there is no standard, there's no way to know if you've improved or gotten worse. If Christ is your standard, then Christ-likeness is your mission - you are improving to become like him. This includes not only becoming like him in "sinning very little" - there are some people who commit very few "sins" yet their lives look nothing like Jesus. It must include also adopting purposes aligned with Christ's purposes. Look at my previous comment before this one in my history. I go into more detail on this in there, but the short-and-sweet of it is that you can't "raise a healthy, God-fearing family" if you aren't leading your family the same way Christ leads the Church - and you can't say you're leading them as he does if you haven't adopted the purposes he had. His purpose was to build a Kingdom for Himself, called the Church (capital C). It is our job to do that also, which is expressed through the great commission: "make disciples of all nations."

The only thing I need a woman for above is raising a family.

When God gave Adam a purpose he said it was not good for him to be alone and said, "I will make a helper suitable for him." If your wife has nothing to do with your mission than give you children and be a mom, you are severely limiting the role God has for her in your life. If your wife cannot do what God designed her to do, she WILL become restless and dissatisfied with you and your marriage will be greatly troubled. Nobody can be satisfied in life who is not able to live out the purposes for which God has designed them.

More to the point, if your mission is so small that you don't need your wife's help on it, then you aren't thinking big enough for God's Kingdom. I've always loved this quote from Dawson Trotman:

Do you know why I often ask Christians, "What's the biggest thing you've asked God for this week?" I remind them that they are going to God, the Father, the Maker of the Universe. The One who holds the world in His hands. What did you ask for? Did you ask for peanuts, toys, trinkets, or did you ask for continents?

I want to tell you, young people, it's tragic! The little itsy-bitsy things we ask of our Almighty God. Sure, nothing is too small - but also nothing is too big. Let's learn to ask for our big God some of those big things He talks about in Jeremiah 33:3 - "Call unto Me and I will answer you and show you great and mighty things that you do not know."

Think on that for a while and re-contemplate your mission. If your only ambition for God's Kingdom is to have a cozy little job with your cozy little family and to "improve" in some ambiguous way that doesn't really speak to what you're improving toward ... how do you intend to answer to God when you are called to give an account of your life on Judgment Day? Make no mistake, the Bible is clear that believers will be judged according to what we do also, not just the unbeliever. Here's a very brief (under 4-minute) video that will go further into what I'm talking about: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=LA_uwWPE6lQ (Francis Chan ... good stuff).

Onto the actual question ...

My question is about vaginismus (involuntary tensing or contracting of muscles around the vagina, which can make sex impossible).

Can ... but doesn't always. In most cases, sex is still possible, but painful. My wife and I dealt with this early in our marriage. It's a predominantly psychological issue that can (and usually will be) self-resolved in time as the fear and anxiety of penetration resolves. At first, it's a nasty feedback loop because the anxiety heightens the tension, which then increases the pain, which then justifies the fear and anxiety so it's remembered the next time you go to have sex. But the pain typically goes away once penetration is complete (it's only during insertion that it's a problem, for most people), which makes it easy to adjust to the initial pain, knowing it'll go away - and as that initial pain becomes a quick over-and-done, the anxiety goes away because it normalizes. When the anxiety alleviates, the vaginismus alleviates with it, and will eventually cease to become an issue altogether.

At the risk of being crass, have you ever taken a dump and wiped your butt too hard and your sphincter tenses while your face makes a weird grin? It doesn't actually hurt in that moment, but you feel like it's going to, and it's an awkward feeling altogether, hence the look of pain across your face even though you're really fine. That's not too different from vaginismus. You and she note you're virgins, which means she's not used to having anything outside of her control penetrating her, and that's going to cause an initial reaction. But the same way you can learn to wipe yourself without wincing, she will, in time, be able to experience a comfort with sex.

I've never heard a case of vaginismus that didn't naturally resolve fairly quickly (a matter of weeks). In my marriage, it was probably longer than most, for unique reasons. But even in our longer-term circumstance, it self-resolved without the need for any dilators. It's more common than you might think for virgin women to be unable to have sex on their wedding night, or even during their honeymoon.

She has been using dilators for a few months with some progress, but she expressed frustration that she can't fit the final size (i.e. close to me) no matter how hard she tries not to tense up.

You also have to remember that this dilator method is in a vacuum. My guess is that she's not particularly aroused while using them. Arousal causes natural lubrication and greater elasticity. I expect she's using lubrication with the dilators, but it's nowhere near as effective as natural lubrication. When she is both aroused and naturally lubricated, things will be MUCH easier than in the sterile-ish dilator context.

My recommendation: on your wedding night, do your best to try to make intercourse happen. Start slow and minimize any risk of anxiety. Get her worked up before you contemplate insertion - preferably even to the point of finishing once from external stimulation alone. Don't get worked up about it if insertion doesn't work out. If she feels guilty that she couldn't have intercourse on your wedding night that can create a painful negative psychological association with sex that will take you years to overcome. No shame or guilt over the issue - just keep working at it. Make it a fun experience playing with each other's bodies - both in having other ways to enjoy sex while working through the issue, and also in working toward actual intercourse together. Treat it more like a tease than a problem.

Interactions on this sub

6 upvotes · 28 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

To tweak a semantic issue that might resolve what /u/rocknrollchuck said - men and women can both be at fault in different ways for crappy marriages. But fault is a stupid and worthless thing to waste time assigning. Pointing the finger has never once helped my kids better their relationship with each other. It won't help a husband/wife better their relationship either.

What really matters more than fault is responsibility. A CEO of a corporation is responsible for the mistakes of his subordinates because he's the leader. A military commander is responsible for what his privates do, even if he's not the one doing it. A husband is responsible for everything that goes on in his household because it's his household.

It doesn't matter if the wife is at fault. The husband is still responsible. Most things that go wrong in the world are due to a failure of leadership. If the way the man leads is not getting the results he wants (whether he's at "fault" or not), the logical solution is to adjust your leadership strategy. Her job is to decide whether or not to follow.

Now, this could lead to a frustrating cycle where he keeps trying one strategy to lead his wife after another and nothing seems to work, so he just keeps spinning his wheels. This is an insanely rare circumstance in general (because AWALT), but for the non-believing red pill guys it's a real one if he's married an outlier. As Christians, we have a position to stop the cycle ...

Jesus' leadership strategy is the optimal one. Changes to our strategy should always be to adjust what we do to be a little more like what Christ did.

In the end, the wife may still leave the man. But at least he can go to God in the end and say, "Yes, my wife left me. But I didn't know a better way to do things than the way you showed us, so I stuck to that and only did what I saw you doing."

That will be the best position a man can be in, when he's at God's judgment seat. In that scenario, God's not going to care who's to blame. He's not judging fault. He's judging "each person according to what he has done." Do what Jesus did. Worry less about blame, more about Christ-likeness. Just make sure you're actually looking at how Jesus handled situations, rather than making up hypotheticals of what you think he "would have" done based on some stereotypical notions you have in your head about who you think he was. Jesus and the Father did a LOT more and handled a LOT more situations than most people realize. We have a model. Look to the model.

Interactions on this sub

6 upvotes · 28 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

also, you can always just choose not to engage with people on the sub you don't want to interact with What? And let someone saying bad things about me have the last word without me defending myself? No way.

Abstinence till marriage (Advice/Discussion)

6 upvotes · 23 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

people actually discussing my questions vs people finding ways to insult someone new for not using the "mission" section properly

The real issue here is that you're not comprehending the way that your mission (or lack thereof) is contributing to the issue you're asking about in the first place. The concepts are inextricably intertwined. By addressing the issue with your mission, we are leading you to a better path for handling the issue you're talking about.

Imagine someone banging their head against a wall and complaining that their head hurts, asking for help curing the headache.

One person says, "Stop banging your head against the wall," and you say, "That's not what I'm asking about. I'm asking about how to make the pain stop. Stop wasting my time with stupid talk about banging my head against a wall when this post is all about how to cure the headache."

Okay, now those of us who are talking about mission are the ones saying, "You have a mental health disorder causing you to engage in masochism and you need to resolve that psychological issue." We're taking the immediate problem a step further to the underlying issue at the core of what you're struggling through.

If you can realize that, you'll be in much better shape.

Abstinence till marriage (Advice/Discussion)

6 upvotes · 23 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

New to the faith ?? Did you read my post or are you just here to rant?

Juxtaposed with ...

I started my celibate journey this year

Translation: "Before this year, I didn't actually take my faith seriously." Conclusion: "Treat like someone who just started taking his faith seriously in the past year."

You might have a history of biblical knowledge, but that's not what I'm addressing. I had a massive wealth of biblical knowledge stored up from being raised in the church, but wasn't actually saved in high school. All that knowledge was impressive to pastors and seminary professors, but was used for the wrong purposes and was doing more harm to my life than good because it was misapplied. Once I figured out what the Bible actually said and began to have my heart aligned with Christ, I realized that most of my storehouse of knowledge was tangentially relevant to actual Christian living in the first place.

I'm not saying this to diss you. I'm saying I've been there too. I'm not issuing a condemnation on you any more than I would have myself when I was in your shoes.

But yes, figuring out what you're actually going to do with your life is going to be the singular most important place for you to start. I'm curious to see what you come to when you reach that conclusion.

Given your conversation with /u/redpill-cool, I'm half tempted to ban you for a short while for being a wuss who can't handle some pushback without losing frame. Sometimes a time-out can help with that. But, as valuable as his pressure is, I know he can come off as a dick sometimes too (not always a bad thing) and the conversation was entertaining enough to read that I'll let it all go anyway.

Announcement: Red Pill Christians will now exclusively be a male only space

6 upvotes · 25 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

One of the goals of this announcement was to help build the community at r/RPCWomen by funneling more content toward them which would otherwise have been expressed here. By making this a male-only space, when women post things, it will be much easier for mods simply to reply: "Great question/interesting situation. This isn't the place for this, but we'd love to see it posted on r/RPCWomen." Before the rule-change, there was little room to force these comments over there. Perhaps it's the lawyer in me, but I like having a publicly-available rule in place before I start enforcing it as a matter of policy.

Dropping the Shield and Finding the Truth

6 upvotes · 21 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Solid post, brother. I've definitely times of feeling in the muck - even recently.

But a wise man asks God to remove the scales from his eyes as he begins the new journey. A wise man knows the ego is there attempting to reflexively protect him from any discomfort or risk. The ego can act like a shield protecting you from what is in front of you, but like a shield it can obstruct your view as you hold it up

This bit has been my prayer and lesson as of late. Great way to word it.

Husbands and Hindered Prayers

6 upvotes · 10 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I often note that the way we relate with our spouse is a physical representation meant to point us toward understanding the spiritual relationship we're meant to have with Christ. Is it any surprise, then, that I can predict with great accuracy what a man's weaknesses in his walk with God are by the way his wife treats him? Women follow their husband's example. If you show no respect to God, she will show no respect to you. If she's nagging and pestering you to do things for her, it's probably the case that your time spent with God is nagging and pestering him to do things for you. I'm sure you can add to the list yourself.

If you can't have a quality relationship with your spouse, it's hard to imagine you're going to have a quality relationship with God either. That's why passages like 1 Timothy 3:5 or 1 John 4:20 make it clear that we have to have a healthy relationship with those who are physically present in our lives as the pathway to having a healthy relationship with a spiritual God in his spiritual Kingdom.

If a man is oppressive toward his wife and not loving toward her, he's not following in the direction of those passages. Granted, the way I'd define "oppressive" is drastically different from the way most women today will claim to be "oppressed" - so take that word in a biblical context, not a modern cultural definition.

How I Overcame Porn Permanently

6 upvotes · 2 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I'm going to go with no. In a very, very broad sense, if something is put in front of me, there's still a choice to get rid of it, which is a conscious decision. But I do not sit at my computer at night, for example, and feel like I have to make a conscious choice to avoid putting on porn. The thought doesn't even cross my mind anymore.

Do you have any concerns about how it seems like this view errs on the side of control of your wife over her personal growth and freedom?

6 upvotes · 15 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

"How do I become worthy enough to be followed?"

Even that's off. That still feeds into the blue pill notion of the man needing to be worthy of his woman, as if she sets the standard he's trying to live up to.

Rather, the things that a man does to pursue Christ and the joint mission he has called us to follow are the exact same things that will make others want to follow us - including women. It's not about being worthy to lead her; it's about being dutiful to Christ.

This is why Jesus succinctly says, "Seek first His Kingdom and His Righteousness and all this will be yours."

Put another way: Jesus says there's no marriage in heaven. So, your relationship to your wife isn't something eternal - it's earthly. In Matthew 6:33 Jesus is saying, essentially, to make God's Kingdom your priority rather than the worldly kingdoms, and when we do so God will make sure the worldly things are addressed the way he sees fit. In my view, that includes whether or not a man's wife follows him or leaves him.

Again 1 Cor. 7 - "Let those with wives live as though they have none." You don't become a great leader so your wife will want to follow because your pursuit of Christ should be as if you didn't have a wife in the first place. Her pursuit of you should be because of your pursuit of Christ.

No, your congregation does not preach "biblical headship"

6 upvotes · 12 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I figured as much ;)

Is Church attendance a command from God?

6 upvotes · 1 August 2020 · /r/askRPC

The Church is the totality of God's people who hold unity in the Spirit and assembly in heaven. The congregational structure is a tool utilized by many within the Church because they believe it will facilitate greater growth. It is the only useful structural aspect to the Church available to the majority of the world - but as useful as it can be, it has the equal potential to be harmful when viewed as a substitute for discipleship rather than a fishing pond for disciples. Those who forsake the congregational structure are just as foolish as those who create an unhealthy co-dependence on it. The issue is not whether or not to participate; it's how to participate. If the structure is non-existent, continue meeting with others in another context that's still available.

I'm not aware of a command to listen to sermons. I am aware of commands to preach and testify. While no one is obligated to listen, we are obligated to be competent enough to be on the other end. If "faith comes through hearing the Word," I'm not sure how you're going to gain that competency unless you're: (1) being discipled (preferred), or (2) prayerfully studying and applying the Scriptures on your own (which will inherently be incorporated into #1 if it's done right), or (3) listening to sermons about what God taught someone else. Pick one. More if you can. I've listed them in the order of efficiency and effectiveness.

I will also note that /u/1timothy47 wrote a post a couple months ago on /r/disciplemaking about how being discipled is a luxury, not a necessity. I know it's appropriately ambitious to WANT to call it a necessity, the reality is that it's not. Many people simply don't have competent people around them to be a discipler in their lives. Or, as that post notes, viewing it as a necessity could cause an unhealthy co-dependence on the person being discipled, killing the discipler-maker's abundance mentality as he feels like he must make the relationship work rather than being willing to walk away from a poor selection to find someone FASTER.

Episode 10 - No Frame, No Game Part 2

6 upvotes · 31 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Haha. I'm tempted to just for the hilarity.

Episode 10 - No Frame, No Game Part 2

6 upvotes · 30 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Learn to hold your frame, brother.

I think you're confusing a lot of biblical passages. But if you can show me one that references it being sinful for two people to hug - married or unmarried - I'm all ears. To address the most obvious issues:

- Lust: This sub has covered it a million times. Lust is not sin. Adultery is sin. Covetous intent (translated "lust") toward someone in an adulterous context is adultery of the heart, even if not the physical act of adultery. There's no evidence that this couple is lusting after each other or that they're unmarried. That may just be you imputing your own lack of self-control onto them.
- Sexual Arousal: Being sexually aroused is not sin. Seeing an attractive person and getting a hard-on is not sin. It doesn't become covetous lust until you start plotting how you would act on it. If someone gets aroused by the clip, so be it. If they masturbate for 1 second while it rolls by, or go back and pause the video, that's their issue.
- Causing Others to Stumble: I'm sick of hearing the way this passage is blown to exaggeration in the modern church. The reality is that we ALL cause people to stumble ALL the time - implicitly. What Jesus is referring to is the person who does so intentionally. This is why you can't take Matthew 18:6 away from 18:7 - it's inevitable that people will stumble, whether we intend it or not. The problem is when someone attempts to cause it. Jesus clarifies again in verse 10 that he's talking about people who "despise one of these little ones." I seriously don't think Jesus was telling people that we must always walk on egg shells around anyone and everyone else for every possible inclination that might cause someone to sin. For that matter, Jesus himself turned water into potent wine - "the good stuff" - knowing that people would get drunk on it. Are you going to tell Jesus that he sinned for causing someone to stumble because of what other people did with the content he made available to them? The theological issue you run into with the exaggerated interpretation of the "causing others to stumble" notion is that you're allowing other people to decide when you're in sin. How THEY interpret what you do or make use of the content you create somehow makes you, whose actions and intentions are otherwise blameless, does not have an impact on your own internal state any more than the fact that people used Jesus's wine to get drunk made him culpable for their sin.
- Above Reproach: As with other issues, many pious church-goers love to exaggerate what this means, suggesting it prohibits a Christian from doing anything that could possibly be interpreted as sin. That definition would be impossible to follow because everything can be interpreted as sin by someone. In this, even a completely 100% flawless leader who is fully sanctified to perfection and never sins again could still be removed from his position of authority because someone misunderstood him. That interpretation is out. Once again: our guilt is not defined by the actions or thoughts of others. So let's go a step down and re-interpret Titus 1:6 to mean that a leader is prohibited from actually sinning. Yikes! Even then we still would end up with absolutely 0 leaders in the church. Even Paul, who wrote Titus and admitted to his own sinfulness, would have had to recuse his position as an apostle if that were the case. So, if Titus 1:6 isn't referring to the appearance of sin or the actuality of sin, what IS it referring to? The Greek is aneγκλέτος, which was a legal term used to refer to someone who was acquitted in court. That is, being "above reproach" in the aneγκλέτος sense meant that no one had basis to file a law suit against them. For the record, others suggest that the concept (rather than the word itself) is simply that an overseer should not do anything that brings shame upon the community in a way that would affect the church's ministry to outsiders.

Long story short: I continue to disagree with you and it seems we have some fundamental disagreements on Scriptural interpretation - you taking the more cultural notions of the passages, while I try to stick with what the passages are actually saying, coupled with common sense and an understanding of the words being used.

New Sidebar Compilation!

6 upvotes · 21 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Unfortunately, I don't think I ever did finish the 400 series. Thanks for the reminder!

RPC Podcast Episode 7: The Importance of OYS

6 upvotes · 9 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

That means a lot from you. You interested in joining us sometime?

Sparking a Husband's Sexual Desire (RPCW)

6 upvotes · 23 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Physical appearance - Create a schedule that involves time at the gym, running, body weight exercises, etc. so that it's planned in your schedule. Once you have a good body, it takes time to lose it, so it's not like it can be gone overnight - you just have to keep up with it, generally. Set clear rubrics for yourself not to cross. One rubric I have for myself is that if my belly goes out further than my pecs, it's time to cut. That standard doesn't work for women quite as well ;) but you get my point. Count belt loops. Use a scale, if you must. Just set a standard that you know you have to change-gears when you hit that line.

Kino - Rearrange your furniture that's conducive toward physical touch. Instead of having a separate arm chair in the living room, move it to the basement, replace it with another decorative piece, and force yourselves to sit on the couch together. Other than that, there's very little that makes this naturally consistent beyond the fact that the more you do it, the less awkward it will feel, the easier it will be to continue.

Clothes - This one's easy. Literally throw away items of clothing that you know are counter-productive. You will HATE doing this. But trust me: it's for the best. Just save enough that you can paint or do yard work in ;)

Attitude - You just have to do it and make it a part of yourself. What might help is to study the Madonna-Whore Complex and realize that your non-seductive lifestyle is bread from too much ASD (anti-slut-defense). That is, you're presenting a false attitude about who you are in order to appear more innocent than you are - especially if you crave sex more than he's aware, which directly proves that you're hiding your sexuality. Embrace that this is a "disorder" of sorts, when perpetuated with your husband in the context of marriage, and embrace a more sensual, seductive attitude as the cure. Ultimately, balance is still helpful, of course. But sometimes to get away from one extreme you have to live in the other for a time in order for the middle to feel appropriate.

Dialogue - Read a lot about the subjects you want to dialogue about. The more you ingest about it, the more it's on your mind, the more you'll want to talk about it. At that point, it's second-nature rather than being something you have to work at.

Ambiance - This is inherently consistent as it requires effort to change the ambiance back once it's created.

Sexual Association - Again, once the association is created, it doesn't go back unless you drop it dead forever. So, this one doesn't require much habit-building - only to get off the ground.

What would you do if you were suddenly single?

6 upvotes · 21 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This comment makes me smile.

What would you do if you were suddenly single?

6 upvotes · 21 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I've literally asked myself this exact question a few dozen times over the last couple years. I'm glad you put up a post on it. It's the proper frame of mind for married men to be processing their sexual goals and why they may not be achieving them.

Just thought I'd post this here if any of you want to chime in and shed some light!

6 upvotes · 20 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I see this misnomer in Christian circles all the time. The verse doesn't actually say sexual sins are worse. It just points out one way in which they're unique. Inevitably, some smart-Alec tries to quip that verbal sins are actually worse because "if anyone can tame the tongue he is a perfect man, able to keep his whole body in check" (a la James 1 or 2). But even that doesn't say it's the worst sin - only that it's the hardest to beat. So, someone else complains that all sins are equal, implied in James where it says that breaking one command makes you guilty of breaking them all ... which it doesn't quite say. It really says that breaking a command makes you a law-breaker, regardless of which command you break, and thus your need of a savior is the same regardless of the severity of your sin. Then there are the sins God calls abominations, which are impliedly worse than those that aren't identified that way.

But I'll cut that rabbit trail off.

Why does sexual sin FEEL worse than other sins ...?

Remember that God's first command to humanity was to multiply and fill the earth in number (Genesis 1:28). Malachi 2:15 clarified that God wanted godly, spiritual offspring filling the earth, not merely warm bodies. In this, human sexuality on a physical level is paralleled with spiritual reproduction. Just as sex/raising kids FEELS like the epitome of humanity's physical existence, so also should spiritual reproduction/child-rearing (i.e. evangelism and discipleship) ACTUALLY BE the epitome of humanity's spiritual existence. It is what your soul was created for. It's called the GREAT commission because it's so GREAT and massively important in everything that God has been doing from day 1 and will continue doing until the final day.

So, when something perverts the image of how God intends to accomplish this master-plan of discipler-making across the earth, we should very appropriately FEEL off about it in more significant ways than anything else.

Alternatively, on a more psychological or bio-physical level, one could argue that pair-bonding, hormones, etc. create strong emotional ties that influence our feelings about sexual matters more than other matters, hence the heightened anxiety about sexual sin over other forms of sin - even worse ones.

what does it really mean to sin against your own body

When you have sex with someone, you become one flesh. Your body and theirs are one. So, just as you sin against your own body in the way you pervert how it is to be used, the way you're perverting the other person's body is also a perversion of our own because their body is also your body in that "one flesh" union.

vs sinning against God

I usually understand the NT concepts of "sinning against" in a colloquial sense. When Jesus says, "If your brother sins against you," he means that you've been offended and need to reconcile. Similarly, when Paul says that you sin against your own body, he's saying your body has been harmed in some way and why would you do that to yourself?

When David speaks in Psalm 51, "Against you, you only, have I sinned," after killing Uriah, committing adultery with Bathsheba, and getting their baby killed, I believe he is praying, meditating, and speaking introspectively out of great sorrow. I'm sure he felt incredible remorse at the situation, as evident in the way he mourned over his child's life and lamented when hearing Nathan's conviction over him. He wasn't saying this in an emotional burst to avoid responsibility for the harm he caused to Bathsheba's life or his deceased child's life or to Uriah in his slaughter. He was saying it while fully embracing these things, as evident from the rest of the chapter of Psalm 51.

What's significant here is the frame issue David mentions in Psalm 51 itself. To give the completion of that phrase from 51:4, "Against you, you only, have I sinned and done what is evil in your sight." You see, David didn't owe any obligation to Uriah or Bathsheba or his child to follow their standards of morality. It doesn't matter what any of them thought was good or evil because David wasn't a subject of their standards. He was only subject to God's standards, and therefore God's expectations were the only violation that actually mattered.

To be clear, my wife has standards for me. All women do for the men in their lives, otherwise the red pill wouldn't exist. But I know that I am not subject to her standards. If she sets a standard that says, "I believe it is immoral for my husband to tell dad jokes to our kids" and I tell a dad joke, I have violated her standard. But is that sin? Obviously not. Because her standard doesn't decide what is or isn't sin for me. The only things that can decide that are myself (Romans 14:14) and God's standard of faith (Romans 14:23), especially as expressed through Scripture.

But what if my wife has a standard that I shall not beat her bloody? If I choose to beat her anyway, have I sinned? Of course. But was it a sin against her standard? No. Because her standards don't define sin. Only God's do. And God commands me through my faith not to beat my wife (or at least compels me through my own individual conviction of the same), so it would be sin against God's standard, not against my wife's standard. Thus, the sin is against God alone, even though my wife is the victim of my sin.

Now, this sounds like a lot of crazy theology, but it's really quite normal. I'm a lawyer, so I see this constantly. A husband beats his wife. This isn't a "sin" in a legal context. We call it a "crime." What a sin is to God, crime is to the government. The government says not to beat your wife. When a man does this, what happens when the wife decides to drop the charges? The state says, "Too bad, we're prosecuting them anyway." She fights back, "But I'm the victim. The crime was against me. I should get to say what happens to my husband." Yet the reply is always the same: "No, his crime was against the state. If he is a violent person, we have an obligation to protect everyone within our state, not just you. You were the victim this time, but if there is no punitive measure, someone else may be the victim next time and we must pursue charges to ensure that doesn't happen."

This is how it is with God and sins against him as compared with "offenses" against others.

I haven't actually done a word study on this yet, but I'd be curious how the Hebrew of Psalm 51:4 compares with the Greek words that Jesus and Paul use for "sin against." I know it's two different languages, and it wouldn't likely change my end analysis, but it could possibly confirm it.

The point is: sexual sins do distort your own body, but it is God's standard that you have violated which makes it sinful. So, I interpret the passage to mean that we are the victims of our own sin, while the sin itself is still against God only.

Others have already addressed the ways in which we are victimized by our own sexual misconduct, so I won't rehash any of that.

What do I need to learn from here since I came from the og TRP?

6 upvotes · 20 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This.

RPC Chat - Episode 4: Christian Dead Bedrooms

6 upvotes · 17 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Fantastic. This whole topic probably deserves a post in itself. You want to write it? If not, I'll put it on my list ;)

She simply doesn't want to / isn't willing to put in effort with her husband

To re-bolster a point from my previous comment: even if she did overcome the obstacle that you're presenting, it still doesn't go the next level of actually showing (even if only by faking) enthusiasm in the process.

I remember a time when my wife was clearly unenthusiastic. I had a seriously hard time finishing and it was bothering her. I asked, "Can you at least try moaning or doing something?" She looked disgusted and insisted that she wouldn't fake it and that if she didn't actually feel like moaning, she wouldn't.

At the time, frustrated though I was, I agreed with her. Looking back, there were countless times that I had faked things with her in order to enhance her experience. Many couples role play, the entire point of which is to be fake to enhance the experience. What it really communicates is that she cares more about her own comfort in self-expression over the pleasure and happiness of her husband.

Some women are able to have sex not because they're particularly aroused, but because they find it enjoyable to please their man and to watch him as she takes an active role in his pleasure. I am often like this in the reverse. I find most of my excitement in sex not from pumping my dick a million times, but from seeing the way I can please my wife and ultimately watch her orgasm. Yet women are so solipsistic that this option doesn't even register for most of them. And what does that say about the degree to which a woman contemplates the needs of her husband in relation to her own? Not to say I define love this way, but most women do - they will incorporate some concept of "putting someone else's wants/desires/needs/whatever above your own." Then sex rolls around and it's self-absorbed with no willingness to set their own thoughts/needs aside in order to please him. "The fact that I give you even starfish is enough of a sacrifice," they think. It's sad.

doesn't want to risk (perceived or real) an issue at work, or cause friction in the friendship, etc.

Right. This goes back to my very old post on the comparison game. How outsiders perceive her is more important than anything else to her.

She knows she can (often) "get away" with it with her husband

This, I believe, stems from the "I conquered, what's next?" mentality. We see this all the time with PUAs. They have sex with a girl, then ghost her. Once they've "conquered" her they become disinterested and move on to the next girl. For women, the "conquer" isn't about getting sex (which is as easy as breathing for most women). It's about getting commitment. Once she has that, she prefers the commitment of the next best guy she can get. She loses interest in the man she has already conquered.

This is why dread is so important. If she believes the game is over - that his commitment to her is faultless and never at risk of his sinfulness winning over him - then she will believe her victory to be final and the boredom sets in, unless she can set new goals separate from the ones she was taught to employ while single. While single, she's taught to pursue commitment from a man. While married, she must be taught to pursue her husband's mission and set aside the dating games - and yet it is still vital for the man to keep her on edge with at least passive dread so that he wins over not only her mind (toward his mission), but also her body (through attraction and desire triggers).

Explaining the Double Standards around Sex

6 upvotes · 14 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Exactly why I left it up.

Actual Conversations With "Abuse" Victims

6 upvotes · 4 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

No, as I haven't revealed any personally identifiable information.

RPC Video Chat

6 upvotes · 4 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

We definitely want to do that. It works best if we can do that through YouTube live, but that requires 1k subscribers to your channel first. We do plan in the very near future to start having uniquely authoritative guests join on the chats.

Who should you listen to on RPChristians?

6 upvotes · 20 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

His flair specifies that he's an "MRP Mod" and therefore his endorsement is to the degree of his familiarity with MRP. That said, even endorsed contributors get things wrong sometimes and shouldn't be relied upon blindly. There are things I've written on this sub that were off-base and should be modified, including in some of the sidebar content. Always test what anyone says.

Does Man Really Findeth A Wife?

6 upvotes · 19 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

They're usually spoken of as being mutually exclusive because most men commit so much time and emotional energy into dating/relationships that it becomes a distraction from your mission.

On the sidebar I wrote a 2-part post on "How to Find the Girl You Can't Keep Yourself from Banging." In it, I explain how you can simultaneously explore interest in women without compromising your mission. The problem is when you prioritize that search over your mission, which is where most men go wrong.

Christian 'Red Pill' books

6 upvotes · 12 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

What do you hold as the Red Pill standard?

I'm not sure I understand the question. My Defining the Red Pill for Christians post might address what you're asking.

The principals you just spoke about or marriage principals in the Bible?

The red pill is not religious. When people say things like "the Bible is the true red pill," they're speaking colloquially, not intending to redefine a secular term. The red pill is understood by the broader community to be "the truth," whatever that may be. However, as the general red pill communities have experimented, they have determined a set of concepts that they believe to be true. These concepts are generally not opposed by Scripture, and often directly supported by it (though the way some people utilize that knowledge is certainly sinful).

When I talk about the "red pill" I am referencing the fundamental truths about intergender relational dynamics as they actually exist. When I reference "secular red pill," it's specifically toward those things which they have concluded about what they believe to be true on that topic. When I say, "as Christians," I'm referencing something that primarily comes from Scripture and not necessarily a conclusion the secular crowd will reach on their own. Yes, there is immense overlap between the two, and that overlap is where the "red pill" exists.

Are the principals you talk about in the Bible?

Yes. Much of it is on the sidebar - amused mastery, fitness testing, preselection/dread. These are all exhibited in the way God interacts with his people in both the Old and New Testaments. If we are to be godly or Christ-like, we ought to exhibit them in the same relational contexts. So, if the Father does it to his children, we do it with our children; if Jesus does it with his bride, so should we also do it with our own wife.

If not does that discredit the Red Pill concepts we know

No more than we would say " $2+2=4$ " is "discredited" by not being in the Bible. I refer to this as the knowledge hierarchy: theology is at the top, then comes science/observation, and philosophy/logic is at the bottom. The three often work together in agreement, but where they don't, the hierarchy must be maintained. So, if God were to miraculously make 2 fish + 5 loaves of bread = ridiculously more than 2 fish + 5 loaves of bread, then scientific/mathematical reality bends to theological truth of what actually occurs. If philosophy tells us that punishing kids is bad and we should only use positive reinforcement, but observation and testing over long-term studies shows that this actually produces unstable adults who can't maintain jobs because their work ethic sucks ... well, observable reality shows us that our philosophies on what should work is not the same as what actually works. This is the hierarchy.

Most things produced by the secular red pill is in the "science/observation" category. What we teach at RPC is in the theology category whenever possible, while still embracing pragmatic reality on those issues for which the Bible is silent (which is surprisingly much less than you'd think).

if they are in the Bible how have they been missed by the church/pastors etc.

Because pastors/churches congregations have ceded to a "CHURCHianity" mentality over a "CHRISTianity" mentality. They love the church so much that they devote themselves to what is best for the church and not necessarily to Christ. This makes sense, as this is where they earn their living and receive their life validation. It is inevitable that the interests of an institutionalized body of people will be divergent from the interests of Christ. When this happens, pastors have sided with what's good for "the church" over what's good for Christ because they can easily rationalize new ways for interpreting the Scriptures about Jesus to justify their focus on the things that will keep the church alive. But if you go in the reverse, focusing on Christ, there's no way to rationalize away the fact that you'll lose lots of people along the way, and a sizeable portion of your budget and income with them.

Jesus experienced this tension too. He had people congregating around him the same way congregations congregate around a pastor each week. He loved the crowds. He cared for them. He taught and helped them. He healed among them. But when the interests of keeping the crowd interested and growing diverged from his actual mission of making disciples, he started saying things like: "You can't be my disciple if this" or "If you want to keep following me, you must do that," and he ultimately sent many people away, prioritizing truth and his purpose over maintaining the numbers of his followers.

a lot of Red Pill concepts are in the Bible we've just feminized them or skipped them all together

In the end, this phenomenon occurs because the overwhelming majority of people in the world are not actually studying the Bible. They're only receiving the Word from what their pastor teaches. Even most small groups today are not actual Bible studies - they are sermon-centered, discussing in groups what the pastor taught.

This is why it's so significant that Paul mentions in 1 Cor. that he intentionally did not ask for a dime from them while ministering to them - because he didn't want to pervert the authenticity of his ministry to them. He didn't want to burden them with the financial obligation to those who preach the Gospel. As soon as someone's financial means becomes dependent on their content and structure, the content and structure are compromised.

From then on, anyone within that content/structure who does not actually study any of this for themselves will have a filter in how they view content. They approach things with the mindset, "This is what I believe to be true. I read a verse that seems to say the opposite. That must mean that the verse doesn't mean what it says; rather, there's another way to explain it. Let me look at other verses that support my view and then I can feel better about writing off that other verse, and I can rationalize it away as some culturally outdated piece."

I used to do this all the time. But the more I became skilled at studying Scripture, the more I realized that ideas generated from cursory reviews of a passage were inconsistent with the facts I discovered from a more in-depth analysis of what's actually being said.

To that end, there are different levels of engaging with the Scripture:

1. Hearing it from your pastor.
2. Casual reading, as in a quiet time/devotional.
3. Discussion-based reading, where you talk about a passage without actually studying it, and call it a "Bible study."
4. Weak Bible study, where you attempt to study, but your study skills are extremely limited or you're using the wrong tools (like cultural lenses) to study the passage.
5. Actual, skilled Bible study.

Only the 5th will produce results along the lines of what we discuss here. Sadly, even among this crowd, most people will only get to #4 - they'll just opt to use an "RPC lens" instead of a "cultural lens." While it will get them more accurate results, it still does very little to help them learn to discover proper results for themselves in their own lives beyond the things directly addressed here.

Why You Must Be Willing to Nuke Your Nuclear Family

6 upvotes · 6 May 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This reminds me of a comment u/redpillcoach once made to one of my field reports:

STFU, smile, and nod. That set her off: "You're so manipulative. You have this power over me. It's all one big power play and you're just flaunting that you have all the power. I hate it. You know I have no power over you, but when you just stand there like that, it's like you're waving all your power in front of my face."

I think I just came. Sorry, what was that? Something about you having all the power and the wife complaining about it blah blah blah.

No / Bad Sex - Always His Fault?

6 upvotes · 28 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

How fluent are you with the concept of frame?

Has anyone seen dynamics change lately

6 upvotes · 28 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Are you lifting? That might explain why women are being nicer.

ABC FOR XYZ

6 upvotes · 16 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Moses is usually my go-to example. God forbade the entire generation that he took out of Egypt from ever entering the promised land. If the promised land is a physical representation of the spiritual concept of heaven, this would be like the pastor whose entire congregation would be going to hell for being so rebellious and refusing to listen to the pastor, all the while letting him stay in charge.

Does that mean we condemn Moses as a horrible, ungodly leader? No. It means the people refused to follow his lead. That just happens sometimes - and Moses is still hailed as one of our greatest models of a godly man and one of only two people referred directly in Scripture as someone who was a friend to God.

Most Christians Do Not Love Women

6 upvotes · 2 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'd add the fact that Ruth's intentions were also not to build a successful career for herself. Rather, she set her eyes on the highest value man there (the owner of the whole place) and seduced him into marrying her.

Props for the last point. Well put.

So... you got the "I love you but I'm not in love with you" (ILYBINILWY) speech?

6 upvotes · 12 March 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

True. Everyone thinks they're the exception to the rule. That's why it's so important to understand the foundation of hypergamy as a universal compulsion within all women. Yes, some can control it better than others, but the impulse will always be there. When men can understand that she's not unique and special among women, they're more willing to be honest to themselves about these types of things.

I always tell my clients: if you don't know what to believe, the safest route is to assume the worst and operate as if it is true, but hope for the best in case you find you're wrong.

Intro

6 upvotes · 9 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Welcome, brother. Here are a few thoughts:

Read: NNMNG, MMSLP, post series through 200s, plus others.

I know you're still new, but WISNIFG really has to be on this list. With how you describe your ability to handle conflict, this is your #1 greatest need right now.

While I am committed to my wife, it is driven by duty, not by passion.

Given how quickly you got married, pregnant, etc. it sounds like you didn't lack for passion early on. What changed? What would you need to see in her to restore the passion? Do you feel passionate about other things in life? Other women? Or has your capacity for passion faded with time?

If she goes low for her own reasons ... But if there is even a slight reason that it might be my fault

Notice the frame issue here. From what I gather, you're hung up on her perception of you in these moments. I imagine she walks into the room all upset, gives her fake little lines: "I don't want to talk about it" followed by "You'll just get upset and things will be worse," and then you proceed to comfort her and tell her you'll listen, and then as the complaints roll in you realize how irrational she's being, so you start to DEER and she winds up thinking: "See? This is what I knew would happen!"

This is a ploy many women play. The frame issue is that you're worried more about her blaming you than you are about whether or not you were actually at fault. How do I know? Because you DEER. When you DEER, you're trying to convince her that you weren't actually at fault, trying to change her perception of you. But if you are content in your own behavior, you can listen openly - and if you are at fault, you'll learn something and improve; whereas, if you're not at fault, you'll feel no pressure to change. But the minute you start DEERING you enter a game of perception shifting. And when her perception is that turf, who do you think is going to win that battle every time: you or her?

At this point, I am just trying to figure out my mission. I know what parts of it look like, but I can't get the big picture.

Let me describe this for you. Imagine a utopian kingdom. Think of Asgard from the Marvel series (pre-Ragnarok) - highly technological, defenders of the multiverse, abounding in compassion and generosity, all acting in harmony for the good of one another.

Now imagine some tragedy happens - like Thanos' coming - and wipes out the entire population except for a select few. Odin wants to see Asgard restored to its former greatness. He finds bountiful land with sustainable provision for billions - trillions, even - yet there are only a few thousand living there.

You live on Earth as an emissary of Asgard sent by the King to call the evolving race of humanity to become the new generation of Asgardians - and upon entry to New Asgard they will be transformed to be like the Asgardians themselves, down to a genetic level. You see all the pain and suffering on Earth and know that there's this free, open invitation across the bifrost for anyone who would love to live in paradise as an Asgardian, and Odin has given you a specific region of Earth in which you are sent to recruit - and if you fail in this task, you'll have to answer to Odin for why.

You could deflect and say, "This other guy is also in my region and he's better at recruiting than me, so I'll just tell people to go listen to him instead." But you also realize Odin may not be pleased with this abandonment of your personal responsibility to the mission he gave you.

Also, the Kree are recruiting from humanity with lofty promises of fun and pleasure, only to turn any humans who join them into slaves toward the expansion of their own empire. Being an Asgardian, you see that the Kree are tricking everyone and it's only a matter of time before they take more ground. This is why Odin first sent a wave of emissaries in the first place - to save the people from slavery to the Kree, inviting them to the paradise of Asgard instead.

As one of these emissaries and a loyal recruiter of Asgard, where do you start? What's your goal? What plan do you have to expose the lies of the Kree without coming off as a crackpot who has no credibility? You have to make a living because Earth doesn't recognize Asgardian currency, so you have a day job while you're there - and it might not be lucrative, but you know when your mission is complete you'll be unimaginably wealthy in Asgard due to your loyal service. What are you going to do with your life in light of all of this? That's the bigger picture.

I was teasing, she took it to heart, and tells me that I make her feel worthless. I told her that if I thought she was worthless, that I wouldn't waste my time.

I used to give the same reply. It's a mistake. You say this because you think it's what she wants to hear to be comforted. "You are worthwhile! You are valuable!" This communicates: "You deserve my love!"

But she doesn't. And God doesn't communicate these things to us. Instead, he says things like, "While you were still sinners [i.e. worthless], Christ died for you [I loved you anyway]." How much more powerful is that? That God's love for us isn't because we're worth it, but that he loves us even though we are worthless! That's some powerful love. That's a love that can be trusted.

Throughout all of Scripture we repeatedly find things like the list in Romans 3 that affirm our worthlessness and God's total lack of need for us. I started communicating this to my wife at one point in my journey: "I don't need you." It confused the heck out of her and she hated it for a time, before realizing the corollary: "But I'm still here because I want you."

You see, if you need her - if she is of such great value to you that losing her would somehow hurt you - then it is impossible ever to distinguish whether you appreciate her for who she is or if you simply go through the motions of appreciation in order to retain what she can offer you. This is an unhealthy ambiguity. But remove your need, just as God doesn't need us, and suddenly your love is more reminiscent of that of Christ. She could be utterly worthless and vile, and this not only give her even more room to appreciate your love toward her, but it also gives you room to let your love toward her be a redeeming force toward those things she offers which you actually do find valuable.

To be clear: for a long while my wife was hung up on feeling worthless because I didn't appreciate what she brought to the table. In reality, she had the capacity to bring things to the table that I actually valued, but she wanted to work on things that SHE valued instead, and then she was upset at me for not valuing the same things as her, so when I didn't appreciate her self-gratifying lifestyle that ignored the things I valued, she felt that I didn't appreciate her at all, and therefore she became worthless in her mind. In reality, she simply had to shift her efforts toward things that actually were valuable in order to receive my appreciation.

In the same way, there are countless people doing what they think God values - attending many church services, serving in children's ministry, joining the latest outreach event, participating on the worship team, etc. But God says, "Those are the things YOU want to bring to the table, but not the things I've actually called you to. Sure, you can keep doing them, and I do get some peripheral benefit from it, but it's still not what I really want."

That's like the wife who perpetually decorates the house, spending her husband's money to do so, but refuses to have sex with him, then is totally shocked when he's upset with her. "Isn't this your house too?" she argues. "Don't you also benefit from living in a more beautiful home that I've decorated for you?" And yet he replies: "I'd rather you spend my money on some lingerie and help me build a family. A better decorated house is nice, but it's pointless if we're not raising kids to enjoy it with us."

Or in the Asgard example, you tell Odin, "No, I have not recruited anyone. But I knew how much you love the humans you wanted me to invite to Asgard, so I decided to use our advanced technology to serve humankind by building for them nicer homes, lightening their work-load through our technology, and causing them to be kinder to one another through our moral teachings. Doesn't this make you happy, even if no one has agreed to cross the bifrost with me?" Odin can only reply: "You've wasted your time. We can teach them all these things in Asgard, but if they will not be with us, the Kree will snatch them away, even unwillingly, and you haven't made any progress in making Asgard a mighty kingdom again."

Our work is toward God's Kingdom, not merely the individual components of the nice things we can do from time to time. Never forget that bigger picture.

My normal response all these years would be to ask "What's wrong?". I haven't done that for 3 months. But I don't yet have the frame to either be confrontational, or jovial and pull her out.

There's nothing wrong with asking that question. It's useful at times. I'm not sure why you'd avoid this - you just need to be prepared not to let her answer create a pressure that you can't handle.

As for being jovial, an example of one time I took the "jovial" approach to pull my wife out of it and into my good-mood frame is she was sulking about something, mad at me over trifles. I teased her, exaggerating about her having a giant frown on her face. I said she should be happy and needed to smile, but if she wasn't going to switch to a smile on her own, I would do it for her. So, I picked her up and flipped her upside-down and shook her a bit saying, "See, now that the frown is upside down you're smiling." She started laughing and the kids got riled up saying, "Daddy, do me next!" and by the time she was upright again she was still smiling.

Q&A on Sexual "Brainwashing"

6 upvotes · 19 February 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm a question-answerer for gotquestions.org. Sometimes, if the question seems relevant to the sub, I'll post what someone asked and my response.

Dating friends vs. dating women you don't know entirely well

6 upvotes · 16 February 2020 · /r/RPChristians

You're missing the rule 2 information. What's your mission? There's no problem dating from your friend pool, but you don't even have that. And without a clear mission and strong frame, even when you do get friends, the relationships will be shallow and directionless.

Too many guys want to skip building the foundation and go straight to chasing girls.

For nonchristians, that's fine. The chase is practice, and if they can get laid a few times before they're actually worth it, they say, "All the better." But if your goal is sex within marriage instead of sex alone, then the foundation matters more than the chase. If you intend to stay pure, the chase doesn't get you sex, but does give her feels - and you end up getting emotionally entangled with someone only to find a few years of improvement later that you could have done much better (though by then you're probably too blue pill to admit it).

This is what I pick up as your issue. Get back to the foundation.

Q&A With an untrusting wife

6 upvotes · 11 February 2020 · /r/RPChristians

If you're asking whether women go to hell for denying their husbands, I don't believe that's the unforgivable sin. If you're asking if it's sin, yes it is. Even Jewish culture had a term for these women: Moredet. Research that for a more historical take. Otherwise, the New Testament should show that Christ gives freedom for men to manage their own homes appropriately within biblical standards as they see fit.

Q&A With an untrusting wife

6 upvotes · 11 February 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I had considered it. u/deep_strength and u/redpillwonder seem to be handling the blogging front well enough. Anything I would blog about I'd just put here anyway. I do plan on starting a podcast soon. More info on that soon - hoping to begin in a month or so.

How would a turnaround for the church look like? Making it more RP than Feminist.

6 upvotes · 21 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Just be cautious of some of his extremely unbiblical views along the way.

Mission

6 upvotes · 12 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This is beautiful. Let me be clear: THIS SUB DOES NOT ENDORSE COMMUNISM. Though I/we may have strong preferences, socio-economic structures aren't something the red pill or Christianity specifically prescribes.

That said - I have often said things very much like this about my commitment to the great commission to the small groups I have led.

What's also interesting is that just as you say a man with this kind of drive for his mission is marriage-material, as soon as he gets a wife her aim will be not for the great commission to be the focal point of this speech, but that she would be the focal point of this speech from her husband. That's the conflict between God's design in women and the curse - that she wants a man with this passion for something, but she goes awry when she tries to shift that passion to become about herself.

The Truth About Porn

6 upvotes · 5 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Amen to that.

Using Kanye as an ice breaker

6 upvotes · 4 November 2019 · /r/askRPC

Good tip, brother. Really, any cultural topic can be used this way.

- Political election: Ask about the candidates and the conversation inevitably ends up in issues of morality and you can ask where they get their moral framework from.
- Popular movies: Ask about a difficult decision the main character had to go through and what they'd do. Transition it to whether or not they've had to make difficult choices in their own lives.
- Video games: You're playing call of duty and racking up kills. You ask, "Ever wonder what real war is like? I just popped that guy's head off. What if he had a family?" You joke at first, but transition to tragic events that have happened to you and ask the person on the other end of the mic the same thing. Ask how they manage tragedy in their lives.

The key in good evangelistic conversation is to find a proper balance between disclosure and prompting. 90% of the conversation should be you prompting them to share their thoughts/beliefs/feelings/etc. with you. Your disclosure back toward them is best if you use your prompting to make them curious about how you would answer your own questions, then when they actually ask, you answer with the Gospel. Not a pushy, "You need to believe this too!" kind of way (though that can come later), but a simple, "Here's what I believe and it changed my life" way. Notice I use the word "disclosure" and not "preaching" or "proselytizing" or anything of that sort. Because all you're doing is acting as a witness - the role God gave us in evangelism.

Killing the Blue

6 upvotes · 28 October 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Servant leadership is a concept most often addressed in Christian circles, and discussed from time to time on r/RPChristians. The framework usually goes something like this:

- There are egalitarians who believe the biblical authority structures are culturally dated and therefore those passages can be ignored. Modern culture claims equality among the genders within marriage (while implicitly elevating women). They suggest if the biblical authors were alive today, they would have catered to the modern generation through egalitarianism.
- Complementarians find a balance between caving to the feminine and maintaining biblical consistency in the form of servant leadership. They acknowledge that the man has biblical authority as the head of the household and that the wife is to submit to that authority. However, they then suggest that the way a man should lead is by always putting his wife's interests first, and therefore if there is a conflict in the home the man gets the final say, but his say is wrong if he doesn't submit his position to his wife's desires.

That's servant leadership in the modern church. It's a gross misrepresentation of the actual relationship between Christ and the church. Easy examples to dispel this: (1) Does God/Jesus cave to every single prayer request to win the lotto or get a promotion? (2) When the rich young ruler refused to sell his possessions, did Jesus cave and tell him he could get into heaven anyway? (3) When the man who wanted to follow Jesus asked to bury his father first, did Jesus undermine his own boundary to make a "loving" exception for the guy? I could go on. The point is: it's not how Jesus relates with his bride (the church), so it shouldn't be how we relate with our bride either.

Now, if this "certain group" you're referencing isn't a Christian one, I'm not sure how else to tackle it, as I've only ever heard this concept come up in Christian circles. If the secular world is onto the notion of servant leadership, I'd be interested to hear their thoughts.

To be clear: servant leadership is fine as a concept in itself. I agree with it. It just needs to be expressed with common sense. It's not "slave leadership." It's "servant leadership." You are not bound by the expectations of the people you serve, and as long as you have a strong frame that has no problem saying no to their expectations, you would do well in earning the respect of those under your leadership by incorporating a heart for service as part of your leadership model. Just don't let them dictate the terms of how you do that.

Killing the Blue

6 upvotes · 28 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Every man should set his own. Yes, my wife is aware of mine. To be clearer, though: this was referencing conditions on a man's expression of love to his wife, not necessarily the boundaries over which he will divorce his wife.

On that, when people discuss this in churchianity, they always quote "Husbands, love your wives" - stop. They often leave off the "as Christ loves the Church" bit, which is a limiter. We aren't called to love our wives in ways or circumstances when Christ does not express love toward the Church.

Those who do keep quoting will add, "who gave himself up for her," and then stop again, leaving out all of the sanctification-oriented language from the rest of the section, as /u/deep_strength often discusses. That is, a husband doesn't sacrifice just for the sake of sacrifice and unconditionality. He sacrifices when it contributes to the sanctification of his wife.

Amused Mastery, Outcome Independence, Agree and Amplify, Frame, etc.

6 upvotes · 21 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

Amused Mastery - Approaching a situation from a higher perspective that lets you appreciate the light and humor in it, while simultaneously conveying a depth of insight that transcends those caught up in the immediacy of the circumstances.

- "My ways are higher than your ways; my thoughts are higher than your thoughts." When we let ourselves escape the immediate frustrations we deal with and see from God's perspective, our attitude in difficulty shifts from frustration to appreciation and intrigue.

Outcome Independence - Not getting hung up on rejection or acceptance on a particular occasion.

- "Whether you turn to the right or to the left your ears will hear a voice behind you saying, 'This is the way, walk in it.'" There's no one clear, definitive outcome. People make choices and God leads us on. Don't get hung up on what choices you make and whether they're right or wrong, and certainly don't get in a tizzy over someone else's choices.

Agree and Amplify - A technique for responding to accusations or conflict that combines fogging (agree) with cocky/funny by amplifying the thing you agree with to an absurd degree so as to make light of the accusation/conflict rather than getting upset by it.

- "For in Christ Jesus neither circumcision nor uncircumcision has any value ... As for those agitators, I wish they would go the whole way and emasculate themselves!" Jewish converts were accusing the Gentiles of being ungodly because they would not get circumcized. Paul pressure flips and says, in essence, "If you're so hung up on circumcision, better go cut the whole thing off." A godly man is not easily angered; rather, he can maintain good humor in the midst of difficult situations.

Frame - Your best self as projected to those around you.

- See Jesus any time the Pharisees try to challenge him. He does not cave to trick questions, but instead conveys the point he wants everyone else to hear, and while refusing to cave to the pressure of the pharisees he draws everyone else into seeing things from his perspective and being impressed by him, making himself the center of everyone's story rather than each person being caught up in their own life affairs.

I'm not sure how you see these concepts as "not separate from each other." Yes, one naturally helps the others, but they are completely distinct in themselves.

[FR] Initiate Often, Confident Always

6 upvotes · 15 October 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I love that quote! I may steal it sometime. But also: when applied to a singular woman, this is a covert contract: "If I keep <blank>, eventually she will <blank>." She may never. What are you going to do then? Do you have options?

[FR] Initiate Often, Confident Always

6 upvotes · 15 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Beautiful application! Just make sure the rejection isn't because you're spiritually unattractive (i.e. preaching hellfire and brimstone), haha.

My introduction

6 upvotes · 25 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

who I am now along with the new struggles I face while becoming a better follower of christ

I'd recommend editing your post to add this information to this post as well. Currently, it just comes off as creepy and troll-ish. But I do believe you're legitimate. But rather than merely sharing your past just to share it, tell us more about who you are today. How has Christ changed you? How have you grown in being the man God created you to be? What applications have you taken from Scripture or this sub or your own research or fellowship with other believers that have helped you? These questions are what benefit the community when you answer them :)

Could someone say anything about the statements this guy is making concerning the validity of the Bible?

6 upvotes · 20 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

no presuppositions

... is impossible. As an alleged Christian, he assumed that defaulting against his faith was the same thing as not having presuppositions for his faith. Notice that he references NO EVIDENCE AT ALL to the contrary positions, showing that he's only looking at evidence against the faith, not evidence for it. This is, in itself, inherent evidence of bias.

Another clear evidence of bias is that his "research" resulted not in questions on the existence of a god, as he claims, but in refutations of the Bible itself. This tells me he was probably googling things like, "Is the Bible true?" This is not a ground-up, unbiased approach on the existence of God himself. It is a look into sources that address the Bible specifically, which will, of course, be incredibly biased one way or another. He didn't hear about the epic of Gilgamesh by conducting particle accelerator experiments to discern the origins of the universe or happening to come across it in a library somewhere, completely by neutral accident. You only find sources like that when specifically looking for refutations of the Bible.

Oh yeah, let's not forget the title of the post. First sentence: "NEUTRAL perspective." Title of the post: "from the atheist position." These two are completely incompatible and shows that he was really trying to go in with atheist bias to understand how they'd reach their conclusions.

More likely than not, I'm about 95% sure this guy has been an atheist all along and merely pretended to be a Christian converting to atheism just to get the reddit karma.

old testament is based off of previously written mythology

More likely: the events actually happened and different people groups interpreted the events differently. Most people (including non-Christians) take these additional texts as evidentiary support FOR the claims the Bible makes about the events actually happening, not evidence against them. The non-Christians who do this simply say things like, "Yes, there was likely a huge flood. The Babylonians thought their god did it, and the Christians assume their god did it. But the fact is, it was just a big flood." This still doesn't do anything to disprove that the Christian God did it. It only proves that other religions try to give their god credit for it instead.

Moses and the ten commandments was based on Hammurabi

Hammurabi had literally hundreds of laws. You don't write hundreds of laws and forget to put "do not murder" as one of them. But you'll also note that several of the 10 commandments are conspicuously absent from Hammurabi's laws. In fact, I'm pretty sure Hammurabi doesn't reference commandments 1, 2, 3, 9, or 10 at all - and that's half of them right there. The others aren't worded the same, but are basic things: "honor your father and mother, don't kill, don't commit adultery, don't steal, don't bear false witness."

many many many evidences about how the flood couldn't have happened given evidence from, zoology, archeology, paleontology and and other fields of study

Right. And there can also be found many many many evidences for the fact that a flood did exist. When I've done the research, personally, the evidence for the flood seemed overwhelming, even in light of non-Christian research on the topic.

Perhaps the most popular is the centrality of oil deposits to where the Ark likely landed. All those middle-eastern countries that we're drilling up - where do you think they got their oil from? Animals decay into oil - especially when buried under water (example from even a secular/liberal source). Why would there be a huge concentration of animals in the middle-east in the general areas that Noah probably landed in? Hmm ... I've heard rumors that this is how Rockefeller became the first billionaire - by logicking his way through the Bible to figure out where the oil would likely be. But I haven't actually seen a source to verify that.

the exodus couldn't have been real

Well, obviously it couldn't have been real. Science tells us that a man can't turn a stick into a snake, or make water turn into blood, or cast boils across a land with a word, or make water stand upright for hours. I mean, it's not like God can do miracles, right? /s

Most "proof" against the Bible only counts as proof if God is bound by the laws of science. If it is possible for God to perform miracles that transcend scientific understanding, then the majority of arguments against Scripture go away because most of those arguments are simply: "It's not scientifically possible."

logical fallacies and how creationist arguments tend to be very circular in nature, with arguments from incredulity

This is where I get ticked off at most apologists. Instead of defending the Bible on God's terms, they fight against atheists on their own terms. I often talk about the wide gap between:

- philosophy/logic < < < science/observation < < < theology/divine revelation

If you try to use logic or observation to prove things that transcend logic or physical observation, you're always going to come off looking like an ignorant idiot. Stop using the wisdom of the world to try to persuade non-Christians. It's a bad idea. It never works. It's idiotic. Sorry, /u/rocknrollchuck - but this is one of the huge flaws with people like Ray Comfort. The better option is to stick with what the Bible says and defend its integrity, not to try to prove that science supports God's existence too. It does, sure. But most people who try to use it for that purpose have no clue how science and our faith actually overlap, so they just come off like idiots saying that "the banana is the worst enemy of atheists because it fits perfectly in the human hand" (a la Ray Comfort).

creationists misrepresent the opposition a lot of the time

Oh, because atheists have never misrepresented the Bible. If misrepresenting something is proof that the misrepresented thing must actually be true, then every atheist has just proven the Bible true. You'd have to be a moron to follow that logic.

"But Red, it was more about the fact that Darwin said the quote, but still believed it was science anyway." Uh huh ... but what makes Darwin right about every crazy theory he's ever had?

a lot of the gospels were written MANY DECADES after Jesus purportedly lived

Yeah, because most Christians assumed he would return in their lifetime. When they realized that wasn't the case, they figured it was time to preserve eye witness testimony before they died and the truth was lost through second-hand accounts.

Okay, so I'm out of time, but let me leave you with this.

Suppose a husband and wife are fighting. The wife throws a chair at him, but he moves out of the way and it hits the wall, making a hole. It's obvious the situation is not safe. The husband grabs the kids and vacates the house to make sure they don't get hurt as collateral damage.

While he's doing that, the wife calls the cops and accuses the husband of domestic violence, using the hole in the wall as evidence, saying he threw the chair at the wall, trying to hit her because he was so mad, and she's terrified for her life.

The cops show up and tell him what the wife says. He writes up a statement saying the exact same story she says, but that she threw the chair at the wall, not him. Now, how would you respond if the cops said any of the following:

- "I don't see any proof that the chair is what caused the hole in the wall, so you both must be lying. No chair was ever thrown at this wall, and we are extremely confident of this."

- "Husband, she told her story first, and your story is so close to the one she told that you must have just copied what she said, so your story must be completely false. You're lying. You obviously threw the chair."
- "It's clear that someone threw the chair at the wall. There's no reason for both of you to lie about this. But, I can't tell which one, so we're going to have to figure out who's lying or telling the truth by examining other aspects of your stories - but we will acknowledge that yes, a chair was thrown at the wall."

Which option sounds the most reasonable to you?

An Interesting Study Indicates Men and Women Sin Differently

6 upvotes · 18 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, no thanks. I don't buy into that definition either. The fact is, lust itself is not identified as the sin. Adultery is the sin. Lust, in the context Jesus provided, is considered adultery. And if you want to get into the Greek and Hebrew words that make up the whole lust/coveting concept, I doubt you'll find much about procreative desire. This is muddling theology of sex with theology of desire without any real reason to do so. That's just bad theology.

Opinions: Do you ask a woman out to begin dating?

6 upvotes · 13 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Not at all. After all, Jesus is the most polarizing person who ever lived.

As I understand it, Manson's concept of polarizing is that to be attractive to some, you're inherently going to become unattractive to others. Becoming more politically conservative might make you more appealing to a conservative girl, but make you an automatic no-go to a liberal girl. Right? Some women ride the fence longer than others, and a guy should take action to force them to make a decision.

The classic pickup mentality is that it's all a numbers game. Even the best PUAs get rejected a lot. So, they teach to keep getting rejected and rejected until eventually you get a close. A normal guy might get rejected once every 6 months because that's all he ever initiates. If he goes through 5 rejections before getting to "yes," he just wasted over 2 years. PUAs will bounce through a dozen rejections in one night to get the close - and all they need is one a day. The more time you spend in the "gray zone," the less time you have to move on to a girl who might actually become receptive.

That's the man-chases-girl model. But the girl-chases-man model can follow a similar pattern. Instead of initiating toward sex or asking them for a date, you're inviting them to join your life. That's all.

The goal here isn't to minimize rejection, though this model certainly does have that added peripheral side effect. It's to see whether or not women are compatible with your lifestyle and mission for Christ without you, as a man, having to change your lifestyle to suit what you think will please her or keep her happy or make her want to keep dating you.

But this lifestyle itself is still absolutely polarizing. Many women will see how committed a guy is to making disciples, for example, and decide that she's just not into that and leave. They're on the rejection end of polarization - and that's okay, because you have abundance and an attractive guy has plenty of other women on the attraction side of polarization and are really drawn to a spiritually mature guy who is making a difference for eternity with his life.

Perhaps the greatest confusion in my comment is the possible assumption that a man should only be inviting women to follow him who he views as marriage prospects. This is what mainstream churchianity teaches, and it's ineffective and has no biblical basis. In my blue pill days I actually used to be an extremely strong advocate for this position, but I see now that it's all grounded on hollow implications based on philosophical thinking about the Bible rather than theological thinking straight from the Bible. Jesus's model is straight from the Bible and theologically sound.

To that end, a guy should be asking numerous women to follow him at all times - not just when they show interest. Contrary to Manson's position, I believe this even extends to women that a guy is not attracted to ... if he doesn't otherwise already have an abundance of attractive women. The reason for this is simply that women know women, and the more women you spend time with, the greater your preselection value, the broader your network of women, the more likely an attractive women will enter your social circle and find you attractive.

In the meantime, be willing to put off girls who are never going to be compatible with your mission in the first place, so you're not wasting time on them. This is being polarizing. It's also being effective. But it doesn't have to mean asking multiple girls out on dates to begin a romantic relationship. It can simply mean inviting multiple women to join you.

Remember that Gillette commercial?

6 upvotes · 3 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Well, in the history of the shaving industry there has never been any competition ever before ... so, you know ... this is kind of a new thing for there to be more than one brand of razor on the shelves. Right?

No Real Man Fallacy

6 upvotes · 25 July 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

What if Scottish law said, "A true Scotsman is one who is a Scottish citizen and maintains residency in Scotland"? Well, now there's an actual code from people with authority to decide who is a true Scotsman and who isn't.

But then someone can complain, "But he's not a true Scotsman, in my book." Now we're back to the question of whether amorphous social norms hold more definitional authority than a governing agency. So, the governing authority could write a statute, "No person shall hold anyone to a different standard of a 'true Scotsman' than our law dictates," and then proceeds to list sentences for committing such a crime. So, outside their jurisdiction anyone can say anything about what qualifies as a 'true Scotsman,' but enter their boundaries and you're off to Scotland Yard.

Is there a book somewhere out there, written by a person or people with governing and judicial authority over men everywhere which happens to define what a man is, and which imposes consequences for those who reject the standards found in that book? Oops, that's a conversation to have elsewhere.

As far as the manosphere goes, I'm pretty sure if someone wrote a post here on MRP all about how "real men don't cheat on their wives," the post would get removed pretty quickly - because someone somewhere in authority has determined that a guy can cheat on his wife and still be a true man. Heck, if he buys into the view that men are inherently and bio-psychologically polygamous (as I do), he's even more a "true man" for expressing his polygamous nature.

Similarly, if someone wrote a post about how you can pedestalize your wife and serve her every whim and that doesn't invalidate you from being a "true man," that post would also get taken down. We could call it trolling, but the fact is that the majority of men actually believe this and might just be trying to preach their philosophies to a crowd that disagrees with them.

My point is more to say that there are individual pockets of governing authorities within the manosphere that have jurisdictional authority to enforce their own definition of manhood - however broad or small that definition may be - and that these definitions absolutely do get enforced. So, while it's easy to say that no one is the arbiter of what qualifies as a "true man," there are still always going to be standards somewhere about what different groups find to be acceptable messages about masculinity/manhood and what aren't. And people in those positions of authority will decide what messages their readership will hear on the subject and not.

And that's not a bad thing. I'm all for allowing autonomy to people within their own domain to govern as they wish. It's the same mentality as minimizing a federal government to empower the state governments to figure out their own issues. But along with this means that there will never be a general consensus throughout the entire manosphere on certain topics, and we just have to be okay with that. Some people aren't, hence the screwball stuff with the 21 Convention and Rollo and all that, along with many of the other fissures that have happened in the manosphere.

One of the consequences of putting a bunch of guys in a chatroom together and pointing them all toward becoming alphas is that eventually people will start trying to AMOG each other with their own views and definitions of the concept of masculinity. I'm with you - this is best avoided, and it's actually a pretty beta concept of people end up caring too much about that issue. But it's inevitable all the same.

This was a question during my class. wondering what others thoughts were.

6 upvotes · 12 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians prove that water baptism is not normative

But it is normative. Christians engage in water baptisms all the time. I think you meant "should not be normative."

But even that is a bizarre question, given that the apostles continued to model the practice - except perhaps Paul. If you want to make a case against water baptism, 1 Cor. 1 is the best argument you can make: "14 I thank God that I baptized none of you except Crispus and Gaius, 15 so that no one may say that you were baptized in my name. 16 (I did baptize also the household of Stephanas. Beyond that, I do not know whether I baptized anyone else.) 17 For Christ did not send me to baptize but to preach the gospel."

But even this argument is unpersuasive at saying it shouldn't be a normative practice because (1) even Paul baptized, despite it not being his particular calling, and (2) he recognizes that the other apostles were doing baptisms and seems to accept that as a norm.

More concerning is the exegetical framework you're starting with. You have a premise: water baptism shouldn't be normative today. You are looking for examples in Scripture that will prove your premise. This is the definition of EISEGESIS, which is when a person imputes their own beliefs into the way they interpret Scripture, as opposed to EXEGESIS, which is when a person looks into the text of Scripture itself to influence their own beliefs. Don't get caught doing eisegesis. It's the single most dangerous practice a Christian can engage in.

Now, the more common use of the thief on the cross in the context of baptism is the soteriological question, not a question of normative practice. You can't use an isolated incident to prove norms because, by definition, norms are observed over numerous samples across a demographic. But most people are interested in the question: "If the thief on the cross wasn't baptized and yet was saved, does that mean baptism isn't necessary for salvation?" That's the soteriological question.

There are a lot of different views on this. The Cathodox branches believe firmly that baptism is a prerequisite to salvation, whereas most Protestants say it's not. I can argue both sides fluently, though I am firmly convinced that it is not a prerequisite for salvation. But that's a much longer explanation than I care to get into right now.

Cold-approach? Day game? Night game? What are the specifics?

6 upvotes · 1 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

"Game" is a contested topic here. I'm all for it, as I'd guess u/OsmiumZulu is as well. /u/Deep_Strength is against it. Part of it is that we're probably using different definitions of "game."

In my view, "game" is anything and everything you do to develop short-term attraction with a particular woman. This includes all of the prep-work that is involved, which could be considered "setting up the game." Lift. OYS. Have a mission. Confidence. Be successful. Etc.

If I had to guess, the parts of "game" that deep cuts out are the in-the-moment efforts that are made to get a girl horny. Some guys reject game because it can be inauthentic. Personally, I embrace it because it's fun to play. Role playing in the bedroom is incredibly and intentionally inauthentic, but it's still fun and something worth doing if you want to do it. In the same way, even inauthentic aspects of game are perfectly fine if you find them fun and want to do it.

As for the "how to" of game, check my post history for my "Married Man Game" posts. I've done at least 3. I don't recommend sexual game for singles.

That said, certain aspects of non-sexual game can apply for the purpose of generally attracting women toward yourself. But I personally do not take the view that this should be an intentional pursuit for singles, per my post on "Finding the Girl You Can't Keep Yourself From Banging" (sidebar, if you don't want to scroll through my post history). So, I don't encourage actively gaming multiple women. As a result, I'm not all that interested in talking "game" strategies for Christian singles, though I'm certain that there are many others here who would. /u/macmeeler comes to mind - and he's probably got some great advice for you on that front.

What I do encourage is keeping numerous women in your daily (or at least weekly) social circles on mission-related activities, and being an attractive man among them. You don't have to be trying to "game" them to win them over, but if you have fun doing something that could be called "game," then go for it. If you do it for the purpose of finding someone to marry, that comes off as pretty blue pill to me, and could ultimately undermine your effort. But if you do it simply because you find it entertaining, then by all means throw all caution to the wind. But this would lead to the conclusion that "game" for a Christian single man will be unique to what each man enjoys. Try out a variety of techniques and see what you enjoy. I'm just not the guy to go into those techniques for a single - first, because I haven't practiced many of them as a single (especially since being red pill), and second, because I find the intentional pursuit of marriage to be a blue pill notion in the first place.

No Wife / Why Women Don't Need You / Do not marry her...

6 upvotes · 26 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

You're right. He isn't here in good faith - and hasn't been for as long as I've known him. His goal is usually to trash the purposes of this sub and tell people they just need to be more godly ... after admitting to sleeping with a girl just last week. Bad faith. I'll stay out of the conversation. u/deep_strength's reply is enough for OP to go on.

The only thing I'd add is that Bobby's stats on how bad marriages are today are looking at 90% blue pill marriages where the guy doesn't know the first thing about attraction. He says 90% of marriages are sexless flops where women do as they please ... yet 98%+ of marriages are blue pill. Hmm ... then he wants to tell the red pill guys we've got it all wrong? Try getting better stats within our own community. Ask the MRP/RPC mods and ECs how their marriages are and let that be your data. You'll get a massively different result.

On Marriage And Mission

6 upvotes · 13 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This kind of sounds like the guy who wants sex, so he crawls in bed after his wife is already asleep. He nudges closer. He moves his foot over so it's touching her foot. He scoots in a bit closer. Then he puts his arm over her to cuddle. Then he gradually slides his hand across her waist. Little by little over 10 minutes he starts playing with her waist line and eventually slides his hand inside her pants. She wakes up and says, "What are you doing? If you want to do something, just do it, but stop screwing around like this."

This "ease her into it" mentality with regard to what you're doing is usually based on a fear of how she'll respond if you're just direct and up-front with her. Don't be that guy.

If you want to "ease her into it," you do it the way Christ does with our sanctification. He tells everyone up front: "Be perfect." He knows what he expects. He knows what his mission is and tells it to them from the beginning: "Follow me and I'll make you fishers of men." But when the disciples dropped their nets, he didn't say, "Okay, there's a man. Go fish."

Clear, bold, up-front. That's how Jesus did it. Then he gave a lot of patience and grace as he was preparing them. Clear communication followed by patience and grace seems wiser to me than the "ease her into it" approach - and it's what has worked for me.

I'd most likely just have a conversation: "I have been praying about what God wants to do with my life. I've decided the only thing that really matters is fulfilling the great commission. Nothing else I do in life will carry on into heaven. So, that's what I'm going to start doing with my life right now. You interested in doing it together? Don't worry, I know it'll take time to figure out what we're doing and learn from other people who are more experienced at this stuff. But I don't want to get to the end of my life and think I haven't accomplished anything that made a difference for eternity."

Tag: /u/SkimTheDross - as I think I'm really answering your question here too.

Helping the predominately but not exclusively gay guy

6 upvotes · 8 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

/u/ChadDownUnder gave a great reply - especially the bit about a woman being an accessory to your mission for Jesus. People today get too hung up on sexuality as if that is the source of their identity. "Gender identity" is not an actual thing - it's a term of art. Gender identification is probably a better word. I'm going to go off-topic a bit here to set up some context, as I believe this is an important issue worth discussing.

Identity

Your core identity is found in what you were created to be. If I build a car in my garage, it's a car. It doesn't matter that someone puts a dress on it and takes it to the prom. It's still a car. Why is it a car? Because I created it with an engine and seats to ride me around. Now, if it lacks the ability to drive me around, it's no longer a car. We could call it a broken car for convenience, but at that point it's really just an organized hunk of metal and wires. It doesn't become a car again until I fix it and it can perform the functions of a car.

You are created by God to make disciples - produce spiritual offspring. This is what defines you and all of us. If you're not doing that, you're at best a broken human, at worst an organized lump of cells that can think. Who you want to have sex with doesn't define you - your creator defines you, and he gives you that definition by what you were created to do, which is make disciples. The person you marry should be someone that advances that cause.

Sexual Missiology

If you marry a man, you undermine the integrity of the mission. I've often noted that God designed physical marriage to be a physical "copy" or "shadow" that can help us grasp the outline of what a true spiritual marriage with Christ looks like. This is particularly true in our expression of sexuality. Just as the God-given biological imperative between a husband and wife to procreate through having lots of sex, so also does Jesus want to spiritually procreate with us. The Bible says that:

- When God's Word is planted in us, we will produce a crop 30, 60, or 100 times what was sown (Matthew 13)

- When Jesus talked about being one with us (as a husband is one with his wife), it was part of his prayer commissioning the disciples to go into the world and make more disciples (John 17)
- When the Holy Spirit comes on us, we are compelled to be God's witnesses all over the world (Acts 1:8)

No matter how you slice it, our spiritual groom entering us results in spiritual procreation. Physical marriage between a husband and a wife is a reflection of God's relationship with the church and this missional imperative.

Homosexual relationships cannot reflect this. Procreation cannot occur. If the Bible endorsed same-sex relationships as a reflection of Himself and His relationship with the Church, it would completely undermine the imperative toward spiritual reproduction, devaluing the great commission. That is, if God authorized marriages in which procreation is an impossibility and still allowed it to reflect his image, then that would mean God is okay with a sterile church that never reproduces - that the church isn't Christ's bride, but his "bride or groom," and that as long as we feel like being a groom-groom with Christ, then we no longer need to share the Gospel with anyone else because the "love" we feel for Christ would be more important to us than the procreational imperative of Malachi 2:15 - "And why did the Lord God make them one with a portion of His Spirit in their union? To produce godly offspring."

To be clear here, physical marriages were only a "copy" or "shadow" of the heavenly thing (Hebrews 8/9), which is spiritual marriage to Christ. In essence, it's a road map to help us understand what God was getting at all along. So, I'm not saying every couple who doesn't have babies is sinning and denying God - because the option of spiritual reproduction is directly available to them without the need for physical reproduction to help them understand how to spiritually reproduce anymore (an advantage of having the Holy Spirit that people before the veil was torn didn't have). But we still do want our lives to reflect God's relationship with his people as best we can.

With that context in mind, the purpose of relationships is to lead toward spiritual reproduction: evangelism and discipleship. This is something you can do on your own with Christ, but a wife is someone who can help you in this role. Anything that you do or don't do in the relationship is evaluated in the context of whether it helps or hurts your ability to live out this purpose.

Should I tell a potential woman I find attractive about my predominant sexual inclinations before dating / asking them out?

That depends. Will doing so in any way make it easier for you to make disciples alongside her? Will it help her make disciples better? Will it affect her ability to help you make disciples? See how this evaluation works?

- If I'm asking: "Should I beat my wife?" The answer is no. This is a poor reflection of God's relationship with his people because he doesn't beat on his church, and therefore negatively influences your representation of God to others, and it also sets a poor example for the people you're discipling, hindering your mission.
- If I'm asking: "Should I lie to my wife?" The answer is no. This is a poor reflection of God's relationship with his people because he doesn't lie to his church, and therefore negatively influences your representation of God to others, and it also sets a poor example for the people you're discipling, hindering your mission.
- If I'm asking: "Do I have to disclose everything about my thoughts and feelings to my wife?" The answer is still no. This is a poor reflection of God's relationship with his people because he doesn't tell us every detail about all of his thoughts and feelings - only those which are individually directed toward each of us, and even then not often - and therefore doing so would negatively influence your representation of God to others, and it also sets a poor example for the people you're discipling, as they'll be inclined to model the same behavior, hindering your mission.

How do I reconcile, given my sexual preferences, that I (i) wait - to see if a given relationship I could flourish in (ii) not wait - ask them out / start dating without true personal conviction that they're someone I can love?

This is, of course, RPC, which means we've got to take a red pill approach and this is a very blue pill question. You're saying, "I really want to get married" - but the red pill isn't about making your marriage fantasies a reality. It's sexual strategy. As Christians, sexuality inherently implies marriage, so I see how it's easy to confuse the two. But my general advice is to avoid marriage in the first place. It's a raw deal for most people and comes with a lot of societal baggage that you'll never plan on, no matter how many blogs and internet forums you read. Most importantly, as Paul notes in 1 Cor. 7 - it distracts you from your mission.

The beauty in what /u/ChadDownUnder is saying about a woman being "an accessory" to your mission for Christ is that it keeps the mission the focus. Right now, I have no clue what your mission is or what steps you've taken already toward living it out. This tells me that you distinguish your desire to date/marry and your desire to fulfill your mission (if you even have one) as if they are somehow separate things and not inextricably linked.

Then, when you ask about relationship advice without any reference to your mission, it makes me think you want a relationship just because that's what everyone wants - because society is gung-ho on pushing everyone into relationships and you've bought into the lie that getting married and having sex someday is what's going to make you happiest in life. This is a supremely blue pill mentality and a fantasy that will never become reality, no matter how down-to-earth you believe you are about it.

So, before getting hung up on if/when to tell a girl this stuff about yourself, I'd start with the question of if/when you should even start dating girls in the first place.

How to take women's votes away to save them and society.

6 upvotes · 3 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

If you think this started with our generation, I'm even more persuaded that you have no understanding of the bigger picture. You must understand history if you want to grasp what it will take to move a nation. The feminization of society has been happening over centuries and this generation of men aren't even close to the first to screw things up. Read /u/Deep_Strength's book - he covers all of this in great detail in the first few chapters with clear citations.

Women Feeling Threatened by Hyper-Sexualized Social Media

6 upvotes · 30 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Before this is a red pill sub, it is first a biblical one. Period.

Men have sinned. This sub seeks to restore them to God's original design. Women have sinned. This sub seeks to restore them to God's original design.

What society tells us about how men and women should be viewed and treated is inconsistent with what God intended. We're trying to restore God's intentions - that's all. Yes, the feminine imperative started when Eve ate the fruit and God cursed women to want to rule over men, but ordained that men should rule over them instead. But the reason this sub is for both men and women is more to do with a restoration of all the world to godliness, not just men, though men must be the ones to pave the way before women-kind will follow en masse (there are individual exceptions among women who are already willing to defy their cultural imperative).

What's ironic is that our message here is far more pro-women than the feminine imperative ever could be. People are only as satisfied as the degree to which they live up to the purpose for which they were created. In his book, /u/Deep_Strength notes a research study on the paradox of female unhappiness - that women today, despite all their "liberation" from the "patriarchy" and all that other crap, are actually more unhappy today than they were a few decades ago. Why? Because you can't be satisfied if you're living outside of your design.

It's not enough for men to return to their God-given design. That is only the starting point. After men have been restored to godliness, women must follow. Women must also be restored to their God-given design as well. Just as this sub has started with a predominantly male user-base, this is necessary because men must pave the way. I do hope that sometime down the road, after there has been a restoration of biblical masculinity among men across the world, that this would inspire women to rise up and want to band together toward a restoration of godly femininity. This sub can be the springboard for them before an RPCW could ultimately be created - though I anticipate that this would still be years away.

Is the Catholic Church blue-pilled?

6 upvotes · 21 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This really depends on what you mean by "blue-pilled." Some people like to say Catholicism is "red pill" because they endorse headship. A majority of Protestants could make the same claim, but red/blue isn't defined by whether or not you endorse headship.

The red/blue dichotomy is one more focused on the distinction between reality and culturally infused ideologies and the frame from which a person operates. With that in mind, yes, Catholics are equally subject to harmful blue pill cultural ideologies the same as Protestants and Orthodox - perhaps even more so.

What are practical things I can do to be more manly, masculine?

6 upvotes · 6 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Tim Keller is a brilliant apologist and philosopher. He's not the best theologian. His view of marriage, as I recall, embodies the same deformed view of complementarianism that plagues most mainstream pastors, specifically blending in ridiculous notions of "servant leadership" in a way that assumes the man must pretty much always sacrifice his own desires and directions in life to keep his wife happy when she wants something different from him.

While he has a lot of great content, his stuff on marriage is, as OZ put it, trash.

Masturbation when your wife withholds: Go, or no-go?

6 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The first few sentences in, I'm thinking, "This is good stuff - why did this get down-voted?" Then you started going off the rails.

Testosterone is not a cure-all, and you can't gauge a man's T-levels by the way he types. There are many high-T men who are still blue pill beta AFCs.

Also, women say no to highly masculine, high-T men all the time. While hypergamy is not particularly complex, we can't oversimplify it either.

The whole "Jezebel spirit" thing also gets way overused. Is it out there? I'm sure. But at some point it stops becoming a spirit unique to Jezebel that others take on, and instead it starts becoming just the "woman spirit." AWALT.

Breaking the Nice-Guy: Take Ownership, Ask For Help

6 upvotes · 13 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

not a believer

That's where it's got to start. While you can make headway with her as a rule of general attraction, if she's not a believer she will never be on board with the Christ-given mission of making disciples. If she's not on board with your mission, she'll never follow. Your marriage will ultimately be doomed.

The good news is: if you're following Christ and you can get her to follow you, she'll be following Christ. That is, if she learns to trust you, then she will trust Christ vicariously through her trust in you. It's not a perfect solution, but it's a place to start.

What are the differences of single and married Red Pill content?

6 upvotes · 13 March 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Other good answers here that I won't refrain. As far as community information goes:

- TRP: a few gems lost in a sea of wannabe-men with the emotional maturity of a 5 year old who can't decide whether to complain or brag, and often are more interested in thinking than doing.
- MRP: more interested in discussing what works, what doesn't, and getting results.

I believe there are some differences of opinion even among the mods on this, but I get the impression that MRP has three base positions (not mutually exclusive) toward the balance of TRP and being married:

- MRP is not a pro-marriage version of TRP; it's TRP for guys who don't want to get divorce raped
- MRP is TRP tweaked for guys who want to incorporate traditional marriage into their MAP for whatever idiotic reason they come up with
- MRP shows what would happen if a guy applied his knowledge of TRP praxeology over an extended period of time instead of quitting every time a relationship got difficult

Difference in priority with spouses

6 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Go over to r/deadbedrooms or talk to a divorce attorney and see how functional a marriage is without sex. Before getting into the specifics ...

This whole project is hogwash.

First, "Ten Dates for Mates" sounds highly effeminate - especially if this is what you're supposed to be doing on your second date. Is one of the dates "dress up in lingerie and have sex in a new place in a new position?"

Probably not. They're probably a bunch of emotional conversational pieces highly geared toward the way women tend to experience love and connection. Your list shows that the things that typically get accomplished on dates are all at the bottom of your priority list:

- mutual activity is, itself, the date
- understanding and tenderness are the feelings that are meant to be facilitated by dates
- intellectual closeness is meant to be fostered by the conversation on the date

The higher priorities on your list are things that happen as an inherent part of day-to-day interaction and not something singled out for date nights.

More significantly, though: this exercise FALSELY presumes that what she says is an accurate reflection of how she will think, feel, behave, etc. Watch what she does, not what she says.

"While we discussed ... she explained ..." Don't trust it. Women rarely know what they actually want. Very few are truly attuned to their feelings. The wise ones will admit in a crisis: "I have no clue what will make me happy" right now." More commonly: "I'm not happy because you don't do enough around the house to help and there's so much pressure on me" - and then you ramp up your chore game and she's still unhappy, so she moves on: "I'm unhappy because you're not supportive and encouraging enough to me." So, you start speaking kinder words and tell her what she needs to hear when she's down, so she moves on: "I'm still unhappy because I don't have the freedom to do the things I want to do in life." So you start covering the kids more often so she can go out with her friends or spend a day shopping at the mall, so she moves on: "I'm still not happy because I met another guy when I was out with the girls and I wish I was married to him instead." See how this works?

Women are inherently progressive thinkers, whereas men are inherently content. They're always looking to the "next thing." I joke with my wife that she has "next-thing-itis." There's always something big on her mind that she's looking forward to, and as soon as she gets it, instead of being happy and content, the next words out of her mouth: "That's great, but now I want ..." [Side note: do you notice the progressive v. conservative dichotomy and the parallels between the masculine state of being from the feminine and how this affects our political landscape in America?]

This makes sense. Women are directional people. They want to know that they're going somewhere. God created them to be followers, so if their man isn't a dominant leader in the home, they're going to pick their own destinations to follow. They must always have something to follow. I'm not saying this is a bad thing, it's just how women are. But it also means that in the absence of strong leadership in the home, their perception of what they want in life or a relationship is in a constant state of flux - as soon as they get one thing they want, their priorities change to want something else - some other (often intangible) goal to pursue. Don't fall into that trap.

How do you avoid the trap? By setting the agenda. Why have her create a priority list at all? You create your list and say: "These are the things we will prioritize in the relationship." You're welcome to get her input on whether or not anything should be bumped around, but at the end of the day this is your marriage to lead, not hers.

Let me be clear: This exercise is EXTREMELY egalitarian in nature. It presumes that her priorities for the marriage should be just as important as yours and that you must work together to understand each other's desires in order to for the marriage to work. This is total garbage. You need to set the agenda and let her know: "I'm not going to ignore your needs, but here's what this marriage is going to prioritize." Let her follow you.

While it's not the measure, it's an important observation to recognize all the same: I can say from personal experience that my wife is WAY WAY WAY happier in our relationship since I stopped asking my wife what would make her happy and I started telling her. "Babe, I know you've been having a rough time and you think x would be a good idea. I bet you'd actually be a lot better off if you did y instead. Give it a try and let me know how it goes." She's discovering hobbies she never knew she'd love and is quitting the litany of numbing activities that she previously wavered between.

Bonus points if you point her to things that are both entertaining and actually matter for eternity. Women want to know they are needed, and if you can find a cross-section between personal enjoyment and purpose fulfillment, you'll have led her to true satisfaction.

Well, I ran out of time and can't get into my thoughts on the specific categories, but suffice it to say I'd echo exactly what /u/helaughsinhidden said.

Flair System Update

6 upvotes · 26 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

MRP seems to manage just fine and they're well over those numbers. What's unscalable is monitoring user-/self-assigned flair, as we simply can't keep up with everyone who flairs themselves. Thanks for looking out, though!

Nofap

6 upvotes · 26 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The 400 series directly addresses this, as well as a couple posts in the 200 series and my post on "sex starved v. Sex addicted." The content is here. Just take a look around.

Validation and Interdependency

6 upvotes · 11 January 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Assuming it's a legit question: when I go to church (which is not every Sunday), it's because I want to, not because I have to or because I want to impress anyone or prove how good of a Christian I am.

But this stems from a larger framework issue on how I define "church." The Bible doesn't reference a Sunday-morning congregational meeting. Although that can be a church too, modern services are a very incomplete picture of what we see in the Bible, which was not service-based, but relationship based.

To that end, my attendance at Sunday services is because I see those as a tool for me to accomplish my purposes. Some pastor has already done the hard work of gathering people together, and I utilize his hard work to advance my influence in the community.

We've done it, guys. "Traditional Masculinity" is now officially deemed "harmful" by the American Psychological Association. High-five to culture!

6 upvotes · 11 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Nothing wrong with that ;)

We've done it, guys. "Traditional Masculinity" is now officially deemed "harmful" by the American Psychological Association. High-five to culture!

6 upvotes · 11 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Why even listen to these twats?

Because it's my job to stay current on issues of psychology and parenting, as it comes up constantly in the courtroom in divorce and custody cases.

I agree that the APA screws a lot of things up, but every psychologist, psychiatrist, counselor, etc. who practices in the country is obligated to follow the rules and guidelines that they produce. Every forensic psychologist who makes a recommendation of who gets custody must follow the APA guidelines for what they can and can't do in psychological evaluations and custodial recommendations to courts. Every psychological test used to assess custody cases, criminal defendants, and ethical violators will be assessed using tests that the APA creates. Every school that trains psychologists seeks APA accreditation if it wants to remain competitive.

Should we listen to them? Not if this is how they go about their research. But the fact is that people do - and awareness on a public level matters.

The Christian Brad Pitt thought experiment

6 upvotes · 22 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent post. This is a very needed reminder here. Fleshed out some more with scripture, this could be sidebar material. Note: Jesus IS Christian Brad Pitt in a spiritual context. True believers will do anything and everything to pursue him no matter how they feel in the relationship, even when he tells us no.

The only thing I want to clarify is that some men objectively can never be Christian Brad Pitt. The framework still works though because the idea isn't the man specifically - as wealthy, as famous, as good looking, etc. - but to be in the top 1% so you're at least playing in a reasonable league by comparison.

A Unique Situation

6 upvotes · 6 December 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Why is this on MRP and not askMRP?

You're too controlling. You wanted a non-monogamous relationship. You got one. You wanted to have sex with other people, so did she. That's what she's doing.

She was never yours. It was just your turn. You felt great while it was your turn. Now your turn is over. You can either man up and keep riding for however long it lasts - and the in process probably maximize that time as well ... or you can whine like a baby about how bad the "intense pain" is and be totally disgusting to her and all other women. If you're lucky, maybe a few women will screw you out of pity for your sob story.

Where do you start? At the gym.

Relationship agreement - what do you think?

6 upvotes · 26 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Surprised it hasn't been said yet: You can't negotiate attraction!

A woman will follow you because you're a high value man on a mission worth following. She won't do it because of some legally unenforceable document she signed when you first started dating. As soon as the terms aren't favorable to her interests anymore (i.e. she finds someone with a better obligation/reward dynamic), she'll branch swing.

Boldly sharing the Gospel - is it unloving?

6 upvotes · 30 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

2/2

For example, if a country is at war, "kill the bad guys" might be an essential part of winning the war, but it does nothing to explain why the war is being fought in the first place. The goal isn't to kill bad guys just because they should be killed. There's a reason why the countries are at war in the first place. Or suppose I want to backpack through Europe. Buying a backpack is probably an essential step in the whole process - I can't backpack at all without an actual backpack. But the point of my wanting to backpack isn't just so I can go buy a backpack. There are a million other bigger reasons and the backpack itself is necessary, but ultimately incidental to those reasons. Sin-management is the same way.

So, what was Jesus' mission? If I had to put my perception to words, I believe Jesus' mission was: (a) to glorify God (b) by establishing a kingdom for God on earth (c) that would carry on into eternity, (d) which he would accomplish through a reproducible model of disciple-making, (e) living out that model to provide an example for other people to live up to, (f) and that in doing all of this he would overcome, in the most glorious way, the spiritual forces that have been at work against God since the beginning, (g) enabling us to take part in this plan by defeating sin's mastery over us (h) so that we are capable of fulfilling our role in this greater plan.

Notice that in all of this, stopping our sin is something of an aside. It was a necessary step toward the actual goal of utilizing us as the tools through which God's greater purposes would unfold. Managing/conquering sin is not an end in itself. It is merely a means to something bigger. Popular philosophy will tell us that "the journey is what matters, not the destination." This isn't true in the Bible. Yes, the journey matters - but it only matters to the degree of where we're actually going and what we're accomplishing. Sin-management, whether on a soteriological or sanctification level, is merely a way-point or small stretch of the larger journey - not even the entire journey itself, and certainly not the destination. So, when we preach from the get-go that being "saved from sin" is the whole point of salvation and a relationship with Jesus, something much, much bigger is lost.

Captain Save-A-Ho Soteriology

When we preach the Gospel in a manner that assumes "Jesus saves you from sin" as the underlying foundation of faith and why Jesus died, we make the whole story about us.

To bring this to a more red pill parallel, imagine a guy who finds a messed up woman that he's really attracted to. She's had sex with over 100 men, she has a dozen children out of wedlock, STDs up the wazoo, she's strung out on drugs, cheated on any man she's ever been in a relationship with, and she's a Grade-A "I'll never submit to a man" feminazi. Should he marry her or not? I'd hope that pretty much anyone - even the bleeps - would tell such a guy to run for the hills, regardless of whatever emotional connection he might feel to her.

Any model of evangelism that assumes Jesus' primary goal on this earth was to save us from sin is like telling that guy: "You'd better marry her. After all, that's what Jesus would do." And, in fact, the gospel of sin management does preach this as what Jesus did. If we ignore the overarching plan that God had in sending Jesus to die in the first place, we're telling people that Jesus was really into this psycho crazy harpy, so he married her with the goal of saving her from all her past struggles.

This is the definition of the "Captain Save a Ho" concept. This is exactly what NMMNG preaches AGAINST doing - and rightfully so. This limited view of the Gospel is incredibly dangerous and undermines virtually everything we preach here at RPC and is at the core of why feminists have been able to manipulate the Gospel into something that would compel men to marry the first single mom or post-wall CC-riding alpha widow they can find.

What did Jesus do?

By now I've deviated from the more public resistance to the Ray Comfort model of sin-management evangelism that you were referencing and gone into deeper theological issues with it. Let me pull it back for the end.

We're not under the old covenant anymore. Hebrews 8:13 makes that clear. So, trying to use the law as a motivator for someone to want to seek Christ is already standing on shallow ground. Yes, it makes us conscious of sin. No, becoming right with the law - even if that's by grace through faith - is not the end-goal. If you communicate to someone that Jesus's function was to make you right with the law again (assumed by the fact that you emphasized the ways they weren't right with the law as the foundational premise for the conversation), all you're going to do is reinforce the notion that Christianity is just about a set of rules. Anyone who looks at those rules is going to feel judged and condemned - and rightfully so. There is no love in this.

There are countless better ways to address the Gospel that doesn't involve the law or condemnation as the foundation. Jesus' strategy was to give people a purpose - a mission bigger than themselves that they could commit to. He shared it with them, he showed them how to do it, he let them try, he sent them out to do it on their own, and he commissioned them to pass it on (208). This discipleship model of sharing the Gospel was the way he lived.

Did Jesus preach against sin as well? Absolutely. He called lots of people to repentance. Did he ever confront people with their sin as a foundation for getting them to follow him? I can't think of any examples. I know of several times that he calls out people for their sin, but I don't recall many (any?) of these people following him afterward. This tells me that Jesus' plan wasn't to do this as an evangelistic effort (or we would have to conclude that he was a wildly unsuccessful evangelist); rather his confrontation of people with their sin had another purpose entirely.

The woman at the well often gets pointed to as a clear example of Jesus confronting someone with their sin during an evangelistic conversation. But notice the foundation of the conversation was first on Jesus establishing himself as the living water - that he would have to indwell within her, sustaining her of life. This is part of the reconciled relationship with God that I reference as a more fundamental foundation for the conversation. Then notice that he doesn't actually condemn her for her sin or call her a sinner, as Ray Comfort suggests. He doesn't say, "You sinned, therefore you need me." It's not a logical leap. He's merely displaying his prophetic godliness to her and the conversation moves on without any further discussion on that point toward a larger mission that God was creating - "A time is coming and has now come," he begins, then paints a broader picture of the development of the church and calls her to be part of that picture.

Alternatives

I have obviously already presented my discipleship-evangelism model as a preferred foundation for sharing the Gospel. That is: give people a purpose bigger than themselves and show them how that purpose rectifies all of their problems. This is, in essence, what I do with virtually every person who has asked a question or sought advice on RPC. "What's your mission?" I ask. Then I give them a purpose - the same one Jesus gives them - and present it as the solution to all of their problems. My goal is to orient them toward Christ and the mission he has for them, and solving their problems (including their sin problem) is an incidental, yet highly desirous byproduct of what they'll experience if they take my advice. So, while you have been evangelizing through blunt communication - and I often rejoice that you do so! - I am doing the same thing from a different angle that focuses on the long-game through immediate reorientation.

That said, I recognize that the long-game isn't always practical and may not meet the need of the hour. Regardless, even in a short-game model of evangelism there are basic principles of communication that can make a huge difference. I completely agree with the previous objector that copy-pasta is highly impersonal and can make someone feel like you're preaching at them without actual care for them, rather than moving toward Christ with and alongside them.

When I was first being discipled, Justin taught me several principles for evangelism (which I haven't shared on here before, but might someday). One of them was: "Always get permission first" - either implicitly or explicitly. He would then explain that when you create a context for sharing the Gospel with them, they can't be pushed away from Christ or get a negative view of Christians when you do what they just invited you to do. It mitigates all of the potential harm while still allowing you to speak boldly and freely.

It also often personalizes the message. I love how you often open these conversations: you ask if the person knows Jesus. That's a first-step toward personalizing the context for the message. The next question you should be thinking is: What will make them want to know Jesus better? Where it can go dangerously wrong is when you shift gears away from their perceived need and you go into sin-management, telling them what need they should be dwelling on instead of the one they're actually experiencing in the moment. Your plan is well-intentioned, as the consequences of their sin, if left without the Gospel, are certainly grave - and this cannot be overstated. But if they don't connect with the sin-management framework for perceiving their greatest needs, they're going to reject the Gospel and accuse you of judging and condemning them. This isn't their fault for being too weak to handle hard truths. It is evidence of a need for greater tact in how to present the Gospel.

Losing feelings for my wife

6 upvotes · 26 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good answer - especially the last few lines.

But Rojo-Gringo demonstrated his own love for his wife in this: while she was still cold to him, he sacrificed for her Right. I just want to be clear: God's sacrifice for his bride was uniquely designed to fulfill his own purposes, intentions, and glory. He did not sacrifice because the church deserved it or because he somehow has this beta infatuation with us, pedestalizing our needs. He does it because he has a higher agenda, and the fact that we get to be benefactors of that agenda is incidental to his glory in the whole process.

Eight questions for the RPC community in other countries

6 upvotes · 16 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

1. I know many women who verbally express regret, but without privy to their marriage, I have no clue how sincere this is or if it's merely a verbal assent to something they later learned to be a biblical issue. That is, they might say they regret it, but not actually feel any internal remorse and have only changed their minds based on biblical persuasion. They do advise their daughters not to live in sexual indiscretion.
2. See above. My personal guess from the very few examples I've seen is that it's merely an intellectual framework shift about what's right and wrong, not that they actually feel internal remorse (though I can list a couple who genuinely did).
3. For many guys, they don't view themselves as settling. If a woman is sleeping around that much, it's probably because lots of guys want her. They view themselves as the one who finally "locked down her commitment" (which is, of course, a very feminine approach to relationships). They say things like, "Plenty of guys wanted her, but I'm the one who finally got her."
4. I'm not in the position of vetting anymore (already married), but there are some women who I would say have sufficiently repented that the remaining consequences are greatly reduced, although they are never completely eliminated.
5. The fact that the first 15 of those years they're probably not all that interested in sex yet anyway. The temptation for sex really picks up around age 15. As for that point to marriage, the way you've framed the question presumes that sex is a primary goal in a Christian's life. It's like asking, "How do you help men come to terms with the fact that they may have to wait 15 years before they get to play putt putt?" If their life goal is to play putt putt, that's going to be a problem. If they have more important things to do, it's going to be sidelined anyway. The fact that sex is idolized in modern culture as an epitome pursuit of human existence doesn't mean it's that way from a biblical perspective. Get people within a biblical framework of prioritization and the sex craved culture gets sidelined.
6. Yes. Easily. They just have to have something they value more than sex that is both active and in conflict with sex. If sex is their highest goal in life, it will be impossible to avoid sex for that long.
7. I object to the "even Christian ones" to the extent that it assumes there is no difference between Christian and non-Christian women. Among genuine believers, there is certainly a stark statistical difference. Where they become indistinguishable is when you look merely at women who self-identify as Christian, which doesn't mean they actually are. A woman who continues in unrepentant sin - especially sexually - is to be regarded as a non-believer and excommunicated from the church (Matthew 18; 1 Cor. 5). The thing is, many women who are already outside the church keep calling themselves Christians and many churches won't enforce Matthew 18/1 Cor. 5.
8. Absolutely there is emotional and spiritual neutering happening. I'm not sure of anyone on this sub who would say it isn't happening. The issue isn't what the Bible teaches, though; it's what churches are teaching.
 - The church's thought process goes something like this: *Men are prone to sex outside of marriage. The Bible says sex outside of marriage is bad. In order to get men to follow the Bible, we must take any measures necessary to prevent them from having sex outside of marriage. Conclusion: shame all sexual impulses for single men so that they will feel so much guilt at having sexual thoughts that they won't escalate to acting on them.

- The Bible's thought process goes something like this: *Men are prone to sex outside of marriage. This is bad. In order to get men to be obedient, God gives them a framework within which to live - a mission. Anyone who lives for that mission, within that framework, will inherently be fleeing from temptation. That framework embraces the fact that men will have sexual desires anyway, but gives marriage as an opportunity to express their sexuality without allowing it to become a dominant distraction away from their mission.

The first bullet there is most often expressed by pastors like Andy Stanley, who preached about how he remains faithful to his wife: refusing ever to be alone with a woman. Ever. He talked about how it was awkward when he would get picked up at the airport and the driver would be a woman and he'd have to call the driving company to send another driver who was a man - that's how extreme he took it. His rationale? "If I set the bar so high that even failing my own bar would still be not sinful, then I know I will never fall into actual sin." Know who else used that same rationale for their lifestyle? The Pharisees. And Jesus condemned them for it (Matthew 15:9/Mark 7:7), as did Paul (Colossians 2:22).

The church now applies that same rationale: "If you want to avoid acting on your sexual desires, you have to go above and beyond what the Bible requires to stifle those desires so that way even if you do break your own standard, you'll still be pure." This is absurdity.

On Biblical Justice and Rape

6 upvotes · 10 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

1/2 - Long Reply Incoming

Okay, so to back up briefly, the OT law was never historically divided into three types - that came afterward. For as much as Paul talks about the law in his epistles, if there were a historical segregation, he would have mentioned it. Instead, we see him arguing over and over and over again that the non-Jews were not subject to Jewish law. He speaks in broad terms, even as to the most fundamental and basic, most important laws they had, like circumcision.

In Acts 15 there was a council that met to decide what laws would be imposed on the Gentiles and not. Paul was present and presumably argued against imposing any laws at all. James brought up the concession to limit it to just a 3/4 (depending on how you interpret it) OT laws - and this was made not as a command that those were the only laws to be retained, but as a concession to maintain peace and unity between otherwise warring factions of Jew and Gentile within the church. Paul's real view on this becomes evident when, years later (presumably after the hostilities died down), he writes in places like 1 Cor. 8 and Romans 14 (among several other places) that even those OT commands that were forbidden to the Gentiles in Acts 15 are really permissible as long as it doesn't violate one's personal convictions or we're not causing our brother to sin (ex. eating food sacrificed to an idol: forbidden in Acts 15, but permitted in 1 Cor. 8).

The Acts 15 council made no reference to moral laws being preserved. They only listed 4 out of the entire OT testament. And given their status as a peace-making concession rather than a theological conclusion, I have to assume that the whole of the OT law is no longer applicable to anyone who is a Gentile.

Accordingly, when you ask:

Why do we follow some of the Old Testament laws, but not all of them? Aren't you just picking and choosing which laws to follow?

No, I'm not picking and choosing any of them. I'm following Paul's conclusion that they are all rendered moot by the new covenant. From my reading of the Bible, this seems so plainly obvious that I'm not sure how so many Christians miss it.

Many want to point to Matthew 5:18 and only quote: "until heaven and earth disappear, not the smallest letter, not the least stroke of a pen, will by any means disappear from the Law" as their basis for assuming the law is still applicable. But they leave off the last 4 words of that verse: "until everything is accomplished." What were Jesus's very last words before dying? "It is finished" (John 19:30).

When Jesus died by the law, we died to it with him (Romans 7:4), and thus the law no longer applies to us. "You are not under the law, but under grace" (Romans 6:14).

I know this only answers the "picking and choosing" part of the question, and I could spend 3 more comments here, so I'll just move on and if there are any more questions I can address them.

Moving into a post-Gospel world, I believe the law of the Old Testament is no longer binding on anyone - none of it. Not even the 10 commandments.

That doesn't mean that there are no standards we should live by. It merely means that the old testament and the old covenant are no longer that standard. Paul replaces the legal standard of morality with a spiritual one - more on that in a second.

I want to be clear that I'm not talking about soteriology right now, as I'm assuming we all already agree that the old covenant did utilize the law as part of its soteriological model, but that the new covenant utilizes grace as its primary vehicle through which salvation would be found. So, when I talk about the law as a standard, I don't mean merely for salvation (a point on which I assume we already agree), but as a list of rights and wrongs from a moralistic lifestyle perspective.

As I've noted on this sub before, I don't believe the law ever existed to point out wrong things simply because God things bad things are bad, but to restore us to be the people God had originally intended. "Bad" or "evil" or "wrong" is not an eternal, innate concept. In the beginning was God and God alone. When God created Adam and Eve, there was no sin or evil. That was introduced ex post facto.

I often ask people whether God created the law for himself or for man's benefit. While there is truth in both arguments, most people appropriately answer: for man's benefit. Jesus gives this example when saying, "The Sabbath was created for man, not man for the Sabbath." If God didn't want us to break the law simply because "Mmm, that's bad, m'kay?" then how are we to benefit from it? How does that help us? It doesn't - it would be for God's own nuisance value that he wants us to keep the law (as if we actually held enough significance in the grand scheme that our behaviors could be a nuisance to God).

Instead, the point of the law is to help us to become the kinds of people God intended when he created humanity in the first place. The old covenant was not about avoiding bad things merely because they were bad, and thereby saving ourselves by managing our sin. It was meant to develop a positive, affirmative character that was oriented toward godliness.

- The command "do not steal" isn't about stealing being part of some higher moralistic list of "no no"s; it's because God wants us to become the kinds of people who don't need to steal in the first place.
- The command to keep the Sabbath isn't about it being wrong to go to work or help your donkey out of a ditch on a particular day of the week; it's about being the type of people who are able to appreciate and enjoy what God has given us instead of working ourselves to death.
- The command not to covet our neighbor's wife and possessions isn't about some darkness that grows in a person's heart; it's about making us the kind of people that are content with what God has given us so that we don't become envious of those who are given more. God will have grace on whom he will have grace and mercy on whom he will have mercy (Romans 9, I think?). Some of the workers in the parable of the talents/minas got more than others - and that's totally at the master's discretion. Coveting isn't bad for coveting's own sake. It's "bad" because a person who covets isn't living up to the type of person God wanted him to be.

Now, in the OT and even through the Gospels, humanity had a significant disadvantage. Here's how this works:

- Originally, God revealed himself to humanity by telling us who he is and what he expected. This is how it is through most of the OT, as occurs through the law and the prophets as external indicators of God's intentions for mankind.
- When humanity couldn't accept that, God came down to show us who he is with a real, tangible example in the person of Jesus. We had God incarnate walking the earth explaining everything to us and showing us what it looked like to live it out in practice. But that still was not enough.
- Jesus says, "It is better for you that I go because unless I leave the helper will not come to you" (John 16, I think). That helper is the Holy Spirit. Instead of telling us who God is and what he expects (OT) or even showing us (Gospels), the Holy Spirit changes the game by entering into us, becoming one with us, and transforming us into who God is and what he expects of us (through Spirit-led sanctification).

To that end, the OT law is obsolete because God no longer communicates his expectations to us through such things. He uses the Holy Spirit internally within us.

Tag: /u/lololasaurus /u/neytax /u/BobbyMcKee

Married Man Game Part 2: Teasing

6 upvotes · 8 October 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The main thing is just not to bring it up independently of her. If she brings him up, fine. If you do it, it tells her you're thinking about it.

The same works in reverse, though. I was getting fitted for a tux for a wedding several months ago and the girl at Men's Wearhouse dug her nose into my neck, took a deep whiff and said, "You smell really good! I just want to keep smelling you." My wife brought that up, trying to tease me about it a few times, but the fact that she kept bringing it up on her own made it clear the situation struck a chord in her. For her it's fine - it's one of many ways a woman initiates by creating context. For guys, you can't do that.

As far as actual teasing, when she brings it up try saying, "I can't tell if you want me to punch him in the face or invite him in our bedroom, so I just want to make this clear: I'm fine with two chicks, but not with two dicks."

Need Some Help with a New Guy

6 upvotes · 1 October 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You start one.

Better Beta Divorce Strategy

6 upvotes · 27 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Yeah, my state has the separate and apart for 1 year rule too, but most people want to file sooner than that, so I don't often present it as an option.

As for the "other strategies" for dealing with a more agreeable spouse, I think you'd be underwhelmed with whatever I'd write up. It's typical negotiation strategy. Of course, there are nuances that I employ to get advantages that most attorneys are ignorant about, but that's more an awareness of the laws and rules of taxation than anything even a well-studied layperson would be able to follow along with.

I'll give a quick example. I have a case recently where I'm representing the wife, who has close to $700,000 in retirement assets. Her husband has stock in his company worth $1,000,000 that he intended to be his retirement. I convinced the opposing attorney and her client to give my client $150,000 extra of the marital assets so they'd both be sitting at $850,000. Sounds fair, right? Until you notice:

- The additional assets my client got came out of their joint savings (not sure why they stockpiled it so high), which is a post-tax asset, as compared to the pre-tax nature of the retirement and investments.
- Because of the way my client's retirement assets were stored (mostly roth with some traditional IRAs) the post-tax value of her retirement accounts would have been around $600,000. Because the husband's stock was all pre-tax, his post-tax value would have been close to $700,000. He should have only given $50,000 to equalize the post-tax values. He gave my client $150,000 instead.

That's not really a "strategy" for winning a case. That's just being good at what I do. So, I'm not sure I could do a post on stuff like that because there would be so many nuances. The post would read more like a lesson on tax and investment accounting that would bore everyone to death and my only real conclusion would be: "Pay attention to tax effecting on your assets" because anything beyond that would be so nuanced to each specific situation that it wouldn't have enough broad applicability.

we have to wait and see exactly which magistrate we draw. our strategy will be partially based on which one

This is absolutely true. Not only does each magistrate have his/her own opinions on how to handle discretionary issues, but I have different relationships with each one too, so my own personal connections and reputations can influence a case. There are 2 magistrates and 3 judges in my county who will bend over backwards to trust whatever I say, even if the evidence is thin - because they know from history with me that I don't lie and I maintain frame even in the face of someone cussing me out, screaming in my face, giving death threats, and in one situation even charging across the court room at me. The magistrates/judges who have seen me maintain a respectable (as opposed to taunting) smile through these types of things are charmed/enamored with my frame as the attorney - something parties can't pull off because they don't have enough face-time with the judges/magistrates. But there are others who only know me by reputation, so I haven't earned that personal credibility with them. As such, I have to employ different strategies to (1) build that reputation in the long-run, and (2) trick the other side into giving me opportunities to show off my positive charm in the face of hostility and adversity. Of course, there are some cases where those opportunities just never come up, so I have to (3) read the magistrate well and learn how to cater to his frame of thinking.

Better Beta Divorce Strategy

6 upvotes · 27 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

based on your experience, i would like to hear your advice on how the man initiates and executes divorce for no other reason than "that's what he wants"

As a technical legal matter, you have to have grounds for divorce. Incompatibility is the only real neutral ground, but state law mandates that it be by agreement only. So, if she doesn't agree to get divorced, you have to use another ground. The most common one is gross neglect of duty. Of course, this is a legal technicality because no court will ever preclude parties from divorcing.

In the scenario you gave, instead of saying "I would be happier if I got a divorce" (which is what you're insinuating: "that's what he wants"), you'd have to frame it as being unhappy in the marriage and give some basic evidence for why you aren't happy enough in the marriage. It wouldn't have to turn into mud slinging. It could be as simple as, "I found someone else and I want to be with her."

Other than proving the grounds for divorce as a matter of legal technicality, most cases will follow the same basic strategies. The one laid out in this post is particularly effective with highly contentious and mentally unstable women. But there are other strategies that work better if you have a more agreeable spouse or if she's not the type who wants to roll around in the mud.

The main point to remember is that frame stops in the courtroom. No matter how charming you are, you're just one of a few hundred faces the judge has on his docket. By the time your case comes up, he's probably processed thousands of contested divorce cases - and you're not going to be the one person to change his framework for processing the next case. So, you have to enter his frame and win in that frame. Where your frame starts to matter is in the pre-litigation process. Attorneys and GALs are far more susceptible to influence than the judges and magistrates are - not to mention your STBE. Let your frame dominate those interactions, pulling them into your way of thinking. But as soon as you step into the courtroom, you pander to the judge's way of thinking and show him why you measure up to the judge's standard better than she does. That applies regardless of who follows first.

Jesus says "Follow Me" - an example of the correct frame of relationships

6 upvotes · 26 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Paradigm changing.

Bonus content for further study: pursuit, seduce, initiate post on the sidebar.

does Jesus pursue me or us?

If we're already married to him (i.e. saved) and we wander away into sin, yes. Otherwise, no. Especially not to initiate a relationship.

This is a very MGTOW type of argument

No, because MGTOW aren't expecting women to follow. Jesus does expect his bride to follow. He just doesn't get worked up when people don't. He shows them the door and moves on.

maybe in a secular way - how much of my time and attention moves towards doing things that I think will get me more women

This is the definition of being purple pill. You have blue pill fantasies. You sprinkle some red pill concepts in your life as a strategy to fulfill those blue fantasies. Then you complain it's a lot of work for the payout. You're still blue pill when you maintain this mentality. The fact that you sprinkle in some alpha doesn't change the color of your underlying framework.

if we are honest, if there was no chance of getting a woman from any of these things or we were celibate - many of these activities we take part in, we would not be doing

This was literally the first post in the RPC sidebar series. Yes, I would continue doing all of these things even if my wife divorced me and I couldn't remarry. Why? Because she isn't my reason. That's blue pill. I have internal motivations for why I do what I do, which don't depend on her. I'd venture this is true of at least all of the mods and several other guys as well.

Very happy I found this forum

We're glad you're here. I'm very interested to see your development and if you'll dive head first into the red at any point soon. Peace, brother.

Difficulty accepting my new reality.

6 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/askMRP

That's because you're in her frame. If I were you, my framework for perceiving the balance of responsibilities would be: "This is my house, my kids, my dinner to cook, my deck to fix, my car to repair. She's the girl I send out to get me my money so I can take care of business."

[FR] "Lost" Frame for the First Time in a Long Time.

6 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

From the first episode of Ozark:

Drug Cartel Leader: When I was nine years old, I started working for my parents' grocery store. Wasn't a big store, but it fed six kids. We had four cashiers. Carlotta, our best, maybe 30, started there when she was 15. She was loyal. The kind of person you call 'Aunt' when you're nine years old, because she was always there. Always with a smile. And then one day, my father's closing up and he sees Aunt Carlotta slip five dollars' worth of pesos out of the till, into her pocket. He could not believe it. 'Why? Why, Carlotta? If you needed the money, why didn't you just come to me?' Carlotta was a proud woman. Not too proud to steal, but proud. She had four kids, no husband. Her youngest one had asthma. Said she needed the money to buy medicine so her boy could breathe. Cried like a baby. Swore she would never do it again. Begged my father not to fire her. Begged. Mr. Hanson, what should my father do with Aunt Carlotta?

Mr. Hanson: Five dollars? You tell her if it happens again, she's gone. you put her on probation.

[Mr. Hanson gets killed. Later in the episode Jason Bateman's character answers.]

Cartel Leader: You never answered my question. What should my father do about a woman who steals from him? A loyal woman. A mother. With him 15 years. What did my mother make him do?

Jason Bateman: Fire her.

Cartel Leader: Why?

Jason Bateman: It's not the first time she stole from you.

Cartel Leader: What was it?

Jason Bateman: It's the first time you caught her.

OP has no idea how often his wife actually crosses his boundaries. This is just the first time she got caught.

What is love?

6 upvotes · 20 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I contemplated putting that in the post itself, but thought I'd give this community more credit ;)

Advice for a girl

6 upvotes · 13 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I would be cautious of any of the secular subs. r/RPWomen used to be solid but has devolved a lot in the last year - both in terms of secularism and overall quality of content.

u/redpillwonder is working on content directed toward women that I think he plans on posting here too.

In the meantime, there's a post in the sidebar directed toward women that he wrote which is excellent. I'll also give a more complete reply when I'm not on mobile anymore.

Overcoming lust/porn problem? (+ introduction, been lurking for a while now)

6 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for the introduction! I really appreciate those stats, brother. You've got a solid body and mind about you and your spirit is oriented in the right direction. This is good news to hear for a newlywed man. You have an opportunity to lay a good foundation from the start that many of us lacked until years into our marriages. In a lot of ways, your story reminds me of my first 6 months of marriage.

I was worried that we would end up having a sexless marriage—completely irrational

That's her frame talking. Sexless marriage are a perfectly rational thing to expect. They are extremely common. But if she can convince you it's irrational, then you'll drop your guard and she takes over.

when my wife isn't interested in sex I'm not really phased. I just move on and initiate again later.

Atta boy!

two weeks ... ended up sliding into porn

Geeze, if I didn't know any better I'd say that's a pretty low threshold. Of course, I know many guys who can't make it past 2 days.

Ok, let's get down to business. First, go back and re-read 202, then immediately the 400-series. In conjunction, they can give a new biblical perception of a longstanding problem. One of my favorite lines from 202 that you seem to be struggling with: "But then you realize that it's silly to assume that guilt could save you from...becoming guilty."

You obviously feel guilty about what you've done. This guilt is putting you in other people's frame. If you want to get past porn, YOU have to be the one to do it. If you're living in someone else's frame, you're not getting past your porn problem; they're helping you get past their problem with you looking at porn. See the difference there?

I know you have a problem with it too. Don't get me wrong on that. But seriously, feeling guilty over it isn't going to make you ... not guilty. Remorse is not the same thing as repentance, despite popular belief. Repentance is repentance.

How do you repent from something like this? Well, I just wrote a whole post on that titled: Sexual Addiction v. Sexual Starvation. Satisfy your sexual cravings and see if you're still looking at porn. I've known guys who would have sex with their wives and then immediately turn around and watch porn 15 minutes later. I was one of those guys for a time (though not for addictive reasons). Are you that guy? It doesn't sound like it. It sounds like when your sex-life with your wife is up to snuff you're just fine.

This tells me that you simply had a time of sexual starvation. It's like when you're fasting and you hit the 5 day mark and you see someone who isn't fasting eating something delicious. You know you want a bite, but are you strong enough to resist? Some people are, some people aren't. Are you going to hell for goofing up on your fast?

No. Are you going to hell for looking at porn? No. If you were, then Jesus' death would have no meaning - it would be powerless to save you from porn. Are you suggesting that your draw toward porn is stronger than Jesus' power to save you? I assume not.

Let me get back on track.

ONE

Once you accept that Jesus bore your guilt, you should stop feeling guilty. That's step one. Look at porn tomorrow? No sweat. Confess, repent, and move on.

In Practice the Presence of God, it was said of Brother Lawrence, "That when he had failed in his duty, he only confessed his fault, saying to God, 'I shall never do otherwise, if You leave me to myself; 'tis You must hinder my falling, and mend what is amiss.' That after this, he gave himself no further uneasiness about it." Adopt this attitude.

TWO

When you have adopted an attitude that is not controlled by internal guilt over your actions - that rightly recognizes that your guilt is on Jesus, not on you and that your refusal to relinquish your guilt to the cross is an offense against Christ himself - that is when you will be able to live in your own frame. You will be able to decide for yourself under your own motives, independent of the expectations your wife, your mentor, your Bible study, your accountability partners, your pastor, or whoever else might hold over you on this issue. You need to be at a point where you can tell them with a straight face, "I masturbated to porn last night. It was wrong. I repented. I'm fine with it and right with God. Pass the creamer." If you feel compelled to have an emotional reaction to it, you're still in someone else's frame.

THREE

Once you've accepted the Gospel that Jesus bears your guilt, and developed your own frame on the issue, you need to set your mission. This is the real solution to the porn problem. I am 100% convinced of this. I've seen dozens of books on the topic of curing pornography and none of them have produced any consistent results. I have disciplined dozens of men through this issue and received fairly consistent results. A lifestyle of evangelism and discipleship cures a lifestyle of porn. That is your mission.

Why? I might as well make a post about this (and I was just about to write a post on something else - look how you got me distracted now!). I'll give you the brief synopsis real fast and then get that post up soon.

- Matthew 12 says that if you successfully cast an evil spirit out, if your house remains empty, it'll come back and bring more crap with it even worse than itself. Point: you can't just kick porn out of your life; you must fill that void.
- The Bible gives us three things that can fill that void: the Word of God, Jesus, and the Holy Spirit. Sound familiar? Oh yeah, that's the trinity. Weird how those are the only good references the Bible makes to something indwelling within us.
- What happens when those things indwell you? Acts 1:8 says that when the Spirit comes on you, you'll become a witness to the world. John 17 Jesus prays that his disciples would be found in him and he in them - and this in the context of him sending them into the world as disciple-makers. In Matthew 13 Jesus preaches the parable of the sower and explains that when the Word of God enters into the good soil, it produces a crop 30, 60, or even 100 times its yield.

Let's recap: kick the demon out; replace it with Father, Son and Spirit; doing this, per the Bible, always results in a lifestyle of evangelism and discipleship.

Why else does this make perfect sense? Because your sin is prompted by a desire for physical reproduction. But the Gospel says that the physical things of this earth are satisfied in Christ on a spiritual level. So, what you long for in a physical way, Jesus satisfies in a spiritual way. So, instead of looking to physical sex to gratify you, look to spiritual sex. What is spiritual reproduction? We call that evangelism. And what is spiritual child-rearing, which pretty much the entire world agrees is the ultimate source of joy in life? That's called discipleship - and 3 John 1:4 agrees, "I have no greater joy than this: to see that my children are walking in the truth."

So, go make disciples. Bear fruit. Don't drop the ball on this one. Just starting this process won't cure you, but running it to completion will. I am very, very confident about this result and it has a proven track record with at least 15 of the 37 guys I've discipled over the years (on my way to the 60 yield!) who are now making their own disciples and seen the freedom that comes with this. Now, that's only 41% - but most of the other 59% never went on to produce disciples of their own, content only to be discipled ... sigh. So, I'd wager the success rate of this method is probably a lot closer to 85-90% - and it's possible that some of those guys simply hadn't seen enough fruit in their lives when I last saw them, but have since overcome their struggle as they continued making disciples after my time with them. So, maybe it is a 100% success rate. Who knows.

My testimony and RP-imony

6 upvotes · 7 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Glad to have you with us. Yes, there have certainly been additional layers of emotional intimacy and oneness as well. As I continue to be assertive and lead in the relationship, this causes my wife to trust me more and more. As that trust increases, her sense of pressure and self-stealing of responsibility in the home (as all women do) decreases to a point where she knows her role and is content with it. She would like additional responsibility, which I give from time to time, but she no longer just reaches for it without asking, like a kid trying to take a cookie off the counter. This sense of knowing our own roles is what fosters a sense of unity in a spiritual sense, just as unity in the physical sense requires a clear understanding of our physical makeup ... otherwise you get into crazy things like pegging and fem-dom.

To re-word myself more clearly: men and women are different shapes meant to fit together both on a physical and spiritual level. If we change our physical shapes, either sexual oneness cannot be had or it's perverted into something unnatural, like pegging. Likewise, if we try to change our spiritual shapes, spiritual oneness cannot be had, or if it is, it's perverted and unnatural in God's eyes and not fruitful to His Kingdom. In either case, both physical and spiritual oneness created from unnatural unity cannot result in offspring - whether physical or spiritual.

Because of both personal sin and the influence of sinful society, most people enter marriage with their spiritual shapes distorted. Women are like clay - they bend to whatever mold they're put up against. Without a man, society is that mold, which is why women care so much about what others think about them and why they're usually very interested in conforming their man to societal expectations - because they've spent their entire upbringing conforming to society, especially if they had weak fathers. So, as I fixed and strengthened my shape and increased my influence over my wife, she molded to fit my spiritual shape, making spiritual oneness possible. This has resulted in a level of emotional and spiritual intimacy that I previously thought impossible.

Life advice and direction needed.

6 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I always tell men to start with their mission. It sounds like you have a plan for the future. That's a good thing. But as far as missions go, it's a garbage one. Your "mission" right now seems to be: "Get a job I actually like and that's conducive to having a family." That's a waypoint, not a mission.

When you're dead, what do you want to be able to tell God, "This is what I did with my life: ..."?

That's is the answer to your first question. If you're not moving toward Christ, you're moving away. The reason you can't grow toward Christ in an environment like this is because your goals aren't God's goals. You have a destination in mind, not a direction. Christ is moving. If you have destinational thinking, by the time you arrive he'll already be gone - and that's even assuming your short-term goals are even where he was at one point in the first place. You'll always be playing catch-up.

When your head and heart are rightly oriented toward the pursuit of Christ through a clear and unambiguous mission He has assigned to you, then you will find it much easier to avoid sin and pursue Christ. Why? Because instead of planning the next time you can sin, you'll be planning your next steps in that mission. As I've often said: The way to avoid sin isn't by trying to avoid sin, but by proactively doing the things Jesus wants you doing in the first place. It's the pink elephant thing. I tell you not to think about pink elephants. If you try to stop thinking about pink elephants you're going to keep thinking about it, despite your hardest efforts. If you just go do something else, you'll successfully stop. In the Christian life it's only slightly different: everything is sin except God's intentions for us. So the only way to stop sinning is by discerning God's intentions for us and proactively doing it. Trying to avoid sin as a reactive measure to temptation will fail every time.

As for meeting quality Christian women, there are a million ways this can be done. Most of that content is already up on the sidebar and /u/OsmiumZulu has done a wonderful job breaking this down. I won't rehash what has already been said there.

Is it weird to hit up a girl you know on instagram?

6 upvotes · 10 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You're right that this post isn't Christian-related in the sense that it's not a unique issue that Christian men struggle with. But the concept of how to approach girls isn't necessarily addressed by the Bible directly in the first place. So, should he ask these questions to secular guys, a feminized church, or guys who actually know what they're talking about? I don't think he did wrong by posting here.

What he did do wrong was fail to give any actual relevant information. To /u/DarqueKnight ...

1. Stats? What's your height, weight, body fat, each of your lifts?
2. Have you read the RPC sidebar? What about the MRP sidebar? A lot of this stuff is already covered in principle in those posts and the comments as well as the books and BPP's podcast. They may not address the exact question you asked, but by the time you've mastered these concepts you'll be the type of man who wouldn't need to ask this question in the first place.
3. What's your job? How are your finances? What's your career path/prospect look like for the future? Do you have anything to offer her?
4. What's your spiritual background? How are you at the 300-level disciplines? Do you memorize Scripture, have daily quiet times, pray regularly, etc.? Do you consider yourself spiritually mature? Are you sharing your faith with others?

Without this information, all we're doing is giving dynamite to children. This will be a new rule effective immediately.

Should I be approaching random girls? If so, where?

6 upvotes · 28 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I get the heart behind what you're saying - and it makes a lot of sense to me. That said, this type of approach often results in people being pushed further away from Jesus. There are more tactful ways to address evangelism and discipleship.

By parallel, if evangelism is the "pre-marriage" process in a person's relationship with Jesus, then that means that the pre-marriage process in our relationship with a prospective spouse should also be addressed more tactfully.

I do agree with your premise, though: that we already have a spiritual imperative to cold-approach people for the sake of the Gospel, so why get so worried about the non-imperative reasons we concoct for wanting to meet someone?

What your wife wishes she could say to you but can't because you're a bitch

6 upvotes · 14 May 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

More likely than not, she gave up on finding her perfect AF, decided to look for a BB to settle down with, fantasized about what marriage might be rather than taking a hard look at what it actually would be with this particular guy, and voila.

For women, reality is not reality. Perception is reality. And perception in their minds begins with fantasy.

I'm at a loss...

6 upvotes · 7 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

OK, I just read your MRP post from 4 months ago. What progress have you made since then? You got some moderately helpful advice there (albeit cliché), so what have you done with it? My first inclination here was to ask how you're doing on putting on muscle mass? If you're not getting into the kind of physical shape you need to be in, why would you expect her to do the same? How much has your bench increased? Your squat? Deadlift?

Back to this post - she realizes she's a big part of the problem. Great. Let her do her thing. Why are you so worried about fixing her still?

What I'm guessing happened is she said something like, "I finally realize I'm a big part of this" and your insides start screaming, "Finally! I have an opening to change her! I better take advantage of this while it lasts." Don't. My wife has done that several times throughout our 10-year marriage. That plan never works. Your goal isn't to change her. It's to be an inspiration for her to want to change herself.

Now, this is a fine line. I get it. Some women will still see you for the sack of garbage you used to be and say the changes are too little, too late. Others will see how much you've improved, assume they can't compete or keep up, so they'll divorce you anyway just to avoid feeling guilty/ashamed every day for not being able to hold her weight. This latter part is especially true among Christian women who are told that they need to meet certain standards as a wife and there is intense spiritual shame (internalized, not necessarily from external sources) they place on themselves when they don't meet that standard, which often causes them to want to give up rather than go through the hard work of improving.

If she's in either one of those places (and it seems like this past weekend she jumped from the former to the latter), then the answer ... doesn't change. Let her figure herself out. If she comes to you with questions, answer them. There's no sense stone-walling someone who actually wants help. But in the absence of her directly asking for your involvement, your job is simply to be awesome and keep improving - to be the source of inspiration for her to do what you're doing.

I don't know if you've read much of the sidebar here, but 108, 109, 110, 205, 208, 210 - and then basically all of 300-level stuff ... this stuff comes to mind.

- 108 - You're at that "low/turning" point and it's probably because you don't have a clearly defined mission that she's on board with.
- 109 - Because she probably expects you to be pursuing her and you haven't developed a frame where the status quo is her pursuing you.

- 110 - Because you still care too much about your "marriage" as if your "marriage" is a thing of its own. It's not. There's you and there's her. "The marriage" doesn't mean squat. So figure out who you are and where you're going and just go do it, then let her trail along if she wants. "The marriage" is not a higher priority than either of you individually.
- 205 - Because obviously you don't know how to communicate in a way that she can receive it.
- 208 - Because you haven't learned to lead the way Jesus did, which starts with example and gradually phases into her adopting the practice on her own and becoming excited about it.
- 210 - Because I haven't see anything from you about your mission in life other than that you want to decrease her standard of living and move away from the place where stuff happens and into boredom ... yeah, she's really going to be into that. You're an introvert, so that excites you. Maybe she's not as introverted as you think she is.
- 300s - Because I get the impression that you don't have consistency in your spiritual life. You don't yet seem disciplined, and you don't have a mission that your pseudo-disciplines are directed toward fulfilling. Go back to the basics and master them. When's the last time you memorized more than 2 verses? When did you last share your faith with someone? Other than a church event, when did you last spend over 30 minutes in prayer?

The sidebar is there for a reason, but your post is so short (even with reference to your situation from 4 months ago) that I really can't tell much about where you are other than to note that if you were where you seem to think you are, you would have known better to include a lot more relevant details. Check out this post, for example. He talks too much about his wife's issues, but other than that, right from the start I know his physical make-up and progress, his mission, his job/income, how much of the RP material he's read, his role within his church, his efforts to pursue Christ, etc. With that context I can much better evaluate what's going on. We can't tell you what to do if you don't tell us what you've done and where you are.

I hope some of this makes sense. If I had to take a stab in the dark, I'd say the best way you can get her to change is simply to invite her along for the ride whenever you're in self-improvement mode. If you're going to the gym, ask her to come along. You both make more than enough to afford a gym that has childcare. If you're going to do some mulching, ask her to join you. If you're going to cook dinner, suggest she helps.

You obviously don't want her around because you're not attracted to her. In your mind you seem to be thinking, "What can I do to make her more attractive to me so I want to be around her again?" But being around you is going to be what makes her do the things that will make her more attractive to you.

For Singles: Finding the Girl You Can't Keep Yourself From Banging

6 upvotes · 26 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is actually a really good question - and one I probably should have fleshed out better.

First off, I have also written a post with an official stance for this sub that premarital sex is and will be considered sin (although definitions of marriage may vary). As such, sexuality is meant to be embraced in the context of marriage, not before marriage.

More to your point, that doesn't mean singles should shut their sexuality down either. Rather, they should prioritize it. Embracing sexuality for a single person doesn't mean making it one's highest priority, as secular RP suggests. It means accepting the fact that we are sexual beings and therefore should not feel guilty for having sexual urges, which the church often attempts to do to us.

The question on the table, then, is what the single person should do with those urges. Should he fervently seek a wife? My post above makes it clear that I think the answer is no - and I am as confident in this as Paul seemed to be when he wrote the same things in that chapter (1 Cor. 7), "I have no word from the Lord, but I give a judgment as one who by the Lord's mercy is trustworthy."

To that end, a single person should avoid marriage at all costs, but in doing so not feel guilty for having sexual urges. But when those urges become overwhelming with another person to the point of inevitable sin, then it should be embraced fully with Paul's blessing that such a person does well to marry - although he notes that the one who stays single "does even better."

To summarize: embracing sexuality first means not feeling guilty about having sexual urges, and then means embracing marriage and sex when one's urges would otherwise lead into sin, and then after marriage to embrace it fully and completely within the bounds of that marriage.

As a point of clarity:

if we are also operating on the RP assumption that any romantic relationship is based at LEAST partially on sexual attraction, how does repressing that desire make us any different from the Nice Guys who divorce their sexuality from their interactions with women outside the bedroom?

Scripture is the premise, RP is a praxeology that fills in the gap where Scripture doesn't otherwise speak ... and most of RP is first found in Scripture anyway. My point in saying that is simply that we don't try to force RP and Scripture to coincide as if they are both infallible truths. Scripture is primary truth, RP is secondary when there are no conflicts with Scripture.

You also seem to assume that a man is pursuing romantic relationships in the first place. If you remove the romantic relationship from the picture as a goal in itself (as my original post suggests), then that "at LEAST partially on sexual attraction" part doesn't come into play either. All relationships are platonic until sexual tension increases to the point where it can't be platonic anymore. The goal here is not to foster an increase in sexual attraction (which I believe is one of the main reasons for how screwed up relationships are today); rather, it's to let the mission drive each person's life context and to allow sexual attraction to build on its own. This is how to avoid dead bedrooms, whereas people who cultivated sexual attraction as singles realize after marriage that they can't keep it up indefinitely, as body chemistry changes, women pass the wall, menopause enters the fray, children get in the way, etc.

The traditional secular/worldly method inherently implies a bulge of sexuality early in a relationship that will fade. Secular RP sexual strategy attempts to mitigate this by making the man as attractive as possible and to encourage him to give the woman many opportunities to respond to his sexuality ... but there will still always be a fade/decline after the early parts of the relationship as the honeymoon phase/new relationship ecstasy wears off. My proposal cuts out any up-front sexual tension and allows it to develop naturally in a way that increases sexuality after marriage rather than inherently lends itself to a gradual fade over time.

How do you circumnavigate modern dating and its standards and at the same time follow God's plans

6 upvotes · 14 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

/u/OsmiumZulu is on the brink of posting something that I'm guessing will really help you, so stay tuned. In the meantime, I also added his original post directed toward singles to the sidebar - it's WELL worth the read.

As for Christian dating, /u/ruizbujc made a facebook video blog post about this a couple years ago, which I fully agree with: [EDIT: redacted to avoid doxxing].

The brief summary is that if physical marriage with a spouse is paralleled with spiritual marriage with Christ (per Ephesians 5), then it's likely that the physical pre-marriage process (i.e. dating) should parallel the spiritual pre-marriage process (i.e. evangelism). To that end, what principles do we see in how God draws non-Christians to himself or in how we, as his bride, go about drawing others into relationship with God?

Examples:

- "While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" - we were imperfect when God decided to pursue us, so don't look for the "perfect" woman. Instead, God utilizes the relationship to raise us up into maturity, and so should we raise up a godly woman worthy of marriage if we can't find someone already perfect.
- Jesus constantly says things like, "If anyone would come after me, he must ..." or "Anyone who does not ____ cannot be my disciple" - This is him setting expectations and boundaries, just as we should set expectations and boundaries in dating relationships.
- God's purpose in drawing a person to himself is not just to tease them, but to bring them into eternal relationship with himself. Likewise, we should not be pursuing relationships just for the fun of it; we must always have marriage as an end-goal if we're engaging in romantic relationships, otherwise you're wasting both your and her time.
- "No bad tree can produce good fruit" - Fruit is our reproduction. If someone isn't spiritually alive (i.e. a non-believer) they cannot spiritually reproduce and God will not reproduce with/through them. Likewise, you shouldn't engage in reproductive acts with someone before marriage either.

A Guide to Manipulation - Part 1: Are You Being Manipulated?

6 upvotes · 13 March 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You seem to be forgetting the years and years of deeply ingrained blue pill philosophy that men have been raised with for decades or more. There certainly is a component of manipulation, but I also included the caveat for a reason, as you appropriately noted.

There's also a big difference between (1) when these things internally originate from within you, as you describe, and (2) when someone does not have a frame of reference of strength and maturity (i.e. most beta men), and therefore is easily susceptible to experiencing these things when prompted by others.

Or are you suggesting that the feminine imperative, hypergamy, etc. is a hoax?

The Cost of RP and the Benefits of Community

6 upvotes · 7 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Amen.

How to approach sexual relationships as red pill christian entering my 20s?

6 upvotes · 4 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with what you're saying in premise, but there are still lingering effects on a psychological level that will affect the marriage. This has been proven true again and again and again by countless Christian couples post-repentance who acknowledge that there were lingering effects that were difficult to overcome and still impact their marriage. I've broached this subject with every small group I've led and the conclusion is always the same.

You're right that other character traits can really mitigate that negative impact, but it's also not wrong for someone to prefer a relationship that won't have those issues to begin with.

How to deal with silent treatment

6 upvotes · 2 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

Yes. That's exactly what this means. If you're really a lawyer, like me you want to get to the bottom of everything. That's incredibly helpful in our profession ... not so much in home life. Turn that drive off and just be you.

For the next six months follow this suggestion: NEVER plan anything for the two of you. Plan things for yourself. Invite her to join you when you feel like it. If she does something else instead, so what? Stop trying to control her, even when it's for her good too.

If you live your life one way for the next 6 months and you're inviting her along and she consistently doesn't want to live your life alongside you, let her go.

How should one phrase to a woman that they don't want to have premarital sex, however, you still want to pursue the relationship?

6 upvotes · 29 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I think /u/Taipanshimshon is referencing "dead bedroom." The "let's wait until marriage" conversation and boundary is not the cause of a dead bedroom; rather, it is the blue pill ideologies that the people who hold this boundary subscribe to which causes the dead bedroom.

So, to answer Taipan, you can have this conversation and avoid a future dead bedroom simply by rejecting the blue and embracing the red. If he's alpha enough, he won't want for sex in his marriage, even if he sets a precedent of abstinence during their pre-marriage relationship.

I prefer to think of it as the longest period of edging ever, rather than training each other to be sex averse. If the actual desire for sex is killed during the relationship because of the abstinence, then the man's not dating her right.

FR: The Spousal Support Scam

6 upvotes · 29 January 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This particularly client probably spent close to $35,000 on his case in total. The difference between a 50/50 allocation of income and the result we got ended up being approximately $3,000/mo in savings, which is $36,000 per year. Given that it was an indefinite spousal support award, after life expectancy (assuming no modifications), that's close to $1,000,000 over his remaining lifespan.

When comparing the monetary savings with my fee, though, it's also worth noting that in the absence of counsel there are other crap things a court often does to a man. I've seen cases where guys have lost 70%+ of their income to the woman - not because the judge intends this division, but because the wife's attorney conflates the numbers to reach this result while convincing the judge that this really is a fair 50/50 result. So, instead of pumping in "$70,000" as the girl's take-home income and "$30,000" for the guy (which no judge would approve), they persuade the judge that the husband is devious and lying about his income and cheating on his taxes, etc. and that he's really earning not $100,000 total, but $140,000 total. Accordingly, with a wife who earns nothing, her fair share should be $70,000. The pro-se male litigant tries to argue the accuracy of his income and shows his W-2s to prove it, but the judge believes the wife when she makes up a story about him doing odd-jobs on the side, such as off-the-books consulting or remodeling people's bathrooms, etc. The bottom line is that he has to pay $70,000 in spousal support even though he only earns $100,000/yr and the judge thinks this is a 50/50 allocation.

Given that I don't know what the other side would have argued (and likely won on) if my client had no counsel or garbage counsel, I can't really quantify that aspect of things - but suffice it to say that his net savings over the rest of his life do skyrocket well above the million dollar mark when you account for this factor too ... not to mention the property division side of things, which follows a similar pattern.

Hypergamy in the Bible (Song of Songs)?

6 upvotes · 25 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

There are certainly examples of hypergamy in the Bible, but I don't think this is one of them. Here's how I read this passage (correct me if you think I'm making a mistake):

- 8-9: Men: "Our little sister has small boobs, how can we get her a man? I suppose we'll just have to distract from her chest with jewelry and clothes."
- 10-12: Solomon's Girl: "I used to have small breasts too, but a while back they grew big and Solomon loved to look at me, so there's still hope for her. Consider: Solomon leases his vineyard out to others who pay him a lot of money, but keep everything above the fee. Likewise, my man has given me a lot, and I enjoy the fruit of his generosity and make myself beautiful with it so that I can keep giving back to him even more than what I enjoy."
- 13: Solomon: "Good message, girlie. I love it when you talk like that."
- 14: Solomon's Girl: "Now go, little sister, and be attractive to men."

The point of 10-12 is two-fold: (1) to let them know that the girl is still young and might grow her boobs in, and (2) that it's her man's job to give her the means to be attractive, and she should give back to him by using her attractiveness for his good. This is not hypergamy, it's red pill truths for women.

Hypergamy is also more than just "go for the guy who gets you sex." It's both ends of the AFBB dynamic. So, Ruth shows the clear BB side of things in barking up Boaz's tree, even though he was an old man and she could have gotten a far more attractive guy. Boaz shows some serious beta traits, but also had a lot of comforts and security to provide.

The AF aspect is more evident in someone like Potiphar's wife, where Genesis 39:6-7 says, "No Joseph was handsome in form and appearance. And after a time his master's wife cast her eyes on Joseph and said, 'Lie with me.'" In verse 10 we see her trying "day after day" to get him. Potiphar was the BB and Joseph was the AF. Why? Because of his looks, we're told. I'd presume it's also because of his dutifulness.

Remember that women have two competing desires and hypergamy plays at both of them, hergo AFBB. This is all covered in 102 :)

How do you not be wise in your own site and Red Pill at the same time?

6 upvotes · 25 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The context of Romans 12:16 is in the middle of how to handle relating with those we consider enemies. The verse before references those who persecute us, the verse after references those who do evil to us, the verse after that references those who have wronged us to the point we seek vengeance, the verse after that references how to handle our enemy, and the final verse in that paragraph references overcoming when someone does evil to us.

In that context, everyone agrees it's gravely unwise to overestimate your position over an enemy. Even secular war generals understand this. But in a spiritual war, specifically one where our target is the heart and not the flesh, we are incapable of defeating our true adversary or saving their captives, who work like slaves for them, if we are so standoffish as not to be able to earn a position of influence in their lives. Instead, our humility is what will earn their trust. Our refusal to show favoritism among class systems will earn their respect.

The proverbs passage is not comparing our self-evaluation to other people, but against God himself. So, from that angle I'd hope we all agree we should not presume to be wise in a conversation with God.

What you're really getting at, though, is something deeper which is more directly addressed in Philippians 2:3, where we are instructed to consider others to be of greater value or significance than ourselves. Interestingly, the top 5 translations on biblehub.com all give different phrases there: above, better than, more significant than, more important than, surpassing.

This stems from the idea that Jesus first preached to the apostles: "For he who is least among you all is the one who is great" (Luke 9:48).

Jesus isn't trying to give them a formula for how they can become great. He's ripping away the formula and standard. He's saying, "You don't get what makes you great in God's eyes, so stop worrying about who will be great because it'll never make sense to you."

To that end, I could say that a pew-sitter who leaves service on Sunday morning and ignores his faith the rest of the week is almost certainly the "least" among believers in his congregation (assuming he's even genuinely saved in the first place). Let's assume he's also homeless, penniless, rejected by society, etc. Now he's really, really the least. But we also know he won't be great in God's Kingdom.

But Jesus is also saying that the head pastor who preaches every Sunday morning and is eventually promoted to denominational leader and oversees countless churches, etc. - he's not the greatest either. God uses a different standard altogether and intentionally trying to rise to the top violates the standard and prohibits us from being considered great.

To that end, if we consider ourselves better than others, or live in such a way as to become better than others (for that purpose, that is), then we have already failed. But if we consider others as more significant than ourselves ("better than" I think is a weak translation), then our humility in accepting the role God has given us does make us great in God's eyes, regardless of how insignificant that role may be.

Consider all the great people we know as prominent believers today. Andy Stanley, John Piper, John McArthur, Francis Chan, David Platt, etc. Do you know who it was who shared the Gospel with that person? Who discipled them? Those people are small, small links in the chain who never get recognition, but I tell you they were every bit as important to God's Kingdom in what they did for these other men as what those men themselves are doing. And if they were humble in fulfilling that role and Andy Stanley is conceited in fulfilling his because he loves seeing how many people show up to his church every week (not to say he is) ... then that makes his discipler greater because the man who discipled him has all the credit for what Andy Stanley is doing, having been a spiritual father responsible for getting Andy Stanley to where he is, but does not compromise his humility in the process.

How do we reconcile this with the RP attitude of seeing ourselves as the prize? Because the concepts are applied in two different contexts. Our humility is meant to be among our brothers for the purpose of considering our own worth to God's Kingdom. Our confidence to our wives is a reflection of the fact that we are more suited to lead her than any other man who might be in her life.

Remember the point of Romans 12:16 is to live in harmony with one another. We are not to be competing. How many men in your church are competing against you for your wife's affection? My guess is none. To that end, you're not at risk of overestimating yourself as against an adversary.

As for the Philippians and Luke passages, a man's own estimation of his rank in God's Kingdom does not affect the value he contributes to his wife. We can't know where we rank with God. All we can do is be faithful and humbly accept the role he has given us. In the context of fulfilling that role, I know I'm getting the job done.

To be clear, here's the dichotomy:

- On the one hand, I know and accept that I am not the most spiritually influential person in the world. In fact, there are others in my wife's sphere of influence who are probably capable of and actively doing more for God's Kingdom than me. I don't know who these people are or how God is valuing each of us, but I accept when I meet any given individual that God can do more through that person than he does through me - and when I disciple men, this is the goal I have in mind for them. This is the humility Paul and Jesus compels in us to consider others as having greater significance in God's Kingdom than ourselves.

- But I also know that irrespective of my position in God's Kingdom, I am the highest value man in my wife's life (or most women around me, for that matter) based on a much wider variety of factors than rote spiritual ranking with God. The fact that I'm an assertive person, on its own, puts me in the top 10%. Add to that the fact of my being the strongest guy in my church (maybe second, never tested the bench of that bulky bald dude), most intelligent, in the top tier for active/involved fathers, relationally humble, etc. and I'm easily in the top 1%.

This doesn't mean I'm more significant to God than these other men. It means my wife should rightly find me more attractive than these other men. I cannot control my spiritual significance - that is for God alone to assign to me ... but I can control my attractiveness. To that end, I cannot take pride in what I cannot control, but I can certainly be the prize within what I can control - and there is no shame or lack of humility in having that right perception of myself, particularly if it improves my marriage to do so.

But if I go off acting like I'm a "better Christian" than someone else or that I'm "more important to God" than someone else, then I have left the realm of humility.

Remember: Humility is not thinking less of yourselves; it's thinking accurately of yourself. Because we cannot know our spiritual status/rank, the Bible tells us just to assume others are higher. But when it comes to all of these other things, I can say with perfect accuracy where I measure.

Also, the "I'm the prize" attitude is a comparison of your contribution to the relationship (not God's Kingdom) as compared with hers. Between the two of you, are you the lucky one or is she? Remembering that context also alleviates much of the concern of being prideful or arrogant with respect to other men in the church. Because of our innate role as men in a marriage relationship, if we lead rightly and are godly, we should always be the prize, not her. This is how it should be, and this is how she wants it.

I remember in the days after I had gone beta I made a comment to my wife: "I'm so lucky to have you. Everyone must be thinking, 'How'd he get such a great girl by his side?'" She was offended at this and was deeply troubled because she (by virtue of hypergamy) wanted others to believe she had married up, not down. She was then paranoid for a year after that with the idea that people really did think that and that she could have done better. That was one of the dumbest mistakes I've ever made in my marriage and one of my first RP lessons in my pre-RP days.

Wife addicted to weaponized sex; impending divorce

6 upvotes · 6 November 2017 · /r/askMRP

that's her last tool that still works on me

That's the problem, though. RP is about sexual strategy. It's mostly about sexual dynamics in a relationship. RP doesn't revolve around whether or not you have stimulating conversation or fun vacations or enjoy similar hobbies. It's about sex. If she can still use sex to get to you - that's the whole of RP right out the window. None of your other improvements matter. AWALT. The next girl will weaponize sex against you at some point too. It might take 2-3 years before she learns she has that power. But if you don't figure that crap out now, you're in for a sore disappointment in your next relationship too.

Wife addicted to weaponized sex; impending divorce

6 upvotes · 6 November 2017 · /r/askMRP

Well, you could have that conversation with your lawyer too ... they just wouldn't ethically be allowed to represent you afterward.

Seriously, though, you sound so butthurt it's hard to imagine that passing "tests are effortless now."

You say you like her a lot, but that's only because your sexual frustrations are so blindingly large that you can't even see all the other minutia about her that you can't stand. Even if you could solve that problem, I can all but guarantee you'll see another issue almost immediately afterward. We're all imperfect, broken people. Despite what the feminist agenda says, 49.55% of the population aren't excepted from this rule.

Magical last minute thing? Beyond divine intervention, no. She probably needs at least two years of dialectical behavioral therapy from someone who has experience (and success) treating personality disorders. Last I knew, there were only 3 people in my entire state that met that bill. So, don't get your hopes up. I think the world record for overcoming these types of things is somewhere around 5 years, but some psychologists theorize that it can be done in 2. My guess is that the rinky dink therapist she has now hasn't given her an MMPI-2 yet and isn't treating her for any officially diagnosed issue. More likely than not, she's just dealing with typical stress management, anxiety, and the normal garbage that doesn't actually help her improve; it only helps her cope with the fact that you're Satan and she's married to you and it's all your fault but she feels stuck (her therapist's attitude, not mine).

Advice to a married recovering beta on initiating

6 upvotes · 22 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

You're at where I was early in my RP journey. My wife will respond to my initiations well, but her version of initiating is still, "I'm not opposed to it today if you feel like you need to." From the good guys at MRP I've learned to accept the fact that women aren't designed to be initiators - so unless you have one of the outliers, plan to get weak starts from her.

But it sounds like your problem is with her response to your initiations too - which is fine. The fact that she's not shutting you down is a good sign. That said, we'd need more info in order to really figure out where you should start. I wouldn't be surprised if there was some Madonna/Whore going on, probably church-induced sexual repression, maybe just a good old fashioned 1,000 foot rope ... really no way to know without more details.

- Height, weight, lifts, body fat?
- At what point in (a) your life and (b) your relationship were each of you saved?
- Which of you is more spiritually mature? How often do you each have quiet times? How often do you each spend more than 15 consecutive minutes in prayer? How often do you each [fill in the other 7 basics from 301]?
- What types of tests is she giving you?
- How's your OYS?
- When you do have sex, is it starfish or hot monkeys?

Between the two books you're looking at, I consider WISNIFG a prerequisite to MMSLP. It doesn't have to be, but the order of how you should be working on things just flows so much better. After all, the first level of dread is passing tests ... you don't get to gaming your wife until a few levels later. Gaming is more fun and gives faster results. But start building the house before the foundation is solid and it will crumble and you'll be starting over again ... and from a worse position.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

6 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Fair enough. But I'm guessing you haven't experienced this problem in the context of a relationship you want to keep. For some of us it's worth it.

Sleeping Naked

6 upvotes · 6 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Hah ... I thought "humble brag" had to have some "humble" in it.

Sleeping Naked

6 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I like that. I have select days where I intentionally sleep with the kids. When I'm ready for bed, sometime around once every 2-3 weeks I'll grab a kid and bring them down to the basement (spare beds there) and we'll put on a TV show and fall asleep to it. But they know that if they ever ask me to do this, the answer will always be no. They have to wait until I choose to do it on my own. It makes the times extra special, knowing they get it because I want it and not because they asked, while simultaneously teaching them to follow Daddy's lead and not be beggars/complainers (a problem they suffered from for a while).

Sleeping Naked

6 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Nah, her mom thinks all Catholics are going to hell, so they've always been Protestant ... but point taken all the same.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

6 upvotes · 3 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

How is this even remotely "unfair?"

Because you're only considering asset division. It doesn't honor her time spent with the kids because she has effectively sacrificed her ability to have the same level of income as you. So, although you walk away with approximately equal assets (accounting for separate property), after the marriage you're going to continue earning income at the highest rate you were ever capable of earning, whereas she's going to be earning at much less than if she had been employed full-time during the entire marriage. So, because of her service in the home during the marriage, she's ruining her life in the after-marriage under your plan by virtue of there being no spousal support.

much more righteous and just than extreme divorce rape.

How are you defining "extreme divorce rape"?

I am mainly trying to protect myself from no-fault divorce and divorce rape which can pull the rug out from underneath me and leave me less able to provide for my children's future

I very much empathize with what you're saying. I get it. I position myself intentionally in the best position to avoid divorce rape as well. But I do that by ensuring I'm doing everything I can to further my wife in her career. Let me assure you: as a divorce attorney, I can say definitively that this is the best way to proof yourself from divorce rape. Marry someone with an equal or higher income-earning capacity and you'll be divorce-proof. Now, as /u/OsmiumZulu just posted elsewhere, you're going to have a harder time keeping your wife loyal if she's not only good looking, but a high-earner as well. She'll know her value to men is extremely high at that point, so your value will have to be even higher to keep her - and if you can't keep up in the finances make sure you're ahead in other areas. But remember: the finances are where divorce rape happens most of the time, so if you get a girl who's on-par or better in finances, you're going to have much lower risk.

What I don't like reading is the "I'm doing this to provide for the kids" line. When you're paying alimony, you're giving your ex the ability to provide for the kids as well. You can't pretend it's all on you. If you're in it because you want to tell your kids, "I buy everything for you and your mom does nothing," that's kind of self-defeating if the reason she can't do anything is because you've done everything in your power to prevent her from having the financial resources to help the kids directly.

Child rearing costs would be documented and split 50/50

Equal split only makes sense if you both have equal incomes. Every now and then I see people try to pull this 50/50 split off with differing incomes and it never works. The higher-earner usually ends up spending far more lavishly than the other because they don't have any care or concern for the budget of the other person, then the lesser earner can't afford to keep up, gets behind, gets stuck in contempt of court, and is ultimately taken advantage of. % income split makes more sense. If you make $80k/yr and she makes $20k/yr, then you pay 80% of child-related expenses and she pays 20%. In the end, even this is relatively unfair to the lesser earner because if there are $10,000 in expenses for the child in a given year, then the lesser earner only has $18,000 to live off of, whereas the other still has $72,000 to live off of. So, the lesser earner is eating into their essential budget to pay for the kids whereas the higher earner is only spending from their flexible budget to make it work. Couple that with the fact that the higher-earner is probably buying Abercrombie clothes and expecting reimbursement when the lesser-earner can really only afford Walmart clothes, and the distinction starts to become more obvious.

protecting myself from the insane current laws

Which laws, specifically, do you believe are insane? I have yet to get any single red pill guy to be able to answer this for me. They always end up giving fact patterns and saying, "It happened to a friend of mine," but none of them can point to any statute or case law ... so they end up turning the concept of "insane divorce rape laws" into some boogeyman that everyone is scared of, even though no one really understands what it is or what it looks like.

The only true incidents of divorce rape involve custody issues where women lie in court - and that's not a law issue, it's a lawyering issue.

My dream would be that divorce does not occur and that I have a healthy, happy, God-honoring marriage that helps raise loving, healthy children.

Being constantly worried about divorce is counter-productive to this goal. It's also counter-productive toward being RP in general.

I am not naive enough to think that I can escape that simply by looking for the "right woman" and vetting hard enough

Very true. But what you can do is commit to living like Christ in your marriage and if you end up suffering persecution vis a vis "divorce rape," then the Bible tells you to consider yourself blessed by virtue of having suffered because of Christ.

I hope you can see my true heart in the midst of this and help direct me to some sort of working possibility of entertaining the idea of marriage without putting my neck on the chopping block.

I do see your heart in this, and I value and appreciate your concerns and the desire to do right by your wife during the marriage. That said, I think you have some misperceptions about "putting your neck on the chopping block" based on misunderstood propaganda from the MRA. I have yet to read an accurate summary on the state of divorce law from any red pill thread, which is why I tend to be the guy who writes those now. Bear in mind, I say this as someone who is a divorce attorney by profession.

Is this a good example of leadership?

6 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

I advised against it ... She did it anyway

How is there even a question on if this is "a good example of leadership"? No. No, this is not a good example of leadership.

if this is a ploy

No. She's lazy. She took the easy way out. She doesn't give a crap about you or your improvements and she doesn't believe you'll keep improving. Be honest, have you plateaued in your physical fitness? Once you're under 13% BF, you're welcome to plateau. Until then, there are no excuses for not making progress each month. Result? She doesn't respect you, so she's going to do whatever she wants. Getting the surgery was a test and you failed, so don't tell me she's not testing you or rarely does so.

I know the redpill advice, want to hear yours.

6 upvotes · 15 September 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

In other words:

- Improve your physique
- Improve your career
- Improve your social network
- Improve your game
- Improve your ability to read people

This is the RP advice he says he didn't want to know. Not to say you're wrong - these things all work and are probably the best solution to his problem. It's just interesting that it's all straight from the RP handbook.

Cheating means you are a "Beta Faggot"

6 upvotes · 25 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I see WISNIFG all over this post.

shamed for not sticking to a commitment that benefits

Compared with: "You have the right to change your mind."

shamed for steadfastly adhering to a commitment that doesn't [benefit you]

Compared with: "You have the right to be illogical in making decisions"

Whatever you cannot say No to is your master and makes you its slave

See the title of the book: WISNIFG

Your wife is a whore and you should divorce her

6 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

To be clear, he's addressing men who whine about being worried about this - not men to whom it is actually happening. His first paragraph also generalizes into an AWALT mindset beyond just the target group. Plus, even within the target group, he's still making the decision for them about how to assess their happiness. I get your point, though.

Just found you! Devouring the links on the right but I need help and I need it soon.

6 upvotes · 22 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

Everything I came here to say. The weight-lifting analogy is great.

/u/awaythrow99912 - If you've got yourself in a rut, and she's not in that rut with you (i.e. she has options), you can't magically prevent her from walking away. Accept the fact that until you're in a position to lead her, she will feel free to do whatever she wants.

Any effort you do to try to control her or lead her before you yourself are someone worth following will not only come off as going Rambo, as /u/justpickanyusername mentioned - it will also train her to develop an amused mastery over you, when you should be having that attitude toward her in time. She will think, "Look how cute he is, trying to tell me how to run my life when he's a train-wreck himself." The alternative is that she just becomes a harpy - either way is bad for you.

FR: Having The Prenup Talk

6 upvotes · 22 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

child support calculators

Cannot be changed. Period. That said, clever attorneys can work their way around this. For example, if the woman is working at $X/yr at the time the prenup is executed, but the parties agree she's going to quit her job to stay at home and raise kids, etc., the parties can agree in the prenup that for any calculation purposes she will be imputed to an income level no less than $X/yr. So, you can't get out of the calculation, but you can agree that the calculation will include favorable numbers for you based on realistic scenarios.

alimony calculators

My state doesn't have a set calculation - it's mostly in a judge's discretion based on a myriad of factors. That said, they tend to default to a % of the after-tax cash available to the parties as a baseline number to work from.

More to the point, you can agree-away your spousal support obligation entirely as long as the agreement is not unconscionable to enforce at the time of the divorce, in which case the provision will be deemed void and a normal support obligation will be put in place.

The way around this is similar to what I mentioned for child support above. That method works, but you can also do the inverse - set $Y/yr as an amount that the parties reasonably anticipate husband may earn and that support calculations shall only apply based off of the excess beyond that number. Because the parties agree that they're contemplating husband's potential income to be that high, no one can argue later that the provision is unconscionable because "I couldn't have known what I was waiving." The only basis for unconscionability at that point is if you have someone who is mentally or physically disabled, which is a circumstance that cannot be foreknown - and even then you can put provisions to account for this.

I'm not sure if that's what you were asking, but I hope that helps. As someone else noted, this all varies from state to state. That said, you can also mutually agree as to which state's laws may apply. So, if you find a state with more favorable divorce laws, you can potentially hire an attorney from that state to draft the pre-nup and both of you could execute it as under that state's laws. Bonus points if you actually get married in that state (destination wedding). I've never actually tried this, but it's a theory I'd love to see litigated. I think you'd have to have at least some base/minimum contact with the state to justify using its laws, but I don't recall actual residency being one of those requirements.

What doesn't work is assuming that without a prenup the divorce court will follow the laws of the state where you were married - or country. I constantly see guys from the middle east trying to divorce their wives in my state and thinking they can just leave her homeless and destitute. They'll argue, "We were married in the middle east, which allows me to do that." The judge says, "I don't care where you got married. You chose to live in Ohio. You chose to file divorce in Ohio. You're following Ohio law for as long as you live in our state."

Tag: /u/crimsonkodiak and /u/VladimirPoontin

How can I work on feeling/becoming more vulnerable?

6 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

growing up I was made to feel ashamed and embarrassed of my emotions, even positive ones.

I definitely feel you on this one!

Vulnerability is the pinnacle of a process that starts with understanding yourself in the first place. [Note that in the following I'm using "you" in the general sense.]

Know Thyself - This may seem basic, but many people are so emotionally repressed that they don't even feel what they should be feeling, or they don't know how to recognize their feelings when they come out. This was me for a while. If you've got baggage, work it out. There are lots of books about this (I'm writing one myself), some therapists can be of help, or even just letting your spouse know that you're emotionally repressed and confused can help.

Feel Thyself - Once you can identify when you're feeling something and what it is, actually let yourself feel it, starting alone if you need to. Practice evoking these things if you can. Sometimes that's uncomfortable, but cry it out in a room by yourself if you have to - or just laugh uncontrollably for no reason. Let it out.

Show Thyself - Begin letting basic emotions show openly in your relationship. Trickle little things in here and there as you feel safe. Don't do a total dump on your spouse because you are suddenly able to. Ease into the process.

Transparency - Once expressing yourself is natural, be completely open. Hide nothing. Be tactful about how you do it, and don't do it "just because." You don't have to be transparent with every emotion, but if it's something important, relay it and explain why you're feeling that way (which you should now be able to do).

Vulnerability - This goes beyond transparency. Transparency is about disclosure. "I'm feeling this way. I feel that because _ happened. It's affecting me in this way: _." Vulnerability goes one more step by inviting the other person to participate: "Will you help me with this by doing _?" or "Do you have any suggestions on how I can address this issue?" or "Can we be a team in working on this together?" It could even just be a request for co-experience: "Can you just hold me for a bit while I process what I'm going through?"

Transparency fosters trust. Vulnerability fosters intimacy.

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

6 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You're making "most judges" statements based on 2 cases where you may actually know the details. Compared to the thousands of judges and millions of cases each year, this is fairly ignorant. You're bitter and jaded. I understand that. But don't extrapolate your experience to everyone else without personal knowledge. All you're doing is giving the feminist agenda more power by choosing to believe in their boogeyman.

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

6 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

On financial matters the judges in my state will always go 50/50 even with allegations of abuse. What I described would hold true even if my wife were out for blood. With allegations of abuse, that only affects patenting issues and there has to be clear evidence for it to happen, although she got me kicked out of the house initially on testimony alone. But that's only a small setback in the grand scheme.

Full time potential rather than current part time work

Yes, this always happens in my state (at least in the 17 counties I've actually practiced in). The only exceptions are nurses and school teachers. Nurses only get imputed to 36 hours (3 12hr shifts) and teachers aren't expected to get summer jobs.

The claim that going full time harms the kids gets made often but I've never seen it actually hold weight with the judge EXCEPT when one of the kids has severe physical or mental health issues requiring 24hr attention.

What do you follow up with when she says ...

As a Christian, if a spouse is intent on leaving, there's nothing wrong in letting them go. The two times I've proposed this the wife flipped out on the guy - ticked beyond measure. But she was also dependent on him (he doesn't need to employ this tactic if she's financially on par with him), so she sticks it out because he won't leave and she has no finances to leave. After a week when she sees he's still trying to make the marriage work, she finally buys in. Both couples are still together today (after 3 and 5 years) and the husband is essentially divorce proof (one calls me back periodically to make sure he's not doing things that will harm the arrangement if she were to file).

The Taming of the Shrew: A Red Pill Analysis (X-Post from TRP)

6 upvotes · 4 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I first read this play during a Shakespeare class led by a feminist. It was interesting, to say the least. Her view was that Kate was actually the dominant one in the relationship. (?!?!?!?!?!?!?!?!?! - the hamster at work).

She pointed to the fact that in a couple scenes Kate is clearly just acting, even though she intellectually knows better. The argument is that society forced her to be in a bad position (she didn't have much choice but to marry this man), so she upped her game with a different manipulative tactic to force her "Pet" to be the kind of man she wanted.

She wanted a powerful man, so she got him to be powerful with her. She wanted money, so she used her submission to win them the bet. In the end, she appears tame, but it's all just an act to get what she wants - and if he starts to slip, ceasing to be what she wants, then she'll destroy him like the shrew she never stopped being - the side of her she merely controlled to her strategic advantage.

My feminist teacher believed that Kate was Petruchio's better in every way and that her tactics were a form of reverse manipulation. In her eyes, the story was one of female power, as Kate could play the game forever and she believed Petruchio would one day wear down, unable to maintain his masculine bravado, which she believed was really all just an act to tame her. In other words, she sees them both as putting on acts to tame the other, but believes that Kate is actually the one who makes out in the end.

That's obviously all a bunch of hogwash. In reality, she was obnoxious for no valid reason. How did Petruchio deal with it? He became even more obnoxious. "Do you see what you're like?" is what his every action screams. "You want to be obnoxious? I can be even more obnoxious - and I can keep it up longer than you can."

That said, I do agree and find it interesting that he never fully broke her spirit. He wanted a submissive wife, not a broken one. He still wanted her fiery passion, and he got it. But instead of that fiery passion being directed against him, it's directed against his frenemies - those whose lives opposed his values, who he loved but to whom he had to prove a point, and be the victor at that.

One of the key points, of course, is that Petruchio, by the end, clearly actually cares for her. In the beginning he's all, "I couldn't care less for her - just give me the money." By the end he's affectionate and you can sense a sparkle in his eyes for her. This is part of what made my feminist professor believe that Kate actually tamed him. In reality, I see it as him getting what he wanted (money) and all that was left for him was to enjoy his newfound bride. That's not to say money is more important than women; rather, his happiness was not in the money itself - it was in her. We'd be fools if RP denied us the right to be pleased with our wives - to find happiness in the marriage. This does not make one tame; it makes one mature. As for her, in many ways she matured too - but her maturity, no doubt, involved being tamed.

Should I start dating now or wait?

6 upvotes · 3 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Let me add brief RP theory to the wonderful common-sense approach everyone else is giving.

RP says that low-value women tend to find low-value men and high-value men will gravitate toward high-value women. Right now you have no value to offer a man, except your looks and physical attention (i.e. hugging, making out, sex, etc.). These things are a dime a dozen, so on their own they aren't high value, and they alone will not get a guy to commit. As much as you may want to use it for that purpose, there's always going to be another girl at least as pretty as you are who he can find who will be more sexual with him.

If you start dating around now, and especially if you begin having sex now, you will become "used goods" and your value will go down because you will have relational and sexual baggage that you're bringing to the man you will eventually marry. As your value goes down, the quality of man you can get will also go down. As a result, you are less likely to pull the kind of guy you want to be with into marrying you and you'll have to "settle." Don't go down that path.

On the other hand, if you focus on advancing your education, gaining meaningful life experiences (stories you can tell later), developing an attractive body and healthy eating habits, researching things you'll find in this and other subs about how to be a great partner to a future spouse, etc. - those things will add value to you. You'll be able to pull higher quality men. So, when you're 18, 20, 25 ... whatever ... when you're ready to get married, you'll have more options open to you and will feel far more confident in being able to find the kind of guy you will ultimately want to be with, and you won't feel pressured to "settle."

In short, avoid things that will lower your value (like having sex or dating around too much) and do things that will increase your value (education, hobbies, life skills, etc.). This is what you should be focusing on. For more insights, type "monk mode" in the search bar on this sub and see what comes up. You should be in "monk mode."

201 - Healthy Sexual Desire v. Lust/Coveting

6 upvotes · 26 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Well, that word "intent" doesn't actually appear in the Greek. The ESV added that to better capture the essence of epithumeo, which is more directly translated as coveting, as evidenced from the Septuagint and other non biblical uses of the word in the culture at the time. So, yes, "intent" enhances the translation, but since I was going to the Greek anyway to show why the English doesn't adequately address what's being said (including in the ESV, despite it being better), which English translation I used seemed moot.

SO is bitchy and disrespectful too often, should I leave?

6 upvotes · 24 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

She will become just like her mom if you end up acting just like her dad. Be different from her dad and you'll get a different result. It's that simple.

Strong, but odd frame - Is the relationship salvageable? Absolutely. But it sounds to me like you don't know how to invite her into your frame. If I take you for your word, I'm guessing you've built a strong frame, but she has a pretty strong frame too. More likely than not, your frame isn't square like most frames, it's got all kinds of jigs and jags. Her frame also has those same jigs and jags, but in reverse, so that way you can both stand in your own frames, close enough to touch, but without forcing either one of you to buckle.

To put it another way, you've developed a strong frame, but the boundaries of your frame aren't shaped the way you want. As a result, the life you're framing inside doesn't have smooth edges; it just looks kinda weird. No picture looks good with a jagged frame, no matter how strong and well-crafted that jagged frame may be. You need it to be shapely and ornate, like it was built by a master craftsman who pays attention to minute detail.

Get a new frame; forget fixing the old one - Here's the thing: it's much easier to break the frame you've got and buy a new one than it is to whittle or smelt the old one into proper shape. Can it be done? Yes. But it's going to take a lot of time and my guess is that if you want an LTR, you don't want to wait as long as it'll take for the whittling/smelting process to finish to find out if she is willing to drop her jagged frame in exchange for your new, better one. In theory, she'd be dumb not to trade up that way, but the hamster can spin the wheel some other direction and it might not work out. You're better off tossing what you've worked on and just implement a new frame now.

Invite her into your frame; don't just fortify it - I read an old post once by /u/jacktenofhearts that chewed out a guy for building a titanium frame that wouldn't buckle under any circumstances, but he forgot to put pillows and blankets inside to make her comfortable once she got in. When you get your new frame, make sure you're staging it like you want someone to live inside.

You can't just approach her one day and say, "This is how it's going to be from now on. You're welcome to do things my way and get a great life as a result; but if not, here's the door." That's a quick way to weed out someone, but you're more often going to lose the baby with the bath water when you do that.

If she's looking for marriage, that's akin to apartment shopping. Doing a walkthrough of a barren, empty apartment isn't very appealing. When the apartment is staged for being live-in ready, people can already visualize what long-term life will be like there. This warm, inviting nature will make her want to move into that place rather than staying at her current apartment until she finds something better.

Also, if the apartment is empty, if she does buy into it she's doing so because of what she envisions the place is like. That means she might rest in your frame, but she's doing it in her vision of what your frame looks like. You're losing a lot of control there, and if you try to take it back you're going to get a lot of resistance and she might ultimately conclude, "I signed up for what I thought resting in your frame would look like. Obviously I misunderstood that. I'm gone."

If it helps give context, I envision the frame itself as being all of your alpha traits. The interior decorating is all your beta traits. You're saying, "I'm the leader. I have boundaries and expectations. If you follow those boundaries and expectations, this is the type of love, affection, and sap you can expect from me. It may not be the sap you want, but it's what this oak produces." Then, let her decide if she wants what you have to offer or not. Once you've got that lovely ornate frame and that oak frame is oozing delicious sap that women want to lap up, you'll probably find better options anyway. In that regard, be happy you're not married yet - you still have an easier time keeping these options open.

[Update] How do I catch her cheating. Looking back what a wast of fucking time !

6 upvotes · 20 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You're probably a good person to answer this. From a Christian perspective, a cheating spouse is a big deal. But from a brute RP "hard core navy red" perspective, why should the husband care?

If she's withholding to save herself for the lover, I get that. But suppose (as is true for many women) that the affair is making her feel sexual again and she hamsters it as: "Now I want sex all the time and it's igniting things with my husband again too! Isn't that a good thing?" So ...

- Her husband's getting it more often
- Her husband gets it better
- She's learning new things to try in the sack
- The new guy doesn't have a proven pattern of comfort-provision and he's just using her as a plate ... she's fine with this, so she's still not likely to leave her husband [take this as an assumption]
- Men spin plates all the time and this is assumed to be okay; so why not her?
- Assume she's being safe and STDs aren't an issue.

Is it just sparing his pride at that point? And if so, does that mean that "kill the ego" only applies to some things, but it's okay to get all butt-hurt when your wife is cheating on you?

I mean, if the husband is finally getting what he wants, why should he care what's happening behind his back to make that happen? After all, isn't that the whole point of Rule 0: Women don't want to see how the sausage is made; they just want the sausage. Does this concept not apply to her too? Why is cheating a definitive line?

These may sound like stupid questions, but I've only ever really considered the matter from a biblical question where there are more "objective" reasons why this should matter. Why should this matter to the non-Christian husband whose wife is finally screwing him better and more often than ever before?

My boyfriend likes that I'm smart

6 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

I'm not sure it's only present in 'dumb' women

You're completely right.

I wonder if your wife has been more feminine, youthful, or 'ditsy' as she has grown to trust your lead.

My wife has never been ditsy, but trusting my lead has certainly made her act and feel younger and more feminine :)

creates latent dread without increasing anxiety to unproductive levels, women generally become happier

This is because of the comparison trap. I have read absolutely nothing about the comparison trap on any RP forum, so I doubt it's a RP endorsed concept, but it's one that I have found to be a relatively infallible truth about every single woman I have ever met in my entire life (i.e. AWALT). That said, I'll try to explain it with RP foundation to it anyway, if that helps.

- Basic hypergamy says that all women prefer to date up (i.e. get the best guy they can). The higher his SMV the better; and she will, if circumstances permit or don't obstruct, swap out guys as soon as one with a higher SMV comes along.

- Preselection is the concept that women's perception of a man's SMV includes a factor for how other women view him. If other women find him desirable, there must be something about him that you don't know yet.
- At first glance, preselection appears to be only for women eyeing a guy they've never seen before - they have to get their impressions from other sources because they haven't yet had the chance to talk to him and find out what he's really like - they just know if other girls like him, there must be something there. That said, this works in marriages too because when a guy starts improving his SMV, if he has been fairly low-value for a while but starts getting attention, the wife might be clued into the fact that there is more to his changes than she has noticed as of yet.
- Now, this preselection concept assumes competition among women. The fact that other women are interested in this guy means he has value, and the woman needs to beat out the other women to get his attention. The comparison trap takes this concept a little bit further and says: Women have an innate drive to outdo other women in the aspects of their lives that matter to them. How good their husband is always matters. Something like how good a woman's job is might not matter at all to a SAHM, so she won't feel the need to compete with a working mom on that front; instead, she will compete with that working mom as to how happy and successful her children are - because that's something that does matter to the SAHM (and probably also the working mom, making it a two-way competition, which increases the emotional investment for the woman in the competition).
- So, when you say, "latent dread ... happier" this is what I see. Dread is essentially the concern that other women want what you have. This is not a negative or bad thing for a wife to experience - it's something she WANTS to experience. When she experiences that dread, it is an internal sign to her that she is winning the comparison game. Other girls want her guy, but she's the one who locked him down. This is why "latent dread" can make a man incredibly sexy to his wife - not because she's scared of losing him, but because he's the trophy she gets to waves around to all the other girls that she is the champion of the comparison game.
- This is readily distinguishable from more overt versions of dread, where the woman is controlled by fear of her man and not pride in her man. Fear causes a woman to try harder and harder to control and manipulate her man, whereas having a healthy (as opposed to arrogant) pride in her man will cause her to submit and become more feminine with him, and will drastically increase her happiness levels. After all, who wouldn't like to be the champion of the most important emotional game women will ever play?

I'm not sure if all that makes sense, but helping my wife win the comparison game is something that has definitely amplified her attraction to me at various times throughout our marriage. Unfortunately, it wasn't until recently (last 6 months or so) that I could actually articulate what was going on to make it an intentional effort.

Don't aim for perfect game, the bar for sex is not that high!

6 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/seduction

Haha, true. That would certainly be much more accurate, but much more confusing to people who haven't taken a statistics course.

Don't aim for perfect game, the bar for sex is not that high!

6 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/seduction

I see what you're saying. To use a slightly different model, though, suppose 80% of people are clueless about fixing cars, 15% of people have a basic level of competency, and 5% of people are very proficient. The 15% are not "average" because of their basic competency. Instead, "average" means being clueless. So, in your model, when you say "60% average" you really mean "60% basic competency" whereas the true "average" (or to use the mathematical term: mean) has a low degree of basic competency at game and someone who is "above the average/mean" could still be in the "basic competency" level ... unless it functions like a switch instead of a sliding scale.

How to bring out the Alpha in a Beta man?

6 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

I totally understand the need to have a comfort threshold. I was just highlighting things that helped me start to step it up at various points. I don't think my wife forgot to pay the bills intentionally. Feel free to drop things off the list that you don't think would work ... add them back if you get desperate.

That said, with your suggested approach I'd be concerned that it would be interpreted as, "She's the boss. She had too much work on her plate. She asked me to help. I will comply like a good beta." He's not actually learning to lead in that scenario ... He's just getting better at following your lead.

Help

6 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I didn't even need to get to the third paragraph to start seeing BPD here. And yes, BPD usually develops from people who have been abused as a child. It is a coping mechanism whereby they create a detachment from reality to deal with their pain and trauma. They have an almost literal out of body experience whereby many of their outbursts feel to them like they're a third person in the room watching something exciting on TV with a bucket of popcorn - because that's how they dealt with the abuse of the trauma when they were younger.

I deal with borderlines on a weekly basis. When negotiating with borderlines in my profession, I have found that the most effective tool is fogging. Here's how my typical communication pattern goes, which works with anyone, but especially borderlines:

- I see your point. I agree with you when you say ____.
- Here's something I can do to address that problem.
- If I work on addressing that problem, would you agree to work on this problem too: ____?

There is ALWAYS some truth in what they're saying, no matter how irrational and deluded they are. Borderlines escalate problems when they feel like they're not being understood. It's the same reason kids yell and scream all the time: If I don't get what I want, maybe saying it louder will get through to them.

Maintaining frame is also huge. Borderlines (especially ones with histrionic features) thrive on high-intensity emotions. The more emotional you get, the more emotional she gets. That emotion is a drug to her, so she'll do anything to get a reaction out of you, and it is totally unsatisfying when you keep your cool. When I'm in conference rooms at court and borderlines are screaming in my face and literally bouncing all over the room because they don't like my proposal, I just keep smiling. When they're done: "I see your point. I agree when you say _____. Here's something I can do to address that problem. If I have my client do that, would you agree to work on this problem: _____?"

If you're not interested in negotiating anything back for yourself (i.e. you just want to calm her down), here's a trick that works with my non-borderline wife. I would hope it works with a borderline too.

- She's raging mad, yelling at you, crashing dishes against the wall, etc.
- Ignore her words; just go hug her until she calms down (usually about 15 seconds); put her head side-by-side with yours so she can't see your face
 - If she tries to talk, let her, but don't respond.

- If she tries to pull away, hold her tight. Her efforts to pull away are a test of your frame.
- Lean your head back, look her in the eye, brush her hair away from her cheek and put your palm gently on her cheek.
 - Don't let go of the hug with the other hand or you may lose control and she'll pull away.
- With your hand on her head, pull her head toward you and kiss her cheek where your palm was.
- Lean back again, look her in the eyes and say, "I love you and appreciate that you are intensely passionate over this issue. In this moment, you are over-reacting and I would like to continue talking when we can have productive discussion."
- Give her a kiss on the forehead and walk away.
 - if she lets you go, the next time you see her in a calmer environment you HAVE TO re-raise the issue; this time it will be on your terms. Have an action-plan ready to go for how to solve the conflict, showing simultaneously that: (1) you care about her concerns; (2) you understand her perspective without validating the thought itself or how she handled the situation [don't underestimate the importance of this in any argument]; (3) you will take charge of the situation so she doesn't have to be the one to worry about it anymore; and (4) her over-reaction was not going to solve the problem. This is a perfect quadfecta (and if I really took the time to think about it, I could probably come up with 2-3 more benefits), but I feel like 99% of men miss the opportunity by forgetting to re-raise the issue on their own terms.
 - if she follows you, still yelling and screaming: repeat all of the above until she doesn't know what to do. If that doesn't work or ...
 - if she doesn't let you leave in the first place ("No! I'm not over-reacting. This is seriously an important issue. How can you not see that?!?" Proceeds to block the door.) ... fog. "I agree that this issue is important. You're right, we should be spending more attention on this issue. I actually have an idea for how we can address the issue," and then pull an action plan out of your butt, even if it's a crappy one. If she doesn't like it, let her make some adjustments. The point isn't to come up with the perfect solution; it's to show her how idiotic her over-reaction was when you could come up with a solution to the problem literally on the spot and you can all tweak the solution from there. This has the same benefits as the first option ("if she lets you go ...") except #1, as it usually comes off as you brushing the issue aside quickly, which is outweighed by the other benefits.

Now, if your wife really does have BPD, she may never get to the point of actually talking about it, even in that last step, or even after several iterations of this hug-kiss-calm-kiss method. Why? Because she isn't looking for answers, she's looking to feel something - anything. For BPDs, negative emotions are better than no emotions. As a result, they stay enraged even when there's no reason to do so. At this point, the better option is to engage in a little emotional redirection.

- Start with my HKCK method (suppose it's a 3rd or so iteration of it in a single fight)
- When you get to the part of kissing her on the cheek, go for her lips instead.
- Repeat the "calm" part
- Instead of a kiss on the forehead, go back for her lips
- Push her against a wall (with your embracing hand still behind her, now between the wall and her back)
- Restrain her against the wall and stare her in the eyes
- Kiss periodically and see how she responds

- Escalate to sex as appropriate

I've never tested this second part, but from what I know about how borderlines think, it seems like it would actually work. You probably won't have any actual physical desire for her in the midst of her craziness, so you're probably not going to want to do any of this. That's the exact problem though: you're not an adequate passion-sparring-partner for her. She wants someone whose emotions ramp up like hers, who can be crazy and feed into all of her turbulence. So, if you have no other way of calming her down, redirect that negative passion and aggression into something positive that she will enjoy. Although it makes no logical sense to me whatsoever, and I've never been a fan of it, borderlines love angry, passionate, rough sex. I'm not saying this is your wife, or maybe she's the exception among BPD women, but if she follows the norm, redirecting her explosive outburst into angry, rough sex is the answer. The dopamine rush afterward will calm her right down and she'll forget what was getting her so upset, often times even realizing that she had no real reason to be upset in the first place.

Now, you know I couldn't leave this one unaddressed. When you use the Bible/God as a manipulative tool it comes off like a kid screaming, "I'm going to tell Dad!" My son does this all the time when his sisters aren't doing what he wants: "I'm going to tell Dad! You'd better start helping me clean the living room!" That totally undermines the respect and authority you've been developing. Yes, God is a higher authority. But God delegated that authority to you in Ephesians 5 and (more notably) 1 Cor. 11:3, "the head of every man is Christ, and the head of the woman is man."

If you've ever had a management-type position, you'll know what it's like when you delegate authority to someone, but they keep running back to you saying, "They're not listening to me!" Your response is usually, "I gave you the authority to deal with it because I know you can handle it. Now go handle it." If you're acting like that employee to God, using his authority rather than the authority he gave you, that's not respecting the management style he established. If your wife sees that you're not respecting God's management, why should she respect yours or your interpretation of God's Word in the first place?

If she really is ignorant of what the Bible says about respect and submission, an argument is not the time to bring that up. You should read 1 Cor. 11 or Ephesians 5 together as part of a joint devotional or couples Bible study.

Not going to go into it here ... but do you disciple your wife? Do you have a firm grasp on Jesus' established pattern for disciple-making? If so, are you implementing it inside and outside your marriage?

I've found that 99% of problems Christians face are resolved by developing a lifestyle of disciple-making, rather than merely the advice received or given through discipleship or application thereon.

Frustrated with LTR's lack of non-sexual investment

6 upvotes · 6 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

I had one impression from the very first sentence and every sentence after that affirmed it: You need to read NMMNG.

You may have already read it. Great. Read it again. You're living your life EXACTLY with Nice Guy Syndrome. The core frustration of Nice Guys (per the book) is that they feel like they give more than they get. His premise is that Nice Guys live on this one core principle:

- IF I hide my flaws and present myself in a way that I think you will like,
- THEN you will love me and meet my needs.

You're living with this core covert contract, which is parallel to the Nice Guy Syndrome:

- IF I become RP
- THEN she will be attracted to me and put forth more effort

OI OI OI OI OI OI OI OI OI OI OI OI

She can smell it on you. Women aren't idiots. They know when you're giving to get. She sees you putting forth a little effort and thinks, "Okay, I guess I'll have to put in a little effort too."

When you live on this anticipated exchange, you're functioning as co-equals. You both have an equal responsibility to step up your game to attract one another. This is not sustainable because it does not come out of abundance. It comes out of emptiness. You're empty because you're not getting from her what you need. She's empty because she's not getting tingles from you (fuzzies are more of a placation; they neither fill nor drain her, but they do drain you to give them).

You need to develop an internal motivation for becoming who you want to be - something that happens whether or not she's giving you the sex you want or massages or anything. If she feels like you're just pandering to her, you're giving her power to judge your improvement and establish how she should respond - and she knows this. If you start living your life independent of her, but inviting her to join alongside, unaffected by her response, she will be attracted.

It may not all apply, but a lot of this is addressed in great detail in what I just posted on r/MarriedRedPill, titled "The Biological Step-Mother."

Difference between the two?

6 upvotes · 2 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'm only in a few days further than you, but my understanding is this:

- TRP = bang all the girls (by being the best you), settle down only when it suits your desires, and even then keep your options open and leave her when you're bored
- MRP = be the best you, this is how to get your LTR/wife attracted to you again; if she still rejects you, let her go or keep raising your SMV (even if you don't intend to use it outside the marriage) and hope for the best, but be super OI because you can't change her, only yourself

Wife threatened to take the kids from me over a non issue. Need advice

6 upvotes · 26 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

My wife tried to make that threat against me once. It was one of the few times when my alpha-side really got to shine in its natural spotlight: I'm a divorce attorney. Ain't no way was that gonna fly.

I really can't explain it (though I'll try), but when your wife is fuming mad at you over something like that, no matter how internally wrecked you are (and from what I gather, if you've been taking TRP for any length of time, you shouldn't be; but let's say you are wrecked) ... just go over and:

- hug her for about 15 seconds, counting it out if you have to; remain silent during this time, even if she tries to talk (let her, but don't respond)
- lean your head back and brush her hair away from her cheek and put your hand on her cheek briefly
- lean in and kiss her cheek
- say, "I love you and appreciate that you are intensely passionate over this issue; but in this particular moment you are over-reacting and I'm not going to let it get to me."

- peck her on the forehead
- walk away with a smile
 - if she lets you go, the next time you see her in a calmer environment you HAVE TO re-raise the issue; this time it will be on your terms. Have an action-plan ready to go for how to solve the conflict, showing simultaneously that: (1) you care about her concerns; (2) you understand her perspective without validating the thought itself or how she handled the situation [don't underestimate the importance of this in any argument]; (3) you will take charge of the situation so she doesn't have to be the one to worry about it anymore; and (4) her over-reaction was not going to solve the problem. This is a perfect quadfecta (and if I really took the time to think about it, I could probably come up with 2-3 more benefits), but I feel like 99% of men miss the opportunity by forgetting to re-raise the issue on their own terms.
 - if she follows you, still yelling and screaming: repeat all of the above until she doesn't know what to do. If that doesn't work or ...
 - if she doesn't let you leave in the first place ("No! I'm not over-reacting. This is seriously an important issue. How can you not see that?!?" Proceeds to block the door.) ... fog. "I agree that this issue is important. You're right, we should be spending more attention on this issue. I actually have an idea for how we can address the issue," and then pull an action plan out of your butt, even if it's a crappy one. If she doesn't like it, let her make some adjustments. The point isn't to come up with the perfect solution; it's to show her how idiotic her over-reaction was when you could come up with a solution to the problem literally on the spot and you can all tweak the solution from there. This has the same benefits as the first option ("if she lets you go ...") except #1, as it usually comes off as you brushing the issue aside quickly, which is outweighed by the other benefits.

It's also worth noting that with this path you'll never get the "he's just trying to fix everything!" argument. If she calms down after the soft affection, you're not fixing anything ... you're being exactly what she wants to see in a man: simultaneously affectionate and dominant. Then, the re-raise of the issue blows her away. If she forces you to deal with it on the spot, as long as you're convincing enough on the "I agree that this issue is important. You're right, we should be spending more attention on this issue" part, the burden shifts to her to prove that you're not meeting the exact need of the moment that she's demanding you address - but you're subtly shifting dominance in the conversation away from her and onto you by throwing her off balance. Because, most women are emotionally-driven, they will pretty much never adapt to this tactic. It will continue to throw them off-balance every single time because when they're in the heat of anger like that, they usually lack the ability to think logically enough to remember how they told themselves they would react the next time you tried to pull this on her. More to the point, most women simply like this tactic enough that they wouldn't want to defray you from exercising it in the first place.

I've done this with my wife over a dozen times in the 9 years we've been married (4 years since I developed this tactic) and I've never seen better results in any other approach. Although my wife is generally frigid (for reasons I have only started to look into, leading to my recent discovery of this sub and its companions), I can only think of one time after doing this where she hasn't tried to initiate sex with me that night or the next day. Beta me rejected her at those times and we haven't had a fight like this in almost a year, so I haven't had the chance to respond differently with another attempt :p That's probably one of those things I'll have to change if it comes up again.

I should also note that I didn't develop this approach as a result of any TRP/MRP thinking, as I didn't know this sub at the time (only discovered it today), so it may not entirely jive with the philosophy here, as I had other huge sources of influence at the time (and still do). So, take it for what it's worth.

Tag: /u/BluepillProfessor (random mod, since I'm new to this whole TRP/MRP thing and wouldn't mind feedback on my approach)

The Courage to Be Disliked

5 upvotes · 1 May 2024 · /r/RPChristians

Glad you find it helpful. This book is basically all about figuring out how to live in your own frame, but assuming you've already been fully indoctrinated by the world's way of thinking and trying to undo all of that. The first 1/2 is mostly tearing down wrong ways of thinking and the rest is about how to rebuild it correctly. That's the overarching framework.

To what extent is a wife allowed to withhold sex and affection if she doesn't feel supported emotionally?

5 upvotes · 10 September 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Our mod /u/RedPillWonder already wrote an entire post on this subject, so I'm going to defer to him for most of my thoughts on the main angle of this:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/hd1v5a/worthy_of_love_earned_respect_and_other_biblical/

In short: "God's commands are not conditional." That sums up the main point. God didn't say, "Thou shalt not murder ... unless you have a good reason, then it's okay." God didn't say, "Do not steal ... unless your neighbor is a bad person, then he's got it coming." God didn't say, "Do not deprive one another ... unless they're being mean to you, then it's okay."

But to address the side-angle of your post, I agree with Deep here too. The Bible is fairly clear and (as RPW notes) "God's commands are not conditional" ... but in modern society, it's rare to find people who are willing to hold women accountable for sinful behavior unless it's a "major" sin issue. Even if they have a technically true/accurate theology on the matter, most congregation leaders will make any number of excuses to avoid rebuking women. Examples include:

- That's really her husband's job, not mine as her pastor/elder/friend/small group leader/etc.
- She's not my wife, so I shouldn't be alone with her and I can't rebuke her in public because she's not a leader.
- They haven't escalated to me in the Matthew 18 process and until they do I'd rather stay uninvolved.
- The sin wasn't bad enough to warrant my involvement.
- That's really a family issue and not a spiritual one. Even though it involved sin, the family dynamic is what really needs addressed, not the spiritual one.
- Counseling would be more helpful than a rebuke, so we'll skip the rebuke and just hope she finds help. Maybe I'll encourage counseling and stay out.

The list goes on. But perhaps the most degrading is in a previous congregation I attended a woman was caught cheating on her husband. Multiple times. With several different men. This went on for years. The leadership knew about it, but allowed the woman to remain involved as a volunteer in multiple ministries and lead a small group, and instead said it was the husband's fault that she cheated because he didn't show her enough affection. So, the ultimate "slap in the face" excuse I've heard is: "I don't need to rebuke the wife when she sins because I'm sure it's really her husband's fault and he should get the rebuke instead of her." The reality is, biblically, EVEN IF they're both in sin they should both be confronted about it.

Of course, it's worth noting that "rebuke" doesn't always mean a harsh word. It can (Titus 1:13, "Rebuke them sharply, that they may be sound in the faith" as one example), but the preferred starting path is: "If anyone [including women] is caught in any trespass [not just serious ones], you who are spiritual, restore such a one in a spirit of GENTLENESS," or 2 Timothy 4:2, "reprove, rebuke, exhort, WITH GREAT PATIENCE and instruction."

The problem is when people start with this gentle approach and it doesn't work and then they say, "Welp, I already did the rebuke thing, so my job is done," without ever escalating to a sharp rebuke for those who are unrepentant and continuing in their sin.

Another complication is that many people will be "repentant" verbally and correct themselves long enough to make it seem like the problem is solved on the surface, but very quickly go back to what they were doing before. This, then, "excuses" (at least in their mind) the leader from escalating to a "sharp rebuke" because the person is viewed as "repentant - trying, but failing" instead of being willfully defiant. This is exacerbated by the fact that when someone is confronted about their sin by an authority, extremely few people will be defiant about it - virtually everyone will play along, even if the lesson never truly sinks in (i.e. no internalization of the repentance), and even if they themselves believe their own repentance, despite it not sinking in. So, the response to the confrontation usually seems genuine (in the absence of a personality disorder), and without the ability to discern whether it's internalized or not, the "spiritual leader" who is engaged in the confrontation will usually give the benefit of the doubt and presume internalization, which is NOT the same thing as good-faith intention.

One more thought ...

Failing to provide for someone materially is more serious than failing to provide for them sexually (at least in the short term), but I still think its a relevant point: the husband and wife often bring different provisions to the table

The husband does have a biblical expectation to provide, but the obligation for sex is mutual. It's expected, biblically, that the wife should also desire her husband enough that Paul had to command husband not to deprive her the same way he commanded her not to deprive him.

While this may seem trite, I've known several people who were jaded by their wife's denial and when she did finally initiate sex, HE would then deny HER as a "stick it to you" and "I don't want your pity-sex" type response.

Psychologically, this is counter-intuitive on a number of levels, but most obviously that you should want to encourage your wife to initiate, not discourage it. This type of reaction conditions her to associate her initiation with the husband's rejection, which is a frustrating experience that she will be less likely to repeat. More significantly: on a biblical level, this is also the husband rejecting her inappropriately. It's not a one-sided responsibility, and trying to play stubborn mind-games with your spouse only digs you into a deeper pit, both psychologically and biblically.

Does it make sense to marry as a man with high earning potential?

5 upvotes · 14 May 2022 · /r/RPChristians

I'll echo this and add reference to all the 1 Cor. 7 stuff that always comes up with this question.

Stop Pointing the Finger

5 upvotes · 28 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Well-said.

Abstinence till marriage (Advice/Discussion)

5 upvotes · 25 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Often whatever your focused on is going to be wrong anyways because that's why you are in the situation you are in. If you were focused on fixing the correct things you wouldn't be here asking for advice in the first place.

This line is gold. You could write a post on that.

What's the end-goal?

5 upvotes · 4 November 2021 · /r/RPChristians

"Put serious money into a Church, and you'll care about it a whole lot more."

I've heard this type of argument a lot before too and there are some good points to be made from it. I think it makes a lot more sense when we personalize it, the same way the other expenses listed are personalized. It's YOUR beachside house. It's YOUR Landcruiser. It's YOUR crypto. But it is NOT your "church" (unless you are actually the pastor).

In this, investing money in someone else's venture doesn't achieve the same result. Many people support local congregations for the very purpose of not wanting to be invested in any other way, as if financial contribution eases their conscience and gives an excuse not to get personally involved in ministry. In my experience, I've seen countless major donors and even people who are poor but giving large %ages of their income to their local congregation who are otherwise very nominal in their involvement. I used to be the treasurer for a congregation and noticed exactly this.

So, my recommendation would be to invest your finances in YOUR ministry, not someone else's. This is what will make you more personally invested. /u/paexology put down some cash to set up his place to host disciplehaus. That's his personal ministry. I've done likewise, accelerating my construction plans with my basement a few years in order to host men also. This is personal to us. I remember one congregation preaching:

- We're actually doing fine on funding. Please don't tithe to us anymore. Instead, I want you to take half of what you're giving to us and start spending it on your own personal ministry instead. Use the money to host a cookout in your neighborhood. Buy pizza for your co-workers so you can build relationships and share the Gospel with them. Purchase Bibles for those you know who don't have them. Get creative. But above all, be personal with your tithe.

This was a powerful word that I continue to apply at various times in my life to this day. While I may have a day-job, I'm also a missionary just like Paul as a tentmaker. I find it hard to imagine he wasn't using his own money to fund his own ministry. I also find it unlikely that while receiving tons of support, he was turning around and sending his wages to one of the other apostles only to ask for support from other people still. Too many congregations play that money-shuffle game, giving support away then claiming they don't have enough support.

What are we investing in ... Are they conformed to the mission or are they in themselves useless pursuits ...?

Along those lines, my suggestion is that the money should be put into the work of the Church, not primarily to an institution that calls itself "a church" (lower case). Sometimes these overlap, other times they don't. Personally, about 10-20% of my giving goes to my local congregation, about 60-80% goes to fund actual discipler-makers on staff with various ministries, and maybe 10-20% supports my own personal efforts.

Sometimes I resent my pregnant wife because of her past

5 upvotes · 15 September 2021 · /r/RPChristians

They've got you on the wrong track here. You had the right idea initially - no need to bring this up. You have to make peace with it yourself first before you go blabbing your mouth to her. Otherwise, your emotions are bound to get the better of you and things will almost certainly get worse - either because you'll look weak or because you'll look butthurt or it'll affect your frame in some way, or any other number of possible issues.

Don't do marriage counseling. There's a reason that modern marriage counseling strategies haven't done anything to halt the rapid acceleration in divorce rates over the last several decades.

Sometimes I resent my pregnant wife because of her past

5 upvotes · 15 September 2021 · /r/RPChristians

This.

And I don't mean that dismissively of OP. I mean that fixing the mission will likely solve his problem. We get emotionally invested in the things that matter most to us. Right now, sex is what matters most to OP. How do I know? Because his mission sucks and he's here complaining about sex instead.

If he had something actually worthwhile to be thinking about, he wouldn't care as much about whose dick went where.

To be fair, I can appreciate the frustration. I get it. Imagining some other dude up in my wife isn't a pretty thought. But let's get our priorities straight. Before we start whining about something we can't change, let's fix the things we can. Then we can circle back once we've got our heads screwed on straight.

Why Lifting is Not a Suggestion

5 upvotes · 19 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Right. I wouldn't even care except that people complain when life sucks, but can't handle it when they're told to do basic things that will usually make the largest impact. Everyone wants a magic button to let them maximize all their life goals while still being able to maintain all their vices (in this case: laziness or gluttony). Heck, I want that magic button too! But if it exists, the red pill doesn't have it. Until it's found, what we advise here is still the most efficient way to accomplish the goals most men come here to achieve - whether that's figuring how to attract a girl or impacting the world through expanding God's Kingdom.

Backwards sexual dynamic?

5 upvotes · 16 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Just a thought here: Is it possible that what you're experiencing with your husband is the same thing that Christ experiences with you? You've got a strong desire for physically reproductive acts. Are you engaging in spiritually reproduction with Christ?

I'm about to write a post to flesh out in greater detail why God doesn't solve the problems of well-intentioned people. Keep an eye out.

Sectarian issues finding relationships?

5 upvotes · 25 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

You're making no sense.

Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers

OP was asking about dating from other denominations of believers, not unbelievers.

Getting your wife back after a separation

5 upvotes · 12 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

you probably can't understand that a different strategy is needed in comparison to not being separated

It's still going past your head. Strategy for what? If I'm separated from my wife my strategy at winning a game of Risk with my friends will not change.

The problem here is that you're supposed to be playing the "Go therefore and make disciples" game, but instead you're playing the "gotta get back with my wife" game. You're in the wrong game in the first place, and that's the problem I was trying to point out.

and without me making a bunch of blue pill concessions in our marriage

But you did make a bunch of blue pill concessions.

If I've deceived her and manipulated her, how is she winning?

She thinks you're a loser who won't deliver. She asks for 10 things knowing you won't follow through, but if she can get 5 or 6 of them, that's a win. Common negotiation tactic. What did you get in return other than the fact that she now graces you with her divine presence once more? What is SHE doing to compensate you for her sin of leaving you in the first place? Oh, nothing? She's back to living her exact same lifestyle and you just conceded to doing more things her way ... and you don't see how that's a win for her? Yeah, you thought you were tricking her ("I'll tell her I'll do 10 things to get her back, but only actually do 5 or 6 of them! hehehe, look how sneaky I am"), but she's playing you the whole time.

If you're suggesting that I need to shoot down everything my wife asks for even if it's reasonable just to assert how alpha I am, that's some terrible advice.

I have a post for people who interpret advice like you do.

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/ixhw7y/dont_be_autistic/

I wanted her back because it was what I wanted

All I'm reading in all of this is codependency. You've elevated her role in your life so heavily that you will compromise everything. That is an unhealthy dynamic that will ruin you in the long-term unless you can start figuring this out now.

I needed to humble myself and take a good look at what went wrong

And that is the one place you went right.

I haven't compromised my mission to be with my wife.

From what I can tell, you didn't even have a mission at all until 5 days ago, if that was your "first shot" at creating one. 13 days ago: "I don't have much of a mission right now." You've been an aimless, missionless wanderer.

How can you have the integrity to say "I haven't compromised my mission to be with my wife" when you didn't even have a mission through all of this? I know /u/rocknrollchuck has been following your OYS for longer - so maybe I'll ask him for input if I'm wrong on this?

So let's hop into your newfound "mission":

My vision is to become an ideal red pill christian man who draws others to Christ, who inspires people to become the best version of themselves, and who loves Christ fully.

My Mission is to become a man who brings glory to God in my marriage, family, career, and relationships by pursuing wisdom, leadership, and love of others. I will accomplish that by sharing the Gospel, as well as by developing my skills in communication, teaching, and fitness, learning about Christ, and developing my sense of humor, love for learning, and concern for the well-being of others.

This was my first shot. Any feedback?

This is vague. When the military gives a troop a mission does the general sit the commander down and say, "Your mission is to kill some bad guys. Now go do it!" No. That's the framework for the mission. The framework for our lives is that there's a spiritual war going on over souls. The enemy wants to keep them from us, it's our job to win then. That's the framework.

YOUR mission is how you're going to win them. The general may tell the commander: "I want your troop to blow up that communications array." When they do so: mission accomplished. What will be the "mission accomplished" in your mission/vision? I've shared mine before: 60 discipler-making ministries in 60 countries by the time I'm 60. That's my long-term waypoint. And after that I'm sure I'll pursue an updated mission. But for now, you need something tangible to wrap your head around because this vague garbage isn't going to give you any real vision for how you're going to accomplish your mission. You're going to keep spinning your wheels day-in and day-out sucking up to your wife thinking that you're accomplishing your mission because rubbing your nose in her butt hole somehow means "glorifying God in my marriage" to you.

I think this is a great discussion that really gets to the core of what red pill is about. Is red pill a road that you follow even if it's heading off the edge of a cliff? Or is red pill a forest with lots of different paths leading to the same destination?

The red pill is the truth of intergender sexual dynamics. As Rollo would say: it's descriptive, not prescriptive. But there are certain things that belief compels you toward. You can't legitimately believe and internalize the Gospel and not be compelled to do something about it - otherwise James 2 wouldn't make sense. You can't believe the red pill and still pursue a "happy wife, happy life" routine.

Your post is spoken from the framework of someone with a very, very blue understanding of the world. You lack comprehension of intergender sexual dynamics. You may be able to articulate certain concepts at times, but you fail to understand them, or they have failed to be ingrained into your understanding of your relationship with your wife. As such, this entire post is blue pill to its core.

In the same vein, I could write a post about how men can get their wives to have sex with them by begging, pleading, and guilt-shaming them into it with bible-thumping verse-quoting pressure. And that post would probably get the intended result for lots of people: she'd end up having sex with him. But she'd also despise him for it. She would lose respect and attraction for him. Their marriage would be worse.

This is what your post does for men here. It creates a framework where the man becomes substantially less attractive to his wife and greatly undermines his long-term goals, if he wants a healthy sex life and respectful helper in his mission. The only reason it's redeemable is because, in rare circumstances, you do have to take that hit if you want to have the chance to redeem yourself with the same woman later.

RP Christians and the Black Pill

5 upvotes · 19 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

The black pill is no better than liberal trash because it pretends that men and women are exactly the same. Men almost exclusively assess a woman's sex appeal by looks, and it mistakenly assumes women are identical to men by also almost exclusively assessing male sex appeal by looks. Men and women are not the same. The sooner you learn that the sooner you can overcome not only idiotic liberal notions, but idiotic black pill notions also.

Even if I find a beautiful Christian woman, would she not be satisfied sexually? Will she always have the nagging feeling that she could do better?

You sound like you're still single, so you're worrying over idiotic hypotheticals rather than getting down to business. Here's a hypothetical for you: If she's hot and I was still single, she probably COULD do better. But hypotheticals aren't real and I've got a good gig going with my wife, so you actually have a chance.

Back to your point: my wife once commented to me that she wasn't physically attracted to me. Ever. Not even when we were dating and I was in my life's peak physical condition. Yet we have a fantastic sex life. She has commented that she knows she couldn't do better. Why? Because I generate tingles through dominance, desire, kino, etc. You've gotta have game. I believe /u/Deep_Strength has commented before that he's not "classically handsome," yet crushes it in the bedroom. Look at Owen Cook, who's generally short, balding, and (I believe) literally on the autism spectrum, yet is still able to date playmates. The black pill can't account for that.

What is the RP Christian response to the black pill?

Simple: Looks are the difficulty level you're playing on. That's all. If you have generally unfavorable genetic traits, but are otherwise physically fit and dress well, your difficulty level is moderate-to-high. If you look like a male model, your difficulty is low. But both can get the exact same results. One just has to try harder than the other. You can still get tingles flowing just the same as any other guy.

I love the line in the politician where Gwyneth Paltrow's character says: "Yes, it's true that I've been having an affair with Tino McCutcheon. Yes, it's also true that I'm spectacular in bed. I work unusually hard for a woman as attractive as I am." Or that tinder meme with a hot girl on one side with the caption "starfish" and the HB6 on the other with the caption "rides like a porn star." The same concepts are true for men. There's a general understanding that when post-optimization physical quality levels are lower, you're going to have to work harder. The black pill is the idiotic notion that you should just give up because it's impossible - and that only comes from idiots who aren't willing to put in the work.

Do pay close attention to "post-optimization" in there, though. You can't be a literal 300lb slob gamer and think you're going to have enough "game" to overcome those deficits. But even the phantom won Christine over with his wretched face in Love Never Dies (yeah - fiction, but I couldn't pass up a musical reference).

Don't Be Autistic

5 upvotes · 22 September 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

ONEitis -> rejection -> monk mode -> ONEitis

I like the way you put this. I definitely see how the mental masturbators can easily fall into this cycle, while telling themselves they're red pill because that ONEitis "isn't really ONEitis, I've just found a really great girl who is actually worth my time more than all the others."

putting in the work

A good friend has taught me a lot about handyman work around the house. I've been putting it to good use lately. Built a gigantic playground for my kids. Just cut up my deck and added a new set of stairs over the weekend. Cut down a tree this weekend too. I've now built a tile shower from scratch, done dry walling, built a stuffed animal cage for my girls, plumbing, flooring, and more. I've figured out a lot over the last couple years, and am about to work on remodeling my basement (bathroom, bedroom, home gym, theater room - though I do plan on hiring help for some of this).

In all of this, my buddy has a saying: "You've always been handy. You were just too scared to start doing it."

The word "scared" always threw me off until I realized he was right. I was scared (1) of trying and failing, which really wasn't as big a deal as I thought, but more significantly: (2) that once I started doing it, I'd realize my own competency and have no excuses for not doing it later.

I think a lot of guys are in this second camp. They realize that once they begin and see how capable they are of living in light of their innate masculinity, they will never be able to go back to their blue pill laziness without a shame looming over them for failing to live up to who they know they are capable of being. It's easier just to stay lazy and pretend you aren't capable of any better - especially when you have a society that labels efforts to "man up" as "toxic" and immoral, meanwhile encouraging you to be lazy, then punishing you for it when you adhere to those expectations.

Looking for Wisdom from Men

5 upvotes · 17 September 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Mission: Composer and Music Teacher. I need a woman to help me fulfill a beautiful life, raise children, have a home.

Try again ;) I recognize that you're new here, so lots of grace on this. As you go through the RPC sidebar, you'll see a lot of content on mission. It might be worth skipping to those posts first, then going back to read the rest, as the direction of your mission is the foundation of everything else.

Spiritual: mature

With the above as your mission, I challenge this statement.

It's just enough distance that it's causing me to weigh the sacrifice. I am 30 and realize I could be seeing all sorts of attractive women. My woman has so much going for her that I have justified the sacrifice.

This is where you complicate things unnecessarily.

If she's worth the sacrifice today, will she be worth the sacrifice in 5 years? 10 years? If no, let her go. If yes, get married and move on with your life. Why screw around with this?

But really, this is where your "serial monogamy" conditioning is setting you back. You believe you have to be in an exclusively committed relationship with her in order to get to a point of marriage. Churchianity suggests that people have to go around acting like they're (pre-)married before you can propose. I can see how these faux-pre-marriages can make some logical sense to some people, but it's far from mandated by Scripture (or even referenced at all).

Back to the point: you're trying too hard to predict the future. You can't. One fundamental principle of life is that women change. You have no idea what she'll be like a decade from now, and no amount of vetting can predict this. What you can predict is who you will be and how you're going to get there - and you can reliably know that hypergamy can work the direction of her change in your favor if you are consistently a valuable man who she longs to follow.

should I take more time as a single man or stay committed to someone I really enjoy? I know it comes down to my own choice

Darn right it does. So what's with the "But I want you all to tell me what my choice should be" nonsense?

Personally, under the circumstances you've given, this is not necessarily someone I would be eager to jump into a marriage with - and perhaps that's for my lack of knowledge of the whole situation. But that's partly why we can't really speak into this situation.

What pillars of RPChristianity might I be missing out on?

Mission. Mission. Mission. Get on that one ;)

Do you have any concerns about how it seems like this view errs on the side of control of your wife over her personal growth and freedom?

5 upvotes · 15 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

authorizes you to control her life

/u/Praexology is spot on. It has nothing to do with "controlling" the wife. I was literally just talking about this with u/BornRedy a week or two ago - that you never want to control her. You do you, as we often say. If she doesn't want to follow, you keep doing what God has you doing and if she wants to rebel, that's on her. You always invite her to join you in following Christ. You always seek her redemption and sanctification if she's out of line. But at the end of the day, she's her own person.

Ask any mod or EC, including on MRP, about the best way to deal with a nagging, rebellious wife. Not one will tell you to "control her." Every last one of them will say: Go to the gym. You have better things to do than endure that kind of behavior. Read between the lines here and you get: Don't try to control her, only worry about controlling yourself. If she decides that her rebellion is more important to her than having you in her life, that's her choice to make, not yours to force her to do what you say.

Be the Judge

5 upvotes · 13 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

"Hey, I'm thinking of blank. You have any thoughts?"

OYS - Where Progress is Made (08/12/20)

5 upvotes · 12 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

u/johnmic07 - she hits you like that because she wants to know you're strong enough to take it. Instead of a verbal or emotional fitness test, as are most common, it's a physical one.

I'd suggest spanking is lower risk than general domestic violence, but still not something I'd screw around with without a consent agreement.

I also have a post on actual quotes from abuse victims. That one may be a bit better to help you understand the female psychology on the issue.

How I Communicate Now, Without Words

5 upvotes · 7 July 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Right on. Glad to hear I'm not the only one doing this. Lots of thoughts on this, but it sounds like you've been at it longer. Maybe revive an old post, or write a new one with what you've learned since then? I'd read that in a heartbeat.

Feeling discouraged with many churches' support of the Black Lives Matter movement, including my own.. Are there any truly alt-right/conservative churches left that don't buy into this?

5 upvotes · 1 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right. Better to word this: Don't defend churchianity or the congregational structure; but do defend The Church.

Explaining the Double Standards around Sex

5 upvotes · 14 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I don't think anyone would deny that such a situation is less than ideal, and perhaps even undesirable. But the only alternatives are indefinite celibacy or engaging in the willful, conscious, and ongoing sin of divorce without biblical grounds (or direct cheating), which is extremely dangerous with passages like Hebrews 10:26-31.

You frequently tend to give way too little credit to a woman's ability to find reasons to do things she doesn't want to do. No woman WANTS to change a baby's diapers or do the dishes or fold laundry - at least not with the consistency required. Yet in most cases, she's capable of doing these tasks with a smile on her face anyway.

Yeah, I get that having sex is on a different level, but there are alternative ways to approach the situation. There was a post on r/deadbedrooms once, for example, by a LL who gave a list of reasons for why she still had sex with her husband frequently. Many of them boiled down to the idea that even though she didn't enjoy it, she found ways of finding fun in watching someone else be immensely pleased - and that made her happy to see him happy. Now, if you just hate your spouse altogether, that's a different story. But most people are coming from the viewpoint: "I love my spouse, I'm just not sexually attracted." If that's the case, there are still ways of expressing love through sexuality even without your own arousal and not making it a bitter experience.

In short, this is a bad cop-out, pretending it has to be all-or-nothing.

Actual conversations with "abuse" victims.

5 upvotes · 5 June 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Solid. More to /u/ciscokid12345 - I usually advise my clients to have zero contact with the other party at all unless they've specifically run it through me first. In about 20% of my cases I'm holding back my client from making progress. In 80% it saves their butts. I'll take the 20% hit to avoid losing 80% of the time. People aren't as smart and tactful as they think they are.

I do make exception for some of my extremely competent clients who I've already coached for some time.

What are your views on prenups with Christianity?

5 upvotes · 3 June 2020 · /r/askRPC

Are you suggesting that staying in a marriage in which you're unhappy is more sinful than divorce? I seriously am not getting where you're trying to go with this. Divorce is sin. Staying married, even in an unhappy situation, is not. Being defiant and spiteful toward your spouse because you cannot divorce him is also sin. A prenup can cover that kind of behavior too.

What are your views on prenups with Christianity?

5 upvotes · 2 June 2020 · /r/askRPC

I advise all of my clients to have a provision that obligates a wife suspected of adultery to drink from a clay jar filled with holy water mixed with dust from a tabernacle floor.

Seriously, though, I don't ever look to the Mosaic law for dealing with non-ancient-Israelites. I do recommend basic stuff:

- Consequences to infidelity that would affect support or property division.
- Consequences to concealment of asset that would affect property division or claims of separate property.
- Consequences for separating from the marital residence.
- Advance stipulations as to present intentions toward a future custody case (obviously these aren't binding, but they are certainly influential).
- Calculations for how "equal contribution" is to be understood while one spouse works and the other doesn't, especially in the event of divorce.
- Provisions for legal fees to be covered or prohibited, depending on who files for divorce.

- Restricted access to separate property or passively acquired wealth.
- Calculations that identify separate property and allow for the creation of new separate property during the marriage.
- A clear statement that the goal of the prenup is not to pre-negotiate the divorce, but to create intentional disincentives to the divorce process itself.

Most of the things I put in are unique to the situation and requests of the client, though. These are just some common ones.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (05/27/20)

5 upvotes · 28 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I am terrified of going to hell

Have you read 307 - Assurance of Salvation yet?

Assurance of salvation: 5/10 I just don't know

What you're describing is more like a 1 or 2. It sounds like the base knowledge of the Gospel is there, and you may actually be saved, but you lack the capacity to be secure in this. And here's why ...

Mission: First to set my own life into order. Mainly get myself in routine including a healthy sleep, exercise and study schedule. Overcoming my extremely introverted nature by building social connections. Holding down a full time job is also of great importance to become independent. After establishing my life I desire bringing the lost imprisoned by sin to Jesus Christ savior of all.

You're basically saying, "God, I know you want me out making disciples, but I have all these other things I want to do first. Can I put your purposes on hold and still have all the confidence and blessing that those who are actively doing the have, even though I'm not?" Also, you haven't actually referenced anything to do with making disciples. At best, you've said you want to make converts. Huge difference. But let me break this down:

set my own life into order

What is "order" for you? You seem to have this vague notion of what it would look like to "have it all together." That's a woman's way of thinking. Women strive to "have it all together." Men accept where they're at, make the most of it, but keep doing whatever they want, whether they meet some arbitrary standard or not.

More to the point: "into order" means you're doing what God created you to do. This is literally impossible if you're not making disciples. So, you have to start making disciples to accomplish this goal.

healthy sleep, exercise and study schedule

It sounds like you're losing sleep because you're not making disciples, so you have no assurance of salvation and it's keeping you up at night (among other things, I'm sure).

The first step of making disciplers is to be what others should aspire to be. This may involve sleep, exercise, and studying, but the motivation for why you're doing it changes. You're doing it because you want to model for others what a disciplined Christian soldier looks like - not because you think you have to become worthy of some arbitrary standard you've created before you can start discipling people. That's tantamount to pedestaling the disciple the same way men pedestalize women, thinking they have to get themselves in order to be "worthy" of her. No, you get yourself in order to attract the filthy sinners that they are.

Overcoming my extremely introverted nature by building social connections

Would you be surprised if discipling others helped you break out of your shell? It forces you to build relationships like what you're looking for - you're just doing it for Jesus, not for your own arbitrary purposes.

Holding down a full time job is also of great importance to become independent

Or it's of great importance to support yourself while you make disciples, just like Paul made tents to support himself when he wasn't being funded by those he discipled. Your statement makes it sound like you find "independence" a greater aspiration than making disciples.

I know I'm being obtusely repetitive. But do you get the point? Your mission to make disciples IS what works out everything else. You set your plan, you strategize the best way to accomplish it, then you follow through. All these other things you want for yourself are incidental to that, and are also likely to be fulfilled as you push in this direction.

This is why mission matters, nothing else. Get that through your thick skull and all these other things will be worked out on their own. Wait ... does that sound kind of familiar? Oh yeah ...

Matthew 6:33 - "Seek first his kingdom and his righteousness and all these things will be added to you as well." This doesn't mean to "find" his kingdom. He's already talking to those who are earnestly following him and who would become the founders of the early church. It means to seek the best interests of the kingdom - to seek its advancement. You do that, while maintaining your own righteousness in the process, and literally everything else works itself out. I'm just telling you what Jesus says, but hopefully in a direct enough way that you'll get it and be able to move forward.

Who should you listen to on RPChristians?

5 upvotes · 20 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I added a sticky comment, part of which notes that if any women want flair, we'll give it to them. It just won't be an endorsement on this sub - more for gender identification purposes, hence u/Willow-girl self-identifying as "participation trophy wife" or u/humectantmenace asking to be titled "Christian Nympho."

I would not be opposed to adding an "RPCWomen Endorsed" flair for women who prove their value to the female community. Someone like u/g_e_m_anscombe would have been ripe for that type of flair. But it would make more sense to do that after we officially open RPCW, which will also be soon.

Discovered an inappropriate relationship

5 upvotes · 12 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

If I wasn't responsible for this community I would. But if you're going to teach something unbiblical that ultimately advances cultural ideologies of churchianity, I have an obligation to pull things back to a Scriptural foundation. You have made no effort to even try. At best, you're just arrogant and misguided. At worst, you're here to troll.

Discovered an inappropriate relationship

5 upvotes · 11 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Realistically, you can't legally kick her out, even if he owns the place outright. The cops won't enforce trespassing laws on a resident who hasn't left of their own vocation. In many jurisdictions, you can't evict your spouse - you have to be divorced first.

The alternative is, of course, to file for legal separation instead of divorce, then have the court issue a temporary order on a motion to vacate the premises. However, if she has substantially less means to move out than he does, it's probably going to be denied.

The proper response, if you're insistent on living separately, is to move out and take the kids with you, then work out an arrangement for visitation. Many guys are afraid to do this on the premise that it's "uprooting the kids from their home." Yet this is exactly what women do whenever they say, "I'm taking the kids to my mom's/sister's until we can figure this out." The point is: if you don't take the kids with you, it perpetuates the view, especially to the court, that you view her as the primary/default parent and that your role is expendable because you believe it's okay for you to leave with them staying behind and no arrangements worked out ahead of time. That's a dangerous precedent to the court.

Tag: /u/lololasaurus - All communications are in writing or recorded from now on. This definitely sounds like legit cheating, not just an emotional affair.

Should I give my Dad a copy of NMMNG?

5 upvotes · 27 April 2020 · /r/askRPC

I agree completely with Deep. That's how I approached things with my dad. I think he ended up reading about 3/4 of it. It didn't stick. Oh well. Don't think giving him a book will be a magical solution to his problems.

You're better off taking something like /u/Deep_Strength's book and saying, "I'd really like to do a small group, but churches are shut down right now. You want to do one with me? Someone I know wrote a book that I've been meaning to read, and I'd love to go through it together." Easy. What Christian dad is going to say no to talking about God with his son? Oh ... I guess weak blue pill ones do. Well, hopefully he's not that backwards.

Is compatibility essential (or even useful!) in a marriage? No, not really.

5 upvotes · 26 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I advocate for three qualities to look for in a discipleship candidate and spouse:

- Faithful
- Available
- Saved
- Teachable

If you give me those qualities in a person, I can instill any other quality in them.

Is compatibility essential (or even useful!) in a marriage? No, not really.

5 upvotes · 26 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right. Stick around long enough and you'll see countless stories of men whose "good Christian wife" "would NEVER do something like that" ... until he becomes attractive and suddenly she's doing "that" and more. Top post of all time on MRP is a perfect example if this:

https://www.reddit.com/r/marriedredpill/comments/dmpqgv/i_almost_lost_my_marriage_of_32_years_and_turned/

Check my post history for my testimony and rp-imony and you'll see I'm another example of a guy who married a frigid prude who it turns out wasn't actually a frigid prude at all ... it was just me being screwed up.

Is compatibility essential (or even useful!) in a marriage? No, not really.

5 upvotes · 26 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Yes. She can learn. Also, how were you planning on assessing this before marriage? I again refer you to u/Deep_Strength's Christian Brad Pitt thought experiment post on the sidebar and also linked in this thread.

... unless you're talking "sexual compatibility" in the sense of gender and sex. I assume that compatibility in the sense of not entering a homosexual relationship is just understood in this sub.

Reposting as text: Advice on how to manage and potentially create a Red Pill women's subreddit for Christian women.

5 upvotes · 26 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed. The short duration of your marriage doesn't seem problematic to me. I'm more interested in how well you are able to connect application of Scripture to your daily life in the contexts applicable to a sub like this - and that you do have experience to share from, whether it's recent or from years ago isn't as big of an issue. Yes, longevity adds credibility, but it's not the only source of credibility.

Was gonna go on mission this year, and now they changed the staff. I don't feel like going

5 upvotes · 14 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I think you missed the point I was making. Think bigger than your immediate concerns and you'll realize how trite they are and that you can mister whether you go or not. So who cares what they do with their group? You do you.

When do you know that they're the one?

5 upvotes · 9 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

There is no "the one" unless God specifically ordains through prophecy a particular bride for you. This is extremely rare. I agree with /u/reformedpolak - your "one" is whoever you pick to marry. Just don't be an idiot about who you pick, and don't expect that marriage will somehow transform her into your soul mate. Even after marriage, "she's not yours, it's just your turn."

Your question is too much of an effort to defer responsibility for a prospective failed marriage to someone else. If it doesn't end up working out, it's like you want to reserve the right to say that SHE wasn't the one. Take responsibility for your own decisions. If you make a good choice or bad choice, that's on you. Yes, there's going to be risk, and no, you will never be able to account for the seemingly sudden changes that women make after marriage. But that's all got to be factored into your decision to legally and spiritually bind yourself to someone else in the first place.

If she does go off the rails in a way you couldn't foresee, sure, that's on her. But at the same time, as I often tell my clients when they're upset at how contentious their spouse is being: "I didn't marry her. That was you. I'm just trying to help you get out."

Most Christians Do Not Love Women

5 upvotes · 2 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Spot on. But when you ask how men are saved, you neglected to ask how women are saved. Through child-bearing (1 Timothy 2:15). While in one sense, this bolsters a pragmatic aspect of your entire post, in another - the more theological sense - it explains something much deeper that I have been getting on for some time about.

Child-bearing and raising is inherently paralleled throughout all of Scripture to the discipleship process - especially in the New Testament. Jesus references the fruit of a person's seed as the thing by which we would know the saved from the unsaved - their disciples. In discussing the unforgivable sin, Jesus once again takes it back to the concept of spiritual reproduction - specifically rebuking the pharisees for trying to lead people away from Christ (i.e. reproducing their death among those who were moving toward life) as the bad fruit, which is unforgivable. Yet the good fruit that vouches for the authenticity for our faith is known through the disciples we produce.

In this way, women are a parallel for the mission of the church. The way they, as a man's bride, bear children and raise them is symbolic of the way the Church, Christ's bride, is meant to bear spiritual offspring (evangelism) and raise them through discipling them. And this is the evidence of our salvation. It's quite plain, then, that women's salvation - even their highest honor - is to be the vessels of birth, establishing the practical example of the way the Church should forever understand its mission.

It amazes me, then, that the spiritual parentage concept is so plainly obvious in Scripture, yet the church attempts to "parent" hundreds or even thousands of kids at a time from a singular leader. What father actually parents that many children this way? Actual parenting strategies are abandoned and instead we call classrooms and sermons the "modern" approach to "spiritual parenting." Total hogwash.

I thought I could get over it

5 upvotes · 24 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

5 times ... 12 times ... 25 times

Why are you so hung up on how many times another guy's willy has been inside of her? If it's one time or 42 times, or even 1,000 times, you need to make up your mind if you're okay with this or not. This is an insanely bizarre detail to share. Also, this is trickle truth, brother. Whatever numbers she gives you: triple it.

This is my first serious relationship

Sounds like you haven't had your first yet. Seriously, are you trolling us?

Is it weird for me to require a virgin or nobody?

5 upvotes · 23 March 2020 · /r/askRPC

It feels like a competition because for these girls IT IS A COMPETITION. That's how hypergamy works. They want to know you're better than the last guy. So, they start talking up the last guy with the expectation that you'll try to one-up him. These aren't the wrong girls; they're all girls. Some are just more vocal about it than others. My post history and the sidebar include posts on how to win competition games by not playing them in the first place.

I agree that virgin girls are rare these days. That said, they're certainly out there. What are your Rule 2 stats? If you're under 40, start looking for someone around 20. Chances are much higher she's still a virgin if you're looking younger.

The Philosophy Side of The Bible

5 upvotes · 20 February 2020 · /r/RPChristians

If you were spiritually responsible for a community, you might feel differently when certain bad advice is given. Not to say that the other guy is one, but there is a large group of cult-like KJV-onlyists that can be dangerous. I don't prohibit people from reading the KJV. I just want them informed before developing their translation preferences rather than being influenced in potentially risky ways.

Note that we did not make a debate of it. He made one comment, I made an extremely short reply. This is hardly "in the weeds with what translation is best." If this little tidbit sets you off, you've got to grow some thicker skin, brother ;)

Q&A With an untrusting wife

5 upvotes · 11 February 2020 · /r/RPChristians

<https://deepstrength.wordpress.com/>

<https://loydwalker.com/>

How would a turnaround for the church look like? Making it more RP than Feminist.

5 upvotes · 21 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right. But using levitical law out of its context is unbiblical.

Advice on moving forward with Christian dudes who are bp?

5 upvotes · 17 December 2019 · /r/askRPC

"The Lord disciplines the one he loves" - Hebrews 12:6.

Respond back: "Excellent reference, my friend. I totally agree that we should love our wives the way Christ loves the church. So, what would you say is the proper way for a husband to discipline his wife?"

Wait 10 seconds through either shocked silence or objection after objection.

"Oh, so you think we should just single out one aspect of how Christ loved the church and ignore all the other ways?"

Done. Works every time. Sometimes I still get some objections, but it's put away as soon as I say: "I want to model Christ to my wife in every way Christ is a groom to us, as his bride. If I say I'm only going to be like Christ in the ways that are socially acceptable, but not in the more difficult, controversial ways, am I truly Christ-like?"

/u/Deep_Strength also had a great reply. Props for making good use of his book.

Encouraging leadership in with non-rp husband

5 upvotes · 31 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

Lots going on here, but I have to hammer this point up-front because it's unbearably often that this happens:

EDIT: Rule 2 as requested

You obviously looked at Rule 2 because you quoted it, but you skipped the "mission" category. That's the single most important thing that affects EVERYTHING you've written here. Everything else is just guess-work without that piece. Nevertheless ...

I do generally agree with (most) of the [RP] ideals, as it pertains to what I personally want in my relationship anyway

Right, because you're a woman designed by God just like every other woman. Your situation here is not unique - you're just frustrated that the power of change most heavily rests on the man's shoulders and you don't have the say or authority.

I can make a very long list of wonderful things about my husband

Great. I can make the same list of Hitler. All this tells me is that you use the positive recognition of his attributes as an excuse to let your hamster keep complaining because you tell yourself: "It's not all hate - I have a fair evaluation of him." Don't couch anything. Tell it like it is and let that be that. Stuff like this makes you lose credibility, not gain it.

I am grateful for him, I appreciate him, I love him, and I make sure he knows this often.

How much rationalizing did you have to do to write this? Be honest. You're talking divorce and serious frustrations and yet at the same time you're saying you're grateful? That's like when your grandma gives you an ugly sweater for Christmas and you say, "Oh, thank you. I'm so grateful for this wonderful gift" that you wish you could throw in the trash but you know she's going to want to see you wearing it next year. You rationalize, "I'm grateful that she cared enough to give me a gift that she thought I would like," but in reality you're not grateful for what you actually have in front of you.

You're not grateful for your husband. You don't appreciate him - you appreciate some of the things he does for you. Big difference. When you say you love him, what does that mean to you? Because what you're describing doesn't sound like love - it sounds like emotional effort.

Also, /u/Deep_Strength hit the nail on the head with respect not being in this list.

our relationship is seriously devoid of passion, physical affection, sexual chemistry, and attraction coupled with:

I'm 5'4" and in the 180s ... He's 5'11" 250s-260s ... he does not lift or exercise. I am also not actively working out.

So you want sex like you see on TV, but you don't want the bodily chemistry of the people you see on TV. You understand how testosterone works, right? It's what fuels our sex drives - men and women alike. Do you know what increases it in a person's body more than anything else you can naturally do? Work out.

I can't force my feelings and he knows this

Yes you can. You can absolutely force feelings. What you can't force is attraction.

I don't enjoy it, he knows I don't enjoy it, and everyone is feeling pretty hopeless

Are you kidding? Hopeless? You're going to use that word? Do you have any hope that if either or both of you got in 6-pack abs shape then maybe your sex drives would be restored? Let me indent your obvious thought process for emphasis:

- MY HUSBAND AND I ARE MAKING AN ACTIVE CHOICE THAT WE ARE MORE INTERESTED IN OVER-EATING AND AVOIDING THE GYM THAN HAVING A PASSIONATE SEX LIFE
- My husband and I are making an active choice that we are more interested in over-eating and avoiding the gym than having a passionate sex life.
- My husband and I are making an active choice that we are more interested in over-eating and avoiding the gym than having a passionate sex life.

I want you to memorize this line and recite it every time you get seconds at dinner. Every time you buy a dessert from the grocery store. Every time you drive by a gym and see their deal of the month. Repeat. Repeat. Repeat.

Right now you're living in passivity. BOTH of you. Not just him. Here's another point that needs emphasis:

- If passable mediocrity is your goal, you'll never put in the work to get it.

Everyone wants the best - a 10. That's a fact of life. I'm not talking about SMV - I'm just saying the quality of any result they're looking for in life. People who compromise their desires say, "I would be happy even if I only got a 4. That's better than the 1 or 2 I have now." They make this compromise because they realize getting a 10 would be a heck of a lot of work. They don't want to do that work. They just want better. But they've already decided they don't want to do the work. They're asking for better results without actually having to change anything. As a result, they're never going to bump from a 2 to a 4. They'll stay at 2 forever.

Now, the one who wants a 10 might not be capable of actually putting in enough effort to get a 10. But by making a 10 their target, they put in a butt ton of effort and end up getting an 8. Solid. But the lazy people are motivated for a short while. They have 10 in their sights, 8 is realistically attainable quite soon, but they finally get their 4 and think, "Well, that's better. This is hard work. I'll settle for the 4 I just got." Then they stop. Then they regress because they don't put in the maintenance work. Then they slide back to a 2 and think to themselves, "Well, I already tried putting in a lot of effort and yet we still ended up right back here, so that didn't work. I guess my situation is hopeless." See how foolish this sounds?

Imagine my internet sucks. It keeps losing connection when I'm using it. Videos have to buffer all the time. I can barely even stream music because it takes 2 minutes to load the next song. Now, I'm paying for the absolute lowest speed service, and I know this. But it would take work to pick up the phone and call the internet company to discuss plans to upgrade my service. It would also cost more money. That's a lot of effort. So, instead, I say, "Look how hopeless my situation is. My internet will never get better! I might as well just change internet companies because maybe they'll be better than this garbage I have right now." But if you change companies, you're going to be out a bunch of money because you haven't finished your current contract yet. The other companies are also more expensive than what you have now because they don't even like offering plans that crappy. So, even if you did change companies, you're going to have to pony up some more cash and put in the work to shop around and get something better set up anyway. Or ... you can just put in the time and cash to get a better plan with the company you have now. But by telling yourself, "Things are HOPELESS with this current company" is just absurd.

I think there's some difference in "taste" of what we each want in bed

Yep. He wants a hot girl in bed and you want a hot man in bed. These are extremely different from what you have now. Your tastes are certainly different from what you're each getting right now.

I honestly believe 80% of our problems boil down to the fact I badly need him to lead both me and our family in just about all aspects of our lives (including faith), and that he needs to develop some self respect

Let me venture a guess - projecting a bit from my fatter days. He doesn't respect himself because he doesn't think his life is something worth respecting. Yeah, he's got decent income, but he knows other high-earning people who have better bodies, hotter wives, and more passionate sex lives. He doesn't want to put in the work to get in shape because (1) he loves his laziness and (2) he doesn't believe you'd put in the work to get in shape, and then he'd have done all that work and still come home to the same old same old, so what's the point? He probably even remembers a few times where he did make an effort for like 3 weeks to get in better shape and not much improved, so he tested that theory and it's gone.

But really, your saying this is just deluding yourself. 80% of your problems are him not leading? Try 80% of your problems are that neither of you are in shape, and getting in shape will almost certainly solve the leadership as a byproduct, as he develops more confidence and is more able to process the (apparently appropriate numerical levels of) testosterone he's already got. Just because the numbers are there doesn't mean his body is doing with it what it's supposed to.

I know my part in this is in submission and respect.

Deflecting much? This obviously isn't the real issue. There are easy and obvious answers if that's the problem.

Consider: He never asks you to do anything directly. So, you stop doing anything at all. Period. Is that a submissive attitude? No. Of course not. Why not? Because you know he wants things even if he hasn't said it. You're submitting to his unspoken desires and expectations.

Ask him: "Do you want me to get in better shape and look more physically attractive?" Do you think he would honestly say no? If you know the answer is already yes, then this is simply an unspoken mandate, and you're hamstering away that you don't need to follow it because he never said it out loud. And you don't want him to say it out loud because then you'll have to submit on something you don't actually want to do. Ouch. As a pastor once said, "It's not submission until you disagree."

Point being: you're only "submitting" to those things that you already want to do anyway and not willing to submit in the areas that he's not yet man enough to say out loud - probably because he's got some feminist juju running through his head about never talking to a woman about her weight. And how could he? He's big enough as is that he has no room to talk. So, he's just given up.

I'm out of space. You know what you need to do. Lose 25lbs then update us with an FR.

Emotional self sufficiency

5 upvotes · 23 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

That's a lesson I've tried to word succinctly a number of times to guys who want to rush into marriage and relationships. They get all excited because when they're a 5 they get super pumped when a 6 actually gives them the time of day. It's usually because there's junk that drops her value significantly that guys don't find out about just by looking at her, hence her still being single. But the guy doesn't care in the moment because he's blinded by feelings of "love". He's super pumped to marry this 6, then realize that the sex life he was expecting isn't there. So, he eventually discovers RP and ups his game - he jumps from a 5 to an 8. Now he's pulling 7s with ease and rather disappointed that he married a 6 when a tiny bit of work puts him in the 8-9 range.

If you're going to have to improve anyway, better to do it before you pick who you spend your life with rather than after.

As for a book to read on emotional independence from your wife/women ... I'm going to go off the beaten path and recommend Practice the Presence of God, by Brother Lawrence. Get the version with the maxims at the end. It's a 60 minute read. It's the most influential book on my life after the Bible itself. The book focuses on being able to experience God's fullness no matter what your circumstances are in life.

Brother Lawrence references his life doing dishes in a monastery - a job he hated - yet having such great joy because of God's presence in those moments. Substitute "being in the same room with a harpy wife" for "doing the dishes" and the application becomes more obvious.

He was a few hundred years early, but really the book is a Spirit-heavy telling of concepts like amused mastery, developing and maintaining frame, OYS, etc.

Dating apps for Christians?

5 upvotes · 14 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

You updated with your stats in a comment, but I still want the other Rule 2 information:

- Mission
- Reading
- Finances

- Spiritual Maturity

Those things will tell us a lot of necessary information as to how successful you're going to be with any girl once you get past the initial swipe. Otherwise, I agree with /u/Deep_Strength that it's doable on a dating app, but mostly not worth the time. You're really just trying to skate around the easy way to find someone at that point. My brother did just marry his wife last December, and he's proud to show off how whipped he is to his internet bride. In fairness to him, she's moderately attractive and he's severely obese (but well groomed), so there's that working for him ... granted, she has psychological and health problems that probably also narrowed the dating pool for her.

Also, and I mean this not in a racist way at all, but from what I've read, minorities don't do very well on dating apps unless they're truly top-tier guys. Your build might make that worthwhile, but in order to draw attraction you're really going to have to show it off by pulling up your shirt to flaunt a 6-pack. As soon as you do that, the Christian girls will initially be put-off - not for lack of tingles, but because of social conditioning against arrogance. So, you have to couch it with a joke, like painting a cross on your torso so they can hamster it that you're not cocky, you're just showing off how much you love Jesus to paint it on your body for all to see. That way they're seeing your tingle-producing assets while not judging you for it.

More to the point: the only real value in online dating is to find people who are (1) either not having success IRL, which means they're usually low value - and if they're attractive, it's because they're low-value for hidden reasons that you won't find until it's too late, or (2) very far away, in which case you're stuck dealing with a long distance (not really a) relationship. My suggestion: don't do it unless you're desperate and willing to accept a lower-quality girl. You're better off upping your SMV and initiating in the real world through mission-oriented activities.

F/R Sunday's Argument

5 upvotes · 12 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Easy path to nip this in the bud:

1. Stop caring so much.
2. When she screws up this hard, instead of getting mad, just say, "I thought I could trust you to do what you said you'd do. I can't. Now I know. Here's what we're going to do ..." and in this case you finish: "I'm going to stay and cook dinner. You can go to small group and food will be ready when you get back."
3. ... There is no third step. That's really it.

Your wife will fail you. It's inevitable. Expect it. If you know it's coming, you won't care as much when it happens. So, when she fails you, acknowledge her failure, embrace it, and let her hamstering do your work for you. You tried to use anger to change how she interacts with you. By telling her she failed you, but not getting upset about it you're both displaying high value and also letting her hamster spin about the whole situation so that she will internally want to do better next time. Which do you think will result in a more positive attitude: her deciding this on her own, or you telling her? Which one will produce more lasting internal transformation: her internally coming to this conclusion or you externally brute-forcing it through anger?

In reality, you screwed up too and you were just shifting the blame on her. If you want to eat, that's your responsibility to get food, not hers. When she offered to cook dinner, she took on that responsibility. When you decided to trust her, that decision was on you. Her failure is on her, your poor judgment of her faithfulness to do what she said is on you. At the end of the day, oh well. She failed. You exercised poor judgment and didn't realize your wife could be flaky like that. AWALT. Deal with it.

Now, you blew this chance already, but an easy move to twist these conversations and turn them in your favor: when you realize how bad you're DEERING and how mad she's getting, just start laughing hysterically. When she gets even more ticked and asks why you're laughing say, "I'm just screwing with you. Did you see how mad you were getting ?? hahaha. Now come on, let's get something to eat."

Hamster goes wild at this EVERY. SINGLE. TIME.

That trick won't work forever, but it's solid gold for a few times. I give it 3-4 uses before it becomes fishy, unless they're super spaced out.

I fell in love with a Muslim girl. What now?

5 upvotes · 11 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

John 1:3 - "Through him all things were made; without him nothing was made that has been made."

No, there are not two gods, there is one triune God. If you deny the divinity of Jesus, you are not a Christian and you're free to date whoever you want. So, that's a simple answer to your question. If you are a Christian, then you may not marry someone of another faith, and therefore it's pretty pointless to date someone of another faith.

Being Supportive on Attitude Issues

5 upvotes · 11 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

the feedback he gets from above may be right only half the time

If a boss provides critical feedback, the boss is always right, even when he's wrong. If he's saying, "You're not drafting those TPS reports the right way," and then you look up the company manual and it turns out you're filing them the right way, what the boss really means is: "I don't care what the manual says, you're not doing it the way I WANT you to do it." It's all a matter of personal preference for most evaluations like this (except when it comes down to the numbers).

I went through the same situation 2 years ago. My boss was coming down hard on me. He didn't even have a reason. He just said he was unhappy with my performance compared to the other attorney in the office. I pulled out numbers - that I was in the office more hours, I was billing more hours, I brought the office more money, my client retention numbers were higher, client satisfaction levels were higher - objectively, I was the better employee. What did it turn out to be? "Well, [other employee] always keeps me informed of everything going on in his cases so I'm always up to date, and I just don't get that from you." I was too autonomous. Despite being objectively a better employee, he had his own personal preference over how things should be done. So, I adjusted my performance to suit his preference and didn't let it get to me because at the end of the day I'm still getting my check. His personal opinions of me don't matter as long as I keep getting that check - that's what his role is in my life. If I need to adjust a few behaviors to suit his preferences to keep getting that check, so be it.

As Paul says, "I don't care if I am judged by you or any other human court. I do not even judge myself. My conscience is clear, but that doesn't make me innocent. It is the Lord who judges me." Have him memorize that verse. From there, it's no longer a matter of managing emotional judgments over him; it's just a matter of adapting behavior to reap the results he's going for.

My point is: most employee evaluation criteria is subjective opinion. At that, his opinion of himself means squat. If his boss's opinion is different from his, his boss is right, even if he thinks he's "right only half the time."

his attitude causes him to take negative feedback way too personally

This is extremely common. I used to struggle with this too. It's ultimately a frame issue. Is he read up on matters of frame? Amused mastery? DNGAF? If not, I wouldn't give him dynamite right off. But if he is, he needs to work on that. Why does he care so much about what others think of him?

In addition to the above reference, Galatians 1:10 seems to be highly on-point: "Am I now trying to win the approval of human beings, or of God? Or am I trying to please people? If I were still trying to please people, I would not be a servant of Christ."

Now, your question is less about what he needs and more about what you can do - so let's skip there.

As a matter of personal preference, I don't know that I'd ask him about his work day at all. A lot of guys like the idea of coming home and getting work out of their minds. My dad was that way. He was able to enjoy home and family more when nobody was asking him about his job. As soon as someone did ask, a million things started running through his mind that became a distraction and he couldn't get his head reoriented. When a man goes from his office to his home, there should be a psychological shift prompted by the change in location/scenery that you don't want to undermine by blurring those lines too much. If he wants to talk about it, let him talk; if not, find other ways to keep him happy.

The best thing you can do to be supportive is to be the best you that you can be at your role within the household. His day at work sucks? He comes home to find a clean house, children playing nicely in the back yard, dinner on the table, and something fun to do after the kiddos go down (sex, Netflix, board game, etc.).

If you bring work into his home life too much, it's very possible he may feel some form of release by venting to you, but it also means he never gets a true respite from what's going on. Your job is to be an oasis for him. Make things as wonderful at home as possible so it's not like he's going from a stressful job to a slum back to a stressful job. Coming home should be like a 4-hour vacation in these phases of life.

Now, you can't realistically keep the house at vacation-level condition and peace all the time - especially if you're working too (can't remember if you have a job or not). But even if for a few days while he's got his struggles going on, the ambiance and attitude can really make more of a difference than trying to help him find a direct solution to his problems.

Another aspect might be that he's afraid you'll judge him the same way his boss does. By simply asking the question, "How was work?" there is a chain of psychological implications that subconsciously run through a guy's head --> "She wants to know what I did at work" --> "What I do at work matters to her" --> "Why does it matter to her? Probably because it affects her" --> "She wants to be affected in a good way, but I only have bad news right now" --> "She's going to judge me."

Now, he may still tell you simply because he needs to vent or he wants to be compulsively honest or for whatever other reason. But I know when I've had those moments in the past I most certainly was hung up on how my wife would think about me if she knew I wasn't a rock-star at the office every day. And, in fact, my wife did used to be directly UNSupportive when I wasn't performing up to par. So, in those days I'd built a pattern of hiding my poor performance from her. If I wanted to take a day off, rather than letting her know I needed a break, I scheduled them on days she'd be out of town so she didn't know I took time off. I'd leave extra early in the morning, but then sleep an hour or two in my car when I got to my parking lot. I'd exaggerate what I was billing or how much non-billable work I was doing, when in reality I just didn't have the work-flow at the time to bring in a decent paycheck. There were all kinds of stupid things that I did out of fear of my wife's judgment - and it was even worse when I knew I wasn't actually performing up to par.

By not pressing the work issues, you're implicitly letting him know you don't care how well or poor he performs at work - that's his business to figure out and decide what to disclose and not. You're communicating, instead: "You're my husband. I know you're stressed, but I appreciate you and I want to recharge you so you can do a better job when you go back."

Part of this is also understanding the framework of why you're asking the question in the first place. Are you asking about his workday for his benefit or yours? I'd wager that for most women, it's for their own benefit to open that conversation, not his. "I want to know you. I want to be a part of your life, even when we're apart. It's important to me to feel connected to every aspect of you, including your work life."

Most guys don't get the same relational connection from dumping their work stress on their wife. We compartmentalize our thoughts and emotions, so it's easy to set aside work stresses once we get home ... unless a wife "forces" us to drudge them up by asking about it repeatedly. Sharing that burden with her doesn't feel, to most guys, like he's becoming more connected to his wife. Rather, it's usually the wife who feels emotional fuzzies when her husband is open and honest about his struggles - but he's not getting those same fuzzies. This can become selfish if a wife is opening a box her husband had tucked away, which now reminds him of his frustrations just so she can feel closer to him.

Even if it does cause him to feel closer to her too (as I'm sure there's some degree of that happening also), there are MUCH, MUCH, MUCH better and more effective ways to get him to feel close to you. So, just play a quick side-by-side comparison game in your head in those moments: Which one will make him feel more loved by me?

- Sharing his work struggles or having hot lingerie sex?
- Sharing his work struggles or getting a shoulder massage?
- Sharing his work struggles or being cooked his favorite meal?
- Sharing his work struggles or coming home to a stress-free, clean house?
- Sharing his work struggles or cuddling to a movie and popcorn?
- Sharing his work struggles or playing with the kids over a fun activity I set up for us?

You can see that even though "sharing his work struggles" might develop some level of emotional connectivity for him and could possibly help him ... the latter choice is going to be more effective EVERY. SINGLE. TIME.

So, if your goal is for YOU to feel more connected to him when you feel like work is pulling him away, then by all means, ask your questions about his day. But if your goal is for HIM to feel more loved by you, do things that are more likely to make him feel loved by you. If he wants your advice, let him be the one to ask for it. If he wants to vent, let him decide when and how to do it. Let him lead and initiate on what he wants, and you just keep refueling his positive energy tank in the meantime.

Complete Lifting Reset

5 upvotes · 1 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

For your age, height, weight, and body fat you should NATURALLY be lifting way more than this. Something sounds seriously off here. Most guys with those base demographics could walk into a gym after having never lifted in their lives and be pulling off more than this. I'm very confused here.

What it sounds like is that you probably do have the capacity for higher lifts, but you have a psychological block due to the history of pain. Chiropractors feel great, but they're addictive and do not offer any permanent solutions. As soon as you stop seeing them, the problems will recur - at least until you're pretty built. I used to have lots of pain in my upper and lower back as well, plus my neck. I saw a chiropractor for a while and had no real long-term benefit from it.

Know what did fix me and make all my pain go away? I got buff. Once my bench went from 145 to 225+, all that pain went away. I'm guessing it's because your body is designed to be muscular. When you don't have muscle, your bones and joints are carrying more load than they should, and not configured properly. When you gain muscle, it forces your body to rest in its proper shape so you're not posturing yourself weird all the time, and it also lets the muscle carry the load of your body around rather than your bones.

Best advice I can give, without being a doctor, is to find non-painful ways to build muscle mass as quickly as possible and hope that the peripheral effect of the muscle you can build will help self-correct the areas where there are pain so you can begin focusing on those areas sooner. But you have to at least start getting your body in a proper shape first.

Duty Sex Sucks, How to Proceed?

5 upvotes · 23 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

As you've already figured out, this is a raw attraction issue. But your question isn't "why is this happening" - it's "what do I do until I get attractive?" So, most of the other answers are somewhat off-topic.

BPP's advice is that a married man should never stop initiating. Athol Kay says in MMSLP that a guy should never turn down a wife's sexual initiation. But everyone agrees it's perfectly appropriate to walk away from bad sex.

Personally, I fully agree with the last bit - walking away from bad sex, but only if you can do it in a non-butthurt way. That requires an immaculate frame and actual OI, rather than the "fake it til you make it" OI that most guys live in perpetually.

As far as the rest, I'm on the other end from BPP and AK. I think it's perfectly appropriate for a married man to go through monk mode for a time. Biblically, this is supposed to happen by mutual consent and only for a short time for prayer (1 Cor. 7). However, "mutual consent" doesn't mean "verbalized consent." If she's not initiating, that's her consent not to have sex; if you're not initiating also, then it's mutual.

I'd suggest a "short time" as a month or two, but it could be shorter or longer. I say that mostly because that's how long it takes to make serious progress with lifting/dieting. A couple weeks alone won't get you very far.

But if she initiates during this time, accept the initiation and be prepared to walk away if you're not into it - unless she pulls the husbandly duty card that most women don't even know exists because they hid it in their trash can so long ago they forgot it was there.

Could someone say anything about the statements this guy is making concerning the validity of the Bible?

5 upvotes · 23 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

And this, my friend, is the only good use of apologetics.

Also, in my small groups I usually end up doing a series on different world belief systems - one a week. When possible, I bring in someone from that belief system to represent their faith and teach us what they believe and why. It is to address this exact situation. I don't want new believers getting led astray. I also want them prepared to witness to such people by knowing what they believe first, so as to facilitate the relationship and gain some insight on where their mental perception is coming from.

Have some fun this weekend. Here's a comic strip for you all.

5 upvotes · 21 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

Expect it. People prefer to stereotype to feed their hate than discern the truth, which takes work and time and might mean they admit they're wrong from time to time.

[ADVICE] My LTR started distancing herself from me for no apparent reason

5 upvotes · 11 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Okay ... here's why the stats matter. I'm not saying this to shame you, but to kick your butt in gear - and because you directly asked for critical feedback.

- Overweight.
- Doesn't lift.
- Doesn't finish books he started.
- Hasn't read RPC sidebar. Says he read Red pill sidebar, but openly admits he hasn't finished books on the sidebar, so something's screwy here.
- Still a student, so no actual income yet
- No quiet times, no consistency in the Word
- Hasn't repented of known sin issues

You're in shambles, brother. You are not the prize yet. The "I am the prize" mentality will get girls horny for you - but only after you actually are the prize.

Now that I see your stats, I'm even more confident about my 90% figure on her cheating on you and using you as her emotional tampon. You're safe. She knows she's got you emotionally locked down on her, she's at a distance so she can keep looking at other guys without you knowing, and if she finds a better option she just branch swings - except it's not even branch swinging because you're not actually in a relationship in the first place. You just call it that.

The fact is: you're not attractive ... yet. You'll get there. There is hope for you. But you're too hung up on this girl because you know you're not all that attractive and she's the best option you have ... for now.

But give yourself 2 years of hard lifting, developing your social skills, increasing your network of friends, getting established in your career, etc. You can do much better than her. How do I know? Because you're a 4 and 8s/9s don't date 4s - even as a safety net LDR. So she's probably a 5 or 6. When you're a 7 or 8 you can do better. Why get hung up on what's available to you now when in a couple years you will have so much more open to you - and someone who isn't going to screw around with other guys behind your back or hide things from you?

Also: what's your mission? You still didn't include that one. That's THE MOST IMPORTANT part of the Rule 2 stats.

"But Red, you just want to lecture me about making disciples, no matter what I say my mission is."

Darn right I do.

Just got offered a new job, but God is still testing me.

5 upvotes · 11 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

I endorse this.

Getting better "game"

5 upvotes · 10 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

I have read Roosh V ... This doesn't sound genuine at all and I would hate to do it.

... coupled with

Does anyone have good tips on being a better conversationalist and having better "game."

You have an answer, but you don't like the answer, so you're looking for different answers. Game isn't about being genuine. It's about being fun. As you noted, you're not a fun person. If genuine you is not fun, then you have to learn to become fun. Either do that authentically, or practice it until it becomes natural to you.

That said ... the topic of conversation skills does warrant a post sometime soon. Maybe I'll get some time soon.

Bonus points: "I have read Roosh V's book" - and "Anyone know if there are any books out there on this?"

EDIT: second quote pasted wrong

FR: The Spell is Broken

5 upvotes · 9 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Any tips on how you battled this in your head during your transition? After reading a lot about habits it seems you must insert a new routine rather than fall into the old one that leads to PMO.

Right, this is Matthew 12. It's not enough to empty yourself of an unclean spirit, as it will always return - and with others more powerful than itself. That passage hinges on the phrase: "If it finds the house is still empty." So, what do you fill it with?

The Bible only mentions three things that indwell us:

- Matthew 13: God's Word (i.e. from the Father).
- John 17: Jesus (also Colossians 1:27)
- Acts 1:8: the Holy Spirit

And what happens when any of these three indwell us?

- God's Word: Matthew 13 says that we produce a crop 30, 60, or 100 times what is sown. That is, disciples are made.
- Jesus: John 17 is all about Jesus commissioning his followers to be disciple-makers, carrying on the ministry he started and into the nations - most notably: "I pray not only for them, but for those they will disciple" (not exact quote, I've never actually memorized that verse). This is the context of Jesus saying that he would be in us - while we are making disciples.
- Holy Spirit: Acts 1:8 says that when the Holy Spirit comes on us we will become his witnesses.

No matter how you slice it, if we are to rid ourselves of evil, we are to fill ourselves with any (all!) of the persons of God, which always results in disciple-making.

My conclusion: go make disciples. That's how you permanently stop your beating off problem.

Oh, and for good measure: the underlying theological framework of RPC is that spiritual reproduction and physical reproduction are parallel processes and spiritual reproduction is the fulfillment of which physical reproduction is merely a copy or shadow (per Hebrews 8/9). Go figure, then, that ridding yourself of sinful sexual expression would be best accomplished by taking on God which leads to spiritual reproductive expression.

Vision for a Biblical Church

5 upvotes · 4 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

PM me about this. I've already got something like this started with some RPC guys and you're welcome to take a look at what we're doing and draw some ideas from it to work with.

For the more general crowd, here's how I see a biblical congregation operating:

- Christ is the head, as the apostles acknowledged.
- Skeletal budget; no buildings, expensive programs, curriculum, etc.; no mandatory tithes; staff have alternative options for supporting themselves if giving doesn't cover their needs, just as the apostles had, ensuring no compromise of the Gospel or biblical truth in order to secure funds.
- Short-term training model. The goal is not to keep people in your ministry for a lifetime. It's to train them up and send them out to run their own ministry after a few years. This is what Jesus and the apostles did.
- Crowd-sourcing logistics. You use what you already have available to arrange for meetings - homes, coffee shops, etc. The people you train up use their own natural life circumstances to reach the next generation. This is what happened in the early church, which did not rely on a centralized building, but on people allowing use of their homes, cooking from their own food, etc.
- Corporate meetings of everyone in the lineage only to occur when necessary or desired, not ritualistically or routine-based, in the same degree of emphasis or lack thereof that Jesus and the apostles modeled (i.e. permit it when it's in high demand and people won't leave you alone, but always pull away from this model to focus on the few).
- No "all the other churches are doing it" mentality; no prefabricated curriculum or content, though referencing outside material when useful is fine. Stick to the Scriptures, as Jesus and the apostles did.
- All 5 instructional aspects of discipleship incorporated: tell them what, show them how, let them try, send them out, pass it on, taken straight from Jesus' model
- All 3 structural aspects of discipleship incorporated: fun/games/relationship building, life/ministry skills training, personal issues addressed, which Jesus modeled
- Tangible vision/picture for what the congregation will be producing when it is done training up a person, which is communicated up-front, as Jesus did ("Come follow me and I will make you fishers of men")
- Intentional pathway for getting a person from where they're at now to become someone living up to that vision/picture, as Jesus had (his entire discipleship process)

In short, everything must be taken straight from Jesus' model. Additional boundaries can be put in place as helpful tools for cultural purposes (ex. setting up bylaws so you qualify as a 501C(3) if you feel so inclined), but these culturally influenced tools are to be nothing more than tools and must not affect the core vision or alter it in any way.

Miracles, signs, wonders, casting out of demons, etc. are all byproducts of such a ministry, not a thing that we must mandate into a ministry. They are the evidence of the success of the ministry, if that makes sense. So yes, it should be happening, but it shouldn't be forced into the model itself.

Continue to pursue dating or not?

5 upvotes · 28 August 2019 · /r/askRPC

Solid. We may have different views on who asks who, but good stuff all around.

Continue to pursue dating or not?

5 upvotes · 28 August 2019 · /r/askRPC

and also too young to date anyone older

At 20, you've got plenty of options available to you. You're in the perfect age range where if you take good care of your body (which seems to be the case) you should be getting lots of attention from both same-age guys and guys all the way into their 30s. I'm not sure why you'd limit yourself here. If I knew then what I know now and were in a different timeline where I wasn't married with kids, I'd be the 30+ year old guy most attracted to women in their low-20s.

With already low chances with Christian daters, it's very hard to date.

This is a sad reality for many women, especially the spiritually mature ones. Ideally, a Christian woman should always be with a man who is more spiritually mature than her so that she can follow him as he follows Christ. Of course, I don't quite know your actual spiritual maturity, but that could say how wide or narrow your options are.

Because of this paradigm, it's perfectly acceptable for women to chase after men, even though men should be chasing after Christ instead of women.

Best place to start? Ask yourself: what would your ideal man be doing right now?

- Would he be running his own company? Join a networking group for young business owners and pick a small-scale business you could market along the way to justify being in the group. Even if you have no real education or skills, pick something like starting a house cleaning business, crocheting blankets, or whatever.
- Would he be in a band? Hit up local concerts and small-time venues and get to know the guys in the band between sets - especially if they play at a Christian cafe or venue.
- Would he be out making disciples? Look around for a disciple-making community. I don't mean churches congregations. They don't make disciples. I mean the ones really committed to doing what Jesus did. This may take some looking, as these pockets are rarer, but I'd be shocked if there wasn't one in your city somewhere.

Should I start approaching attractive men?

Of course.

then I will be too forward

Here's how this works:

- The beta guys will be thrilled that a (presumably) attractive girl is interested in them.
- The guys who get the orientation of the pursuit and are solid leaders will expect women to come to them.
- The only guys who won't be interested are the old fashioned types who are too spiritually immature to understand the orientation of the pursuit and are too hot-headed to be willing to adjust their cultural impressions that the man should initiate.

In short, the only guys who would be put off by you being "too forward" in approaching them are the types of guys who you don't want. But being "too forward" you're still going to have to filter out some weak men anyway - but they'll be much easier to tell apart.

weird holding tank that I am in and I know others are too. That it is very hard to date seriously until somewhere around 25 because of the stigma, frustration, and risks dating younger.

That stigma is a product of feminism and you should ignore it. It says that women should "get out there" and "have fun" and "really experience the world" and "learn who you are" before you're willing to settle down and get married. This is always code for: Go have lots of wild, rampant sex, taking advantage of your feminine sexual power while you've got your looks working for you, then get a good provider to supplicate to your every whim a year or two before your looks start fading.

While it's far from a Christian sub, go read some of the posts on /r/WhereAreAllTheGoodMen. I mean the actual reading bits - top comments, self posts, etc. Not just the memes, pics, etc. They're definitely talking about the secular world, but you'll learn real fast what lies feminism is feeding women, and hopefully you can learn from others' mistakes.

In your particular situation, the lie is that you should wait to get married until you're "ready" because you have to "learn who you are and experience the world" first. Don't fall for that trap. Yes, there are risks to dating younger. But the rewards are much higher and the chances of finding a good guy are INSANELY higher when you look while you're young than when you're 25+. At that point, you've already spent most of your best years and, at least from the perspective of the crude secular sub above, with your highest-value years on the sexual marketplace behind you, you have a lot less to offer a guy, therefore can expect a lot less, and therefore end up with a lot lower quality of men ... ergo the women who keep asking at 28+ r/"Where are all the good men?"

I've prayed a lot but haven't fasted about this.

Fasting can have value, but only if you are doing it for the right reason. Too many fast just because they think it's a good idea or because they want to change God's mind. Biblically, the purpose of fasting is to express the sincerity and extremity of how we feel to our spiritual groom. That's it. If he chooses to change his mind as a result, great, but we don't do it with the expectation that this actually happen, as there are plenty of biblical examples where fasting didn't actually change anything at all.

I wrote a lot more about this here:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/blrqw7/share_your_experiences_with_fasting/emr4wi7/. It's a good idea, just make sure it's not with the expectation of results; rather, to build your trust with God because you know he hears you when you go on a hunger strike to show your sincerity.

Where should I look? Or would it be better to put this on the back burner for now?

I tell men to put it on the back-burner until they're in their 30s and well-accomplished in their mission. For women my recommendation is the reverse: begin looking immediately, and don't be afraid to look older. Younger guys are going to be more immature and poorer leaders.

Best way to look for a guy is as I said above: what would your ideal guy be doing this weekend and go there.

A strategy I teach men is cold-approaching. This is more an evangelism strategy for spiritual reproduction, but that's how Christ intends his bride to be. As a woman who knows her ovaries are fading, Christ's bride should realize the clock is ticking on just how many disciples we can produce during our lifetime, and we should be pretty eager to initiate spiritual reproduction often before we become that old guy/gal that the younger crowd just can't identify with - and it's much harder to witness to older people (40+).

In this sense, just as we as Christ's bride are to be eagerly pursuing him with spiritually reproductive passion, so also should a woman pursue a physical man with sexual passion. Just as we (Christ's bride) may cold-approach people to build Gospel-centered spiritual relationships with, so also should a potential bride be willing to cold-approach a man to build a Gospel-centered physical relationship with.

Easy opener: "I saw you over there and thought, 'I'd love to meet that guy,' so here I am. I'm sywonsmumu. What's your name?"

But what if I get rejected?

It comes with the territory. Your Heavenly Father doesn't reject you. Your spiritual groom, Jesus Christ, will never reject you. The Holy Spirit promises to come on you when you ask. Do you really need much more validation than the supreme being in all the universe? If not, then a guy turning you down shouldn't mean much. If rejection does bother you that much, it says something about the sufficiency of God in your emotional life.

Now, I may be confusing some masculine traits in this, so flesh this out from other red pill women. u/g_e_m_anscombe might be a good resource for you here. Men are innately meant to seek validation from God, but women are designed to find validation from their husbands - so maybe you're perfectly in your right and God-given design to be concerned about rejection from men, to some limited degree (not to say you are concerned, just speaking hypothetically).

I suppose if you are concerned about rejection, and appropriately so, then maybe the better question to ask is: How much rejection am I willing to face to find a guy I'm willing to follow?

You see, rejection is a wonder filtering mechanism. At least from a male perspective, when a girl rejects a guy it helps him filter pretty quickly which girls are worth his time and which aren't. No sense spinning your wheels when it's not likely to work out anyway; so I'd rather a person reject me if they know it's not going to work than waste my time for weeks into a dead-end relationship. This aspect, at least, can work for women too. If/when you face rejection, smile: it means you just checked another guy off your list so you can stop pining over him and move on to the next guy (and as a practical matter, you should have a list of potentials, not just one guy before you start thinking about a backup).

/u/redpillwonder would also be a good resource - he's done a lot of our writing toward helping women be what the ideal guy is looking for. Maybe he has more tips on finding a worthwhile guy too.

But whatever you do, don't get hung up in the false teaching that you should be out there looking for "Mr. Right" and that there's some guy out there who's perfect for you. There's not. Every guy will have pros and cons. Every married girl will at some point feel like she settled. AWALT. AMALT. Don't hold extremely high standards. Hold biblical standards.

The guy I fell for was often homeless; constantly harassed by the authorities; his feet were dirty; he stunk often; he said things that extremely offended the type of people I would have wanted to impress; people hated him so much they tortured and murdered him. But he was a good man and a godly leader. I couldn't have asked for better. Not high standards, but biblical ones. Not to say attraction is bad - you SHOULD (MUST, even) be attracted for it to work; but you get my point.

[Discussion] Feminism & RedPillWomen

5 upvotes · 27 August 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

Peach it!

A Man and His Struggle

5 upvotes · 22 August 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Haha. Well played, sir.

Looking for advice, Need help. +Apology.

5 upvotes · 15 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I applaud your humility here brother, especially without sacrificing confidence. Maintain that balance. It will serve you well.

The Kingdom of God is a Party

5 upvotes · 12 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Can you give us an outline of some of his major points throughout the book?

The "Closer to God" Myth

5 upvotes · 3 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

are you saying that women make friends/disciples better by talking with each other

No. I'm saying that this is the natural feminine default strategy and that it is less effective at building healthy relationships than the natural masculine default strategy at building relationships.

Or were you saying that doing is needed by both parties to be most effective?

This one.

Disciple-making is most (only?) effective in longevity (i.e. beyond 2 generations) when authentic relationships are at the core. Note the balance in my posts: I posted first about the importance of building authentic relationships, unlike what the Church tells us, and then I go and criticize the focus on the relationship itself as the end-goal. That's because some people will experience the joy of authentic relationships and stop there. In reality, they must ascend to purposed relationships.

But neither of these authentic or purposed relationships are born on conversation alone. Even among women - and I have asked many - there is a general consensus that their closest friends in life were not the people they had deep conversations with, but the girls they had fun doing things together with - going to the movies, gabbing about things where the content of the conversation didn't actually matter, shopping, etc.

I'd be willing to bet a small fortune that the majority of women who are experiencing great loneliness are trying to build relationships through deep and personal conversation (and likely failing even at that) rather than by living life alongside one another.

That's why I referenced How I Met Your Mother and my wife wanting relationships like that - because they just hung out with each other a lot and it wasn't focused "let me get to know you better time" that comes off as extremely contrived, but it's goofing off about whatever happens to pop on your mind to talk about or to do together.

The Main Event

5 upvotes · 1 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

What you're describing is any boundary-setting conversation, not a main event. There's a huge difference between "I'm cutting off your checkbook" and "This relationship is over."

More Than Marriage: How churchianity has screwed up friendships too

5 upvotes · 1 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

As a matter of frame, capable alphas do what they want and are revered for it, incapable alphas do what they want and people hate them for it, capable betas do what others want and are rewarded for it (but not to the degree that they worked to get the reward), incapable betas do what others want and don't get rewarded so they become resentful, there is no such thing as a capable omega, incapable omegas have such low self esteem about their social capabilities that they do one of two things: (1) avoid all social interactions so they never have their frame challenged in the first place or never have to serve someone else's frame, or (2) totally give up on their own dignity by embarrassing themselves repeatedly through absurd social antics that they know will never succeed, ironically giving them just enough frame to appear alpha, which they can't maintain so they become beta when their alpha jokes finally work and they don't know what to do, after which their betaness ruins things for them and they're back to omega.

As a matter of sexuality, you're omega if you desperately crave sexual attention from women but can't get an attractive one interested in you, so you settle for bottom tier women or doing ridiculous things until one of them actually works.

Common traits: extremely skinny or obese, video game and porn addiction, low tier jobs, socially awkward, heavy emphasis on their internet persona over their real life.

116 - God is a jerk.

5 upvotes · 25 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The title is blasphemous

It's not meant to be controversial. It's meant to be a fact.

According to Google, a jerk is "a contemptibly obnoxious person." Presumably the jerk doesn't self-identify that way, so the definition is more about society's judgment of his behaviors. Society certainly shows contempt for God and regularly complains about things he does in the Bible, finding them obnoxious - or worse: cruel, vicious, and spiteful ... all characteristics we commonly associate with jerks.

The reality is that we do have a God who has done cruel, vicious, and spiteful things. By all accounts, with what society means when it uses the word "jerk" - God actually is a jerk.

The issue here is less about how we characterize God and more about why you have bought into the notion society has sold you: that being a jerk and having jerk-like qualities at times somehow makes you a bad person. The Bible never said, "God is not a jerk." It does say God is good and not evil and that he doesn't even tempt anyone to evil. That means that qualities that society describes as jerk-like need to be disassociated with their negative connotations as "evil" or "socially unacceptable" or even "morally repugnant" when we read the Bible, and instead try to read just the way we think about God and morality alongside socially unacceptable behaviors.

being a strong alpha man means to always raise others up. Perhaps not so up that they surpass us

Yes, absolutely so up that they surpass us. "Truly, truly, I say to you, whoever believes in me will also do the works that I do; and greater works than these will he do" - John 14:12. My proudest moments in making disciples are those when the guy I disciplined goes on to surpass me and do even greater things than I do - and, biblically, all of this works to my account as well as his.

116 - God is a jerk.

5 upvotes · 25 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

As long as that's wiser for your family, do it. Some men are just lazy and will let the bills sit in the mailbox for months. If that's what you'll degrade into, then don't take control just because you feel like the "manly thing to do" is to "take leadership of the finances." Delegate as appropriate. Of course, the better solution is to be the disciplined guy and get the job done right.

Just as playing nice is a tool that can work for you, so can delegating leadership authority. Learn when to play both cards.

Awesome girl that doesn't take care of herself

5 upvotes · 2 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I had the same concern about my wife before I married her. Mind you, I was pretty darn blue pill at the time, so I'm not condoning my thought process in those days. But she was very thin and attractive with horrible eating habits. She never exercised, ate whatever she wanted, and loved snack/junk food days.

Flash forward 14 years since we first met. She's still exactly the same: qualifiers aside, she generally still has horrible eating and exercise habits. And although she is slightly larger, she's still pretty thin overall. We went to a waterpark a couple weekends ago and out of literally hundreds (thousands?) of women 20+ she was easily in the top 5% for waist size. So, at least 11 years into marriage it hasn't manifested as a problem. I wish my genetics were that good to make my body as easy to maintain!

That's not to say this girl will have the same good fortune. She may have hit the genetic lottery, or maybe not. There was a study done at one point that by the age of 40 a person's body shape becomes extremely difficult to change. If you do manage to change it, your body will always want to go back to the shape it was in when you were 40 ... until you get around 70 or so, but that's another mess entirely.

All of that aside - why are you looking so much older? That's a decision you will almost certainly regret a decade into the marriage. My wife is a month and a half older than me and I've already felt that. Not that I would trade her in if God gave me a free pass to do so. She adds too much value to my life right now. But in the majority of cases and for a multitude of reasons, it's better to go younger. I joke now that a prime candidate for a wife is someone who is FAST and EASY:

- Faithful
- Available
- Saved
- Teachable

and

- Elegant
- Alluring
- Submissive
- Young

Those are traits I'd be looking for.

Gravitational Centers - A Case Study on the MRP Journey

5 upvotes · 12 June 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'm with you. Our state supreme court does have an 18 month docket before they start yelling at the judges for not getting it done.

Argue that she's using supervised visits for the shock value. It's like a woman's n count but in reverse. If she says 10, we believe 20 is more accurate. If she says to the court that your badness scale is "96", the court might believe you're 48, but you may actually be at 3. So, she says you're so bad your visits have to be supervised, knowing it'll never happen but hoping the fact that she made the request at all will cause the court to believe there is some merit to her feeling that way.

Best solution is just to call it out for what it is as plainly as I just did.

Also ...

I had the kids 70% of the time. I agreed to 50/50 cause I want my kids to see their mom.

I had a client who did this too. I told him not to. We had a GAL recommending he get custody. The psychologist recommended custody. The judge at the pretrial said he'd likely get custody and they all said mom should only get every other weekend. He insisted.

9 months later she filed for a modification - not even a year went by. Court said that because dad knew of all moms problems during the marriage and agreed to shared parenting anyway, he could no longer use that evidence in a modification case.

We still managed to get not one, but two psychologists in our corner (the other one was the opposing party's own expert witness!), the GAL and three school teachers all on our side. Mom only had herself. The judge still ordered shared parenting again, but with a slightly worse schedule for my client. His rationale: you agreed to shared parenting once, now you're stuck with it. I'm not going to change things on these kids just because she's throwing a fit now. You knew she was like this and that this would happen again - there's nothing new here.

Don't make the same mistake and assume you can fix it later if it doesn't work out.

Fiance withholding information about rape

5 upvotes · 31 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

and go to church a congregational meeting every sunday

FTFY. If you see me doing this with guys here more often it's part of a broader theological-linguistic differentiation that I do believe matters. More on that to come.

other girls who were raped ... don't like being touched and are generally not flirty with boys

A lot of this depends on the age it happened and which type of psychological fracture occurs. Girls who were raped at younger ages tend to have a disassociated experience, almost out-of-body-ish, to help them cope, which forms the basis for a borderline personality disorder. Borderline PD is often noted by being irrationally obsessive about relationships and demanding intense emotions from them, and negative emotions are better than no emotions at all. Borderlines are very volatile and are the type who cannot stay out of a relationship for longer than a few weeks at a time. This relational obsession makes them extremely sexual, as they see sexuality as a way of heightening the emotional state of the relationship and keeping their guy on the hook so they won't be abandoned.

The alternative is more common in women raped later on in life, which is what you said you noticed in other women. They have a clearer sense of self when the event happens, so it's harder to disassociate oneself from what's going on. This leads to a more direct trauma that's associated with masculine power over them, causing them to pull back when they see similar triggers in the future.

That's not to say that these patterns are true for everyone, as there are certainly some who break the mold. But this is a fairly common trend that I see in a lot of my cases that involve psychological evaluations.

she also didn't have any qualms doing sexual favors for me once things go heated between us (both of us are christians and she told me she believes in waiting for marriage)...Not sure if there is a link between that

This is characteristic of a borderline. Be cautious. Borderlines present as very normal, yet passionate in the first year or two of a relationship (mostly because NRE keeps their emotional thirst satiated), but their more negative qualities start to show when there is risk that the relationship might end or when the relationship becomes boring, after NRE ends (which is usually after about 2-3 years of dating or 6-24 months after marriage).

Has she ever been diagnosed for any mental health disorders? If she's not willing to get evaluated on her own, you could say you found a really extensive personality test online that's the most in-depth you've ever seen. Then give her one of the free MMPI2 versions floating around online (I can e-mail one if you need it). There's a website that gives slides showing which scales are evaluated to assess Borderline PD (or other PDs for that matter - maybe she's histrionic or something else entirely - or nothing at all). Either way, it's an easy way to get more insight here.

She said that's information that only a husband should have access to Huge red flag right there. If she's really moved on, then it shouldn't be such a big secret that she has to hide it. I know several girls who have been raped at all different ages and can now talk freely about it because they have found true freedom in Christ from the situation. If it's still a secret, it's still a problem for her. Period.

Also, she's intentionally denying you the ability to vet her for this being a problem. That leads me right back to the MMPI2 as my strongest recommendation. I'm less interested in the details of what happened and more interested in whether or not that manifested into a persistent psychological issue that you'll be dealing with forever. While personality disorders can technically be cured through secular means, it's a minimum of 2 years of intense therapy involving two weekly sessions - one individual and one group - through a method known as dialectic behavioral therapy. Most people deny having a personality disorder in the first place and believe even once diagnosed that it's just a bad diagnosis or that they are perfectly capable of controlling their issues. This is what makes PDs so dangerous: that people with them virtually always refuse to acknowledge them or do anything about them unless ordered by a court. I have seen Jesus cure personality disorders literally overnight (I'm one of them), but you cannot rely on this.

Worry less about the details of what happened and more about the fact that (1) she's withholding information relevant to your ability to assess her marriageability, and (2) she might have a long-term psychological issue that she'll never be willing to have treated.

Also, the fact that you both seem to be shamelessly sexually active with each other is somewhat concerning. On the one hand you seem to want to praise her for being a solid believer, but in the same sentence you're saying that her alleged commitment to Christ didn't matter to her - or even you - once emotions and arousal kicked in. That's playing with fire, brother.

I told her I still consider herself a virgin because it wasn't consensual ... she was damaged goods, I was shocked and told her again otherwise

Beta. Lying. Blue pill. Calling out what I see.

Don't bend over backwards to make her feel better about what happened. Yes, she's damaged goods. You've said it yourself: "I also told her that this means that the past isn't dealt with but rather it is still in the present." Her past has damaged her to the point where she's now using it to damage you. She is broken. Either reject that and move on or embrace it and redeem her.

When we were tainted by sin, we all became damaged goods. "No one is righteous, not even one," Romans 3 says. God didn't coddle us with lies about how it's "not your fault. Adam sinned and you just inherited it. If you had been in Adam's shoes and had control over the situation you never would have been in this mess. You're a good person who just had a bad roll of the dice."

No, Jesus's solution wasn't to lie to us about our status. It was to redeem us. To sanctify us. To reconcile us to God. You need to admit to her: "Yes, you're damaged goods. But just as God can redeem us, he has charged men to redeem the women in their lives, and I'm okay with that" - but only IF you actually want to proceed here. Just no more blue pill garbage about how she's still perfect and lovely and has no problems and so wonderful and idyllic in your mind. Take her off the pedestal.

she can lie effortlessly and has apologized for doing it to me before, to my knowledge this doesn't happen often Seriously? What type of hamstering did you have to do to write this sentence?

I'm scared brothers is this a red flag?

Yes, but only a huge one.

Anybody else feel like this?

5 upvotes · 16 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This post is an intriguing byproduct of living in a blue pill culture. "Guys, everyone gets so excited about relationships and dating and marriage. I feel like I should get excited about that too, but I don't. Is something wrong with me? I wish I wasn't this way."

Here you've innately escaped the cultural compulsions, but instead of embracing it for the theological beauty that it is, as /u/helaughsinhidden pointed out through key biblical passages ... the world has conditioned you to make you think you're the problem. Society would characterize you with a mental health disorder for not wanting the same things everyone else wants. God characterizes you as blessed because you don't desire the things of this world the same way everyone else does.

All of that being said, if I take your attitude a few steps further, it could lead to an impression that you're depressed. Do you have trouble motivating yourself to go to work? Do you isolate yourself from other men? When's the last time you went out to the movies or hiking or bike riding? Depressed people tend to lock themselves up in their houses and avoid these types of things - if you're not doing that, but you still lack desire for these things that the world obsesses over - that's a beautiful thing.

But when you say things like, "I'd like a family," but you can't explain how the thought of having a family excites you, it makes me think that you're still operating in blue pill conditioning. You want what everyone else has. You haven't embraced the red pill yet - that what everyone thinks everyone else has is a lie. Nobody has the family life that gets posted on Facebook or flashed on every TV screen. My guess is that when you say you'd like a family, you still have ideas about what that looks like - even if they're what most people would consider "realistic" ideas - which are rooted in blue pill thinking. I'd dig into that a bit more, if I were you, as this is what might be the tipping point between "I'm different" to "I'm depressed."

If you look at the passages that /u/helaughsinhidden cited, the reason God grants some people the gift of celibacy - which can easily include a disinterest in viewing women in a sexually exciting way - is to focus on the mission that he gave us.

What's your mission? Let's start there.

Power Prayers

5 upvotes · 15 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good stuff, brother. I like this. A relevant passage on praying for wisdom: James 1:5 - "If anyone lacks wisdom, let him ask God, who gives generously to all without finding fault, and it will be given to him."

More to the point of praying with confidence - 1 John 5:14-15 - "This is the confidence we have in approaching God: that if we ask anything according to his will, he hears us. And if we know that he hears us—whatever we ask—we know that we have what we asked of him."

The shocking truth: Betas not only live hell in this life, they often go to hell too. Defining the christian alpha.

5 upvotes · 15 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

the relationship is FOR the benefit of the one being disciplined or mentored

Or, as my discipler said, "I'm not discipling you for your own benefit. Sure, you'll benefit from it. But I'm really doing it for the benefit of the people that you'll disciple someday - and the people they'll disciple too." Think big! God's people had a generational mentality for millennia. Somehow we can't see past our own kids.

(F/R) It gets worse, but then better

5 upvotes · 11 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

thinking I was just not rewarding bad behavior, but looking at it to day...buthurt and using this behavior passive aggressively Withdrawing your time and attention as a means of "not rewarding bad behavior" is not something you do in the moment. If you do it in the midst of bad behavior it comes off as butt-hurt and passive-aggressive, as you've found, otherwise as controlling, manipulative, and callous, as other people have also found. Instead, you maintain frame in the moment, but simply find other things to do with your time later on that don't involve her. If she feels like you're punishing her, you're doing it wrong. Punishment is a display of weakness - as if you must resort to force and fear to get people to follow your lead. Always maintain frame. But if she's acting prissy and testing you left and right, why would you want to be with her in the first place? You won't, so you'll fill your time the next day with other things, like going to the gym.

Married Man Game Part 3: Sexting

5 upvotes · 5 March 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Indeed. Or instead of dropping it you roll with whatever she sends. Instead of nudes or cleavage you get a picture of her rolled up in a parka?

"I can feel the soft fuzz across my face right now as if I were leaning in for a kiss."

"I'd zip it down two inches."

"You grab my hand to stop me, a little nervous and uncomfortable."

"You couldn't stop me even if you were really trying."

"The parka you adorned yourself in was no longer the sign of modesty you meant it."

"It was a challenge."

"An invitation to explore the warmth hiding beneath its insulation."

"I look up to lock your eyes with mine."

"Without looking down, you unzip the next two inches."

"And then two more."

"Anticipation."

Celebrate!

5 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Amen!

How do you guys view/approach ghosting?

5 upvotes · 28 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Welcome. Ghosting can mean different things to different people, the main dichotomy being if you just drop off the face of the earth randomly or if you communicate an end and then drop off the face of the earth.

My dad's "cardinal rule" he gave me when I was in college was: "When it's over, it's over. You leave any room for her to worm back in and she'll take it." I found this to be true when I dumped my first girlfriend. She was awful. She acted like it was all cool to be "just friends," but she continually leveraged any time together to try to re-start the relationship, moving in to kiss me, asking to go on dates again, etc. - basically continuing the relationship just without calling it a relationship.

When I was ready to take my dad's wise advice, I communicated plainly: "This is done. We will not be getting back together. I don't want to lead you on." She still tried, so I started turning her down on everything. Then she'd show up to my dorm randomly or message me on the brand-new website that was exclusive to certain people in my university called "Facebook" or AOL Instant Messenger - and I kept hitting that block button.

Some people would call that total shut-down of communication ghosting. Others would say it isn't because I told her in advance that I didn't want to communicate anymore. Take your pick. That's how I'd handle things. But as u/mado55 said, if there are any creepy or unsafe vibes going around, maybe don't even give that warning. I'm sure it sucks being ghosted, but you don't owe her anything and she doesn't owe you anything. Just accept it and move on.

What do you Christians think of MGTOW?

5 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

There's a difference between MGTOW and celibacy, as /u/Deep_Strength and /u/Hannelore010 alluded to.

- Celibacy is a spiritual gift/discipline of a man choosing to remain single and separate from all sexual activity in order to devote himself entirely to God.
- MGTOW is an undefined protest against relational structures currently existing in the sexual marketplace for a variety of reasons.
 - First wave MGTOWs are generally men who were hurt by women, became whiny about it and decided never to get involved again. It was a retaliation effort.
 - Second wave MGTOWs are generally men who couldn't get women in the first place, so they gave up before even trying, joining the band wagon with what the first crowd were doing.
 - While they manosphere hasn't titled them as anything, there are other MGTOWs who actually do chase after sex, they just refuse to get married.
 - There are other MGTOWs who are perfectly fine with both sex and private marriage, as long as it isn't state-enforced.
 - Some MGTOWs are protesting the gender bias in laws; others are protesting the horrendous social treatment of women against men; others aren't protesting anything, but are simply making a decision that they believe is wise
 - There are also countless stories of men who claim to be MGTOW, but then as soon as a hot enough girl shows them interest, they abandon their MGTOW ways and are off into the sunset with the woman they swore they'd never shack up with

I fully endorse celibacy. While I greatly empathize with the MGTOW crowd, I cannot condone the motivation behind their decision. Romans 14:23 is clear enough: "Anything that does not come from faith is sin." 1 Cor. 7 gives a clear enough faith-based reason to stay single. If your rationale is limited to the secular MGTOW rationale, it's not faith-based. If, however, the MGTOW rationale is what caused you to choose the celibate route, then it's perfectly appropriate.

"I saw how awful it is to be a man under today's laws and sexual marketplace and decided I wanted nothing to do with it and that our country needed to change. What was I to do with all of my extra time that I'm not chasing women? I'm going to pursue my mission for God." That's a perfectly appropriate framework within which to be a Christian MGTOW.

For Single Guys - An Intro to the Red Pill, A few pieces of advice, and a Farewell

5 upvotes · 22 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

In all our conversations this is one of the better posts I've seen from you. While there are several things that could use some tweaking, I appreciate what you're trying to do here.

Instead of spending all your time plotting and scheming on how to have sex with women, seek God's Kingdom first. Red Curious objected to me saying this as it's vague.

Let me be clear on this: I'm not saying "seek God's Kingdom first" isn't valuable. I'm only saying that it's not marriage advice. If a guy comes in here on the brink of divorce and that's the best you've got for him, how many of those men do you think will end up divorced and how many will get married? Because I promise they've already heard that advice in the church and the stats are what the stats are.

My objection wasn't to your saying this. I agree with the advice. What I had a problem with was you criticizing the advice on this sub without giving any advice in exchange. It's like saying our health care system in America is screwed up and posting article after article about all its problems, but never actually proposing a better plan. The closest you ever come is saying: "Instead of our current health care system, we should all just focus on having better health insurance." Yes, this is a great goal. But it has no practical value.

Countless men already know that they should be following God and living by the Spirit and seeking His Kingdom. Without clearer instruction, the way most men try to live these ideals still ends up being just as screwed up as if they'd never received the advice in the first place. Many of the blue pill pastors who have ruined the lives of millions of men and women with their horrendous views on marriage firmly believe that they are following your advice. That is why it is objectionable advice. You can't criticize a structure without suggesting a replacement.

That said, I do appreciate many of your suggested replacements that are finally enumerated in this post, although they're clearly not targeted at restoring broken marriages. They're good general principles to live by. But they're also the same as going on a Christian finance website and tell people struggling through severe indebtedness on the verge of bankruptcy that the best way to be a good steward of your wealth is to love God. Yes, it's true. But it has no practical value in the context of their need.

it's not something to study for life, it's something you internalize and go on with

I couldn't agree more! I hope one day that you do internalize it.

How screwed am I? 12 questions from Beta Bucks

5 upvotes · 19 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I really appreciated this. Would you be at all interested in writing up a post on the importance of evaluating RMV in women instead of just SMV?

That is, SMV can be sized up with a single glance. "How bad do I want to bang her?" is pretty much all we ask ourselves before assessing a girl's SMV. But her Relationship Market Value is something often overlooked.

For the secular world, especially the TRP guys (as opposed to MRP), they're not interested in marriage in the first place. The "relationship" only has value to the degree that it gratifies sexuality, and therefore a woman's SMV is all that matters. In the reverse, from your time on r/redpillwomen I'm sure you'll recall just how much RMV comes up, as they're more interested in locking down their glorious leader than in raw physical attraction. For the Christian, if marriage is going to happen, all of the things you're telling u/macmeeler are things that need to go into consideration of a woman's potential, and a post on this could really help a guy vet.

Not to get too numerical, but it might even be nice to break it down:

- 2 points for her financial responsibility. 1 based on the debt she brings to the table (relative to your income potential) and 1 based on her ordinary spending habits.
- 1 point for being saved
- 1 point for living out her faith, maintaining boundaries against sin (ex. not sleeping together or having oral in the first week you met), etc.
- 2 points for low n count
- 1 point for mental stability, no personality disorders, no scars from her parents, etc.
- 1 point for being submissive

... you get the idea. I'm just throwing random numbers out there. My guess is, though, that when most guys make such an assessment they're going to find that the "perfect girl" is really nowhere near what they expected, and this will help men start to pick up the cues that you often talk about when you encourage them with ways to vet - and I've always loved your posts on vetting more than anything I would write on the subject.

Just thinking as I type, maybe it's more of a flow chart before you can even get to calculating an SMV first. Like, the first bubble would say "Christian?" and if it's a yes, then you proceed to two more questions that should also be disqualifiers: "Actively living out her faith?" and "Any significant sin issues, or susceptibility to temptation?" Then if those questions are passed, you can get on to evaluating RMV. Anyway ... thoughts?

Ideas to consider for men who follow Jesus...

5 upvotes · 11 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Props to /u/Deep_Strength and /u/ActualTransition for some well-thought-out answers. Let me make this much simpler:

1. The sole goal and focus of RPC is to get men living the way God wants them living. The majority of that focus is on developing a man's mission (see numerous posts from 100 and 200 series) and establishing him in godliness (300 and 400 series).
2. 1 Cor. 7 says that one of the major things that can distract a man from serving God is marriage. This is especially true when marriages don't reflect God's intentions.
3. One of the primary reasons that marriages become ungodly is an unhealthy sexual dynamic. A cure to sexual dynamic issues is necessary to get these men back on track. That is, sex and relationships are the context, but the Gospel is always the cure, and the mission of Matthew 28:19-20 is the reason why it's worth curing in the first place.

One way or another, sex is something God created. God has a purpose for sexuality, which is directly related to the mission of Matthew 28:19-20, as I have explained many times here. If people have sexual problems, someone has to be willing to talk about them with biblical answers that are actually helpful. The church has failed. God's mission is our focus, but we must be willing to address all hindrances to our living out that mission. This sub has targeted men whose sexual and relational issues are their biggest hindrance. Saying, "Live by the Holy Spirit" is unhelpful when men can't figure out how to do that because they can't see past their sexual and relational problems.

As has already been noted here, no one is saying, "You should try to get the highest SMV woman you can." That is not RPC's goal. What we do say is, "If you want a high SMV woman to satisfy your sexuality within the confines of marriage so that sex isn't a distraction to you anymore, here's how," or, "If you are already married and sex is a problem holding you back from your mission, here are ways to improve yourself that can be simultaneously beneficial to your mission and your sex life."

All of that being said, what I don't appreciate - and you're lucky I didn't see this post earlier - is people accusing us of believing or teaching something that we don't. This comes up repeatedly here: "You all think blah, blah blah, but the Bible says this instead ..." Most of the time, "blah blah blah" is something that they read on TRP or MRP that they assume we say too, or that they assume just because of the "red pill" name that we must automatically have the same goals and purposes of every other red pill forum.

This is simple and plain ignorance.

Tag: /u/rocknrollchuck

Finished the 200s, - Question Alpha Positive

5 upvotes · 1 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Stoic doesn't mean robotic. It means that you are unphased by negative influences. So, if you were practicing stoicism in ancient Rome and an arrow went through your shoulder in battle, you were fighting before, so you kept fighting. If you're laughing with friends and your wife disrespects you, you keep laughing with your friends, unphased by her comment. Don't go cold. Just continue as you were before the negative or painful experience. Going robotic when you weren't robotic is the opposite of stoicism: it's breaking frame and allowing yourself to be affected by someone else's behaviors.

Ironically, I wrote in that post: "Most guys think this 'robot mode' is the same as 'being stoic' (for example). It's not." What you're saying about yourself and what you learned from this post is the exact opposite of what I actually said in the post ;)

My favorite passage on "alpha positive" or true stoicism is Paul and Silas in Prison, in Acts 16. They've been beaten and jailed ... and what do they do? They're singing songs and praising God. No matter what torture they took, their hearts and attitudes were positive and uplifting to God.

What "clicked" for me? When I started focusing on my mission and realized that the stupid things my wife got upset about didn't matter to God. She matters to me, but my mission matters more. Her job is to help me with my mission, not distract me from it. That's the mental shift that needs to take place.

Too Little, Too Much

5 upvotes · 23 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Because no one can vet perfectly and AWA still LT.

My wife is a great example. I thought I vetted carefully. She was hot, stayed in good shape, actively discipling other women, could hold deep theological conversations, memorized new scripture weekly, etc. I got the opinion of other godly people who knew her better than I did and they all affirmed she was great wife material.

Several years after we married and I grew sick of dealing with an entirely different woman from when we were dating, I confronted her about it and she admitted that she had been faking it since we first met in order to get me to marry her. Once she got married she didn't feel like faking it for much longer.

You think you can vet, but no amount of vetting will prepare you for everything.

Too Little, Too Much

5 upvotes · 22 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm sure I would have more trouble being detached. That is a serious thing and has serious ramifications.

Ergo the dangers of having "too little" trust. The goal isn't to be detached from your spouse. It's to be attached in a healthy way rather than an unhealthy way - and to know that if you were forcibly detached from your spouse (death, infidelity, divorce, etc.) that you are okay because you have God, other options, internal emotional stability, etc.

What is the Christian RP Advice to a Wife for Getting Her Husband to Change?

5 upvotes · 17 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I wrote a post on this exact subject a while back. Feel free to skim for it in my history.

That said, we divorce lawyers have a saying when a client gripes about their spouse: You're the one who married him. We also often say, I don't have a magic wand. At some point they need to take ownership of their poor decisions:

- the failure to vet him properly
- the nagging and complaining
- the sexual denial
- the defiance and disrespect

Most people don't recognize their own contributions to their problems. They go to you for advice, hoping you'll give them a magical formula to undo the consequences of all their bad decisions and behaviors. Imagine someone telling you his mom died last year and he wants you to give some advice on how to bring her back. You can't give him what he wants. You can only help him cope with a bad situation.

Now, on a larger scale, the reason these guys go passive is twofold. First: internet sin. It's part of the male struggle since Adam. Get him saved and following Jesus, to start.

Second, society now punishes masculinity in marriage rather than rewarding it. If guys aren't being rewarded for taking on the responsibilities of being men, they're never going to "man up." This root really needs to be resolved at a societal level before application in the home can garner consistent and appreciable results.

A woman can try to condition her man through positive and negative reinforcement, but I haven't met many women who can maintain stoicism consistently enough to align their responses and his behaviors properly in the long run to make this feasible. Plus, it can easily become sin for a woman to employ certain types of negative reinforcement on her husband, as this is often disrespectful and manifests as her leading him.

I prefer my method of negative discipleship, per the post I referenced.

We've done it, guys. "Traditional Masculinity" is now officially deemed "harmful" by the American Psychological Association. High-five to culture!

5 upvotes · 11 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

True ... but this one can have far greater implications than most of the other stuff I see, particularly in family courts.

Life Lesson: Treachery of women even within the church

5 upvotes · 9 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

After the first divorce, I remarried 4 months later

I hate pop acronyms, but this one actually deserves it: SMH.

in an attempt to 'Set a good example for my children

Because a "good example" to them is teaching them that men should be married and that God didn't really mean all those things in 1 Cor. 7? A more balanced approach needs to be given.

But let's be honest: you remarried because you wanted the validation that you believed only a new wife could give. It wasn't a "fixation on sex." You wanted to prove that you could screw another woman and get marriage right, immediately after seeing your first marriage tanking.

but 4 years into marriage has become a card carrying feminist

And then you discovered that you weren't going to get that validation and success story. Joy.

This intentional change has been revolutionary for me in every way— Physically, Mentally, Spiritually— in spite of the conflict that ensues with every step I take forward.

Uh huh. Sounds Rambo-ish to me.

This one will end in flames eventually too unless she miraculously gets with the program.

Yep, a very Rambo thing to say.

and my mission now is to hopefully keep young guys from repeating history

How is she going to help you with this mission?

Find a woman who WANTS TO BE A WIFE... a homemaker; a mother; a woman that Wants to cook and clean

Yeah, but that's not what I wanted out of my wife. I wanted to do all the cooking. I wanted my wife to be working and remaining financially competitive and hiring out the cleaning or taking charge of maintaining the house myself. Guys want different things. Be cautious of giving advice on false assumptions. Her biblical role is to follow your lead, not to do dishes and vacuum the floor. If you lead her into doing those things, then she should follow; but if you lead her down another path, she should go down the other path instead.

a woman who ... a woman who ... a woman who ...

That all sounds great, but you're also describing a unicorn ... because implicit is that she'll do all these things and also not cheat on you, not divorce you, not blow all your money without telling you, etc. What if I got a woman who did everything on your list, but she cheated on me weekly? Would that be any better? You see, the things you've listed are nice perks, but they're also peripheral ones. If you're getting worked up over peripheral things, there's a bigger internal problem that you need to work through.

This sounds old-fashioned and archaic, but it's the only way that a marriage will last for the long term.

Again, I could have a marriage that works incredibly well with a woman who doesn't want to cook. I know because I married a woman like that. Or a woman who works rather than being a homemaker - because my wife works and defers a lot of homemaking responsibilities to others.

What you're describing is what you want out of a relationship and concluding that "the only way that a marriage will last for the long term" is if it's a marriage aligned with your goals, purposes, and desires. And for you, you might be exactly right. But for guys who have other missions in life and different plans for how they want to utilize their wife's assistance in that mission ... well, then different lists need to be created about how to vet and what to expect the role balances to be.

Should I ask my ex-wife to meet?

5 upvotes · 13 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

If you're whole and at peace, you're whole and at peace. No need to go to her.

If you're not whole and at peace, talking to her isn't going to give that to you. Jesus will.

If she's not whole or at peace with the situation, it's her business to come to you if/when she wants to tie off loose ends.

Shame Case Study #1: How To Recognize Shame and Its triggers

5 upvotes · 11 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You're over-reaching. Not every comment that you don't agree with is an effort to shame you.

- Sometimes blunt truth is necessary and appropriate.
- Sometimes the person just wants to help, but isn't great at communicating their intentions in online text.
- Sometimes it's a well-warranted rebuke and not an attempt to shame someone.

I haven't gotten to your previous posts on shame yet, but I'm seeing some serious cognitive dissonance here. On the one hand, you seem to be condemning shaming, but on the other, as /u/Uncommon_Sensed_1234 pointed out, you're shaming someone else for posting something you didn't like. So what is it: is shaming wrong for everyone but you, or is this post just massively hypocritical?

Let me step back for a second. Shame is not something anyone else can give you. It's internally decided by the person who either will/won't experience it. If I pee my pants in court, no one can make me ashamed of that. I could flaunt it around as a sign of how confident I am - that I could do something absurd like that and still carry on ... just like Donald Trump saying he could shoot a man in broad daylight and not lose any voters. That doesn't mean it's a good idea to do it - it just shows the degree of confidence a person has within their own frame, and how immune they are to shame.

In the reverse, entirely devoid of any outward influences at all, someone can still experience shame simply from their own internalized perspective of their life and worldview.

When we talk about "shaming" as an active thing one person does to another, it's an intentional effort to cause someone to feel ashamed. It doesn't mean that person has the power to actually make anyone feel ashamed.

People attempt to shame me all the time. As a lawyer, it's part of my job. That doesn't mean they have the power to make me actually experience shame.

Accordingly, if shame is something that you can internally control on your own, rather than blaming someone else for shaming you, work harder at not feeling ashamed on your own. And certainly don't make up a post DEERING against some guy who likely didn't intend to shame you at all. And don't over-reach the extent to which shame actually applies.

Now, what you're probably referring to is not shame at all. It's humiliation. Humility is an internal state of being, much like shame. But humiliation is an external perception about someone. Whether humiliation causes someone to feel humbled or ashamed is up to that individual person. But the effect of external "shaming" is that other people take on a lesser view of the person being "shamed" or "humiliated."

This isn't anything any different from basic frame-mastery anyway. The ordinary responsive techniques apply. Your wife tries to humiliate you during an argument? Fog, negative inquiry, etc. Girl at the bar makes fun of you for being too short? Agree and amplify.

The only time humiliation can really negatively affect you is with people who don't actually know you. People can try to humiliate the president, for example, because few people reading the media posts actually know the president in person - what he's like when he's not publicly broadcasting something. That can have peripheral effects if your public perception actually matters to your life mission - but even then, it's only if you are an important enough figure to have a public perception in the first place.

To that end, I don't see any real discussion on the only viable danger of external shaming/humiliation. I just see you trying to shame someone for giving you blunt constructive feedback.

That being said, I do agree with the commenter that I don't see much biblical reference in your posts. I'm not shaming you by saying that. I'm making an observation to inform you that this reflects poorly on your credibility when you speak. Are you trying to speak from your own authority or from God's? If from God's, then let God speak.

I often write on the three foundations of a person's beliefs: philosophy, science, theology. You seem to use a lot of philosophical thinking. People here are looking for theological conclusions. If the crowd is looking for theology and they get philosophy, you're going to get some push-back. Theology trumps philosophy. Philosophical reasoning should inherently warrant skepticism. Go to Scripture and that skepticism dies down.

Lastly: please fix whatever editor you're using that makes your comment text bigger. It's really annoying and comes off like you think whatever you say should stand out more than what everyone else says.

BF hasn't said I love you...

5 upvotes · 2 November 2018 · /r/RedPillWomen

Infatuation fades

So you do agree with this.

However, it should transition into a deeper companionate love over time.

This is often called pair-bonding, not love.

Dependent familiarity is another way it can manifest - when someone becomes emotionally invested in maintaining a certain degree of stability in the circumstances that are most familiar to them. To that end, most people who experience this are not actually feeling an emotion they would call "love" for their SO; they're experiencing an emotional dependence on the fact that losing something so familiar to them would mean change, which would be difficult, and thus unpleasant. This is also quite a different thing from actual love.

Fair points on the rest :) It's just worth noting that him saying "ILY" to her doesn't actually resolve the "Knowing he loves you is important to feeling secure in the relationship" bit because the words themselves are unreliable, as the actions are the proof. While I agree that it's preferable to have the words also, I do believe the actions can stand alone without the words (whether they should is a different conversation altogether).

How to date "evenly" as a Christian

5 upvotes · 1 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

No, you're not on the subservient end no matter what. Hypergamy is your out - to just have to be high value enough. Your value to her is one of two things:

1. That she's incredibly attracted to you and wants to gratify that attraction by being around you.
2. The tangible things you have to offer her: money, protection, acts of service, buying gifts, etc.

If 1 doesn't apply, she evaluates 2. If she's still young and capable of pulling guys she's actually attracted to, she will always preference 1 over 2.

If you're high into category 1 to her, you don't need any of category 2 to maintain her. But it works like a scale. If you drop a point in 1, you have to add a point in 2.

As for cooking, cleaning and finances, who does those things for you now? Can't you just outsource those things anyway? You don't really need her to help with those things. They're just a convenience.

Same with the other things. You can pay for consultants who will cost far less and be far more qualified.

Seriously: think of all the money you will spend on a wife in your lifetime. Then think about the cost to outsource what she would do. If you use that as a rubric, I've done the math and the cost of outsourcing is cheaper every time.

What things will she do for you that you can't outsource or where the cost to outsource it would vastly exceed the excess in the cost of marriage. That's where you're really finding your value from her.

u/osmiumzulu once said that everything can be outsourced except sex (at least for the Christian). So, sex has a clear value for a Christian man in looking for a wife.

The relational connections in life are another thing that cannot be easily outsourced. I have several men I have discipled in life who I would never have been able to connect with on that level if it wasn't for my wife meeting their wives and inviting them for dinner. That can't be outsourced, and it directly helps my mission of disciple-making - just as having sex and birthing kids gives me more disciples to make - even more devoted ones than the strangers I learn to love.

But I can assess those things because I know my mission and her role in it - and in many other ways she has a vital role in my life too. I don't value the things I can outsource as much, and I do often outsource them, or just do it myself.

So, don't give copout answers just to hamster some rationalization for wanting to get married.

Boldly sharing the Gospel - is it unloving?

5 upvotes · 30 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I should also note that by definition, "follow Jesus" assumes you're giving them a mission. Jesus isn't stagnant. He's on the move. He's doing things. If he's going somewhere, he has a purpose for going there.

If a squire is told to follow his knight, or a knight to follow his king, this doesn't mean to literally just follow them around, though that can happen. It's not like Jesus is walking ahead and we're trailing behind, following him. It's more like the fact that the squire adopts the purposes of the knight and helps him with them. The knight adopts the purposes of the king and helps him with them. A wife adopts the purposes of her husband and helps him with them. That's what it means to "follow Jesus" - not merely to trail behind in the same general direction.

So, when we tell someone to "follow Jesus" we have to tell them what Jesus's purposes are that they should be adopting, otherwise we're leaving them to figure that on their own, which is incredibly dangerous. That's why most Gospel presentations that don't include some basic, fundamental vision-casting for the new believer ultimately result in believers who wander aimlessly, plug into a church, sit in a pew, maybe volunteer on the worship team or in the kids' ministry, and think they're fine.

This would be akin to Launcelot telling a potential recruit: "How would you like to live in King Arthur's castle? All you have to do is affirm that He is your King and then try not to get into any trouble while you live there. That's really all you need to know about being a knight. You can figure the rest out as you go."

Then, when he joins the fray and Arthur sends him on his first quest, what's going to happen? Either the guy's going to pee his pants, terrified that he's actually being asked to do something and isn't at all prepared, or he's going to quit and say that he didn't sign up for that.

Even worse would be of Launcelot were being honest about how difficult the life of a knight would be, lest the new recruit get the wrong impression about how fancy and pampered things must be living in the castle.

But in reality, people in the old days - and every story of lore ever told on the topic - wanted to be knights not because of the pampering, but because they wanted to be part of something bigger. They wanted a quest - a mission. They longed for adventure and a role to play in something that actually mattered.

This is why my neighbor, who I referenced in my other comment, ultimately joined the air force. It's why men join sports teams and vie for the championship - not because it's a cush life playing sports, but because the challenge of pursuing a goal that matters to you is very alluring and gives your life a purpose. It's why men join RP forums in the first place: because they're lost and aimless and they need someone to orient their lives toward something that they can strive to achieve - whether that's weight lifting goals, sexual activity milestones, a level of respect from a spouse, etc.

To tell someone, "Join our team, come live in our castle, and be friends with our community" and yet not tell them anything about what that community's purpose and goals are - I'm just not sure what we're accomplishing, and I somewhat agree with my pastor that it begs the question of whether or not the person is actually saved in the first place, if their only impression of the faith is, "Jesus saves you from your sin, so believe in him and try to avoid doing bad things."

That makes it seem like the community itself has no aim or purpose - that it exists merely to survive and keep people as civil with one another as possible. How's that any different from the rest of the secular world? And yet even every secular government has goals and agendas that it recruits people to assist with.

And what's truly terrifying in all of this is the parable of the fig tree. I'll quote it here for easy reference:

"A man had a fig tree planted in his vineyard, and he came seeking fruit on it and found none. 7 And he said to the vinedresser, 'Look, for three years now I have come seeking fruit on this fig tree, and I find none. Cut it down. Why should it use up the ground?' 8 And he answered him, 'Sir, let it alone this year also, until I dig around it and put on manure. 9 Then if it should bear fruit next year, well and good; but if not, you can cut it down.'"

If you already agree that discipleship/evangelism - the mission Jesus calls us to - is what Jesus means by fruit, and we're not imparting that mission to people from the get-go, aren't we setting them up to be cut down? Every newly planted seed knows in its genetic coding that it is growing toward eventually bearing fruit - that's the reproductive imperative in all of God's living creations. But if we fail to impart that coding into the seeds that we're spreading - that we're spreading sterile seeds - how can they grow up to produce good fruit later? We're dooming them to fail.

Even if one wanted to argue that the mission can be given after salvation and not during evangelism, doesn't that still function as a bait-and-switch? We're telling people, "Do this so you can avoid going to hell, and it's a free gift!" but then turning around two weeks later and saying, "Yeah, it was a free gift, but you still have obligations, and if you don't live up to those obligations your heart might get callous and maybe you'll lose your salvation or you just weren't ever really saved to begin with until you start adopting these other things that I didn't tell you about before."

Also, if "following Jesus" is part of the criteria for salvation, and not mere intellectual acknowledgment of the factual events of the Gospel, then how can we ever claim that someone has been saved through our efforts if we have never elaborated what it means to follow Jesus?

To be clear, I'm not advocating for works-based soteriology. Grace through faith is certainly what saves. But if we flesh out what "faith" really means in a biblical context (which I believe I have done in the 400 series), we see the same conclusion that James 2 reaches: that intellectual assent in the absence of any actual reorientation of a person's heart toward living out God's purposes in our own lives begs the quite rhetorical question: "Can such faith save them?"

Ok, I'm done now. Sorry, this is just such a huge topic :p

Losing feelings for my wife

5 upvotes · 26 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I get lots of guys who have brought up this exact issue, including before my RP days. My answer hasn't changed:

"What should I do if I feel like I don't love my wife anymore?"

Now, when a Christian tells me something like this, my typical answer is this: "That's sin. Stop doing that." They get confused and say they're not doing anything. "Okay, then start doing all the things you're supposed to be doing." They get confused again and say they're doing the best they can, but it's somehow "never enough."

Now, at that point I pretend to be confused and say, "I thought you said you didn't love your spouse? But now you're telling me you really have been loving her all along. What's the real story?"

That's when the core of it comes out: "No, I meant that I'm not IN LOVE with my wife anymore. I don't FEEL the same way I used to."

Phew, I thought they had a much more critical problem. Jesus didn't say, "Whoever has gushy feelings for me is the one who loves me." He said, "Whoever has my commands and obeys them is the one who loves me" (John 14:21).

If your actions are on board, then you are appropriately loving your wife, even if your heart isn't in it. Don't worry, it'll catch up again in time (though the "how" of it is something I don't have to get into just yet).

Goodness ... how awful would it be if I was accused of not loving God every time I had a dry quiet time or I didn't have an emotional moment during worship?

So, when we ask: "What should I do if I don't love my spouse anymore?" that's the same thing as saying, "I don't feel like obeying God. What should I do?" The answer is obvious: obey God anyway. Likewise, with the question at hand (not to be confused with "obey your wife" - different authoritative roles at play here), the answer is obvious: love your wife anyway.

I'll follow up with the emotional side of it if I have some time later.

On Biblical Justice and Rape

5 upvotes · 9 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I have an answer, but will follow up soon - deadline in 15 minutes and I just procrastinated too long typing that :p

"I think I was just raped"

5 upvotes · 8 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I wrote this post after-the-fact, knowing that it wasn't actually rape. So, rather than mislead a reader and make them think it's rape only to discover otherwise later on, I try to be more up-front with my textual clues about the actual conclusion.

Frame is impossible without abundance

5 upvotes · 6 October 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The metaphor is decent. That said, abundance makes frame easier, but it isn't essential to have frame. DNGAF and having a mission beyond the marriage are better sources of frame. A guy can have zero abundance, but maintain frame because he's got more important crap to do than worry about whether or not his wife will yell at him for doing it.

It just happens to be that if you replace if we replace "crap" with "girls," abundance fits in as one component of this greater context.

Cut off my best friend/oneitis and now she's blowing up my phone. How should I handle this?

5 upvotes · 1 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Hmm ... (1) Christian - potentially even a mature one, as she's wanting to share her faith; (2) single; (3) hot ... and for good measure: (4) obviously willing to follow you wherever you go, even if the only place you're going is away from her. This girl destroys the "pick 2 of 3" rule. That said, you're pretty insistent that she's not marriageable, and I'll just take you at your word and assume she's got to be a psycho nut job in certain ways.

As Deep said, you've got to take her off the pedestal. You don't want to marry her, but you do want to have sex with her. Great, you've just proven you're a guy. Why would sex with her be so spectacular in the first place? To give an old crude, yet aptly puissant /u/bluepillprofessor quote: "One wet hole is the same as the next."

Let's get to the heart of the issue, though: What's your frame?

You feel like you have to respond. That's her frame. She wants an answer. She has emotions that she's waving in your face to make you respond. If you want to respond, fine. Do it. But if you don't want to, why should her emotional reaction to your silence affect you that way? You're not her boyfriend. You don't owe her anything. You have no obligations here.

Your life mission determines the orientation of your frame. You haven't shared what it is. I'll take a stab in the dark and assume it has something to do with evangelism and apologetics, though I'm giving you a lot more credit here than I think your post would indicate. She's providing an opportunity to extend your evangelistic and apologetic influence into a new community through her. That sounds like a golden opportunity served on a silver platter. If you could maintain frame while coaching her through this, that'd be perfect.

But you can't. That's weakness. She knows you have a weakness for her. How does she know? Because she's a good looking girl. She assumes every guy has a weakness for her. She's probably right. She's baffled because you don't want to talk to her anymore, right? Why do you think that is? "Because girls take that stuff personally." No. Because her world view is shattered when she realizes there's a guy out there who isn't crawling on his hands and knees begging to kiss her feet. Instead of finding it unusual that there's a guy who has shown interest in her, she's confounded at the fact that you're not. Think on that for a while and take her off the pedestal.

What makes you wise here is that you know your boundaries. You recognize that your mission will be compromised if you take her silver-platter offer. Was it rude of you to ghost her? Sure. But there's no verse that says, "Thou shalt not be rude." Jesus was quite rude to the pharisees when they called him out. He was also downright rude to the Syrophoenician woman who pleaded for his help. I'm rude to the telemarketer who calls and I hang up before they finish their sentence. There's nothing wrong with being a little rude.

What are you to do? Ideally, you'd get your internal point of origin straightened out, develop some discipline, and go advance your mission while making it clear to her that you're not interested. But if you can't do that safely, either keep ghosting her or, given that you've already told her you'd call her, be a man of your word: make the call and tell her what's what.

Kavanaugh - the loss of rationality

5 upvotes · 28 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I am a moderate but right leaning. If a democrat has a good idea, I call it good. If a republican has a good idea, I call it good.

By that definition, I'd be a moderate too. But what do I call myself when I find 9 good ideas on the right for every 1 good idea on the left? In short, this is a great way to try to diffuse any debate over your political position by declining to address what ideas you think are good or bad ;)

no one can call out their immature behavior

Well, to be fair, you did. So did several people in the comments below the video you linked. People do all the time. The media just doesn't report on those views; they only report on the views of the women. That's what you're really getting at.

There MUST MUST MUST be some standard of law or procedure that we hold people to in order to convict them of wrongdoing.

There is. For criminal issues it's "proof beyond a reasonable doubt." For most civil issues it's "a preponderance of the evidence."

Do I know 100% that he didn't sexually assault someone? No. But that's not the question here - the question is if they presented a case to show that he did. They didn't.

Innocent until proven guilty. That said, I think one of u/rollo-tomassi's posts references a popular blogger who was suggesting that on rape and sexual assault allegations all women should be believed no matter what - because the risk of letting a perpetrator go was worse than the risk of putting an innocent person in jail. It's pretty ridiculous, but that's the nature of modern day feminists.

I know this is a RPChristian forum and possibly political discussions don't belong

It's welcome as long as it focuses on the issues and not a party line. Feminism is a clear issue that is relevant to this subreddit.

HOWEVER we as judges or rulers (if we are to have order) must have a standard to follow and emotion/empathy are not standards.

Let me be clear here: you're citing an outburst that happened which the media covered. There were no negative ramifications. No one was judged. The senator is not going to jail because these women decided to yell at him. The justice candidate didn't lose his position because of this episode. Yes, in the aggregate these types of things definitely sway opinion and affect judgments and policy on the whole. But what makes their strategy so dangerously effective is that no one can pin point one incident that caused the tipping point. No one can watch this video and say, "That's the one that got that candidate booted from consideration."

I fear America is falling

America isn't falling because some women yelled at a senator. It's falling because the media portrays these episodes in a way that will influence the next election. CNN has no power to judge the senator or the judicial candidate. What they do have power over is to report on what the real authoritarians do/say in a way that makes sure they don't keep their authority after the next election.

The fact that Trump was elected is something of a miracle in the face of the modern media - but it also shows you just how much of a stirring there is among those who aren't influenced by the media. It takes a massive conviction to go against the grain of cultural pressures like that, and the sheer fact that Trump won even with the media pushing hard democrat makes me wonder how lop-sided things would be if the media switched positions and started leaning even 1/10th to the right as they do to the left. Or more to the point, if the media were less biased in the first place and actually stood in the middle, how much more room would the right have to breathe?

How to Play the Game

5 upvotes · 25 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Great post, brother!

Until she clearly wants commitment from you, don't have interest in commitment with her. How quickly are you willing to give her your commitment?

This is huge for guys who are dating. This is the key to preventing ONEitis and to maintaining a position of dominance that is highly attractive.

I remember when dating my wife I made a comment one day: "I'm so lucky, I bet other guys wonder how I got so lucky to end up with a girl like you." My wife was mortified. It was probably the dumbest thing I have ever said to her - and I thought I was being romantic and giving her some feel-good flattery. Her reply? "That's awful! I don't want people thinking I'd be willing to date some loser." She was open about her hypergamy before either of us even knew that word existed.

That was one of my early red pill lessons: she wanted a guy who was better than her. Too bad I didn't know how to apply it. My solution was to act like I was a step above her - because that's what would make her happy. What an awful confusion of alpha traits in a beta frame.

I was giving her my commitment and expecting hers in return. Know what happened? She dumped me. After three days of crying and whining and begging and pleading she took me back. She knew I'd give her anything she wanted - and that set the tone for those first 7-8 years of marriage that I always talk about as being pretty darn awful.

All the techniques for passing girls' tests circulating Red Pill have this concept at their core. Being above the game.

This is pretty much what I was getting at my my "Comparison Game and Positive Dread" post. I like the unique take on that concept here, broadening it to a much wider application.

you want your demeanor to communicate that this approach is you extending to her a chance to prove herself to you, maybe now or maybe over a cup of coffee later

This is spot on! The only point of clarification is that you don't just want to communicate it as your demeanor - you want it to be your actual internalized state of being as well.

And pray, brother. I pray and believe during my interactions all the time.

This isn't just for singles. Even as a married man, when my wife used to yell at me (post-RP), sometimes I picture Jesus sitting right there next to me and we're having a conversation, talking about her in the midst of her fit. To use a somewhat famous Christian joke, it's a lot like these guys having a conversation about someone frothing at the mouth right in front of him. That's how you develop amused mastery: through prayerfully practicing God's presence.

Absent fathers in Christian communities

5 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is sad to hear, brother. Show her what you've got in the next few months. I've had cases where the parties reconcile mid divorce. And if she goes, that's her loss. That said, if you're a cage stager on reformed theology, that's on you for driving her to the liberals ;)

Difficulty accepting my new reality.

5 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/askMRP

They are MY children.

I think you missed the point that /u/Rian_Stone was making. He wasn't asking if you were raising someone else's kids. He was asking if you take ownership over the fact that they're your kids.

Your post makes it sound like you're their nanny, taking care of her kids until she gets home. Take the reigns back. Your language matters. This will shape your psychology within your marriage.

The Golden Ticket

5 upvotes · 17 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Guys have a golden ticket too. It's made of real gold. We just don't get to trade it in for prizes. We rip it up piece by piece and give it to people whenever we want something. If we follow certain stipulations, like excelling in a profession, our ticket becomes more valuable, so we only have to rip apart smaller pieces to get the same stuff as the next guy.

We can also keep our ticket relatively intact, waving it in the air until women start throwing down their gold-colored paper tickets at our feet. Of all the prizes they could have, my real gold is the one they want - the one they'll gladly trade their shiny paper ticket to get.

will there be a difference?

5 upvotes · 13 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Sexual desire is not sinful. Acting on it outside of marriage is. Flirting is not an indication that you want to have sex right then and there. It's merely an indication of attraction. There's nothing wrong with being attracted to someone or showing someone you're attracted to them. Flirting is just one way of doing that. I don't see anything in the bible that indicates this would be wrong in any way.

Lift, Faggot, Lift

5 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Amen.

Field Report. I asked my wife to write an erotic fantasy story and she didn't, but something else unfolded instead.

5 upvotes · 5 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Is this harmless fun to put her on display?

I'm a big fan of PDA. Most Christian women are not. In my view, PDA can go a long way toward showing others - especially those in the church - that sex isn't something shameful to be hidden behind locked bedroom doors.

At what point is it causing others to lust?

At the point where you're both reckless about your concern for other people.

Let me be clear: your sinfulness is not decided by someone else's sinfulness. If you can, in good conscience and because of your faith, do any of what you're doing without conviction from the Spirit, then either you're (a) a self-deluded non-Christian, or (b) not sinning. See Romans 14:14, 23 for the operative passages there.

I've lusted after a woman who was wearing full-body winter clothes before. Certainly she was doing nothing sinful in that she was being perfectly modest. My lust was on my own head. If someone wants to lust after you and your wife, that's on their own head. If you're (a) intentionally causing them to lust, or (b) being reckless about behaviors that might cause others to lust, then you can hardly say your behaviors are coming from faith, thus you're in sin. For my purposes, "reckless" is a disregard for the actual implications of your behaviors ("I'd rather not know because then I might have to stop" kind of thing).

Boundaries were set long ago not to involve anyone else, what other boundaries should be considered?

I don't have many, except by personal preference.

Cause for concerned?

That's you living in her frame. Stop worrying about what her story might have been or why she's doing this. You'll get too caught up in your own head.

Ready to get engaged (in light of past PMO)

5 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You've already got some great advice here - shout outs to /u/helaughsinhidden, /u/Stryker7200, and /u/matrixtospartanatLV for their write-ups! Here are a few things that roll off the top of my head.

FIRST: Your friend is absolutely right. I can't count the number of guys who had "conquered" porn while dating a girl and then found that after marriage they were neck-deep in it once again. I'm yet another one of those examples. What makes me convinced that his concerns over you are valid are the exact reasons you gave for why you think they're invalid: "I've built good habits and defenses ... Time limit on YouTube, no video games, better diet, better sleep hygiene," etc. These are all human effort things. In other words, you're saying that your will-power is higher than most other men. Good for you. It will fail. Your pride in your will power might not let you fail in the realm of PMO, but the failure will come nonetheless. You're not trusting in Jesus as your cure, you're trusting in yourself ... and I just don't see how that's going to survive when your deep-down blue pill fantasies that I sense still lingering are finally shattered.

To that end, your post has convinced me that you have not conquered your sin; you have merely poured wax in your ears.

TWO

Now, with that aside, are you in a good position to get engaged/married? Well, goodness ... you've known this girl for so long and you're pretty darn convinced that you've vetted her quite thoroughly ... I'm not buying it.

My rationale has nothing to do with your porn problem, though I do usually advise to kick it before getting married (which is not a hard stance - just general wisdom). Instead, I'm more concerned with the hints of blue pill ideologies I'm picking up about your attitude toward marriage in the first place.

- Why do you want to marry this woman?
- You seem to have only recently started improving your SMV, so are you sure you'll be content with her 10 years from now when you realize you could be pulling much higher quality?
- What do you think sex during marriage will be like?
- How are you doing at maintaining your physical boundaries in the dating relationship?
- What's your internal emotional state like every time you see her?
- What has she done already to demonstrate her character for being Faithful, Available, and Teachable? I saw in a comment that you've predominantly been in an LDR using mostly video chat to communicate - how does that meet your standards of a woman making herself available to you?
- Are you going to move to where she is or is she going to move to you?
- Why are you speaking to her on Facetime so often?

I get the impression you're emotionally impulsive about the relationship and not thinking long-term. I mean, if she's a total knock-out with a biblical mind about her, then don't lose a good thing. But I'm just very nervous for you.

I can't say for sure whether you're ready or not. Even you can't know that. Only God can, and you're going to have to trust that he's sovereign so that (1) he won't let you marry when you're not ready, or (2) if he does, he'll make it work anyway. In the meantime, kick whatever blue is lingering beneath your skull and rib cage. Those are the real red flags I'm seeing.

Question on priorities.

5 upvotes · 15 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

... I REALLY like this. I'm going to use that in the future. Bravo, good sir!

"Three reasons why Christian parents are raising slutty girls and beta males"

5 upvotes · 14 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is quite an impressive list. Let me add a more conceptual foundation for the notion that we are meant to emulate Christ:

- 1 John 2:6 - "Whoever says he abides in him ought to walk in the same way in which he walked."

- 1 Cor. 11:1 - "Be imitators of me, as I am of Christ."
- 1 Peter 2:21 - "For to this you have been called, because Christ also suffered for you, leaving you an example, so that you might follow in his steps."
- Romans 8:29 - "For those whom he foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the image of his Son"
- Philippians 2:5 - "Your attitude should be the same as that of Christ Jesus."
- Ephesians 5:1-2 - "Therefore be imitators of God, as beloved children."
- John 13:13-17 - "You call me Teacher and Lord, and you are right, for so I am. If I then, your Lord and Teacher, have washed your feet, you also ought to wash one another's feet. For I have given you an example, that you also should do just as I have done to you. Truly, truly, I say to you, a servant is not greater than his master, nor is a messenger greater than the one who sent him. If you know these things, blessed are you if you do them."
- Ephesians 4:24 - "Put on the new self, created after the likeness of God"
- John 14:15 - "If you love me, you will keep my commandments"
- Galatians 3:27 - "For as many of you as were baptized into Christ have put on Christ."

There are many, many more that imply that we are to emulate the example Christ set for us. That said, a common thread of all of these is that we are to emulate the character and priorities of Christ and not the actual decision-making patterns.

To that end, u/matrixtospartanatLV:

There has to be more. Am I doing it wrong because I got married? Because I had children? Because I have a steady job?

Jesus did NONE of those things.

Jesus married the church. He also refers to us as his children. His job was that of a vocational minister - but he also had a lay job as a carpenter, just as Paul modeled a lay job as a tent maker. Jesus did all of these things.

But I agree that there are some things that we are not meant to emulate. Jesus wore sandals everywhere and not sneakers. Does that mean we must wear sandals and refuse to wear sneakers? Of course not. These are not character and purpose-oriented things. In short, I would differentiate between being Christ's physical image and his spiritual image. All of these passages and more seem to be talking about the spiritual image - that our lives would be oriented the same way as Christ's.

[FR] Duty Sex Doesn't Exist

5 upvotes · 13 August 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I thought the same thing a year ago.

Is my wife pregnant by another man (I need some advice)

5 upvotes · 7 August 2018 · /r/askMRP

Cool. Get defensive. You're only proving my point.

Church Discipline

5 upvotes · 30 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

As far as I've always understood it, public discipline per 1 Timothy 5:19-20 only applies to church leaders. All other discipline is to happen in private. For example, a couple years ago my pastor had to discipline a woman for repeatedly and unrepentantly cheating on her husband. The two are still married, but living separate. He still attends our church, but she was asked to leave in private and she has agreed to do so. No announcement was made at church about her leaving. I knew another woman who was being obnoxious toward others in the church and trying to cause trouble. It got bad enough that the pastor asked her in private to leave. After recognizing she was no longer welcome (at least as long as her issues persisted), she did not attempt to come back. There was no public announcement related to her leaving. In both cases, only the people directly involved in the situation were informed of the result and it was left to those people to decide who they wanted to tell and how much was told. After all, public declarations like that affect the victim as well as the perpetrator - and it would not be fair to the victim to make a public announcement of the perpetrator's sin when the stigma, whether deserved or not, will affect the victim's life and relationships.

The reason it's different for leaders in the church is that there is supposed to be a spotlight on them. Paul talks in Philippians about leaving behind people who live after the model he gave them - and he encourages others to follow that model. As such, churchgoers should know who the church leaders are and should actively be seeking to live like those people. If one of those leaders is living sinfully, it should be made clear to all people that they should not be living like that person.

The issue we have today is that many churchgoers don't even know who the "elders" (or deacons or advisory team members, etc.) are in their church (I don't know who they are in my church!), so there's no expectation of modeling on the part of the leaders, which is counter-productive to the mission of disciple-making, which is heavily based on life modeling (as opposed to teaching). So, that throws a wrench into all of this as well, where pastors feel they have a prerogative to keep things hush hush because nobody else was even looking at that person's life as a model in the first place. In reality, this is a pastor's habitual sin for failing repetitively to maintain a culture of disciple-making in his church and he should be the one publicly rebuked for it and letting things get to that point in the first place. But yes, such a sinful culture does make it easier for a pastor to engage in church discipline because he doesn't have to out his friends in front of everybody. But this also fails to encourage elders to live to a higher standard because the risks of failing to do so are much smaller.

TL;DR - Public discipline is only for church leaders; for everyone else it's perfectly appropriate to keep it private. As a practical matter, I'm sure there's room to make it more public if the person keeps coming back after a private excommunication, which then becomes disruptive to the body as a whole, warranting the body as a whole to get involved.

As for unsubmitive wives, you're absolutely right. This is certainly a sin issue, and one that often does not get addressed appropriately in churches.

That said, when it comes to public condemnation, because women shouldn't be positional leaders in the church, it leaves the question as to whether or not women should ever be rebuked publicly. After all, if men want the position of leadership, it makes sense that there is a higher risk and responsibility associated that if they fail in their duty to God, which includes obedience and repentance upon failure.

However, I would make some room for the wives of church leaders because they often operate as de facto leaders among women in the church. If a woman is leading a women's ministry, for example, then she is a leader in the church, despite that she may not be paid a salary or be on staff. She still has the modeling influence I referenced above, and that influence is usually targeted at many people, and thus any rebuke should also be before those people who are influenced by her ministry.

That said, we also have to account for the fact that the husband is still ultimately responsible for the leadership of his home. If an elder's wife is unsubmitive and other women look to her as a model, how do we address this? After all, 1 Timothy 3:4 says, "He must manage his own family well and see that his children obey him, and he must do so in a manner worthy of full respect" (also adding to the debate on physical punishment of wives from another thread). Verse 5 then explains, "For if someone does not know how to manage his own household, how will he care for God's church?"

So, if it is the man's household and he is responsible for managing his wife under control, then if he were to have her reprimanded for unrepentant unsubmitiveness, then should he not also simultaneously resign from his position of leadership in the church? No, most men would much rather hide his wife's sin than accept that conclusion. Or perhaps he is in habitual sin for failing to keep his household under control as its leader, and therefore if she is rebuked he must be rebuked publicly as well.

This leads to the possible conclusion that it's sinful for a man to lead his home in any way other than an RP way.

I'm a Christian. I'm a "jerk." Deal with it.

5 upvotes · 13 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well-said. Years and years ago, my youth pastor did a talk on different ways people view God, and this seems to fit right in. His three models were:

- A Cosmic Police Officer - someone just waiting to punish you as soon as you do anything bad.
- A Universal Vending Machine - we punch a few buttons to tell him what we want, put in some money/time/whatever, and wait for it to be handed to us.
- A Mystical Force - Like in Star Wars, if we just believe enough, we can manipulate God to do whatever we want.

I like the genie thing too ;)

Book Summaries

5 upvotes · 10 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

No More Mr. Nice Guy

When I Say No I Feel Guilty

Married Man Sex Life Primer

Mindset towards those who are not chaste

5 upvotes · 25 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

There are no "certain circumstances." RP is not a prescribed code of conduct. It is a mindset or orientation of life based on an understanding of how intergender relational dynamics really work. That's all.

If you know the truth and want to marry a non virgin anyway, go do it. The bible doesn't forbid it. RP doesn't forbid it. The only thing RP would forbid is the mindset that you have some obligation to ignore her past indiscretions.

To that end, I'm not even sure why people even use the word "forgive" here? Did she sin against you? No. It's not yours to forgive. Forgiveness has nothing to do with it unless you actually end up marrying her - and even then it's questionable. It's simply a matter of exercising wise discretion.

Women like to use the word forgiveness on this context because it lets them use the bible as a manipulative tool to accomplish their goals. Imagine if instead of "Will you forgive me?" they said what they're really asking: "Will you pretend I never did that?" As long as you understand this is the question you're really addressing, do whatever you want, acting in wisdom.

Lessons from two divorce cases

5 upvotes · 15 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

It depends on the state you're in. I live in a state that assumes all property acquired during the marriage is joint and marital even if you keep it separate, so there's no helping there. The best way to fool-proof yourself is to get your wife a job earning comparable income to you. Just get filthy rich and pay someone to do all the housework for you. If you want a wife who stays home, that's fine ... but expect to be paying spousal support if it ever ends.

Is Sex Outside of Marriage a Sin? An Official Stance.

5 upvotes · 21 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I explained one example of where it's a sin in the OT. But this line ...

If it aint a sin in the OT, it aint a sin in the NT either.

Dang, brother ... that's pretty ignorant and not consistent with Paul's writings. I also referenced the whole "invent new ways of doing evil" thing, which pretty much affirms that there are new sins that were never mentioned in the OT that are still sin.

Now, you've made a trite philosophical case for your position, but let's see some theological backing to it. Point me to some passages that lead to this conclusion - and I don't mean explaining away passages that are unfavorable to your position. I mean analyzing passages that positively affirm your position.

How to transition into celibacy?

5 upvotes · 14 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Beautiful reply.

If you used to be BP and changed, what made you reconsider feminism?

5 upvotes · 7 March 2018 · /r/RedPillWomen

Travelling in India

I'm really confused by this. I have several clients (I'm a divorce attorney) both male and female who were married in India, including one where we're combating jurisdiction from India to get it in the US. All of these clients on both sides tell me that India law is incredibly feminist and favorable to the woman. Obviously I'm not an attorney in India, so I can't speak to that personally, but what I'm hearing is quite the opposite: that custody and support laws over there are allegedly worse than they are in the US.

Tag: /u/trexgomez and /u/yuithegraceful - just for better inside information on this subject most people would never vote a woman into the US Presidency

I don't think that's true at all. It's more that most people wouldn't vote that particular woman into office, given the incredible allegations that had been made against her, some of which were borderline (if not outright) treasonous ... not that I'm a big Trump fan either.

I bought a Laura Doyle book and haven't looked back.

You'll be happier in the long-run. Just make sure you're doing it for the right reasons :)

I now consider myself a moderate.

Which is where I tend to fall.

How about you? What event in your life or the world changed your mind about modern feminism?

The Bible and an 18 month total dead bedroom.

Girl problems

5 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

A perfect case of hypergamy at work. You're the BB, her boyfriend is the AF. Of course he's a jerk. Why do you think she's screwing him and not pining over you?

How would one approach this text and hold frame in a beneficial way coming from a Christian perspective?

5 upvotes · 2 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

So ... you've got an ex who knows you're not interested, but wants to get the benefits of your time, attention, and affection anyway. AWALT.

How do you hold frame? Can't tell you. You haven't told us what your frame is yet. What do you want to do? Who do you want to be? What are your priorities right now? Those are the kinds of questions, along with what u/redpillwonder said that will give us more room to provide helpful feedback.

If you're really not interested in chatting with her because you need time to heal or whatever, just don't respond. You're under no obligation to do so, and it's better not to lead her on if you have no interest.

Rollo Tomassi: How the FI has assimilated modern church culture

5 upvotes · 27 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Let's be clear. There are two good things we can do on earth that we can't do in heaven: (1) make disciples (Matthew 28:19), and (2) reconcile the things of this world to God (2 Cor. 5:18). If those are the only good things we can do here that can't be done in heaven, then they should be the highest priority of the church and all other functions of the church only have value on Earth if they contribute to one of those two purposes.

To that end, there are a great many social justice purposes that the church should be engaging in and we should not shame it for doing so.

- James 2 says, "Religion God our Father accepts as pure and faultless is this: to look after orphans and widows in their distress and to keep oneself from being polluted by the world."
- Isaiah 1:17 says, "Learn to do good; seek justice, correct oppression; bring justice to the fatherless, plead the widow's cause."
- Zechariah 7:9-10 says, "Render true judgments, show kindness and mercy to one another, do not oppress the widow, the fatherless, the sojourner, or the poor, and let none of you devise evil against another in your heart."
- Proverbs 31:9 says, "Open your mouth, judge righteously, defend the rights of the poor and needy."
- Jeremiah 22:3 says, "Do justice and righteousness, and deliver from the hand of the oppressor him who has been robbed. And do no wrong or violence to the resident alien, the fatherless and the widow, nor shed innocent blood in this place."

- Jesus says in Matthew 7:12, "Do to others what you would have them do to you."

I intentionally picked verses from different authors rather than repeating from the same book to demonstrate that this is all over Scripture - and I could find even more in Paul's writings. Social justice is a vitally important purpose and function of the church and not one we should ignore or berate the church for being interested in.

The problem isn't that the church is focused on social justice. It's that it has abandoned the mission of disciple-making. Disciple-making focuses on the person; social justice focuses on the cultural needs. When the cultural needs are the primary function, it makes sense that the church will become ingrained with and influenced by culture.

Set the priority straight back to discipleship and you'll notice that the church will be less interested in appeasing culture and more interested producing godliness in people.

As always, the model of discipleship that Jesus gave us is the answer to the problems of the world and the church. We know the church has lost its way and betas aren't going to set it straight. So, are you going to alpha-up and do something about it or complain on an online forum that you don't like what's happening? ;)

For the record, I live what I preach. I am actively making strides in my church to restore the focus of discipleship and foster an appreciation for biblical masculinity. It has been a long process, but it can be done. In general, it takes 3 years of intentional effort to earn influence with the leadership of a church. You can knock a bit off of that if you happen to build the right connections early on. But if you've been at your church for 3+ years and haven't found your way into a position of influence among the leadership or part of the leadership itself, it's time to get started. If you're already there, start utilizing that influence for God's purposes.

But don't sit idly by just hoping for things to change or looking for a church where someone else already did the work for you. That's lazy and it's beta thinking.

The Feminine Imperative has replaced the Holy Spirit

5 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I've actually done a lot of writing on the "No True Scotsman" argument, which only applies if there is no objective definition of a "Scotsman." If Scottish law outlined a clear definition of a Scotsman, then one could use that phrase quite objectively and point to the law that proves it. Someone else could come along and subjectively disagree with that law, but they're still not getting their Scottish citizenship if they don't otherwise qualify under the terms of that law.

God has authority to decide who is a "real Christian" and not. He told us his standard in a written code, the core soteriological principles of which are commonly agreed upon by virtually all branches of the faith (ex. the Nicene Creed). If someone says, "I really do not overly concern myself with issues of salvation," there's good cause to question whether or not she objectively falls within that standard (although I'll refrain from making any judgement on that point, per your request).

Let's assume she's a legit Christian (not to imply she isn't). Let's also assume there's no biblical issue with her being a pastor and that questioning the appropriateness of her theology/biblical interpretation is off the table (again, removing the "no true Scotsman issue from the conversation).

A lot of what she's saying is good. Complacency is deadly. Doubt is a necessary accompaniment to faith. Great. But the women who were moderating Athol Kay's forum also had some good things to say at times. Nevertheless, we see how that went down. The practical harm on a structural level of her being in the position she's in outweighs the good that she might otherwise communicate, even if we assume she was only communicating authentic, genuine truth - even if it were red pill truth, at that.

To be clear, I recently wrote on the hierarchy of theology > praxeology > philosophy. If we remove the theological issues (avoiding the NTS argument), at a praxeological level we still reach the same conclusion as theology: society functions best when God leads men and men lead their wives. This works on a purely praxeological level even without theology because God designed the world to work that way.

When we put a wife in a position of spiritual authority over her husband (noting that this pastor's husband attends her church and is not in a higher position of leadership than her), we run afoul of everything the red pill knows to be true, even from a secular vantage point.

When we extrapolate this authority not only over her own husband, but upon an entire congregation as well, it empowers other women in the church to (1) follow in her example of spiritual leadership over her husband, and (2) reinvigorate their feminist tendencies, heightening the BB side of their hypergamous desires on a cultural level within the church. Not only so, but onlookers from outside the church are then given greater justification to amplify hypergamy's BB play on a societal level because "even the church agrees now too."

But I'm not even concerned about that part of it. The world will do what it's going to do. What's more concerning is the impact it has on the men themselves. Despite the cumulative impact these types of women have on the church and society as a whole, and the way this feeds into their dominant position over men, they still want an alpha to screw them. That desire isn't going away, and it's been proven time and again among countless feminists. But they've just convinced men on an institutionalized level that they must be subservient to a woman because she has a position of spiritual authority, which presumably comes from God - and how dare you even think about defying someone appointed by God!

No, the man must beta-up. He must submit to his woman pastor, who proves that it's fine for him to submit to his woman wife, and that he might as well submit to every other woman in society as well ... at least if there's a chance that he wants sex anytime soon.

Of course, if we agree that women are sexually responsive and not spontaneous, then any structure that stifles a man's innate authority to initiate with his wife is also going to stifle his sexuality as a whole - because she's simply not going to initiate spontaneously as often as he would.

Let me back up for a second. If women are seen as viable candidates for spiritual leadership and men are being influenced toward a beta mindset by virtue of seeing a woman in authority over them every Sunday morning, it follows that most men will defer to their wives as spiritual leaders by default. It becomes the path of least resistance and the most natural directive, given that the family is subservient to the church and the church is subservient to a woman. So, we have a family with a beta husband, led by the wife on both a pragmatic and spiritual level.

In such a household, where will the man find his authority to initiate sexually with his wife? Perhaps his patience runs dry and his balls are blue enough in more ways than one that he finally makes a move on her. But now she is empowered to deny him. And if she is sexually responsive, what is she responsive to? Certainly nothing he has to offer. After all, he's not offering her anything she couldn't get elsewhere by flashing a smile, or if the man is "lucky enough" ... something more.

In the end, if we allow women to take the lead in the church, men become an interchangeable resource both within the church and outside. He has no value left to contribute. That's not to imply that his leadership is the only value he has to contribute, as the cultural model shows that women can, in fact, be effective leaders. The issue is that desire is dead. His alpha-ness is what he was contributing - and it is something women crave. But in this model, sex would become purely a matter of procreation whenever the wife decides she wants a child. As much as he may slobber over her, she will not be slobbering back.

Of course, I am speaking predominantly philosophically in all of this - suggesting what would logically follow from one chain of events to the next. But we know that at least the foundation of this rings true even on a praxeological level. We see enough relationships in the church follow this path to know what would certainly result. Theology is, in my view, the only pillar still supporting healthy marriages. Even with that pillar in place, we still see many marriages crumbling to what I'm suggesting. Remove theology from the equation (which is what the secular world wants, including secular RP) and I wonder how quickly and widespread my predictions would become reality.

This is why I believe secular RP is doomed without God - without RPC fortifying the pillar of theology in its appropriate context.

But let me address one more point: that this would kill the faith entirely. I have said on RPC many times before that God intends the physical things of this world to parallel spiritual truths. Physical reproductive acts are paralleled with spiritual reproduction, which is evangelism. Physical child-rearing (i.e. leading in the home) is paralleled with spiritual child-rearing, which is discipleship.

If we train people on a physical level to abandon male headship for female headship, and sexuality in the home is thereby stifled because the wife is not attracted to her beta bucks husband, then the God-given pattern for spiritual reproduction is equally stifled and the compulsion toward evangelism is lost. It's no surprise, then, that this pastor you reference notes: "I really do not overly concern myself with issues of salvation, especially salvation of other folks" (note how the article author bolded the wrong section?). What happens after a generation or two with extremely stifled evangelism? The faith dies. Why do you think God set things up the way he did?

And if men are not the ones leading the family in the upbringing of their children, not only do we have the practical impact of these problems propounded on the next generation, but we also lose the model for discipleship that Jesus gave us in favor of female strategies of child-rearing, which have already started to take root even among male thinking simply because the secular culture has pushed that agenda for so long. And what happens if the next generation isn't trained rightly? The faith will die. Why do you think God set things up the way he did?

Of course, I have not even gotten into much of the content of what she teaches ... but these are my thoughts nonetheless.

EDIT: I should note that most of this is based on her statement that she wants to reform the church. I'm simply musing on what would happen if she were successful in that goal.

An anatomy of butthurt and the impact on frame

5 upvotes · 7 February 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

It's only cliché to someone who already knows that move. I often forget that others are gaming women who have had moves put on them before. Nevertheless ... pulling hair during sex is also cliché ... but if it works it works.

TLDR: withdrawing time & attention, the last ditch, roommate, not wife

5 upvotes · 7 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

No ... not supposed to make her hot for him. It's supposed to communicate that her behavior is unacceptable. If she's checked out, why should he continue giving her a free ride?

An anatomy of butthurt and the impact on frame

5 upvotes · 6 February 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The point of the post isn't to pontificate on the best response to the request, in which case there are certainly many better responses than what is listed here.

The point is to discern what is and is not butthurt.

Wife had abortion without telling me

5 upvotes · 4 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I endorse all of this.

Purity question

5 upvotes · 31 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

My ex set me up with her roommate last weekend.

What the flying spaghetti monster?!? Read up on hypergamy? Don't take dating recommendations from your ex. She does not have your best interests in mind.

The girl I was set up with is not a Christian

2 Cor. 6, yadda yadda. Don't date non-Christians. Period. Next.

I feel like towed the line with making out

I literally just answered this question to someone else yesterday by PM. Here's what I wrote:

This is an issue talked about quite often and the consensus is that there is no consensus. Everyone is different and has their own boundaries. My wife and I dated for over a year before using the word "love." After that, I would kiss her cheek, hand, neck, shoulder, or other innocuous places, and she to me, but they were only pecks. When I was ready to propose, we kissed on the lips for the first time. A month after that we started tongue kissing. A couple months later we started making out while sitting down, then a week later we started making out while laying down. A month after that we started making out with my hand on her belly under her shirt, but never touching her breasts or going below the waist. That was as far as we went, then we were married a couple months later. So, in the 6 months that we were engaged, you can see how physical affection started escalating quite quickly.

Now, that's just my story, and I have no regret about any of that because I actually did marry her. If I had broken up with her, I would classify a lot of what we did as sinful because I was certainly lusting over her in my heart and mind, which is only vindicated if she actually is my wife (in my view, that applies regardless of when the actual covenant is established).

Any advice on how to approach this from a Christ-like frame and position of godly humility and repentance?

You've got to call it off immediately and ghost your ex. You can't get over her while she's still around ... at least not with where your frame appears to be right now. Maybe down the road, but it's going to make both your spiritual and RP journeys much harder.

Wife wants to take Girls Weekend to Tahoe

5 upvotes · 31 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

Look at it this way, if you don't let her go she will use that against you and based on your frame rip you to shreds.

So the solution is to give her frame even more power over his? I agree with the "let her go" sentiment. I don't agree with him funding the trip when she's already drained his resources to meet her standard of living expectations. He needs to cut her off, not keep empowering her.

How should one phrase to a woman that they don't want to have premarital sex, however, you still want to pursue the relationship?

5 upvotes · 29 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

