From there, it's your responsibility to discern the balance of value and effort you want to maintain in your relationship. I always assess that value in terms of my mission. It's one thing to assess value based on my feelings, in which case I would run my marriage very differently. But my feelings are fickle anyway, and as a Christian I have more important things to do in life than make sure I'm feeling happy in my marriage all the time. So, instead of asking how my wife is adding value to me, I ask how she's adding value to my mission - because my mission is more important to me than my emotions. If the effort I invest in her is not adding any value to that mission, then I focus on my mission without her. If she's ready to join in and reduce the amount of effort I have to spend to get the same value as before - or even better: that she increases her value-add to my mission, even if I have to return to the previous level of effort - then I no longer have to focus on the (soft) "next priority" on my list because I have another means of accomplishing my purpose.

And to be clear, let me refrain the two scenarios for when a wife is behaving poorly that should cause a man to re-engage:

- She requires less effort to get the same value
- She requires the same/more effort, but gives appropriately greater value

Between the two of these, I would preference the second one every time. The first is reducing the profitability of your joint interactions and puts you in placation mode with one another. In essence, she's still not any more on board with your mission than she was before, but she's accepting the fact that your mission is more important than she is, so she readjusts her expectations of you to account for that. She's less interested in following you than in doing the minimum necessary to get what she wants from you.

The second, while requiring more effort from you, is the situation where she actually increases her engagement in your mission. This can increase the bond between the two of you, thereby increasing sexuality as you are more and more on the same page with pursuing the same goal - and it also reorients her mindset in following you.

Sad State of Affairs

2 upvotes · 20 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The surprise was the portrayal that everything was fine... until it wasn't.

So, I can echo story after story like what you've described, but one of the worst is from my church and not one of my cases.

The husband was something of a bad boy - piercings and tattoos everywhere, fit shape, etc. The wife was your classic goodie good church girl knockout, wearing dresses on Sunday and raising her hands in worship, dancing as she sang. She was appointed director of the children's ministry after impressing everyone with her incredible biblical knowledge and passion for serving in the church. He joined the security and parking teams and usually chummed around with other people in the hallways instead of going to service. They both posted on social media frequently how much they loved each other and weren't shy about their sex life.

Then one day he's calling me asking about divorce. It turns out the goodie girl who knew more theology than 90% of the people here and who was a leader in the church and passionate during service ... had cheated on him. So I meet with him to figure out what's going on. Turns out it wasn't the first time either. It was the 7th (that he knew of). This was just the one where she refused to break it off when he found out.

Moral of the story: church leaders are easy to dupe. They're looking at outward appearances, not the heart. And when they say they're looking at the heart, they're looking at the wrong criteria to assess the heart. That's the danger of emotionalism in the church. Emotions are a horrible indication of spiritual maturity.

To be fair, before I was saved, I had several pastors duped too, thinking I was the most spiritually mature high school student they'd ever met. I was bold with my faith, I knew more theology than they did, and I knew how to put on a passionate show. But none of it was real.

Now I'm dealing with a pastor who just yesterday invited me to join a "preaching team" and he's telling me about the other people he wants on the team. They're all people who have a clear outward appearance of spiritual maturity, and I know for a fact that 1 of them is the real deal. My wife jokes that I have a man-crush on him because of the level of respect I have for that guy. Another is a girl, who is the real deal, but ... girl. The other two I happen to know are not even remotely mature. But one is highly knowledgeable, so the pastor wants to appoint him anyway, despite the fact that the pastor just had to remove him from another team for serious character flaws. The last guy is highly emotional, but is as spiritually illiterate as a box of rocks. I led him in small group for 2 years and after a few months he finally asks: "I hear you using the word 'gospel' a lot. What is that? What does that word mean?" I would also teach basic stuff, like what the parable of the sower meant, and he'd argue with me, "I don't buy it. That explanation doesn't feel right to me." Then I'd show him 10 verses down, where Jesus himself explains it and he'd cave. So props to him for being willing to learn, but his discernment is way off. Yet these are the people that the pastor wants to put in charge of all the preaching that gets done at the church - content, who preaches, etc.

Pastors are easily duped. End of story.

Sad State of Affairs

2 upvotes · 20 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah ... that's not biblical. Biblically speaking, we all deserve hell. Anything better than that is simply God's grace. So, the word "deserve" doesn't do much for me. She deserves far, far worse.

Sad State of Affairs

2 upvotes · 20 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Funny ... reading the whole story I'm thinking, "I know this person. I've seen ten of them in the last month." There's one case in particular that I suspect could actually be the people you're talking about - every detail lines up, including her potentially losing her church job if she files.

It would be a mistake to think you couldn't help, though. "I will go before you and will level the mountains; I will break down gates of bronze and cut through bars of iron. I will give you hidden treasures, riches stored in secret places, so that you may know that I am the Lord, the God of Israel, who summons you by name" (Isaiah 45:2-3). With everything I've seen, I've gotten to be a pretty darn good judge of character too - flawless, even. But part of that judging is a recognition that nobody is beyond the Holy Spirit's power.

Now, on a separate matter, I also fully invest in the WISNIFG bill of right #3 - "You have the right to judge if you are responsible for finding solutions to other people's problems." Jesus did this all the time. It's why he focused on the Jews and didn't go off healing every sick person in the entire world - especially among the Gentiles. When the Syrophoenician woman asked for help he almost turned her away, but for her wise answer. I imagine many others were unwise. Jesus let the rich young ruler walk away and didn't follow him around trying to get his heart in the right place. So, I'm fine with not being responsible for others' problems.

The question, then, becomes simply: If you believe God could change his heart, would you want to be the vehicle God uses to do that?

Both answers to that question are perfectly legitimate. Maybe you're bearing fruit in so many other ways that you don't have the capacity to take on a job like that. Just don't discount the option simply because he seems like a difficult one. Some of the most fruitful disciple-makers I know were guys I had found and discipled who I never expected much from.

Caught wife wanking off

2 upvotes · 15 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is one of the reasons we've never used a vibrator in the first place. There have been times when I've wanted to get one, though. I've read that using a vibrator too much can make it hard for her to enjoy stimulus from anything else, but I'm not sure if that was just for virgins learning to have orgasms in the first place or if it would still apply and possibly cause regression for people who have been married for over 10 years and orgasms were never a problem.

How should I handle these two disciples?

2 upvotes · 13 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I wasn't recommending he disciple her - only that he work together alongside her to start a discipleship ministry. That will involve some training, but nothing on the level of actual discipleship. I was also assuming at the time that he did have some interest in her. If he doesn't, there's no need to include her unless it helps his mission to do so.

Question on leading someone into becoming quality wife material

2 upvotes · 12 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

What does this look like at this point in time?

I gave a few examples in my comment. The main thing is to engage in things that are outward focused, not focused on you and her. Dinner, movie, walk in the park, etc. are all focused on you and her. Things that are outward focused takes the pressure off, letting you do something valuable beyond just the romance of it all, while still giving you more exposure together to feel things out.

This feels like it goes against everything RP I've read/been taught, but at the same time I can also see that this is a situation where it might be warranted?

It's situation-specific. I wouldn't give this advice to a married man, for example. The goal here isn't to blurt out everything that crosses your mind. It's to set clear boundaries - ones that you might let her cross, but that you will let her know before they are actually crossed.

Avoiding doing this puts you in the position of communicating covertly, which is how women communicate. While this can be received well, it also gives her the wrong impression because her emotions will always lead her further down the path than you're willing to go at this time.

So, as a general rule, I would ordinarily agree with you that remaining covert in your intentions is more attractive, there are situations that warrant decisive boundary-setting instead. This is true in marriage as well, just in different ways.

she aligns with it as much as anyone I've met

Aligning is one thing. In theory, every girl who is godly and pursuing Christ should align with your mission. It's not enough just that you're moving in the same direction. Parallel lines move the same way, but never actually cross. There's got to be an overlap of your efforts at some point, where you're doing these things together and not individually. I learned that lesson the hard way.

Abundance Mentality

2 upvotes · 12 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

/u/sic_redditr cruiser is doing some good writing on abundance mentality on his instagram. I haven't asked yet, but when he's a few posts in I was going to have him put some of the content up here. Instagram is shorter, so 3 insta posts to one reddit post is probably appropriate, and I've only seen the first two so far. Either way, you can message him for more information on abundance. /u/BobbyMcKee also had the more general reply that I'd give. Also, there's an entire post (maybe a couple?) on the sidebar to address having an abundance mentality - I think in the 200 series.

Abundance Mentality

2 upvotes · 12 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is the correct answer. Good word, brother.

How should I handle these two disciples?

2 upvotes · 12 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Solid reply.

On being 'Red Pill'...

2 upvotes · 9 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I wrote a post early on this sub's history to cover this exact issue. It's on the sidebar. Here you go:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/76wv9u/defining_rp_for_this_sub_and_understanding_the/

How to date "evenly" as a Christian

2 upvotes · 2 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I can appreciate this response. Just recognize that of the statements in your last paragraph, the biological imperative one is the only one that isn't part of a fantasy world that most people concoct without justification and that doesn't measure up to reality.

Hosting a Board Game Party

2 upvotes · 1 November 2018 · /r/RedPillWomen

Cheeses that melt into a cream rather than clumps or stickiness should be doable, but I haven't actually tested it other than with white Queso (which does work quite well). Most other Salsa varieties work just fine, but Pace is my personal favorite for mixing purposes, even if it's not the best for straight salsa-eating.

Boldly sharing the Gospel - is it unloving?

2 upvotes · 30 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well said. It's like when Jesus told his disciples to pray for workers in the vineyard ... then guess who the first wave of workers ends up being ...

The Consciously Crazy Wife

2 upvotes · 30 October 2018 · /r/askMRP

A symbol of strength and might, but one in which she can rest safely under its branches from any storm that may come by.

The Consciously Crazy Wife

2 upvotes · 29 October 2018 · /r/askMRP

Well said. Teasing and pranks are my primary MO - possibly even too far at times, which works incredibly well quite often. Agreed that this is better than actual argument - I never thought of it as a way for her to release some of that steam before, though. That's a helpful connection.

The Consciously Crazy Wife

2 upvotes · 29 October 2018 · /r/askMRP

I've been a supporter of the /u/Rian_Stone [+3] idea that you purposely give her things to be angry about. That way, she gets her feelz and it short circuits her need to come up with things to be mad about.

A solid reminder that I'd much forgotten about. Thanks for that.

Or maybe calling your personality manipulative is her own manipulative play?

Absolutely. I had to resist the urge to DEER on that exact point.

Learning from the life of Esau

2 upvotes · 29 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

There's not. Most Bible studies I've been in suffer from one of two key failures in the discussion prompts:

1. They're too rhetorical, so it leaves no room for actual discussion. The answers are obvious and everyone is likely to agree, so conversation never starts.

2. They're too abstract, being so far separated from the material that no answer could ever be evaluated as "good" or "bad" - there are just people's own personal opinions and thoughts.

Better questions are those that relate to the material, but cause people to think very hard about what the material means or how they have been failing to apply it in their own lives.

Questions that presume a preexisting application are also very, very bad and dangerous: "When was a time that you helped someone in need?" All this does is convince people that they're already good at helping people in need. It doesn't convince them that they need to change their behaviors going forward.

The Consciously Crazy Wife

2 upvotes · 29 October 2018 · /r/askMRP

This is good - and I never thought of the gradual-release method of dealing with craziness and emotions. It gives me the mental imagery of a steam engine, which is constantly producing steam, and if it all keeps storing up it'll explode, so it releases it in controlled puffs that provide energy to whatever it is that steam engines do. Or maybe I'm crazy and don't know how steam engines work, but it helps nonetheless.

Open thread

2 upvotes · 27 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

In addition to the links u/redpillwonder gave, I believe this post on: "There is no 'Christian version' of anything" really gets to the heart of your question.

RPC is not a Christianized version of the secular red pill with verses to back it up. It takes concepts that are originally found in the Bible, but uses similar lingo as the secular red pill to communicate what the Bible says in terms that Christians who are already associated with the manosphere will be able to understand.

I should also note that the comment of mine that u/redpillwonder shared is probably something that needs updating, as my views have evolved quite a bit since then, as I continue to study the Bible.

As for spinning plates, which you mentioned in a comment below, there's no question that the sniper mentality of finding a wife is very dangerous and usually leads to awful marriages, whereas the shotgun mentality is far more effective and leads to more stable, godly marriages. Part of that mentality means that you are actively building relationships with multiple women at a time - definitely not sexually, and most likely not romantically, but that you are constantly getting to know different women and keeping your options open until you are confident about someone. Serial monogamous dating is never found or mentioned in the Bible. Polygamy, though I don't endorse it today, is actually the default presumption in romantic relationships in most phases of biblical history. So, a view of relationships that presumes a man must be serially monogamous in his dating life in order to find a wife is based on cultural influences and not a biblical foundation. If you develop serial monogamy as your own personal conviction, then you should abide by it, per Romans 14; but it is also important to recognize that it is an unwise conviction that leads to unnecessary difficulties in married life later on, including an increased risk of divorce.

Losing feelings for my wife

2 upvotes · 26 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Amen. Though it would be more accurate to say that discipleship is the best model for accomplishing the goals of counseling. Counseling itself doesn't really look like discipleship at all.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (10/24/18)

2 upvotes · 26 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

OYS ??? I don't know - I don't keep track.

Instead of giving the repetitive updates on each area, I'll just skip straight to where I've been screwing up lately: golden ratio and bids for attention.

After catching up on some of u/redpillcoach's videos last weekend (I was previously only looking at the series playlist - didn't realize there were others not part of the play list), the concept of bids for attention resonated with me. I had assumed I was appropriately employing the golden ratio because of the broader things.

But when I heard about bids for attention, I noticed something I hadn't picked up on before: I was starting about 80% of our conversations. Initially I considered this a form of leading. I'm supposed to be the initiator, right? But the question popped in my head: what am I supposed to be initiating? I'm to initiate a purpose, plan, path, process, and progress (just winging the alliteration here). But when I initiate all the conversation, it's no longer about leading the family, it is interpreted as me pursuing her. And she often seems disinterested and uninvested in the conversation.

So, this week I've been working on rebalancing the initiation ratio of conversations:

- I used to call her on my way home from the gym to tell her my plans for dinner. Not doing that anymore. I just do it.
- When we had scheduling issues to work out and how to get kids from place to place, I used to call to figure out what was going on. Now it's just a simple text: "I'm getting kids and covering swim lessons" or "You're doing kids today." Done. Logistics only.
- When the kids were down, I used to open every conversation while she sat scrolling social media: "So, how was your day?" Not anymore. If she wants to chat, she can bid for my attention. I do what I have to get done (which lately has been working from home).

Even when she would try to initiate with me, she's lazy and would yell from whatever room she was in, hoping I'd hear her. I used to yell back. Idiotic. That only adds chaos in the house. I stopped yelling back. If she wants my attention, she can come get it. I have better things to do than try to figure out what she's saying through 2 walls or around 3 corners.

I don't know how this is going to pan out yet. But it's certainly more freeing to break the mold of me bidding for her attention all the time. I have noticed initially that after she realizes I'm not initiating like I used to, she's stepping up more often to be that initiator. We're having about 25% less conversations because some of the times that I would have initiated, she doesn't - and she just goes off to do her own thing, which gives me more time to re-purpose toward my own agenda. She's now the one initiating conversations with me and I get 25% of that time back. Win-win.

The 16 Commandments - Part 1

2 upvotes · 25 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Fair points. I agree with your first and third paragraphs. As to the second, there is certainly a point where too much attention reduces interest and affection. There are relational dynamics that people tend to gravitate toward, following a path of least resistance unless a better dynamic is readily available. Part of that means that if a guy is showing too much attention, his attention becomes cheap and loses its value, so instead of accepting it to move toward a higher relational dynamic, it's easier just to get bored of it. I'm working on a post to explain this much better, but didn't have much more than a few minutes to get started today.

Is woman created in God's image let's explore.

2 upvotes · 24 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It's first degree and second degree. If I look at a bowl of fruit and draw an impeccable picture of it, that picture is in the image of the bowl of fruit. If that same artist then removes the bowl of fruit from the room and looks at his own picture and draws another exactly like it, is the second picture:

- in the image of the original bowl of fruit? or ...
- in the image of another picture?

Obviously it's both.

Catching a cheat... time traveling?

2 upvotes · 24 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Did she cheat on you? Who knows. That's not actually the important question. It breaks your blue-pill fantasy world that you'd have a perfect, loving, faithful wife who would never do such a thing because she's a good church girl. It also breaks your blue pill illusion that your wife is just a cold, frigid harpy who doesn't like sex. She does. Assume it happened. Fantasy broken. Welcome to the red pill.

First thing's first, even if she did cheat on you, there's nothing you can do about it now. Cautious wisdom aside, her sin is ultimately for God to decide what to do with. If you want to divorce her, divorce her. If you want to remain married, forgive her. Those are really your only two options.

Beyond that, look to David. He had sex with another man's wife, then killed that man, and his sin got their child killed. Has your wife done so much to you? Probably not. Nevertheless, was David's sin against Bathsheba for making her an adulteress and killing her child? No. Was it against the child who died? No. Was it against the man whose wife he slept with and who he then killed? No. Psalm 51:4 - "Against you, you only, have I sinned." Why? Because Uriah, Bathsheba, and the baby are not his judges. He's not bound to live up to their expectations. He answers to God, not them. It is God's standard that he violated. Uriah, Bathsheba, and the baby are all under God's protection and provision, and if David violated that, it's God's mess to sort out, not theirs.

Likewise, you have no spiritual claim or hold over your wife. She has a duty to you, but not an inherent one. It exists only because God says it does. Her duty to you is her duty to God. If we remove God's frame from the picture, there's no basis for her to owe you anything anymore. Accordingly, her only obligation is to God. So, if she failed in her duty to remain faithful to you, that's for God to figure out. If you want to pretend to ascend above God to judge her for her actions, so be it. But by insisting on the "truth" of the matter, you're not really gaining anything beyond what you would otherwise achieve by assuming she cheated on you.

"Peace of mind" or "sanity" should not depend on the truth, but on living in the right frame. If you're that worked up by her doing what girls do, that's your internal emotional problem, not hers. And it's one that she can't solve by giving you an answer. Let it go or let her go. Those are your options.

As for the biblical viability of divorce in the first place, I have made my views pretty clear on this sub: divorce is always sin, even in the case of sexual immorality - but it is a "permissible" sin in the event that someone would be inclined toward even worse if divorce were not an option. As to the next step, I don't see any "unless she cheated" exception to remarriage after divorce - though the same principle would likely apply: if being forbidden to remarry would cause you to commit even greater sins, then because of the hardness of your heart, the sin of remarriage after divorce is the preferable option.

I want to fix our marriage in a RP way but need to find a way to resolve this ... for my own sanity

Fair enough. Here's my roadmap for you. Decide for yourself if/how you want to implement it or tweak it. But don't just strategize in your head. At some point you actually have to start doing something different. Losing weight is a great start, but ...

1. Stop worrying about whether or not your wife cheated on you. Assume she did. Forgive her, but be cautious about similar opportunities she might have in the future.
2. Discover your mission in life. You haven't given us one. She probably feels like she's in a dead-end marriage that isn't doing anything but accumulating money. If you're Indiana Jones, what's the Lost Ark you're questing for? Or are you content to stick it out as a professor at the university making money instead of being on a meaningful, world-impacting adventure? Your mission is God-given, not something you make for yourself. That's key. That's why I didn't say to "make up" a mission - I said to discover it. There's enough on the sidebar about this.
3. Start bulking now. Weight loss is great, but you're going to have a harder time bulking after it's all gone. As things stand, you could eat a clean 2k calorie diet, lift heavy, bulk your muscles, and still be losing weight all at the same time, as your body starts burning the existing calories in its system to repair your muscles. This requires a good sleep schedule, so make sure you're getting that. But don't wait to bulk up. Just make sure the calories you're consuming are predominantly protein. Steak or chicken with broccoli for dinner most nights is about perfect. I commented to someone else recently that homemade tacos can also be an incredibly healthy way to ingest lots of protein while cutting calories and sticking to healthy foods. Use beef jerky as a snack. The more protein you eat, the less calories you have to consume while still being able to bulk.
4. Adhere to the golden ratio. You sound very needy and clingy. She knows this. Sex is a chore to her. Why? Because she's already getting from you all the relational things she wants. If your attractiveness to her doesn't increase and you just decrease your relational engagement, as long as your level of engagement exceeds her level of attraction toward you, she's simply going to resent you. But if your level of engagement dips below her level of sexual interest in you, one of two things can result: (1) if both levels together are below her divorce threshold, she'll just leave you, or (2) if it's above her relational threshold, she'll become sexually responsive until your level of relational engagement equals her level of sexual attraction for you.
5. Spend the time that you would have been spending with her with God. Learn to rely on God as your source of strength and stability. Devote much of this time not only practicing the 7 basics (the 300 series you haven't gotten to yet), but contemplating how you can fulfill your God-given mission in life.
6. STFU, monk mode, amused mastery, DNGAF. Stop arguing with her over anything. If she wants to argue, let her vent it all out, then you say, "Thanks for the update on how you're feeling about me. I'm off to the gym," or some other activity that shows you're not interested in arguing with her. During this phase, while you're working on improving yourself, stop initiating sex. You'll only be reinforcing her conditioning that sex is disgusting. She has to have some base desire for it and right now it's just not there. In order to survive this monk mode and her tantrums while you STFU, you're going to have to work on your mindset, employing amused mastery not as an active technique, but as an internal perspective. When you can see her whining and screaming in the broader context of your mission (do you actually have one?), you'll realize it's usually quite trivial, so it stops mattering as much. Her emotional investment in such trivial matters will seem humorous, like when a child throws a tantrum over the fact that he didn't get a cookie. It's funny. When you have that mindset, you will be able to radiate your DNGAF attitude that shows her that you're beyond all that - you're becoming your own man, who doesn't rely on her for his sense of wholeness. You can get that from God, as you've already started doing in step 5.

In response to u/rocknrollchuck's comment, getting a genetic test after the baby is born is usually only $150-300. It's not that bad. If possible, do it without telling her. That's just going to be an unnecessary fight and it only reconciles your own peace of mind. It's also gives you a leg-up if she ever tries to threaten to leave you because you'll know the viability of her threat and she won't. If it's yours, you're good. If it's not, then you decide how you want to proceed. If you want to raise the child as your own, do nothing and let the presumption of paternity stand (given that the child was born during a marriage) until divorce may one day rear its head, in which case you pull out the results. If you don't want to raise the child, just file a complaint to disestablish paternity whenever you feel like it. With DNA test results, you don't need an attorney to do this and the court will have to grant the complaint.

Would you date woman who had sex with a Muslim before?

2 upvotes · 23 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Nah, trolls need to learn. Keep it down.

Would you date woman who had sex with a Muslim before?

2 upvotes · 23 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I know u/redpillwonder removed this thread - but this comment is too funny not to approve so at least OP can read it. Keep an eye on the respectful tone, in general, but I think when responding to a troll this is warranted.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (10/17/18)

2 upvotes · 18 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Life Mission - To glorify God with all my spirit, all my body and all my mind by pursuing discipline, virtue and excellence in all that I am called to.

Sounds cool, but what's the end-goal? How will you know when you've accomplished this mission? Or perhaps another way to put this would be: What's your vision for accomplishing that mission?

If you don't know the end-destination or have a clear picture of what your life should look like 50 years from now, your mission is too vague to be of value, even if it's fully of Christian words and cool sounding stuff.

Have Read - Listened to: RM (2x), NMMG (3x), WISNIFG (3x), WOTSM. Read MAP, MMSLP, SGM, Sixteen Commandments of Poon, Book of Pook, Prayer by Keller, Extreme Ownership, Purpose Driven Life, Reading - The Bible (in one year), The Subtle Art of Not Giving a * (SAONGAF), listening to Models.

Any attention to the sidebar content here?

Diet

Home-made tacos. As long as you can limit the cheese and stick to hard-shells, it's basically all meat and veggies and one of the most delicious things in existence. Soft shells tend to add more carbs and calories than hard, so you do have to be careful with the tortillas. I tend to over-stuff my hard shells so that I eat less shell and more meat/veggies. Also: make your own salsa.

I asked my wife if she noticed I lost weight. "Not really".

Yeah, you already know what's wrong here.

life mission and how to drill that down to career, family, body, finances and ministry.

So "ministry" is the last of 5 split priorities. I know you probably didn't mean them in a particular order, but it shouldn't be on that list in the first place. It is the clothes line on which all the other things hang.

How does your career contribute to your ministry, or how can you implement your ministry in your career? How do you minister to your family or can you utilize the members of your family to help you minister outside the home so it becomes a team effort? How does getting fit help you minister to others? How can your finances contribute to your ministry? None of these things matter if they're not making a difference for eternity. "Whether you eat or drink, or whatever you do, do it all for the glory of God" (1 Cor. 10:31).

Also downloaded and started reading the the RPC sidebar pdf

Ah, there it is.

Any advice or suggestions on how to handle SF?

Yeah, pick her up and move her. Want doggy? Flip her over, grab her by the waist and hoist her up to your balls. Want cowgirl? Start in missionary, grab her arms, and flip yourself back until she's hoisted up on you. Whatever position you're looking for, as long as you're strong enough you can toss and turn her whichever way you prefer. You might find she actually gets into it more when you're taking charge in the bedroom like that.

we rarerly go out or socialize outside of church

Yeah, fix that right away. Get some friends. It sounds cheesy, but go on play dates. I met with a new guy at my church last week at the park so our kids could play together while we hung out, then I invited him to grab dinner with me afterward. It was chaos, but it was fun. As you meet new people, your social network grows. As your social network grows, your popularity (otherwise notoriety) grows. As you become more popular, you garner more female attention. As you garner more female attention, dread increases.

I have a rule of thumb that I follow about 75% of the time:

- 60+ second convo with one new person every day
- Introduce myself to 1 new person at church every week
- Set up a time to meet someone new over coffee, dinner, lunch, etc. once a week

The 60-second convo is meant to get you used to interacting with strangers and making friends where you never thought you'd find them. The church introduction is part of gaining influence in your spiritual home, as the people who are known in the congregation are the ones who have the most influence over the leadership. The coffee/dinner/lunch times are where you actually solidify some of the new contacts into your social network. The reason it's only 75% is because of that one: sometimes you have to follow-up with people already in your social circle, which can take time away from engaging with new people.

I have thoughts and ideas of getting more involved at church with ministries and maybe even starting some. But, the reality is - I need to own it at home first.

Sure, but don't let that be a cop-out. I've used it as a cop-out. I've seen dozens of men who have too - men who had decent family lives and home ministries, but weren't willing to think bigger until their homes were better. Part of leading your home is modeling ministry for your family, which means going outside the home so that those in your home can see your lifestyle and know what they're shooting to be like and do down the road through your discipleship of them.

For Women: Getting Your Beta to Man Up

2 upvotes · 17 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

How so?

Beta is always bad: Change my mind

2 upvotes · 12 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I like this. Well said.

On Biblical Justice and Rape

2 upvotes · 10 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Amen - though the law does still inform us, because for some people sanctification isn't automatic.

On Biblical Justice and Rape

2 upvotes · 10 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

We don't follow Jewish law simply because Jewish law says so. It is not a binding standard over non Jews. But it does still hold advisory capacity in that it reveals the character of the God we intend to orient our hearts toward. With that in mind, to answer your first set of questions:

1. God did require it for the benefit of a specific people in a specific time. But the OT law does not transcend all cultures over all time. Am I in sin for having my son circumcised on the day he was born instead of the 8th day? No. The circumstances making the 8th day optimal are no longer a medical concern. The law was made for man, not man for the law.
2. Of course we uphold what Jesus and Paul instruct - but not because the law said so; rather it's because we cannot possibly act in faith when we are knowingly abandoning what Christ taught. Also note that they don't cite the law as the reason for their exhortation - "the law says so, so you'd better do it!" They cite heart issues for refraining that standard.
3. We can't, but God can, which he did through Christ (except maybe on a technical theological level, which is that my standard was true even old testament times). Also, justice is highly context dependent - something even the ancient Hebrews understood and applied before blindly killing disobedient children.

Simply put the idea that the New Covenant invalidates the entirety of the Old Covenant is just not a critically reasoned position

I can't speak for the critics, but I can quote Hebrews 8:13 - "By calling this covenant 'new' he has made the first one obsolete; and what is obsolete and outdated will soon disappear." I'm not sure how you get around that.

some of it was retained (prohibitions against adultery, theft, murder, etc.)

Right. But they weren't retained as the law. The whole point of Jesus bringing these up in the sermon on the mount is to show that these are all really heart issues and not just the law for the law's own sake - and even then he's speaking to Jews in a time when that law was directly over them.

Again, we are not under the law, but that doesn't mean the law is uninformative. I owe no obligation to any old testament Jewish law, but I do owe an obligation to the author of those laws. He has not imposed those laws as a burden over me, but they do guide my expression of faith through what it reveals of the God I love and serve and how I might reflect his character to the world. This is what it means to be free from the law and free from sin but a slave to righteousness. Paul doesn't say, "You're not under the law ... except those ones. You're still under those ones."

Paul never used the term "Trinity"

Indeed, but he did most certainly distinguish between Father, Son, and Spirit - the first couple verses of romans makes that clear. I'm not married to the word trinity. I am married to the biblical concepts that compel that conclusion. No such compulsion exists in the bible for a tripartate view of the law.

ceremonial ... civil ... moral

Yeah, I fully understand the distinctions, but you still haven't provided a biblical basis for the distinction. By creating one for ourselves, we're developing our own man-made standard for which laws we're going to follow and not. In my book, that's not cool and is dangerously close to liberal theology. Never impute man made philosophies on scripture and theology.

What you do with the civil laws is certainly appropriate, though. You are drawing principles from the law about who God is and letting that be a guide rather than a strict statute to be observed as an authority over us.

I agree with pretty much everything you said on the moral law. As you note: it's not wrong because some verse in Deuteronomy or Leviticus said so. It's wrong because it breaks the image of God that we are meant to reflect to the world, and which our faith compels us to bear. I don't avoid killing people because some verse in Exodus told me not to. I don't do it because I love my God: heart over law.

I hope that makes more sense. I don't think things have to be as complicated as the human-created tripartate law line of theology makes it.

Tag: u/rocknrollchuck

On Biblical Justice and Rape

2 upvotes · 10 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You successfully avoided the red herring! Good job. Most people answer that Jesus died for us, so John 13:34-35 is about radical sacrificial love. But Jesus says "have loved" in the past tense. He hadn't died yet.

Your answer appropriately gives one sub point nested beneath what I think Jesus actually meant. But notice the subtle, yet extremely relevant difference. In the parable of the good Samaritan Jesus is addressing "who is my neighbor?" in the context of "love your neighbor as yourself."

But "love your neighbor as yourself" is different from "as I have loved you." In John 13 Jesus was talking to the 12. How did he love them?

He disciplined them. He reproduced his character in them and trained them for his mission. He gave them a purpose and role that would have an impact on eternity - something no one else on earth could have done for them. He gave them something to believe in.

Serving them is merely a sub point under this. That is one of the many tools he employed while training them. Their relationship was defined by their status as his disciples, and the mission to spread the good news to all nations was the imperative of that discipleship relationship. But service, kindness, patience, teaching, rebuking, gentleness, etc. - these were all different methods he employed to get the job done and the methods he wanted them to continue to utilize ... you know, as opposed to other methods of spreading a message, like newsletters, brute force, political power, war, mass marketing, etc.

If my interactions with someone are not designed to lead them closer to Christ, am I really loving them through that action? After all, "God is love," so if he's not the goal, is it love? That's why Isaiah 64:6 notes, "Even their good deeds are as filthy rags." That's why Hebrews 11:6 says, "And without faith it is impossible to please God."

I hope that makes some sense. Just some things to think about. If morality is defined not by the law or our behaviors, but the orientation of our hearts, is it the same can be said for love and interpersonal interactions ... bringing us right back on point to one of the main purposes of this sub: how to build right and healthy interpersonal relationships. That's part of why I say marriage is discipleship. If I'm not discipling my wife, I don't truly love her anyway.

Married Man Game Part 2: Teasing

2 upvotes · 8 October 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

While I wouldn't say "just as visually stimulated," I certainly agree that visuals are important. The difference is that for a guy, visuals are about 90% of his evaluation of a woman. For a girl, the visuals might be 30% of her evaluation of a man, the other factors being things like social status, money, charm, confidence, etc.

More to the point, there was actually a psychological test done at one point on this very subject. People were shown various images and there were brain scans measuring how they reacted to those images. Kittens, landscapes, artwork, etc. would all give little blips. Things like a sandwich or a deck of cards gave no blips. A fit, naked woman made the meter ping like crazy - for both men and women. A fit, naked man, on the other hand, only got about the same level of blips for women as the landscape and artwork (and no blips for men, of course). My psychology professor humorously concluded that even straight women found a beautiful woman to be more visually stimulating than a handsome man.

What does living out Matthew 6:33 look like?

2 upvotes · 7 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Then find one of those people and teach them how to do what you know how to do. What you've just shared shows me that you actually are ready to disciple someone in the practice of having a quiet time.

My guess is that if I asked the same questions about some other things, like prayer or fellowship or bible study - when if you're not perfect, you are proficient enough at some of the 7 basics that you'd be able to give me the same answers on those things too. That's all discipleship is at its core: imparting to others what God has imparted to you.

What does living out Matthew 6:33 look like?

2 upvotes · 7 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Do you know anyone who doesn't know how to do that or isn't doing it in their life?

What does living out Matthew 6:33 look like?

2 upvotes · 5 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Do you know how to have a quiet time?

Avoiding awkwardness. We see each other every Sunday.

2 upvotes · 1 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You sound butthurt. Read the "anatomy of butthurt" post on the sidebar (I think it's in the 100 series).

I know you're not trying to attract her to you any more than she already is. But that's seriously how you probably came off. She thinks you're mad at her for something and you're being a pussy about it. "Just man up and tell me what your problem is!" is what she's thinking.

Whether or not you do is up to you. Don't worry about what she thinks or wants or what she texts or says. You do you. You don't owe her anything other than what you've committed. Be a man of your word. Beyond that, pave your own way and don't let her texts or demands shake you.

Now, if it were me, I'd be trying to preserve my influence in her life. Influence is power. It's how I get stuff done. I can only do so much by myself, but the more people I carry influence with, the wider my breadth of impact on the world becomes.

Conversely, she can start rumors about you that can ruin your influence. That's a risk you might have to take. I'd rather a false rumor be spread about me than for me actually to compromise my position before God by beating off to thoughts of her if I'm around her too much. So, you'll have to figure that out for yourself. Just because I'd be more inclined to talk to her, doesn't mean you should be. I expect my discipline and internal fortitude against ONEitis and sexual sin are stronger than some.

Feminism changing the modern American woman?

2 upvotes · 1 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Christians are in a weird position with respect to the classic red pill phases. On the one hand, we're naturally put off by immoral and obnoxious behaviors. On the other hand, we're meant to accept the world for what it is and find our peace in Christ instead.

Why do you care so much about whether or not women in America today respect men? You can't make them respect you. You can't go back in time to when they allegedly had a higher respect for men. The world is what the world is. The red pill is about accepting it and optimizing your life and influence in the world as it is, not trying to recreate some fantasy that you wish the world would become. You can have that fantasy in heaven. Until then, we live and work in the nitty gritty.

This is all a frame issue. If your emotions are defined by what women think about you, guess whose frame you're living in! Stop caring so much about what women think and just focus on what you've got on your own agenda and none of this will matter anymore. Is it important to be aware of? Absolutely. Is it something to get worked up about? Not a chance.

Avoiding awkwardness. We see each other every Sunday.

2 upvotes · 1 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Let's be real clear: "she's disinterested" because you were "texting heart emojis everyday." You really thought that was attractive? That just shows her how cheap and easy your affection and commitment comes.

She admits "she liked [you] since [you] were 16," but there are probably a couple dozen other guys she's liked in that time-frame too, right? There's a difference between, "I really like Bob" and "I exclusively like Bob." For some reason you have it in your head that she's just been waiting around for you since you were both 16 until you "effed it up."

You saying "I'll see you at 8:30 mass tomorrow" is heard by her as, "I'll keep waiting for you, however long it takes. Just let me know when you're ready and I'm here as your backup option."

You didn't actually comply with Rule 2 here. You haven't indicated what of the sidebar content you've read and not. My guess is you're pretty clueless about hypergamy. This is a basic ASBN ("alpha seed, beta need") dynamic happening. She wants to have her fun with all the exciting people, but she keeps you on the hook for the guy that maybe she'll settle down with one day, if a better beta doesn't come along first who could give her more than you could. That doesn't mean she's riding the CC around town, but it does mean that you're not the fun choice.

READ. THE. SIDEBAR. Go lift. No more cardio garbage. No "sprained wrist" excuse. You can still do squats, use the fly machine, situps, lats, etc. If you're pushing 18%+ body fat, feel free to run a couple miles after your lifts. But right now I'm guessing you're not impressive or imposing enough to catch her attention. If you don't take care of your body now, while you're single and have major flexibility in your time - how much less when you're married and have a family? That's a subconscious thought running through her head. Also, she assumes that if you're not improving your physical shape or taking it seriously (cardio is just maintenance), how can you be trusted to be disciplined and devoted in other areas of life?

Actually ... she's not thinking any of those things. She's not even thinking about you in the first place. That's just the subconscious reaction running through the back of her brain that causes her to tuck her neck in and scrunch her nose to her eyes when you text her.

To that end, if she doesn't give a crap about you, why do you give so many craps about her? Kill the ONEitis. If you don't want to "just be friends" with her, then don't be friends with her. She made her choice. Move on.

Now why the heck would you want to be passive aggressive to her? Has she wronged you in some way? No. She doesn't owe you anything. She doesn't even owe you the truth. She owes it to God and to herself to be an honest, God-fearing woman. But she doesn't owe that to you. So if she wants to lie about her availability so she can spend time with her coworkers, why is that any of your business?

"Because I'm the one she lied to!" I'm sure you'd say. But she doesn't owe you the truth. She hasn't willfully submitted herself to your authority. You're not married.

For that matter, what would happen if you confronted her about it? "I saw you hanging out with your co-workers last night, even though you told me you were going to be busy last night!" How do you think she's going to answer? I'll tell you: Yeah, I was busy last night. I made plans with my co-workers, so I couldn't hang out with you. Make sense?

How do I not make it awkward seeing her tomorrow during service?

Go find the hottest girl you can, pay her a ton of money to pretend to be your girlfriend for the day, and then introduce her to your ONEitis. Works every time in the sitcoms, right?

Look, awkwardness is a good thing. I thrive in the awkward. Every time a situation is awkward, that's prime opportunity to show just how alpha you can be. Alpha men don't give two flips about how awkward the room is. They have fun and do what they want to do regardless.

One of my signature moves is intentionally creating awkwardness just so I can cut through it. Awkwardness places people in a natural state of submissiveness. They'll do anything to alleviate the tension. It takes one person to tell them how to do that before they're following his lead.

This works between the sexes too. Go watch some LAHWF - the self-proclaimed "king of awkward." Have fun with it. Create those weird moments, then tell people you're just screwing with them. Enjoy life. Don't be controlled by the tension in the room. Be the one creating it and using it.

TRP Quarantined

2 upvotes · 28 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

How about Disney charging double to get into the Magic Kingdom if you wear anything Trump related?

Or when I went to New York last month and a store owner kicked out a group of high school tourists for wearing MAGA hats.

Just processing here ...

Reddit is a private company that controls a PUBLIC SPACE.

In my first amendment and civil rights classes, we talked a lot about this. I know there is substantial case law that if a business holds their doors open to the public, they must comply with certain non-discrimination policies found in the Equal Rights Act. That includes not discriminating on the basis of race, religion, sex, ethnicity, etc.

If a company is private they can discriminate all they want, per the now moot case about the late Boyscouts of America, may they rest in peace, which case (as I believe is still good law) allowed them to discriminate against homosexuals having a place of leadership because it was fundamental to their mission, morality, and purposes as an organization to maintain that separation at the time of that case.

So, the question is whether or not reddit is held open to the public because of the ease of access of the public entering its space and the fact that they use the open internet, or if it is a private company because the entire website is hosted on their own servers without public funding and only open to comment by those who sign their user agreement, etc. I don't know the area of law enough to sift that out.

YOu can't ban white males.

Ah, but can you quarantine them? That's what Reddit is hanging their hat on, I'm sure. They're not preventing people from saying whatever they want on TRP (at least not yet). They're simply putting up a warning. It's total garbage, of course, but they're being crafty about it.

You can't ban free speech.

True ... unless you make everyone sign a contract to use your website and they agreed in that contract to limit what kinds of speech they will engage in and not. Right?

To be clear, I'm 100% with you on there needing to be some legal recourse if all goes to hell. I'm just curious if that legal recourse actually exists under our country's current laws? I honestly don't know the answer.

TRP Has Been Quarantined - Meta Thread

2 upvotes · 28 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

So true. I feel like I've heard this before.

TRP Has Been Quarantined - Meta Thread

2 upvotes · 28 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Amen brother. Preach it!

Better Beta Divorce Strategy

2 upvotes · 27 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Well, I'm uniquely situated because I'm married to a higher-up with a big-4 accounting firm. We've had conversations about this stuff incessantly. Also, I intentionally build relationships with the forensic accountants who specialize in divorce litigation, so I have their unique knowledge and insights as an invaluable resources at the touch of a few buttons on my phone.

If you wanted to consult with someone, the forensic accountants who regularly practice in your county's domestic relations court are the best place to go. They're going to charge you by the hour, but there's no one who will know better - certainly not a tax preparer or general CPA.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/26/18)

2 upvotes · 27 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Just curious how you're assessing some of the 7 basics:

1. AoS: what's holding you back from a 10 here?
2. Quiet time: what you put for bible study is really a qt/devotional. You might be around an 8 purely because it's a group devotional and not much alone time. But group time still counts.
3. Bible study: What you described is more of a devotional. How often are you writing down numerous observations, doing word studies, cross referencing with parallel passages, reading commentaries, researching topics, etc.?
4. Scripture memory: are you going by what you've memorized in the last few weeks or by how much you've accumulated in your lifetime? Also, are your times meditative and contemplative or rote memorization? Scripture memory for me is more emotionally charged than prayer or quiet times, for reference.
5. Fellowship: could you invite others over to spend time with you and your family? Start a small group during lunch break at work with other believers on the job?
6. Evangelism: Nice!
7. Prayer: Sounds more like an 8 or 9.

Better Beta Divorce Strategy

2 upvotes · 26 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Good point.

How to Play the Game

2 upvotes · 25 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thinking you "won" the game shows that you're in the game in the first place. This is the biggest problem, which u/macmeeler addressed in the original post, so props to him.

Are there any attorneys here? Would a subreddit such as TRP have a case for libel/slander over the negative portrayal of it in American Horror Story?

2 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/askTRP

Not my area of law, but no.

Difficulty accepting my new reality.

2 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/askMRP

Well, after having written about 30% of it I scraped my outline and started over. Much of that previous content will be recycled and modified to be used in the new draft, so it's not a total loss. But I wanted to do a much better job targeting an audience in the book rather than raw information dumping.

Dread levels and having an infant (told to chill tf out)

2 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/askMRP

Does your wife participate in this alongside you or merely enable you?

I'm not downing your chosen career path. I agree it's noble. But as far as missions go, "My career is my mission" is the attitude from most every guy who ends up hiring me. It's exclusionary and doesn't take advantage of a woman's drive to live life alongside a high quality man. It treats her as an enabler to him, not a follower or helper.

Dread levels and having an infant (told to chill tf out)

2 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/askMRP

Because she exists to help you accomplish it. You lead, she follows. Where are you going? If you're going somewhere that she doesn't want to go, why would she follow you there?

I'm not saying you have to change your mission to suit your wife. If she doesn't want to follow, that's her business. But if your mission isn't attractive to any woman ... well, you've got a bigger problem.

Remember the captain/first mate example that gets used a lot. The mission is where the boat is headed. The captain determines the destination. But if the captain decided the bottom of a whirlpool is his destination, what person will ever want to sign up to be his first officer? And suppose the captain chose that mission after she already signed up for the job. Why would she want to bother doing her duties on the ship if the ship's just going to sink anyway?

Or if you set Antarctica as the destination and she loathes the thought of going there, why would she want to stay on board that ship? She's going to hop on a lifeboat and leave you. That's fine if you've got some other first officer ready to hop on board who does want to go to Antarctica or if you're willing to go it alone. But is that what you're really trying to accomplish here?

I joke about her "following you to the ends of the living room," but there really are some women who would follow a high-quality man to the ends of the earth. If you're already that high enough quality of a man, so be it. Make your mission to dive straight into the pits of hell and she might still join you. In the meantime, what are you doing to get her on board with your mission or to set boundaries at the efforts she tries to make to distract you? Gotta have that mission solidified before you can even get there.

You're Not Thinking Big Enough: Part 2

2 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Building a deck is a great short-term goal. It's obviously not a mission, but good on you for at least picking something to start with. I actually just rebuilt my deck (with a friend's help) a few months ago. It was a lot of hard work and a lot of lonely hours ripping up the old boards, pulling nails, etc. But we have a beautiful finished product now. I can see what I accomplished with my time.

As you think bigger about your mission, how will you measure your progress? If you have no way to measure progress, then the mission is too vague to have any actual value. Good reply. Now come back by Monday with a post of your own updating the community about what your mission is and how you're going to accomplish it.

Purple Pill and the Christian Red

2 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a good comment and requires more consideration from the mod team. I have seen some excellent posts from non mods too, but I agree with your overall sentiment.

u/rocknrollchuck u/redpillwonder u/osmiumzulu - thoughts?

Purple Pill and the Christian Red

2 upvotes · 20 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I couldn't agree more. I almost went into the early church, which existed predominantly without New Testament Scripture as Scripture, which wasn't canonized until a couple centuries later. In essence, the epistles were "men swapping notes." But I didn't want to belabor the point in an already lengthy post.

Purple Pill and the Christian Red

2 upvotes · 20 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

So in essence, Christ is Red and we are Blue. When the Holy Spirit indwells us, we begin the transition from Blue to Red, from Self to Christlikeness.

To refrain one of my notes, salvation doesn't make a man red. He doesn't become red merely because the Holy Spirit comes on in. People stifle the Holy Spirit all the time. All I was saying was that Christians should inherently understand the need to internalize the red pill because it's a process we already experience on a separate plane with salvation.

Separately, what I was getting at is that a man is purple if he views Christianity as an external measure he's trying to live up to. But what the secular crowd doesn't realize is that for some of us this isn't an external measure; it's a fundamental part of who we are and to abandon it would be to abandon our own frame. So, I'm not applying the red pill in a way that fits into Christianity. I'm applying it in a way that satisfies my own desires and compulsions, just as the secular red crowd does.

You're Not Thinking Big Enough

2 upvotes · 18 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is beautiful. My wife has often done the same for me as well. There have been countless times when she has built relationships with other parents in our neighborhood who I otherwise never could have connected with, despite the fact that I'm the extrovert and she's the introvert. We naturally connect and relate with different types of people, giving me an opportunity to enhance my social network through her efforts. Next thing I know, I'm playing racquetball with the neighbor a couple streets over who I'd never met until just a few days before.

Your story resonates with me.

Field Report: Beginner Moves - this works!

2 upvotes · 17 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The Good

- You're trying new things that you were too chicken to do before
- You're not going Rambo yet, maintaining enough of your old ways to keep the transition smooth instead of all at once
- You're starting to realize that her antics are something to be laughed at, not taken seriously
- You didn't apologize for when you did nothing wrong

The Bad

- You still took her too seriously
- You felt compelled to text her
- You let her responses to you affect how you feel

- You're defining your "RP progress" by how she behaves toward you
- It took you 3 minutes to think of, "I want to have sex with you tonight."
- You came here to share your excitement, looking for validation from us, under the guise of wanting to teach men that telling your wife "I want to have sex tonight" is a good idea ... and assuming that this wasn't somehow implicitly obvious to every man who wants to have sex tonight (although to be fair, I do remember days when this wasn't obvious).

To keep avoiding Rambo mode, pick 1 or 2 things on the "bad" list and work on it this week, then another for the next week. Don't try to fix all at once.

Living in Christ's Frame - Defeating the Anger Stage and Finding Emotional Stability

2 upvotes · 17 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I think you're misunderstanding amused mastery. It's not poking an angry bear because you find it funny or amusing. It's having a transcendent perspective that lets you see things in their proper place, which often results in it being amusing or laughable when we see how worked up some people get about trite things.

This blog covers it nicely:

amused mastery is taking a "big picture" outlook that life is a fun game you've mastered, so you respond to challenges and stress in a confident, relaxed, detached, and amused way.

He uses the example of his daughter spilling oats on the floor shortly before an open house. He could have gotten angry at her. Instead, he recognized that she's just a little girl who made a mistake. It's cute. It's laughable. Sure, it can be annoying too, but why get down about trite things? He's better than that. He sees a bigger picture than oats on the floor.

Jesus does this all the time. His famous "Martha, Martha" speech is one example. Screwing with the nagging pharisees is another. Submitting to Pilate's and Herod's ridicule is another. Dealing with the disciples on the stormy boat is another. And so on ...

With regard to his bride, it's late, but off the top of my head, the letters to the 7 churches in revelation come to mind.

I feel sort of held back

2 upvotes · 17 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

i have to think so much more, especially around woman im really attracted to I've gotta save something for the book ;)

In all seriousness, though, I'm posting a quick response that should at least start a conversation. Let me know your thoughts and if it targets your point of curiosity.

An introduction

2 upvotes · 17 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm glad to hear from you. It sounds like you've got a good head about you and you're moving in a good direction. If you need anything from us, we're here to help. I recommend the OYS threads as a great place to start. I think they get posted on Wednesdays, but you can still use last week's too.

My question: What's your mission? What are you doing or working toward right now that you'll be beaming to tell God about on Judgment Day?

will there be a difference?

2 upvotes · 13 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's true. The way non-Christians practice it certainly can lead to sin. That doesn't mean it's that way for everyone.

To be clear, I'm not saying you have to flirt. If it violates your conscience, then surely it's sin. Romans 14:14 is clear enough of that. Just be cautious not to condemn other people for doing something that isn't wrong simply because you have a conviction against it. That's equally sinful.

Living in Christ's Frame - Defeating the Anger Stage and Finding Emotional Stability

2 upvotes · 12 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I like it. That's a good saying.

Field Report- Dropping the Betas, Standing my ground.

2 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Nah. "Getting pissy" isn't something nice guys do around others. They internalize it and supplicate. Although it certainly comes from a beta frame, "getting pissy" often means alpha behaviors - trying to show dominance over others, demanding their own way, acting controlling, etc.

Consider how OP describes him:

- "he never wants to do what i want to do" - Okay, so he has his own plans and agendas that he doesn't cave to OP.
- "then 1st guy says lets move seats. I said 'you won't be happy unless its always your way'" - He makes a decision and leads others in carrying it out; OP just didn't like that decision
- "1st guy ... just decided as he does to make plans for everyone that fits him" - He expects others to live in his frame
- "1st guy ignores us" - He DNGAF
- "2nd Guy passive as ever just followed 1st Guy" - Other people follow his lead
- "He had no ride, stuck with 1st Guy to drop him off" - Others look to him as the answer to their problems
- "As we caught up to 1st and 2nd Guy" - He's ahead, they're lagging
- "1st Guy starts being ["passive"] aggressive as he is ordering at the counter ... not even looking at us" - He DNGAF
- "Said see you to 1st guy, he said 'we'll see'" - He DNGAF and displays amused mastery
- "as im dropping 3rd guy off, 1st guy rings the 3rd guys" - He initiates.
- "1st Guy, comes up, sits next to me. at this point i was waiting for his apology ... He acted exactly like he did on the phone with 3rd guy, all nice and hey bro this" - He DNGAF and applied amused mastery; he also initiated and didn't get butthurt over the obvious conflict
- "i can hear 1st Guy screaming my name several times across the church to get my attention" - Again, DNGAF and amused mastery, treating the interaction like a game

I'm not saying 1st Guy actually is alpha. But those are literally every time OP mentioned 1st guy and virtually all of those examples are expressions of alpha traits, so what else can I conclude? Blue pill though he may be, I'm not seeing beta descriptions of supplication or being unreasonably nice, etc.

What I see going on here is that 1st Guy is the AMOG. OP is ticked because he wants to be the AMOG but he hasn't earned people's respect like 1st guy has. OP writes this post as a victim puke about how some other guy is out-alphaing him in church.

Tag: NoFaithInThisSub - since you like more comprehensive break-downs.

Field Report- Dropping the Betas, Standing my ground.

2 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Amen.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/05/18)

2 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

almost all their conversation was text, that's her preferred method. She hates FB and IG messenger

Texting gives you time to think of the perfect response before sending, making it easier to be flirty. Active conversation, whether by phone, in-person, or through chat messaging, makes it more difficult to maintain a certain persona that's different from your actual self. This is significant because it indicates she was actively trying to impress him rather than feeling like she could be herself around him. It tells me she was looking to cheat and not just an "it just happened" kind of thing, as occurs more often when she's vulnerable with another guy.

She is 165 lbs and NOT happy about it

Because you keep shoving food in her face. Stop that.

The BC and SSRIs are mostly being blamed for it

Women will blame anything and everything else whenever they can. Let her blame it, then take away the excuse. You take charge of the birth control - use a condom instead of her being on the pill. I don't care if you don't like condoms. Suck it up. Pull out if you prefer that instead. If you're done having kids, get a vasectomy. Stop making her responsible for the birth control. See above for the SSRI thing. Let her blame the SSRIs, then take them away so she has no more excuses.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/05/18)

2 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I don't think he was prepared for the research you've obviously done on this. Props.

Field Report- Dropping the Betas, Standing my ground.

2 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I think you're very confused about what it means to be alpha. You're calling these guys beta, then describing very alpha behaviors. "Beta" is not a synonym for "I don't like them" or "less alpha than me." If anything, your own account portrays you as having the beta behaviors, also evident in many of your comments here. You get way too invested in what other people think and do. Just because you're a stiff douchebag on the outside doesn't mean you're alpha if you're otherwise gung up on all this on the inside. Other commenters have already hit on this though.

It could be that these men are very blue pill in their ideologies. I think that's what you really mean. But a person can be a blue alpha.

Also, you're taking what I said too far. I didn't mean for you to be tactless and crude in how you chat with her - or even worse: about her, in front of her.

Also, just because you want a girl doesn't mean it's wise to pursue her. My advice was less about getting you to hit on someone and more about exposing inconsistent ideologies you were expressing in your previous post. If you do choose to hit on a girl, taken or not, weigh everything involved and be wise in how you go about it.

I can name countless respectable men who stole their wives from other men (ther best story is Abraham Lincoln). I know it can work. But all these stories involve tact and wisdom.

Field Report- Dropping the Betas, Standing my ground.

2 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is an excellent response.

Field Report- Dropping the Betas, Standing my ground.

2 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's not quite how frame works. It's not about getting your way all the time. It's about not being manipulated or pressured to go someone else's way against your intentions. That said, sometimes (often?) it's wise or beneficial to do what others want or suggest. One great reason for this is to put on the character of Christ - presumably something you should want to do.

Jesus knew how to butt heads. But more often he served people. He didn't do it out of weakness or obligation, but out of desire and strength. This is what it means to be a Christian and how we should model our lives after Jesus.

I think you would do well to learn to be more of a servant. "For even the son of man did not come to be served, but to serve."

Introduction and Backstory

2 upvotes · 7 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I think u/rocknrollchuck already did. At least he suggested it. Not sure if it happened or not.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/05/18)

2 upvotes · 6 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Are you sure you are able to successfully take this on with all the other things you have going on right now? Seems like your plate is awfully full at the moment.

After next week I'll be done with my trials, so my personal schedule clears up, despite having the increased obligations with the kids. As long as child care is covered, it's a worthwhile investment for me.

NoFITS September Update

2 upvotes · 6 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

not to DEER (is that correct terminology usage?) is that That's actually exactly what you were doing: rationalizing your behavior. But you redeemed it by owning it at the end ;)

"out of respect" is just a figure of speech really. I have manners towards him

Ah, but who says it's "good manners" not to hit on another guy's girl? Where is that written? Does the Bible say this? Obviously if they were married, that would be different. But if there's no ring, she's fair game.

Nevertheless, if you're genuinely not interested, that makes more sense and should have been your up-front statement on the matter.

Ok i will read Rational Male, then Married Man SLP, then The Way of the SM, then maybe after some practice, i will be a bit more alpha. Does the recommended reading path look suitable?

It can be. Rational Male is more the "why" behind what you do. MMSLP is the "how to do it" part, so you might want to bump that up first. But again, it's geared more toward married men, so might not be directly on-point for you anyway. I just know it has a whole section on covering alpha and beta behaviors and the distinction between them. That said, it doesn't go into being alpha, it only addresses behaviors of alpha men or that can give an appearance of alphaness. At some point the outward appearance needs to be internalized.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/05/18)

2 upvotes · 5 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Props on the lifts! I still have you on the bench, but your squats and deadlifts have flown past me. Quite impressive.

I did look at porn last week. Pretty disappointed in myself.

If it helps, I like what Brother Lawrence once said: "That when he had failed in his duty, he only confessed his fault, saying to GOD, 'I shall never do otherwise, if You leave me to myself; 'tis You must hinder my falling, and mend what is amiss.' That after this, he gave himself no further uneasiness about it."

Often times the self-battery we inflict over our sin does more to keep us in the sin than it does to help. Logically one would expect that impressing greater guilt on ourselves for our failures would be a better motivator to keep us from repeating the problem. Theologically, we know this is a wrong approach and that Jesus is the only answer and that he doesn't condemn us, so neither should we condemn ourselves.

She hasn't ever really dated in her life, she tells me, so the fact that she's doing all this with me means it's kind of serious for her.

It's also an indication of how quickly she'll drop her boundaries. Be cautious there. It's not a red flag, but it is a yellow flag to keep an eye on.

Better not mess this up.

Kick that attitude. That's going to put undue pressures on you that could affect your behaviors. If you mess it up, oh well. She's not a unicorn. Life won't be over if you lose her. Maintain an abundance mentality and don't treat her like she's a scarce commodity. I think you already know this, but it's worth repeating anyway.

girl from nearby Christian University who's an airheaded stunner with strong faith and is head over heels for me. Checks a lot of the waifu boxes.

I'm intrigued. What's the deal there?

This is the most challenging semester I've faced and I find that it's hard to get the ball rolling with studying.

Spending time with girls is good, but having 5-10 "other plates" might be too much. Don't get so obsessed with romanticism that it becomes a distraction from your independent pursuits. Otherwise you're living outside of your own frame. It's not any one person's frame you're in; it's more like an ideology's frame.

I find myself longing for her ... separation anxiety ... remind myself ... that she's lucky to be dating me

Dang, that's a lot in so few words. Longing for a woman is a good thing. Separation anxiety obviously isn't. From our past phone conversations, I know that you can have a tendency toward co-dependence. Keep that in check as much as possible. That said, your self-reminder is right on point and can be a good way to orient yourself toward stability.

the other girl who is pressing me constantly, wondering what I'm doing, flattering me, and adorning her texts with emojis out the wazoo

Interesting. These are some yellow flags. It tells me that she has little restraint. So, if you're Chad 1.0, how much restraint will she have when she gets bored of you and meets Chad 2.0? Highly emotional women without restraint are more inclined toward branch-swinging. /u/OsmiumZulu once had a post on the dangers of having "the hot wife" - maybe go back and look that up. OZ, perhaps it's time for a sequel to that? It has been a while.

If things get more serious with any of these girls I'm sure the tests will come though

Indeed. You're still in school right now. Once joint responsibility enters the picture (which really doesn't trigger until after marriage), it's a whole new game, hence "RP on hard mode." There's also an element of NRE going on that will make things more difficult as that fades. This is why vetting is so important. Even if the yellow flags don't turn out to be an issue, it's worth contemplating them all the same.

Spiritual

I'd like some more elaboration on this. Is there any way we can help you in this area?

Long Distance Relationships

2 upvotes · 4 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I was in an LDR with my wife for over a year while we were dating. I think /u/Deep_Strength (our new mod!) has said he was also in an LDR with his wife for a time. So yes, it's doable.

That doesn't mean it's recommended. You mentioned some good reasons: frame, instability, being used.

My biggest reason for advising against it is that it fosters ONEitis. Both people end up in a scenario where they can only fantasize about what it would be like to be with the other person. That fantasy world creates an emotional attachment to what you think she will be like rather than what she is actually like. That's the real danger.

Having periodic in-person visits actually doesn't help the problem. It makes it worse. These visits are usually highly charged. For one, you usually want to make the most of each visit, so you plan all kinds of fun things to do and don't learn what it's like just to live life alongside one another. Second, it gives a short dose of emotions as a drug - enough to keep you wanting more, but not enough to move past it and see things for how they really are. As a result, the short visits inflame the ONEitis rather than giving an opportunity to move past it. Third, it sets a false precedent for what life would be like with the person, exacerbating the fantasy land problem. Fourth, most people in LDRs are that way because one or the other is in school, which leaves plenty of room for a relatively immature concept of what married life will be like in a post-education working adult life, which changes a lot of things. That's not to say kids in school/college shouldn't date and get to know women or even that they shouldn't marry; it simply means that becoming committed during that time-frame involves a lot more of the "unknown" than they tend to realize, making them commit to a phantom or fantasy rather than a known quantity/context.

Again, LDRs are certainly doable, but the reasons they're unwise aren't just because of the one-sided nature of the relationship (after all, plugged in men enjoy the emotional hoopla of it all almost as much as the women do), but because of the inaccurate representation it gives about the couple's future prospects, leading to a tendency toward unwise decision-making patterns.

Social Influence and Defying Context

2 upvotes · 31 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This makes no comprehensible sense at all.

I'm still single ... just married [MRP Draft]

2 upvotes · 31 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good question. In addressing relationships I always like to look to God as the example. Do we get all of him? Do we know everything God ever thinks or does? Of course not. Our heads would explode. At best, the bits and pieces we get to see of God are mere shadows of his actual brilliance. A man should be the same way - always making his wife want more, just as we always want more of God.

But that doesn't mean we're without the ability to have emotional and intimate connections with all three persons of God. Indeed, God meets us in very intimate ways, including in heart-to-heart moments. These moments just aren't about him revealing himself to us; they're about him speaking into our needs in that moment.

When a husband tries to fabricate a heart-to-heart moment by self-revealing things without an appropriate context to do so, not only does it come off as contrived, but it fails to emulate the way that God reserves those moments for situations when we need it. He doesn't prompt a new revelation to someone just because he feels compelled to do so - it's always looking out for our good, our sanctification, and our reassurance. It's God's way of expressing how to pass a comfort test. But then, if we try to abuse his goodness by becoming demanding (i.e. a fitness test), we see God portray a different aspect of himself. "I'll comfort you when you're down, but don't expect me to pander to you when you're acting like a harpy," is the attitude I sense.

What parts of yourself are you keeping reserved

Usually when people ask this question they're mistakenly thinking that a "part of yourself" is your past. What runs through their head is, "So, should I tell her about what I did when I was 16 that got me arrested or not? Or should I bring up the way the kids used to make fun of me on the playground and how that hurt me?" This all stems from a mistaken assumption that your past defines you or makes up your identity. It doesn't.

Simply put, I'm not who I was as a kid, before Christ, or even yesterday. If I'm constantly improving (as I believe I am), then I am a new and better person every day, subject to the standard stock market paradigm (ups and downs, but overall moving upward). I'm not my future either. I might become that, but I can't say for sure because I don't have a magical crystal ball. I am who I am today. The part of "myself" that I keep reserved is simply anything and everything that my wife doesn't need to know to: (1) fulfill her role as my helper, (2) trust in me as her leader, and (3) experience the comfort and provision that I have to offer her. If it falls in one of those three categories, I'll self-disclose in contextually appropriate times and ways. If it's outside of those three, I STFU and do what I'm going to do. If she wants to know what I'm doing or why I'm doing it, she can ask. And if she asks, I can decide at that point whether she needs to know for any of the above reasons. But trying to foster a heart-to-heart moment through proactive self-disclosure is a display of low value and can have the exact opposite effect of what you're intending.

how do you have intimate heart-to-heart conversations while still having some part of yourself locked up?

By staying in context. If our heart-to-heart conversation is about a difficulty parenting one of our kids, I don't need to go blabbing about how some girl at the gym was eyeing me down. That just doesn't make any sense. Likewise, if she sees a girl eyeing me down and brings up her insecurities about it, I stay on topic and pass the comfort test rather than blabbing about my inner-most thoughts on what god spoke to me in my quiet time that morning. That makes no sense. Stay on context. Have heart-to-heart conversations about the topic at hand, but don't think to yourself, "I feel really close to her right now, I just want to share everything!" That's dangerous.

Are you just keeping secrets for the sake of giving her something to chase?

No. But as a practical matter, it's not realistic for me to tell my wife everything. There's only so much time in the day. So, I have two options: (1) I can be absent-minded and just disclose whatever is on my mind without discretion on the premise that somehow this is "being open and honest" with my wife, or (2) I can be strategic and intentional about what I disclose and talk about with my wife in order to lead our conversations down paths that are beneficial for the family. Between the two, which sounds like the more effective husband: the one who is "being open and honest" all the time just because "that's what married people are supposed to do" ... or the one who is being intentional about leading conversations?

Is it "my deepest darkest desires" type secrets?

It can be, but doesn't have to be.

How important is a woman's sexual past to you?

2 upvotes · 31 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Look to Jesus. Does he demand purity in the relationship? Yes. Does he expect it in light of the present "landscape" (as u/osmiumzulu put it) of a post-fall world? Nope. That's why he sanctified us, just as a husband is called to sanctify his wife.

Mark my words: there are no perfect women. If she's a virgin, that's great, but it also means you're sacrificing somewhere else. Decide which is more important to you. My wife and I were both virgins. If I had to do it again, I'd make the same standard (except in the case of a widow). If I were 50+ and no longer pulling 20s looking to marry me, I'm sure I'd be open to change on that.

I'm still single ... just married [MRP Draft]

2 upvotes · 29 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well said.

Reviving the "right of passage" culture through Monk Mode

2 upvotes · 28 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I like this. I do want to note up-front, though, that "monk mode" has a fairly specific definition in RP terminology, although it seems to be applied in two phases:

- Phase 1: Cutting off all efforts to pick up women/sex up your wife so you can focus exclusively on self-improvement without feeling butthurt or getting ONEitis.
- Phase 2: Adding back in efforts to pick up women/sex up your wife, but with no expectation of actually closing - the goal is simply to practice things that couldn't be practiced in phase 1, like kino, flirting, etc.

What you're proposing is close-ish to phase 1 in concept ... you're just taking it much further than the term originally implies. Either way, this sounds like it could be truly beneficial for a lot of single guys. I wouldn't recommend some of this for those in established families, like moving to another city or not communicating with your family.

Ready to get engaged (in light of past PMO)

2 upvotes · 27 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Is that what you're getting at? Assigning credit where it's due and taking responsibility more directly?

That's valuable too, and your rephrase is more on the right track. I don't disagree with anything you said there. But what I'm really getting at is not being controlled by a non-existent meta concept, like "the relationship."

I don't think it would be right at this point for me to call things off as casually as you might after a couple dates.

Why not? Because the answer to that goes more into what I was talking about. Good thing you already elaborated.

So we're unofficially engaged and my original question was whether I'm ready to make it official.

Gotcha, so you feel a sense of obligation to her because you talked about maybe getting engaged sometime soon. You're not even engaged yet, but the fact that she knows you thought about getting engaged is now changing and affecting your behaviors.

dropping my GF at this point because I meet (or know I can probably someday meet) someone a point more attractive seems very selfish of me and dehumanizing to her

I like u/OsmiumZulu's example in one of his sidebar posts: Imagine you only ever got to pick one house to live in for the rest of your life. You have thoughts and expectations on how big you want your family to be, how much square footage the house has, how easy you want to have bathroom access, how big of a bed you can fit in your room, a place kids can play, etc. and you find a house that has most or all these amenities by the time you're in your mid-20s. You're aware there are tons of better options that would cost a bit more, but would do a much better job meeting all of your long-term needs and expectations ... you'd just have to save up for a little longer. Maybe by the time you're 30 you can afford a newer model that's larger and would more appropriately meet all of your needs with extra amenities that you wouldn't even know you needed until you moved in.

Well, you already told the owner of the first house, "I'm interested, and I might even put an offer in pretty soon," but you never actually did make an offer. After all, it's a big decision and once you buy this house you'll never be allowed to look at or live in another house again for the rest of your life.

What you're telling me is that you're going to stop your search because the existing owner got their hopes up about you saying you might put in an offer soon. You also haven't communicated what the offer was that you intended to put in. Have you given her a list of your expectations for the marriage so she knows in advance whether or not she even wants to sell to you in the first place? She might have a different set of expectations and you're both just assuming that whatever the offer will be, it'll be good ... until your offer actually comes in and she realizes, "Oh, he wants me to fix the deck and replace the hot water heater? And he's only wanting to pay 80% of the list price?"

WISNIFG's bill of assertive rights No. 4 - You have the right to change your mind.

If you're not absolutely sure about this, (1) get yourself in a mental state where you're not hooked on her first, then process your decision under sober judgment, then (2) when you do make your proposal, be extremely upfront and honest with her about the concerns you have that would give you pause about marrying her. If it's her looks, let her know. "But that's mean!" No, it's called being honest. Don't let social stigma about what's mean or not dupe you into making a mistake on something that you can't take back later. I mean, Jesus called part of his bride "luke warm" and said he'd spit them out of his mouth. He called people a brood of vipers. Paul cussed at people. He told others to emasculate themselves. There's room for blunt honesty. If she doesn't know what you're really expecting out of the home in advance, that's like buying a home without a home inspector telling you what needs worked on and whether or not it's something that could actually ever be improved - or maybe there's some city ordinance that prevents you from ever building an expansion on the home, so you're stuck with what you bought at first ... and 18 years later when you've got 4 kids that are all teenagers you're now regretting it.

You get one chance. After salvation, this is literally the most important decision you'll make in your life. Are you really going to be so flippant as to say, "Well, she's expecting it, so I really don't feel right backing out now unless something really bad comes up that I didn't know about before."

It would be a "I read on the internet that the grass is greener somewhere else, so bye."

No, it's: "I feel like if I proposed anytime soon it would be because of some internal pressure. If I ever propose to someone, I want it to be a free choice, and not something I have to do. I know you're not the one who put that pressure on me - I did by saying I might propose, and then I'm the one who is hung up on how you might feel if I changed my mind, but that's not a healthy place for me to live in or to get engaged in. I need to know that you're not expecting a proposal and that we might very well break up someday - and that I have the freedom to do that, or else I can't ever propose from a place of confidence and stability."

And then, once you've got that down, you've laid the foundation for retracting what you said and breaking up - if that's what you decide to do. You've also left the door open for staying together - if that's what you decide to do. But at this point you're now your own man. You're not being controlled by some meta pressure that doesn't actually exist anywhere than in your own mind.

I'm sure you're not suggesting relationships should be without emotion, caring about each other, or enjoying each other's company.

Not at all - those are all good things.

Are you saying I shouldn't miss her at all, or just not too much (on some kind of spectrum)?

No. What I'm saying is that an emotional investment in the relationship that makes you feel compelled to be around her all the time and that would cause you emotional distress in her absence is unhealthy and precludes you from having sober judgment about the relationship. That emotional connection will wear off, statistically, between 6-24 months after the wedding day. That's when it will finally settle in that you're married for life and there's no going back and you're stuck with someone who you no longer feel emotionally compelled toward. Can you be okay with that? Do you actually like - even love - her enough to want to be with her for the rest of your life, even if you never felt emotionally toward her again the same as you feel today?

By God, I hope you will feel that emotion again periodically throughout your marriage. I know I do. But many people don't, just like many people never feel an emotional connection to God - yet we still have a choice on whether we abandon him or continue living right by him. Can you have the same devotion to the girl you marry? If the emotions are what's holding the relationship together right now, what will happen when they fade? If you haven't experienced the relationship without that emotional connection, then how do you know whether you'll be okay without them? That's all I'm saying. Emotions are good when they're good, but they're not a wise basis for decision-making, as emotions are often deceptive.

on some kind of spectrum

Not quite. If you could have an emotional connection indefinitely, that would be ideal. It's just unrealistic. Right now, even when you're furiously mad at her (and I hope you've experienced that by now!), you still have an emotional imperative toward her compelling you to resolve the issue rather than walk away. I'm saying you need to get rid of all of that pressure and embrace: "If I don't want to be here, I'm just going to leave" - and then, with that confidence and stability in mind, make the decision about whether or not you want to stay or leave, uninfluenced by internal emotional pressures.

It's not about ridding yourself of the emotions. It's about not being dependent on your emotions - that you can see past them and do what you want to do, even if it defies your emotional connectivity to her.

But if I don't miss her at all, how can I say I care about her, etc?

Subtle, but important distinction: Do you want to care about her, or do you want to care for her? Caring about someone means nothing. Caring for them means everything. I can stop caring about someone/thing in a heartbeat and never look back. That's an emotionally-driven concept. Caring for someone is more aligned with the biblical concepts of love as a behavioral disposition toward someone and not an emotion.

fulfillment and purpose is in Christ, then what value is there in having a wife?

That's an excellent question, which I believe is why Paul wrote 1 Cor. 7. His answer in that chapter: because if you don't get married, you'd end up having sex outside of marriage, which is a hindrance to living out your purpose in Christ. Remember that marrying for "love" was a predominantly foreign concept throughout virtually all of history, including biblical times.

if I get any emotional fulfillment from sex or if I feel loved through it, now I'm depending on my wife for fulfillment and I need to get back in my frame where I remember all my needs are met in Christ

No, you can certainly enjoy those things without having a co-dependence on them. The Bible is rife with passages about enjoying the good things God's given us. Embrace that openly - but like Ecclesiastes says, there will always be good and bad times and the distinction between the two should not phase your sense of wholeness and satisfaction in life with Christ.

I hope this helps provide some clarity. I don't mean to sound harsh, I just want to make sure you're acting in sober judgment.

Frame?

2 upvotes · 27 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, this is definitely on the sidebar. But frame isn't necessarily related to confidence. A man who has a strong frame has confidence, but a man without frame can be either confident or not. Confidence isn't what creates frame; it's a byproduct of having frame.

As OZ said, "Frame" is a man's point of origin. It's about who gets to decide how you think, feel, make decisions, etc.

- For some people, they live in society's frame. To a degree, this is unavoidable. You can't just will a million dollars into existence - there's a game that has to be played. But some people let it affect them on a deeper level so that their entire lives are ruled by societal expectations over them.
- For others, it's their wife/girlfriend. They let their internal sense of self-worth, decision-making processes, etc. be affected by what their SO thinks of them.
- For others, it's their ideologies. They hold certain philosophies about life that they refuse to break, despite the fact that those philosophies are holding them back from achieving their goals.

In the case of Christians, we hold theology as a foundation for our frame. Where secular RP embraces a man maintaining his own point of origin, we must maintain Christ's point of origin as a reference, and then develop our own sense of self within Christ's framework. This adds a layer of complexity, making frame more difficult in a Christian world view - but it's also far more powerful, as we literally are living out of infinite power when we exist within God's frame. So, between my own finite frame as a human, however strong I may make that, God's will always trumps it and that's where I must live. It's a glorious thing that God gives us individual identities beyond the communal identity we're given within his frame, as that then gives us the ability to continue applying an individual source of strength that uplifts the community and gives a foundation for attraction on an individual level.

Married Man With Girl Friends

2 upvotes · 26 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Okay, I have more time :p

NI is Negative Inquiry. When someone makes a negative statement toward you, it's the tactic of responding with a challenge to the merit of their negativity. So, if your wife says, "You never listen to me!" you respond, "What is wrong about me not listening to you?"

In virtually all cases, the wife will bring up blue pill concepts of "this is what married people are supposed to do" - but who gets to decide what is "supposed" to happen in the first place? The Bible, of course. So, you trail a line of questions to discern if there's anything actually unbiblical about your behaviors. Does the Bible command husbands to listen to their wives? I can't think of a verse that says so. So, is it actually "bad"? Well, maybe it is, maybe it isn't. The point isn't to prove that what you're doing is right - it's to get her thinking more rationally about her accusation in the first place.

But the real goal of NI is much, much deeper. With each response, a follow-up NI can take place until one of three things happens:

- You reach an actual conclusion on whether what you did is evil or not.
- She realizes that her accusation was really only about her personal preference and not anything inappropriate on a moral or biblical level.
- She converts the fitness test into a comfort test by opening up about one of her own insecurities that caused her to make the accusation in the first place ... at which point you employ amused mastery and other comfort-test passing measures.

Fogging is deflecting accusations by agreeing with the statement itself. It doesn't mean you agree to the substance of the accusation. So, if she says, "You're an idiot!" even though you know you're quite competent, you don't agree to being an idiot. You simply say, "I agree that you think I'm an idiot." She can't argue against someone who's only agreeing with her.

Ready to get engaged (in light of past PMO)

2 upvotes · 26 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I believe the nature of a couple's relationship is about as important as the people in it.

And there's the confirmation of the blue, right out of the gate - assuming that "the relationship" has merit in itself as if it's a distinct entity. The concept of "the relationship" is a psychological tool that subjects people to manipulation and control. We talk about "the relationship" or "my marriage" as if it has its own thoughts, feelings, needs, and desires. Consider phrases like:

- My marriage needs improvement
- Our relationship is going great
- What's going on in your marriage?

It's like "the marriage" is a psychological dog you keep in your pantry that you try to feed from time to time, and when it's not getting enough exercise it starts hounding you until you take it on a walk. "The marriage" doesn't exist, nor is there any biblical reference to "the marriage" as being a separate entity from the people within it. All of the biblical passages I can remember talk about how the people within the marriage should act toward each other, and never that there's some "higher existence" that is metaphysically created when these two people decide to place their bodies alongside each other for life. Remove that philosophical concept from your brain and you'll be on a much better track to success in the way you interact with the woman who will one day be your wife.

In each of the above phrases, people are really saying: "My wife and I are not happy together" or "My girlfriend and I are very happy together" or "How are you and your wife feeling about how you treat each other?" It's painfully obvious when you look at it that this is what's really going on. Yet disassociating the "marriage" from the people in the marriage is the norm, and it gives society or even a person's spouse to manipulate you. Instead of "This is what a biblical marriage should look like," we should be saying, "This is how my wife and I should interact with each other, according to the Bible." Notice how these concepts are seemingly identical? But one personalizes the sentiment and the other creates a standard that transcends the individuals. And whoever gets to define that standard is the one who gets to manipulate the other. Because the church is usually the one who defines that standard, and the church is controlled by the feminine imperative, that means that treating "the marriage" as a disassociated metaphysical concept having its own existence puts the husband in a position of being manipulated by his wife and the church based on social expectations about what "marriage" as a concept should look like rather than looking at what the Bible instructs the people within the marriage to do. Tag: /u/Deep_Strength, as I believe this is something that might be worth processing a bit for your book, as you brush against it from time to time without hitting the issue head-on.

merits ... drawbacks

Cool, you created a pro/con list. Those can be helpful from time to time. But if you're on the fence about a woman to the point where you have to create the list to tip you in one direction in the first place ... tells me it's too big of a gamble to be worth staking the rest of your life on the girl. If you were to put those lists on a scale, you should find a bowling ball on the "pro" side and a cracker on the "con" side ... but then you'd never have to make the list in the first place. The pro/con list will help you discern which of two options is more wise than the other - but ONLY in a vacuum. That is, if she was the only person who would be a good candidate for marriage in your entire life, then it would make sense to evaluate whether or not it's wise to bind yourself to her that way. But as soon as you account for the fact that there are literally millions of girls in the world who you could create a pro/con list over, suddenly the options change. Even if you were to narrow it down to the women you think you could pull into a relationship, imagine each such hypothetical woman having a pro/con scale. Maybe there are 3 dozen total. Of them, suppose 12 would have the scale tip in favor of marriage. Now, among those dozen women, imagine ranking each of them in order of how heavily the scale tips toward marriage. Assuming your current girl does tip toward the "pro" side (which even that still seems to be in question, but we'll roll with that assumption anyway), where do you think she falls on this new list? Is she someone who barely tips into the "Yeah, I suppose she's a wise choice for a bride" side? Or is she on the top of the list where you're thinking, "OMG! I totally need to lock this girl down right now"? Obviously this requires some presumptuous thinking about your prospects with other women, but if you're only just recently starting your path to improvement, it's highly likely that you're on the low-end of what you could pull down the road. Don't get married early, improve yourself, and then brood on the fact that you could now be getting way better. I think my wife's pretty hot, but I've still had those days and I wouldn't wish it on anyone.

I'm infatuated with her (just bein' honest)

I.E. - You have ONEitis. This is a condition known to affect a man's ability to assess his own situation.

Is it really worth the loss of innocence to add a point or two to that?

That's ultimately your call. I can't advise you on how to balance that without actually being you. But what this does make me curious about: what loss of innocence? Just because you have a strong emotional connection? Or have you had sex with each other (I can't remember)? If it's just the former, this is a prime example of the problem with viewing "the relationship" as its own metaphysical entity. You're viewing "what you have together" as something disassociated from the real bottom line in the situation: you both have strong emotions toward each other. Sure, breaking that emotional bond might have some psychological ramifications on each of you if you each have a very weak frame ... but that's probably because both of your frames are controlled by "the relationship" in the first place. This assumption of having been in a "serious relationship" somehow having a hold over you in the future is somewhat absurd once you've started living in your own frame for a week.

She said that seems like a lot. I asked her "when we're making out, does sex come to mind?" "Yeah" "So you might not think about sex all the time, but it's my job to inspire you"

I like this. Keep that attitude! If you keep improving your attractiveness throughout the marriage (stagnancy, even without a decline, always results in failure), you may not have much to worry about. Unfortunately, the overwhelming majority of marriages don't involve both parties continually improving themselves after the marriage.

Faithful

Sorry, I can see how that word could be confusing in this context. It's not about being sexually faithful to you. It's "faithful" in the sense that we are faithful to God. When you give her an instruction, how diligent is she about living it out? Or have you not yet felt comfortable giving her tasks and instructions? For example, have you ever had her over and asked her to vacuum your floor? Have you ever asked her to drive to the store to get you something? Most guys tend to think, "No way, I should be the one serving her like that," and then end up becoming their wife's helper instead of her being his. That's, again, part of the problem with looking to "the marriage/relationship," as defined by the church, to discern how you should behave with your SO.

I just kinda agreed, not very leaderlike of me, I suppose

Nah, you're fine. A good leader listens to the counsel of those he trusts. It would have been bad if you weren't crossing any actual boundaries and she was just having a moment of prude-ness and you caved.

If we were dating in person, that's close to the frequency I'd be shooting for. Are you saying I should focus on developing myself/my activities more? (I do need to do that.)

So here's the thing: I had a somewhat hidden agenda in my questions. I was less interested in how good these areas were going for you - and it sounds like you have a lot of positives to report. I was more interested in your attitude about these concepts, as that evidences your degree to which you're living in an ideological fantasy land. Virtually all of your responses affirmed that your idealism about her and the prospect of marriage is very high.

My concern with you being on Facetime so much with her isn't about you needing independent hobbies (though that's certainly true too). I'm concerned that you're developing a pseudo-co-dependence on the relationship. I don't say this as anything unique to you. Most couples do during the dating/engagement phases. But this is also what lays the groundwork for all the stress and disappointment guys experience after the wedding. If you had to separate from her for a month, how badly would you miss her? Blue pill idealism would scream: "I should miss my wife a lot!" That's a very dangerous attitude.

I've asked all the important questions I can think of. I know asking isn't the most reliable, but where applicable she's shown herself honest.

Here's another crucial point: I comment on your impulsivity and your long-term thinking ... and you respond with comments about her, her, her. You define the reasonableness of your emotional investment and forward-planning by who she is and how she responds to you. I want you to look at yourself, independent of who she is and how she reacts to you, and evaluate not whether there's more you could do to vet her, but if there's more you can do to stabilize and ground yourself before making a big decision.

I do need to work on myself as first priority.

The red pill is more about seeing the truth. Improvement is merely a byproduct of proper perspective.

Married Man With Girl Friends

2 upvotes · 25 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Have you read WISNIFG yet? That needs to be next on your list if you haven't. Will supplement when I have time.

Question on femdom fantasies.

2 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, fun probably wasn't the right word. But I do enjoy processing unusual questions that have never crossed my mind before. This response is quite helpful and I'll likely incorporate some of it in my ultimate answer.

Married Man With Girl Friends

2 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, I actually laughed out loud at this. I like it.

Need Guidance For a Kid in a Jam.

2 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Gotcha. But making her pay that price also means condemning him to never having sex again for the rest of his life. Is he willing to pay that price to teach her a "lesson" that she'll likely never pick up because she could easily find someone else to give her the provisions that he'd be denying her? Who is the one really being screwed in that arrangement?

Now, I get it. You feel for your friend and don't want him having sex with a whore who is using him. But for all I know, by the time that happens maybe he'd have bulked up and started living in his own frame and he'd be a big enough boy to make that decision from a place of strength rather than a place of weakness.

Once he's the prize, it's not about her using him; it's him using her to express a sexuality that (within your theological framework) he would never be able to express with anyone else without sin. So why condemn him to a life of sexlessness when he has the ability to have sex with someone without sin? On principle? Let him make that evaluation for himself.

Like I say, if he were a nonchristian or you were teaching him that he could rightly remarry, then your advice is spot on. But a man's sexuality is often too important to him that I don't think I could personally ask him to close the door on it forever just to teach someone a lesson she'll likely never learn anyway. That's a decision he needs to figure out for himself.

Need Guidance For a Kid in a Jam.

2 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

First thing's first: the 400 series is here for a reason. I know I've simplified it to 5 posts, but I usually spend a solid 3 months of weekly meetings with guys to work through the content in a meaningful way. Read, study, and get him on board with looking to the Gospel to help him lick his wounds.

Second, don't refer him to a counselor. I work with psychologists and counselors all the time. If he needs medication just to get him down to earth for a while, then get him to a psychiatrist. But at the end of the day, a counselor is going to give him a psychological cure to a spiritual problem. That's not to say some mental health problems aren't real; rather, it's to say that in the fact pattern you've given, it sounds like his problems are things that the Bible readily addresses and it would be a shame if he were placated with secular methodologies, which even the Christian counselors employ.

Third ...

I'll be advising him that she might attempt a comeback when she's done with her fun, and that, in my opinion, he should reject her.

You would be spot-on if you were also advising him to find another wife. Given your theological view on that subject (and mine as well), then making a Display of High Value (DHV) doesn't really have much of a purpose if you're not trying to attract any women with that display.

That's not to say the advice is wrong - merely that the rationale behind it is inconsistent with your theology, unless you believe his pride and self-respect should be higher priorities to him than his sexuality. I can see how for some people that would, in fact, be a tough call.

As for "biblical resources" on the subject:

- Deuteronomy 24:1-4 seems pretty on point, but that's also Jewish law from a time long ago that Paul says we're not bound to follow. So, take it with a grain of salt. Jeremiah 3:1 kind of falls in this camp as well, but on a more philosophical ground.
- 1 Cor. 7:10-11 says that divorced people "should remain unmarried or else be reconciled."
- The entire book of Hosea is pretty much what your friend is going through. Have him read that book. He married a prostitute, she was literally a whore accepting money for sex from other men. Yet God had plans for them to be together all the same - so not every OT example follows the Deuteronomy 24/Jeremiah 3:1 path. I will note, though, that although the other OT passages are suspect as part of Jewish law and tradition which was fulfilled in Christ and is no longer a part of the new covenant (though perhaps still valuable for what it teaches us of God's intentions), Hosea is also a one-of-a-kind story that we can't really take to be a normative expectation for anyone's life.

Finally, it's also worth noting that God makes concessions due to the inevitability of sin in a fallen world. That is, sin is still sin, but when such sin-sin scenarios are present and unavoidable, God encourages the option that does the least harm to his glory and image on the earth. That is why Moses permitted divorce in the first place - not because there were cases where it wasn't sin, but because their hearts were hard and they may have done even worse if they had not been given that opportunity.

So, if your buddy is likely to either sin by remarrying into a godly relationship or by having sex with several girls outside of marriage because he is weak while trying to remain faithful to his conviction that it would be sin for him to remarry, which one do you think does greater harm to God's Kingdom? Call it what it is, but exercise wisdom in the midst of being in a broken world.

Need Guidance For a Kid in a Jam.

2 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Just for the counter-point:

John Piper does the best exegesis I've seen on the topic (not to say I agree with much of what he puts out - quite little, actually, but this one's solid): <https://www.desiringgod.org/articles/divorce-and-remarriage-a-position-paper>

My view, as written recently:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/97ve15/qa_on_divorce_and_remarriage/

Pastor's role

2 upvotes · 23 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I've seen these stats before. First, the numbers only account for American churches and not all the abuse by Catholics overseas. Second, even at that the numbers pan out.

- Protestants: 260 cases/yr, 280,000 churches, 150 million people, 500,000+ pastors. That's an average of .09% of churches or .00017% of protestants, .052% of pastors.
- Catholics: 228 cases/yr, 17,651 churches, 70.4 million people, 37,500 priests. That's an average of 1.3% of Catholic churches or .00032% of Catholic people, .61% of priests.

That's over 10x more likely for a minor to be molested by a priest than a protestant pastor.

Tag: u/rocknrollchuck

Pastor's role

2 upvotes · 22 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Hmm ... perhaps we have a very different perspective on the state of the church today. I would hardly call it "vaunted," and I believe that "tradition" is what gave way to most of the feminization of the church, as it gave people an excuse to look to cultural sources rather than what the Bible says when determining what modern church culture should look like.

Pastor's role

2 upvotes · 22 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well said.

What is love?

2 upvotes · 22 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with most everything you've written here, so perhaps we're not as far off as we may have first thought. The only two points that I see where we may still differ:

The Bible, despite a closed canon, continues to evolve as new translators pick up the pen ... that translation is part of the inspiration of God.

I do not believe that any modern English translation is "inspired" in the sense of "infallible." It is "inspired" in the sense that God likely motivated someone to write it for a specific audience with a specific purpose, but that the text itself is "fallible" with regard to technical accuracy.

An understanding of the culture of origin is valid in deciphering meaning.

While I agree fully with the concept, I would not hold such an interpretation to be inspired or infallible. More to the point: which culture? Was Jesus inspired and infallible when preaching the sermon on the mount? Should we apply Hebrew culture to our interpretation of that sermon or Greek culture because the apostles may have written it in Greek first rather than in Hebrew or Aramaic?

Or to be clearer, when trying to understand what Matthew wanted to communicate to his Greek-reading audience, it may be valid to look at why he may have used certain Greek words. But to understand what Jesus meant to the people sitting on the hill listening to him speak, we must look to the Hebrew culture and how they would have understood things. Right?

Septuagint

Just to be clear, it sounds like our views on this are almost identical: it is not "inspired" in an "infallible" sense, which would be a designation reserved for the original Hebrew, but it is deserving of the utmost respect when it comes to being used as an interpretive tool - and it is one that I have often used myself on this sub.

Pastor's role

2 upvotes · 22 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

two different levels of inspiration

You're distinguishing between universal and individual revelation. That's a very appropriate distinction to make in this conversation. However, I do believe that universal inspiration exists outside the biblical canon, and I think you do too. Those who hold that "tradition" is a product of the Holy Spirit inherently hold that it is "inspired" to such a degree that all of church dogma and doctrine should account for the tradition of the church. I would suggest that it exists in other areas as well, outside the tradition of the church throughout history.

were the early church councils mistaken in excluding certain inspired books, the very word of God, from the cannon?

Maybe, maybe not. I'm less concerned with whether a bunch of old dead guys made mistakes and more concerned with whether we are making mistakes today. The principle of "near unanimous consent," as I often call it, is a powerful test that affirms a lot of what all those old dead guys said. It doesn't mean they created an exhaustive list of whole inspired texts; only that virtually everyone can agree that, at a bare minimum, those 66 that they selected were/are inspired.

I'd wager there are countless other wholly inspired books out there as well, but it isn't particularly necessary that they all be included in the canon. Perhaps they have duplicitous information, or their substance, while inspired, would have re-shaped the focus of Christianity if they had been included, thereby derailing God's intended path for the church. Or it could be that many texts are partially inspired - that is, that God inspired someone to write something very important, but the person then mixed in God's inspiration with their own thoughts on another page.

did those councils get some of the books in the bible wrong?

This is where the "near unanimous consent" principle comes into play. If someone wants to conclude that one of the 66 books is not inspired, then he must also argue that God is generally hands-off when it comes to guiding his people. Many people do, in fact, argue this exact point, most notably those who subscribe to strict Reformed theology. Of course, that same camp actively professes the office of the papacy to be the anti-Christ, so that's not much of a surprise (and no, I'm not a Calvinist ... or Arminian, for that matter).

Did they ...? If so, how do you know?

The test Jesus gave: "By their fruit you will recognize them." I see the fruit of the 66 books in my own life and in the lives of countless others - and I don't mean merely the "good works" that they prompt, but the type of fruit Jesus references in his parables: when the Gospel springs up in someone, bearing new seed that falls into nearby ground. That is, what disciples are made because of these other texts? Or are there any texts that are bearing bad fruit? That are actively turning people away from Christ?

Now, I know this can seem quite circular: I'm applying a standard in Matthew 7 to prove that Matthew 7 is inspired. First, any conversation about the faith must involve just that: faith. To put our faith in the councils of men seems off to me. To put our "faith" in logic and philosophy also seems off, which is what most of "tradition" appears to be to me. Instead our faith should be in God himself, which can break the cycle of cyclical reasoning. But more specifically, the cyclical reasoning argument only really applies if the Holy Spirit only existed as an active presence on the earth when Matthew 7 was written. But because the Spirit exists in us today and is active in the world today, we have a present reason for trusting in the Scriptures that doesn't involve putting our faith in an ancient council.

Further, were the early councils mistaken in distinguishing true Christian belief (matters of christology) from that of Arians or Gnostics?

My point here is that it doesn't matter what the councils said in the first place. From a historical perspective, it's useful to know how the church got here from where it was, so it does matter in that sense. But on specific issues, like early doctrine, christology, biblical canon, and whatnot, when you ask if they were "mistaken" it sounds to me to be no different than asking if John Piper was mistaken in one of his books published today. No doubt, when he writes his books he also has a council of wise leaders in the church who advise him, provide feedback, who help him discern the Scriptures and generate the content. Or imagine any other book that was written by multiple authors. Or perhaps more germane is the example of biblical translations, like the NIV or the ESV, which were the products of large groups of people working together.

The questions you're asking only actually make sense if we assume that those ancient councils actually had some inherent authority to decide the matters that were before them. Take away this assumption and the whole thing really seems quite silly. I'm not saying it's a wrong assumption, of course. I'm merely saying that of the various positions, this seems a very unlikely one to me - and a position that only becomes prominent if someone has a preconceived notion about church tradition, apostolic success, and the like.

To go back to the original question: were they mistaken? Maybe, maybe not. On most things, I'd wager they were spot on. But I'm not so confident in the allegations that they were Spirit-inspired on a universal level that I would say they got everything right, especially when we see the intense conflicts even within those councils over various things, and the ways that some of the conclusions served to gain incredible political advantage to the people in the councils. Mix this with the fact that many of the "traditions" - even as to the sacraments themselves - are practiced in ways that are in direct conflict with the teachings found in Scripture, it creates a clear contrast between Scripture and tradition on many points. But again, that's just from my perspective. I'm sure the Catholic community has many intelligible ways to defend their version of practicing the sacraments.

maybe I'm not discussing this topic with a Nicean Christian

To be clear, I affirm everything in the Nicene Creed. That said, I do not hold the Nicene Creed as having any special weight or authority. I see it as no different than a John Piper or John McArthur book that succinctly summarizes what is otherwise authoritative through Scripture. The book's summary is not inspired, but to the degree that they are referencing truths found in an inspired text, it is 100% true all the same.

For example, if I said to you, "God wants you to love your neighbor," my exact phrasing there may not be inspired. What is inspired is the biblical text that I'm referencing - and you know that my words are true, even if they hold no divine authority apart from the source from which I reached my conclusion about what God wants you to do. In the same way, the Nicene Creed doesn't have any actual authority in and of itself as an inspired word of God, otherwise it would be called Scripture - but it is all true because of the source material from which it was derived.

To that end, it's not a question of whether or not you're conversing with a Nicean Christian, which one could rationally say I am; rather, it is a question of whether or not you're conversing with someone who believes that tradition is authoritative in itself, which you could rationally conclude I am not.

Pastor's role

2 upvotes · 21 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Correct. At best, one could argue that canonization of the bible is a product of tradition, not the bible itself.

Pastor's role

2 upvotes · 21 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I've heard that argument and don't buy it. But I'm okay with the fact that others do.

Sex Addicted v. Sex Starved [MRP Draft]

2 upvotes · 21 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I like this. Thanks for sharing.

Man's Folly

2 upvotes · 20 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's a tough story to read. You should expand on it and write a field report post showing all you've learned from your upbringing.

The Dangers of Pathologizing Manhood

2 upvotes · 20 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Exciting! Welcome to the club. I found that 4 isn't any harder than 3. Hopefully you'll have similar results.

Question about trying to love and be there for females

2 upvotes · 20 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is what I would have said anyway. Good answer.

To /u/hello_im_phil, sending her messages like that is a Display of Low Value (DLV). It makes her think you're still pawing over her and placing her on a pedestal and that whenever she's ready to come around, you'll be there waiting for her. You've got to move on.

Also props to /u/lab_of_the_sea_2021 - the whole "if it doesn't work when you're here, it won't work at a distance" concept is very apt.

Also, /u/FuzzyKittenIsFuzzy - solid point picking up on the co-dependency issue. Don't encourage her to be co-dependent on you, Phil, unless you want to undermine your decision not to move forward with her in the foreseeable future.

Kicking Porn For Good

2 upvotes · 17 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I knew I liked that guy. Great video. He echoes through secular rhetoric the same conclusion I reached: that the answer is a man's mission.

Advice for a girl

2 upvotes · 17 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, on further reflection, there are extremely rare examples, like Jacob, but that's because God had an agreement (covenant) with his dad and grandpa. But when I did the full bible-length study the ratio of verses comparing us pursuing God to God pursuing us ... it was at least 20 to 1. Either way, I'm glad this can help. The sidebar post "pursuit, seduce, initiate" goes into this too.

Question on priorities.

2 upvotes · 16 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well said.

Advice for a girl

2 upvotes · 14 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Correct. This is a good answer. Most of the stuff on RPW is about how the woman can remain in her own frame while still adding value to her man. It says nothing about entering into her man's frame so that he can be the one to lead her in how he receives value.

To be clear, not everything on that sub is bad. There's a lot of good content, as u/CoachDad9 has referenced. But there's a lot of bad content too. The same could be said for TRP, MRP, RPC, TC, and pretty much every sub in existence.

What I'm more concerned about is not whether or not good, practical advice can be found there (I could probably go on a subreddit for Nazi sympathizers and still find some good, practical advice here and there), but whether or not the advice leads someone to glorify God through their lifestyle choices. To that end, RPW may have a lot of content that increases a woman's general value to mankind, but it will not have as much content about how to exit her frame to understanding her husband's perception of her value, nor will it encourage her to leave her secular practices in order to pursue God's perception of her value.

To that end, I have repeatedly seen comments over there telling girls that it's okay to have sex in the first date, suggesting that a high n-count really isn't all that bad, encouraging women to live with their man before marriage to see what it's like, etc. These are ungodly practices and I wouldn't want a woman taking that kind of advice if she is in Christ.

Wear a black arm band to church in August 2020

2 upvotes · 14 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is my gut reaction too. I don't see Jesus doing anything to change a political structure, nor does his inaction on a political level amount to an endorsement of the political structure at that time. Likewise, Paul and the apostles lived in the days of Caesar Nero, who made it a distinct political agenda to kill all Christians, and yet this is the political climate where Paul wrote Romans 13.

In short, I believe the biblical attitude is merely to say: Culture's going to do what culture's going to do. Let's not let the church get mixed up in it. Let's keep pulling people into the church.

"Three reasons why Christian parents are raising slutty girls and beta males"

2 upvotes · 14 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, I follow now.

What has the church done to women?

2 upvotes · 13 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You mean after all its catering to women and the church is still pushing women away too? Who knew ...

For real though, where the church gets it wrong is in assuming that biblical headship will push women away. The church doesn't realize that when men are men and lead the way God designed, the women are happier and flock to the church in droves: (1) to get all these great guys, and (2) because they follow where the men lead.

How do you reconcile TRP with Christian values?

2 upvotes · 12 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

As far as descriptive theory goes, I can't think of any discrepancies off the top of my head. That's not to say they don't exist, I just can't think of one. Maybe there aren't any. Who knows. If anything, I'd say that the secular model is incomplete.

406 - You are "not guilty" so stop feeling guilty

2 upvotes · 12 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I like this. A better way to word it, though, isn't that we "sometimes still sit in the cell with the chains wrapped around our bodies calling out to Christ" - it's that the chains are literally gone but we keep our eyes closed and don't believe it and keep acting like they're still there.

For Singles: Finding the Girl You Can't Keep Yourself From Banging - PART 2!

2 upvotes · 11 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Great question, squizzo. Two things on that point:

1. Ask God for bigger things. Once you master personal discipleship in your own relationships, start a church wide initiative that includes the ladies. Work toward revamping your church's small group system to point people toward discipleship, and meet women as you train the small group leaders and coed groups. Go outside your church to look for men and meet women along the way.
2. You probably have a limited view of what discipleship really is, which is understandable given the way the church views it. The church usually promotes discipleship either as a group initiative, or if they're wise enough to move into their one on one, it's a weekly meeting time where one guy teaches another and talks about life issues.

When I disciple a guy he shares my life. If I'm going to the grocery store, I call him up and ask him if he needs anything and to go with me. If I'm going to a social event, he goes with me. If I'm going to dinner with the family, I invite him to join.

Very quickly, he starts doing the same for me, introducing me to everyone in his circle of friends. Then his friends usually like me and want to hang with us some more, giving me an opportunity to encourage my guy to witness to those people God I can observe him in action and give feedback. And as those people are drawn to me and my guy, they bring their friends for stuff in the future and my social circle keeps growing.

But all of this comes from a life on life view of discipleship, not the knock off version of 1.5 hours per week that the church calls life on life. Jesus didn't do 1.5 hours a week. He shared his entire life. I do set some boundaries, but not many. I even let guys watch during times my wife is having one of her episodes against me so he can watch me pass tests and handle conflict. I even had a time last year where a guy invited me over and I sat through a very raw and nasty argument he had with his wife to give him feedback. Nothing is off limits except when, like Jesus, I just need to get away.

406 - You are "not guilty" so stop feeling guilty

2 upvotes · 10 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good question. Look a couple verses earlier - "Don't you know that friendship with the world means enmity against God? ... he jealously longs for the spirit he has caused to dwell in us ... God opposes the proud but shows favor to the humble." The context is contrasting the troubles of the world with the life that God calls us to.

Now compare that language of the world being enemies to God with Philippians 3:18 - "For many, of whom I have often told you and now tell you again even with tears, walk as enemies of the cross of Christ." It appears that Paul's words in James 4 and Philippians 3:18 are something that he spoke of repeatedly: that the world is an enemy of Christ, and that he had great turmoil and sorrow over this.

So, when he's talking in verse 8 about "wash your hands, you sinners, and purify your hearts, you double-minded," I get that he's refraining what he started talking about in the previous verses: trying to get non-believers into a relationship with God in the first place, which is why verse 8 starts, "Come near to God and he will come near to you," implying he's talking to people who don't already have a relationship with God.

To that end, my original post highlights that godly sorrow is for the non-Christian, and thus the "Grive, mourn and wail" part supplements verse 8's compulsion for non-Christians to seek Christ quite well. But even from another angle, for the believer there is basis for grieving, mourning and wailing - not over our own sin, which God has forgotten and "remembers no more," but over those who "live as enemies of the cross of Christ."

How do you remain or accept being Christian? And it turned into a ramble warning

2 upvotes · 10 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

How does one reconcile having faith in something in and of itself?

In the reverse, I don't see how anyone finds any value in life by having faith in nothing bigger than himself. On a philosophical level, I believe every man needs something beyond himself - be it God, his favorite sports team, the concept of "marriage" or whatever. Many of these things are inherently destructive and cause a man to leave his own frame. But if such a thing is actually true and the man is merely embracing reality and orienting his frame to include that knowledge, then he is not doing himself harm, but a much greater benefit.

And if it is this way, why would I choose one thing (i.e., book, or gods, or path towards self-actualization) over another?

Because we don't have the option not to choose. Jesus said, "Anyone who is not for me is against me." So, you either choose to believe in Jesus or you choose any other path. Ambiguity or agnosticism is defined in Christianity as a choice against Jesus, not a refusal to choose at all.

Should not my only concern be both immediate and long-term, temporal pleasure?

Rather than asking what "should" be the case, which is ultimately a philosophical conversation, I prefer to stick with what "is" the case - one that can be addressed through theology and praxeology. Every man has his own interests and systems of prioritization, so the "should" questions aren't always going to reach the same conclusions, although some things are grand enough that it would be almost impossible not to have a unanimous consensus. To that end, if hell is real and as bad as the Bible says it is, is there any legitimate basis for a man to want to prioritize his temporal desires in the present at the expense of spending eternity in such a place? It's easy to say a man "should" prefer to avoid hell, even at the expense of his present gratification. But many men are simply okay with accepting that risk.

God gave us free will for a reason. That free will lets us determine our own point of origin and prioritization. It lets us decide if our pleasures in the present life is worth sacrificing eternity over - and God is the one who saw fit to give us that choice, so I dare not question him and tell other men what they "should" want.

Instead, I care about what they do want and what is presently true about a man and the universe he lives in. To that end, a man must know the truth - the realities of heaven and hell, good and evil, the Gospel, and all other relevant factors that may affect his decision-making processes. What he does with that information is up to him.

Romans 2 says, "So that you may be proved right when you speak and justified when you judge." Every time a non-Christian is presented with additional evidence, testimony, or a call to follow Christ, evidence is heaped upon that man which will be presented at judgment day. A judge who must discern between a "he said/she said" case might not be confident in his judgment, and others certainly won't be either. But if there is a mountain of evidence against the offending party, then the judge and all of those around him can have great confidence that his decision was just and proved right. This is the obligation of the Christian. The obligation of each man is to decide how he wants to be judged and the probability/risk assessment of the chance that he may be right/wrong about what information presented to him he accepts as true and false.

And more than why, how on earth do you even have the confidence to believe in what you are believing?
Was it not also taught by man?

Imagine a time-traveler opens a portal in your house. You watch him walk through it. He takes you through it as well. You see the future. You come back. He spends a week with you talking all about time-travel and his adventures. Then he leaves back through that portal.

Now imagine your neighbor witnessed none of this and you're telling him all about it. He believes you. After he believes, the time-traveler also appears to him and tells him all about his adventures in time.

Your neighbor then goes and tells someone else about the story you told him and about his own experience with the time-traveler. That third person then raises the questions you asked: "Isn't this all just stemming from what your neighbor told you? Couldn't your personal experiences just be hallucinations?" To the two who actually met the time-traveler, these accusations would seem absurd. But to the one who doesn't believe time-travel is even possible in the first place, the possibility of them telling the truth would seem absurd.

Kicking Porn For Good

2 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's awesome! Glad to help :)

Kicking Porn For Good

2 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

We don't smother guilt with a pillow. We smother it with the Gospel. I've heard your take before, and it makes philosophical sense, but there's no scriptural basis for the Spirit utilizing guilt. There is substantial basis for the enemy doing that. I think the reason is that guilt only lends itself to temporary and shallow victories. It's a shaky foundation. The Gospel is a strong foundation.

I am very encouraged by your story though! Alcohol dependency is a nasty beast to kill for many people. Yay for pressing forward!

Sex Addicted v. Sex Starved

2 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

That was in another post on RPC. If you want to peg, go peg. My point there was merely that pegging doesn't create a one flesh connection. I'm not sure why any guy would want to do that in the first place, but to each their own.

How do you learn to truly let go of someone?

2 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Is it vain to give positive feedback to a comment that encourages people to read my stuff? Screw it - your biblical references are what make this worthwhile. Noice.

Sexual Addiction v. Sexual Starvation

2 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/TheRedPill

It's an internal issue, not external. Imagine jacking it to porn is like eating a potato chip. Your body is really craving steak, potatoes and broccoli. How many potato chips does a guy have to eat before he's a steak and potatoes addict? Can't say because he isn't eating steak and potatoes anyway. What about a food addict in general? No clue. How bad are those potato chips screwing up his life?

Introduction/Accountability

2 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

but mostly focusing on the Bible for now

Praise God for that, brother. If your mind is free from cultural influences, you'll find quickly that any of the stuff here is found there first anyway.

we should be out of debt (other than student loans and mortgage) within 3 years

This is wonderful. Cut this shorter if at all possible. Once you start dieting, you might find there's an extra $100-200 or more (depending on how much you eat out) in your monthly budget to apply to these other debts, saving you a ton on interest and potentially cutting 6 months to a year off your goal.

Now I have this post I can look back at and see where I was on 8-8-2018 and make sure I am continually improving.

This is an admirable thing.

didn't end up actually having sex on our wedding night

Me either. I feel you on that.

There were several months in our marriage where we didn't have sex at all just because she didn't feel like it or was too tired.

Been there, done that. Do you see your language about how she's the one making these decisions in your marriage?

It got to the point where she turned me down so much for sex that I stopped asking, and she didn't ask, so I know we had a couple of 6 month gaps between having sex.

Ergo my testimony about my 18 month gap! which I just posted about yesterday.

she is the one in the worst shape but only a little worse than me

When researching for my post on sexual addiction v. starvation I looked into some stats on food addiction and found that 3x as many women are addicted to food than men. I'm not surprised by your conclusion at all.

We can't lock our door at night because our daughter has a full blown freakout if she gets scared in the middle of the night and the door is locked.

Sounds like you're in your daughter's frame.

"But my wife would never stand for our daughter's middle of the night outbursts!"

Then you're in her frame.

What do you want to do?

However there is definite progress in the sex department and also just affection in general.

That's nice. But get yourself under 25% as your next big mile-marker and you'll see even larger improvement. When you're under 20% she'll start trying to lose weight too (or not, whatever). Then shoot for 15%, then 12%, then 10% if possible. Try to do each of these in 3-6 month intervals. It's more than doable if one is dedicated (preaching to myself here too - trying to go from 16% to 12%).

My testimony and RP-imony

2 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Glad to hear it helped. For the "figured out the Bible" complex, spend 6 months on r/TrueChristian and reply to at least 3 posts a day - but only when you have actual Scripture to back up your points. I found very quickly when attempting this that I didn't know as much as I thought I did, but that through hours upon hours of research to get to the point where I can do that at will now, the exercise was well worth it.

How do you learn to truly let go of someone?

2 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Aaah, that makes a lot more sense now. To that end, I wrote 115 - Dealing with ONEitis.

Sex Addicted v. Sex Starved [MRP Draft]

2 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for the background. Your husband sounds a lot like me. I'm glad things are moving in a good direction for you two! I would have been excited if my wife actually did any research like you've done to help resolve your issues. For my own sake, though, I appreciate the value in learning to lead independent of her pursuits, which are an added bonus on the rare times that she does proactively make some progress on her own.

How do you learn to truly let go of someone?

2 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's what I figured you meant. I agree.

Sex Addicted v. Sex Starved

2 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Fair enough. For what it's worth, biases aside, I consider you a comrade who merely has a different point of origin from my own. I've always respected your feedback more than most.

Forget about respecting your wife. Respect yourself.

2 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Amen.

Forget about respecting your wife. Respect yourself.

2 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's a solid FR right there. Of course, prioritizing your own respectability in the face of your wife's disrespect isn't the same as disrespecting her. Not to say this was your intent, but after all, it's to my glory if other people are jealous of my wife, so why would I want to undermine her to those around us? I see another Christ/Church parallel in there somewhere ;)

My testimony and RP-imony

2 upvotes · 7 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's a decent write up. My wife is past the "it's sin" part and onto "it's gross."

The first time I gave her oral she passively tried to set a boundary, "That felt great. I don't know how you do that. I don't think I could ever do what you just did." I asked, You mean lick out a woman? "Uh huh." Then I guess it's a good thing you're not a guy.

Is my wife pregnant by another man (I need some advice)

2 upvotes · 6 August 2018 · /r/askMRP

What is your question? It sounds like you wanted to vent. Fine. But at least be honest about it. Don't hide a vent session in disguise as a request for advice - especially when the answers are plain obvious and you know it.

Introduction

2 upvotes · 6 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The macro tracking is good start, mentioned by someone else. I'm also looking at Paleo and insulin sensitivity

Try the Whole30 diet. It only lasts for 30 days, so it's not a long-term commitment. But it does cut everything out of your diet that could potentially be causing inflammation. The plan is that after the 30 days are over, your body is "pure" and you can gradually start adding foods back to see the effect that it has on your body. In the meantime, every time I've done the Whole30 while working out, I end up losing about 20lbs.

What should i read again to get that started.

NMMNG. A proactive way to practice being alpha is simply to engage in no-context conversations. I have a post in my submission history about that. I may be titled about social networking or something like that.

It's around the prophetic.

Yeah, you're still not giving any actual information. You're like a kid saying, "I've got something really cool in my hand!" And someone asks what it is and you say, "It's totally awesome. It's amazing. I really like it. It's so cool." Then the guy asks what it is again and you say, "I just told you - it's awesome, amazing, cool, and I like it."

How do you reconcile TRP with Christian values?

2 upvotes · 5 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yep. That's why I put that in there. You'll also notice that there are a lot more people following rule 2 since it was posted, and I have certainly removed non compliant posts and only reapproved them after they added the relevant content.

Life advice and direction needed.

2 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

We'll simply have to agree to disagree. This is not worth the time to explain any further. Thanks for the stimulating conversation.

Life advice and direction needed.

2 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Again, read 209. I break it down into vision, mission, and calling. The vision is the end destination that God has in mind, which we must all adopt collectively. Our mission is the plan God created for getting from today to the fulfillment of that vision, which is also a communal plan given to all believers.

Our calling is the individual context Christ gives us for living it out, which is unique to all of us based on our spiritual gifts, talents, the life circumstances he placed us in, etc. - and even that does come from God, but because one's specific calling is unique to every person, I give significant room for flexibility on that point. A doctor might make disciples of his residents, whereas a teacher might make disciples of his students, or another man of his neighbors. And the way he makes disciples might focus on intentional times of teaching, or it might be on encouragement, or it might be on training or coaching, or it might be through a focus on serving together. Those are the places where it's individualized for our own life circumstances, but the mission as a whole is common to all.

Life advice and direction needed.

2 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Matthew 28:19-20 - "Go therefore and make disciples of all nations." I just fleshed this out in greater detail in a reply to OP's reply to my comment. I also edited 209 on the sidebar to reflect my increasing fervor on this issue. So ... uum, yeah, when you say:

I'm under the impression that the Bible says to go forth and preach the gospel

You're agreeing with me, not disagreeing ;) That is the very mission that is assigned to us.

Life advice and direction needed.

2 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I've found this to be repetitively true in life: God won't tell you in prayer what he's already told you in His Word.

It's no wonder your prayer for a mission isn't being answered - because you've ignored what his word says about it: "Go therefore and make disciples of all nations."

Can you imagine God asking you on judgment day, "What did you do with your life?"

- "I made some money and supported a family."
- "I made disciples who follow you and will be entering your Kingdom."

Which answer do you think God wants to hear? Which one do you think matters more to him at the end of the day? Even the non-Christians do the first one, and their families are going to hell, despite the fact that they were good providers. Your mission has to extend beyond this and it must be the one prescribed by God.

I used to give a lot more leeway on this sub about this. I would say things like in 209 - "In my view, the vision must always incorporate the 3 Greats in some way: Love God, Love Others, Make Disciples. But I'm not going to hold everyone to that." I've changed my mind since then. I now believe it is a full spiritual imperative that all men incorporate discipleship, and the three greats at large, in their mission. It doesn't have to be the entirety of it, but I do believe that if it's not there, that's sin. Period. In fact, I'm editing 209 to read this way because I am so convinced of this by Scripture.

Mental Point of Origin and Philippians 2

2 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Okay, enough being repetitive on that point. If we understand that our identity is one with Christ because of his indwelling presence in us and the new creation he has made us to be after his own image, then what does that have to say about our "point of origin"?

Is making yourself your mental point of origin considered selfish ambition?

If you haven't adopted Christ's identity, then the answer is yes, because your "self" or your "point of origin" is your flesh, which is not "one" in anything apart from Christ.

If, however, we understand our identity in the communal sense that God intended, then Paul's words in Ephesians 5:28-30 lead to a different conclusion: "He who loves his wife loves himself. For no one ever hated his own flesh, but nourishes and cherishes it, just as Christ does the church, because we are members of his body."

In other words, if our "point of origin" is the oneness identity that God gives us in his self, with our spouse, and within the church, then there is no room for selfish ambition in the first place. What we do to each other we do to ourselves. It would be like the hand punching the nose and the foot stamping on the hand. Nobody is better off when this happens. We have only damaged ourselves when we damage the other parts of our body.

Is counting others (your wife) more significant than yourself the same as making her your mental point of origin?

No, because Christ is the head, therefore he is our mental point of origin if our identity is found in him.

Is counting others more significant than self the same as "putting the concerns of others before your own"?

You quoted Philippians 2:3-5, but you left off verses 1-2, which set the context for the passage you quoted. Here's what they say: "So if there is any encouragement in Christ, any comfort from love, any participation in the Spirit, any affection and sympathy, complete my joy by being of the same mind, having the same love, being in full accord and of one mind." Then he goes into what you say. He's describing their oneness and unity - the fact that they are all part of the same body with a common identity in Christ.

In other words, he's saying, "Before doing what's best for the mouth, think about what's best for the stomach too." In this way, each part of the body receives its support not from its own efforts, but from the support of the rest of the body as well.

The problem predominantly comes in the form of application, as the Church is so broken that it's virtually impossible to conceptualize this in practice today. Everyone is taught a form of hyper-individualism that if one were to live and apply what the Bible actually preaches on identity-oneness, those people would be ravaged for all they had and taken advantage of. This is why the Bible has several passages that also talk about people managing their own households well, and providing for the members of their own household - because on an individual familial basis a husband who leads rightly can let this oneness play out in his own home, but as a practical matter the body of Christ as a whole cannot express it fully today, and thus appropriate boundaries and safeguards need to be put in place as we work toward maturity, which further stretches our boundaries over time to gradually incorporate that common identity.

I have this with some guys outside of my household. If they were my neighbors, we would have a singular joint fence around both of our properties rather than around each of our own homes - because we have that oneness bond. And that number has increased in my own life over time. And I believe it can be this way with everyone in the church. But not until the church has turned back to Christ and recognized Him as the head of the body. Right now everyone believes they are the head and everyone else should be their hands and feet.

How can a Christian follow this advice in light of Philippians 2?

By recognizing that Christ is our point of origin and not our flesh. I am Christ, in my spirit. Christ's will is my will. His point of origin is my point of origin. If I have really adopted this, then my brother in Christ is me also, if Christ is also his point of origin. So, as I help him, I help myself, and vice versa. To that end, non-Christians are not me. I do not put the needs of the non-Christian above myself (which includes Christ and those who are also in Christ), thereby supporting or enabling their sin. I put my own needs and desires above theirs, which if I am one with Christ, then my needs and desires are for the betterment and expansion of Christ's body.

So, if Christ is the head and I am his bride, then it is my duty to enter his spiritual frame and adopt it as my own. From there, my frame is identical as everyone else who has also entered Christ's frame and adopted it as their own. So, it is our job, then, to bring others into that frame and to adopt that identity. This is my desire, which I receive from adopting the desires of Christ. I then must contemplate and process the most effective way of accomplishing my desire in this regard - and that certainly includes application on Philippians 2:3-5.

What makes some of this confusing is that we, as men, function in a dual capacity. We play the role of bride to Christ, but we also play the role of men to the world. So, in one sense we must be the submissive toward Christ, but in another sense we must be the dominant toward the world. I think a lot of guys have a hard time getting past that and assume that they are only to be the dominant and forget what it means to be the bride of Christ, adopting our groom's frame.

I see that the text says "also to the interest of others" assuming you will look to your own interests first.

It doesn't assume we look to our own interests first. Verse 2 tells us what Paul is assuming: that we have "the same mind, having the same love, being in full accord and of one mind" - that is, that our interests would be the same as others. That is why he also says, "Have this mind among [communal] yourselves, which is yours in Christ Jesus" - because our mind is from Christ Jesus, which we all adopt.

Would that be how you explain mental point of origin to someone who would disagree with Rollo's iron rule of frame?

Simply put, I'd explain it that Christ is our mental point of origin. Anyone who is in Christ has the same mental point of origin. Christ's interests for his own body are parallel to my own body. Sometimes I need to eat and focus on the needs of my stomach; sometimes I need to hump my wife and focus on the needs of my penis; sometimes I need to lift weights and focus on the needs of my muscles, etc. When I'm at the gym and hungry, my stomach must rightly subside itself to the needs of my pecs and quads, etc. When I'm eating, I might be horny, but my penis must subside itself to the needs of my stomach, which supplies the energy to my muscles, which empower me to have better sex for my penis, etc. See how it's all interconnected?

So no, we don't disagree with Rollo's iron rule of frame. We embrace it in the context of our dual role as a bride who adopts Christ's point of origin and frame to him, then reflects it as our own point of origin and fame to the rest of the world, without apology and without bending or breaking.

Mental Point of Origin and Philippians 2

2 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

1/2

This is an excellent question - and one I'm actually excited to answer! I've contemplated this issue since long before I even knew of RP or read any of /u/Rollo-Tomassi's stuff. The conclusion is actually a little weird if the Bible is true ... because Rollo's content is 100% right, but not necessarily in the way one would expect.

That said, I should note that you're comparing Rollo's DEscription of how the world operates with a PREscription that the Bible compels us to follow. Rollo has not suggested we defy the Bible. He's merely explaining how things work. You are drawing your own conclusions about what that understanding should compel you to do. But when you understand what the Bible has to say about frame, identity, and interpersonal interactions, we see that the Bible's prescription is fully aligned with Rollo's description.

Individual Identity in Christ

The issue stems from the concept of "identity." Who are you? Who are they? Any fans of The Walking Dead will know right away the phrase, "I am Negan." Negan is a community leader, but he develops a sense of oneness in his community to the point that they all self-identify with him and the "spirit" of his leadership. Unfortunately, the show does little more than display this as a symbol of loyalty.

But in the Bible, when Jesus says things like this, we see something very different at play: "Anyone who has seen me has seen the Father ... Don't you believe that I am in the Father, and that the Father is in me?" Jesus is saying that his very identity is defined by his Father.

Now we also know this is true for us. 2 Cor. 5:17 says that when we are saved we become a "new creation; the old has gone, the new has come." We are no longer ourselves. Our old self in the flesh remains only as an outward shell, whereas the fruit beneath is new and pleasing. In this regard, we don't define ourselves by our flesh, but by Christ in us. This is where our identity is found - and it is a oneness bond. That is why Ephesians 4:22-24 says that we are "to put off your old self ... and to be renewed in the spirit of your minds, and to put on the new self, created after the likeness of God in true righteousness and holiness." It is also why Paul says separately in Romans 7:25 that he is still a "slave to sin" in his flesh, but a "slave to God" in his mind. Yet our identity is found through Christ in us, not in our flesh, which is why he says a few verses earlier that when he sins, "It is no longer I who do it, but it is sin living in me" - because his identity isn't derived from his sin, but from Christ living in him.

Marital Identity

We also know that the Bible references humans as being "one" in being this way too. Genesis 2 says that a husband and wife will become "one flesh." Malachi 2:15 extends this on a spiritual level by saying, "And why did the Lord God make them one, with a portion of his Spirit in their union?" See also 1 Cor. 6 and 2 Cor. 6 regarding the spiritual oneness that can be formed through sex. When practiced biblically, a husband and wife share a common identity on a spiritual level the same way that we share a common identity on a spiritual level with our spiritual groom: Christ, as we are his bride, the Church.

From there, the Bible even talks about this oneness between husbands and wives in more practical terms. In Ephesians 5, for example, Paul says something weird: "Husbands ought to love their wives as their own bodies. He who loves his wife loves himself. Indeed, no one ever hated his own body, but he nourishes and cherishes it, just as Christ does the church. For we are members of His body." This isn't just an intangible oneness that has no practical value. The new identity is created when a man leaves his father and mother to start a new life with his wife (per Genesis 2) means that when we are married we are no longer who we were before we were married - there is an actual identity change that takes place. This isn't merely a new situational circumstance that the world generally understands it to be.

Communal Identity

But this goes even further. Jesus prays in John 17:22-23 "that they may be one even as we are one, I in them and you in me, that they may become perfectly one, so that the world may know that you sent me and loved them even as you loved me." This prayer actually takes it to another level: it's not just that our individual identity is found in Christ, or even our marital identity, but that we also have a communal identity among the body of believers.

This is why Paul says in Ephesians 5:32, after the above bit on a husband viewing his wife as his own body, "For we are members of His body ... This is a profound mystery, but I am talking about Christ and the church." He speaks of this "body of Christ" concept in 1 Cor. 12 and Romans 12 as if we all share a common identity defined by Christ, who is the head (Colossians 1:18).

That is also why Jesus' prayer in John 17 isn't just that they be one with Christ, but that they be one with each other - and to recognize the significance of this oneness that God intended us to have, not only in our purpose, but in our very identity, being united in Christ, as Christ is in all of us. Ideally, we should all be able to proclaim as Jesus did, "Anyone who has seen me has seen the Father ... and that the Father is in me," just as the Father is in all of those who belong to his Church.

Instead of saying, "I am Negan," in the shallow sense of loyalty, we say, "I am a Christian" - literally a "little Christ", as that is the core of our identity. We are defined by Christ in us, for we are his groom and we are collectively his singular bride with one identity.

Tag: /u/Deep_Strength and u/palmorwrist - as this with part 2 would serve as a reply to your comments

[FR] Fixing your SMV

2 upvotes · 1 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with virtually everything you've said ... if we look at this post in isolation, abandoned from the greater context of everything else I've said on this sub and my ultimate purpose for the men here. I think you and I probably have a very similar end game in mind. We simply have different perspectives on how Jesus and the apostles modeled reaching that end game - and much of that is likely due to a difference in our target audience. May I ask how long you have been engaged substantially with the red pill community?

As for the individual points, I'm sure you're right that some of the verses I referenced are in a different context, though not so far removed as to warrant the application I suggest.

More to the point:

- How do you suggest men glorify God with their bodies through failing to take care of them?
- How do you suggest men honor God through maintaining a spirit of timidity or failing to learn to act boldly or failing to lead in their marriages?
- How do you suggest men honor God with their finances without working on earning them in the first place or without regard for being a viable provider for a family?
- How do you suggest glorifying God in the way we interact with others if we choose not to develop a personality and character that earns the respect of outsiders?
- How do you suggest we glorify God in our relationships with others if we are not working on building those relationships?
- How do you suggest we glorify God through immoral and unethical behaviors?

You criticize what I am suggesting men work on, but fail to address how a neglect of any of these areas would be any more godly than an improvement in them. Or are you suggesting that God doesn't have anything to say about these aspects of our lives in the first place? Or that he doesn't care?

Church Discipline

2 upvotes · 31 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a gem.

Starting a RPC men's group

2 upvotes · 30 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks. I'm certainly expecting that. I appreciate the insightful reminder to keep an intentional eye out for this.

The usual reply to "See, you do it too!" is, "Yeah, and when you've got what I've got going, you'll be allowed as well. But for now, get back to the gym." An in-shape person can eat 2,000+ calories a day because they don't need to lose weight. A fat tub of lard doesn't get that right until he's at his fitness goal.

Trying to create a "Look"

2 upvotes · 30 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

What message, as a Christian man, should I be broadcasting?

1 Thess. 4:12 - "so that your daily life may win the respect of outsiders and so that you will not be dependent on anybody." Our attire should be that which outsiders would respect us in.

If I went around wearing gym shorts and a t-shirt, most people might not think much of it, but they certainly won't be increasing in respect for me because of it (except in rare cases). And if it's not going to cause an outsider to increase in respect for me, why would I think it'd cause my wife to increase in respect for me?

Trying to create a "Look"

2 upvotes · 26 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Having a "look" sucks. It was one of the RP concepts I waited longest to address. I still slack on it occasionally. I like going commando in my gym shorts too much, though I often lounge in a polo atop them.

Nevertheless, swapping the gym shorts for even khaki shorts resulted in a noticeable improvement in my wife's apparel and attitude toward me. Call me a sellout if you want, but the results are worth it.

Wife saw me reading r/askmrp last night and wanted to see what it was

2 upvotes · 18 July 2018 · /r/askMRP

As cholomite noted, your first big mistake was being evasive. Honesty is the better choice. If you honestly don't care about her interest in what you're reading, then be honest and tell her that. Or just be honest about what it is. Most girls don't actually care enough to look deeper into it on their own anyway.

Now, if I just feel like teasing her, I've said a couple times, "Just texting my girlfriend." She knows it's a joke, but the suggestion that this thought even crosses my mind registers a degree of dread.

My wife knows that I've been a fairly well respected redditor for years. So it's easy just to say, "I'm just making a reddit comment." Most of the time I can tie it to faith, since most of my activity is on r/RPChristians, then can branch off on a related theological point and engage her in the conversation. Or even if it's a secular RP sub I'll just say, "Some guy's screwing up his marriage and I'm trying to help him out."

As soon as you act secretive, you screw it all up.

How do you respond to threats from your wife?

2 upvotes · 16 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

2/2

to her it feels like <blah, blah, blah> ... So what am I supposed to do in those situations ...?

Stop caring about what she feels like. Let her get mad. Let her throw a hissy fit. Let her yell at you. Let her pass out.

This probably deserves an FR in itself, but I just got into it with my wife a couple days ago. She's been sexually responsive, but doesn't always have the best attitude when I initiate (yes, I still need to be making progress, just like everyone else). I had initiated and she gave me crap about being tired and she started whining and whatnot. I said, "Cool, I'm going to do some writing, then," and I kissed her on the forehead and left for my basement to work on one of my books. She comes down all apologetic and says, "I'm sorry. I was being a brat. I guess if you really want sex right now I can deal with it." I said, "Don't worry babe. I don't want sex right now. We're good. Go get some sleep and we'll have sex tomorrow." Then she starts complaining about how she's offering me sex and I'm turning her down and that I wanted it 5 minutes ago, so I must still want it now. So, I said with a smile that her attitude turned me off, and that I'd rather work on my book instead. I then set a clear boundary that I'm not going to have sex with her when she has a bad attitude and I'm not going to pressure her into feeling like she has to give duty sex just because I initiated.

Here's where it gets interesting. She interprets this that I expect her to walk around the house wearing lingerie and makeup all day, waiting for her to pounce on me as soon as the kids are in bed. So, in one monologue she starts yelling and screaming about how ridiculous my expectations are. She punches a wall at one point. She talks about how she should have just become a nun because she'll "never be that horny college slut that you want me to be." I just sit with an "interested, yet perplexed" look on my face throughout all of this. When she's done, I simply say, "I understand that's how you feel [fogging]. Here's what's going to happen from here. I'm still going to initiate sex whenever I feel like it. If your response turns me off, we're not going to have sex and I'll go do something else. If your response doesn't turn me off, then I'm going to keep escalating until we have sex. It's that simple."

In all of this, I stuck to my desired outcome and did not mold it to her. I did not let her emotions change my attitude or make me angry or upset or turn into some cold, emotionless robot with a dead look in my eyes (I used to do that a lot). I maintained having a personality and a positive attitude. This is actually more nuanced than people think. Go on youtube, search LAHWF and watch several of his videos. He's usually dry and monotonous in his awkward approaches to people. Then he made this video, where he's intentionally maintaining "personality" in a conversation. That's what you have to do to maintain frame in these types of situations.

As to your situation specifically, what's the big deal if she passes out? As far as I'm aware, a vasovagal response isn't lethal or anything you need to be hospitalized for. It's literally just fainting and coming back around in a few seconds/minutes. She wants you to treat it like a life-and-death thing that can never be triggered. Screw that. Tell her, "I have a joint problem that responds to stress. Every time you whine my joints start aching. So, you'd better never say anything that upsets me or else my joint might tingle." I get that in her mind a vasovagal response is a bigger deal than a joint ache, but it still conveys the same concept: there's a low-risk, undesirable result that can occur from certain stimuli and you're telling the other person that they need to cater their actions to your condition so that you don't have to experience that undesirable result. You're a big boy. You can decide for yourself when your interest at any given time outweighs her interest in avoiding a vasovagal response and the probability that it will actually be triggered.

excuses to threaten divorce ... So how do I respond?

As /u/Deep_Strength said, call her bluff. Don't respond to threats.

But how do I RESPOND in the moment?

Fog, NI, AA, AM ... the usual.

I can't dismiss because there IS some validity

Stop saying that. Just because a condition is valid doesn't mean it's serious. Let me make this a bullet point, because I googled it just to be sure, rather than going off of memory.

- It is generally not considered to be a dangerous event, nor a sign of a more serious cardiac condition.

I have a weird condition: taco seasoning makes one of my lower back molars tingle a little bit. How legit would it be for someone to say, "I better not use taco seasoning when I make tacos because he has a legitimate condition - his tooth might tingle"? Legitimate $\neq$ serious. Don't let her use a non-serious condition to manipulate you.

Now that doesn't mean you go around intentionally triggering this response. Be sensitive, of course. But as soon as she uses it as a manipulation tool, she's crossed a line and you need to reinforce that boundary.

Plus since she only says these things while threatening divorce, telling me she despises me and can't stand me... So me saying "Whatever you want, whatever it takes to fix this" Is just being beta, giving in to bad behaviour and reinforcing a pattern.

Absolutely. Don't do that. Even if your ultimate decision is aligned with her desires (for example, if she's actually right and it took that argument for you to realize it), you don't phrase it in terms of her desires ("You're right"); rather, you phrase it as a conclusive action-step: "Here's what we're going to do ..."

How do you respond to threats from your wife?

2 upvotes · 16 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

1/2

feeling like I know a LOT about God, but don't really experience him in the way the bible seems to say I should Expand on what you think the Bible says about how you should experience God. This statement intrigues me and is often rooted in a false perception based on how other Christians think you should experience God or how they act like they experience God, not necessarily what the Bible actually says. Search my comment history for the word "emotionalism" and you might find more of what I'm talking about.

as due her not having a clear purpose / mission in life

That is a reflection of you, my friend. Your wife is to adopt your mission/purpose, not have one of her own. If she doesn't have a mission it's because you don't or you haven't invited her to participate in your mission. What is your mission? If it's your career, that's a solid example of why I say your career can't be your mission. It's really darn hard to invite your wife to participate in that in a meaningful rather than obligatory way.

*Her issues:

As /u/RedPillCoach said, these are all projections. She probably has histrionic and narcissistic tendencies, which would explain a lot of what you're describing. One clear trait of a narcissist is that they accuse other people of having the flaws that they themselves have, as this detracts attention away from their flaws and makes it look like you're being a child if you say, "No I'm not, you are!" It's actually an effective strategy most of the time, which is why narcissists use it so often.

How do I approach?

Pushing a woman isn't a problem. You SHOULD be doing this. How you push her, though - that's the tricky part. But I've already written that up and would have you re-read 208 - Leadership Part 2, which might be more helpful now that you know a clear context in which you can apply it.

BUT - Sometimes it feels like not instantly agreeing with her on an issue in her mind makes me an evil person.

Negative Inquiry, my friend. This is your best friend with a wife like this. As I've said many times before, if used correctly it will always lead to one of three conclusions: (1) she admits her issue was only a matter of personal preference and that you did nothing wrong, (2) she recognizes that she's wrong and there was nothing morally objectionable or sinful about what you did/said/whatever, or (3) she reveals a deeper motivating for getting so worked up about the issue, which is almost always a comfort test and can be passed accordingly with lots of room for actual inner-heart-change in the process.

And she went off that I was a sick person who has serious issues etc. Again - I told her I AGREE with her that its wrong, I never said I felt otherwise

In other words, you broke frame. You need to put WISNIFG next on your list because it sounds like you're trying to fog, but you're doing it wrong. That book will also explain negative inquiry better.

She didn't care, she was outraged that my first reaction wasn't to immediately condemn the action, but to question the validity of the article

No, no, no, no, no. You've got this all wrong. Her outrage had nothing to do with the article. It was outrage that you didn't agree with her opinion. She wants you to be one of her girlfriends who's all, "uh huh, darn straight ... you got that right, gurl" whenever she speaks. You're right for not caving, but you're also breaking frame when you do. That's your biggest problem here - a frame issue.

Specifically, she has her own frame. She's trying to use her frame to break yours. You're trying to maintain your frame without hurting her frame. That's why you say what you want, but then you cushion it with, "I am agreeing with you" as an attempt at tactfully mitigating the fact that you're not fully adopting her frame. In reality, you should be ignoring her frame altogether, not reinforcing it. The more you reinforce her frame with crap like that, the stronger she feels her frame is, the more she's going to challenge your frame.

btw I'm not American, and am not a supporter of Trump either. I just don't like jumping to conclusions from articles that may very well be omitting facts.

Okay, now why'd you have to go and say that at all? Now it sounds like you're trying to cater to our frame too, whatever you think that might be. You don't need to justify your views on politics to us unless we challenge you on it.

Vasovagal syncope

My wife has this to known triggers too. The triggers aren't random. They always have a common link, like you noted (stress, fear, etc.). But people can experience those triggers from unexpected stimuli. For my wife, the only real consistent trigger for her is having her blood drawn.

I'm a Christian. I'm a "jerk." Deal with it.

2 upvotes · 13 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

As I literally just shut down my computer ...

Expanding on a question asked in another post.

2 upvotes · 13 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is brilliant! It's almost like something Jesus would have said. Oh yeah ... not to steal your thunder, but he did. In the parable of the Great Banquet (Luke 14:15-24) Jesus talks of a rich man who invites all of his other rich friends to a banquet. None of them come because they have their other rich-people things to do. So, he sends his servants out to "bring in the poor, the crippled, the blind and the lame."

Even after that there was still room, so he has his servants COMPEL those on the "roads and country lanes" to "come in, so that my house will be full." But "not one of those who were invited will get a taste of my banquet."

So, as you say, it's not surprising that we get the average and the below-average in the faith more than the above-average. Jesus said this is how it would be.

- BUT!!! Jesus also compels us to a higher standard once we're in. We are to become the "above average" if we were not already that way when we joined.

This is true not only with how we care for ourselves, through good stewardship of our bodies (the female side, as you indicated), but also in how we earn and manage our finances (the male side you mentioned). Ecc. 2:26 also comes to mind: "To the person who pleases him, God gives wisdom, knowledge and happiness, but to the sinner he gives the task of gathering and storing up wealth to hand it over to the one who pleases God."

Are those average dudes and gals sitting in the pews every Sunday truly saved or are they there because the church is where they fit in?

Salvation isn't decided based on how you compare to the average on the SMP. It's based on faith. The context of this conversation doesn't give any information to discuss whether someone is saved or not. That said, I think what you're getting at is a suggestion that some people join church not because they believe in Jesus, but because they need a place to belong. Yes, that's true. But no, we cannot make a sweeping generalization that any relative proportion of average people are there for this reason or not.

Small Intro

2 upvotes · 13 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

To their detriment, many people downplay the importance of an intellectual understanding of scripture and elevate feeling their faith

Philippians 1:9 is a great reference for this: "And this is my prayer: that your love may abound more and more in knowledge and depth of insight."

If people want to rave about how much they "love" (feelings) God and that our "love" (feelings) for him trumps everything else, just ask them where their love for God comes from or if their love comes from knowledge and depth of insight. Puts them in their place every time.

You can also take a more roundabout way with Hebrews 11:6 - without faith it is impossible to please God. Romans 14:23 also says anything that doesn't come from faith is sin. Where does this faith come from? How strongly we feel about Jesus? No. Romans 10:17 says that faith comes from hearing God's word. So, all that feeling-love (as opposed to biblical love) is worthless if we don't know God's word as the foundation of our faith because we can't please God otherwise.

Matthew 7:24-27 also adds obedience to the mix, calling it the strength of our foundation. So, God's word is our foundation, but if we don't obey it, it's a worthless foundation. We never see emotions come into any of these conversations by Jesus and Paul.

Biblical textual analysis of why Adam had headship before the fall

2 upvotes · 13 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I think Genesis 3:6 is pretty clear that Adam was there when Eve was decided and ate the fruit.

TheRedPill is Feminist

2 upvotes · 12 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Consider Emperor Constantine, I think everyone agrees he converted his Empire to Christianity for political reasons

I think he merely legalized and encouraged it, but Theodosius I was the one who enforced it as a mandated practice.

Still, look how far he spread Christianity? You and I probably would not be Christians today if not for him.

I can't say what would or wouldn't have happened, though I'm confident that those who God foreknew would choose him would be predestined to choose him no matter which version of history God ultimately went with, including an alternate history where Constantine and Theodosius I didn't "Christianize" everything.

More to the point, virtually every person I've ever heard preach on the subject (including my church's new pastor in a conversation just yesterday) acknowledge that these two men did more harm to the church than virtually anyone else in history, including Caesar Nero.

You talk about "many 'fake', 'believe-cos-it's-cool-now' Christians" as compared to the other real believers who were made, and we simply can't assess that comparison. But I can say quite definitively that Jesus' design for the church and the way that it was meant to grow by the model he gave us was crushed and crippled by these political movements. Because of this, we will forever struggle to have to distinguish between the faithful and the frauds. This will always skew any data we ever get and will also prevent us from witnessing to many people who need the Gospel because we assume they already have it. It also gives license for people to self-identify in one way and rise to power and authority within the church only to promote sinful views, like feminism, even though their faith was never genuine - because it's socially advantageous to be part of the church, even still in today's culture. You're not going to find that garbage in the church in China or North Korea or many middle-eastern countries.

I think what /u/rocknrollchuck is talking about, though, is that Jesus came to build a spiritual kingdom, not a physical one. So, when you compare feminism's rise to power to how the church should do it, you're talking on two different wavelengths. The church isn't meant to take over politics like feminism sought to do. It's meant to accomplish a similar goal on the spiritual battlefield rather than a physical one.

TheRedPill is Feminist

2 upvotes · 12 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting read ... but do you have to write like an 1850s philosopher? I'm pretty sure you don't speak that way.

Anyway, I don't think even the secular crowd would disagree with anything you're saying. They're not anti-feminist. They're anti delusion caused by feminism. One of their main concepts is, "We're not here to change the system; we're here to figure out how to use the system to our advantage."

To that end, I don't see Jesus or the apostles pushing for political or social revolution. Jesus also told us that as we approach end times the world would degrade, so I'm not hopeful that we could ever be widely successful in the goal you're proposing, and even if we were it would only be a temporary win.

Obviously that doesn't mean we shouldn't try. But it does also mean it should not be our highest priority. There are more important reasons God has us on the earth than to try to prevent his prophecies of the degradation of society from coming true ... at least on a mass scale.

I don't think we are meant to change society. I think we are meant to start a new society altogether - something the world will look at and want to join. You can't stop a sinner from their sin, but Christ can pull them out of it into something new entirely. That's the church ... or at least what it was meant to be.

NEW RULE - READ BEFORE POSTING

2 upvotes · 10 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is good feedback. I'll post my testimony soon. Thanks for this! Hopefully more will follow.

RP Christians Sidebar "Handbook" (Download Links)

2 upvotes · 10 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Done - it's on the sidebar

Is it weird to hit up a girl you know on instagram?

2 upvotes · 10 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Hah! I like it.

I feel like girls might see me as a player?

2 upvotes · 10 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well, if you're not trying to get laid, why are you trying to get married in the first place? So yeah, getting laid is an important part of marriage. Without it, you'd be better off just having a close female friend.

Sure, some girls aren't receptive to this, but the types of girls you want aren't the ones who are prudes. When you say "those are the girls that I WANT" it's either because you have a fetish for prude, asexual women or you're just mistaking "spiritually mature women" for "women who aren't sexual or tempted by sexual men."

I've talked a lot about dating in this post. My main conclusion is that if you want a spiritually mature woman, you shouldn't be looking at all. You should just be living for God and meeting someone who's following alongside your mission. The fact that you're looking at all inherently lowers the standard of who you're going to find. The true spiritually mature woman is often made by her man, not found by him. But if you would rather find a pre-made spiritually mature woman, then the advice in my above-referenced post is how you're going to do it.

I feel like girls might see me as a player?

2 upvotes · 10 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

These are good things to process and it's a difficult issue to address.

Maybe some harshness is in order if you're going to tolerate the single guys that have no clue what a side-bar is and basically feel like they've dated any girl for which they've held a door.

I hear you. OZ was just commenting in mod-chat yesterday about how proud he was when another guy you called out posted some garbage and the community here reamed him for it and set him straight. He said it's nice to see people here taking ownership of the sub and somewhat self-policing. I agree.

Do the mods here think these LV posts are worth the work?

I can only speak for myself, but you'll note that I don't respond to all of them. If it's not worth the work, I don't respond. If there is something significant to be said that hasn't already been said, then I chime in. But worth is decided by each person. Personally, I walk away from many sermons on Sunday morning thinking, "That was total garbage and a waste of my time," but the person next to me is crying and praising God because that's exactly what he needed to hear. So, I stop evaluating things based on its worth to me and contemplate its value to others. To that end ...

do the mods here think these types of posts are LV?

Again, I can only speak for myself, but the question here depends on how we assign "value" to a post. Certainly if someone is trolling there's no real value to anyone, and I've removed some of those posts. But if the person asking the question has a legitimate question, there may be value in it, although I love /u/OsmiumZulu's copy pasta asking for stats, what sidebar material they've read, etc. - and I've taken to doing the same myself on a number of posts. This forces the poster to make it a higher quality.

But here's the thing: most people coming in here aren't going to know how to discern a high-quality post from a low-quality one. They won't know what's expected until someone tells them. So, they're going to ask their question and look for an answer, just as happens everywhere else in life and reddit. So, we can't really fault them when we're the ones who haven't given any posting criteria - and perhaps that is an issue that does need rectified.

Beyond that, I will also note that LV posts can still have two peripheral sources of value: (1) because at certain junctions even low value activity is better than no activity at all; and (2) even if the poster isn't taking things seriously, sometimes stupid and silly questions evoke good conversation that is beneficial to everyone else who reads it, which is why it is often said of reddit that the real heart and value is in the comments, not the posts themselves.

All the same, these are good things to be discussing and I'll certainly be chatting with the other mods about the things you're bringing up!

Sex god method... RPC Perspective?

2 upvotes · 8 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

SGM was mostly good content but focused on girls whose salvation is seriously in question. Genuine Christian women will likely have some different reactions to some things on an emotional level, but biologically they'll likely still be responsive to all that stuff ... Romans 7:25 affirming that while our minds are renewed, our bodies remain unchanged.

Romans 14:14 (among many other passages) also makes clear that sin is found in our hearts, not in the actions themselves. So, I ask: What is the reason you're doing this? and What is her motive for liking it? and Is that a motive you should be fueling or stifling?

I've never said a cuss word in my life. That's a personal conviction of mine, although I am firmly convinced it is not sinful to do so for many purposes. But I have been seriously convicted lately that I should learn to use some words in a right context to break any subliminal prose I may have over my "I've never said ..." record.

More to the point, if you're telling your wife stuff in bed that affirms the bond you have (ex. "Your pussy is mine" or "You're MY slut") and she receives it well, I can't see how that's wrong.

But if you're doing something just to make it feel naughty because sin is sexy ... even if it's not technically sin, it becomes sin by deriving pleasure from doing something on the basis that it feels wrong.

But if it's sexy not because you feel like you're doing something wrong, but because it's exciting to stretch boundaries and try new things that you may have previously thought were wrong, that's a good thing.

Reworking the Sidebar

2 upvotes · 7 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I have no objection.

Reworking the Sidebar

2 upvotes · 7 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's a decent suggestion. I've started a book that would do essentially that. I'm just slow on writing it.

Happy Belated 4th, men. Here's my bi-monthly example of what NOT to do. Link in comments.

2 upvotes · 5 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I think they're helpful when accompanied by an analysis of why it was wrong and what should have been done instead. Without that analysis there are too many alternatives or suggestions that aren't helpful that people might reach on their own. And if you're relying on other people in the comments to do the analysis for you ... well, that's just lazy :p

Happy Belated 4th, men. Here's my bi-monthly example of what NOT to do. Link in comments.

2 upvotes · 5 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Fair enough

Apparently there's a sidebar

2 upvotes · 4 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks. Glad I can be of help. I've just studied a lot throughout the years and read the bible daily.

I'm fairly new to redpill, but with my Christian beliefs I don't fully trust redpill.

2 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

To be clear, there are many endorsed contributors who will prescribe certain behaviors and complain that a man is not truly "red pill" if he doesn't accept those behaviors. It's not everyone, but it is a majority of ECs on MRP, for example.

Dealing with ONEitis

2 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed

Are Christian events a bad date idea...why?

2 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is an important question.

There are no women watching

2 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a wonderful message on an otherwise disheartening reality.

There are no women watching

2 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Men are the creators of culture, women aren't.

This was true until men empowered women to be culture-creators. I'm not even saying that's a bad thing. Women have a lot to offer culture. From Jane Austin to J. K. Rowling, I'd be grieved if we lost many of their contributions. But I think what you're getting at is social structure, where it's a lot more dangerous - and indeed cultural influence lends itself toward a strong influence over social hierarchies.

This is simply untrue. Sure, many women won't obey their adult live in roommate man child, but a husband who owns his life and fulfills his role as a man? Many, if not most, will obey. My wife, and many other women I know, are keen to listen to and obey strong men. Not only have I seen this play out first hand among Christian women, but I know many secular women who desire the guidance of a strong man to run their life and call out their crappy behavior.

This is what I came here to say - and you worded it much more efficiently than I would have. If this were not true, secular RP wouldn't exist - it would have reached a different conclusion of what attracts women to men.

Pastors, husbands, and godly older women ought to call women out for their sin. We don't see that from the pulpit much today because most pastors are weak, which is a separate sin that men in the church need to address. Finally, Jesus wasn't obligated to fix our mess but chose to do so anyways. We ought to meditate on this and find it to be instructive.

Perfectly put. It's sad that pastors will repent of so many sins, but not the ones that keep butts in their seats.

Phil's June Update

2 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm sorry you got down-voted. I actually agree with you and put you back in the positive ;) Service in the church is great and should be encouraged, but it is rarely a solution. It is often a placation to actual spiritual maturation and sanctification. People think, "As long as I put in my hours of service, God and his people should love me more" or something like that.

I like to refer to Dawson Trotman's line in his famous sermon: Born to Reproduce (my favorite sermon of all time):

If I were the minister of a church and had deacons or elders to pass the plate and choir members to sing, I would say, "Thank God for your help. We need you. Praise the Lord for these extra things that you do," but I would keep pressing home the big job— "Be fruitful and multiply." All these other things are incidental to the supreme task of winning a man or woman to Jesus Christ and then helping him or her to go on.

That said, if your conclusion is to abandon the church entirely, that's a more troubling concern.

Should I be approaching random girls? If so, where?

2 upvotes · 28 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

if you don't get used to thinking, "hey, she's pretty. I want to know her name," and then going over and introducing yourself, how are you EVER going to meet a girl? From my experience, the good ones will not open you.

Not to mention that if it's wrong for you to do it, why do you (general) seem to think it's okay for a woman to cold-approach you?

See how easy it is to get duped into thinking that women should have special societal privileges, but that men should be stifled?

There is no "Christian version" of anything

2 upvotes · 24 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

To a secular worldview, sure.

Desiring God Says Feminism Wants to Silence "Real Men"

2 upvotes · 20 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's a good point. I call this "modeling." It's a significant part of any form of leadership and influence, if we want to have any kind of impact on our world.

What I will note, though, is that the mission of disciple-making is not merely a "your thing, my thing" issue. It is, in fact, a biblical calling over all people. The way we carry it out is what differs from person to person.

Some people are gifted at hospitality and may have people in their home to share Christ with them. Others might be gifted at teaching, and will have intense and deep conversations about the Bible. Others are gifted with prophecy and will call out those they love on their sin and help them walk along the narrow path. Still more might be gifted at mercy, in which they'll build disciples by sharing others' burdens as the foundation of the relationship.

There is no spiritual gift of "discipleship," which some would assume as an excuse to not do it - by claiming they don't have the gift. But even if it was (like evangelism, for example), that does not mean everyone without the gift is excused. Someone who is not gifted at hospitality, for example, cannot claim he has no obligation to be hospitable to others when they visit. Someone who isn't gifted at mercy cannot argue that he has no obligation to be merciful toward others. It simply means that some are uniquely talented. So, the fact that someone is a gifted evangelist means he's really good at it, not that people who are less good at it should just give up and do something else.

Whatever a person's spiritual gift or life circumstance is, that only creates the context. But the mission of disciple-making is clear in Scripture as a call over all Christians.

Aaaquad introduction, stats, and brief RP journey 6.18.2018

2 upvotes · 19 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a wonderful field report. Thanks for sharing this! Now let's get down to business:

Stats

Not a bad place. I was worse off when I started my journey.

Lifts.

Set higher goals for yourself. With SL5x5, you should be able to increase your bench by 10lbs every week or two, which will get you to your year-end goals in the next couple months. This works until you're around 250, when it starts slowing down a lot.

Similarly, I've found with leg lifts, using proper form you can get quick gains at a rate of about 20lbs every week or two until you're around 350.

Just today I uploaded a new and improved 203, written by /u/RPChristof. This should help you quite a bit as well. It doesn't delve into the SL5x5 as much as my old post did, but it's far more comprehensive on the whole, and the SL5x5 website is on the sidebar anyway, so my breakdown probably wasn't all that necessary in the first place. After reading his comment, I started a new routine today, finally leaving SL5x5 after almost a year of it.

RP Background

A few things of concern in here, which ultimately boil down to a question: What boundaries do you have for pre-marriage physical relationships? Follow-up: Do you have a biblical basis for those boundaries?

Relationships

The way you write tells me you have a confidence issue. What have you been doing to cultivate abundance in your social status?

Work

This sounds like you're in an engineering program? I don't really know. Regardless of your present motivation issues, your actions still seem to be moving in the right direction. Finish your degree. You don't have to be top of your class, but shoot for it if you want to. Ultimately money isn't the end-goal of life anyway, but with a PhD, you'll likely never be found lacking too much either.

Spiritual

This is wonderful to hear, and I'm glad the 300-series has been helpful to you. It's really the one I want to develop most in the future, as I talk a lot about discipleship but haven't actually posted much on how to do it - only the follow-up process.

With regard to the knowledge-to-heart transition, I might be able to help there, as I used to have a significant struggle with this for a long time. More on that to come, if you want to delve further into detail on that. In the meantime, I like CS Lewis' 'fake it til you make it' approach when he says something like, "If you find that you know what is right, but your heart is not in it, just do it anyway and you should find your heart will soon follow."

Mission

This is beautiful to read. With regard to fitting your vocation in, I usually teach that there are three primary realms to consider:

- Where you work (vocation/co-workers)
- Where you live (neighbors/community)
- Where you play (hobbies/friends)

It's easy to assume your vocation must fit in, but it's essential that you not try to address all 3 at the same time. I typically suggest picking one as a primary ministry - wherever you see God most moving. Pick one as an "on-deck," where you're priming relationships for when your primary ministry dies down, which is inevitable over time. And reserve the third as your "save haven," where you can exercise a positional and temporal sabbath.

For example, I have had times where work was my "safe haven." I was always ministry-minded, but didn't put any pressure on myself to expand existing relationships or build new ones. Instead, I applied that pressure on myself in my community and I primed relationships at the gym so that if my neighbors move away (which will happen with a couple in a week) or things just generally die down (like during most winters), then I can focus more on connecting with some guys at the gym or playing racquetball more to build some relationships, or perhaps connecting with other writers or guitar players, etc.

Now, at other points I've also had my home as my "safe haven," with my work as my primary and my hobbies as "on deck." Pretty much any combination, I've done it. But what has consistently failed is when I've tried to do all of them at once.

Misc.

I look forward to your next progress report!

Was hit hard with some realizations, need input

2 upvotes · 18 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I didn't say that's how we should think of our spouses. You have to remember we're talking in context to a guy who says he has a fiery libido for some girls, but wants to pursue a relationship with someone who he isn't sexually attracted to. That means he'll end up being disappointed with sex in the relationship, which is a significant concern and can cause serious temptation to adultery.

Was hit hard with some realizations, need input

2 upvotes · 17 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Isn't she a nonchristian?

Was hit hard with some realizations, need input

2 upvotes · 17 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You think you're something special because you want her for more than just her body. This is the same story as every beta sad sap in any teenage movie ever made. You think this should give you some credit with the girl or with God, but it doesn't. It's a very beta attitude. It's unattractive - sometimes even repulsive to women. A woman might someday marry a guy like that for his betas provisions, but she'll likely never be excited about having sex with him.

Of course, if you're being genuine maybe you'll be happy to marry her even is she never wants sex with you. You'll end up wanting sex with someone else though and become embittered with your wife when she doesn't end up attracting you sexually the same way the other girls do.

I think it was u/OsmiumZulu who recently said that most other things you can get from a woman can be outsourced, but as a christian you can't do that with sex.

EC on TRP explains why making sex your god fails

2 upvotes · 15 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Absolutely.

EC on TRP explains why making sex your god fails

2 upvotes · 15 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting and good read. I agree with a lot of that too. The way I see it, looks make up at least 3 points of a guy's SMV. A male model gets all 3. A good looking guy gets 2.7. Maybe he's balding and only gets 2.5. Unless the elephant man works at the desk next to her, a true 0 doesn't exist.

So, an ugly guy might still get half a point for trying and 1.5-2 if he's got a great body. For many men those couple points are enough to jump them from 6 to 7 so they can start pulling 6s. They see the change and effect based on that criteria alone and the black pill is born.

Now I'd say "alphaness" is worth at least another 3 points. This one is far more disparate. 0s actually exist in mass droves. So when a guy gets up to a 3, that's a huge bump from what he likely was before.

The fact that increasing the alpha seems to give a bigger boost than improving looks isn't necessarily because it's more important. It's because there's a wide disparity between a man's natural condition and his improved state. If a man improves his alpha enough he may not need to change from his natural state of appearance at all.

RPC approach to dealing with Body Dysmorphia and other psychological insecurities?

2 upvotes · 14 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This whole post reminds me of the book You are Special by Max Lucado. OP, go read that book. It's a kids' book, but maybe the simplified recitation of the type of attitude you need to adopt can help :)

She wants God not you

2 upvotes · 11 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

But God also created women with a need for a husband. This is part of God's design even while she was sinless - not something God intends to undermine.

She wants God not you

2 upvotes · 11 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Or ... many girls want a guy just like their daddy. But yes, your point is certainly an interesting thought exercise. If God is the true alpha who also gives all the beta provisions, it makes sense that women would desire him most of all. But women also want what can appease their senses. In this world God will only fulfill for them on a spiritual level what a husband can on a physical level. So, while you may be right, it does not diminish their imperative to find a husband and be with him too.

[FR] Calculate your "cost per fuck"

2 upvotes · 8 June 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Yes, it's the retirement account that does it.

[FR] Calculate your "cost per fuck"

2 upvotes · 8 June 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Since nobody else wants to and I have no good excuse not to, I ran the calculation using all my fancy divorce software. Result: -$192. That's right: she pays me.

Wait ... so does that mean I should have less sex with my wife so my per sex value improves even more? That's why math doesn't always make sense.

Body fat % for Visible abs?

2 upvotes · 8 June 2018 · /r/askMRP

In the past I've managed that for 6 months. This must recent time (last summer) was only 3. I've also done it with a month on, month off timing but that doesn't work as well because my body never adapts, so it just sucks the whole time.

27/m virgin, want to lose it

2 upvotes · 7 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It's one of the founding principles behind how I parent my kids. It's also inherent in my personal makeup. Whenever my wife wants me to do something or let her do something I often ask, "Why?" She gets so mad, thinking I'm challenging her and implying she's being stupid. Obviously it has nothing to do with her being stupid - but I can't make an informed decision if I don't know why she wants what she does, and I'm not going to just rubber stamp everything she wants just because she says so.

lol's from women at church

2 upvotes · 4 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

when Christians enter into marriage they should not be playing games anymore

Game = charm, wit, charisma, etc. This isn't the same as "playing games." In the dating realm it might come off as "playing games" because most men don't have it naturally, so it's a facade they have to put on. To that end, I don't ever advise men just to put on a show; rather, it's a "fake it til you make it" concept - that we must live as who we want to be until we actually become it.

C. S. Lewis said something to the effect, "If you find that your heart is not where you want it to be, live as if it is anyway and you should find that your heart will soon follow after your actions." In the present context, if I want to be a man who can charm and seduce my wife, even if I didn't have that naturally, it might make sense to practice it for a while until it becomes second-nature and a natural part of my marriage.

Speaking from 10 years of experience in marriage, I can tell you that the best things for our marriage, intimacy, and sex life have ALWAYS been when I have been open and honest

I have been married for 10 years as well. I agree with your assessment here ... except when your "open and honest" behavior comes off as validation-seeking. If you go to your wife for validation instead of God, you will lose her respect in the long-run.

Any wimp can hide from his wife; it takes a confident man to reveal his true self Agreed again. This is one of the core concepts of NMMNG. But, as you seem to include, the way you reveal this cannot be in a "kiss my booboo and make me feel better" and "please tell me you still love me!" way.

relationship is based on game and not genuine connection

Unless that "game" - that charm, wit, flirtation, etc. - is all a natural part of the way I interact with my wife. To repress those aspects of how I want to connect with my wife is what would be inauthentic at that point.

rebuild the relationship based on Godly things rather than manipulation.

Where is there manipulation? And who's to say that all forms of manipulation are bad?

use that knowledge in a genuine and loving way rather than one that seeks to manipulate your wife into finding you attractive.

This is my thought exactly. I think the core difference we have is in how we understand and define "game." I get the impression you view it as a "facade" used to trick your wife into thinking you're something you're not. Virtually all of the manosphere uses it to reference certain characteristics about oneself that when expressed usually comes off as indicating sexual interest. To that end, if I were to suppress these traits of myself, I would be deceiving my wife by failing to communicate my sexual interest. Or if I were to employ non-"game" tactics of expressing my sexual interest, it would be dry and boring, like a robot sitting next to her making a monotone pronouncement: "I. Would. Like. To. Have. Sex. Today." That's an easy way to kill a bedroom.

My guess is that you employ a lot of "game" on your wife without calling it that. Have you ever hugged her from behind and slid your hand up her shirt to feel her abs? Have you ever lit some candles in the bedroom and waited for her to walk in? Have you ever rubbed her leg while watching Netflix, then kissed her cheek and said, "Shall we?" If you've done any of these things, you've employed game. If you haven't ... dear goodness, I feel bad for your wife :p

lol's from women at church

2 upvotes · 4 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

In conjunction with my reply to /u/rocknrollchuck - this is the other half of what I would have said, so you spared me the trouble :) After reading OP's (/u/palmorwrist) post, my gut reaction was to think: "I bet these women don't even realize what they're doing." It's not just that they're not trying to have an affair, as the original post suggests - it's that they don't even realize their own subconscious behavioral cues in the first place.

What I don't agree with is your next comment: "Just ask your wife ... If she thinks your method of communication with other wives is flirting then eliminate it."

This is, in essence, allowing her to define sin for him. It gives her too much power/control over his behaviors, which can be very detrimental to the relationship and is very likely to lead to a decrease in their sexuality within the marriage, which will only make OP want to re-engage with these other women all the more, making the self-control issue much harder to correct. Instead of surmounting a small hill, he'd be turning it into a mountain before he even got started on his way up.

The better option is to improve his character to develop self-control in the face of his present situation. The only exception I would give is if he is recklessly leading these women on, in which case he needs to back down. His post and comments make it clear he's not intentionally leading them on, but sometimes we are reckless with our conduct, not considering the probable impact it has on other people. That said, nothing in this post makes me think that any woman is actually lusting over him; rather, I get the impression that their subconscious attraction triggers have been tripped and that's about it. All's well and he'd be better to improve his self-control rather than improving his wife's husband-control.

What is the problem with porn?

2 upvotes · 4 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is one of the reasons why I said his sentiment is close, but not quite. The other obvious reason being that some people stay interested in sin even after they've had their time enjoying it for long enough.

Men with high testosterone, less likely to be in church

2 upvotes · 1 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well ... RP does too. If your marriage sucks, it's because you, the man, have failed to lead it properly. Right? ;)

What is the problem with porn?

2 upvotes · 1 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That makes more sense.

#MeToo church edition: Major Evangelical leader, Paige Patterson "removed" as Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary President

2 upvotes · 29 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

"But it's our favorite dress! And we've been wearing it for so many years that we just can't imagine putting on another one" ... right? That's how they'll respond. It doesn't matter what holes are in it or the fact that it smells like a trash heap. Oh well.

#MeToo church edition: Major Evangelical leader, Paige Patterson "removed" as Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary President

2 upvotes · 29 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That was never Christ's bride in the first place. It was just a new dress she wore for a while.

#MeToo church edition: Major Evangelical leader, Paige Patterson "removed" as Southwestern

Baptist Theological Seminary President

2 upvotes · 29 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

On a philosophical level I want to agree with you. But I don't see God letting his bride die so he can marry someone else. I see him redeeming and reconciling her - transforming her back to what she once was. That involves work from within, just as a wife who has gone astray needs an internal readjustment before she can be right with her husband again.

How to go about Handling Test From Others?

2 upvotes · 29 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I get that normally I should just let it go but it is not the reaction I feel within and so I am asking for guidance. Any ideas?

This is the key. You know to "turn the other cheek," but it still bothers you internally because you haven't mastered the Galatians 1:10 concept, "For am I now seeking the approval of man, or of God? Or am I trying to please man? If I were still trying to please man, I would not be a servant of Christ."

Now, I'd guess that internally you're not living just to impress these buffoons. But you do still care what they think of you. In other words, you have your actions rightly oriented, but your internal emotional state hasn't caught up yet.

How do you get it to catch up? The best advice I can give is to rightly orient yourself on a mission for Christ. When you are going in a certain direction and you can see that your life choices are making progress toward your goals, you stop caring what other people think or say because you're already making progress in the things that do matter to you.

Conversely, if you don't have a mission and are just trying to improve your life, then what other people think will matter greatly. You have no orientation, so what others think of you will define which way your life is oriented. Don't let other people set the frame. Set it yourself and go. That's how you'll develop a strong frame and it's how you'll have a concrete internal emotional state that is unshaken by these things. This is a frame issue, not a matter of mastering test-passing techniques.

To be clear, tests are things women throw out that have attraction cues. These men aren't testing you. They're not trying to be more attracted to you. They're just being men. Sure, you could AMOG them into backing down, but that's your choice and I'm not sure how alpha you are generally anyway.

[Discussion] Love After MRP

2 upvotes · 22 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

If it matters, my preferred balance looks something like:

- passion: 8
- companionship: 8
- commitment: 5

To evaluate my wife toward me:

- passion: 6
- companionship: 9
- commitment: 9

I know these numbers are relative and subjective, but subjective impressions and evaluations matter on an individual level. It also looks like I get more love from her than I give, but that's also because I bring more to the table. There are other aspects to love that I didn't mention in my original breakdown for various reasons, but earning an income, maintaining the calendar, parenting the kids, etc. - all those things are forms of love too, if we accept my underlying contention that love is more about what we do than how we feel or what we say (though those things matter too). Accordingly, if we added that stuff to the balance, I'd outweigh her by a few points, bringing a closer balance.

The key here is that on the points that matter to me, I'm getting from her what I want in abundance of what I want. But on the points that matter to her, I bring more to the table. To that end, it's not about who loves who more or if one loves the other enough. In the context of an LTR/marriage it's about ensuring the balance is uniquely suited to the situation.

For men who actually have their lives figured out, giving her what she wants from a relationship will be second nature and require no additional effort because he just has to keep on being his awesome self the same as before the relationship. As a result, it's her who usually ends up making up the difference in trying to meet his standards - but this is natural for most women, as it is their pattern to mold to their man anyway.

Advice. Legal next moves. Etc.

2 upvotes · 22 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

About 1/3 of my cases involve family members helping pay my bill. It's very common.

Appearing butthurt when I'm not

2 upvotes · 15 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

I'd question your escalation tactics. If she's going to say no, she would have let you know somewhere in the "kino'd all day, flirted, instigated, isolated" phase. If you do it right, THAT is your initiation. You go 90, she goes 10.

I used to think initiating sex meant carrying her off to the bedroom or sticking my hand down her pants or starting to pull clothes off or something. Now it's a lot more obvious that well-played kino is the initiation. Her response to your kino should be what you formerly used to think of as initiation. Or let me put this another way: the way beta men see initiating sex is really what the women should be doing in response to your kino. Don't do your 90% and then also her 10%. Let her do the last 10%. Let her be the one to start undressing or walking you up to the bedroom.

When you're chilling to netflix and you're rubbing her inner-thigh and she grabs your hand and puts it down her waist-line, that's her responding to your initiation. That's her 10%. If she's not doing that or giving affirmative signals back, she's not interested. Sure, you can still be more bold about it, but if you hit a brick wall with kino, don't be surprised if you hit a brick wall with something bolder too. The only question at that point is if your "bolder" approach is strong enough to knock that wall down - and I don't mean forceful; I mean powerful. There's a difference.

As for not acting butt-hurt, it's all about frame and attitude. It's often been said that your frame is the best version of you as you want the world to see you at any given time. If you're acting that way in one moment, then after a denial you're acting anything less than that, it's obvious to her that her actions had an effect on your mood. It's that simple.

To be clearer: butt-hurt doesn't mean your attitude changes from 10 down to 2. It could be 10 dropping to 9. Any indication that her actions affected your attitude is a foothold of power that she has in your life - and she knows it.

From there, most men have the gut reaction to say, "Oh, well after a rejection I feel like dropping from 10 to 8, but I'll keep acting 10 to show I'm not butt-hurt because I'm not." In reality, the fact that you'd drop at all is butt-hurt. Don't lie to yourself. Even if you're still in a good mood, a lesser good mood is still evidence of her hold over you. If you need to fake a 10 in those moments until you actually make it, go for it. But don't lie to yourself and say you're OI and not butt-hurt when you are.

Screening for a Wife: Methods (Part II)

2 upvotes · 15 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is some grade-A advice here.

Screening for a Wife: Methods (Part II)

2 upvotes · 15 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent post! I'm reminded of the three things to look for in a potential disciple: faithful, available, and teachable. If you can get all three in one person you can mold them to become anything. This is true for prospective wives. And to be clear, "faithful" doesn't mean sexually pure (though that's good too); it means that they will apply what they learn from you rather than tossing another brick in their knowledge pile.

Some of the conversational techniques here are really fun to employ and can have a lot of value even for married men.

Is texting really only for logistics?

2 upvotes · 14 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

When I was in the 18-26 age range, it was all about IM. I had countless important and in-depth conversations over IM with my wife (and other women) that I now realize was more harmful than it was helpful. You'll hear advice saying that it's okay as long as you're tactful about how you handle it. I'd be weary.

Here's the thing: as I have often said here, women are creatures of desire. But they very rarely desire what's in front of them. Their desires are often oriented toward that which they fantasize about.

- You're dating, she desire marriage.
- You get married, she desires kids.
- You get kids, she desires a bigger house.
- You get a bigger house, she desires more kids.
- You get more kids, she desires a bigger car.
- You get the bigger car, she desires a bigger and better man.

Why? Because she realizes that you meeting all of her desires isn't curing the emptiness that she feels. That's why RP tells men to stop supplicating to women and start living for themselves. Instead of meeting their desires, make them adopt your desires. That's where true power in the relationship lies. And because you're the one setting the pace of the desires and where to go next, she never loses interest in you as long as you don't become stagnant.

Back to texting ... when you have conversations about texting, she doesn't see what's in front of her. She sees what her fantasy world creates. This can work for you or against you. If she's not attracted to you, you're the villain in her story and she'll read everything in a negative way. You try to text her a funny joke and she sees that childish goof-ball who needs to grow up. But if you are attractive to her, you can text her the exact same joke and all of a sudden you're funny and flirtatious.

To that end, attraction cannot be built on texting or IMs alone. At a best case scenario, you'll cause her to become attracted to her fantasy version of you, then be disappointed by the real thing when you don't measure up to the hype she created in her head. At a worst case, she'll find you creepy or sissy for opting to use a long distance medium over an actual phone call or in-person meet-up.

Now, I agree with what /u/5beams5 said - that if you're just dating and not meeting up every other day, there probably should be some kind of long-distance medium to keep the plate spinning. Text can work fine with that. But as has been noted elsewhere, less is more. Don't let her create a fantasy version of who she thinks you are based on your text messaging skills - for better or worse. Let her figure out who you really are. That will breed long-term success.

Should Christian singles implement kino or should they wait until marriage for kino?

2 upvotes · 14 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

As /u/Whitified said, you're going to have trouble getting a woman to fall head-over-heels for you without some form of kino. You might still get married, but kino speeds up the process. You've read a lot of what I've written about the importance of avoiding marriage in favor of your mission, so I won't re-hash that here. But when you do get to a point where you're horny for a particular woman and she's showing interest back, if you want to ramp up that marriage date to get the ball moving rather than having a protracted engagement, kino is certainly a way to do that.

Without kino she might want to take it slow, make sure things are a good fit, etc. - which are all code for, "I need to throw some more tests his way and see whether he's going to be a good beta provider." Add in kino and instead of the BB you become the AF and she'll have no problem speeding up the process. Note the clear distinction there: for the beta bucks she wants to take her time before sleeping with him, making sure there are no better options first; but for the AF she knows what she wants, and if she's committed to her faith she'll know that marriage needs to happen first, so she'll fly past all that "be slow and see if this is a good fit" garbage.

To that end, introducing kino under a modern cultural dating model is incredibly dangerous and leads to marriage that will almost certainly fail because sex becomes the foundation of the marriage. This is bad. In my profession, I make the most money off of those types of couples. But if one is following my model of finding a wife, they have a foundation on Christ and the mission he put them here to fulfill - something that by the point of sexual attraction should already be a mutual pursuit. They're already spiritually mature enough and have their lives oriented correctly so that even if they got married after only a month or two, they should be fine, and thus there's no harm in kino - if anything, it should be encouraged.

As for the technicalities of what's okay and what's not, what /u/BayAreaRPChristian said is solid, although I would conceptualize it somewhat differently when it comes to kino technique. Nevertheless, the general categories of what's okay inside and outside of marriage make sense to me.

Thoughts on "Intended for Pleasure" by Ed Wheat?

2 upvotes · 14 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

My wife's doctor recommended the same thing. She didn't do it. I wish she had. Unfortunately, I do not have another book recommendation.

How to approach sex in the first weeks of marriage

2 upvotes · 8 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

No matter how awesome of a guy you might be, you're going to be rejected by your wife at some point. You want sex, she doesn't. It might be for good reason, it might not be. Most guys get butt-hurt when they get that rejection. They take it personally or whine like a little baby because they didn't get their way, or they just go ice cold and walk away. In my 211 post on "An Anatomy of Butthurt" I addressed a lot of this, demonstrating that the better frame is for the man to maintain his positive attitude even through rejection. Stoicism is not about being cold and robotic to deal with pain - it's about experiencing pain without letting it affect you. If you were cold and robotic before the pain came on, then I suppose stoicism would mean staying that way through the pain, but a cold, robotic frame is also a sucky one that no woman wants to live in. If one's frame is full of wit, charm, charisma, humor, strength, passion, etc. then one should be able to continue exhibiting all of those qualities even through the pain of rejection, the pain of a nagging wife, the pain of a wife who hurls insults and acts like a harpy, etc.

What "speed" for "escalating" would you recommend?

My wife and I have a joke about this that makes it very easy. When I was in high school there was a guy who invited the slutty girl over to study Spanish. She goes up to his room, they open the book, and before reading a word he just says, "So, are we going to do it or what?" Then they had sex. There was no escalation, no build, no kino ... nothing. Just a really bad not-even-a-pick-up-line. So, sometimes I'll just do a cold lead with my wife by using this line. She laughs, we have sex.

Other times I start my game far earlier. I tease her early on with pseudo-mean/pseudo-flirty text messages throughout the work day. When we get home, I approach from behind and wrap my arms around her, maybe slipping a hand up her shirt and on her belly to get her feeling some skin. After dinner I'll pat her butt to as a "get to work" cleaning up the dishes while I get the kids ready for bed and put them down. After that I'll sit on the couch and she'll cuddle up to me. I rub her back, she cuddles closer, and it builds from there.

These are two highly polar extremes - and both work. There is no right "speed" that fits all situations. If my wife's in a bad mood, she needs more escalation and amused mastery. If she's in a good mood, all I've got to do is say, "So, are we going to do it or what?"

Also: Physical and/or also verbal?

All of the above. As noted, it's really situation dependent. But if you're in the long-game because she's in a bad attitude, generally start with verbal before physical.

What parts of "Game" should a RP Christian utilize? Which ones should we not utilize?

2 upvotes · 7 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's fair. It also depends on one's theology of marriage after divorce, which is a disputable matter under Romans 14. If one allows for such remarriage then there is usually no adultery concern.

How does a RPC deal with hookup culture?

2 upvotes · 7 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Putting up a Christmas tree also has pagan roots ... that doesn't make it sinful. There's a book titled Pagan Christianity that goes into all of the pagan origins of virtually everything the church does - especially in the Catholic and Orthodox branches, where there's a lot of pomp and circumstance and ritualism. That doesn't mean it's sinful. It simply means it's been reconciled and redeemed to God.

To that end, for all we know Adam ate out Eve while she gave him a bj. How do we know the Egyptians didn't learn it from them? My guess is that the sinfulness of pre-Noah mankind included all kinds of sexual things that predated Egyptian culture, so I'm highly skeptical that oral sex originated with the Egyptians and no one before them had ever done it (not to say that this means oral sex is part of that sinfulness).

Many people also reference the clear allusions to oral sex in Song of Solomon. Long story short, in the context of marriage it's not sin. That said, this has been a boundary I still haven't gotten my wife to cross ... that will, I hope, come in time.

How does a RPC deal with hookup culture?

2 upvotes · 7 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is the exact reply I would have given. The push for purity is only harmful if it is led and initiated by the woman. If it is initiated by the man, it is not "playing into the feminine imperative" - it is a man exercising appropriate leadership and demonstrating that sex cannot be utilized as a weapon against him, that he has sufficient control and restraint over his own body.

It also takes the pressure off the woman to have to be the one to exercise restraint, which is healthy in the long-term. If a woman is godly, she will refrain from sex before marriage. Period. The harder a man pushes her to violate that boundary, the more accustomed she becomes to putting up her defenses around her sexuality and the stronger those defenses become. That pattern will continue into marriage, greatly stifling the woman's sexuality. As such, if the man takes responsibility for the purity of the relationship and alleviates her burden and she has good reason to trust him in this, that is far more likely to lead to an open, healthy sex-life after marriage.

Also, re: Joshua Harris ... I actually put that book on the sidebar when I first created this sub ;)

Tag: /u/RedPlanetMan - I'll let this operate as my reply instead of doing a separate comment

Regulating Sexual Desire

2 upvotes · 7 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

There is some other good advice here on the distinction between why secular RP says to wait and the actual orientation of the Christian life, so I won't re-hash that here. The real reason I recommend guys wait until later in life is two-fold:

1. Guys tend to hit their peak SMV at around the age of 35, so it makes sense to wait until at least 30 so you're a lot closer to that optimization. At this point, lots more options open up. Sure, statistically, you might age yourself out of some women. But on the whole you will have a lot more options open to you and it's certainly not uncommon for people to marry 5-15 years younger (my grandparents: 17 years apart; my in-laws: 13 years apart; my wife's grandparents: 12 years apart; a couple friends: 9 years apart; a missionary couple I know: 8 years apart).
2. When women marry a guy in his 20s she's marrying him for what she thinks he could become, not for who he is. This is very dangerous because it has an incredible bolstering effect on her frame and she will often find herself disappointed if she sees the man's actual direction in life take a different path from the one she had in her mind. If the guy waits until his 30s she can hardly make this mistake - she sees that he is well established and knows exactly what she's getting, making it much easier for the man to maintain frame and set his course in life for her to follow, rather than her demanding that he go down the path she expected him to follow.
3. Biblically, people shouldn't even making "getting married" a priority in the first place - not now or at any age. Marriage should be something that happens as a natural byproduct of two people living on mission for Christ alongside one another in a context where a "burning passion" eventually occurs. Paul frequently references in the Scriptures several women who "labored at his side" - and that was in a culture that heavily opposed women having any actual role other than sitting in their houses tending to a man's needs. I've written more on this elsewhere here, so I won't refrain.

My point here is that you shouldn't wait to get married just because the red pill tells you to wait. Their rationale is a secular one. But there is still great wisdom in waiting anyway, if you choose to do so.

As for dealing with sexual urges between now and then, there's some good advice around here from /u/akohlan198 and /u/Deep_Strength, but I'd add pursuing a mission in life. This is how you're going to happen across that woman anyway. I did a much larger write-up on this in this post from a month ago. Simply put, the best way to keep sin out is not to try to avoid sin; it's to re-orient yourself toward the things God wants you doing.

Those aren't general characteristics to employ; it's an actual mission he put you on. If you're not living on that mission, then you'll be living for something else - and anything else other than the mission God has set you apart for is sin. So, if you're not going to live on that mission, whether your sin is premarital sex or even spiritual apathy, it doesn't really matter ... you're just swapping one sin for another.

To be clearer, if you refuse to live on the mission God called you to live on, but you also want to refrain from sexual sins, what you're really suggesting is: "Guys, I want to live a life of sin and rejection of God's mission for me, but I don't want that to be sexual sin because the church will shame me real bad for doing that, so can you help me get rid of that sin and find another sinful way of living instead ... maybe a sinful lifestyle that the church will actually be okay with?" That's how those types of conversations always feel to me.

Regulating Sexual Desire

2 upvotes · 7 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed. Both the RP and Bible's positions, as best I can tell, are to avoid marriage at all cost. The Bible's only exception in a post-Gospel world is if you're mutually burning with passion with someone else to the point where you would otherwise sin through premarital sex - and even that is contingent on the other person being someone who will live by the leader-helper dynamic established in Genesis. That's why Paul in one place gives the "burning with passion" excuse, but in another place also says, "But don't marry a non-believer." Paul inherently assumes all believers are living on mission for Christ, which is evident through much of his writings. This assumption was rational in his day, but it has become lost today as so few people actually live this way. So, when Paul gave the excuse for two Christians to marry, it was with the assumption that the husband and wife were both believers and that the husband would be following after his pattern of disciple-making (see Philippians 3:17, Titus 2:7 in the context of Titus being discipled by Paul and commissioned as a disciple-maker, 1 Cor. 11:1-3, 1 Thess. 1:6-7, etc.) and the wife would help him.

Regulating Sexual Desire

2 upvotes · 7 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Solid comment, but a few things to note:

The Scriptures in 1 Corinthians 7 recommend you marry if you burn.

That's mutually with another person, not necessarily just because someone by themselves happens to want sex a lot.

Being older does not necessarily mean your chances are better either

Very, very true. But as a matter of practical observation, an older guy dating younger women is often far more likely to garner their respect and a submissive attitude up-front. There's a sense that the man is pre-established and the woman is joining him, rather than same-age couples who both have pseudo-established lives that they are trying to "blend together," which leads to different conclusions. That's not to say it can't be done right, but it does make things easier if you marry younger.

As far as sex drive goes, what /u/akohlan198 said is good

Those are good, but I'd add pursuing a mission to the list. I'll never drop this prerequisite. Finding a virtuous woman is not enough. Having a solid mission will give context for knowing whether her virtues can easily be oriented toward the man's purpose in life or if they're simply pleasant character traits that she will only exercise at her own discretion and, thus, they become more a point of frustration than of beauty.

On this I speak from experience. I married a virtuous woman - someone that many other Christian men commended me for doing, seeing her character and highly praising her for her godliness. But after we were married it became apparent that she would not orient her exercise of those virtues consistently with my mission to make disciples. She was willing to be hospitable, but quickly despised when I brought men I was discipling into the home. She was humble and meek, but acted arrogant and condescending when I would take 2 hours off of work (and therefore made a little less money that day) to meet with a new Christian who wanted to read the Bible together. She was very generous, but fought me when I wanted to orient our giving toward people who I knew to be active disciple-makers. Name any virtue that you think a woman should have and she had it ... except when it came to my mission, in which case those virtues went straight out the window.

This is what led to some of my beta days. After the first couple years of marriage I caved. I wanted my "virtuous wife" back, so I started orienting my life around the things she wanted - and she did become "virtuous" again - because she was able to exercise those virtues in a way consistent with her own life pursuits. But with those virtues she also became pious and prude ... frigid even.

Now, this is incredibly frustrating because from the outside she looks like the model of a godly woman. The church doesn't care about the mission of disciple-making (which has always been my mission), so they didn't care that her exercise of the virtues was conditional on pursuing worldly goals as our life mission. All they cared about was that I should do whatever it takes to lead my wife into godliness. When I would pull away and start pursuing my mission again, the church would tell me that I was the one in the wrong because I was putting my mission to God above my relationship with my wife ... like WTF?!?!?

Anyway ... my point is simply that virtues alone are not enough. The exercise of those virtues must also be compatible with the mission. I eventually got my wife on board. But I don't want to see other guys go through that same struggle I did just because they found a wife who otherwise seems very hot, godly, and virtuous. Mission matters.

Tag: /u/ElectricalAutumn

Learn to pick your battles

2 upvotes · 7 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Ah, I love these moments now. See my wedding post, for example. It's fun to notice all the ways your perception is much clearer now.

What you missed here is the opportunity to engage in a theological conversation with a brother that can pull some of the wool off of his eyes too. He's reading the second half of Psalm 37:4 and assuming that the first half is an unrelated condition.

- An unrelated condition is something like, "If you give me $20 I will give you a pair of pants." There is nothing uniquely intertwined between $20 and a pair of pants other than the value ascribed to them. This is called bartering/negotiating. One person wants one thing, someone else wants something different and unrelated, so they swap.
- A related condition is more like, "If you get me the broken vacuum and a screwdriver, I'll give you back a working vacuum ... and then you can use it on the floors." All parts of the transaction here are clearly tied together. This is not bartering. It is productive interaction.

Now, how often does God EVER interact with us on the barter system? How many times have you seen God say, "I need this, you need that, so let's trade"? It doesn't happen because God doesn't need anything from us, much less our delight in him. He is perfectly content in himself - and that is something that most Christians, even blue pillers, can accept: that God doesn't negotiate with us, just as a man should not negotiate with his wife/girlfriend.

Instead, God's words in Psalm 37:4 are much more aligned with a related condition: "Make me your heart's desire and I'll give myself to you." This works on a number of levels.

- Theologically we know that our greatest gift from God is God himself. The whole point of Jesus dying and rising, which is the central event in all of time, was to put us back in a position where we could be reconciled with God once again - that we could receive once more the relationship he always wanted with us.
- We also know as a theological fact that anything we desire more than God is a form of idolatry and is, therefore, sinful.
- We know that our hearts have many desires that are absolutely sinful and that God should not grant, even if we do delight ourselves in him, so obviously he doesn't mean "all desires," and thus he must be referencing a specific one.
- This view of the verse appropriately places God himself as the focal point of our lives - both in the sense of giving him our desire and getting him back in return for our desiring him.
- Most women (despite what we otherwise know from RP) will verbalize, "I don't want your money or your stuff or blah blah ... I want YOU." That relational connection is a large part of what drives them, which is why women who do have rich husbands who can fulfill all of their other desires still find that their wives are unsatisfied. Why? Because they don't have the relational connection with their husband that they crave. This verse, if interpreted correctly, corroborates this principle by suggesting that the solution to relationship problems is not getting stuff from God in exchange for our desire; rather it is by getting God himself, which is who we should desire above all that other stuff.
- As a practical matter, when women express intense desire for their husbands, what is the husband's God-given reaction: (1) "Thanks for acting all sexy today and putting on lingerie. Instead of sex, let me take you out on a date, buy you flowers and candy, and write you a poem," or (2) "Heck yeah, girl - let's get it on!"? In option 1 he gives her stuff. In option 2 he gives her himself. If God has wired husbands to respond this way to their wives' desire for him, why would we assume, "Oh, but that's unique to human husbands; God as our spiritual husband wants to be totally different - he would rather give us all the other stuff we desire rather than himself." That's just idiotic.
- In light of the above, the husband who is desired and readily gives himself to his wife also naturally wants to express his generosity and kindness toward his wife in other ways. But this is not as a substitute. Imagine if we delight ourselves in God and he tries to give himself to us and we say, "Oh, sorry God, I was really just doing that because I thought that's how I would get all the other desires of my heart. I don't really want you that way right now." Now imagine a wife getting all sexy in lingerie and grinding on her husband as he walks in the door and he tries to take her up to the bedroom and she says, "Oh, I don't know where you got that idea from. I don't want sex. I was just trying to do something to convince you to clean out the garage and buy me a smoothie." How's that going to make a guy feel? How's that going to make God feel? So how are we going to interpret Psalm 37:4 this way when it offends our very senses in practice ... yet at a purely philosophical level we want to believe it because it feeds into the prosperity theology that everyone deep down wishes were true.

Anyway ... that's what I think about that whole exchange. There's a great theological conversation just waiting to happen - one that could lead to his being red pill'd if he accepts the truth of what God is trying to communicate here.

Being Double-Minded

2 upvotes · 4 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent comment here!

belief is head knowledge of a truth, while trust is firm reliance on the integrity, ability, or character of a person or thing. Faith is belief and trust working together

To be clear, even when the Bible uses the word we translate as "believe" - that word is a combination of intellectual assent and trust. So, "believe in Jesus" in the Bible means more than that word "believe" would mean to us today :)

Here's an example: imagine a man stretches a tightrope across the Grand Canyon. He walks across it to the other side, and then back again. Then he gets a wheelbarrow

Charles Blondin was his name, and it was Niagara Falls :)

u/RedPlanetMan, I'm curious: have you given up drugs, or are you still using them? This would certainly be a factor either way.

I had this exact same curiosity and meant to ask, but got distracted by work half way through my comment and forgot to add it in when I got back.

Being Double-Minded

2 upvotes · 4 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Here's what I see, take it or leave it, like it or not.

You were on drugs and had a few bad trips. You became legitimately empty. You longed for some kind of legitimate fullness because you realized the things of this world couldn't satisfy you. Then your story just kind of ends.

I don't know if you're a Christian, what your mission is, how much you lift, body fat, relationship history, or even what you're looking for.

Simply put, you still seem pretty aimless, but optimistic. Emotionally, you've come out of a bad place - and that's great. But do you really know where you're going? Because if you don't, you're going to return. Take Matthew 12 to heart:

43 "When an impure spirit comes out of a person, it goes through arid places seeking rest and does not find it. 44 Then it says, 'I will return to the house I left.' When it arrives, it finds the house unoccupied, swept clean and put in order. 45 Then it goes and takes with it seven other spirits more wicked than itself, and they go in and live there. And the final condition of that person is worse than the first.

I'd love some biblical feedback.

2 upvotes · 2 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

SECULAR

Men have spontaneous desire. We can just want sex at the drop of a hat based on general triggers that doesn't require anyone proposing sex to us, though that's welcome too. Women have responsive desire. They do desire sex, but their desire does not trigger until someone initiates with them.

This really functions more like a scale where women are 95% responsive and 5% spontaneous. Men are generally closer to 80% spontaneous. If we want sex in a manner that suits the frequency of our desire it doesn't make sense to keep waiting for her 5% to trigger. So, we must activate her responsive desire by initiating.

BIBLICAL

In distinguishing the secular from the biblical I'm not saying the secular is wrong. It is praxeological reality. Rather I'm saying that there is a biblical foundation for why God ingrained these praxeological impulses in us this way to begin with. That biblical foundation on marital relationships will usually be found in the parallel Christ is trying to establish in his relationship with the church.

How often do you have the spontaneous desire on your own to evangelize to someone? That's usually pretty rare. But when you feel the Spirit on you for whatever reason, all of a sudden you can barely hold it back, right? That's because physical reproductive acts parallel spiritually reproductive ones ... i.e. evangelism = sex. God is our groom, we his bride.

We know theologically that God is always the initiator of anything good we do. It does not come from us. Our job is to respond to his calling and prompting on our lives. We are responsive beings in our relationship with him. God wants it this way for a variety of reasons, so he created men and women to function this way in physical marriage as well to help us better understand how to relate with him in our spiritual marriage to him.

Homily on Ephesians 5:22-33 by St. John Chrysostom (On Marriage and Family Life)

2 upvotes · 2 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

2/2

How do you define "falsities" in this context?

Falsity here is a reference to something that is untrue. From what you say after, something could certainly be "pure" in motive yet still untrue. I don't suppose you are arguing that every Orthodox priest who ever preached from the pulpit has only ever spoken truth and has never had anything false come out of his mouth during a service. So, while I acknowledge the purity from which they preach (although even at that I'm sure some preached from false motives, which Paul in Philippians 1 says we should still rejoice at), I also believe there are "falsities" mixed in, despite their good intentions.

At the end of the day, I trust 2000 years of tradition that has been preserved quite well, from my research, and still have to stick to my guns that scripture came from tradition.

I fully understand this position. But I also have trouble reconciling that with the Gospel being living and active, implying that it is not static, as tradition often tries to make it. There is no room with putting off the old ways and adopting new ways as the world changes, which Protestantism readily embraces and is highly consistent with Paul's philosophy of ministry in 1 Cor. 9 - again, not to say that I agree with all things Protestant either.

1 Cor. 15:3, 11

This isn't referencing a tradition of special robes and incense burning from a chain or pictures on a wall. This is a reference to the tradition of what was taught about the Gospel. That is a tradition I can readily get behind.

1 Cor. 11:2

Yes, it uses the word "traditions" and says they were handed down, but you can't remove the context of 11:1, where Paul makes it clear that he's talking about his way of life that was set as a model for them, as affirmed in Philippians 3:17, "Join together in following my example, brothers, and just as you have us as a model, keep your eyes on those who live as we do." Notice the stark similarity between this and 1 Cor. 11:1-2? It tells me that what Paul said in 1 Cor. was meant to be interpreted the same way as what he said in Philippians 3:17 - that the "traditions" referenced in 1 Cor. 11 relate to their model of how they lived their lives broadly and the mission of discipleship that they had imparted with that model, just as he just spoke in the previous chapter about the guys he had been discipling and was sending to them to disciple them as well. That is the tradition the 1 Cor. 11 passage references.

The first Christians "devoted themselves to the apostles' teaching" (Acts 2:42) long before there was a New Testament

No, the apostles teachings were, themselves, the new testament. They were simply recorded on paper later and ultimately canonized even later than that.

From the very beginning, the fullness of Christian teaching was found in the Church as the living embodiment of Christ, not in a book.

More accurately: it was not found in the church; it was found in the Spirit speaking through men who shared the message with one another through discipleship, which is the mission and tradition of the church.

Another point of intrigue: if the Orthodox church uses this passage to claim the apostles teachings other than Scripture as part of tradition, then what are those teachings? What non-Scriptural sources do we have of the preservation of those teachings? And if there are none and that "tradition" was lost, then does it mean it shouldn't have been considered Spirit-inspired tradition in the first place? Or did the Spirit fail us by allowing inspired tradition to be lost? This logic just raises too many questions.

But these verses merely condemn erroneous human traditions, not truths which were handed down orally and entrusted to the Church by the apostles.

So this raises another thing I was about to type anyway: who decides which church teachings are part of "tradition" and not? Surely there are several bad teachings that were going around, for the apostles condemned many for false preaching. So if people within the church were teaching false things, and therefore the apostles had to write letters rebuking those churches for doing it wrong, then the church itself is not the determining factor over which tradition is preserved or not. Content from within the church is both good and bad. So, what other factor discerns which tradition is preserved if not the church? The Spirit, as outlined above.

I get the distinction between human tradition and apostolic tradition, but in my research on the matter it seems very difficult to prove much of anything outside the use of Scripture, which makes those traditions a product of Scripture anyway creating a nice little circle if the canonization of Scripture is also viewed as a product of tradition (for which there is much greater historical support than most of the apostolic traditions). I have yet to see a historical source that referenced Peter or Paul wearing green robes and swinging incense from a chain. But I'm willing to stand corrected there.

Homily on Ephesians 5:22-33 by St. John Chrysostom (On Marriage and Family Life)

2 upvotes · 2 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

1/2

However, the OT, if that is what you are mentioning

Yes, that's what I was mentioning.

I've found the "original mission" to be closest in the Orthodox faith to that of the apostles from my inquiry and study/research

I'd be interested in seeing how you reached that conclusion. I don't see much about any apostles saying much about a particular branch of the faith other than that we're all believers and should view ourselves as in fellowship with one another. Orthodoxy seems to draw a clear line and says, "Sorry Paul, but we don't agree with you. We're the one true church and if anyone is outside our bounds, we're going to draw a hard line and not embrace this whole unity thing." I've had many Orthodox people even tell me that it is their belief based on what their priest teaches that anyone who does not identify with the EO church is not part of the "C" church and thus will go to hell. Then again, I've heard a few (lesser number) other people say that the authorities who established that line of thinking were overruled at some point and the EO church no longer thinks that way, or something weird like that.

How is this "deferring spiritual leadership away from the man and toward the church"?

If I understand 1 Cor. 14:35 correctly, the husband should be responsible for the spiritual instruction of his wife, not the church. She is not meant to engage with the church directly (only passively); rather, she is to find direct spiritual leadership from her husband. The husband should be utilizing the church as a resource for discerning God's will, but 1 Cor. 11:3 also makes it clear that the church is not man's authority, Christ is. So, as I see it, the flow goes something like this:

1. God is the head of Christ.
2. Christ is the head of man. Man isn't always the best at discerning Christ's will, so Christ gave us his spirit and his church as the two primary ways of discerning his headship. The church speaks through Scripture and tradition - not as equals, but both with divine inspiration nonetheless (although not all aspects of tradition are divinely inspired/infallible). The Spirit speaks through transformation and sovereignty, as I have said before: "The Spirit rarely tells us God's will; rather he turns us into the type of people who don't have to ask in the first place" and "even if we are not confident of which choice Christ prefers, if our spirit is oriented appropriately toward obedience we can trust God's sovereignty to have the Spirit guide our actions in obedience all the same."
3. Man, after submitting to God's will, then becomes the authority over his wife to lead her in all matters.

This flow in 1 Cor. 11:3 is contrary to the more popular view the church espouses today, which is that the wife's connection is directly to Christ and not through her husband, and therefore women should be able to participate in church as much as men (although some branches will still deny them positions of leadership). But that view ignores many biblical examples, such as Exodus 4, where Moses tells God to use Aaron instead and God says, "That's fine, but I won't speak to Aaron directly. I'm going to appoint you to do that. So, I'll speak to you, and you will speak to him" and to use an exact quote: "It will be as if he were your mouth and as if you were God to him." Modern Christianity says, "The Bible must be wrong there because spiritual philosophy tells us that God should want to have a direct relationship with all of us, not this silly spiritual lineage concept." [To be clear, when I talk about rejecting apostolic success, I mean in the way the Orthodox church applies it, not that I reject it altogether as most protestants do.]

Do you mind if I ask who your authority is then?

Christ.

Or, who guides you in reading the scriptures so that one's own interpretations don't get in the way of "Truth"?

My thoughts on "Truth" notwithstanding (per my last reply), see above re: the balance between Church and Spirit, which break down ... Church: Scripture and tradition; Spirit: transformation and sovereignty. Of these 4, Scripture is the highest, but that does not diminish the authority of the others. In my view, Scripture is not authoritative because tradition tells us it is (which is an Orthodox view); rather, it is authoritative because the Spirit affirms it to each person individually as they engage with the Scriptures, as evidenced by the way it transforms their life toward Christ.

A good example on this would be where Orthodox tradition has one particular canon that it acknowledges, whereas Protestants have a smaller canon. I know the Spirit has affirmed the 66 books of the Protestant canon to me personally through their impact on my life. I have read the additional books that the Catholics and Orthodox also include, but I have not received such similar affirmation. Nevertheless, I am open to the idea that the Spirit may just want me focusing on the 66 for now and simply doesn't want me focusing on the others yet - and he might have his reasons for that, and I might get affirmation of the other books later. In this sense, it is clear that my acceptance of Scripture is not because tradition produced it, but because the Spirit affirms it. The tradition of the church over time is certainly an influencing factor on that, and thus I look to the disagreements among Christians/within the Church as a resources to help me discern which books I should be testing in the Spirit, and thus the church still plays a major role, but the affirmation of the Spirit Himself is a higher authority to me than my faith that some dead guys from 1700 years ago got it right.

"how do you know that the Spirit is speaking though your Church?"

The same way Jesus told us to test the spirits in anyone: "By their fruit you will recognize them." But in my view it is not "church" or "denomination" specific - it is message-specific. A church may preach a Spirit-filled/inspired message one week and then the next week the Spirit says, "I really wish you hadn't said that." That's why there are very fruitful churches who also preach blue pill nonsense. It's why pastors can preach the Gospel one week and pop psychology lessons the next.

That is why we must do as the Bereans did, per our prior conversation, and test everything against Scripture first. After that, I test it against the Spirit through prayer and what application of the message would make me become - if it would cause me to bear more fruit or less (i.e. the transformation component of the Spirit) - and against the present and historical teachings of the broader church (i.e. get feedback from other godly people) ... and if all else fails, I resign myself to God that I have done all I can to seek his will and it is then in his power to ensure I follow the right path, even if I have no absolute certainty on the matter, and thus I can walk confidently even without certainty.

A Meditation for Weightlifters

2 upvotes · 1 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for sharing this. Motivation for lifting is always welcome!

My Story

2 upvotes · 28 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I wrote about this in my post on denominational life cycles.

1. Visionary
2. Growth
3. Organization
4. Institutionalization
5. Death/change

That institutionalization concept is what you're describing, when a church becomes more interested in the organization itself than the vision that started it.

Setting expectations for fat loss and muscle gain

2 upvotes · 27 April 2018 · /r/askMRP

Cool. Using gloves might help too. Our gym just got new equipment and the new gripping on their bars is a whole line of metallic diamonds points that dig into your hands. It's quite painful and makes a tight grip almost impossible and may even draw blood. Some people are asking them to file it down. It's pretty frustrating, especially for deadlifts and squats.

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

2 upvotes · 27 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Since we're talking about feminism and idolatry of romantic love, the problem is always brain cancer.

In a large number of cases, I agree. But I do believe there are several women who have not bought into feminism and idolatry of romantic love who still aren't attracted to their husbands. To that end, that one cancerous source is not at the root of their sexual dysfunction - an unattractive husband is.

Or to be more clear: if the only reason for a deadbedroom in a marriage is that the husband is a fat slob and it has nothing to do with feminism or whatnot, then the "cure" to that specific problem is the husband making himself more attractive. But I do agree that feminist ideologies are present in a majority of relationships, so I can see why you'd assume we're only talking about those types of relationships. That word "always" just throws me off there because "feminism and idolatry of romantic love" are not always present.

I mention this because my particular case was one of those situations. My wife started with idealized notions of extreme romanticism and assumed when we were married that her bubbly feelings would last forever after marriage. 2-years post-marriage that started to fade and she accepted the hard realities that movie romanticism and feminist ideologies were a farce. Today she fully embraces this. But we still had a dead bedroom for a long time. Why? Because I was an unattractive fat slob.

The solution for me was not to rebuke her for having feminist ideologies that she had abandoned years ago. It was to make myself more attractive. Once I did that, our sexuality was restored. It was literally that simple. Those attraction triggers I had improved had massive overlaps between what you would call "game" and "biblical marriage." But eradicating something that was already gone was no the cure to my particular situation, and I suspect that may also be the case for a large minority of other men on this sub.

Many Christian men who encounter the manosphere think that "Advil" will cure their "brain cancer."

I agree that if feminism and romantic ideologies are the core of the problem (ergo cancer), no amount of game or advil will cure it. The only place where I think we differ here is that I disagree with the contention that all sexual dysfunctions in a marriage stem from this particular type of cancer.

I've received many e-mails from Christian men who encountered the manosphere who were seduced into committing fornication

These are the exact types of men that caused me to create this sub in the first place. They are also the reason why I believe we must find common ground with the manosphere wherever possible (which is easy to do) because that common ground is going to make the transition much easier. A lot of that common ground can be found in the lingo. For example, where the word "dread" gets a lot of heat, I've joked on here before that it could really be called "intentional triggering of preselection tendencies" for a much more innocuous phrase ... but you're going to put so many people off by changing terminology like that, you'd lose much of your potential influence.

Their idol is "game" as their focus is on being as sexually attractive to their wife as possible or passing her hypergamous tests.

Right. So we have a few options on how to help these guys.

1. We can give them a stern rebuke and hope they listen, which is the "sharp contrast" model. But in my experience this tends to be very ineffective, especially when the men are seeing their individual goals met as a result of their idolatry, nevermind that they're mispalced goals to begin with.
2. We can accept that their idolatry is not easily changed, so we reorient their focus in how they practice it. For example, if they are hung up on sexual fulfillment, we demonstrate that the way to achieve their goal is by doing the things God is calling them to do anyway, reorienting them away from secular practices of achieving that goal into biblical ones, giving them an opportunity to reconcile their faith with their otherwise idolatrous purposes. This is less than ideal, but it at least gets their behavior on track on the hope that, as CS Lewis suggests, their heart will soon follow.
3. We reorient their purpose altogether, setting their hearts and minds in the right direction and let them know, "Don't worry, all that other stuff you wanted will be met too, but it can't be fully satisfying until you abandon it as an idolatrous goal first and commit yourself to God and his mission for you." This is the strategy that I attempt to utilize in this sub, and it's based predominantly on Matthew 6:33 and the litany of parallel passages that lead to the same conclusion.

Does that make it more clear?

Yes, and hopefully this reply should clear up stuff on my end too :)

I assume you are talking about biblical marriage here as the cure for rebellion and curing sexual dysfunction. The answer is yes.

Well, not all issues of sexual dysfunction are tied to rebellion, as noted above. Even if the wife is fully submissive, if she's not attracted to her husband she might find herself in a pattern of duty sex, whereby she readily submits her body to him, but she's just not that into it so he doesn't enjoy it much either.

That being said, what's the evidence that your proposal actually does solve dead bedrooms?

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

2 upvotes · 27 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Throwing pretty much everything under the umbrella of game gives it very little meaning because it's so broad.

I agree. But that is how I've seen the term used over the last year+, which is why we hear about beta game, alpha game, blue pill game, hard core game, married man game, single man game, and all kinds of things that go beyond the standard red pill prescriptions.

The goal of Christians is to put God first and whatever He created us to do here for second, third, fourth, and so on.

I'm more aligned with /u/rocknrollchuck on something like this - that we're not meant to set priorities in a hierarchy; rather, we're meant to set one priority and let that be that. God's mission for us is our priority and it is the way we "put God first." To say we have a secondary priority is to split our attention and steal away from our devotion to God, which is what Paul references in 1 Cor. 7. He is speaking not on a "technical possibility" level, but on a practical level that most men will forsake their duty to God, in whole or in part, once they're married in order to please their wives.

But this is also why he gives the command: "From now on let those with wives live as if they had none." This is his way of saying, "Don't make them a secondary priority - just make God your only priority and let that be that." Of course, if our obligation is to make disciples of those God has placed in our lives, it makes sense that this should include making disciples of our wife and children, and therefore they fit within our obligation to God, but not as a separate obligation for their own sake. There is no "I love God first, then my family." It is "I love God and I love my family as an expression of my love to God."

This is what Jesus means when he says, "If anyone does not hate his father and mother and brother and sister, his wife and children, and even his own life - he cannot be my disciple." Most people try to go through mental gymnastics to explain away what he's saying as some form of "in comparison to how much you love God" - but that's not what Jesus said and he easily could have added that clarification. Instead, we also see him saying, "You who do the will of my Father are my mother and brother." This leaves us with the implication that Jesus placed no inherent value in blood connection; rather the spiritual connection we have to others is what defines the relationship. So, if left to the relationships themselves without any spiritual connection, I believe we should literally hate the worldly pressures toward our blood relatives, which distracts us away from God. Instead, we should love those with whom we share a spiritual bond. As husbands and fathers, our job is to cultivate that spiritual bond with our wife and children so that it has value through Christ. But we are not to give it an inherent value or worth of its own accord apart from Christ.

I'm not sure if that makes much sense, but it's how I read the Scriptures and understand the lop-sided balance between our devotion to God and our connection to our earthly families.

The end result is inferior for Christians compared to biblical marriage.

I'm confused ... end result of what? Following red pill game to the exclusion of non-overlapping aspects of biblical marriage? If so, I agree. But we must also acknowledge that biblical marriage does have significant overlap with red pill game.

If you are mentoring "blue" or "purple" men and bring up "game" you basically lose all credibility and their minds become closed off.

I don't know about that. MRP's sidebar, for example, references Rollo's book and blog, which has a lot of content describing "blue pill game" and "beta game" and yet people take him quite seriously. We just acknowledge that it's ineffective and counterproductive game. But it is "game" nonetheless.

This is why I think it's a good idea for Christians eschew any relation with the secular manosphere completely including "game" and other red pill terminology, whether they are broadly or narrowly defined.

I agree with you on paper, but not in practice. Ideally you're right, Christians should have their own model entirely separate and distinct from "the red pill" at all and its own terminology because there are enough differences that despite the significant overlap it could rightly be called its own thing, and we should not be copying from the secular when the actuality is that the secular manosphere is actually getting all their findings and conclusions from the way God created the world, and therefore from us.

But as a more practical matter, if we don't find some common ground with which to minister to people, it will be an "us v. them" mentality, which makes it so much harder for people to cross from one side to the other. So, as with Paul in Acts 17 and 1 Cor. 9, if we can find some common ground and work with people on terminology that they know and understand in order to reach and save them, I believe we should and we are right to do so.

As I have stated before, my purpose in creating this sub was not to create a Christian version of RP. Rather, I saw many, many Christian men who would otherwise be led astray by secular RP into sin and rejection of God and accredited it to the fact that they had nowhere to go to address their issues in a Christian world-view that was willing to identify with them on the world-view they were coming from. That is, they were already neck-deep in secular RP views and terminology and there needed to be an opportunity for reorientation that did not require a sudden, drastic change from "secular RP" to "biblical masculinity." When there's already so much overlap anyway, why force it to be more diverse than it is? Why not utilize the similarities, preserve some of the language, and make the flow of communication much easier and allow them to find Christ and biblical masculinity through a more natural progression? That makes more sense to me than forcing a stark contrast, and this also seems more aligned with Paul's method of reaching those outside the church.

I think you're tunneling onto "rebuke and correct" too much here. Lots of meat in Eph 5

I agree. But to be fair, that was all I really saw in the original post. The other things you reference here weren't mentioned in the original post as part of the "cure." Of course, and I assume you agree, it must transcend just Ephesians 5 and must embrace all ways that Christ interacts with his bride.

As I'm sure you'll notice from my never-ending refrain on this sub, the primary trait between Christ and the church actually has very little to do with sanctifying and providing and cherishing, etc. - it's that he has a mission that transcends himself and he calls his bride, the church, to participate in that mission. That's why Paul gives the clearest possible picture of discipleship in 1 Cor. 11:1-2 and then immediately afterward in verse 3 says the bit about, "But I want you to understand that the head of every man is Christ, the head of a wife is her husband, and the head of Christ is God."

That is, Jesus voluntarily acknowledged that everything He did was not of his own accord, but as his Father commanded. This primarily consisted of two things: (1) Jesus dying and rising so that people could be reconciled to God; and (2) Jesus discipling his followers as his #1 purpose on earth toward bringing the Gospel to all people. To that end, the Father is the head of Christ and shared His purpose and mission of discipleship with Jesus as Jesus's primary purpose for living. Likewise, Jesus is the head of the church and shared His purpose and mission of discipleship with the church as our primary purpose for existing. In the same way, a husband is the head of his wife and should share his purpose and mission of discipleship (which he gets from Christ as an active part of the church) with his wife as her primary purpose for existing.

I say this simply to reiterate that we cannot possibly talk about "biblical masculinity" or "biblical marriage" if we are neglecting the most important aspect that Christ models for us in his relationship with the church, which is that we must adopt the ministry of discipleship as our primary purpose and calling. Without that all else is lost and futile. All of the other things from Ephesians 5 become just as much a bandaid or "aspirin" as you otherwise accuse (and probably rightfully so) most game methodologies of being.

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

2 upvotes · 26 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I see the distinction much clearer now. Here's how I (and what I believe most of the manosphere) understand it:

- GAME is anything a man does that impacts his attractiveness to a woman. I might even add the requirement that he intends it for that purpose. So, if he lifts weights to be strong enough to win a boxing tournament but has no actual woman in mind to attract, is that game by virtue of the fact that it does have the unintended byproduct of attracting women? Meh, I don't really care, but maybe.
- METHODS are the intentional or subliminal tactics we employ within the umbrella of game. There could be a whole flow chart beneath this, but let's break it down into two primary categories:
 - INEFFECTIVE GAME METHODS are all the blue pill strategies, like white knighting, chivalry, choreplay, idolizing, flattery, etc.
 - EFFECTIVE GAME METHODS are the things you listed, like AA, AM, dread, etc. But there are also countless others, like building a good physique, having a good job, demonstrating leadership skills, having an important mission, etc. On their own, these things do not originate from game, but they are certainly a part of game.

You're trying to categorize things as mutually exclusive which actually overlap substantially. Take "murdering people" as an example. Cain first did this in the OT before there was ever a law against it. But now there is a law against it. It wouldn't make any sense to say, "Murdering people is not 'against the law.'" It's a human action that wasn't created by the law. I suppose some would say that it falls under some definitions of 'against the law,' which is true, but it does not originate from there, which means they are immune from the 'against the law' I am referring to." That sounds about as bizarre to me as you saying "Masculine traits are not 'game.'" Of course they are. Murdering people falls under both categories of human action and being against the law. Masculine traits fall under both categories of 'created by God' and 'game.'

Trying to redefine game to suit your point only adds confusion. It's the same tactics that liberals employed when they changed the definition of "intolerant" to be based on one's political opinions rather than their behavioral conduct toward others (Merriam-Webster's website being a great example). By changing the definition, they all of a sudden sound really catchy and trigger emotional reactions to their cause by calling everyone "intolerant" who doesn't agree with their position, when in reality the people on the other end are saying, "But we're not like that at all. We are tolerant under the true definition - they just changed the meaning to get you all riled up."

I feel like you're somewhat doing the same thing with game - by taking game methods and assuming that the methods themselves are the entirety of game. It is true that there are many bad and unhelpful methods - especially of the blue pill variety. There are also some that are not part of the cure. But there are others that are part of the cure. Rebuking one's wife, for example, is what you put as part of your "cure" - but it's also rightly part of "game" if it's a tactic a man employs that has the effect of increasing his wife's attraction to him - especially if he also intended it for that purpose. And anyone who reads your post and thereby starts employing "godly masculinity" in the hope of attracting his wife to him is automatically employing it for that purpose, as they're no longer doing it for God's own sake alone, and thus it most certainly is game. But it's not one of the methods you listed.

The fight here is not against game, but against the philosophies that create the foundation for certain methodologies of employing game. That's where I think the ultimate disconnect is between what I see and what you wrote.

Tag: /u/rocknrollchuck

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

2 upvotes · 26 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

So, you've got some good stuff here, and there's a lot to address, but my biggest question: how are you defining game? From the way you use the term, I get the impression you mean something different from how many endorsed people in the manosphere use the term. All the same, are you suggesting ... ?

- Game is sinful and should never be employed
- Game is not sinful, but you shouldn't use it because it's not "the cure"
- Game is not sinful and you're free to use it if you want, just don't ignore "the cure" in exchange for game

As you note, game might be a pain-killer, but sometimes all you have is a headache that doesn't require brain surgery. And even if you do require brain surgery, sometimes you need those pain killers until it's time for the actual surgery. Of course, I don't know that I like the analogy in the first place, given that I do believe game is something that should be upkept with some consistency, whereas I don't think people should addict themselves to pain killers :p But that's with how I understand and define game, ergo my original question.

Why I am anti-game and pro godly masculinity

2 upvotes · 26 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed. It is part of blue pill ideology to think that a wife should just be attracted to her husband "for who he is."

For Singles: Finding the Girl You Can't Keep Yourself From Banging

2 upvotes · 26 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

For lack of a better way to say it, how does this work?

You pursue your mission. People are going to flock to you as you do so. One of those people will be a woman you'll desperately want to have sex with, and she with you. You decide to get married to legitimize the sexuality.

It seems to me that this proposal jumps directly from an acquaintanceship / friendship directly to consideration of marriage.

It certainly seems that way on paper, but as sexual tension naturally increases between you and other women you'll find yourself in that phase where people say, "They're not official, but they're pretty much together." This is exactly where you want to be - because you have no obligation to her, only to God. It's a lot easier to make your mission first. It's a lot easier to avoid oneitis and new relationship ecstasy, etc. This is also what even secular RP preaches: don't make relationship commitments of exclusivity, per the sniper method. Always keep things open.

how this can happen if you skip the phase in which sexual attraction is built, i.e. dating or courtship

You have to remember that dating/courtship is a relatively new phenomenon, compared to the rest of human history. So I wouldn't immediately jump into the assumption that this is a biblical ideal that everyone should strive to go through before marrying someone. Modern dating/courtship is a highly feminized social construct that really does very little to advance the man's interests, but still provides (albeit to a lesser degree) relational security for women.

In order to get that relational security, the secular world has allowed women to utilize sexuality as leverage to get that relational security, saying that they will only have sex with a man who they have an exclusive relationship with (which mostly stems from anti-slut defense over anything else). In a Christian worldview where sex before marriage is off the table already, then there is really no leverage women have to pull the man into that type of temporal relational security, so I'm not sure why a man would do it. Specifically, it communicates three things to a woman: (1) acquiescence to relational social constructs, (2) an intentional pursuit of the relationship as an ideal, and (3) that the man's commitment to his mission can be tempered and balanced with other agendas. That said, I accept that most men will enter into exclusive relationships to pursue marriage anyway simply because they still see marriage as an independent goal worth pursuing, which runs contrary to my (and most of even secular RP's) view of things.

To get back to the heart of the matter, as you live on your mission to God you're inevitably going to find lots of women who you're sexually attracted to. You should do your best to avoid it, but it's going to be inevitable eventually, which is why I say that even under my model 99+% of men will still end up married. When that sexual attraction starts to build naturally, you won't be able to help yourself from being around this girl - but you shouldn't create some dating commitment of exclusivity to her either. You just continue your mission, but spend time wherever it happens. When the sexual tension is at its apparent peak, you "get married" - but by then she'll well understand the context of your mission and the prioritization that happens with it, as well as your expectations for her role in that mission. It wouldn't be a traditional marriage by any means, but traditional marriage is mostly a product of feminization and product marketing anyway. Ideally, your marriage should look exactly like what you had before you were married, except you're allowed to have sex and you live together to save on expenses.

Notice that most dead bedrooms and manifestations of blue pill curses happen because people start changing how they view each other and the world after marriage. It jumps from "him and her" to "we and us." It's no longer "his house" ... it's "our house, and we must allocate responsibilities." Even most people in the secular RP world screw this up. At a theory level a scant few of them seem to understand this, but I still see lots of talk even among endorsed contributors about allocation of responsibilities in the home, as if it's a joint effort. They're still assuming that marriage changes things - but that change is precisely what ruins most relationships. You marry someone because you liked who they were and how they lived before you married them, so why just start up and changing things immediately after marriage? If it isn't broke, don't fix it. This, of course, is much more difficult when you're marrying young.

Back to the point: by utilizing dating/courtship, you're communicating to the woman that you are willing to work within widespread social constructs. This will then, of course, communicate that you're also willing to work within the modern social understanding of marriage. Even if you try to explain otherwise, she will not be able to understand or receive it because she sees the pattern: meet a man, start dating, relationship builds, get engaged, get married ... and the continuation of that pattern will be implicit in the subtext of all of her thoughts. She cannot escape it no matter how many times you explain to her otherwise. The only real way to break her expectation of a traditional marriage is to break the expectation of traditional pre-marriage social constructs as well, which means not entering into exclusive dating relationships and demonstrating the pattern and prioritization of your life to her before marriage, after which the proposal will make much more sense in the framework you have already established. This is also a far more honest approach to relationships. She knows exactly what she's getting into before she says "I do." And if you have abundance, you'll be fine even if she says, "I don't." But as a practical matter, the sexual tension wouldn't have built to the point that you'd even be contemplating marriage if she was in an "I don't" mentality, so even that risk is very low.

I'd also stray away from a big, fancy wedding ceremony. Practical considerations aside, this would undermine everything else a man is striving to achieve. A post-wedding celebration would be fine, and I've known several people to do this. Sexual tension built, they got married at the courthouse on their own, then they told everyone about their marriage and decided to have a party with cake, dancing, etc. to let their families meet the new spouse. Of course, you don't have to have the celebration part, as that's totally up to you and how much respect you want to give the family members who would expect it and want to meet your bride. I'm simply saying there's room for it, but not as the wedding ceremony itself, which can be dangerous.

I'm not sure if this is what you were looking for, but I hope it helps.

Tag: /u/OsmiumZulu and /u/rocknrollchuck for feedback/a second opinion, as I know most of this is pretty "out there" for most people.

What parts of “Game” should a RP Christian utilize? Which ones should we not utilize?

2 upvotes · 20 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

If she's not your wife, she's set aside for someone else.

What parts of “Game” should a RP Christian utilize? Which ones should we not utilize?

2 upvotes · 20 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Sorry, I meant "single christian." I fixed it.

Passive game is most of the stuff OZ talks about and what fills most of the sidebar:

- being physically fit

- being spiritually mature
- having a solid mission
- having a good job/career path
- OYS
- solid frame
- etc.

What parts of “Game” should a RP Christian utilize? Which ones should we not utilize?

2 upvotes · 20 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

For an unmarried Christian, yes, passive game is the ideal. Once you're married, passive game becomes the foundation, but active game is where the magic happens. So, for example, where the single Christian should not be utilizing keno, the married Christian man should and that's what will likely trigger sex.

What parts of “Game” should a RP Christian utilize? Which ones should we not utilize?

2 upvotes · 20 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

To be clear, the point of dread game has nothing to do with intentionally causing the other person to feel dread (which often comes off as petty and can rarely be done right intentionally). The point is to be so great that dread naturally trickles in even without you doing anything to prompt it, other than being a high quality man. It's not about manipulating her; it's about acknowledging the passive effect of your self-improvement on her.

Phil's April Update

2 upvotes · 20 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

What is it about this woman that makes her different from every other woman in the world? Give me very specific examples - at least 5 traits that no other woman you've met has.

Let me also ask this: other than emotions (which I promise will fade), what value does her presence in your life add that you can't get anywhere else?

Phil's April Update

2 upvotes · 20 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's a good word.

I need this, fam

2 upvotes · 10 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, I thought it was humorous enough :p I wouldn't want the sub filled with crap posts like this, but one every now and then isn't so bad.

1. “How does God feel about it?”, or Feminine morality in dystopia

2 upvotes · 9 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's what they all say.

There might be a reason so many people are saying it ;)

The only non sinful action possible with CP is if you are an investigator required to prosecute the ones involved in it

To be clear, you really mean: "The only use that doesn't violate my own personal moral standard." My guess is you haven't searched the Bible to discern whether or not God would have other non-sinful uses.

Nevertheless, this is the example I had in mind. But even then, the one who views it purely for investigatory purposes is still doing so in sin. That is, it's still sin for any non-Christian no matter what good they're otherwise trying to accomplish. Romans 14:23, Isaiah 64:6, Hebrews 11:6 all say the same thing: if it's not done for God's purposes, then it's evil, even if it otherwise appeases human concepts of morality.

and you are telling me then... when you use pirated material you don't and have not felt a pang of guilt before during and after and ignored it because.... you wanted (needed) it?

Guilt, no. Desire not to get caught, sure. The two aren't the same. To be clear, I don't pirate much (if ever) anymore because I can actually now afford stuff. But back when I did, I did not have a sense of doing wrong anymore than driving 5 miles an hour over the speed limit or when cutting through someone else's back yard.

Is it a technical legal violation? Yes. But the law only applies to the degree that anyone cares to enforce it. Many laws exist as a matter of technicality, but are not enforced. In the American legal system, for example, it's widely accepted that the law is a three-branch process.

- The legislature writes the statute to dictate the bounds of the law.
- The judiciary interprets it and decides whether or not a person, under a specific set of facts, should be punished by that law.
- The executive enforces the law and determines who to submit to the judiciary.

So, if a state statute says "No one shall drive faster than 70mph on a freeway," that's the legislature issuing a boundary. But if the police refuse to enforce that against someone traveling 75mph, or the judge refuses to convict someone for it ... 2/3 of the legal system has determined that no public offense has taken place that warrants penalty and the legislature is overruled. This same thing applies in countless other situations.

To refrain: secular governments do not dictate sin and morality. They dictate civil protection. To that end, the law sets general standards, but acknowledges that every situation is unique, and therefore does not apply a black line to every case. If no one cares to enforce a law, and that law wasn't a God-given dictation of morality in the first place, then there is no sin in breaking it.

On the topic of piracy in specific there was an interesting article I read several years back: one of the major record labels that actually encouraged internet piracy, including their own content. They had several of their bands put statements on their website saying, essentially, "We're not going to change the law, but we're not going to enforce it or press charges either." Why? Because selling CDs wasn't where they were making their money anyway. They got their money through ads, selling song rights for use in commercials and movies, tours and concerts, etc. Their profits actually increased significantly after encouraging piracy. Of course, they didn't offer their content for free - they still wanted to collect from those who wanted to toss money their way.

The point is: it's never as simple as "the legislature said so, therefore it must be a sin." Biblical morality and civil boundaries are not the same, and our biblical obligation to our civil boundaries is to respect our governing authorities, not to submit to every order issued from on high. Remember that Paul was writing Romans 13 during the time of Nero when the orders from the top were that all Christians were to be executed - a civil law that Paul certainly felt no guilt in ignoring.

What Do I Do? My Wife Is Openly Unattracted To Me + Interested In Other Men / Past Relationships

2 upvotes · 8 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The only thing I'd add to what /u/OsmiumZulu and /u/rocknrollchuck said is this: OP - what's your mission?

She probably doesn't respect you because she doesn't see eternal value to what you're doing. She wants to be married to a man she can be proud of - someone she can stand next to on judgment day with a bright and shiny smile and say to God, "I helped him do it." You don't have that respect, you won't have her desire.

Looks, leadership, being alpha, etc. are all incredibly important and probably top priority for single guys. But I fully believe they soon become a VERY close second after marriage. Women never stop asking the question, "Where is this going?" Women are never satisfied and never will be. No matter what you give them they will always say, "Awesome! Next I want ..."

When they're single they only have marriage on their minds. Then they want a house. Then kids. Then a bigger house. Then more kids and a minivan. Then to vacation in certain places. Then to redecorate the house. Etc. They're shortsighted, only seeing the next step ahead.

You have to be the visionary. You have to be the one to say, "Our lives will be oriented around this one thing. We might get the house and kids and minivan along the way ... we might not. But come what may, our lives will matter to eternity." That's a powerful attitude. It also lets her know you aren't going to be bogged down by her shortsightedness. You're not going to let her wants and feelings call the shots. You're setting the agenda and it's a better agenda than the garbage she probably has in mind.

This is attractive. This shows her that there's more to you than the billions of betas and dime-a-dozen alpha-players out there. It proves you have something that's rare that she'll likely never find again.

Then you actually have to live it out. And if you can be alpha about it too ... that's the icing on the cake.

So I ask: how are you going to make heaven a better place? Clothe the homeless, feed starving children, fund cancer research ... that's all great for improving a dying planet and populace, but what is going to be your impact on eternity. Or more accurately: who will you impact for eternity? Then show, don't tell.

Where is the sweet spot between being an impressive man while also “not trying to impress others” per Philipians 2:3?

2 upvotes · 6 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

As /u/rocknrollchuck said, there was no point in Jesus' life where he ceased to be confident. Pride is the opposition to humility, not confidence.

The beauty is that an alpha should ideally exude both by nature. For one, he doesn't care to impress people, so his motive should never be one of trying to hype himself up. He is who he is and he's okay with that - OYS and all, accepting his flaws and waving them for the world to see, as Paul suggests in 2 Cor. 12 ("I will boast all the more gladly about my weaknesses").

On the other hand, in part because he doesn't care what others think, he's free to know himself truly - independent of covert motives of people-pleasing and whatnot. By virtue of knowing himself, he can have all the confidence in the world as to the accuracy of his own bounds and limits and never feel the need to buckle or break them in order to appease others.

The truly difficult balance is not between confidence and humility, but between (confidence + humility) and identifying with others to whom we are meant to minister, but whose lifestyles are not naturally within our bounds. 1 Cor. 9 makes it clear that there must be some adaptability on our part, so we can't just completely ignore what others think of us if we want to be effective ministers. We must care what they think - but not as a judgment on ourselves; only to the degree that what they think affects our ability to share Christ with them. That's the difficult balance to maintain.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

2 upvotes · 6 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The biggest frustration I have is that you accuse everyone who disagrees with you of being legalists while you're the one looking to the "ins and outs" of the law to try to justify your behaviors. At the end of the day, I don't care if you pirate or not. You're the one who has to answer to God in the end, not me. I've done my due diligence in warning you - not about pirating, but about the orientation of your heart. I don't care if you want to call it entertainment or culture or self improvement. None of those labels change anything. They're just things you tell yourself to make you feel better. Go for it. As you say, just let it rest.

1. "How does God feel about it?", or Feminine morality in dystopia

2 upvotes · 5 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is an excellent conclusion, and I hope OP takes your advice. As I noted elsewhere, based on my last interaction when OP brought this topic up, it's clear he's not interested in the orientation of his life. You cannot be oriented toward both the world and God at the same time. Instead, we are to, as Paul says, "reconcile the things of this world" to be used for God's purposes. That can include video games, TV, movies, books, etc. But those things can only be included if they are being consumed for the purpose of advancing a calling God gave us.

As I have often said before, I like watching TV. I don't get to do as much of it as I used to, but I've seen enough TV in my day that I can walk up to anyone on the street, ask them if they've seen any good shows lately, and be able to hold a conversation with them about whatever they bring up. I could then leverage that conversation and relationship for the advancement of the Gospel in their lives. Some of the shows I watched back in the day were pirated. Long explanations aside, much of that content was redeemed in future relationships I built with non-believers or people I was discipling. I don't believe there was any sin there because of the purpose for which I was doing it, despite the fact that I was entertained as a secondary function.

Another point worth noting: during the time that I was doing this, I was already fairly maximized in my capacity to make disciples and continue my own journey of spiritual growth. It's not like I was watching all that TV as a substitute to evangelism, discipleship, quiet times, Scripture memory, prayer, Bible study, fellowship, etc. I was doing all of those things and only consumed TV shows after my higher priorities were met, and in a manner that supplemented what I was already doing. So, when I found out that Chad and his wife were really into Walking Dead, I made that the focus of my TV-watching. I was discipling Chad and he and his wife were both in my small group. That show created a great relational context for me to connect with them and minister to them.

But OP's stated purpose is his own self-amusement and entertainment. He just wants to kick his boredom to the curb and has provided no information on how many guys he's discipling, how many people he has shared his faith with in the past month, how many verses he's memorized in the past month, how many days he's had a quiet time, how many hours in prayer, how much time he's spent in in-depth Bible study, etc. The implication, then, is that he is looking to justify his piracy under the law because he knows he is not in a position to redeem it for some other godly purpose. I hope I'm wrong in this assumption, but nothing in any content OP has ever posted would imply otherwise.

That is why I think OP's post is a bunch of BS, regardless of the technicalities either way. Simply put, his heart is in the wrong place. Per Romans 14:23, if it's not coming from faith, it's sin, even if it is legal under some weird technical justification of whatever passages he wants to look at.

Competency and Good Looks of an Idealized Alpha, Character of a Biblical Alpha

2 upvotes · 3 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Let's be clear: alpha and godly are not the same thing. They often overlap, but are two separate spectrums. A guy can be truly alpha and not godly at all. He can also be truly godly and not alpha at all (depending on life context). Ideally a man should be both alpha and godly, particularly if he is to be married.

I'm not a fan of the "a true alpha acts in such and such godly way" sentiment. We can say this definitively of a godly man, but it means something different to be an alpha man. As CS Lewis would say, "We already have a word for godly: godly." So let's not start confusing terms.

Now, all of that being said, it does seem that you are acting in godliness with respect to caring for your widowed loved one (circumstance dependent, of course). But nothing in this post implies alpha. It sounds like you're trying to rationalize your isolation and still feel like a "man" (whatever that means to you).

In reality, don't give a squat what we think or whether or not people see you as a "real man." Don't rationalize or justify your life. Doing so proves the opposite of your claim. You want to stay single and take care of your mother in law? Go for it. You don't need our stamp of approval. You want to ditch her and go find a girl? That's none of our business.

Being alpha doesn't mean you prove your alphaness to other dudes, which only really serves to limit or control your choices to that which you think will cause other guys to perceive you as alpha. The real alpha doesn't care if other men think he is beta ... something that's really hard to figure out from the secular RP subs who will say DNGAF then ridicule you and attempt to get you to GAF about their opinions.

Long story short, you're doing some good things here, but you also seem to be missing the point and confusing terms. I hope this reply helps straighten things out a bit for you :) Sorry if it comes off as unnecessarily harsh ... my mental filter is garbage when on mobile.

Steven Anderson on women's roles according to the bible.

2 upvotes · 1 April 2018 · /r/RPChristians

No, they're not irrelevant. I'm not sure where you got that from. They just warrant a lot more leniency.

Is there anything we as young men we can do to slowly dispel a Jezebel spirit with RP principles?

2 upvotes · 29 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

And yes, if she did it to him she would do it to you eventually as well. Good call.

More to OP: This makes sense on one level. But from a different angle, if he waits patiently for the relationship to end, and only then makes his move, she might still be the type who would branch swing when another guy shows initiative - only under this plan he has no way of knowing or expecting it because he didn't take the opportunity to test it for himself. Perhaps the better option would have been to test it while she was still with the other guy, then turn her down if she went for it ... and if she didn't go for it and she wanted to resolve things with the other guy first, then all the better.

Is there anything we as young men we can do to slowly dispel a Jezebel spirit with RP principles?

2 upvotes · 29 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Nonetheless come Monday, we will need to greet each other and then sit in silence until the day is over, and then repeat until the semester is over, I imagine we won't be actively trying to sit together in the future.

Wait, wait, wait ... why do you "need" to greet her?

Because social conventions demand that I act a certain way around people in certain contexts

Screw that. You don't "need" to do anything. You don't want to greet her? Don't. If you do want to, do it. The compulsion that you "need" to do something because some social nicety forces you to is a display of weakness.

even if it is lingering oneitis

It is. This is exactly what you're describing.

Just assigned seating is the problem.

No, assigned seating is your barbell. It's like you're a kid and your mommy dropped you off at the gym. You think to yourself, "There are so many weights around. This makes me feel uncomfortable. I know if I just sit here doing nothing for long enough, my mommy will pick me up again and the problem will just go away."

Instead, you've got a unique opportunity to learn how to deal with your feelings. Not many people are forced into it. Some people like to run and cower by just "next/ghost her and move on." Here you actually have to spend time in an awkward situation. That's a beautiful thing.

How are you going to handle it? Are you going to confront her? Are you going to develop an internal peace so that it doesn't feel awkward anymore? Are you going to utilize the awkwardness back at her for some purpose? I don't know. There are lots of options here. But "just wait and hope it goes away" is the weakest one.

I know that we will never be an item

Kick that attitude out of your head. Don't be a defeatist. If you want her, go get her. If you don't, don't. If she's not a Christian, certainly don't. But don't let your assumptions about what might or might not be true affect your decisions. That's weak and unattractive. I did that for most of my life. I was an over-analyzer. I assessed probabilities and statistics and only took chances worth betting on, including with relationships. That was idiotic. Don't be like I was. Be Han Solo - "Never tell me the odds!"

In fact, maybe the best thing you can do is just cold approach her. Ask her on a proper date. Let yourself get rejected ... or not. Worst case scenario, you get complete closure and practice the art of hearing "no" and moving on. Best case scenario, she gets attracted at the fact that you grew a spine.

For what it's worth, it seems like the reason she lost interest in you is that she probably found another guy. She had you on the hook, you didn't bite, so she moved on and got bitter at you because she wanted you first. Don't let "I think she has a boyfriend" be an excuse, though. If there's no ring on her finger, she's fair game.

I am certain there should be some Christian principles/virtues that could be relied on to mend a bad situation into something that won't look as bad once the scarring is permanent sometime in the future

First off: why would there be scarring?!?!? That just makes no sense to me. Why are you so hung up on this girl that letting her walk away is going to leave some immortal wound on your soul?

Second: The biblical principles about mending relationships only apply to those who you're actually in relationship with - and who also are brothers/sisters in Christ. If she's a non-Christian, just drop her like a rock and practice internal peace when you're around her. If she is a Christian, but she's not part of your social circle, then who cares? Matthew 18 doesn't really apply to you there. If she is still a significant part of your social circle (which you've already said she's not) or was to a degree that you would have had a Matthew 18 obligation, then just confront the issue head on. Tell her what's bothering you, try to make peace, and move on with wherever the chips fall.

I know it sounds all complicated

Just the opposite: it sounds incredibly simple. You got ONEitis, she lost interest, you're feeling scorned. Any other complication is in your head. There are only three courses of action: (1) confront her about what's going on, (2) master the art of internal peace in the face of awkwardness and conflict, or (3) whine and cry about it.

Personally, I think #1 is going to be the most beneficial, long-term. Every time you learn to face a difficult situation head-on you toughen up a bit inside and it becomes easier and easier as time goes on. This will benefit you relationally, in your career, with your family, sexually when you're married, etc.

Bible commentaries: What can you recommend?

2 upvotes · 29 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Also, it's not a Bible commentary.

"Why Orthodox Men Love Church" - I thought this article applied to some red pill principles and thought I'd share my/this perspective with everyone.

2 upvotes · 28 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The large chunk of text you quoted is total garbage. It wrongly assumes that protestants forbid the use of "icons." I know countless protestants pictures and statutes and whatnot of Jesus in their homes. This isn't forbidden. What is forbidden as idolatry (not iconoclasm - I don't even know how that enters into the conversation) is worshipping the image *as if the image has some spiritual connection to the person depicted.

If a church has a statue of Jesus at the altar, I have no problem with that. If someone thinks that the statue itself has some mystical property that makes it easier to connect with Jesus, or more likely that your prayer will be heard, or some other thing that implies a belief that the physical material standing in front of them is somehow divine or intimately interwoven with the divine - that is the problem. That is idolatry.

Iconoclasm, the heresy which teaches against the use of icons, is thus precisely a denial of the Incarnation

This is just laughable. Seriously, what a joke. So, if I refuse to pray to a statue I'm suddenly denying that Jesus came to earth in the flesh? Whoever the author was that wrote that blog excerpt has no intellectual integrity.

2000 years of Christian history supports the use and veneration of images

Absolutely.

as part of Christian worship of the Holy Trinity

Nope. Now we're confusing the icon for the trinity again. Let's not do that. The icons are a symbol and reminder of the trinity. They are not the trinity themselves, otherwise what are we to do when our house becomes cluttered with all these icons? If my reverence for God is tied to my treatment of an icon, I could never throw away a picture of Jesus because that would somehow be disrespecting God himself. That's absurd. Or what if I draw a cross on the chalk board? Now I'm disrespecting the cross if I erase it, thereby defiling the icon.

If the icon is not mystical in itself, as the author claims, then our worship of God is independent of anything to do with the icon itself. However, if the icon can help us remember God in a manner that enhances our ability to love, appreciate, thank, etc. God - then the icon has value. But the icon's value is not for its own sake; it has value only to the degree of the independent worship of God that it generates.

As I often say, there is a map and there is a destination. The icon can sometimes function as a map to help us reach the destination: connecting with God or worshiping God. Once you're at the destination, the map is pretty much worthless and can be thrown away if you don't think you'll need it anymore.

To that end, I have grown in my reverence for Christ through artistic renderings, icons, pictures, etc. But at the same time, I have no regard for the objects themselves, except to the degree that they may contribute to that purpose. At the end of the day, they are still just objects.

To make the assumption that every person must somehow have this mystical connection to God through use of icons is simply over-generalizing. I won't stop someone from pursuing that path if it is beneficial to them. So, I welcome the Orthodox to continue using icons as they do, if they find it beneficial. But as soon as they equate our treatment and emotional disposition toward an icon as the equivalent of our treatment and emotional disposition of God, a clear boundary is crossed.

this is what keeps me from seeing the Orthodox faith as a viable option for me

Meh, the icon thing isn't as big a deal to me. Again, I see validity in their use, just as long as it's not mandated and there's a rational (even if misguided) theology behind it.

There are more serious concerns with the Orthodox church, mostly revolving around their views of ecclesiology, which border on the heretical (though I won't quite go that far).

marriage prep: confront her with my past sexual sins?

2 upvotes · 28 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed in full :)

marriage prep: confront her with my past sexual sins?

2 upvotes · 28 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, my experience is that maybe 1% of Christians instinctively pray about situations and seek guidance from the Spirit and the other 99% tend to seek guidance from other Christians to tell them what their conscience or biblical interpretation should be without regard for what it actually is.

Humility - the “mother of all virtues,” and pride, “the cause of all sin.”

2 upvotes · 23 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Amen :)

Pastor injects Feminism at Wedding Ceremony

2 upvotes · 23 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well, let's be honest ... the whole wedding ceremony concept is a pretty feminist process in the first place. Most men would be fine without all the ado. It predominantly serves to fulfill the woman's sense of hyper-romanticism about marriage rather than accepting the hard reality of life after the fact of marriage, which is nowhere near as fantasy-driven as the ceremony and ideology in her mind would otherwise cause her to believe. That's not to say weddings are bad. They certainly can have value, but they are often not utilized appropriately to add positive value to a couple's post-marriage life.

Pastor injects Feminism at Wedding Ceremony

2 upvotes · 23 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is more of what I mean when I talk about the difference between philosophy and theology. Theologically, there is no explanation for why God utilized the rib. We just know he did. So, it is a theological fact that the rib was utilized to create woman. Any speculation on why he used the rib (ex. "It's close to the heart," as many pastors suggest) or why he didn't use some other part (as in your story) is purely philosophical argument.

Philosophy will always follow the wisdom of the world. Right now that worldly wisdom is feminist, so it makes sense that these philosophical musings from Scripture are going to follow a feminist train of thought.

This is the danger in confusing philosophy with theology.

Humility - the "mother of all virtues," and pride, "the cause of all sin."

2 upvotes · 23 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I see where you're coming from. I do agree that humility is incredibly important and that many other virtues are rendered moot if expressed without humility, and thus humility is a foundation of many of the virtues.

I still don't buy into the "mother of all virtues" concept, but that's more due to a fundamental difference with some of the texts you quoted and also that I do believe humility and poor in spirit are two very different things.

- Humility has to do with having an accurate self-perception with regard to where one stands before God and other humans. I can say quite appropriately: "You probably don't know a better racquetball player than me." I can make this statement in perfect humility because, guess-work aside, it's probably true and I have every reason to believe in the veracity of the statement - and because even if I did get beaten by someone else you know, I would gladly accept my new understanding.
- Being poor in spirit relates more directly to the condition of a person's spiritual state at any given time. Someone who feels backed into a corner and has nowhere else to turn to is the one who is poor in spirit. The Matthew 5:3 word for "poor" is not penes or penechros, which are words to describe a condition of physical poverty; rather, it is ptochos, which more literally translates as "to crouch or cower as one helpless." It can be used when someone who is financially destitute has that feeling, but often-times the financially destitute still maintain an inappropriate sense of confidence in their situation and do not have that sense of helplessness about them. In the reverse, the same concept is applied (but using a Hebrew word) in Psalm 34:6 when David, a king, describes himself saying, "This poor man cried out, and the Lord heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles." The concept here is the same as the poor in spirit notion in the beatitudes: that there is some trouble and sense of helplessness. This does not necessitate a humility, although the two certainly often overlap.

All that said, I'd wager, like you said, that we agree with each other on a lot more than we disagree on this point. So, I appreciate your sharing these resources, as they were very interesting and gave good food for thought :) Even if I don't agree with everything coming from them, there's always something valuable that comes out when people work diligently to divide the Word of God :D

Humility - the "mother of all virtues," and pride, "the cause of all sin."

2 upvotes · 22 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a perfect example of where philosophy disguised as theology leads to incorrect answers. The author calls humility the "mother of all virtues" and then references several passages that say humility is a good thing. He very marginally makes an argument for why other virtues are derived from humility, but doesn't ever actually make his case - he just kind of says it. At best, he's using conventional thinking to amp up humility as the highest virtue.

That's what this man says. What does God say? "And now these three remain: faith, hope, and love, but the greatest of these is love" (1 Cor. 13:13). What does Jesus say? The greatest commands are to love God and love others (Matthew 22:36-40). Where is our core identity found? In Christ (Galatians 3:27-28). And how will the world know we are in Christ? By the way we love one another (John 13:34-35).

So, while I greatly appreciate the value of humility, let's not confuse this author's exaggerated speak about the virtue for what the Bible actually says. Humility is not the "mother of all virtues." If anything could claim that title, it is love. This is what the Bible says. But gimmicky titles like "mother of all virtues" certainly does sound catchy and gets readers, I'm sure. But let's never put man's philosophy over God's theology.

As for humility in its proper context - not as the "mother of all virtues," but as a very important virtue - the author is correct in his description. It's not about degrading yourself or devoiding any confidence from your life. It's about understanding who you are in your own proper context and living out of that.

One thing I do believe is that self-confidence should be eradicated from our lives entirely. This sounds counter-intuitive up-front, especially to an RP audience, but hear me out.

Philippians 3 is very, very telling. Paul starts out talking about non-believers who demanded physical/worldly symbols to outwardly demonstrate one's faith - specifically the Jews claiming to be Christians who were demanding Gentiles to be circumcised. Paul then contrasts this with the genuine believers saying, "it is we who ... put no confidence in the flesh - though I myself have reasons for such confidence." He then lists a litany of reasons why he is better than everyone else. In modern RP lingo it would go something like: "I bench over 400lbs, girls literally faint when I walk into the room, I'm totally OI, DNGAF, OYS more than any other guy you've ever met, etc. - and it's all true; I'm not just boasting here."

Then he says, "But whatever was to my gain I now consider a loss for the sake of Christ. What is more, I consider everything a loss because of the surpassing greatness of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord, for whose sake I have lost all things. I consider them garbage, that I may gain Christ and be found in him." In other words, "All that stuff that the other guys boast about - that can be good stuff, but my confidence isn't from those things, and they're garbage in and of themselves."

Instead, we see that his confidence is in Christ and that his inner contentment in life is (per chapter 4) found in that "I can do all things through Him who gives me strength." Secular RP says that men maintain their confidence and inner-peace/stoicism/frame/whatever you want to call it because they know they are awesome and they are the prize ... because of all the physical things they can point to about their great qualities. Christian RP says we pursue those things, but don't rely on them as our source of inner-strength; rather, we rely on Christ.

For this reason, our confidence should not be in ourselves, nor should we believe we are "the prize" simply because we are strong, charming, intelligent, hard-working, etc. We are the prize because we have Christ in us and He works through us to do things that actually matter - and this compels us to strive to be strong, charming, intelligent, hard-working, etc. as peripheral traits, not the core traits of our identity themselves.

Or to be more clear: we are not to have self-confidence; we are to have Christ-confidence. But if we are in Christ, our identity is in Christ, and therefore our confidence in Christ is rightly attributed to our self-esteem - not for the outward things we display, but because of who is in us and what he compels us to do. That is where humility is found.

Update to an update

2 upvotes · 20 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

So she has a mission in life, albeit a short-sighted one. You haven't expressed a mission yet. Her mission is more important to her than you are. Since you don't have a clearly articulated mission, you don't know what boundaries you should set or maintain. Her mission makes sense to you, so you can't figure out if supporting her in her mission is a good role for you.

It's not. Entering into or pursuing a relationship with a woman whose actions clearly express that her mission is more important to her than your mission is a clear recipe for failure. Note that I said your mission and not you personally. You've gotta figure out that mission thing. Your mission is what should attract women to you, and it's what should drive the boundaries you set in the relationship. It's also what will create your frame and how you invite others into your frame.

If you do have a clear mission, there's only one question: Is she living in a way that is supportive and advantageous to your mission? If the answer is no, then leave her and move on. It's literally that simple.

Also, listen to everything everyone else here has said. You're being given some good advice.

Open thread idea

2 upvotes · 20 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed.

Open thread idea

2 upvotes · 20 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I trained in boxing at one point. It wasn't something I was overly intense about at the time, but it will definitely kick your butt into shape. For raw strength training and brawling capacity it's definitely my recommendation. Other forms will focus more on toning, speed, and flexibility at the expense of strength. Of course, for sexual strategy toning is probably more important than anything else anyway.

Pursuing a Godly Woman - Advice Needed

2 upvotes · 20 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with u/OsmiumZulu - everything he's written in this thread, for that matter.

You're looking for OT God to talk to you, when he spoke verbally through the Father. Then Jesus came and spoke through actions and modeling God's will. Today the Holy Spirit shows God's will by becoming one with us, transforming us.

As I often say of late: The Spirit doesn't tell you God's will; he transforms you into the type of person who doesn't have to ask in the first place.

The Church converting to paganism

2 upvotes · 15 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The economic aspects of the early church were based on the fact that they were under political persecution unto death. Many of them couldn't hold typical jobs or engage in the public marketplace for fear of being hunted or killed, so they engaged in communes with one another as a base means of survival and avoiding the implication that they presented a serious harm/threat to the government. In essence, as long as they were keeping to themselves, Nero was less likely to amp up his efforts to kill them all off.

A Guide to Manipulation - Part 2: The Tactics

2 upvotes · 15 March 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Gotcha. Agreed.

The Church converting to paganism

2 upvotes · 15 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good read. I've only recently started listening to Peterson, but from what I can tell he thinks on the same wavelength I do, as with many of us here, albeit still purple in many respects.

All the same, I applaud your efforts to reach people with a non watered down understanding of the bible. Just be cautious not to make the mistake Peterson is warning about: focusing your efforts on an anti feminist ideology in the church rather than the bible itself. I'm very cautious NOT to do that with this sub, as the tendency of most red pill people is to make the red pill itself an idol.

Dalrock's blog is a great example of this (as opposed to his personal ministry, which I know nothing about). He says really good and valuable things on his blog. I encourage men to read what he has to say and put his blog on the sidebar for that purpose. But at the end of the day, his focus is not on the faith itself, but on an ideology - and he uses his faith as a context for talking about that ideology rather than using the ideology to advance the purposes of his faith, or just focusing on the faith in the absence of an ideological agenda at all.

I'm not saying what he's doing is bad by any means. That type of niche blogging is necessary so that the appropriate weight of one topic is not lost in the balance with everything else. But it's still pushing an ideology (albeit a good one) by leeching/being a parasite off of Christianity.

In an online blog format, this is perfectly fine. But as a focal intent of a personal ministry, as Peterson says, don't let the ideology become a parasite that leeches away from the whole of what the bible teaches; rather, treat it more like a leech that you intentionally put on dead skin to eat away the dead bits and let healthy skin grow in its place ... while still making use of all the rest of the body that wasn't decaying in the first place.

What are your positions on...

2 upvotes · 15 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

1 Timothy 2 is another very similar passage from a different author that reaches the same conclusion. But I tend to agree with your interpretation all the same. But it's not just the rich they're referencing. They're talking about the way the prostitutes doll themselves up or, as OZ recently noted, the priestess of Artemis (who I believe also engaged in sexual rituals and forms of religious prostitution).

For Singles: Finding the Girl You Can't Keep Yourself From Banging

2 upvotes · 14 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Haha ... I hear you. Just be cautious, though. The aspects of your mission that should allure women to you are things that should naturally expand your social network and that women would understand to be fruitful for God's kingdom.

So, if your mission is to "take the ... Church head on" as your adversary, that will fulfill neither of these purposes. In many ways I felt like that's what I was doing too, but tact means everything. Phrase it that your mission is not against the church, but to redirect the church.

Imagine a hockey puck gliding along the wall, behind the goal, and back toward the half of the court where it came from. Now imagine smacking it straight against the wall "head on." Which one seems more graceful? Which will maintain the most momentum once the puck is moving the right direction again?

Keep that imagery in mind when deciding how to pursue your mission. Pastors can get on board a lot easier if you come alongside them in a redirective fashion, which will work to increase your social network and maintain the apparent integrity of your mission to outsiders. Smacking head on just made me look like a defiant idiot when I used to employ that method.

As u/Whitified once noted, women often associate tact with charm and charisma. Good tact is attractive. Bad tact is not.

A Guide to Manipulation - Part 1: Are You Being Manipulated?

2 upvotes · 13 March 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Ah, I see the disconnect here. My point is obviously not to blame manipulation, as if that would do any good. It's to pull men out of the manipulation. Lift, diet, sidebar, etc. are the practical steps to do that.

The point isn't to blame the quicksand for trying to kill you. It's to understand that you're in quicksand so that you know how to escape, as compared to if you were stuck in the mud or the ocean.

The other point of the post isn't just about the man's condition, but in acknowledging the woman's actual affirmative desire for some of these conditions in her own life.

Girl problems

2 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I understand and agree as to the concepts. Thanks.

Girl problems

2 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I look forward to hearing it.

But the point is that the man should do what he wants - that's how he maintains his frame. I agree entirely that if he's doing it because he thinks she deserves an answer or something along those lines, he's breaking frame. But sometimes there's a psychological need, even in the man's case, to create definitive closure, which can be productive for his frame ... so I don't like cutting off the option entirely, and thereby defer to whatever the man himself wants to do in the situation.

Rollo Tomassi – Interviews and Video

2 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Exciting info. Thanks for the update on this. Audio/video are always easier ways to ingest information throughout the workday and at the gym.

Piracy: Pharisaism or Libertarianism?

2 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You guys are basically suggesting that I sacrifice my cultural diet on the altar of petty legalism. Aren't you?

No, I'm suggesting that if you're not willing to sacrifice your cultural diet at all in the pursuit of obedience, then you're in a sinful state such that no matter what the answer is, there's no point.

Take the example of eating pork. Imagine me saying, "I don't care what the actual answer is, I'm going to eat it anyway. But if you can all help me find a biblical justification for it so I don't have to feel guilty when I do it, that'd be great." Now, we know that biblically all meats are "clean" now, so there's no sin in eating pork. But when I maintain that attitude, whether I eat pork or not, I'm still sinning, even though the actual eating of the pork might not be sinful. My heart is totally in the wrong place. I'm not looking to honor God; I'm looking to justify my actions. That's what's wrong.

As I've said before, there are some contexts in which piracy may not be sinful, but if your attitude is, "Screw what God wants. I'm going to do it anyway. I just want you to help take away my guilt" ... there's nothing that can be done to help you. The reason it's trolling is because you ask up-front if it's sinful as if it's a legitimate question you're wrestling with, but then you blatantly reject any suggestion that it is sinful and say that you've already made up your mind on the subject. That's trolling.

If your attitude was: "I just want to obey God. If God doesn't want me to do it, then I'll stop and never do it again. But I'd really like to know, because that's a hard command to follow" ... that type of attitude I can get behind and would warrant sharing appropriate contexts for when pirating would not be "sinful."

Piracy: Pharisaism or Libertarianism?

2 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

If you torrent something and keep seeding it after your download, you are still redistributing it to others who otherwise may have paid if it was not available online.

Plus, this argument fails to see the en masse effect. If only one or two people download it who otherwise never would have bought it, then the company has not lost anything. But as hundreds or thousands of people do so, the ability to gain access to this content becomes more readily available to the degree that others who would have paid are now opting to get it for free instead, and even though you're not one of them your participation in the grand scheme has contributed to that problem, even if you're not seeding it yourself. You have still demonstrated to someone somewhere that there is a large market for this stuff and websites that get paid by advertisement are happy to let leechers-only people join because they still get their advertising dollars from you for having clicked on their page in the first place. That is, you are contributing to keeping alive an illegal website, thereby offering passive assistance to those who actually are depriving the content-creator of the money that otherwise would have been paid if that website/torrent/whatever did not exist.

Long story short, you're still trying to justify a decision you've already made up in your mind. You're trolling at this point. As I've noted elsewhere, there are certainly contexts in which piracy may not be "sinful," but the way you're approaching this is so off-base that I can't support it and I'm inclined to agree with /u/OsmiumZulu that this topic as a whole is off-point for this sub to a degree that maybe this whole thread needs removed.

How to approach "proposing"?

2 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You should have talked about these things in depth ... many marriage related topics ... conversations ... chats that somehow turned into a 2-3 hour conversation

Nah, bro. Your main point is spot on: that if he has to ask, he's not ready for marriage (and it's even less likely she is!). But he shouldn't be getting this information from what she says. He should be looking at how she behaves. The way she acts while dating will only degrade post-marriage. So, if she's not following his lead now, it doesn't matter how many conversations they've had - she's not going to follow him during the marriage without some serious "the power of Christ compels you!" transformation in her heart. Acta non verba. Let's never forget that. Look at what she does, not what she says. You're usually the first to bust that out even.

Other than that, all of your other topics of consideration are spot on. To that end, I'd even adopt /u/rocknrollchuck's recommendation of setting clear boundaries up-front and seeing how she responds. Although it's still verbage from OP to her, it gives her an opportunity to react so he can gauge her actions in response to those topics. Asking her for her opinions on them directly like this makes it seem like too much of a mutual decision rather than a leader asking for valuable insights from his helper. Of course, I'll assume you meant for him to employ tact in these conversations all the same.

How to approach "proposing"?

2 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It's great that you want to get married but you have not done your homework on her if you have to ask her if she will respect you after marriage and will comply to male leadership.

Amen to that. Great response overall.

How to approach "proposing"?

2 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Definitely not the first option, unless your frame is a cold robotic dictator. Personally, I reject the heartless frame and like to be fun and upbeat. If your frame is fun and upbeat, your proposal should be as well. Whatever your frame is, stick with that and follow through.

I get the impression you're trying to teach her a lesson. You want to control her. You can't. Besides, women change their minds all the time, so she might answer the right things today and decide differently tomorrow. Acta non verba.

Go have fun with it, but above all: do what you want. If you want to make a big extravaganza about it, go do that. If you want to just ask her on the couch after a tv show, do that. But undercutting what you want to do just to sound and feel macho is neither RP nor in your own frame.

Girl problems

2 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The ONEitis is strong with this one.

What were Christ's "boundaries"?

2 upvotes · 6 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

what they personally feel are right

I'd clarify: what the Holy Spirit leads them to believe is right. Of course, as I have often said on my more public blogging forum, The Holy Spirit rarely tells us directly what God desires of us; he's more in the business of transforming us into the type of people who don't need to ask in the first place.

it really seems to be him taking authority instead of ...

Correct.

setting a boundary

I'm not sure what that would be other than that he won't be distracted from his mission, even by those he loves. This is for us to dokie also and is the heart of 1 Cor. 7 saying, "From now on let those with wives live as though they had none" and Jesus also saying, "If anyone does not hate his mother and brothers, wife, children and even himself he can't be my disciple" ... aka: my mission must come first.

bearing fruit

The concept I was getting at was Jesus seeing a clear boundary for us: were either good fruit bearing soil/plants or we're cut down and thrown out. That's how he engages with his bride, as should we, though he is not without patience in the process.

Likewise, as husbands we are right to set clear expectations on our wives and enforce consequences with that same measure of grace, mercy, and patience.

So, I can't choose your boundaries for you, but I can look at these types of passages and tell you principles in how to select those boundaries and enforce them.

How would one approach this text and hold frame in a beneficial way coming from a Christian perspective?

2 upvotes · 5 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It seems like looking at talking to women in this way portrays more confidence because you aren't expecting anything in return (needy/nice guy-esque) and just being totally honest within one's frame. Is that what you are saying here?

That's exactly what I'm saying. I interact the same way with my wife, although the context is obviously very different. I don't have some inherent expectation or demand of her sexual interest in me, as if I could negotiate or demand desire in the first place. I interact with her as someone who lives closely alongside me for the purpose of helping me in a mission, and I utilize the relationship for that purpose. And on days that we're "burning with passion" then we have sex. On days when we're not, we don't. Adopting this attitude has increased marital sexuality rather than decreased it, contrary to blue pill thinking. In essence, it's the DNGAF/OI/mission-oriented mentality that attracts her to me in the first place.

What do you mean by this?

The Old Testament clearly gives an imperative toward marriage. This is evident from Genesis and lasts through the time of the prophets. If someone was not married or producing physical offspring, including a male heir, that was disgraceful. That imperative exists and cannot be denied.

However, in a post-Gospel world we know that the imperative toward physical offspring is redirected toward spiritual offspring. As Paul says in Romans 9, it's not those of the "blood" of Abraham, but those children of the "promise" that matter.

So, where God told us to become one flesh with one another as husband and wife to produce physical offspring, we now no longer have a physical imperative toward this because our new command is to become one with Christ as his bride for the purpose of producing spiritual offspring (through evangelism) and raising those offspring (discipleship) until they're old enough to reproduce and raise offspring themselves (generational ministry). That is, God established the generational family structure of the Old Testament as a foreshadowing of the type of spiritual ministry he would utilize through us as the church in a post-Gospel world.

It sounds like the conclusion I'm reading is that "marriage is most likely if I'm open to it (and I most likely will get married), but that isn't, and shouldn't, be the goal". I should focus on coming into the frame of Christ, and in turn, make disciples through that calling by becoming more like Christ and going out in the world in all humility and developing my frame and mission/vision.

Correct.

What were Christ's "boundaries"?

2 upvotes · 5 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This does make more sense. Christ's boundaries were always very clearly articulated and came with an on/off switch. "If you want to follow me or be my disciple, you must ___. If you don't do ___, you can't follow me or be my disciple."

Likewise, as men we must do the same: "If you want to be my wife and follow me, then you must ___. If you don't do ___, you can't be my wife or (if you're already married) reap the benefits of being my wife."

To be clear, there are many who self-identify as "Christ's disciples" or "followers of Jesus" or whatever, but they're not going to get those benefits on judgment day if they don't meet the criteria laid out by Christ and most potently expressed through the Gospel (see Matthew 7, for example, with the whole "I never knew you" bit).

To that end, although I may have made a spiritual covenant with someone and become one flesh with someone, if she wants to continue reaping the benefits of our union from me, she better keep being fruitful in the relationship as well. If not, she falls in the numerous passages where Jesus talks about an unfruitful tree ... and that's not pretty. Of course, divorce laws work against a guy here, but that's the gist of it.

Now, the way you do that without getting yourself caught in a divorce is by adopting such traits as humility, kindness, patience, etc. As with the parable of the fig tree, the owner was going to cut it down and throw it in the fire until the gardener said, "Hold up, be patient with this tree. Let me fertilize it and water it and try to get it to grow some fruit before you cut it down." The owner agreed. Likewise, we should give our wives time to come around to following our lead, ergo the 1,000 foot rope.

From there, the implication I get from the passage on Abraham pleading for Sodom (Genesis 18) is that if the fig tree were to have even born only one healthy fruit, then the master would have let it live, just as if Sodom had even only 10 righteous people (and presumably this would have continued to just 1) God would have spared it. So, even if you don't have a super beautiful, highly fruitful tree of a wife, if she is producing good fruit and not only bad, then you've got to take what you get.

But at the same time, 1 Cor. 3 also says that some people will be saved, "but only as one escaping through the flames" and that all of their fruitless stuff will be burned away. I take this to mean that if a wife has very little fruit to show for herself toward the marriage and her contribution in the man's mission, then the man should remain married (because she does have fruit), but he doesn't need to be showering her with lavish blessings either ... her role in the marriage should meet however one defines "escaping through the flames," which doesn't sound all that pretty.

Hopefully that's a little closer to what you intended.

Wife and I fight when I am ill.

2 upvotes · 2 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree completely. I think where it got confusing was when OP was comparing his wife to his mother and suggesting he wanted his wife to care for him the same way his mother did. That would be inappropriate. But her more general lack of care altogether is also inappropriate.

Of course, as you appropriately note: he can't force her to provide his expected level of care. So, to some extent, he's just got to man up and deal with it for now until he can learn to lead his wife into a place where she more naturally has that loving, submissive inclination toward him, which she presently lacks. She's not magically going to get there on her own. He's going to have to lead her into it.

Wife and I fight when I am ill.

2 upvotes · 2 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I've dealt with the same thing from my wife. When she's sick, the whole world must stop to attend to her every need. When I'm sick it's, "Aw, I'm sorry you're feeling bad. Can you do the dishes and vacuum the floor?" Or at least that's how it used to be.

Here's the deal: you're not wrong in wanting to be cared for. This is a perfectly appropriate feeling. Yeah, there are clear mommy issues tied into this, and I'll get to that. But the fact of what you want and what you actually get rarely align. You are also right in other posts to expect your wife to submit to you and respect your leadership, but she doesn't do it, right? You're also right to expect that she should have sex with you when you want it, right? After all, biblically we're called not to deprive one another and that her body belongs to you as much as yours to her - and this in a sexual context, right? But she doesn't live that out, does she?

We're all sinners. We all have expectations both biblically and pragmatically that simply will never be satisfied. On the 404 circles illustration, you're looking to be illegitimately satisfied through your wife. Is it any wonder that you then find yourself illegitimately empty when she fails you?

Does she have an obligation to help you and support you through your time of sickness? Absolutely. But the harsh reality is that she's human and will fail you. You must accept that, embrace it, and not let it shake you. The fact that this does shake you - that you are upset by her failure to do her job - is where you have lost frame. Your emotional state is dependent on her actions. So, although I don't condone the way /u/TheGlassStone was trolling/stalking you, that's what he meant when he said you were in her frame. Because her actions decide your emotions.

Now, as /u/BirdManBrrrr said, there are many different hats you're trying to put on her. Despite what the feminists may say, no woman can "do it all." God bless the ones who try! Most of them just don't.

You want her to be a submissive wife, passionate lover, nurse to her patients, mother to your children, nurse and mother to you, etc. and all of these roles just don't compute.

Different roles require different characteristics. Some women are surprisingly versatile and can change their character traits to suit many different relationships. But trying to get a woman to express two conflicting character traits in one relational context is difficult and won't likely happen.

Specifically, if you want your wife to treat you like your mommy treated you, ask yourself: how often did your mommy get horny at the thought of having sex with you? How often does your wife get horny taking care of your son when he's sick? How often does she get horny over the patients at the hospital? My guess is that if it happens, it's during times/phases when they're not showing significant external symptoms of illness - they don't need her to play mommy/nurse to them.

Now, you're probably thinking, "But I don't want to have sex with her when I'm sick like this - I just want her affection while I get better." Righto. But she can't separate the immediate temporal context from the long-term relational impact. In her mind, you are you. There isn't "sick BornRedy and not-sick BornRedy" ... there's only BornRedy. If she has to view and treat you as a sick child today, a month from now she's going to remember that emotional context of how she related to you and feel like she's having sex with a little boy. That's why /u/BluepillProfessor recommends taking things very slowly - because women cannot immediately change their relational context for interacting with people. They remember the feelings they had in the past and it takes time for their hearts and brains to rewire into the new order.

To be clear: they can't change their characteristics and internal emotional frame of reference very quickly when hopping from context to context with the same person. However, they can change their characteristics and emotional frame of reference when the contextual change is from one person to another person. So, if she's playing mommy to you, that doesn't stop her from playing sex bunny to someone else.

And when you took your hiatus from applying red pill principles in your home (per one of your previous posts), you imprinted in her mind, "Okay, that was just a phase. It won't last, so I don't really need to adapt. I just need to wait it out until he's back to his old ways again." This further validates in her mind that there is no need to even bother trying to change her characteristics and emotional frame of reference with you - because she thinks she'll just end up changing back anyway.

Long story short: don't expect her to wear multiple hats in her relationship with you. You can expect multiple hats in life generally, as she will have to wear one hat to your kids, another to her patients, another with you, etc. But when she relates with you, she's either your wife or your nurse or your mom or your counselor or your boss or your whatever. Pick one role and run with it. I suggest wife.

Now, you're probably thinking, "But shouldn't a WIFE be nurturing and affectionate to her husband when he's sick?" Ideally, yeah. That'd be great. But again, that's bluepill thinking. It's imputing a fantasy world into your expectations rather than living in the pragmatic reality of how she has always behaved in your marriage. The goal of red pill thinking is not to get people to meet our fantasized expectations. It's to learn how people actually function in the real world and make the most of that operating system to suit our own purposes (which in a Christian context should be God's purposes).

Since I know you're computer competent, imagine you're on your computer and you want to play a video game.

So, you spool up your windows operating system and start playing. Then you decide you want to record some audio and integrate a few things with your phone, so you uninstall windows and jerry rig an apple operating system, even though the components really aren't supposed to work that way and you have to do some weird hack to get it done. After you're finished with that you decide to do some programming, so you reformat the hard drive into a Linux operating system. When you're done with your programming project, you have some extra time, so you decide to reformat the hard drive back to windows to play your video game again.

What's going to happen here? (1) You're probably going to fry your computer pretty quickly. (2) All of your efforts are going to be run inefficiently. (3) You're going to find a lot of data corruption and lose lots of important files that prevent your computer from functioning appropriately in any of the operating systems, much less all 3. (4) If your computer had emotions it would hate you.

Your wife has many different operating systems. When you married her, you probably had some idealistic blue pill fantasy phrase like: "I love you just the way you are, and even if you never changed I'd want to be with you forever." Now you see the harsh reality that this simply wasn't true. You did expect her to change and she didn't. Or maybe it's the flip - you wanted her to stay that way forever, but she ended up changing because life changes and she can't be that cute college girl anymore who only had to worry about showing up to class and taking tests.

In all honesty, if you want her to be that person again, you can make it happen. You just have to remove all responsibilities from her life to the point where her present matches what things were like in the past. This means you doing 100% of the financial provision, doing all of the housework except for a portion of the house approximately equivalent in size to her college dorm room, you doing all of your and the kids' laundry, you managing all the finances, you giving her the emotional security and stability that her parents gave her such that if things go south, she knows it's all still going to be fine, etc., etc., etc. But that's just not realistic. I actually tried that with my wife for a time. It was awful. Her behavior shaped up, but I hated my life. On the 108 Life Path of a Relationship, that was backtracking rather than moving forward.

Pick one operating system and let her run on that. Windows is probably not the best operating system to be running for audio recording, phone integration and synchronization purposes. But you know what? Rough around the edges or not, you can still get the job done. Windows may not be the optimal operating system for computer programming and coding. But you know what? It's still good enough to get the job done. When it comes to just having fun and enjoying your time on the computer - yeah, it's the best.

Just like installing an Apple OS on a PC hard drive isn't supposed to work, there are some characteristics and emotional frames of reference that your wife should really not be having with you. Being your "mommy" is one of those. She can jerry rig some kind of an emotional hack to make it work, but it's not generally a good idea. That's why PCs can run some old emulators that are very low-maintenance just fine, but try running a PS4 game on your PC through an emulator. It might work, but there are going to be so many bugs and flaws and problems that it's just not worth it.

Anyway, I'm just rambling at this point and have to get back to work.

Husband pastor & quite time

2 upvotes · 2 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Define "home."

Everything that falls within the purview of the family. Responsibility for the home can be anything from fixing the deck to doing the dishes to providing income to put food on the table or teaching children how to be godly, productive adults.

... and other scholars I've read disagree, at least as it applies to the physical house

So, if the "physical house" has a leaky pipe or worn out shingles or broken boards on the deck, that's the wife's responsibility, right? Or is there a verse somewhere that says, "The husband shall do these things around the house: __, __, __ and the wife shall do these things: __, __, __"?

See what I'm saying? I can see some support for the notion that all of the housework is the wife's domain. That's why I acknowledge it's a legitimate position. But if you're going to make that leap, and there is no verse that says "except these responsibilities," then you've got to be willing to put the WHOLE burden on her. To be fair, my mom was that kind of wife. She was a stay at home and did all of the housework, including ripping out floor boards, redoing dry wall, fixing leaky pipes, cementing the back patio, etc. If that's the extreme you want to take it, my mom was a great example of this and I can really get behind that, even though I still don't think it's a biblical mandate. But if you're going to say that the home is the wife's domain, then start allocating home responsibilities to the man also, I think you'll have a much harder biblical case to make there. I'm more comfortable, biblically, with the position that the man is ultimately responsible for everything within the family, including the care of the house, and any conclusion that the housework itself is the wife's responsibility is only derivative of a cultural context that husbands chose for millennia to utilize their authority in the home to place that kind of housework in the wife's domain - not that there is a biblical mandate that they must make that her domain.

Are you a literalist? Are you in the non-literal "principles/intent" camp? Something else?

Fair question, I'm sure I wasn't clear. I believe that the intention of the author when he wrote the words on the page are what the Spirit inspired, and that the words themselves were also inspired by the Spirit to give adequate context to understand the author's intention at any given time.

When I said I was a literalist, I referenced two specific examples of cases where people (even hyper-literalists) try to explain away what Jesus said by saying, "He was just speaking in hyperbole when he told us to (1) gouge out our eyes and cut off our hands and (2) hate our mother and brothers and spouse and kids." If you look at the context of what Jesus is saying in both passages (and there are many more), you'll know that he meant exactly what he said - he was not speaking in hyperbole or facetiously. Likewise, using Titus 2:3-5 is another example where a literal interpretation leads to the conclusion that older women should teach younger women certain things, which includes how to work at home.

This is a great idea and something you promoted early on in this sub's creation - that this is a skill all women should have. But it goes beyond a literal interpretation of that passage to imply a command that younger women must work at home. The literal interpretation is simply that this is a skill they should be taught. In that sense, this is another case in that 95% where I believe authorial intent and the literal interpretation align. It becomes "hyper-literalist" when people exaggerate (i.e. "make hyper") the implication of the passage into a command that was never meant to be given: that younger women must work in the home.

The words/phrasing show it's clear a contrast is being made between things, and not commands for women to not braid their hair, etc.

How so? "Women should adorn themselves in respectable apparel, with modesty and self-control, not with braided hair and gold or pearls or costly attire." That seems pretty straight forward to me.

The way you get around it is with the next verse: "but with what is proper for women who profess godliness - with good works." Okay, so that's what Paul is really after: a woman who dresses in a way that professes godliness, not literally prohibiting them from braiding their hair.

... just like Titus 2 says "that the word of God may not be reviled," right? In one you're looking at the authorial intent in the command, yet the other is to be taken literally? That's a theological inconsistency.

we certainly give heavy credence to why God wants something as well as to what the commands are

Yeah, maybe I didn't communicate my point well there. The issue is which dominates: God's intent, or the technical letter of the law. A hyper-literalist will care about why God issued the law, but they don't allow that "why" to influence their interpretation of the command; rather, the command influences their interpretation of who God is in the first place. The WBC is a great example of all of this. They look to literal interpretations of biblical passages in very dangerous ways. They care deeply about why God gave those commands, but they don't let God's intent in giving the command control their expression of obedience; rather, they re-shape their view of God to fit the commands he gave, and you get a grossly distorted image of the faith when that happens.

And the reason fits just as well with a literal interpretation. That if one doesn't do those things, then the word of God is reviled, because they're not doing things God commanded.

But you're going beyond a literal reading of the passage to impute that as a command that was never given. It was simply a skill to be taught. Whether or not that skill is ever put to use is a different question - but all women should be able to fulfill that role in case their husbands call them to it.

I do think a woman can work outside the home and it's perfectly fine as long as she doesn't neglect her duties at home.

Yeah, I remembered you saying that. But you're still imputing some "duties at home" on the woman that somehow transcends her husband's authority. I simply don't see this command in Scripture that the husband must assign the wife duties at home or that the wife must accept such duties even if her husband doesn't assign it to her. I see that in culture; but I hate cultural theology - that our interpretation of God's will is somehow defined by culture. So, arguing about what some past culture did only works on a theological level if God specifically adopted that cultural practice and said, "Yes, this is exactly how it should be done."

If one only takes principles from passages and not what God says, you can make scripture mean almost anything.

I think you're confusing liberal theology in there. There are virtually always enough textual cues that point toward the author's intent that there's little room for debate/interpretation. But there are countless passages where a direct, literal interpretation that doesn't account for intent causes massive problems. The WBC is a great example of this. I also knew a guy who tried to kiss me - and every Christian - every time we met because a literal reading of Romans 16:16, devoid of Paul's intentions, told him he should "greet one another with a holy kiss." That's the danger of hyper-literalism that excludes authorial intent. Perhaps better terminology would be "interpretational literalism" and "applicational literalism," where I have been calling the latter "hyper-literalists."

My flavor of "interpretational literalism" would look at Romans 16:16 and say that Paul is literally talking to a church; he's addressing specific people; and he literally wants those people to whom he's writing to greet one another with a holy kiss. Any implication that he also intends us today to greet one another with a holy kiss leaves the realm of "interpretational literalism" and enters "applicational literalism." In the same way, Titus 2 and 1 Timothy 2 give room for applicational literalism to run its course, but interpretational literalism still seems to make more sense to me - that Paul meant what he said in the context in which he said it. Trying to extrapolate a passage beyond the context in which it was spoken is dangerous work.

when Jesus said "I am the door" we don't think he was a literal door on a house

That's just inconsistent theology, though. You're picking and choosing which verses to apply literalism to and which you're going to reject literalism and go with a metaphorical interpretation. So what you're saying is not "literalists are cool with this." You're saying, "I'm cool with it because I'm not always a literalist - I'm only a literalist when I feel like being one." That is, you're applying authorial intent and interpretational literalism most of the time, but for some passages applying inconsistent theology to switch to applicational literalism.

Of course, one who follows authorial intent and interpretational literalism would agree that (1) Jesus literally said these things, and (2) in the spiritual realm Jesus literally functions like a door through whom all must pass to reach the Father.

Husband pastor & quite time

2 upvotes · 2 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

"Much anger in him, there is ... When you look at the dark side, careful you must be ... for the dark side looks back."

Husband pastor & quite time

2 upvotes · 1 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

First: pray for them

Second: treat them like non-Christian, as opposed to Christians with bad theology. We rebuke and reprimand Christians who live sinful lives based on bad theology. But we don't rebuke non-Christians for their sin. That'd be like trying to dry up the ocean one bucket at a time ... and dumping it on the beach no less, where it will just roll right on back in.

Third: as with non-Christians, avoid theological discussions. If they want to debate some weird passage, it's not because they want to learn. It's because they want to trap you. Nevermind that they can't, just don't humor them at all.

Fourth: center all conversations around the gospel. This is much easier than with blatant non-Christians because the spiritually deceived already think they've accepted the gospel, thus freely embrace talking about it. This is the one theological area worth discussing with them because liberal theology is inherently derived from a misunderstanding of the Gospel or a refusal to accept and internalize the Gospel in one's own life.

Fifth: most importantly: disciple them. Show them through your life model intentionally exposed to them all that true faith has to offer, then invite them to join you in living out that model, even as you mature and refine your model of living.

TLDR: withdrawing time & attention, the last ditch, roommate, not wife

2 upvotes · 1 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Sorry, just saw this in the mod-queue, which I admittedly don't check very often :/

The author has made it a habit to not go to sleep until he has asked his wife 3 questions every night while sitting up right in a chair in their bedroom before going to sleep: What have you been dealing with? How are you feeling? and How may I help you?

Be cautious with the frame issue here. This positions the husband as being subservient and submissive to his wife. Servant leading is one thing, but letting her emotions dominate the direction of the marriage to a degree that it must be brought up every single day ... that's super dangerous.

Husband pastor & quite time

2 upvotes · 1 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

To be fair to /u/RedPillWonder, it's more nuanced than I made it sound and he probably agrees with the "One of her roles is housework" bit more than I would. I get the impression that he and a few other people here believe that a man MUST assign the role of housework to the wife or he is in sin. Alternatively, if her husband instructs her away from housework and she listens, they may assume she is in sin for listening to her husband and abandoning her allegedly God-given duties in the home. I do not believe that this is a biblical mandate.

I believe a man can choose not to have his wife be a homemaker, and that this is perfectly legitimate. If he makes that choice, his wife is still right before her husband and God when she follows the lead of her husband in doing something other than homemaking. After all, the responsibility for the care of the home still falls under the husband's headship. It's not a unique domain given by God to women. In my view, this is the difference between legalist applications of the law (i.e. the letter of what must be done on earth) as compared with principles derived from the law, which we must incorporate in our model of living (i.e. the heart behind what God actually means when he tells us something).

In that context, the biblical passages that delegate homemaking responsibilities to the wife are not to be read as literal commands that transcend time, space, and human culture any more than the command for women to wear head coverings or that women shouldn't braid their hair or wear jewelry or expensive clothes. How many churches "permit a woman to speak" during worship? And let's not forget the command even on men to "greet one another with a holy kiss" (Romans 16:16) and how few of us follow this either. There are all kinds of new testament passages that we ignore on the grounds that "God didn't intend that to be applied in a literal way; we have to look to the heart behind why he said it and fulfill that as well." But when it comes to some other things, if it suits their own interests some people are quick to break the theological pattern that they've been applying for all those other verses.

I'm not okay with theological inconsistencies or the "pick and choose" method of which commands we follow and don't. It's either all literal or it's all on principle and context. Of course, 95% of the time principle and context are going to lead back to the same literal application as before anyway. This is why I believe many people get trapped in hyper-literalist thinking - because it does line up a majority of the time. The principle behind why we're not supposed to lie will lead to the same conclusion today as it did a couple millenia ago. But the principle behind why women should not braid their hair might not. A hyper-literalist cannot reconcile these two without going Mennonite/Amish in many ways. Where a hyper-literalist might be able to reconcile 95% of the commands with his own modern non-Mennonite/Amish lifestyle, the one who functions on the intent of the author rather than the technicality of his words will be able to reconcile 100% of the biblical commands with practical reality.

Now, this is still vastly distinct from liberal theology, which suggests that even the author's intent should be abandoned when culture changes beyond the scope the author would have expected. So, when Paul preaches against homosexuality in Romans, for example, he has principles in his mind as to why he believes this is condemnable behavior, and those principles still apply today, whereas the liberal theologian would throw those principles out the window and argue, "If Paul was alive today he wouldn't have said that over our culture." When it comes to something like women wearing braided hair ...

- The hyper-literalist must condemn all women who braid their hair and rebuke them and ask them to repent. They don't give any regard for "why" God doesn't want women to braid their hair; they just do what they're told.
- The one who functions on authorial intent (as I do) would recognize that Paul is saying not to dress and act like a prostitute or a stuck up snob, and suggest instead that God doesn't actually care about the position of the strands of hair on a woman's head.
- The liberal theologian would say, "Paul didn't know that women would braid their hair all the time today, and if he knew what society would be like today he would have said something very different, so we can just ignore what he said back then for that culture."

EDIT:

In my view, the same applies to Titus 2's statement that older women should teach younger women to be homemakers.

- The hyper-literalist must condemn all women who aren't homemakers and rebuke them and ask them to repent. They don't give any regard for "why" God wants them being homemakers; they just do what they're told.
- The one who functions on authorial intent (as I do) would recognize that Paul tells us his reason: "so that the Word of God may not be reviled." As long as our lifestyle is not causing the Word of God to be reviled, we have fulfilled Paul's intention. A woman who is shrewish or disrespectful to her husband would certainly cause the Word of God to be reviled. But I don't see how anyone would hate God's Word if they see a woman holding a full-time job instead of being home 100% of the time.
 - Another noteworthy point is simply to ask: "What Word of God would be reviled by a woman not being a homemaker?" In that culture, women were virtually prohibited from having full-time jobs anyway, so Paul clearly isn't suggesting women shouldn't have full-time jobs, as that thought probably would not have crossed his mind in the first place. Instead, it was culturally accepted that women were supposed to be homemakers. If a woman was not fulfilling her homemaking duties, it meant that she was lazy and not a helper to her husband. If her husband allowed this, then God's commands about working diligently or his establishment of the woman as her husband's helper would be reviled, among other things. So, we must consider which commands would be reviled and make sure those are not reviled in our lifestyle today. But just as it's possible for a woman to braid her hair today and not look like a prostitute or a rich snob, so also is it possible for a woman to have a full-time job and still live diligently to the work which her husband has assigned her and as a helper to her husband and in submissiveness to his authority so that the Word of God along those lines and others is not reviled.
- The liberal theologian would say, "Paul didn't know that someday it would be okay for women to work en masse and full-time. If he had known that, he never would have written this over our culture, so we can just ignore that passage."

309 - The discipleship process

2 upvotes · 1 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I would love to read that!

Consider it done.

I'm a huge fan of Ray Comfort's "Using the Ten Commandments to bring the knowledge of sin" method

That's fair, and it's highly effective for some people. But it only works if the person (1) already believes in God, (2) already agrees with the Bible's definition of sin and morality, (3) already agrees that there are eternal consequences for failing to address our sin, and (4) already agrees that other religions' methods of addressing human sin are inadequate.

Some people, especially those non-Christians who were raised in the church, meet all of those criteria. This is particularly true for the generation between the ages of 35-65 today, given the cultural climate that their parents would have raised them in. For those under that age range, fewer and fewer are being raised in the church or with any real pressure to learn and understand biblical concepts even within the church.

So, it's getting a lot harder with younger audiences to find people who meet those 4 conditions that make them ripe for the Ray Comfort model to work. That's not to say it's altogether ineffective, as there are still a lot of people who do respond to this. But I do believe there are other models that are more effective for a younger audience. More on that to come.

We must not excuse ourselves, but force ourselves to the irksome task until it becomes easy

Hmm ... now I'm going to have to do a post on the box illustration.

Husband pastor & quite time

2 upvotes · 1 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

To be clear, I think the main area of disagreement is in my belief that the wife's primary responsibility is to her husband, not to her home. I agree that if a husband leads his wife into a context where she is the one primarily responsible for the housework, that's great. But ultimately, I also believe that the responsibility for the housework still rests squarely on the husband and he cannot defer to God or anyone else, "Hey, it's my wife's fault for not getting it done." It's not like God gave the husband authority over the home and then said, "except for the housework - I'm making her do that."

309 - The discipleship process

2 upvotes · 1 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

during times of disagreement

Indeed. I literally just put up a post on this :)

It is my responsibility during those times to make the godly decision and stick to it, regardless of whether she agrees or not.

Right on.

The main danger with relationship evangelism is that ... the longer we wait the more difficult it can become to share it with them down the line

This is a good point. I often overlook this because I don't experience that fear of rejection that many people do. I appreciate and value my close relationships with people, but I don't depend on them. It goes back to the circles illustration in 404 - if my satisfaction is in Christ and not in the things of this world, then I'm perfectly content to lose the things of this world for the sake of gaining Christ and doing what he called me to do, which is to make disciples (Philippians 3:8 is reminiscent here).

In short, I'd suggest that your premise here is a good one for someone who had not yet learned to find their satisfaction in Christ alone - who still has some internal compulsion to value certain things of this world to a degree that it hinders one's mission.

I find that the reason most Christians don't share it is because they don't know what to say.

This is a good point. Maybe I should do a post not just on the systematic process behind evangelism, but on the more practical concerns of living it out. Thanks for the feedback!

309 - The discipleship process

2 upvotes · 1 March 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent question. First off: "worker at home" or "worker at an office" or whatever are only contexts, not the mission itself. Your wife's mission is not to be a "worker at home" any more than it's your mission to "make money." The mission is to make disciples. The rest of the details are just the context for how you do so. So, asking "how does my wife get involved while she's working at home?" is the same as asking, "how do I do this when I have a day job?"

Discipleship is predominantly about modeling. It's you living the Christ-like life in such a way that others can follow in your example, and then intentionally building relationships that call others to follow in your example. Part of that for you is going to be modeling to the guys you're discipling that you're faithful and diligent with your employer. They won't see you at your job, but they will understand that you're working and you'll be able to tell them how your work day has gone and things that you've done to demonstrate diligence, per Colossians 3:23, Psalm 90:17, Proverbs 13:4, etc.

From your wife's perspective, this is true for her too. If she happens to be a housewife, this is actually easier than the working husband's ability to incorporate discipleship into one's daily routine. In my job, I take breaks for lunch to meet with men I'm discipling and we talk about our careers as part of the relational and modeling component, but I can't very well have them sit in the courtroom and watch me go at it. A housewife, on the other hand, actually can do this. When my wife was on maternity leave for the last 6 months (she just started working again in February) she would invite other women over to the house with her to spend time together while she took care of the kids, washed the dishes, cleaned the house, etc. Sometimes the girls would help her do these things, and other times they'd sit at a table and just chat with her while she did it. But she was modeling to these women how to be good homemakers. She was also talking to them about Jesus and imparting to them the importance of spending time in the word, praying, memorizing Scripture, sharing one's faith, etc. (i.e. the 7 basics).

Now, this alone is really each of us living the mission for discipleship in parallel, rather than working together on a common mission. What binds it together is when she and I work together to set up intentional strategies for helping the people we're ministering to move forward in their relationship with Christ. To that end, she'll tell me about the women she's working with and I will lead her on how to help them take the next step. She then takes her unique knowledge of how women think and act and utilizes that to find an optimal way to communicate what I've laid out so that the women can actually receive it rightly. Although this sounds highly analytical, it's really a natural and organic process when put in practice.

From there, we also have couples in our church and community who I tell my wife, "I'd really like for us to build a relationship with them and help them move forward," so then I invite them to dinner or have my wife initiate with the woman of the relationship, if she already has the stronger relational context for initiating. To that end, when my wife simply makes friends of other women in the church, that's a help to me because it gives a door for me to reach those women's husbands as well, leveraging my wife's social inclinations to make my job of connecting with those men easier - and all the better if she's discipling those same women as well, putting us in a discipleship context together within the same family.

Let me know if any of this is confusing. But suffice it to say that there are countless ways that a wife can help a man in his mission of disciple-making. Not the least of these, which I hadn't mentioned yet, is helping me see blind spots when I'm communicating with someone. So, for example, when I was discipling my pastor last year, he went off on sabbatical for a few months saying he was shutting off his phone, social media, etc. to make it a true vacation. I followed suit and left him alone, but my wife appropriately noticed afterward that this had hurt him because my relationship with him was above and beyond what he had with the rest of the church, so that "don't contact me" line wasn't meant for me specifically. I had to address that with him and apologize, which helped heal a wound that I wouldn't have noticed was festering had it not been for my wife's relational insightfulness during one of our planning/strategy sessions (which again, are really quite organic in practice, usually starting off with something like, "Hey, how'd your meeting with so and so go?").

Husband pastor & quite time

2 upvotes · 27 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Sorry, I haven't been on since you posted this. You used a short-link. By default all of reddit has short-linked posts and sometimes comments removed automatically (i.e. it wasn't even this sub's auto-moderator that did it).

So, in the future, utilize the full link and you'll be fine. I do think, for reference, that even doing the whole "[] ()" format for putting text on the link doesn't even work - you have to use full links.

Asking wife's consent?

2 upvotes · 15 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

MRP = r/marriedredpill ... it's a secular red pill sub.

I think you're stretching things beyond logic, trying to force things into one box. It's like if I said "men are strong" and your responses are: "oh, so a man can never touch a baby because he's so strong he'd kill it." That's the type of logic you're using when you jump from "employment doesn't matter" to the conclusion that this is somehow in conflict with Eve having kids and raising them. "She has a job ... I guess kids are out of the question now." What?!? That conceptual leap just makes no sense to me.

You're trying to compare a society where the overwhelming majority of income-generating jobs available were things that women were not physically capable of doing (or at least were categorically worse than men at doing) to a society where the job requirements are generally on par for both genders. Can a woman work a desk job as a CEO, salesperson, dentist, etc.? We don't know - those positions didn't exist back then as we know them today. What we do know is that the jobs that did exist were difficult for women to fulfill and God did not object - he didn't say, "Men, you have to let women do it too." He also didn't say, "Only men shall work, no matter what the job is." So, you're confusing culture with "God said ____." He didn't say anything. Don't put words in God's mouth that aren't there.

If you want to make a philosophical leap, drawing from the fact that woman-friendly jobs didn't exist during biblical times and that God didn't object and make your conclusion based on that alone, that's fine. But be extremely careful when trying to communicate a philosophical leap as a theological conclusion.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

2 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Aye; and there's the rub, eh?

Sure, but there are some crimes that imply a hardened heart and others that don't. For example, wanton and intentional murder is pretty clear, for the most part. Stealing from a grocery store ... not so much. From there it's just a matter of repetition: "I've given you grace 3 times now and you've failed each time, so take your sentence." In the meantime, "grace" should always be accompanied by an order of restitution, which is also a biblical concept (see Zaccheus, for example).

how do you define 'wicked'?

I know this needs a lot more explanation, but ... biblically.

Is he wicked, or is he ill and in need of treatment?

Both. Wickedness got him addicted to drugs in the first place.

What if the act itself is more questionable -- for instance, as the OP alluded to, homosexuality? What if you have a loving couple whose life appears to bear good fruit, but they happen to be of the same sex? Do you vote them off the island?

I'm not sure how that's questionable. Unrepentant sin is unrepentant sin. I'm still not sure how you're defining "good fruit," but my guess is that if they're bringing people into a theology of, "You can ignore what the Bible says, just believe in Jesus," then it's not good fruit. If they got married as homosexuals while non-Christians and only afterward found Christ and have repented of their sin and are no longer engaging in intentional homosexual sex or encouraging other people to adopt a "pick and choose" theology, then yeah, they're probably fine ... and I'd say they're even okay to live together as long as they're clear with each other and others who may observe them that there is no longer sexual engagement between the two of them and their bond is merely one of loving affection and mutual support, which I would encourage all believers to have - same sex or not, including two men who are roommates. The term "romantic affection" is really often just code for sexual desire toward someone else. It can also be just a categorization of different other types of desire or affection, but I don't typically think of itself as a thing of its own.

I get that some of this seems gray, and I do believe that gray areas exist. But there are lot fewer of them in the Bible than people would like to admit. Instead, we like to create gray areas as a justification for our behaviors. As long as we can say "there's no way to know for sure," we can feel confident in doing it because it's not definitively wrong. In reality, the Bible says the opposite - that we are "slaves to righteousness" and that all things are "wrong" unless definitively redeemed as "right." And that concept of redemption (and also reconciliation) is powerful enough to cover lots of things, so it's not like we're in some tight little box either.

Asking wife's consent?

2 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Leadership is his role. What tasks you are fulfilling - be it through employment or around the house - are your context. The roles are not interchangeable. The context in which we fulfill those roles is.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

2 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

There's some truth to what she said, but it also leads down a somewhat dangerous theological path if we follow down that road too far. To be clear, and I'll tag her so she can correct me if I'm wrong, but I believe /u/Willow-girl has said in the past that she is not a Christian, but does have an appreciation for certain aspects of our faith (sorry if I'm mistaken on this).

The good in what she's saying is that our obligation is to do right by God in our own lives and that this should be unshaken by someone else's failure to live up to their calling. Ultimately we are not the judges of their salvation, so it's not for us to try to condemn people for believing mistaken theology or for engaging in sin and refusing to repent. We can't control someone else - so you do you and let them do them.

She also appropriately acknowledges that the fruit of a person's life is what matters, although I would clarify that Jesus had a very specific intent in saying this: that our fruit is the disciples who are following Jesus because of our lives. Things like being "good, patient, kind, loving," etc. are nice, but they're not the fruit Jesus referenced in Matthew 7. In fact, in the very next passage after the "by their fruit you will recognize them" Jesus cites people who were doing many great things for the kingdom - prophesying, casting out demons, performing miracles, etc., but Jesus says, "I never knew you." Our works are not the "fruit" we are to look for from our lives. But immediately before both of those passages Jesus talks about people walking down the narrow v. wide roads to heaven and hell respectively. Which path you're leading people down is your fruit. If you lead someone down the wide road to hell, you are bearing bad fruit. If you are leading someone down the narrow path to heaven, you are bearing good fruit. It's that simple.

The danger is the implication that people doing "good things" is how we should discern the authenticity of their faith. Non-Christians can fake good all the time. There are countless non-Christians who seem like perfectly wonderful people. But the Bible is clear: "Anything that does not come from faith is sin" (Romans 14:23) and "without faith it is impossible to please God" (Hebrews 11:6).

If we assume that these people are our brothers in Christ simply because they make a verbal profession and have good fruit, yet refuse to repent of otherwise obvious sin, we may miss a critical opportunity to bring someone onto the narrow path who otherwise would have headed for destruction.

We also risk giving such people too much influence in our own lives, potentially leading our own path astray.

And by tacit approval of their sin, or otherwise simply turning a blind eye because they're otherwise good people, and allowing them into church culture, their ideologies (particularly if there are others in the church as well) start to permeate and the church becomes less about preaching truth and more about being culturally sensitive, and ultimately converted away from truth toward culture. This is not a hypothetical threat - it is an actual one that has happened already on a mass scale. This is why Paul says in 1 Cor. 5 that if someone is in unrepentant sin, we have an obligation to cast them out of our community until they either (1) stop identifying themselves as Christian, or (2) repent of their sin.

Is woman created in God's image? Let's explore.

2 upvotes · 14 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Gotcha. I've heard that argument before. It's a decent one.

308 - Prayer

2 upvotes · 13 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The best help is to read the Psalms. Put yourself in David's shoes and contemplate why David would have been so passionate about how adoration for God and His Word. Then, consider if David was in your shoes what types of Psalms he would have written and then be the one to write those Psalms - lift those up as your adoration to God.

Adoration is not about emotionally bursting with joy toward God. I actually just made a facebook post yesterday on that very concept: that Christianity is not about emotional experiences. Instead, adoration can be a resolute acknowledgment. Imagine a knight kneeling at the throne and saying, "You are my Lord and King. Long live the king! His greatness shall reign throughout the kingdom!" I don't imagine this knight skipping down the courtyard in jubilation while saying this. But it is masculine adoration all the same. And if you happen to get the emotional jubilation while adoring God, go for that too.

Misogyny is a sin?!! <https://www.russellmoore.com/2018/02/12/teach-boys-respect-women/>

2 upvotes · 13 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

These are good points. I've always taken the position that God's "changing his mind" was a statement framed that way for our benefit, not as a theological fact of God existing in a temporal stream, which would make God subject to time, which would mean that there are things or concepts which transcend God.

I often reference this concept when discussing prayer with people. Specifically, I ask people to muse on the concept of praying that God would change the past. If he does, we would have no memory of ever having prayed it, so for all we know our prayer to change the past was answered and our memory was simply adjusted to account for the fact that in the present timeline we never would have had to pray for that in the first place. If he doesn't answer the prayer, that accounts for why we remember praying it in the first place, but does not prove that God does not answer those prayers.

The reason I bring that up is because if God is both timeless and omniscient, as I believe he is, then before time began, God knew everything that ever would be, including every possible variation of how free choice would play out, including every prayer that would or would not have been said under any and every circumstance. When we do not pray, God would not have pre-creation accounted for what we would have said if we had asked, hence James saying "you do not have because you do not ask." But in every possible version of reality, God knew what we actually would pray and incorporated those prayers when setting his actual divine plan into motion.

To that end, God's understanding of what would unfold throughout eternity has been unchanging since creation and will remain unchanged throughout eternity in heaven. But at the same time, that understanding was affected by our prayers and our choices. In this, we can rest confidently in both God's sovereign predetermination of history, knowing that he knows and has determined everything that ever was and will be, but also that our individual expressions and freedoms are valid and genuine and that God "changed" his plan to account for the variables we created and proposed.

So, when God says in Scripture that he changed his mind, I read that more as him saying, "When I set eternity into motion, I knew you would say/do this and I adjusted my plan to account for your actions/requests."

And this kind of example is exactly why I say that maybe we don't (or can't) understand it fully.

My point in all of that was more to show the feminized inconsistency that Christians tend to want to explain away Satan and sin, but refuse to apply consistent logic when the same reasoning would imply that Eve was an afterthought and Adam was God's primary creation of humanity.

What is the actual danger?

2 upvotes · 13 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You're seriously trying to twist around what I'm saying just to pick a fight here.

So, they didn't have the gospel, but now they have it? (Catholics and Orthodox)

They had it. They weren't preaching it and/or modeling it because they had political gain. When that political gain started to diminish, including through the reformation, which took away a lot of the church's power, the Catholic church responded to the reformation. Over time, at the risk of losing everyone to Protestantism, the Catholic church returned to preaching the Gospel as found in Scripture (although they still have a lot of other fluff that they mix in with it).

With the exceptions of a few denominations, Protestants have, in general, completely abandoned 1800 years of tradition.

This is simply not true, although I suspect it's just a definitional difference in the word "abandoned." We don't consciously draw from those sources, but everyone down the line from Luther onward has been influenced by the tradition of the church. So, I don't consider it "abandoned" as if that 1800 year history just vanished. It's still there, it's just not something studied as authoritative.

95% can't name one Chriistian author born before 1800AD.

But the authors they can name are usually in the 5% who can. As such, the authors that people read today (Tim Keller, Andy Stanley, John Piper, etc.) are drawing from their understanding of Scripture and church tradition when communicating what they write in their books. Often times those authors will even cite the historical church figures directly.

That's like the number 1 excuse Christians give to not get involved in legal/political matters.

It's not an excuse to avoid getting involved. It's a statement of prioritization. Besides, even if it is an excuse, it's a good one.

Yet the same Christians all protested when the World tried to legalize gay marriage.

Actually, only an extremely small number protested. Many churches simply noted that it was a bad decision, but continued about their business. What you're probably misinterpreting as "protest" is the church reacting to their congregations by saying, "Just so you all know, the SCOTUS just made this decision, but that's not aligned with what the Bible says, so we're still going to go with what the Bible says." That's clarification, not protest. Only extremely few churches were holding picket signs or encouraging their members to call their representatives. Most churches understand that the government is going to do what it's going to do.

When people see that Christian monogamous society produces the best fruit (in contrast to the fruit of this secular society, or the fruit of Islamic Shariah law), would they not respect the Christian deity more?

I doubt it. I want to say yes, but the secular world often says, "You had your chance and you blew it, now it's our turn" - referencing all the corruption in the church during a patriarchal society when the church had immense political power. Sadly, I suspect that if the church had similar power again, the sinfulness of the men at the top would probably ruin it again.

The Power of RPC

2 upvotes · 12 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Now who's misquoting Scripture in jest! ;)

What is the actual danger?

2 upvotes · 12 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

REALLY? So you think corruption and indulgences (greed) is worst than female pastors, seperation of Church and State, secularism, LGBT agenda and all other forms of sexual perversion? Or a church that promotes promiscuity, using gender-neutral terms to describe God, etc?

Absolutely. All the problems in the "church" that you point to today are blessings, not curses. The fall of the church started in the early 300s when Theodosius I mandated that all people convert to Christianity. Since then, for as long as the church was under one banner and ruled by tradition there was never any way to distinguish between a true and a false believer - particularly among leadership. The ship was being steered straight to hell and it was far harder for anyone to be saved in those days because it was so rare for the genuine Gospel to be preached without someone trying to come in and manipulate it for their own political advantage.

Now, today we also have people manipulating God's Word for political advantage. But under a sola scriptura theology, we now have a means of filtering the truth from those who would manipulate it. We have the freedom and ability to tell other believers, "That's not what the Bible really says," whereas before the reformation there was no authority or ability to challenge the system when it was leading people down a false path. Moreover, when the Gospel was perverted for those many centuries this presented a true barrier to salvation - much like for many of the people who attend Joel Osteen's church today. It's almost impossible to come to saving faith when your primary goal is to utilize faith as a tool for your own selfish gain. The Gospel is lost in a church like that. But today alternatives exist, and that wasn't the case pre-reformation. If Joel Osteen was your leader back then, everybody was subject to his teachings. As such, the corruption permeated everywhere.

Then there are the other aspects of our conversation - that although many of these things are bad, they're not necessarily salvation-negating. If a church teaches the true Gospel, but also maintains a feminist culture, people can still be saved in such a place. I don't know that I can say that of the church throughout most of its AD history.

And the net society result, is that instead of a Christian society with some non-believers, we now have secular societies with some Christian believers?

True, but we always knew things were going to move in that direction anyway. That's not the fault of the reformation for taking things there - that's the fulfillment of prophecy. I do agree, however, that we do still have an obligation to keep trying to set it straight, even if we know we will ultimately fail.

re-consider our definition of "Church"

Yeah, as should be obvious by now, I don't adopt the mainstream definition.

It definitely doesn't mean we look at a completely dead walking-zombie church and convince ourselves that it's better than the past.

I see the historical church from Theodosius I through the reformation as the "dead walking-zombie" church trying to bite and infect anything it can get its hands on. I see the church today as having many dead and zombie-like parts, but that there are some parts that have been genuinely regenerated. It's like it was a zombie and a cure was implemented ... but the cure is slow to work and the virus is fighting back as culture develops new strains that the cure wasn't designed to protect against.

The Power of RPC

2 upvotes · 12 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a solid post. I loved every minute of reading it :) Of particular note:

Man embraces masculinity, women try to shake him and train him to worship femininity instead, man embraces masculinity, women embrace masculinity.

This is a solid flow chart that summarizes most red pill relationships in the first place. Excellent job making a broad concept very succinct.

What also strikes me out of this is the way that women have weaponized not only sexuality, but also the Bible itself in their effort to subjugate men and cripple the church. No other tool has been wielded so strongly as humility.

As I've written before, when I met my wife I was a natural alpha. I wasn't particularly interested in women. I was a man on a mission and I had great confidence in my ability to carry out that mission. I placed that mission above her and she knew it.

After marriage, things started changing. My testimony involves someone calling me out for pride. It was a sin I struggled with for my entire life through college. It was still in me when my wife first met me (before we were dating). The very first time her parents saw me they commented on my pride. So, what did my wife do to get me to behave the way she wanted me to? She went to pride.

As I would lead small groups in church or engage with pastors or teach classes - no matter what I did, her commentary afterward was always: "You're so prideful. No one will listen to you if they don't respect you. You need humility." Normally this would be great advice. But when she's the only person in my entire life telling me this and literally dozens of people commented on how impressed they were that I had such great biblical knowledge and yet somehow was humble about it, I'm inclined to believe she was the wrong one.\

But as I had been beta-ized over time, I bought into the lie that most men in the church are taught: "One of the best ways your wife can help you is by making you aware of your sin. She knows you better than anyone else. Listen to her when she tries to convict you." There were countless other men I've known over time who have commented on their wives always seeming to know exactly what sin they need to work on next - and they said this as if it was divine. Obviously the red pill man will look at it often note that this is not from God; rather, it's a simple case of "My husband isn't good enough for me, so I'm just going to keep nagging him about all of his faults until he changes to become the man that I want him to be."

I played into the exaggerated-humility game for quite some time - a couple years, in fact. It was during those 2 years that I had my 18 month dead bedroom and had the least impact on my mission of disciple-making than at any other point in my life since being saved.

Now I accept that not only can a woman weaponize the Bible and concepts that ring true with a character of godliness for their advantage - but that they will do so whenever it advantages them. To her credit, my wife genuinely believed she was helping me become a more godly man by asking me to be more humble. But that's only because she was looking at beta men in leadership positions and assuming that they were more godly than a confident man on a mission for Christ who had never sought lofty titles.

Are we to be humble? Yes. Does that mean we should abandon confidence to amplify our humility? Absolutely not. This post does not come off as arrogant - it seethes confidence through the cracks. Thank you, brother.

Secret Phone - Part 2

2 upvotes · 10 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

Red pill wasn't working. She went into crisis mode, which amped up her sexuality, then when she felt safe around you again she started to slide back. You need more time to work on your frame. You also need to stop caring what she thinks. Don't screw around with games about how you found her phone. Own up to it. Tell her you don't trust her, that you snooped, she got busted, and you're not screwing around with her until she gets tested ... if at all.

How Institutions Die

2 upvotes · 10 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Ah, I follow. My last church was actually entirely lay led. I was an honorary elder and helped implement a policy whereby the congregation was encouraged to subtract from their ordinary tithe (or in some people's cases all of it) and redirect it toward personal ministry, like taking their co-workers out to lunch, paying for their neighbor's car to get fixed, etc. It was a stellar success and we saw an immediate massive boom in reports of people sharing the gospel who were otherwise pew sitters and several people being saved and ultimately joining the church.

I'm fully persuaded that the pressure churches place on tithing and maintaining the institutional structure is misguided and doing a disservice to the purpose of the church. Further, with the exception of a few select individuals, most of the early church modeled a grass roots movement that would be better off even today meeting in homes through patterned discipleship rather than placing the emphasis on weekly services in a large flashy building that required substantial financial commitment to upkeep.

How Institutions Die

2 upvotes · 9 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

What you're saying only makes sense if there is no Holy Spirit guaranteeing its survival. As Gamaliel said in Acts 5 (I think), "If this is of men, it will die; if it's of God it will survive and do we really want to stand against God?"

But I believe the institutionalized church has made the same mistake Israel did - and I will be more candid in my comments here than I was in the post itself. Institutionalization is just as much sin as when Israel demanded God dethrone himself and give them a king instead (1 Samuel 9, I believe).

It's the church saying, "Sorry God, but we don't trust you because there's just too much pressure from the world ... so we're going to do what the world has proven works and trust in that strategy for running things instead."

That's a pretty unhealthy attitude. It's also the attitude that got the church into all this blue pill feminized nonsense.

I'd wager that if the church remained a grass-roots organization founded on discipleship, it would far closer reflect what Christ intended than it does today with all the politicization, bureaucracy, seminaries, etc. It's just the church following the pattern of the world rather than the pattern of discipleship Jesus gave us.

What is the actual danger?

2 upvotes · 9 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I get it, but as he already said, that's a really weak argument unless you're suggesting that feminism negates salvation. If it doesn't, then souls are still being saved, even if it's in a feminist context. The greater concern is the impact that this beta-targeting has on the mission of discipleship. That's what I'm more worried about. Fighting feminism for its own sake is only a sub-par goal if it's not connected to an eternal purpose that advances God's Kingdom in heaven.

The Feminine Imperative has replaced the Holy Spirit

2 upvotes · 9 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Someone I respect once said he saw no problem with a female pastor as long as there was a male head over her. His rationale was that she would only be a voice through which the message he wanted taught would be communicated, and therefore the teaching originates with him and he is responsible, not her, as she is merely a tool being used by the head pastor to recite things for him.

What are your thoughts on this view? I'm guessing you already know my position, but the concept still intrigues me all the same.

To add a bit more, he questioned me deeper:

1. Would it be okay if a man wrote a script to a teaching video that involved a woman as one of the characters?
2. What if instead of a video it was live performance in front of everyone ... can the girl participate then?
3. What if instead of a teaching skit he just wrote out a transcript of the sermon he wanted to deliver and had her read it word for word in front of everyone?
4. What if instead of word for word he gave her all of the main talking points and she agreed not to deviate from the teaching he laid out, but she had freedom to pick which words to use to relay those lessons?
5. What if he gave her a concept and said, "Here's what I want to teach them, now you figure out how to communicate it, then do it?"

I thought I knew where this pattern was going - to try to get me to admit something by easing me into it ... but his real point was to ask: how are you drawing the line? What verse says that one of these is okay and the other isn't? Or are you doing like the Pharisees did by making up your own arbitrary line and imposing it on others?

The Feminine Imperative has replaced the Holy Spirit

2 upvotes · 9 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good stuff ... But I will note an offset to the Matthew 7 "I never knew you" vibe you're going for here: Philippians 1 ... "It is true that some preach Christ out of envy ... [they] preach Christ out of selfish ambition, not sincerely ... But what does it matter? The important thing is that in every way Christ is preached, whether from false motives or true. And because of this I rejoice."

I'm not saying she is preaching Christ. She might be preaching a false gospel entirely. I don't know. But I'm not quick to condemn ministries that Paul may have rejoiced at.

The Feminine Imperative has replaced the Holy Spirit

2 upvotes · 9 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good ol Charles Blondin.

The Feminine Imperative has replaced the Holy Spirit

2 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I've used a similar definition, but without the "until death" part. I do believe that people can callous their hearts during life to a degree that repentance becomes impossible for them or, as in the case of Pharaoh (who hardened his own heart several times first) where God finally seals his hardness.

Does theology triumph over biology?

2 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Without any context, I interpret it as a statement that Theology > Science, which is the core of my theology/praxeology/philosophy post from last week. In a recent article I wrote elsewhere, I changed "praxeology" to "science" more generally (as I presume a praxeology is a subset of science that focuses on human behavior).

To that end, whatever science may say about how the world operates - even on matters of sexuality - if the Bible says otherwise, then we go with what the Bible says. Why? Because science comes with the presupposition that all things must fit into a scientific framework, which we know biblically is not true (i.e. that God can and does operate outside of science). Also, because science is experimenting on a fallen world, and thus cannot dictate matters of morality.

For example, if science comes out and finds a genetic code that proves homosexuality is a genetic condition, do we suddenly say, "Okay, science just proved it, so it must not be sin!"? No. We understand that the fall of man affected every aspect of life, including human biology. Just as psychological issues can cause physical consequences and physical conditions can cause psychological issues, so also can spiritual issues affect a person's physical body and their psychology, and in the same way psychology and our physical bodies can affect our spirit. They're all interconnected.

So, when science studies biology, it is studying something that is different from God's intended design, which we can otherwise discern through theology. If science determines that humans are inherently sexual creatures, theology agrees and that's what matters. If science determines that homosexuality is a biological issue, theology would say, "That's fine, but acting on those impulses is still sin."

Of course, if you gave more context, maybe Piper is really trying to say something more detrimental to masculinity.

Why the Church is Dead

2 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

group therapy sessions....

Or the polarized opposite: highly rigid, over-structuralized curriculum-oriented sessions that defy any actual unity or bonding. Churches follow both extremes, rarely finding a proper balance. That's the subject of an eventual 300 post. I've just been too lazy to go there.

Why the Church is Dead

2 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

As I wrote to ReddJive, there are two aspects to this:

1. Abandoning the institutionalized church doesn't violate Hebrews 10:24-25 if you continue to maintain a relational network with other believers, who become your koinonia that fits into the larger ekklesia.
2. But we should still participate in an institutionalized congregation because it's a tool that we can use for the greater purposes God has given us.

I have no problem saying, "I use my church. It's little more than a tool to me." I'd tell my pastor that to his face (and probably will when I meet with him next week). When the institutionalized church has abandoned God's purposes (discipleship) in exchange for programs and cookie-cutter processes, then I have no choice but to reject their underlying motives as having any value and must, instead, utilize the resources they have available to advance what I believe God has truly called us toward. A lot of this involves going "under cover" to earn the influence necessary to enact a lasting change - whether on an institutional level (i.e. the leadership adopts a new direction) or an individual level (i.e. leading specific people in the church down the right path).

The most valuable resource that institutionalized congregations offer us is its skill in amassing people. If I tried to go out on the streets today and get people to follow what I have to teach, I'd probably fall flat on my face. Either that or it would take significant time (probably a decade) to reach more than a couple hundred people. But if I enter an institution that already has 500+ people (as my church does), they have already done the leg work for me of getting those people together who want to learn and are interested in hearing the truth of what the Bible preaches. The next step is simply for me to earn enough influence within that crowd of people to start reorienting the directive.

From there, my view tends to differ from that of /u/Whitified and my pseudo-affiliated organization: The Navigators. They believe that the best way to change the culture is to earn influence with the leaders, steering the ship from the top down. I believe that Jesus modeled a different path, earning influence among the people, directing the people to the point where the leaders have no choice but to follow.

Why do I take this approach? Mainly because it's what Jesus did. But also because the leaders are the ones who have a motive to appease the feminist imperative in the first place. They stand to benefit from the cultural reputation boost in being an "open-minded" church. That's how they get people in the door and warming the seats. But the people themselves are far better off if they reject this imperative and live as God intended. So ... should we attempt to "convert" the people who stand to lose a lot if they convert, or should we "convert" the people who stand to gain from such conversion?

It's the same with the Pharisees. If the Pharisees converted to doing things Christ's way, they would have lost all of their power and influence in the culture. But the people themselves had nothing to lose. So, Jesus skipped the Pharisees, accepting that he could never change them all en masse (with few limited exceptions, like Nicodemus), and went instead to the people.

But to be clear, I reject online forums as a legitimate means of satisfying Hebrews 10:24-26. I just haven't fully fleshed out my reasons yet.

Why the Church is Dead

2 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I think it is important to make this critical distinction.

Hah ... after just writing a couple other comments refraining this idea, I see you already beat me to it. Word studies on koinonia and ekklesia (both words for "church" or "fellowship of believers" in the NT) should be very illuminating on the subject.

It's also worth noting that our modern word "church" was not derived from either ekklesia or koinonia; rather, it came from the old english circe (pronounced kirke; also kirk in Scotland and kirche in Germany). These words all pertain to a place of worship as opposed to the people.

The Greek ekklesia was a military term for "a purposed gathering," like when officers would meet together to strategize a plan for battle. It was adopted by the Jews when developing the synagogue structure of secret meetings meant to preserve the old testament Scripture while in Babylonian captivity. It had nothing to do with an institution and everything to do with the purpose for why people were getting together. A "meeting" was not an ekklesia. A strategy session was. Today, the church has no purpose.

More to the point, koinonia is often translated as "fellowship," but has a much, much deeper context, per my 103 post. It literally references a "one in spirit" bond. Once again, a Sunday meeting does not foster this. Most churches try to institute small groups to facilitate this, but as long as the focus is on the curriculum/program, it will not meet the requirements of a (1) "one in spirit" bond (koinonia) because the unity of spirit is not being fostered, or (2) a "purposed gathering" (ekklesia) because in the absence of a unified spirit, content cannot be redirected toward a common purpose.

So, where the institutionalized church would argue back that small groups are meant to satisfy the ekklesia and koinonia functions of the church, I have yet to see one that actually does. This is predominantly because to allow such sentiments to foster among the people would be to deprive the institution of its power.

Why the Church is Dead

2 upvotes · 8 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

No, this sub continues to reference sex before marriage as sin. None of us take the viewpoint that it's an unforgiveable sin that condemns a person to hell with no chance for repentance ... but it is sin, nonetheless.

What Rollo was referencing, I believe, is simply the fact that this is what the church teaches and that this teaching has had a negative impact on masculinity. But that negative impact is not by virtue of God's design. That is, it's not the law against premarital sex that causes men to become beta. It is the cultural condition that causes men to believe that they must become beta in order to get married in order to have legitimate, non-sinful sex.

If culture functioned as God intended it, and as it actually did function for roughly 5,800 years, a man would not need to become beta to get married and have sex. Again, it's not the biblical concept that is at the core of the problem - it's the feminized culture.

An anatomy of butthurt and the impact on frame

2 upvotes · 7 February 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I didn't see starting the car on this list. I'm not playing dumb. I'm simply getting at the conclusion that there is no universal list. My wife gets a kick out of using a chainsaw and I love cooking. Are you suggesting I forbid her from doing yard work that I hate doing so that she can cook which she hates doing ... just to appease your arbitrary list? Screw that.

An anatomy of butthurt and the impact on frame

2 upvotes · 7 February 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I never saw autistic as being a reference to someone's emotional state ... more an inability to comprehend and apply basic social concepts.

An anatomy of butthurt and the impact on frame

2 upvotes · 7 February 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Where's your list on which jobs are a man's job and which are a woman's? I'd love to read it.

TLDR: withdrawing time & attention, the last ditch, roommate, not wife

2 upvotes · 6 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It sounds like you've gone through Matthew 18 already and she's rejected repentance as an option. So, you're to treat her as an unbeliever. If she leaves you, 1 Cor. 7 gives you the freedom to let her go.

Until then, you also are compelled by 1 Cor. 7 to live as if you had no wife. Go read 110 and my post from yesterday on Mission (210 I think). Just ignore her and do what God put you here for. After all, now that you appropriately realize your marriage isn't your purpose in life, it's time to get going on what you were really here for all along anyway.

In pursuing your mission, you should be allocating all of your resources toward matters that advance that mission. As you've appropriately done, cut her off because she's holding you back - but even more. You've lopped off some basic luxuries she wanted to spend money on, but now you're going to take it even further. Buy steaks to make for yourself and the kids, but leave broccoli and carrots in the fridge for her. Buy a separate fridge and padlock it if you have to. Take the keys to her car and tell her she can save up for her own car and ride a bike to work in the meantime. If her work is too far, too bad ... she can get another job in biking distance. You're not doing her any favors anymore to help her get her life in gear. It's on her head now. Seriously cut her off.

To be clear, this is Romans 1. It's God cutting off his blessings so that his people who have rejected him as a groom can wallow in the consequences of their own sinfulness. I'd like to say that this eventually kicks people into gear - to shape up and start following God when they realize how bad it gets. But the fact is that most people end up in the "depraved mind" category. Whether you want to say they "lost their salvation" or were never saved to begin with, I don't care. The bottom line is that they're not part of Christ's bride at that point. They have walked away. If she gets to that point, so be it.

Self-Righteousness, Pietism and RP

2 upvotes · 6 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

And therein lies the first rule: she needs you less, so she has all the power. The thing is ... you actually need her much less, you just don't realize it yet.

To be clear, my wife was the same way. She also never had a single sexual fantasy and was totally non sexual until she married me at 23. My wife had serious psychological hangups about sex due to butt tons of negative conditioning growing up. But it does get better. There is hope.

Self-Righteousness, Pietism and RP

2 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

My usual MO would have been to give her my phone let her look at the pictures, and explain who each person is and how there's nothing going on and that she has nothing to worry about.

This is actually brilliant with one quick modification. Instead of explaining how there's nothing going on you explain how you're screwing each one of them.

"That's Cindy. I banged her on the copy machine last week. Oh, and that one's Kristen. I had trouble getting in her panties, but once she opened up she was like an animal. And this one's Linda, but she's too prude to do it anywhere other than in our bed, so I've only been with her a couple times."

She'll know you're teasing her. If you really were cheating you obviously wouldn't be telling her all about it. And although she'll think it's sinful teasing it will (1) communicate how dull she really is in the sack, (2) communicate what you think would be fun, and (3) trigger healthy dread that's rooted in an appreciation of your social environment and not in smoke and shadows that you were trying to concoct.

I just dug in didn't know much of what else to do besides get out of her frame and hold my position.

Ah, but that's the thing ... supplicating is only one way to get in a woman's frame. Getting butt-hurt is the other. It shows her that she has the power to cause an emotional reaction out of you.

Remember this: women crave emotional control over their man. This is their curse. Any emotion is better than no emotion. Supplicating is good emotion. It gives her all the warm, fuzzy feels that you're committed to her and will keep providing those beta comforts undisturbed. But if you're not going to supplicate, then getting angry/frustrated/mad/visibly upset/etc. is the next best thing - because it shows that she can still get a rise out of you, and that's still a form of power.

If you just sit there and laugh off her antics with one joke after the next, then she will know she can't control you. That's how you stay out of her frame and maintain your own. When she realizes how much fun you're having in life and how miserable she is when she can't control you ... that's when she finally comes around to the conclusion: "Maybe doing things his way will be more fun, and I can have as much fun as he seems to be having."

Now, you're probably thinking: "But my wife doesn't want to have fun. Having fun is a sin. We're supposed to deny ourselves all the time. So, why would she ever want to enter the frame of a man who enjoys life?"

BECAUSE YOU'RE LIVING OUT YOUR FRICKING MISSION AND SHE SEES THE FRUIT.

How many times do I have to refrain it on this sub?!?!?! MISSION FIRST. Nothing else matters. Get that down and everything else follows.

There is no "Christian version" of anything

2 upvotes · 5 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I feel very betrayed.

That sucks. But I'm guessing you misunderstood what I was saying.

basically everything you've taught me, and most of the material here has been the Christian spin-off of many secular RP counsels

No, the point of this entire post is that it's the reverse. When I first became RP aware, I didn't think to myself, "I wish there were a Christian version of this." I thought: "They're just telling people what the Bible already says. They're ripping off the Bible and taking credit for it."

I've said it countless times here: secular RP is self-described as "men swapping notes," but RPC has a textbook written by the Teacher. Where do you think those secular notes come from? They're copying material put in place by the Creator. RPC is the original; TRP/MRP is the copy. But RPC was created later simply because prior similar church movements have never been able to gain traction in an increasingly feminized church, where there are actual spiritual authorities to contend with who tend to want to shut it down - whether on a congregational or denominational level. The secular crowd doesn't have an authority who can shut them down. I felt no concern starting RPC because I've always been comfortable working outside the church in the first place - and ultimately to transform the church.

Specifically, I hold that there are 6 contexts in which we can engage in a mission with respect to the church:

- Despite the Church: This is when the church is directly opposed to what you're doing and you find no support;

so you must leave the church to pursue your mission

- Outside the Church: The church isn't opposed to what you're doing, but they won't endorse or support it and they won't allow it in their walls, so you've got to do it on your own separately while otherwise continuing to attend.
- Within the Church: The church isn't opposed, but they won't endorse/support it, but they don't object to your engaging with its members toward your mission.
- Utilizing the Church: The church isn't opposed, but they won't endorse/support, but their existing independent functions offer a useful opportunity to work toward your purpose in tandem with them working toward theirs.
- Transforming the Church: The church thinks what you're doing is good and they're willing to learn from you and adopt your mission as part of their vision for the entire congregation (i.e. not just "cool idea, go start a ministry for whoever wants to join).
- Alongside the Church: The church is already on board with your mission and have adopted it in their vision and you're supply spurring one another on.

I usually use these 6 types when imparting the vision of disciple-making on men so that they know how to hone their disciple-making efforts in the most productive way. But the same is true of RPC. Originally the things I was doing were in the "despite" category - my church would have been directly opposed to the things I say here. After conversations with my pastor, he now sees value in it, but can't endorse it because it is not culturally appealing, thus would push people away. Sure, you may say, "That's a weak pastor - go find a better church" ... but let's be honest, how many pastors are willing to reject feminism and embrace biblical manhood? So, I functioned outside the church for a short time until others in the church read some of my Facebook posts (which is a lot of terminology-shifted content from RPC) and those within the church wanted in. So, I started working within the church - and then I saw opportunities to engage in men's groups and teaching classes, which have allowed me to work alongside my church. They're still not at the "transform" point yet, and that's the hardest step - it might be years before that hurdle is crossed.

But my point in all of this is that RPC came first because the Bible and divine revelation and the order of creation and the fall all preceded TRP/MRP. The fact that the secular crowd started an online chat forum to talk about what they observed in the created order of things (as adjusted by the fall) doesn't mean that they somehow came first.

A glib "i apologize if in the history of this sub I have done that by mistake and ignorance" doesn't quite accept culpability. YOU HAVE BEEN DOING THIS SINCE DAY 1.

No, I was referencing the scant few times where I talked about a purely secular concept that had nothing to do within how God created the world or how the fall affected it ... and yet somehow I called it a biblical concept. Off the top of my head, I can't think of any examples where I have done this, so I left it as a general apology in case someone does find something. But the overwhelming majority of the content on this sub is stuff that I believe originated with God, not TRP/MRP. The fact that I adopted their terminology is simply to help reach an audience who already had a lingo to work with. This is no different than a missionary translating the Bible into a new language - he's trying to figure out how to communicate a message from God in terms that a particular community will understand.

And let me be clear: this is also why I wrote my other post on the balance of theology and praxeology. Theology is discovering divine truth through divine revelation. Praxeology, when it is accurate, is discovering divine truth through exploring the functionality of creation - which is also from God, even in the context of the fall, if He is sovereign (as I hope we all agree he is). So, the only room for secular concepts to make their way in here are when they are inaccurate representations of praxeological truths and yet somehow we (or I) have been duped into believing they have merit, and have ex post facto added Scripture to them.

concepts such as spinning plates and OYS that apply to RP do apply to church behavior, just perhaps whitewashed in new language and applied less bluntly. It's not what we'd prefer, and definitely not what we're told growing up. It is, however, the way things are, regrettably.

But if these things are praxeologically true, then they originate with Christ, through whom all things were created. First, both "spinning plates" and "OYS" are things that are directly referenced in Scripture, albeit by different names. So, when we adopt them as Christians, we are not "whitewashing" a secular thing - we are rejecting the secular thing and looking at what Scripture says, which is why "spinning plates" in RPC looks very different from secular plate-spinning, despite having the same core operative principles beneath them.

More to the point, because we will only find examples of these things happening in Scripture, we can't on that basis alone conclude that it is good or healthy. Instead, we must accept that as a praxeological matter, if God is sovereign and this is how the world functions - both within the church and without - and that this is what is necessary to make a marriage work toward God's purposes, then it must have originated with God's intent, even if only as a "next best alternative" response to being in a broken world. A more commonly known and accepted version is the allowance of divorce. God's original design didn't account for this, but as a praxeological truth, God knew that forcing people to remain married would cause even more problems than allowing for divorce, so he allowed it. In the same way, "spinning plates" might not be God's perfect ideal, but if that is what is necessary to avoid the greater harm of living in a broken marriage that stifles spiritual productivity, then I accept that the "next best alternative" comes from God as well - while also remembering the whole host of mutual benefit that comes with these concepts, and not just the selfish ego-boost that women, feminists, betas, and white knights would like to highlight as if it's the only relevant part of the conversation.

If what you are saying, that even these considerations about practicality are irrelevant to the true kingdom of God

To be more concise, I'm saying the opposite: That praxeology, although secondary to theology, is still an accurate measure of what God intended if one maintains appropriate spiritual priorities.

The reason secular RP goes way off course is because they prioritize sex over the calling to make disciples, or even their own eternal fate. This misguided set of priorities allows them to skew their application of praxeological concepts. If praxeology is taken in the context of eternity, as it is meant to be, then we learn that praxeological truths make a lot more sense. That is why I repeatedly distinguish on this sub between descriptive and prescriptive aspects of RP. This should also address your last two paragraphs.

The value of application

2 upvotes · 3 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Touche

Need some advice on how to respond to this comfort test

2 upvotes · 2 February 2018 · /r/askMRP

Pressure flipping is probably the best option here. Get her talking about why she has this concern. That said, I'm not always processing the "best" response immediately, so the two times my wife has done this in the last six months, instead of thinking to pressure-flip I gave the following two responses:

- "Oh, you weren't supposed to see me stabbing those needles into my eyeballs the other day."
- "If I'm unhappy with you, you'll know it."

- She responds: "I feel like I do know it."
- I answer: "Oh, this is going to be real fun when I really am unhappy with you then."
- She punches my arm for teasing her, but still smiles.

Your proposed response comes off as super butt-hurt about something.

There is no "Christian version" of anything

2 upvotes · 2 February 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Or you're a Wesleyan who believes God makes decisions based on foreknowledge.

Or you're a compatibilist who goes with some mix.

I have no doubt good would have liked for everyone to be on board. But I get the impression that they had lost their chance before the ark was even finished being built. The ark isn't symbolic of Jesus's. It's judgment day.

The interplay between theology, praxeology, and philosophy on human behavior

2 upvotes · 30 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I don't, as my ongoing effort to build up this sub demonstrates. That said, many guys come over here with a psychological dependence on the approval of the rest of the manosphere. If someone on MRP starts calling them names and tells them to get their butt in gear, that has an impact on them - especially if they're weak in faith and that secular MRPer is telling them to do something contrary to the faith. They just might be persuaded to give in so that they can earn the approval of their fellow men.

When people come here, there needs to be something distilling that concept. They need to know that RP is not about doing whatever the MRPers or TRPers are telling you to do. It's about embracing the truth and letting that guide your decision-making processes. If I don't write things every now and then that makes this clear, new guys to the sub will never feel free to embrace what we're professing under God's Word.

The interplay between theology, praxeology, and philosophy on human behavior

2 upvotes · 30 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed, indeed. This is my conclusion as well. Of course, this gets us heat with the secular crowd who says, "No, you must endorse our prescribed behaviors as well."

To their credit, I think I understand their rationale. They believe: "If you truly understood red pill praxeology the way we do, you would agree with us about the best course of action necessary to take." And in their frame of understanding, they're right. The key is to remember that "best" implies a directive. That "directive" for the secular crowd is enhancing sexuality.

To that end, I fully embrace every aspect of the secular RP view, including the prescriptive behaviors, as being the most effective method for optimizing human sexuality. But the "best course of action" for me isn't pointing toward optimizing sexuality alone; it is pointed toward maximizing my sexual experience without compromising my higher priorities, which I derive from theological conclusions, which in my understanding of "truth" or "Truth" will always trump praxeological conclusions.

More to the point: I believe that if every one of the secular RPers, no matter how hard core, embraced the truth of Christ as expressed in the Bible, virtually all of them would agree that the whole picture of the truth changes things and eternal consequences should factor into our sexual strategy.

After all, this is why MRP exists on a much, much, much smaller scale, right? As W&S once told me (paraphrasing): "It's not that we at MRP are pro-marriage. We're still anti-marriage, just like TRP. But we're simply against all the bad things that can happen to a man if he gets divorced." So, RP prescribed praxeology had to change from TRP methods to account for this new purpose that TRP otherwise ignored: avoiding the pains of divorce. In very crude terms, RPC is now doing the same thing: adjusting the application of RP knowledge and praxeology to account for a new purpose that MRP otherwise ignores: avoiding the pains of hell (among countless other purposes we derive from biblical theology).

I'd be most intrigued to hear /u/BluepillProfessor's thoughts on this, as he was part of the transition from TRP to MRP, and now has been overseeing the birth of RPC as well.

How Can I Bring My Girlfriend to a Relationship with Jesus?

2 upvotes · 30 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, well that sucks. God-speed in your recovery!

And yeah, I'm mostly on board with compatibilism, with a few minor exceptions :) I reach a similar conclusion, but on completely different grounds.

How Can I Bring My Girlfriend to a Relationship with Jesus?

2 upvotes · 30 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Do you know how many men have said and felt exactly the way you do, only to find out from the horse's mouth and/or clear evidence that they were banging another man like rabbits?

---> This guy! <---

This is dangerously close to the worst stereotypes of beta behavior. White Knights rushing in to save a "broken" woman.

Nail ... meet head.

How should one phrase to a woman that they don't want to have premarital sex, however, you still want to pursue the relationship?

2 upvotes · 29 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Ah, that makes sense. Although I don't disagree about the underlying compulsions, I do believe Christian women exist who are overtly desirous about sex while also having remained pure to a point. That is, some women remain pure until they meet the right guy. If OP is that guy, he might genuinely be the first one she might have been willing to give it up to.

It might also be her way of trying to lock him down - by weaponizing sex as a means of forcing him to propose under spiritual pretense: "We've already been one flesh, if we don't get married now that would make everything we're doing sinful."

Or it could just be that she's never met a guy who has aroused her enough to even spark this type of sexual desire in the first place, specifically to the point of being willing to overstep her spiritual bounds and OP is the first.

It could also just be that OP is interpreting her behavior as sexual interest when, in fact, she's just being more generally flirtatious.

Or maybe OP can handle more in the way of physical contact without crossing a line than she can, so once her line is crossed she's horny and just wants it, but OP has been the initiator all along, never passing the point of his own control ... and no other guy has initiated with her past one of her boundaries before.

I guess my point is that there are several scenarios where OP's situation might make sense and her still be a virgin, but without discrediting the fact of her female compulsions, hypergamy, etc.

All of that said, I do also agree with you that if she is trying to tempt him to go further sexually, "she is acting very unlike a Christian woman."

How should one phrase to a woman that they don't want to have premarital sex, however, you still want to pursue the relationship?

2 upvotes · 29 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

True, true.

you /him are asking her to contract now for later. thats what my issue here is.

Well, he's not making a contractual expectation on her overtly. He's simply saying that between now and marriage he has a boundary of no-sex that he will not cross.

Yes, there is a presumption that he expects her to be totally horny for him post-marriage, but that's not a condition of his boundary, thus it's not a contract. If he covertly maintains this expectation anyway, that's a covert contract he'll have to abolish. But it should be a characteristic about her he should suss out anyway.

If she's hot for him now, and he keeps her dangling, there's no reason to believe she will lose interest purely because of the marriage itself. Most loss of interest post-marriage is the result of changed behavior patterns once the commitment is solidified by vows and protected by divorce laws.

he wants her to be a virgin in some sense - then I can tell you with near certainty she isnt.

What makes you say that?

How should one phrase to a woman that they don't want to have premarital sex, however, you still want to pursue the relationship?

2 upvotes · 29 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Ah, I see what you're saying now. The context of OP's question made it seem like she wanted to have sex with him right now and he was trying to find a way to say, "Sorry, but not until marriage."

If we enter with the presumption that she has been jaded by the church against all thoughts of sexuality (as was the case with my wife - and to an abnormally extreme degree), then yes, a totally different conversation needs to happen. I'm not sure why, in that case, OP would be worried about this conversation because he already would know she'd be enthusiastic at the opportunity of avoiding the "dirty evils of human sexuality" for another few years.

Tag: /u/akohlan198

Christian dating: Good book 2 read together?

2 upvotes · 28 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Unfortunately, I'm not aware of any red Christian books. There are some that are purple at best.

Complementarianism usually is applied as purple, but something on this list might help:

<https://www.9marks.org/article/a-brief-history-of-complementarian-literature/>.

Just be ready to lead her away from any purple or blue ideas that may be expressed in anything you recommend. Even MMSLP has very purple tendencies. If she trusts a book author more than you, there's a problem.

Rollo Tomassi – The 21 Convnetion Talks

2 upvotes · 26 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I very much enjoyed the interview I saw with you from that convention. I'm looking forward to diving into the full talk as well!

Given your prior misgivings about the 21 Convention, what % of the content available would you endorse v. reject as being "too purple"? Or does the site itself label different videos as "red" or "purple" so someone can figure out for themselves what to give the most attention to and which they can ignore?

Hypergamy in the Bible (Song of Songs)?

2 upvotes · 25 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Not necessarily to disagree, but for the sake of undersatnding: how do each of them demonstrate hypergamy?

My gut reaction is to say that Abigail wasn't trying to up her position, she was defending her rauckus husband and intended to remain faithful, and even after he died it wasn't until David approached her that she acted on it.

Similarly, Bathsheba doesn't show any interest in leaving Uriah for David. Rather, I get the impression that she would have preferred to stay with her husband, but only went to David after her husband was dead (albeit by more nefarious means than in Abigail's story).

Thoughts?

FR: Crawling back to RP after some struggles, wife kicks me while I am down.

2 upvotes · 25 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's the point ;)

Hypergamy in the Bible (Song of Songs)?

2 upvotes · 25 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Could be ... haven't watched the video. But what you described isn't even remotely present in the text at all. So it leads me to think they're doing a lot of "reading between the lines" or just making it up as they go, rather than taking the scripture at face value.

Having my mother NOT come out for the birth of our child due to the way my wife treats my mother?

2 upvotes · 24 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

I agree fully. I was just noting that it's easy to convert passive aggressiveness into active aggressiveness.

Random RP Thoughts!

2 upvotes · 24 January 2018 · /r/RedPillWives

Yeah, that's mostly TRP. MRP is better, but still not perfect. If you can handle spiritual conversation r/RPChristians is probably more aligned with the mutual appreciation you have in mind.

Having my mother NOT come out for the birth of our child due to the way my wife treats my mother?

2 upvotes · 24 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

The aftercare is a legit thing. My wife's been through a couple c-sections and is given a severe weight-lifting restriction. When you have other kids running around the house that you can't pick, it's a serious problem when the guy's off at work all day. The problem isn't her need for help, it's that OP is letting his wife dictate what help she wants and why and on her terms and the only option he sees to take the reigns back is extremely passive-aggressive (no to mention the subliminal context others have already commented on as well).

Having my mother NOT come out for the birth of our child due to the way my wife treats my mother?

2 upvotes · 24 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

Good answer. But it's only passive-aggressive if he doesn't tell his wife why he's not inviting his mom over.

Question about dating - denominational question - (22 y/o male)

2 upvotes · 24 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Methodists do have the traditional aspects to them, but they are also on the more theologically liberal end of the spectrum. Not as bad as Episcopalian though.

403 - The Lens Part 1: The Hopeless Cycle

2 upvotes · 24 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed. That's the exact reason Paul wrote Galatians 3:3 :) Glad to hear this is helping. I'm looking forward to putting up part 2 soon.

Question about dating - denominational question - (22 y/o male)

2 upvotes · 24 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

As already noted, the Catholic and orthodox varieties certainly have a very restrictive view on sexuality. This is predominantly from tradition and only marginally from scriptural interpretation. Or to put it another way, their views cannot stand on scripture alone, though there are passages that may allude to their views.

Among protestants, some varieties of Southern Baptist are very prude, known for things like prohibiting high schoolers from going to prom because people dance at prom and dancing leads to sex, which is generally viewed as taboo. To be fair, not all Southern Baptists are like this.

In addition to the above three, Lutherans and the Amish reject most forms of birth control.

As for everyone else, there's no standard view from one to the next on sexuality. Individual pastors tend to set the stage for their own congregation's views.

Filtering RP through a Christian Worldview

2 upvotes · 23 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good thoughts here. Let me clarify a few things:

Spinning Plates: For the most part, I don't recommend this to people. I only note that it can be done under limited circumstances without sin. As /u/Whitified noted, this isn't part of the descriptive aspects of RP, it's among the prescriptive aspects. When RP delves into the realm of prescribing life behavior, it steals away from the "you do you" attitude into trying to create uniformity - forcing men to adopt the same frame rather than creating one of their own. This is dangerous to do on an institutional level if not done with extreme caution. From the secular RP subs, I simply don't see that appropriate level of caution - it's communicated recklessly.

I did write a post recently on spinning plates. The point isn't to provoke interest in other women intentionally. It's the fact that when you're a high value man, you're going to develop plates that spin themselves. Even common daily interactions like saying hi and smiling at someone can be enough of a flick to get the plate spinning and she just keeps herself going on her own inertia after that - and that there's nothing wrong with this as long as you maintain appropriate boundaries and an up-front attitude of those boundaries. In essence, "plates" are simply the male version of "orbiters" for women. My wife has orbiters. I know countless other Christian women - married and single - who have orbiters as well. It's just a fact of life. We don't have an obligation to shut down every orbiter/plate that comes our way. Rather, as believers we have an obligation to engage others with kindness, patience, respect, grace, mercy, love, etc., but also with a firm representation of the truth, including of our own boundaries.

ONEitis: ONEitis isn't about singular affection; it's about singular obsession. It really stems from a conflict between the sniper mentality and the shotgun mentality. The sniper mentality is the guy who perches himself on the sidelines waiting for the perfect opportunity to take his one shot at a singular target. The shotgun mentality involves the fact that buckshot spreads everywhere in a short reach. It takes no patience or precision - it's just a matter of going out and doing your thing.

To that end, what you're really confusing in both of your question topics is the difference between the "finding sex" mentality and the "improving sexuality" mentality. When finding a sexual partner (which in a Christian context means someone to marry) the shotgun method is without question the absolute best to go by. The sniper mentality simply does not work and typically results in significant disappointment and the infusion of many beta traits that become self-incapacitating as to one's own goals.

Once married, you're not in "finding sex" mode, you're in "enhancing sexuality." In this context, the shotgun mentality is still the best approach, but from a totally different angle. You're not firing off your buckshot bag a new bird out in the field. You're displaying how powerful your shotgun is because that power makes your wife wet.

Now, the anticipated objection is that sniper rifles should be impressive to your wife too. That's fine if you're shooting at someone else, but good luck hitting your target ... your wife will get bored with the wait and not believe you'll ever bag the bird - especially since you don't intend to anyway. In reality, with the sniper mentality in this context, you're aiming the gun at your wife, and that's not sexy. That makes her want to run and hide.

To be clear, I'm not suggesting you actively seek orbiters with the shotgun mentality. I'm suggesting that you put a shotgun on your mantle instead of a sniper rifle, and that when you're polishing that tool (i.e. going to the gym, OYS, etc.) you do it openly rather than feeling like you have to hide yourself away.

To that end, I like it when my wife struts around the mall with me showing off her cleavage. Sure, she's got a shotgun there too, and when she wears her yoga pants to the gym, she's polishing her shotgun in front of everyone - and I prefer this over her (1) not taking care of her shotgun or (2) hiding herself beneath baggy clothes.

Long story short, if you make your wife your target, you do both her and yourself a disservice. Show affection, yes, but not as a shooting strategy. Do it because you want to, not because you need to.

I'd also challenge the concept of not showing affection to other women. Don't be romantic with other women, but you can certainly be kind, patient, gracious, merciful, a servant, etc. - and you should do these things intentionally. The church today grossly limits a man's ability to be Christ-like toward others when it tells men that they should ignore Christ-likeness in order to take on extra caution to preserve purity in their marriages. The Pharisees did the same thing - they added extra rules and laws to be extra sure they didn't fall into sin ... and Jesus condemned them for it. So when the church implies that we should avoid ever talking to other women because it might possibly lead to temptation ... well that's just nonsense and we don't see Jesus or the apostles doing this. We see Paul saying men should work alongside the women who contend for the Gospel (Philippians 4:2-3).

I have no desire for my wife. I cheated. What is the end-game?

2 upvotes · 22 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

Good anecdote. Would you argue that everyone else's experience will mirror your own? Or even a majority would if people gave up plate spinning in favor of monogamy?

I have no desire for my wife. I cheated. What is the end-game?

2 upvotes · 22 January 2018 · /r/askMRP

See my above response

Sandcastles and Dust to Dust

2 upvotes · 19 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a good word - especially that last line. Especially for Christians, life has no end. So, if we were looking to some big finale as our defining moment, we're going to be disappointed for all eternity. This is expounded even further when considering even something like sanctification during this life, which won't ever be made complete, but the process of improvement and betterment is crucial all the same.

Thanks for sharing this!

A few questions for you "RP" hotshots

2 upvotes · 19 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent post. A great reminder of things that often are implied, but left unsaid. Thanks for this, brother.

Blood sacrifice? Really?

2 upvotes · 11 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Sounds about right. I suppose my continuation to embrace Catholicism here is because "the average modern post-Vatican II Catholic who doesn't know, and frankly hasn't been taught or required to know, the historic and dogmatic positions of the RCC in this area" is the overwhelming majority of Catholics ... and I don't want to reject people on the grounds that they identify in name with something, but would very likely reject that name if they knew all it entailed. To that end, these types of things are part of why my church is something like 74% ex-Catholic. For many of them, I hear, "Once I heard what Catholicism actually teaches, I ran the other way." But, like Mormons, the Catholic church often hides some of its "less friendly" views to get people in the door and only springs it on them when they feel like those people are already hooked and reeled in.

Help I'm stuck in betabucks purgatory

2 upvotes · 11 January 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I would have responded, but it was already removed.

Blood sacrifice? Really?

2 upvotes · 9 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I assumed Catholics were here too. Maybe catholic isn't considered christian to some people.

Catholics are certainly welcome here. I use the standard of the Nicene Creed. It's not a perfect standard, but it's a simple and definitive one. All Catholics affirm the Nicene Creed, so I assume they're "Christian" for purposes of self-identification (again, where a person's heart actually is - that's a different question). A Mormon, for example, could not pass that test and would not be allowed to self-identify as Christian because they deny the Nicene Creed.

I overcame it about 3 years ago

This is the most encouraging part of your story :) I have a lot to say about this process and, unfortunately, have simply become too busy to keep putting out 400-level content, which is where most of this will be addressed. But as I see men posting about their deeper struggles like this, I'm renewed in my conviction that I do need to return to this soon.

I didn't even know that "catholic guilt" was a thing ! Wow. I just read about it online. That sums it up for me.

And it's not just Catholics. Many/most Protestant denominations lead to something similar, though Catholics are uniquely notorious for this. My wife was an extreme sexual prude for a long, long time due to guilt from religious upbringing. She often told me in arguments about sex, "My parents only ever taught me two things about sex: if you're not married it's evil, and it hurts a lot. For almost 20 years that's all I was told about sex from my parents or my church. It's hard to get past that." She was never Catholic - that was coming out of Protestantism. So, we have it too. As I noted in another comment above, every denomination can be reamed for a myriad of flaws - maybe not always in what they believe, but in how they apply what they believe.

Amazing grace has a line in it about being a wretch like me. Why? It wasn't until I cultivated my own personal power and stop giving all my power away to the priest that I finally felt great.

The theological statement is an accurate and good one, but has little to no practical value in the context you were formerly trying to apply it. The truth is that apart from Christ we are filthy, wretched sinners. We are awful people. There is nothing good in us. Genesis 6 describes this saying, "Every inclination of the thoughts of man's heart was only evil all of the time." When Romans says that Jesus sets us free, it's not a freedom to do whatever we want; it's a freedom to do good. Before Jesus the only option is evil. As Romans 14 says, "Anything that does not come from faith is sin." But through Christ we now have the ability to choose good over evil, whereas our "good works" before Christ were always tainted with impure motives.

I suppose that's a long way of saying that God wants you to be empowered to make the right decisions yourself. If you ever do something because you have to, you're not doing it for the right motive and it's probably still sin anyway, even if it causes a positive result in the world. As /u/Whitified noted: don't let anyone be an absolute authority over what you believe or what you do other than God Himself (vis a vis the Holy Spirit or Christ in you). Be your own man and test everything against the Bible. After all, in Acts 17 Paul commends the Bereans for refusing to trust him until they saw in the Scriptures with their own eyes that what he was saying was true. We should all follow in their example.

Perhaps this post wasn't in the right place.

Nah, this is the right place. The initial reaction just started down a rocky path.

I was just curious what to do when you start questioning your faith ?

I'll try to write up a more full direct reply when I have some more time.

The Real Purpose of Woman!!!

2 upvotes · 8 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

What is the real purpose of woman? The Bible is pretty clear: to be a helper to her man.

What is the real purpose of man? The Bible is pretty clear: "The end of the matter; all has been heard. Fear God and keep his commands, for this is the whole duty of man."

Merge these two and we see that that the purpose of women is to help their man fear God and keep his commands. This, of course, only makes sense if we consider God's affirmative commands and not just the negative ones. Negative commands = "don't do this, don't do that." Affirmative commands = things like, "Make disciples of all nations," and "multiply, fill the earth in number," and all that other proactive stuff.

What if a woman is single? Is she without a purpose? Of course not. She's the bride of Christ, so he's her man, so she can participate directly in the divine plan.

For those who are married or want to marry: Why?

2 upvotes · 8 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good stuff here. Primary takeaway: "It isn't wrong for women to make sure they will be protected from the harshness of the world." Of course not. God designed women to be this way. That's a good thing that should be praised, not a selfish trait to be condemned.

Not a virgin

2 upvotes · 6 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Why pursue a relationship with a girl who isn't marriage material in the first place? Sounds like you're wasting your time and hers.

Not a virgin

2 upvotes · 5 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

To that end, call her out on the lie, repeatedly if necessary, and she'll appreciate your no nonsense attitude - particularly if you sprinkle in a few "I'm not judging you" mannerisms. She just might actually fess up to the truth. And if she really is telling the truth, you're still the guy who tells it like he sees it.

How betas manage to be bf ?

2 upvotes · 4 January 2018 · /r/askTRP

On the whole, I do believe that. The evidence I've seen to the contrary is usually a Q&A session with women, which is skewed by their perception.

I'm not aware of any definitive studies done on genetics about the subject; rather the comments about genetics are usually someone making an interpretive assumption based on those Q&A "research studies." I'm open to changing my mind on this, though, if I see evidence to the contrary.

The only thing I can think of off the top of my head is that male sperm recharges every 48 hours, giving heightened sexuality during that time. For those who have sex or masturbate every 48 hours or less, that urge doesn't ever manifest. For chronic masturbators it's a whole different dynamic in the first place.

On the female side, though, they have an entire week where their sex drive is amplified during ovulation, which does not diminish with sexual activity. So, whereas increased sexual activity for a man may decrease his sexual appetite while he recharges, the woman's is constant within each phase of her cycle. Of course, many men don't track her cycle, try to initiate just before or on her period where her drive takes a nose dive, then say, "See! She doesn't like sex."

Given that most men (committed Christians partially excepted) masturbate every 48 hours or less, the number of hours per month they spend beyond a given 48 hour span is almost certainly less than the number of hours a woman spends during or near ovulation each month. So, from that angle, over the span of a month, there's more time that a woman is likely to be sexually charged than a man. But, in turn, because men usually go at least 24 hours between sex/masturbation and recharge fast, their truly sex-averse phases are similarly fewer.

To put it another way, men are consistent with a modest sexual appetite, whereas women fluctuate with longer periods of heightened biological inclination toward sex than men.

Christian Plate Spinning ... Seriously? Sure. Let's do this.

2 upvotes · 3 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I seriously doubt that many husbands would be pleased with their wives developing abundance mentality this way

Fair point, but I'm pretty sure the boilerplate RP response would be that abundance mentality is an attraction factor for a woman toward a man, not the other way around. In an RP framework for understanding marriage dynamics (at least from a secular perspective, I haven't explored this from a Christian perspective), a woman doesn't need an abundance mentality to enhance attraction to her from her husband. So, that abundance must be serving another purpose.

Now RC has made the comment in MRP that Christianity allows for polygamy, and has implied it's just the local law of the land that prevents engaging in other options endorsed by MRP because polygamy is against the law.

I literally just made a post on this. Although this is my leaning right now, I would not intend this as a hard theological statement for all.

I fully expect to see RPC eventually allow a second spiritual side marriage in lieu of adultery

I don't expect that. To have one "legal marriage" and multiple side "spiritual marriages" would be to spit in the face of the governing authorities contrary to Romans 13. This is what Mormons do. I myself will not endorse that.

this abundance mentality that includes flirting

I didn't say "flirting." My example was with a "hi" and having a conversation. Flirting is an additional layer of effort. Some people can engage that way without sinning, others can't. But that's riskier ground than the given example.

It's like putting a dieter in front of a buffet as expecting him to self-regulate. AMALT.

Sure, some may react that way. But I also understand that the cure to ONEitis is to spend time getting to know the object of your affection - and to realize that she's just a normal person like everyone else. She's not the "special snowflake" that you assumed from afar. In my experience, maintaining my distance keeps the mystery and magic alive. Once I get to know a person I often find myself losing interest because I start to see the flaws and how the relationship would likely play out, which actually has a positive effect on my ability to remain faithful.

And no, this guy's marriage is not solid since he has stated that he would have remained single given the knowledge he now has.

I'd say my marriage is solid. It's not perfect, of course. But you're confusing the point of my statement. The reason I wouldn't re-do it was (1) only if I could retain the knowledge of discipleship, and (2) because Jesus and Paul both appropriately say that one should remain single if he can, as this allows him to be wholly devoted to God. It has nothing to do with wishing I could get out of my marriage.

Tag: /u/OsmiumZulu

Christian Plate Spinning ... Seriously? Sure. Let's do this.

2 upvotes · 3 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It is only the premarital sex that gets some Christian brother's panties in a bunch.

To that end, I say rightfully so. Although I do use the phrase somewhat flippantly, I really don't believe "premarital sex" is a thing, since I believe sex creates a marriage bond. Instead, I would technically call it "pre-ceremony sex." So, if a guy goes out and has "pre-ceremony sex" as part of a one night stand, that's fine as long as he acknowledges that he's created a spiritual one-flesh bond that God calls marriage. In this, there is no sin. It only becomes sin when he then abandons that relationship for another one, in which case his new partner is now someone with whom he is in an adulterous relationship.

Alternatively, you could view the new partner as a polygamous relationship and say that the sin is that he's not maintaining the God-given obligation to the girl from the ONS - especially if she goes off and sleeps with another guy, given that tacit approval of polygamy in the Bible was only ever one-directional, as polyandry never got similar attention. Would polyandry have received similar tacit approval from God? I don't know, but I'd wager not. If we look at the relationship with God and the Church, it still seems one-directional. Christ has one bride: his Church. But you could also look at it as to all of the individual parts of the body of Christ. I am Christ's bride just as much as my pastor is, just as much as my wife is, etc. But ... if I, as Christ's bride, decide to go take for myself a second husband, that's a violation of Rule #1: "Thou shalt have no other gods." This is probably worth a post just to see what others think on the subject, though.

All that said, I agree on all counts. My point in quoting Rollo is simply to say that "spinning plates" does not have to be sexual. Even the secular guru acknowledges this.

Interesting article from 2011 I thought would be beneficial to share | Her Desire, His Rule

2 upvotes · 2 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Although I appreciate what /u/Whitified and /u/RedPillWonder have said, I might say "yes" in a few circumstances.

- If it's a gray area and you have exercised your authority to cause them to act, then you are responsible for their sin and they are not responsible.
- If it's a black and white issue and you have exercised your authority to cause them to act, then you are responsible for sin, and they are also responsible.
- If your failure of leadership has increased their sinfulness on the whole, then you are responsible for the degree of the increase in their sinfulness.

That said, to give a contrary position:

- If your exercise of appropriate, godly leadership has increased their sinfulness (as often happens), then you are not responsible for this increase in their sinfulness. This, instead, is their own sinfulness reacting negatively in the face of genuine conviction, as people often do.

The RP is tearing me apart. Don't know what to do.

2 upvotes · 2 January 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Removed for a Rule 4 violation. If you want to argue a rational point, I'd be more lenient, but just posting links (these ones in particular) hits everything in Rule 4:

- against the purpose of the sub
- promotes outside content
- nominal quality

I'd probably be happy to entertain the conversation I think you're trying to start, but you have to actually start the conversation.

I had an epiphany this week

2 upvotes · 24 December 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

It promotes covert contracts. The whole concept behind the book is: "If you act this way toward your spouse, he/she will love you and be overjoyed and want to do anything for you." That's a lie. The idea behind having different ways to communicate affection is valuable, but the author takes it too fast when he goes from "here's some helpful stuff to try" into the realm of "oh, by the way, if you do this then all these other things will happen too" - and the fact is that most of the time they won't. He took good advice but attached a false promise to it.

For those who are married or want to marry: Why?

2 upvotes · 21 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

TL;DR - If a woman is faithful, available, and teachable, her negative AWALT tendencies can be overcome or minimized as she grows in faith, so these qualities are more important than finding a woman who "isn't like that."

Be the Judge

2 upvotes · 20 December 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Have you read through steels 'mystery method' post?

Loved it!

you cede the power in the moment you begin to DEER

I still believe this is context-dependent, per my reply to bogey. You seem to be saying "no matter the context" in one hand, but the given examples are always situations where she would have a cause to look with a judgmental eye in the first place. I am confident that there are times when a quick explanation has far greater value than other non-explanatory tactics and can often prevent arguments before they start.

For example: "Go put on your red dress. I'm taking you out tonight." You issue an order, then you explain your order. That explanation preempts her "why" or any likely complaints about not wanting to go out and it also gives her context for getting ready without you also having to say, "Also, put on blush, put on lipstick, put on nice shoes," etc. You can clear up a lot of otherwise wasted dialogue if you just give a quick explanation up-front. WISNIFG's "self-disclosure" category is almost always an explanation framed as a statement of intent.

I've also found that a non-engaging explanation of "Here's what we're going to do and why we're doing it" in the midst of what would otherwise be an argument enhances respect and trust. She knows that you're actually processing decisions before you make them rather than flying off the seat of your pants. It shows that you're trustworthy, competent and wise as opposed to brash and irrational. Sometimes brash and irrational is sexy. Sometimes it's not. I've tested both methods and have noticed a difference in both submissiveness of character and sexuality between when I employ each of the two.

That said, I do agree that ex post facto applications of DEERING are virtually always harmful regardless of context (unless you can conceal the fact that it's ex post facto). And I think this is what you and bogey have in your head. You're thinking of one specific context and assuming that the explanation is always coming from a mentality of weakness and can't quite wrap your mind around the way it can be an expression of strength, wisdom, and strong leadership - just not all the time.

To that end, what you're saying sounds great on paper and makes for great theory. The intellectual in me wants to agree with everything you and bogey say ... but in practice the results come out quite differently, at least for me. So, while avoiding explaining or rationalizing your decisions may generally be a good idea, I do see some situations where there is positive value in doing these things - just not in a manner where you're engaging with her on her level; rather, in a manner that engages her as the submissive who can benefit from the additional information you're providing.

If you don't see very easy fly balls when it comes to this, how does that lend to credibility, when a new mental model without any anchoring in what we already know comes around?

First off, most intelligent men should be able to self-assess devil's advocate positions enough that there aren't any unanticipated fly balls. But even if they do come, the default reply is: "Let me think about that." It successfully nullifies the thought from being pressed any further at that time, puts you in the position that will issue a judgment on that thought rather than her, and tells her that you're not a brash person who acts without processing relevant information.

Be the Judge

2 upvotes · 20 December 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

DEER is always a bad choice in every situation.

If I walk into court and refuse to present an argument that defends my client's position, demonstrates excuses for his behavior, explains his rationale, and rationalizes the wisdom in his choices I would lose my license.

DEERing is not "always a bad choice in every situation." Period. It is a bad choice in most situations, sure. But not every. Applying RP concepts in their proper context is valuable. Taking them beyond what they were intended to do just because it sounds more manly is idiotic.

To quote the post you cited:

I think fundamentally DEER comes from a place of a lack of confidence and a fear of judgement. People who do it are afraid of the consequences of their actions or inaction. They are afraid of people judging them or their decisions.

Using the court example, an attorney or party can DEER with a great deal of confidence in their position, but it's also worth noting that the judgment is real. The consequences for their actions are real. If a guy is falsely accused of committing a crime and does not defend himself, he will go to jail.

you really have to start digging into the reading

I've read it all. I'm on board with virtually all of it (just as I'm sure there are some technicalities you'd disagree with as well). But even these books are "explaining" and "rationalizing" their positions, and many of them preemptively present a "defense" of what they suspect others will argue (or already have argued) against their positions.

In faction, Rollo often talks about the conversations he gets into with those that object to his content. Sometimes he blows them off. But other times he engages. It's the "rational" male for a reason - because rationalization is not inherently a bad thing. If we were to say that all defenses, explanations, excuses and rationalizations are bad, then there would be no sidebar content in the first place. This sub wouldn't even exist. Someone like /u/jacktenofhearts would have been kicked out for how much he explained things to people he was trying to help.

Be the Judge

2 upvotes · 20 December 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This notion that "DEERing is always bad no matter what the context; this is an infallible rule of manhood with no exceptions" is idiotic to me. The advice against DEERing is predominantly for idiots who don't know how to be wise about when to utilize these concepts and when not. They will always make the wrong choice, so we just tell them not to do it at all. When a person wises up, discretion can be added back in.

Be the Judge

2 upvotes · 19 December 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

True, no analogy is perfect, but they still hold value.

Why does a judge need anyone to represent his position? All judges enter a case with a basic impression on how the case should be decided. The attorney's job is to persuade the judge that the attorney's way is better than the judge's default view. Even without opposition a judge can be unpersuaded and go with what he originally intended.

113 - Christian Frame: Part 1, an Introduction

2 upvotes · 19 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I would call the great commission a clarification of Genesis 1:28, not necessarily a sub-point. The prompt to reproduce and fill the earth in number and master over it in a physical sense has shifted to a spiritual fulfillment of that same imperative. Spiritual reproduction is now the goal, not physical reproduction. We are called to multiply through discipleship, not necessarily child-bearing.

Specifically, humanity started fulfilling the physical command to fill the earth, but God said, "Guys, guys ... that's totally not what I meant. Let me send a flood and start over so we can try again." Malachi 2:15 explains what Genesis 1:28 really meant - that God wanted "godly offspring."

Of course, having physical offspring is necessary for there to be godly offspring. But we have filled the earth (some say we've overfilled it), so the command in a physical sense is moot. But we have not filled it with godly offspring, so the remaining imperative, through the Gospel, is to make the offspring living today "godly," per Malachi 2:15.

Should Christians Care About Physical Attractiveness?

2 upvotes · 18 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent post. Thanks for this!

Should Christians Care About Physical Attractiveness?

2 upvotes · 18 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

This is a genuine psychological phenomenon, not just among the RP population. Just as women have retroactive emotions, men have mnemonic attraction. A woman's retroactivity with her feelings says she imputes how she feels today onto her memory of how she felt in the past. A man's mnemonic attraction (my terminology, I don't recall the actual phrase) means he imputes his attraction from the past onto how he sees someone today.

It stems mostly from what I've written about in the past about the "summer effect" in high school. In past comments, I've noted that a fat nerd who gradually from August to May becomes buff will still never get noticed by the girls - he's still the fat nerd to them because his change was incredibly gradual. But take the same person and the same development from May to August (during summer when those girls won't see you for a few months) and all of a sudden people are asking, "What happened to him over summer? He's hot now!"

Since we're around our wives all the time, and they're around us, a similar effect happens. We still see them as they were, not as they are. At a conscious level, we can pick apart the differences, but subconsciously that memory from our attraction in the past is burned into us. That's why the "past lover" or "old fling" is such a powerful concept. We remember this intense, burning desire and when we see them again, in the absence of drastic, drastic changes that cannot be ignored, the subtleties of age, just a few pounds, less muscle tone, etc. just go unnoticed and we still get that rush of excitement at seeing the person we were once obsessed with. But if the changes are too significant, then the "summer change" effect triggers and our past attraction is broken.

402 - Impact of the Cross

2 upvotes · 18 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

There certainly is some correlation on a denominational level. For example, virtually all Pentacostals tend to align with the spiritual warfare theory, and the results are pretty obvious.

Is speaking harshly to your wife a sin?

2 upvotes · 15 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

As /u/OsmiumZulu alluded to, I always like to compare my relationship with my wife to how God relates with his bride. Now, I don't necessarily use Israel as the prime example. It's a good one - but I also take the view that the Church is now Christ's bride and not Israel anymore. Because the church is part of the new covenant and Israel was interacting with God under the terms of the old covenant, there is a difference in how we should view the parallel in the relationship.

That said, even when looking toward the Christ/Church relationship rather than the God/Israel connection, we see many harsh words. This comes first and foremost from the apostles (namely Paul). Although Paul is not the groom in the Christ/church relationship, if his words are inspired, they're from God, who does hold that position vis a vis Christ. So, Paul's God-inspired harsh words against the Corinthians, for example, are things that we can emulate in our own marriages. Similarly, Revelation (especially the agnells addressing the churches) is chock full of harsh words.

But what's most important here is that these words are always accompanied with an attitude that they are spoken for the benefit of the bride, not to express one's own frustrations and anger. So, I would do likewise. Before speaking harsh words, calculate carefully the impact of your words and determine if the severity is necessary to bring about the end you're trying to accomplish.

I do this all the time with my kids, by the way. They do things and I'm not necessarily angry at all. But I know they need to see me react a certain way in order to mold their behavior. So, I'll fake a modicum of anger, disappointment, or whatever the situation calls for in order to communicate to them that their actions affect our relationship, just as our actions affect our relationship with God. Now, my kids' actions aren't going to affect the fact that they're still my children (i.e. God won't kick us out of salvation, for the most part), but the character and the quality of the relationship is affected for sure. Similarly, if your wife is acting in a way that affects the character and quality of your relationship, just as Christ (who I do not believe we have the power to wound, hurt, upset, disappoint, etc.) reacts to us to reorient our lives to be in a right relationship with him.

Book Suggestions?

2 upvotes · 12 December 2017 · /r/RPChristians

For men who are not yet RP aware, John Eldridge is a decent starting step. He's definitely purple ... leaning more blue than red. But he's certainly redder than the rest of the church, so it's not a bad place to test the waters in starting someone's journey.

I would not recommend his stuff to a guy who's already embraced the red, though. This would be a step in the wrong direction. But you specifically asked about recommendations for someone who isn't yet RP aware, so he's a fine starting point. Just don't take anything he says as dogma.

Non-covert contracts... just contracts... how to handle?

2 upvotes · 30 November 2017 · /r/askMRP

Fellow guy with a deeply religious wife and 4 kids ... can affirm. Rambo is possible, but when she is convicted against divorce, you do have a lot more flexibility and can make progress much quicker.

It's hard to lead if you don't have preferences

2 upvotes · 29 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

In specific, you're correct. That said, there is still value in addressing principles behind leadership.

Consider personality typology as a nice, neatly packaged parallel. To rephrase what you said: "Personality is the distilled version of YOUR traits and synthesis of YOUR experiences that creates a unique style that suits you." Absolutely. And no two people are exactly alike. That said, personality inventories like Myers-Briggs, although far from perfect, still get used worldwide and are widely agreed upon as having value in understanding general principles, even if they lack the ability to predict with specificity how a person will act in a given situation.

Now, I know the M-B typology of pretty much every person I interact with on a regular basis. It's not a flawless predictor of their behaviors, but like a wide river, although I can't steer a drop, I know where it's all going to end up. I can guess the flow of a person's decisions, which helps me figure out how to interact with them most productively (which is incredibly helpful in my profession).

In the same way, although you're right that leadership can't be pinned down, trying to draw out general principles has great value - especially if one accepts that there are different ways to influence people and don't try to force every square, triangle, rectangle, etc. peg into a round hole.

How to respond to a marriage ultimatum?

2 upvotes · 25 November 2017 · /r/askMRP

Limited availability while on vacation, but here goes ...

But religion!

The disciples (Matthew 19:10), Jesus (Mathew 19:11-12), and Paul (1 Cor. 7) all agree that it's better to avoid marriage at all. Period. Legal or religious, I don't care, I speak from practical experience when I say their advice is on point.

You can't "keep the courts out of it."

I wouldn't say this is true for most jurisdictions, but definitely for some. All states have tweaked common law marriage to some degree from what it was pre-90s. In my state, common law marriage is gone in full. In other states it's just a higher bar to reach. Some it's still easy. The ceremony and wearing (or at least owning/exchanging) rings and calling yourself married will almost certainly meet even the higher standard.

For preference not to start a conversation that might tick off some mods, if /u/zamunda761 wants to ask about the best way to address this issue, he can PM me or ask the question on r/RPChristians. My views on the subject keep evolving as I'm learning to filter out blue pill ideology from what the words in the bible actually say and mean in what was otherwise a very red pill culture (comparatively at least), so I'll note that for Christians the answers may not be immediately apparent. Interestingly, apart from RP, my wife independently came to the same conclusions I now hold :p Makes my job easier.

Discerning God's will - emphasized for singles

2 upvotes · 20 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

This makes sense to me. I agree :)

Discerning God's will - emphasized for singles

2 upvotes · 20 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Sorry if I made some bad assumptions. The context of your comment sounded like, "If I want to sin, I'm just going to do it because as long as it makes me happy it's not really sin because God wants me to be happy." I'm not really sure another way to have read that :/

Discerning God's will - emphasized for singles

2 upvotes · 20 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

In almost every case as long as I am myself God is happy with me.

This is an EXTREMELY dangerous thing to say without appropriate context. You have to remember that we have two selves: (1) the self we experience consciously in the flesh, and (2) the self we experience spiritually through Christ in us.

If you're referencing #2, then absolutely - God will always be happy with us when we're being ourselves. But everything you've written implies you really meant #1.

You're right that God is not a "moral policeman" - but the Bible is clear enough that he will judge people according to what they do (Romans 2:6, though 8 is also highly relevant here). If who you are has not changed from before you said "the prayer" to after, then being yourself will land you in hell. That's a straight up fact. You have to be the person God is trying to mold you into - not that works save, but that the one who isn't living righteously clearly doesn't have genuine saving faith. Read the entire chapter of James 2 for more on this.

I say this not to be harsh with you, but to wave a giant red warning flag because I really care about you and don't want you sucked into the easy-believism path. Easy believism says a person just needs to verbally profess Christ as their savior, but that they can continue in salvation without any evidence of their faith being expressed through their actions. To be clear: *faith makes no sense if it's not in the context of *being faithful. You can't claim to have faith if you're not living faithfully to the calling God has on you. <Man, I'm really going to have to accelerate this 400-level stuff.>

God wants good for me. And in a sense, that means that he wants me to go after what I want

This couldn't be farther from the truth. To quote Galatians 5:17, "For the flesh desires what is contrary to the Spirit, and the Spirit what is contrary to the flesh. They are in conflict with each other, so that you are not to do whatever you want."

This entire comment falls in the Proverbs 14:12 category: "There is a way that seems right to a man, but in the end it leads to death." I really don't want to see you go down that road, brother.

113 - A History of Feminism

2 upvotes · 17 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting reference. I hadn't noticed that one before.

113 - A History of Feminism

2 upvotes · 17 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Ephesians 5:25 is clearly referencing Christ's death for the redemption of his bride, the Church. There is no confusion or mistake there. But it also cannot be taken in isolation of all of the other ways that God interacts with his people. For example, there are some who claim to be Christ's bride, but to whom he says, "I never knew you, away from me you evildoers" (Matthew 7:23). There are also passages about people who disown Christ and how he'll disown them before God in response (Matthew 10:33; 2 Timothy 2:12-13). So, if Jesus says, "There are some circumstances where people who are allegedly my bride will not be entitled to get the benefit of my sacrifice," there are also circumstances where your civil/legal bride will not be entitled to the benefit of your self-sacrifice on her behalf if she is not one with you in spirit.

But this is more significant: there are a whole host of things that Jesus DOES NOT SACRIFICE. He never once sacrificed his mission or plan of disciple-making. He didn't sacrifice his perfection. He didn't compromise on any of his teachings, views, or beliefs. He didn't cave on what he expected of someone who wanted to be one of his followers (i.e. his bride) - and he let them walk away if they wouldn't adopt his frame. He did sacrifice his time, attention, energy, finances, popularity, and ultimately his life.

And what did he sacrifice for? For the church's happiness? No. For the church's freedom to get their way? No. For comfort and security from worldly pressures? No. Freedom from oppression? No. For the church to feel all warm, cuddly, and cozy in his arms all the time? No. His sacrifice functions to restore us into relationship with Him - to bring us into HIS FRAME rather than bolstering our own frames (or our collective singular frame as one body and bride).

So, if you hear a pastor talk about how you have to sacrifice your life ambitions, your time, attention, effort, etc. to make your wife happy - that's a joke. Your sacrifice should be to do what it takes to get your wife into your frame. That was the singular and primary goal of the cross. That's why the fall evicted people from the garden, as a demonstration that they were leaving God's frame. It's also why Jesus says in John 10 that he is the gate through whom we must enter (by virtue of his death/sacrifice), literally living inside the frame/gate.

How did Jesus get us into his frame? What, exactly, was the sacrifice he endured? What does this mean to us? That means suffering at the hands of the people you love. Jesus' sacrifice was directly caused by the Jewish people (who had to pressure Pilate into it who otherwise tried to release Jesus) - those same Israelites of whom God said in Isaiah 54:5, "For your Maker is your Husband - the Lord Almighty is His name." He suffered torment from these people in order to pave a way for them to be restored to his frame and away from their sinful rebellion.

In the same way, your sacrifice is meant to be to endure the torment and wrath of your wife to whatever degree necessary to pull her into your frame. This is why it's so essential to learn to pass tests. Because that's what the Gospel was - the biggest s-test God's bride had ever thrown at him. And he did it to bring her back into relationship with him on his terms, not on ours.

So, don't ever let someone confuse you on what Ephesians 5 means when it says, "Love your wives as Christ loved the church, who gave himself up for her." Understanding the context of what Jesus gave up, why he did it, and the things that his sacrifice actually accomplished - that's the only way to read Ephesians 5 correctly ... not imputing the blue pill mentality of a husband just sacrificing for his wife's happiness because it's 'the right thing to do.'

Of course, if you deny lordship salvation and embrace easy believism, none of this could make any sense - because then the church gets to maintain its own frame and doesn't have to enter Christ's.

Tag: /u/BluepillProfessor - given that you always seem interested in biblical perspectives on fitness tests, and this is about the biggest one the Bible (or world as a whole) has to offer.

113 - A History of Feminism

2 upvotes · 17 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

you're really rejecting the World's version of chivalry

Or, more accurately, I'm using the word in its original, purest form. In the intro to Mere Christianity that words stop having value when we're constantly changing what they mean. He gives the example of "gentleman," which meant "land owner." He says someone quite nobly, but altogether uselessly commented, "Ah, but is not the true gentleman the one who is a gentleman at heart?" This is a great sentiment, but we already have phrases like "nice man" or "good guy," and we don't need to commandeer a term for a social classification in order to repeat what we can more directly say otherwise.

Similarly, people today have commandeered the term "chivalry" to mean something beyond its original bounds. We already had terms like "gynocentric" and "women worship" and whatnot.

The thing is, some words are accurate in their meaning, but other less accurate words have positive emotional connotations. People (usually liberals) find it easier to steal words that have positive emotional connotations and change their meaning, rather than trying to describe themselves accurately and change the culture to view the accurate words positively. This is an intentional psychological ploy.

Of course, the same thing happens with negative words too, like "intolerant." The original definition of "tolerant" was something along the lines of "able to live and function harmoniously alongside those with opposing views" - and intolerance was the inability to do so. I have now seen in a few modern dictionaries that the definition of tolerant is "someone who supports and encourages the views of other people," which gives the liberals the ability to call anyone who disagrees with them intolerant.

Word games are really a funny thing. But it's funny in the way that turning on a buzz saw and waving it over your newborn's head like you're pretending to cut her head off just to freak out your wife is funny.

Can I salvage this?

2 upvotes · 16 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Wanna know how I got out of it? Fucking discipline and accepting that the new "me" would never be the same as the old "me" ... man up, deal with the symptoms and eventually they would either get better or I would get better at dealing with them.

Reminds me of what Daredevil said to the disabled kid in the beginning of The Defenders:

- That money is really gonna help your parents. But for you, from here on out it's only gonna get harder, Aaron. You realize you're only at mile one of the marathon, right? Everybody's gonna tell you how to feel. Doctors are gonna tell you to stay positive. Your family's gonna tell you not to feel sorry for yourself. Your therapist is gonna tell you not to be angry.
- The kid says, "I just want my life back."
- Daredevil: They can't give you that. Maybe you'll walk again. I hope so. But maybe you won't. But your ability to get through it as this gets harder - that is a hundred times more powerful than slapping a smile on your face and pretending like everything's just fine. <sighs> Do you understand? Hey, listen ... no one can give you your life back, Aaron. You have ... You gotta take it back.

Give Me The Feels

2 upvotes · 16 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

the only time women want to win is when they're in competition with other women. Has nothing to do with their man, or men

I call this "the comparison game." I actually wrote a post on this (coupled with preselection) a couple weeks ago but never published it.

The thing is: it does have a lot to do with their man. Women only play the game with each other when the stakes are something that matters to them. So, a working mom might compare her great job to all the housewives who have no job - because her career matters to her. The housewives won't care about losing the job comparison because career doesn't matter to them - instead, they'll compete about how well their kids are being raised. Because the career mom cares about that too, it becomes a mutual competition where the career mom uses her additional financial resources to compete with the time and attention that the housewife can give to her kids.

The quality of a woman's husband always matters to her. Period. So, she'll either manipulate her man to make it look like he's the perfect husband and avoid talking about how horrible their sex life is because she really isn't attracted to him (i.e. the hollow victory - she cheated to win), or she'll cede the loss, but get the approval and support from other women by complaining constantly about how awful her husband is.

My solution to men is, of course: don't play the game. Doing so steps you into her frame and makes you too concerned about how other people perceive you, totally killing your life directive. Instead, you do your own thing, invite your wife into your frame, leading her to ignore the game altogether ... and by doing so, incidentally that's how you win the game for real - when you stop playing. But at that point neither of you care that you actually won, yet the relationship still gets the benefit of the preselection/dread because everyone else can see that you're winning even if you and your wife are OI/DNGAF about the results of the game.

What is the value of femininity?

2 upvotes · 14 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

You might find this comic strip entertaining. It's not necessarily RP, but it about sums up the distinction between how feminists view women who live within their feminine role, as opposed to how Christian women actually experience it.

I will also re-reference this comment and that entire thread, which is designed specifically to answer that question: How does submissiveness benefit the wife?

Failed a fitness test tonight

2 upvotes · 14 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I always viewed AA as an immediate response to a shit test, not something done in the process of the conversation

Ideally, yes. But if you don't see a clear opening right away or aren't experienced enough to do it right off the bat, you can do it mid-conversation as a way of saying, "I'm done with this nonsense ... now let's have some fun."

We had a conversation with our pastor and his wife where I OYS and listed off a ton of areas where I have been passive

This is a great way to avoid the Rambo rap. Have someone with authority over the two of you tell you that you need to be making the changes you're already planning on making (i.e. being less passive, being more flirty, etc.). At that point she can't get confused about why you're changing - you're just doing what your pastor suggested. Why wouldn't she be okay with that? Well played. If she does get in the "you're changing too much! Let me take control again!" mode, just blame it on your pastor rather than revealing RP. Just be careful that this doesn't backfire if your pastor has a second conversation to 'clarify' what he meant ... and then you've got him speaking against your RP changes because he's too BP to know any better.

I also wanted to include this Interesting article. Thanks for sharing! My wife is most likely suffers from approval idolatry. I think comfort idolatry is more deeply rooted in her, but approval dominates her surface actions.

Failed a fitness test tonight

2 upvotes · 14 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

It might have come across as me being butt hurt though.

This is the key right here. Lots of guys argue, "But I wasn't butthurt!" In reality, it doesn't matter if you are or not. It only matters if she perceives that you are. Perception is everything to women.

I don't know how Negative Inquiry will get her to see her feeling are not my fault

NI can certainly have that impact, and often does with my wife, but that's not the point of it. The value of NI is (1) that it gives you time to collect yourself, (2) puts her on the defensive by pressure-flipping and making her explain herself rather than you explain yourself, (3) pokes around at enough different places and causes her to say enough things until a clear AA is established, (4) disorients her from what she was originally trying to argue so that AA makes more sense when you do it, (5) helps you figure out the core of the issue so you can determine if it's an s-test or a comfort test much easier, and (6) helps put you in the frame of mind of realizing how ridiculous she's being so you can regain amused mastery as soon as possible, if you ever lost it in the first place. None of these depend on convincing or changing her perception of the problem - it's all about helping you by giving you a better perception and opening up opportunities to steer the conversation you want it to go. It's a way of commandeering a conversation that was otherwise at first dominated by her emotions.

How is getting butthurt a sin?

To be fair, I said "usually." I also define sin more openly than most. The original Greek word that we translate as "sin" is hamartano. In its earliest and most consistent uses before biblical writings it was an archery term that was said when someone "missed the mark." The distance from the dead-center of the bulls-eye to the arrow was the "hamartano distance" - just how far you missed the mark. Even if you hit the bulls-eye, if you were off-center, you had a hamartano distance. The idea is that God is perfect, so any imperfection at all, no matter how slight, is sin. It may not be morally condemnable sin, but it's an imperfection nonetheless - and all imperfection highlights our differences from God.

When a person gets butthurt, it's usually a display that they're not living in the contentment that comes from Christ. They're letting worldly influences affect their internal emotional state, which should always rest on Christ and only genuinely be affected by Him, except in circumstances where Christ would want you to mourn or become angry, etc. To that end, Jesus got "butthurt" when he saw the money changers at the temple and decided to drive them out with a whip. He mourned when Lazarus died. He got anxiety to the point of sweating blood when he was about to be crucified. So, emotional reactions aren't bad. But these were reactions that were consistent with his plan, his heart, his intentions. They were not responses to someone else trying to manipulate him. So, he was emotionally expressive, but he wasn't emotionally reactive, if that makes sense. Accordingly, when we act emotionally reactive, it comes off as butthurt (whether we intend it that way or not), which is an example of how we're not acting like Christ in a given moment - and that distinction of us being non-Christlike is an imperfection, and therefore sin.

I think I am more OI now and maybe it is just being communicated as butthurt?

Probably. Again, perception is everything to a woman. If you're not actually butthurt, it might not be sin; but if she perceives it as butthurt, she's going to think you're in sin. You'll have to figure out how to communicate in a way that avoids this perception in her - not because you have a spiritual imperative to convince her you're not in sin (as long as you know you're not, that's enough), but because that's going to impact how she is attracted to you and how well she respects you. If she's going to follow you in your new endeavors to grow and become the godly man you're orienting your life to be, she will need to see that you have the emotional wherewithal to get the job done and to be trusted.

I have a long history of being butthurt so maybe that is what is being communicated to her?

Indeed, I'm still getting over this with my wife. I have to go above and beyond to show her that my reactions today are not what she's used to seeing from me. I don't do this with words - I do it with my actions. When I was getting more denials after starting my MAP, I noticed her still recoiling a little, waiting for me to get butthurt - and even if I didn't want to act all lovey-dovey at the time (in fact, that's the opposite of how I want to (re)act), I still did it because she needs to see with my emotional state that I'm not hurt by her rejection. After that happened enough times I developed actual OI (rather than the 'fake it til you make it' type of OI) to the point where my gut reaction is actually aligned with being lovey-dovey in the face of rejection ... and the result is that rejections are pretty darn rare in the first place now.

How would I know I am going to fast? ... just changing as I learn new things

The thing is, you can learn things faster than she can follow. So, if you implement new things as you learn them, you're almost always going to be going too fast. I had started down that path and saw how it was setting a bad foundation for my improvement process. I got some good warnings early on about slowing down and took the advice and never actually had any explosions, though I did have a few comments where she'd be yelling and I'd be laughing and she'd say things like, "If this is part of all that 'self-improvement' stuff, I don't like it." That was the worst I got ... and now she likes it, so there's that.

As far as how you know, just gauge her reactions. If you notice her making comments about you changing, you're going too fast. Ideally, it should be so gradual that she doesn't notice. If she notices, she'll recoil and try to pull you back into her frame. That's fine because you'll know how to deal with it; but it also makes your job harder and it also makes her more alert to further changes. Reeling in the 1,000-foot rope should be something done in a manner where she doesn't even realize it's happening.

wtf is going on, I was in control of the relationship but I feel it slipping away, I need to do something about this

To some degree, this is a good mentality. But it does also demonstrate that you might be coming on too strong. She should be noticing this after-the-fact, not as it's happening. She should be thinking, "Huh, I just realized this happened yesterday," and not, "What's happening right now?"

Wife complains that she feels like I am "leaving her behind".

2 upvotes · 13 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I just didn't want to scare her away

Indeed. Don't go Rambo. If you've been a supplicating beta for years until now, you're going to have to keep some of those behaviors going for a while. Trickle in the things you're learning slowly and gradually, not as soon as you learn them. There's a temptation for new guys to read something, see all kinds of great stories on RP forums of how well it worked for someone else, and want to implement it immediately in the hopes of getting the same results. This does not work. You can't really internalize things properly that way - it's simple behavior modification, and if you don't see the return on your behavior change that you're expecting, you'll end up losing steam and regress (this is what we call covert contracts - an expectation that if you do something she must respond a certain way).

with HOW MUCH talking I've done over the years

This is why you don't talk to her about any of this. She's used to you telling her what you're going to do, and words never pan out. They're hollow promises. Instead, SHOW HER what you're doing to change (pacing yourself, of course) and let her live in the fruit of that. This can take anywhere from a few months to a couple years, depending on the length of the relationship. Be prepared - the longer you've been beta and the more you've convinced her your changes are always superficial the longer it will take to turn her around.

i've damaged things beyond repair

Here's the beauty in our faith: once you're married, you know God wants you to remain married. So, God's going to make a way for the marriage to work. Period. It's never 'beyond repair.' Now, whether or not you're willing to follow through with what it takes to make that "repair" functional is up to you. But you have the entire concept of redemption working in your favor.

theres really not much mystery to me... i've verbally communicated every thought and desire i've had to her

But people change - and obviously you've started changing. There's no mystery right now because she's had very recent communications to you. But if you stop that over-communication, eventually the silence will catch up to where she thinks you're at and she'll start seeing gaps between what she expects you to do and what you actually do.

Also, and this is a tip from my pre-RP "humans are my lab rats" days (not a suggestion; just letting you profit off of my past): intentionally do things people would never expect you to do just to see how they respond. This adds the mystery back to you because she can no longer predict your actions. It also gives you an opportunity to learn how she reacts to you in different situations. It also tests the limits of how far she's willing to follow you and under what conditions.

For example, you've probably never just randomly scheduled a one-night trip to a hotel in your home city to just chill with her and your kids (if you have any) at the pool and a new environment. You can probably find something for under $100, plus a $50 meal = a relatively inexpensive getaway that changes up the focus that she's not expecting at all.

Other ideas include sending her an unanticipated lewd photo of yourself or text message and see what she says; show up after work with pizzas without telling her in advance, even if she happens to have already made dinner for the night (in fact, that's even better, as it forces her to see the unpredictability of your behavior); pinch her butt in public where other people can see; call up her parents for a quick chat and don't tell her about it - let them do it, then play it off casually like you just felt like catching up with her dad. Seriously, just find stuff she'd never expect you to do - things that are generally positive and, if possible, sexually suggestive - and start doing them to add that mystery and unpredictability back into the relationship.

Failed a fitness test tonight

2 upvotes · 13 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I was mostly stoic during this conversation which is pretty new for me.

You may already know this based on our private conversations, but just to clarify, stoicism isn't about being emotionless; it's about not letting circumstances affect you toward negative emotions. As wikipedia says, "Stoicism teaches the development of self-control and fortitude as a means of overcoming destructive emotions ... becoming a clear and unbiased thinker." One should still maintain their positive emotional traits. A decline in positive emotional traits at a given time shows that your wife's outbursts are affecting you - even if she can no longer draw you into negative emotions. So, if you were smiling and cracking jokes before, you have to continue smiling and cracking jokes through the test to show that you are unphased by her actions. Simply avoiding negative emotions is not enough. Even better is to increase your positive emotional expression as a counter (not a support) to her efforts, which is why AA works so well. But even /u/BluepillProfessor notes in his podcast that AA should not be the default test response in a marriage the same way it would be if you were single.

I since changed my mind about said goal and didn't tell her.

This is where you failed to lead. It happens, no biggie. It's rightly her job as your helper to highlight when you're not oriented toward fulfillment of communicated goals, so she wasn't wrong in what she did, though probably wrong in how she went about it. Of course, this could have been averted with a simple, "Hey, just so you know, I changed my mind about ..."

I should have A&A in response. My response instead was to get ready for bed which I said I was going to do

Conflicting thought here: (1) you told her what you were going to do and you followed through despite her comment ... but I get the impression from the rest of the post that she took this as a negative emotional reaction from you - the withdrawing/passive-aggressive type of emotional butthurt rather than the active-aggressive type ... either way, you did what you said you would, so props for that; (2) AA would have certainly dispelled any impression of being butthurt and positioned you in a much stronger place overall.

if you want to ... (trying to regain frame)

These two phrases are often incompatible. Simply say, "I'm going to keep getting ready for bed, like I said. Come on in here and we'll continue to chat." Or, if you don't want to chat and AA isn't a natural thing yet, just STFU and let her figure out if she wants to talk at you or not.

says I was in sin by disrespecting her

NEGATIVE INQUIRY!!! There's a reason this is my favorite. "I understand you felt that way [fogging]. What did I say that came off as disrespectful? [NI] ... What is it about that you think is sinful? [NI] ... I can see why you would think that [fogging], but is there a place in the Bible that affirms this, or where are you getting the idea that this is sin? [NI]" 99% chance she's trying to use "sin" as a spiritually manipulative term against you - especially when she's got the plank in her own eye.

I always got on her for walking away when we were talking (... true)

Why does it matter if this is true or not? This isn't an "I do that to her, so she can do it to me" scenario. And if it was wrong for you, it's wrong for her. Your wrong doesn't justify her wrong ... two wrongs don't make a right, and all.

my new norm is just walking away from bad situations. Maybe since I don't know what to do I am trying to regain frame?

I wouldn't walk away mid-fight unless it becomes dangerously toxic. The typical pattern should be STFU -> [Fog -> NI - on loop until you can figure out a good AA opening] -> AA

How do I decipher between fitness tests and her actually being concerned I am in sin and is calling me out according to Matthew 18?

Her attitude. A concerned wife sounds very different from a shrewish wife. BPP's podcast actually has some humorous audio clips of his wife that he uses to assist in identifying s-tests from comfort tests. The "concerned I am in sin" thing is a comfort test. It's her way of saying, "I'm really worried about you and I want to know that you're committed to me and to Christ." It's easy to get these confused, so I don't blame you for the question. But the podcast is a good place in discerning these. MMSLP also goes into it some.

Is there any way to reply to being called out in sin without DEERing?

If you've actually sinned (and getting butthurt is usually sin, for the record), then fogging is your best friend. Agree, confess, etc. But if she's calling you out in a negative way, you can still AA after fogging and agreeing. If it's a comfort test and genuine concern, just acknowledge it, repent, and be appreciative that you've got a first officer who knows how to keep an eye out for her captain's spiritual well-being.

Is it just fogging?

Mixed with AA, STFU, and NI.

Should I ever say "thank you for your permission" even in a sarcastic way?

Never be negatively sarcastic. AA by definition is positive sarcasm.

My stoicism made me seem like an a-- hole this time, but should I ever say it even jokingly?

I'm not sure of the context for the phrase, but probably not.

How do I handle pre established norms that need to change?

Patiently. Just keep doing you and let her follow at her own pace. Don't try to force the norm to change. Just let it happen whenever it does. If you've been married 10 years, expect it to take 10 months.

Should I specifically say things are different?

No.

It has never been a norm for me to be stoic or not need to fix things.

Then don't jump into genuine stoicism too fast. If you had a pattern before of getting needy and rushing to her to fix things every time there was a problem, continue that pattern - just phase it out gradually. As you phase it out, make sure you're doing it in a manner where you're only displaying these blue pill tendencies when it will do the least damage. Trying to implement too much too fast results in going Rambo and she will explode on you, which it sounds like you're predicting to be the case from your first line of this post.

Should I specifically say: "if you start disrespecting me, I am going to walk away."

No, but after she has already disrespected you very clearly in exaggerated ways, feel free to say something along these lines.

Is this a good guide for fitness tests

It's not a bad outline, but BPP's podcast covers it better. That link is geared more toward singles. Things are slightly tweaked when you're married, particularly in a Christian relationship.

What is the difference between an "alpha" and a sociopath?

2 upvotes · 10 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

An alpha does what he wants. A sociopath doesn't care what other people want. The two can overlap, but there's a lot of room where they don't.

Hypergamy for the Married Man

2 upvotes · 9 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'd love to see how you rationalize SGM or MMSLP or BPP's book/podcast or even NMMNG itself being on the sidebar with however it is you're defining covert contracts.

And as I've said before: DEERing is how we learn and grow. There would be no RP if nobody ever took a position and defended it or explained why they hold that position or developed a rational foundation for why something works. If you were a woman I was trying to screw, I wouldn't DEER with you, but as far as I can tell I'm not trying too screw you ...

Hypergamy for the Married Man

2 upvotes · 9 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

https://www.reddit.com/r/marriedredpill/comments/7bk3il/hypergamy_for_the_married_man/dpku8hq/

Hypergamy for the Married Man

2 upvotes · 9 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Translation: "I'd rather mock a fake ideology to ignorant people who don't know any better than engage with someone who knows I'm actually speaking out of my butt."

I could just as well go around telling people "/u/RuleZeroDAD thinks covert contracts are the way to win a woman's heart - don't waste your time listening to him because he's totally clueless." If I make up something about what I think you believe, that doesn't mean you actually believe it or that the dogma you follow supports it.

Hypergamy for the Married Man

2 upvotes · 9 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I was referencing the "covert contracts" and "he's removed 'GTFO' as an option" bit. I don't care if you want to call me purple. But don't go waving a false banner about your speculations of me to justify your efforts to discredit what I have to say when they're inconsistent with what I actually think and believe.

Hypergamy for the Married Man

2 upvotes · 9 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Meh, says you. I think that's more you imputing your misunderstanding of my ideology onto me and not what I actually think/believe.

Hypergamy for the Married Man

2 upvotes · 9 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Go one step further ... look up Georges Lemaitre. To quote Wikipedia:

Lemaitre also proposed what became known as the Big Bang theory of the origin of the universe

Oh yeah, and he was also a Catholic priest who essentially invented this theory while teaching at the Catholic University of Leuven.

Hypergamy for the Married Man

2 upvotes · 9 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Our religion sure did a number on this woman. That was not what God intended at all!

I think that's more her parents, abusing religion to get her to conform to their expectations. A sad, yet common reality.

The woman's unfailing mythical Chad Detectors are absolutely EASY to fool

I've noticed this repeatedly. But you have to be careful or else you start to contradict what you said in that one conversation with willow on RPC about window dressing. Yes, they're easy to fool, but at the same time, the man still needs to internalize it. It's not just "fake it to get what you want, then keep faking it" - it's "become the type of person who gets what he wants."

AND that you can manipulate your relative SMV by basic behavioral changes- in the same way women alter their SMV with a corset and makeup and high heels.

Perhaps, but there is a timing difference. The woman's change in SMV can literally happen instantaneously or in a matter of minutes. The man knows who the woman used to be, but doesn't care if she's dolled herself up in the moment and acting all slutty at a given time.

On the other hand, if a guy steps up his alpha game, the woman will still judge him by his past behaviors and it takes time to convince her that his new behavioral patterns are more than just an act to get in her pants. This is why, as you say, dread occurs over a span of several months - even a year or more, and not something that can be employed all at once for immediate results.

you show not that HE is not a threat to YOU. You show that YOU are not threatened by HIM. See the difference?

Absolutely. I was careless in my wording.

Hypergammy is not good or bad, it just is.

Agreed. I wasn't saying hypergammy is bad. I was saying that it can work for you or against you. If it's working against you, those are the "negative impacts" I was referencing. The whole point of the post was about how to stop hypergammy from working against a guy and get it working for him instead. Stopping a woman from being hypergamous would be tantamount to trying to turn her into a man, and I assume we all don't want to be married to dudes.

Hypergammy for the Married Man

2 upvotes · 9 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Some of the items I listed have been added, but divorce has always been an option. When I said in the past that it's not, it's because the conditions by which I would consider it an option were not in existence at the time, so I was trying to nip the "ditch and replace" comments in the bud. Obviously that has pretty much always been taken the wrong way.

Hypergammy for the Married Man

2 upvotes · 8 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You're probably right on that. There are just some standards that are so mass accepted that it seems to be objective.

And no, I don't intentionally seek orbiters. But that doesn't stop them from finding me.

Hypergammy for the Married Man

2 upvotes · 8 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The practical application points are based on things I have naturally done, not mental strategizing angst implementation. As noted in the post, one of the examples came from almost a decade ago, long before the notion of sexual strategy entered my mind and before MRP existed. They come from a place of thinking, "I noticed this worked for me, maybe it will for you too."

Suggestions on how to undermine the crab bucket

2 upvotes · 6 November 2017 · /r/askMRP

"Christian" friends who are, of course, actually feminists underneath their Christian cover

Oh, how I hate those who give us (Christians) such a bad name.

I am "using" her because I refuse to legally marry her

Let's be fair here. You are. Even if you married her, you'd still be using her. It's not a real relationship if it didn't involve each party trying to use the other for something.

her friends keep telling her ... I've been .. calling out ... and telling my girl

Okay, it's your word against theirs. In a word-battle, she's going to side with her girlfriends every time. She might behaviorally align with what you say, but internally she will feel like they're her real support system, not you - especially if they're telling her what she secretly wants to hear anyway.

Solution? Don't use words. Don't tell her anything. Just do you.

This is common problem for men dating Christian women

I can say with 99% confidence she's probably not a genuine Christian. She probably has the fear of hell in her, so tries to self-identify with a religious organization in the hope that her skin won't be melting off for all of eternity, but that's not how Christianity works. If she were truly "saved" she wouldn't be dating a non-Christian or having sex before she's married (or at least she'd have serious convictions against it after every failure that it would severely affect the relationship). This comment demonstrates that somewhere around 18.65% of people who attend church regularly actually meet some minimal criteria for "saved" ... and if that number is extended to all self-identifiers, it's only 3.8% of all people who call themselves Christians. Chances are you found someone in the 96.2% (or if she does go to church regularly, the 81.35%). I wouldn't take her faith seriously, especially if she's already shown significant signs of being willing to compromise it when it suits her fancy.

The reason she's so influenced by these other women (even though the odds are that those other women are also in the 81.35%) is because women inherently get their identity from other people. So, if they want to figure out if they're "Christian" or not, they look to other "Christian" women for validation. If these other women give a nod, then she feels secure, even if it's a false identity coming from a false source. As the man, it's your job to give her an identity. When she lives in your frame, she's adopting your identity. If she's that worried about eternity, she's always going to have one foot out the door, looking to someone else for that aspect of her identity (whether right sources or not), and you need to decide if you're okay with that.

208 - Leadership Part 2

2 upvotes · 4 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

We periodically talk about the state of our marriage at my prompting.

Do you ever wish he would initiate these conversations?

I've read on RP subs that a woman can never love a man the way he desires. Yes she can and yes I do because Sarah and Ruth are my role models.

I agree with you on your thoughts on this. That said, to be fair to the rest of the RP community, I think they mean this in the same way they mean "AWALT" - not all women are actually like that, but all have that underlying imperative. Some women actually aren't like that - but only because they're suppressing the tendencies that really are there, exercising greater self-control.

In this situation it works similarly - all women find it incredibly difficult to love their men the way those men want/need to be loved. Some are able to overcome that underlying difficulty better than others, but the struggle is there - and your story affirms this. You just happen to be a woman with a stronger drive :) Props to you for that!

I've read that a man cannot show weakness or she will lose interest and branch swing or have an affair.

This goes to the "useful" v. "non-useful" assumptions category. Again, it's clear that many women remain totally faithful to extremely weak, beta guys. In fact, I saw a thread on askMRP recently where one of the mods reamed a guy for over-hyping the "all women cheat" notion, and his point was just as I said: "The evidence is that many women do remain faithful to weak, beta men."

But assuming she'll be faithful no matter what is not a useful assumption. It doesn't help the man better himself, nor does it protect him in the event he actually did marry one of the cheating-type with low self-control.

Assuming she might cheat under the wrong circumstances gives a guy a reason to keep improving - which also benefits his wife. It also (1) prepares him to minimize the risk of cheating, (2) puts him in a position that helps her exercise self-control and develop strength of character, and (3) minimizes the devastation he might otherwise experience if she actually does end up cheating anyway.

Basically that a woman isn't capable of actions of love without a man leading her.

That I disagree with ... but I should qualify: Without God, I do believe he is right. 1 John 4:8 says that God is love. So, without God no one is capable of pure love the way God intends. I say this boldly, but with reservation at how I know how poorly this will be taken by many, but I do not believe non-Christians are capable of true, pure love. They can experience and express a shadow of it, but not the real thing (see Hebrews 7-10 re: earthly expressions being "shadows" or "copies" of the truer heavenly things; and I believe pure love is one of those "heavenly things" that non-Christian love cannot rightly attain).

In this regard, even non-Christian men are incapable of loving their wives appropriately, nor can they lead their wives to love them fully. As among shadows, I can't say for sure - but I do suspect that the "shadow" concept is partly why many men on MRP don't experience love "the way he desires" - because God has put in a specific desire that only He can fill and no woman can fill that void.

Now, among Christians, I do believe that a woman who is living by the Spirit CAN love her husband appropriately and purely, even without him leading her into it. But this is working against the grain of the order of creation. It's possible, but not the way God designed things to function, so it's easier to facilitate pure love as a two-way street when the husband actually is leading his wife.

Anyway, I will be deleting the painful part of this post.

I'm sorry to hear that any of this is painful for you. What about it causes pain? Is it at remembering how much you have sacrificed for the sake of being loving and submissive?

Back to Basics – Mystery Method, The Game, and the Rules of the Game, Married Edition

2 upvotes · 3 November 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Dang! A month to write a post? That's insane. Longest I've spent is probably 2 hours :p You're making me feel lazy.

FR: Why having a mission is so important

2 upvotes · 3 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

We're starting a new small group sometime in the next month or two and this time it's mostly made up of people she's inviting (I've drawn the crowd for the last few groups we've led). It will also be more co-led this time, rather than past groups where I did all of the teaching and facilitating.

Also, she started an 8-week women's group last week, where she's implementing things that I've instilled in her in the girls in that setting.

Also, I'm encouraging her to invite more families from the neighborhood for dinner, which we just had a couple over last night that she had invited. In the past I was always the one connecting with and inviting people.

We're also scheduled to lead a conference in February on spiritual healing/freedom where I'm writing most of the content and she stepped up and decided she wanted to be the one to share the Gospel on-stage for the conference and write all the content that would go in the handbook for it. This is very exciting given how introverted and timid she usually is! From being too shy to pray out loud at small group to speaking on stage at a conference is huge :)

FR: Why having a mission is so important

2 upvotes · 3 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

We're starting a new small group sometime in the next month or two and this time it's mostly made up of people she's inviting (I've drawn the crowd for the last few groups we've led). It will also be more co-led this time, rather than past groups where I did all of the teaching and facilitating.

Also, she started an 8-week women's group last week, where she's implementing things that I've instilled in her in the girls in that setting.

Also, I'm encouraging her to invite more families from the neighborhood for dinner, which we just had a couple over last night that she had invited. In the past I was always the one connecting with and inviting people.

We're also scheduled to lead a conference in February on spiritual healing/freedom where I'm writing most of the content and she stepped up and decided she wanted to be the one to share the Gospel on-stage for the conference and write all the content that would go in the handbook for it. This is very exciting given how introverted and timid she usually is! From being too shy to pray out loud at small group to speaking on stage at a conference is huge :)

204 - Abundance Mentality ... and Humility? Yes, both.

2 upvotes · 1 November 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Glad to hear it :) I always advise to continue testing everything against Scripture. Even I go back and question some of the stuff I've written and wonder if it needs revision or is really biblically sound. So, always feel free to challenge and ask questions.

In the meantime, I'd love to hear your story and what's been going on during your lurking phase. Maybe make a post about it!

207 - Perseverance, Sin, and Fitness Tests

2 upvotes · 31 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Unfortunately, this sub is probably the closest thing in the world you'll find to a "red pill church." I'm sure they exist ... I just haven't found one. I had a pastor who was unwittingly a clear red-pill type guy, but he moved off to the other side of the country ... Phoenix, AZ. Very sad.

And so my journey must begin

2 upvotes · 31 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

if my wife left the home and took my kid?

If she did this, she's got bigger arguments to worry about than whether or not you were an involved enough dad.

Even so, if you've provided financial support, attempted phone contact, attended the kids' sporting events, how often you've tried to reach out to her to spend time with your kids, how long it took you before initiating court action, etc.

if I'm deployed overseas?

Unfortunately, military personnel, as a practical matter, do not get custody often due to the nature of the job calling them away at a moment's notice and the inability to make parenting decisions and spend time with the children while on deployment. That said, if the mother is totally screwed up, it does happen, and the father just has to make arrangements for while he's away on deployment. In the alternative, some men simply have to choose between continuing a career in the military and having custody of their kids.

As for the arguments, the above still applies with regard to your efforts to be involved.

I need some encouragement about remaining sexually pure.

2 upvotes · 30 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

When you say that it's better for some people to remain unmarried, isn't that like some serious straight-up RPChristian stuff? I feel like RP mainstream is mostly about getting laid.

It's not unique to Christianity. /u/Whitified and I have had lots of conversations - ultimately in agreement that marriage is the lesser option in a Christian world, but head over to TRP and you'll see swarms of advice there on why RP is "anti-marriage" (or more accurately: "anti-marriage 2.0" ... or 1.5 or whatever). Neither secular nor Christian RP will tell a person they're "wrong" for wanting to include marriage as part of their long-term goals, but making marriage itself the goal is the epitome of the beta mentality. You must have a transcendent purpose for wanting to get married - both in secular and Christian RP.

The difference is that secular RP abandons marriage because it's easier to get great sex when you're not married, so getting married puts you at a disadvantage on any sexual dynamic. Christian RP discourages marriage because (per 1 Cor. 7) it interferes with a person's ability to commit to his mission from God, while continuing to deny sex outside of marriage.

Do you know guys who are single and happy?

Yes. They're the types of guys who could easily get girls/sex if they wanted, but have chosen otherwise for an intentional purpose - and usually they're uniquely capable of remaining celibate once properly unplugged from cultural conditioning toward sexuality as being the primary focus of life.

I don't know anyone in real life, any female, I'd like to have mother my children and wake up to, etc.

And therein lies part of the problem - those are peripheral aspects of marriage that show that your view of Christian marriage is still about each other and not a greater purpose. It's nice to have someone you can enjoy waking up with and raising kids together ... but those are secondary to the purpose of the leader-helper dynamic in the context of the God-given mission to make disciples of all nations.

A priest told me I should look at relationships as exploring other people.

That's a good way to put it. I consider it more like an intimate job interview. God started an organization called the church. He put you in charge of a specific division in your locality. He says you can fulfill that on your own if you want, but if you feel like you need a helper, go for it. So, you decide to hire an employee to be your right-hand-woman - someone who will help you manage the day to day operations, marketing/getting the word out, handle administrative tasks, etc.

Online dating sites or "word of mouth" from friends are the weeding process where you're sorting resumes and gathering recommendations from other colleagues you trust. The first date is the initial interview. Dating itself is like an internship - a trial period with no long-term commitment, but necessary to test the waters and see if this person will actually help or not. Marriage is the post-internship employment contract. Of course, in the church this is an eternally binding agreement. You can sever practical relations, but God only gives you one "hiring token" - and once you've spent it, it's gone (unless you maintain a view that remarriage after "divorce with grounds" is not sinful).

Now, if we all had this mentality, wouldn't that drastically affect what we look for in a woman? Of course, this context leaves sexuality as a sideline thing - but that's exactly what it should be. It's a secondary function of marriage itself in a post-Gospel world (in a pre-Gospel world it was the primary because sexual reproduction was necessary as a metaphor to help people understand spiritual reproduction in a post-Gospel world).

From here it should now be much clearer how devastating it is to make the marriage your goal in life - especially the woman. How would it make any sense for a regional manager to interview dozens of people and go through several interns just to find an intern he can devote his life to pleasing, at the expense of the company? That's literally what 1 Corinthians 7 is saying happens when we get married for the sake of the marriage - it's a distraction from our actual purpose. The new employee then doesn't actually have a job because the regional manager has folded the company in order to center everything around the employee, who is left wondering, "Wait, why did I want to get hired here in the first place? Oh well, if it's going to be all about me I might as well just take advantage of it and live it up as much as possible," and thus men get manipulated in marriages.

And so my journey must begin

2 upvotes · 30 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Sound Activated Recorders (SAR) are not admissible as evidence (and their existence should be Top Secret), but they can give you direction on her intentions.

That's state-specific. My state allows audio recordings as long as one person involved in the conversation (i.e. you) consents to the recording. The other person can be oblivious and it still counts.

I need some encouragement about remaining sexually pure.

2 upvotes · 30 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Why do I still struggle so powerfully with this?

Because you don't have a mission in life that transcends your sexual desire. You are still living in the blue pill - you idealize marriage and sex as some ultimate goal in life. You have made it your emotional center. RP is about breaking that ideology and returning to a state where you're in control of your desires rather than letting cultural influences and social norms tell you that you should want sex and that marriage is some ideal bliss that everyone should strive for.

In reality, marriage, at its core, is a contract to enter into a partnership for a common purpose. The man sets the purpose. The woman says, "I like your purpose. I want to be involved and I trust that you can actually get that purpose done. What can I do to help? Where do I sign?" This is the leader-helper dynamic God established in Genesis.

If you don't have a purpose, you're not going to find a wife. It's that simple. Or if you do, you're going to find one who will likely reject you when she figures out your life is aimless or that she doesn't like whatever purpose you end up coming up with after the fact. The worst thing you can do is to make your wife your purpose. This is the epitome of the blue pill mentality and it will crush you. It's also why you're still struggling - because you have an ideology that needs to be broken. When you have a right view of sex in its relation to your purpose, that's when your struggle will become manageable. It will cease to be an ideology that you worship and instead become a tool to drive the ship forward.

Why does my desire to please Christ so barely edge out my desire to please myself?

Because you're still on the blue pill. You still have a fantasy world about marriage and sex. Someone like /u/BluepillProfessor is far better at explaining all this than I am. /u/Whitified probably has some useful things to say on the topic of unplugging as well.

But from a Christian vantage point, there's another layer to "the red pill." TRP and MRP stop at understanding the truth of how intergender relational dynamics function. But the matrix analogy works much, much better and more completely when we understand that taking "the red pill" encompasses the whole of the spiritual influences behind all of the physical life. There are literally angels and demons running around fighting battles and whispering in your ear. There are hierarchies and schemes and plans that have been in the works for centuries. There is another dimension - a spiritual realm - hiding behind this physical manifestation that we get to see with our eyes and feel with our hands. The physical world is merely the matrix - a place originally designed by God to be a paradise for spiritual beings to experience physical bliss.

When the fall happened, that physical reality became a prison. We lost touch with the spiritual truths behind our being and the enemy contorted the physical realm as a curtain to hide the truth of what goes on behind the scenes - just as the machines did to the humans in the matrix. When someone unplugs, they start to see the world for what it is - a copy or shadow of the real world, and one that only purports to have a sense of order while actually being a placation tool against the reality of the war that goes on in the spiritual realm. That war is fought over souls. I know that sounds cliché, but it's literally the truth. The devil's goal isn't to get people to sin - it's to use sin as one of many tools to keep people from being unplugged.

You are still plugged in. You still think that anything that happens in the matrix actually matters. As a result, your pleasure matters more than God's pleasure because you don't see the gravity of everything happening in the spiritual realm and the importance of the mission we, as the unplugged Christians, have to play.

Why is God silent when I ask for a wife?

Because he's more interested in you becoming a soldier. The wife's job is to help her husband. If you're not on a mission, you don't need help with anything, so why would God give you a wife? Worse yet - if you're on a mission that's inconsistent with God's actual universal goals - he would be doing harm to his purposes by giving you a wife. That's why I say repeatedly: find a mission first. "Seek first His kingdom and His righteousness and all these things will be added to you as well" (Matthew 6:33).

Then, of course, is the fact that God wants you to take ownership of the whole situation. Once you're on mission alongside God - on His mission and not whatever purpose you may concoct for yourself - he wants you to conduct the interviews and figure out who will be best suited for the job. Tag: /u/OsmiumZulu - in case some of this helps with your upcoming content for single guys :)

Why am I so weak?

Because you're plugged in.

What am I supposed to be learning?

The reality of how the world works - both in the RP intergender relational dynamic sense and in the broader biblical sense of everything happening on a spiritual level. But it can't stop at learning - it must switch to applying in both cases.

If a wife is not part of God's plan for me, does it get any easier?

If you remain plugged in, no. If you unplug, yes.

I need some encouragement about remaining sexually pure.

2 upvotes · 30 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Not sure why this got downvoted ... it all seems solid to me.

I need some encouragement about remaining sexually pure.

2 upvotes · 30 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

God wants to be first in your life, and may be withholding the wife you want until you are willing to put Him first

I find this to be true for many people in a wide variety of situations - not just this one. Well said.

I need some encouragement about remaining sexually pure.

2 upvotes · 30 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

we both needed time to mature

This is key right here.

Wifey misses the feelz

2 upvotes · 26 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

As you alluded to, Jesus only forgives genuine repentance, not insincere words designed to sweep a situation under the rug. A genuine apology requires repentance. Because we're not omniscient like God, we must discern behavior over time, meaning the immediacy of the forgiveness component is not truly possible among humans.

Consider a wife who cheats on her husband. She begs and pleads and apologizes so he will take her back, and he genuinely believes her and says he forgives her. Is he really going to release all consequences so quickly? Will he let her grab dinner alone with her ex the next day? No, because he needs time for her to prove the genuineness of her repentance.

Working on the Sidebar

2 upvotes · 24 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting. I heard that he had propositioned Dalrock to co-write a book about RP Christianity, but the project never got off the ground.

I take the view that morality is subjective, but enforceable by power. Because God is the most powerful, we are judged by his morality. We can all choose for ourselves which side of that judgment we want to end up on, becoming submissive to God's standards or following our own. So, if God decrees that cheating on your wife or engaging in divorce (limited exceptions apply) is "immoral" by his standards, anyone is free to reject this. In that sense, RP is genuinely amoral, as are all things of their own accord (see Romans 14:14).

None of the descriptive aspects of RP are immoral because they're just ideas in a vacuum. It's not until they are personalized and internalized (and ultimately acted upon) that they develop a moral quality about them.

To that end, as long as RP is a toolbox, there is never a morality issue. Tools don't have a moral quality about them. But some tools simply cannot be used without creating a moral quality in the application. So, when a "hard core" RPer says that a person cannot truly be RP without embracing the tools of cheating and divorce without grounds as tools you are willing to employ - that person is inherently forcing RP to become a moral concept.

If RP is merely a descriptive set of truths, it is amoral. But if it prescribes that under certain conditions a person must act a certain way or is prohibited from acting a certain way, then it becomes a moral issue.

The Trident of Masculinity

2 upvotes · 24 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The same could be said of reddit - even MRP. For some, it's great. For others, they spend so much time reading and talking that they never actually get to the gym or game their women.

It's not that there's anything wrong with the medium itself. It's about how you use it.

The Trident of Masculinity

2 upvotes · 24 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Although it only applies to one type of "spiritual," r/RPChristians does hammer this point home quite well. The 300-level series is devoted to it.

Wifey misses the feelz

2 upvotes · 24 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

You've said a lot of good things here - and have done an excellent job explaining the dichotomy between the "ditch and switch" mentality evident on TRP from the Christian concept of spiritual oneness, which assumes a life-long bond before God that cannot be broken by man (even by divorce). When you say "like your own flesh" - the Bible goes further and says that you actually are one flesh. That your bodies don't just belong to each other (though it says that too), but that the other person's body is your body.

That said, I don't think pair-bonding and RP are incompatible, particularly from a Christian understanding of how God designed relationships. For those who do not comprehend how the human spirit functions, I can see why this chasm might seem to be the natural conclusion, but it doesn't have to be.

Rp is not about "unplugging from your wife" - it's about unplugging from the conditioning that your wife, and a feminist society at large, has placed on a man. It's unplugging from the notion that one must bargain for sex or from the idea that one even needs sex to be fulfilled as a man in the first place.

The sex-negotiation-game is actually just as big of a hindrance to pair-bonding as implementing commitment-fear to get sex. Although I don't doubt the effectiveness of dread, in some aspects it presents the same concept of negotiating for sex that most women employ. The difference is that women negotiate sex for physical service whereas dread institutes commitment and emotional security as the currency with which sex is bought - or in the reverse, that sex is used to buy commitment and security.

- Beta male mentality: I better do as many chores as possible and provide a lot of money and buy her nice things for the hope that maybe it'll be enough to get sex for a night or two this week.
- Female dread mentality: I better have frequent sex with him and give BJs and try new positions and kinks for the hope that maybe he won't feel like he need to respond to all those other girls giving him attention.

Betas tend to be defined by their emotional connection to ideologies beyond their control, whereas alphas sever those emotional connections and merely pursue pragmatic goals. The beta may have the same pragmatic goal as the alpha, but they are so emotionally invested in the goal that it affects how they perceive the path to accomplishing the goal, particularly when there are intangible ideologies at work that may muddle the clearest path.

On a separate scale, dominant people tend to maintain their own goals and manipulate others and their environment to that end. Submissive people adopt the goals of others and function within a prescribed role for the role's own sake.

When a man is beta, the woman will usually step up and become alpha. Someone needs to have a pragmatic plan or the ship sinks, so if the man is going to be an idealist, the wife will set the down-to-earth agenda. As I wrote to /u/matrixtospartanatLV, women typically don't have to play an intentional game here because they can get what they want most of the time without exerting any actual effort - particularly around beta males. The primary beta-male ideology is nobility and chivalry for the sake of the woman anyway. So, it's easy for women alongside a beta guy to just do whatever they want, screw the consequences - because they can still get what they want no matter how bad they act out; and this is the dominant actions behind her alpha mind-set.

When the man becomes alpha, there's a tendency for the woman to then shrink into a beta box rather than expressing her alpha in a submissive framework. But things don't have to be that way for the relationship to work. A man would do better to have a submissive wife than a beta wife and those are two different scales. I'm piggy-backing on your comment to brainstorm a bit here, but humor me in contemplating four potential categorizations:

- Alpha-Dominant Woman: Caution to the wind, she does what she wants, is not manipulated or controlled, and exerts her influence over anyone and everyone in range. When people oppose her or criticize, she doesn't take it personally and will often fight back or just go about her day as if nothing ever happened. She has goals and pursues them, but isn't emotionally tied to these goals and is not broken when a goal becomes unattainable. She simply readjusts her direction and plows ahead down the new path.
 - Archetypal Examples: Beatrix/Uma Thurman (Kill Bill); Meryl Streep (Devil Wears Prada); Sigourney Weaver (Aliens); Angelina Jolie (Mr. and Mrs. Smith)
- Beta-Dominant Woman: These are the harpies that most men are married to and complain about. They have an ideology of what life should look like and their emotional state depends entirely on (a) how closely her actual life is to that ideology, and (b) whether or not other people perceive her life as being close to this intangible ideal. Most of these women don't even know in detail what their fantasy life would look like, they just know they're not living it. No matter how much they get in life, they always want "the next thing." True satisfaction becomes an intangible goal. As a result, they lash out at everyone around them, blaming everyone else for why they're unhappy. They then use their emotions to manipulate others into getting them a little closer to their dreams, which always raises the bar on how high those dreams extend.
 - Archetypal Examples: Pretty much any sitcom TV wife ever ... think of Everybody Loves Raymond, King of Queens, Modern Family, etc. More classic examples: Vivien Leigh (Gone With the Wind) or Audrey Hepburn (My Fair Lady), although each of these women transform into the Alpha-Submissive by the end

- Beta-Submissive Woman: These women have fantasies about life and are emotionally attached to those fantasies, but they have relinquished control over their attainment. So, instead of manipulating others to push closer to her dreams, she has given up and latched onto someone else's dream, hoping to experience fulfillment in life vicariously through the satisfaction their man experiences in accomplishing his goals. Because their satisfaction in life is almost exclusively found vicariously and never directly, she often finds herself desperately clinging onto what little she has in life and is easily subject to manipulation; likely to fall into depression or otherwise emotionally withdraw from her partner or the world entirely [/u/slipknot_is_metal talks about this a good bit in response to conversations on upper-levels of dread].
 - Archetypal Examples: Molly Hooper (Sherlock); Bella Swan (Twilight); pretty much any damsel in distress who's only along for the ride
- Alpha-Submissive Woman: She has set childish fantasies and ideologies behind her and accepts life for what it is. She sets clear goals and makes plans for accomplishing those goals - but her primary function is one of supporting the vision of another. Her goal isn't vicarious fulfillment through someone else's joy in accomplishment; it's in the diligent fulfillment of her role in a grander plan for the sake of that role itself. Whether she is a pawn or the queen, her pleasure comes from being the best pawn or queen she can be - playing her part so that the game, as a whole, advances for the team she's backing.
 - Archetypal Examples: Catelyn Stark (GoT), Lois Lane (and pretty much any superhero's main girl), most Disney princesses (Belle, whose primary function is Beast's agenda; Jasmine, who follows Aladdin's lead; Mulan, whose strength serves a greater cause); Fiona (Shrek)

I think a lot of what you're describing is a break in the alpha/beta mentalities between women. But I do believe a woman can retain her alpha while still being submissive. RP hasn't explored this distinction too much yet and just assumes submissive and beta are the same thing within women.

Wifey misses the feelz

2 upvotes · 24 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

The pinnacle of leadership is to get someone else to come up with your idea and execute it with passion and precision.

This is pretty much exactly what I was trying to describe with my response here - let her take ownership of things and brainstorm, and let her think the ideas were hers all along and that they're working. This is how a leader can get his followers to engage with a personal investment in the leader's pursuit. Lack that personal investment and she'll feel like she's just fulfilling a duty, so fulfilling a duty is all she'll give back.

Then I told her she will always know how to warm me up.

And this is the flip that needs to happen. She wants you to warm up on her terms, and the husband must show her that the hot/cold knob isn't an emotional one, but a physical one. Women don't understand this because their emotions determine whether they're feeling hot/cold toward their spouse at a given time, so they assume it's an emotional system for the husband too. This is actually kind of weird because they know we're physically driven, they just lack any capacity to understand it and apply it.

This is why men must be intentionally strategic, whereas women are innately strategic. Sexual strategy comes naturally for them because there is no cultural imperative for them to need sex - they can get it any time they want. As a result, although they do employ strategy, they feel like it comes naturally. This is why many women can't stand the idea that men are employing a conscious strategy - because it comes off as being "fake," when in reality very few men naturally exude the strategy necessary to maintain a healthy sexual relationship in the context of marriage (or even outside of marriage, for the non-Christians).

An interesting thing I noticed recently along these lines - when beta men realize that women don't need sex because it's just always available, if the beta man isn't getting sex (or at least the sex he wants), his usual strategy is simply to withdraw his sexual attention and wait her out until she wants it so bad that she's begging him for it. I tried this strategy. I've seen several posts on deadbedrooms about guys saying, "I'm testing to see how long she'll go." It never works. That's why things like: will always be more effective than any beta-minded strategy. But this is also why men have to act as if these things come naturally to them.

Treat her like a woman. Game, kino, etc.

207 - Perseverance, Sin, and Fitness Tests

2 upvotes · 24 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

True, true. My only point there was that Michal lost her man over this issue. It's actually a very sad thing, but a reality that must be faced. Though I do just naturally assume most people know the story of David and Bathsheba.

What is going on in the head of Christians that give BP marriage advice?

2 upvotes · 23 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

People give bad advice, not always maliciously, but because it's from a paradigm of what they have come to accept in their own weakness.

The irony is that this all comes from a place of arrogance and pride. "Nice guys" believe that the world is bigger than they are, so they're incapable of doing anything other than being victims. They can't control whether or not their own desires are met. So, instead, they develop a means of self-validation whereby they can feel good about themselves even when they consistently fail to get what they want in life. They then pride themselves in this failure because they're living life by a higher standard. Then they think that everyone who is strong enough to go after what they want and actually get it is somehow weaker because they're playing on "easy mode." They aren't living by a higher standard - they do things too directly. But the "nice guy" - he has rules that he's made up for himself that make it much harder for him to get what he wants, so when he does get something to go his way he believes this is a greater victory than the 95% success rate the alpha males tend to have. "You took the easy way; I took the hard way. The hard way is much more rewarding." Then he looks at his life - the sexless marriage to an ugly wife with a mediocre dead-end job and acquaintances who never quite become friends - and he gets a self-satisfied, smug grin on his face because he earned it without "breaking the rules."

Now, God did give us rules - and they are not to be toyed with. But God's rules aren't in conflict with alpha-dom - they actually lead a person into becoming alpha and losing the beta mentality. The problem is when the Bible is read from a beta framework it's going to come off as beta. But the people who wrote it were in an alpha-dominated society where people would have been murdered for saying in quiet whispers what modern politicians preach to the masses. If we read the Bible from that mindset - the framework of the people who wrote it - we get a very different result. An easy way to do this is simply to parrot a catch-phrase before every command you read in the Bible: "The true alpha ..."

- "Do not lie" = "The true alpha does not lie" -> They don't need to. They're all OYS and tell it like it is. The beta avoids lying because he's afraid of the consequences.
- "Do not steal" = "The true alpha does not steal" -> He doesn't have to. He positions his life in a way where he can provide for those he loves. The beta avoids stealing because it's wrong and he might get caught.
- "Do not commit adultery" = "The true alpha does not commit adultery" -> He doesn't have to. He dominates the bedroom with his wife and is satisfied. The beta avoids committing adultery for fear of losing his wife.

The list goes on, but the point is that this actually explains why the commandments are beneficial. They're not just a list of bad/immoral things that we shouldn't do because God said so. They're a list of things that, when followed, compel us to live the life God designed us to have. That's why betas are so worried about how much they're sinning or whether or not what they're doing technically meets some weird theological definition of sin; whereas the alphas are more concerned with positioning themselves in a way where sin won't be a temptation in the first place.

Okay ... time for a post on sin-avoidance.

Tag: /u/generic____account (this was more written for you - I was just piggybacking on his comment).

Advice to a married recovering beta on initiating

2 upvotes · 23 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

any man could fulfill your position.....a beta provider is all the same right?

This is solid and doesn't get said often enough.

What she can't and couldn't accept that is that a large portion of my marriage to her was based on her body.

As I've said before:

- Sex defines the marriage (literally: God defines it by "two becoming one flesh"). If you're not having sex, you're just roommates.
- But because you can get better, more frequent sex outside of a monogamous marriage, if you're going to get or stay married, you'd better have a purpose for being in the marriage that transcends sex itself.

These two facts create an internal conflict that's often hard to reconcile.

We've not had sex in somewhere 3 years now, I've actually lost track to be honest.

Dang, I thought my 18 month streak was bad. To be clear, though - you said "example from my own past," but also are using present-tense words and say "now." I'm not sure if you're talking about a prior dead bedroom or literally from 2015-2017.

Going "cavemen" during the starfish/duty sex is your attempt at showing her how fun sex should be.

I'm still working on this. My wife is extremely sensitive to pain and probably has fear/anxiety-related vaginismus (she won't talk to a doctor about this). It's one thing to go a little wild and leave her sore. It's another thing when the slightest bit of insertion makes her grimace and wince. This happens pretty much every single time on initial entry, even if she's well-lubricated.

There are ways to avoid her having that reaction, but it involves a lot of time and foreplay and going very slow. I've tried the "just ram it in"/"caveman" approach to get the initial shock over with all at once and that never goes well. The two or three times I've done this she ends up crying in soaring pain and we have to stop. Once we get going, she's usually fine for about 10 minutes, but gets sore and either starts pushing me to finish so we can be done, or I'll remove myself and we'll do other stuff while she recovers so I can reinsert again. This all makes the dominance/caveman parts of SGM somewhat difficult.

Frankly reading Sex God Method will be of benefit. It goes into detail over the psychology of sex which is fairly complex.

I was actually disappointed in the psychology component of the book, but it was certainly worthwhile nonetheless. It neatly packages everything in a clear, easy-to understand way that you simply don't get from most other books.

Advice to a married recovering beta on initiating

2 upvotes · 23 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Well said.

What is going on in the head of Christians that give BP marriage advice?

2 upvotes · 22 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I should have been clearer: women are more likely to believe they have developed an emotional connection with God. They are generally more emotionally expressive than men and rely on their feelings. So, if they're praying and happen to feel something they assume it's God, whereas the man would be more discerning in many situations (although in increasingly shocked at how men are losing this discerning ability in recent years).

How does this advice change for dating?

2 upvotes · 21 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

No clue, but I do agree that the actual methods each person employs is unique to their own talents and gifts.

How does this advice change for dating?

2 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I do come from RP after being a big ole beta, after all.

This statement concerns me and makes me think the exact opposite. I believe you don't pedestalize women, but there's more to RP than that. Having a mission independent of your mate is a big part of it. As I just wrote to someone else on askMRP:

This is your problem right here. You don't have a purpose in life. As a result, you're just aimlessly wandering waiting for a purpose to fall in your lap. When a guy's like that, girls become his default. And when you make girls your default purpose, they become your emotional center. When your girl is your emotional center, your relationship jumps from want to need. When you feel like you need her, that's where you become totally subservient to the feminist imperative.

Now, you're not fully down this path. In fact, you're probably making some nice steps back. But right now you're somewhere between "she's my emotional center" because you're so worked up about whether you should keep her or leave her ... and "I need her" because you're showing clear signs of panic about the whole thing.

That last bit was targeted more for the other guy, but the point is still the same. You're not "subservient to the FI," but the longer you lack a life purpose, the more likely you are to slide in that direction - because at some point you're going to start to panic and think, "I'm X years old and all my friends are married, but I haven't found a wife yet! What's wrong with me?" and that emotional disturbance is going to ruin you.

Get the mission now and this problem goes away. Even if you do get to be X years old and wifeless, you won't care because she's only there to help anyway - and if you're doing fine without a helper, so be it. Now, you probably want a helper, and God designed you to have one - but you won't need one.

How do you guys keep an abundance/abundance mentality without actually cheating?

2 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

Abundance mentality should reflect the entirety of your life, not just your abundance of women. If you have a scarcity mentality about finances, but an abundance of women, you're still going to be pretty stressed and miserable and it will show in your relationships. For all the non-women areas, I wrote this post on RPC.

As for abundance mentality with women, a catch-and-release policy can work wonders. If you can get a number close and then just not follow-up, your psyche will get huge shocks of "I'm awesome" because you'll know you could easily start adding plates if you wanted to.

Personally, I'm satisfied with IOIs. I got some numbers in the past, and still do on occasion. I've had two different girls give me their number on my receipt at the drive-through in the last 4 months - and I wasn't even trying to game them.

In reality, I just focus on striking up conversations with hot girls. Back in the day the thought of talking to the "hot girl" was terrifying. Now I know that I can hold onto a conversation with one indefinitely - and keep her smiling and laughing the whole way through. I don't ask for the number. I just be awesome. If she tries to touch me, that's more than enough to show me where the conversation would head, so I'm cool cutting things off and leaving. Find your line and what you're comfortable with and hold firm to your boundaries.

How does this advice change for dating?

2 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

the ones who aren't need a lot of discipleship and spiritual maturity to become that way

As I have often said before - if you can't find a godly woman to bride and bed, raise one up. Finding a woman who is marriage-ready at the time you meet her is like walking into a random kitchen pantry and expecting to find a 5-course meal ready to eat.

Sure, someone out there might actually have a meal cooked and ready to go just sitting around, but that's extremely rare. It's more likely that you'll find all the ingredients in the pantry for a great meal, but you still have to do the work of warming up the veggies, saute the mushrooms and onions, grill the steak, etc. But even then, it's even more likely that they're not going to have all the ingredients for the meal you want to eat. So, you're going to have to figure out if you're okay with the meal those ingredients are capable of making or if it's worth the effort to go to the store to buy the ingredients for what you actually want - and then figure out if the kitchen has the equipment to cook that meal in the first place, and maybe the store nearby the house you walked into doesn't carry the ingredients you want, so you're going to have to find creative alternatives to get it.

Okay ... weird analogy, but it's the first one that popped in my head and I'm at work. Bottom line: if you want the "right" girl, you've got to find someone who has the raw material to work with, then disciple her to become that. In my view, there are only three necessary raw materials if you're a good discipler: Faithful, Available, Teachable. If you're a novice discipler or haven't disciplined anyone yet, you're going to need a lot more than just those 3. Solution? Develop your spiritual maturity until you're actively reproducing your faith and life in others - then you'll be much, much more prepared for finding a wife and raising her up.

Anyone have experience with NMMNG groups?

2 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

Yeah, I've definitely led enough small groups on other topics to know how to keep it from becoming a victim-puke fest. Also, I think the fact that I wouldn't be exposing them to the RP-verse right away would allow me to use trickle-truth to keep them from going Rambo. My basic outline would be patterned off the first 6 levels of dread, at least at first, and look something like this (sorry, this is more me just processing openly than actually responding to anything you said):

- Week 1: Intro - Everyone shares their stories; lay ground-rules for the group (i.e. no talking to your wives)
 - Assignment: Do something for at least 1 hour that you wouldn't normally do - break the pattern of your story
 - Spiritual Growth: Begin praying for your wife
 - Reading: NMMNG - 1/2 of the book
- Week 2: DL2 - Monk mode, STFU, and Lifting - talk about how and why; psychological boost, built attraction, etc.
 - Assignment: Lift 4 days, 1hr/day, cardio doesn't count
 - Spiritual Growth: Continue praying for your wife
 - Reading: Finish NMMNG
- Week 3: DL 1 - Unplugging; biological imperatives (polygamy/hypergamy; spontaneous/responsive desire); non-negotiable attraction; why BP mentality doesn't work
 - Assignment: Plan a family activity, prep everything yourself, and go do it - don't tell her about this, just do it
 - Spiritual Growth: Begin having a quiet time
 - Reading: First 1/3 of WISNIFG
- Week 4: DL 1 - Introduction to frame; recognizing fitness tests; importance of developing a mission outside the marriage
 - Assignment: Tell your wife "no" to something, and don't give in if she fights back
 - Spiritual Growth: Develop consistency in your quiet time
 - Reading: Middle 1/3 of WISNIFG
- Week 5: DL 3 - Male hobbies, spiritual growth, family leadership
 - Assignment: Do something on your own with another guy (preferably from the group) without your spouse/kids
 - Spiritual Growth: Begin practicing fellowship
 - Reading: Finish WISNIFG
- Week 6: DL 3 - Progress reports - share stories of what's working and what's not; successes and failures
 - Assignment: Try something that worked for one of the other guys
 - Spiritual Growth: Continue practicing fellowship
 - Reading: First 1/4 of MMSLP
- Week 7: DL 4 - Passing fitness tests (STFU, AA, AM, fogging, etc.) and conditioning availability
 - Assignment: Experiment with test-passing techniques more consistently; be ready to go to spend more time at the gym or hanging out with guys from the group if she's not responding well
 - Spiritual Growth: Begin studying parts of the Bible
 - Reading: Second 1/4 of MMSLP
- Week 8: DL 5 - Thinking beyond your wife; improving personal hygiene, bodily aesthetics, work attitude, and other stuff outside the relationship itself

- Assignment: Get a new haircut, buy a new outfit, step up your work performance
- Spiritual Growth: Continue in Bible study
- Reading: Third 1/4 of MMSLP
- Week 9: DL 6 - Game and kino
 - Assignment: Flirt with your wife and ease into kino, escalating if you've been easing in the whole series so far
 - Spiritual Growth: Begin delving into practical aspects of the Gospel
 - Reading: Finish MMSLP
- Week 10: Understanding frame at a deeper level; being an oak
 - Assignment: Take practical steps to work on your weak part of the oak - the strength or the comfort aspect
 - Spiritual Growth: Continue understanding and applying the Gospel
 - Reading: Genesis and Hosea (books of the Bible) [Might have them start reading MAP instead; haven't decided]
- Week 11: Abundance mentality; stay plan is the go plan
 - Assignment: Take 1 practical step to reduce scarcity/increase abundance (per this post)
 - Spiritual Growth: Begin Scripture memory (book of Philippians)
 - Reading: Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians (books of the Bible)
- Week 12: Progress reports
 - Assignment: Try something that worked for one of the other guys
 - Spiritual Growth: Continue Scripture memory (book of Philippians)
 - Reading: Read 2 books of the Bible you've never read before

There would be stuff beyond this ... but that's what I've mapped out so far. Thanks for letting me use your comment as a processing tool :p This was more just for my own benefit than anything else. [EDITS: Also, sorry if I keep editing this. It's easier to just keep adding new thoughts here than trying to set up a google doc.]

Anyone have experience with NMMNG groups?

2 upvotes · 20 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

Ah, good to know! Then I'll tag /u/reddreadwolverine to this post here.

Failure, not sure why

2 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

why the dichotomy?

What's the incongruence?

Chad isn't so much RP incarnate as he is the threat to you and your relationship

Sure, that's been my understanding as well, context-dependent, of course. The hyperbole line has me curious, though. What's the hyperbole that I confused? You're probably right, I just don't know what you're referencing.

Also don't confuse the idea of PUA with RP.

This is a good point. I think I assume that pick-up artistry is a sub-component of being an RP man - that you have to know how to game women, and for MRPs: your wife as well. So, I have traditionally seen PUA as a sub-component of the larger framework of everything that goes into an RP man. Is there another way to view this?

As for PUAs in the "artists" sense of the word, I usually associate that with seddit, not RP.

The ultimate goal here is to keep your woman from wandering. I believe the Bible admonishes men of this Indeed, it does.

Again something not said much on the MRP sub is that RP is a toolbox. Pick a tool and use it. TRP is a little different they would rather you play the game by the playbook.

Per my post from a couple days ago on "defining RP for this sub," I get the impression that anyone labeled "hard core" would disagree with this. They act like you must embrace all of the tools and if you personally reject any of the tools in your own life, then you're not "RP" and anything you say is tainted by BP virtues. After all, that's the reason cited for why I got banned from MRP in the first place (before being reinstated) - for saying on another sub that I reject cheating or divorce in my own life.

It's why there was a schism between the two a couple years back but it's now largely been healed

I would love to hear more about this. I know the 2-paragraph summary, but I feel like understanding the history better might help me grasp how MRP functions more clearly so I don't butt as many heads.

With feminism in play women are at a huge disadvantage in maturing.

True, true. But in addition to Dalrock's points (which are well taken) the Bible itself says as much. I mean, Paul says that women are not to participate in church - they're to learn in quiet submission and ask their husbands if they have any questions. So, single ladies are at a serious disadvantage already because God has designed the natural order that women are meant to develop in maturity through their husbands, thus a woman trying to mature without a husband (although possible) is going against the grain of God's design. If a woman does have a husband, but he's immature, he's never going to be able to lead her to become mature - you can only lead as far as you, yourself are. So, on the whole, female spiritual maturity is, indeed, a more difficult thing to see, although the modern church glorifies emotionalism, so women often get praised as being "spiritually mature" because they have an emotional connection that many men lack. This is a grave misunderstanding. I'd like to see Dalrock talk about that - haven't read enough of his stuff yet though.

But the church is largely to blame here

Agreed wholeheartedly.

Many men grumble about it but do little to stop it. I left.

Although I mourn over that decision, it is certainly an understandable one. I am probably 3-5 weeks out from starting an NMMNG group within my church (I have 3 guys ready, trying to put feelers out on 2 more). I almost made a post on askMRP about that last night, but decided to post 206 on RPC instead.

But as to the "Mother's Day" v. "Father's Day" differences in how the church approaches things, my biggest frustration is that even when the church does promote anything masculine, it's all gross stereotypes and not actual character issues. It's, "Let's go hunting and shoot guns" or "camping trip!" Activities don't make you a man. Those are only the context in which you express your manliness.

I mean speaking from authority because you have the character and the confidence to do so.

Gotcha - the same way the Bible says people were amazed at Jesus' teachings "because he speaks as one with authority," even though he was a homeless carpenter.

if I can do that at work ... then I can do this any where.

I had a similar epiphany with applying lawyer skills in my home.

IN my mind I see goofy getting up and trying to out embarrass the AMOG that showed up. Then again OP is way too worried about what she thinks.

This makes a lot more sense now - and I fully agree.

206 - Brace Yourself for Battle

2 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

But you've said that your plan is, essentially, to lay low and really not make an intentional effort in the fight. I've told you my plan, which centers around discipleship - and this sub is a springboard for other men to move in that direction as well (late 300-series will get there more specifically). So, the wait is short - the degree of influence will be the bigger challenge. But you can't hold out for some major church-wide movement to just spring up all at once. Jesus always started with a few to reach the many. That's what discipleship is all about ;)

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepilled to answer)

2 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I totally missed that quote before. Thanks for sharing that! For a book that MRP endorses, I'm surprised at how many people there reject this concept.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepilled to answer)

2 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

In case you haven't noticed, I've been following (stalking) you since you appeared.

I do remember you saying you would do this after a conversation about not wearing our rings. I kind of forgot about that, though. Hopefully it's been worth the effort?

I thought at first that you were him.

Interesting. In what ways, in specific?

In all cases the problem is the fight with the "vows" issue/hamster.

I can see that. And I should note: vows do mean something to me too. That's why I don't have a present intent to cheat. But, as I said, I also realize I am human - and for a long time in our marriage I had thoughts of cheating running through my head 90% of everyday. But I thought I had to hide that because "Nice Guys" hide their flaws. If she knew how dark and dirty I was, she wouldn't want me. She would hate me if she knew I was thinking that! How dumb I was.

In reality, Jesus tells us that confession is the beginning of solving our problems. /u/rocknrollchuck gave the example of being drowning, holding on to a plank of wood to survive and someone throws you a life raft. That piece of wood is all the garbage that I'm hiding, thinking that hiding it will save me. I have to let go of that plank

(by confessing) before I can grab the life raft, where true safety and life can be found. Jesus isn't going to magically make my sex life amazing if I'm still clinging onto all my old BP garbage ways of getting the job done. He's trying to throw me a life raft, but I have to let go of the thought that "hiding" will save me before I can accept his lifeline.

And, of course, confessing my weaknesses is letting my wife know: "I love you, but I want to screw other girls. I can't reconcile those two forever." This isn't manipulation to get sex. It's raw honesty. A kind of honesty that we don't see in Christian marriages very often. An honesty that, if communicated more often (on the whole within the church, not necessarily in one isolate marriage), might let wives know the gravity of a problem before the husband ends up cheating behind her back. After all, what's done in secret comes off in the church as, "I had no idea this was going on - how horrible that seemingly good people can be hiding so much!" But if a guy is just brutally honest with his wife, pastor, etc., then at least some semblance of integrity can be maintained. "He did wrong, but under the circumstances, who can blame him? He was open and honest, we tried to help in every way we could, but nothing was working. Eventually he got worn down and gave in. I get it." My own discipler made that comment to me once when I was struggling through pornography during my 18-month dead bedroom (no sex at all).

You'll note that with all the mega-church pastors who end up in major scandals, they're in those scandals not because of what they did, but because of the way they tried to hide it and cover it up. Brutal honesty is the key here. So, when you previously mentioned "plausible deniability" and "maybe not actually cheating, but giving the impression of possibly doing so" - I think those conversations and non-verbal communications can be given with a lot more honesty than most Christian men would be willing to admit.

I think a Christian Capt Jack Sparrow may be what you are looking for.

That's an interesting characterization for biblical manliness in a marriage. I'll have to ponder that one for a while. Thanks!

How does this advice change for dating?

2 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I should also note ... I disciplined a guy a few years back who is an ex-meth addict. After coming to Christ, being fully aware of the glory of meth ... he totally wishes he had never done it.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepillled to answer)

2 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Yep, I fully get all that. That's part of the foundation of my 107 post on why (most) women actually want to feel dread in a relationship. I'm also not beyond letting my wife think I might cheat on her someday. After all, Christian or not, I'm still a flawed human being. Just because I don't intend to right now doesn't mean it won't happen someday.

That singular concept probably deserves a post of its own, and could stir up serious controversy among genuine Christians, even here. But the truth is that even good, well intentioned Christian men often still end up breaking their promises of fidelity, even when they were sure they never would. So when we promise or wives a lifetime of faithfulness, we're potentially lying to them, or at the very least are speaking shallow words. Why give false assurances when doing so creates the exact circumstances where we are most likely to break the promises we just made? That just seems idiotic to me.

111 - "As I Say" v. "As I Do" and the Polygamy/Hypergamy Divide

2 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

there would be no need to police this with some sort of imposed restriction. Women would flock to the top guys naturally.

Well, hypergamy doesn't mean women go after the top guys. It means they go to the top guy they can get. For many women, the top guy they can get is a deadbeat guy who will abandon them and leave them destitute. So, you'll still have some of that problem. Even if they do hyper-game their way up a rank or two, they're still with low-income guys who can't afford multiple wives unless the wives are the income-earners supporting him and/or the other wives too ... in which case they're really marrying down, so that would be counter-productive to the hypergamous drive anyway.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepillled to answer)

2 upvotes · 19 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'll have to check that one out. I know if I had the choice, knowing what I know now, I would do things very differently and probably avoid marriage altogether. But, and I know it's cliché ... I would never want to lose my kids.

Developing the RP Unfazed Attitude

2 upvotes · 18 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

when your wife sometimes doggedly sticks to her guns

Here's the fundamental problem. This phrase means you're operating in her frame. You see it as your job to get her to stop sticking to her guns - to move her. If you operate in your own frame, you'll realize that she's the one who has to move you. As a good helper, she should have valuable things to contribute sometimes. So, it's okay to move and adapt your frame when she has a legitimate source of improvement. But when she's wrong, she's wrong. You don't have to change her mind - make her feel like she's the one who has to change yours.

I think the butthurt mostly stems from a man's lack of internal emotional control

Indeed. Just as "the testing of your faith develops perseverance," so also does the testing of your frame. 2 Peter 1:5-7 lists a progression: faith -> virtue -> knowledge -> self-control -> steadfastness -> godliness -> brotherly affection -> love.

Self-control is one link in the chain, but a very important one. To master it, you need Jesus first, then to develop a character modeled after his, and then to understand how to utilize the character/virtue God is instilling in you - basically all the 300-series stuff. That's when self-control develops, which causes "steadfastness" - another word for an unbreakable frame. Then it affirms that this firm frame is what makes a man godly - that our godliness and strength should be applied for the benefit of our brothers (not in a beta way, but in an alpha/oak way) - and all of this is the epitome of love. Lose that frame and you compromise your capacity to love. The church will tell you the reverse - that breaking frame is how you love your wife. But that would be denying the "steadfastness" link in the chain.

The difference between immoral and amoral

2 upvotes · 18 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I appreciate the plug for RPC and am happy to entertain these conversations there. That said, even from a Christian viewpoint, I'm inclined to agree with you. Romans 14:14 is clear:

- I am convinced, being fully persuaded in the Lord Jesus, that nothing is unclean in itself. But if anyone regards something as unclean, then for that person it is unclean.

As with your gun analogy and the toolbox view /u/SteelSharpensSteel mentioned (which I just posted about on RPC last night) - tools are not evil; only what the user does with them. That said, there are some tools that on their own are quite innocuous, but could not realistically be put to practical use without calling the decision into question.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepilled to answer)

2 upvotes · 17 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I won't disagree there!

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepilled to answer)

2 upvotes · 17 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, this is crazy scary in comparing to how my wife used argue these points with me. She wouldn't deny Paul's authority, but she'd say things like, "He just seems arrogant and I don't know how much I trust him - I know it's still Scripture, but only as to what God intended, not what Paul intended."

Defining RP for this sub - and understanding the toolbox

2 upvotes · 17 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

The premisses of most RP material is based on evolution.

Evolution was developed as a concept to explain how humanity (and the rest of the world) got to be the way it is, but without utilizing the Bible. The bottom line is that evolution must lead to the same conclusions about actual human existence today because we know the end-result (we're living it). The Bible does the same thing - it gives a framework for how humanity came to be what it is today. Whether non-Christians want to utilize evolution as the backdrop, or Christians want to use the Bible as the backdrop, the fact is that we're all still functioning in the reality of how the world operates today. It doesn't matter so much how things got this way as it does understanding the way things actually are.

With this in mind, when I reference descriptive principles, I don't mean that as an endorsement of how the RP world explains these principles to have developed. I just mean the reality of how the world operates today.

Therefore, a RPC foundation would have to consider the fact that the human nature is corrupt and that our perspective about sexuality was also compromised.

Absolutely agreed! And I think that's covered in the first few posts in the 100-level series.

Without this understanding and the comprehension that only God can redeem and lead us into healthy relationships, the tools that could be developed to "fix" the problem aren't going to work very well.

Agreed. The 400-level series will address the Gospel as the primary and ultimate tool for all things that need to be "fixed" - I'm just not ready to start going down that road yet. I want to lay more of a foundation in the 300-level series first.

That said, if you want to skip ahead and make some more posts on appropriate Christian tools, I'd love to engage!

RP was initially considered to be a ideology to stop the feminism abuse on society and now it has become a roadmap to increase the chasm between the genders

This is an unfortunate reality :/

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

2 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

However not initiating sex would surely be much more effective if combined with other dread

As well as all the other RP concepts, of course. This post wasn't meant to replace all that - it was an appendage to deal with a unique type of problem that is surprisingly common that the mods and most flaired people simply don't get because they haven't lived it.

I find it all really funny, particularly after years of being on the receiving end of guilt trips and self-righteousness.

Good for you - and keep that attitude up!

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

2 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Scroll up to the top of the page - it's all in the original post.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

2 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

But for seasoned MRPers.. I can see why this is getting backlash.

That's why I tried to put up-front: "This isn't for the vets or men with wives who like touch/sex."

I now see that people do not want details, they want the dumbed down truth to save time and energy

True. But when we give the dumbed-down generalities, people misapply the concepts and then they get ridiculed for going Rambo and they're told they're idiots and fags and retards or autistic for trying to figure out how to do something when no one ever explained how to do it.

In general, I see the utility in brevity. But when dealing with mental health issues, such as a targeted sensory defensiveness disorder, you can't leave a lot to chance.

So instead, they just stick to general platitudes (MRP world: lift, kino, OYS, IDGAF, etc)

And then how many posts do we see on TRP - "I always see people talk about kino, but how do you actually do it?" or "I'm trying to lift, but I'm not seeing gains - how do I do it?" Or men who screw up the whole OYS thing and get ridiculed for not innately understanding what no one explains. It's one of those aspects of the manosphere that I simply don't get and quite loathe - ridiculing people for not doing what you've intentionally avoided telling them to do.

But all you have to do is just repeating the same dumbed down message over and over again to attract the unconscious masses of people out there (voters.)

But this attitude actually supports the accusers that say RP is just a cult - that it's more interested in getting people in than it is in actually helping them. I can't support that, and I don't believe that's what RP is.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

2 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

How would I learn or grow from quitting? That's just saying, "If RP on hard mode is too hard for you, just quit the game and start over on easy mode." I like hard mode. I enjoy the challenge.

Also, I started this process while fairly beta and trying to re-learn my alpha. It wasn't until I was around level 9 that I discovered RP. So, the thought of divorcing my ONEitis during this process didn't compute at that time.

Deconditioning the wife who is disgusted at your touch - 10 Levels of Kino

2 upvotes · 13 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Ugh ... I'm an idiot. To you and /u/red-sfpplus - that part of the drop in body fat was actually from February 1 through June 8. I've fluctuated a little since then but hover around 225. I want to get to 200 or less, and the way I diet that can be done in the month I'm giving myself starting next week.

I use the whole 30 plan for my diet (basically meat, fruit and veggies and nothing else). 30 days on that with no lifting and 1 day of cardio a week was enough to lose 20lbs. But I only did that for 45 days total. I normally just pay attention to CICO when cutting. When lifting heavy I eat whatever I want.

I certainly have stretch marks but no loose skin issues. The stretch marks have faded quite a bit too, so that's good.

I'll make the edit as soon as I'm at my desktop ... The mobile app won't let me edit for some reason. The lifting (165 to 250) did happen in 2 months though. It took another 2 or so months to get up to 285 (just this week).

As for the 7 year hell, that was mostly because I was beta like none other in my marriage. Knowing RP up front, your risk of that becomes insanely low. But I do agree - if you're someone who can handle not being married, this is the better path. But that conversation is better had on RPC.

Where Is The Good?

2 upvotes · 12 October 2017 · /r/askMRP

Heh ... my backsliding was long before then. Starting cardio was at least something of a step in the right direction. And I still do cardio ... I just make sure the 2-3 miles everyday is only my warm-up, not the main event.

Keto/LCHF

2 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/RedPillWives

Same experience here as soon as I ate some potatoes!

Sleeping Naked

2 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

haha

Sleeping Naked

2 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

True. And again, it's more because they're my gym clothes. She does most of the day to day laundry, including 100% of the laundry for the kids. But that's because I gave a hard rule on that one. She insists on this notion that if a kid wears an outfit for even 60 seconds, its dirty and cannot be reworn. This applies to pajamas too. So there's literally two loads of laundry everyday. My policy is if there's no visible dirt and it doesn't stink, its clean. But it's a "pick your battles" thing for me ... so she can follow her standard as long as she does all the kids laundry - and she's not allowed to complain about it.

Sleeping Naked

2 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Nice ... but I always got the impression Ken was just Barbie's man- toy.

Sleeping Naked

2 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

That's what I'm hoping for. One anecdote (mine) doesn't prove much.

Sleeping Naked

2 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Done that with clothes on. Haven't tried recently or with clothes off ... I imagine it would only really work if she's nude too.

Sleeping Naked

2 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I do the modeling thing and had her return 3 or 4 outfits. But let's get real ... the stuff I want her buying wouldn't necessarily be appropriate work attire in the first place.

Also, I do my laundry and toss her stuff in when I have extra room. 99% of the time I do laundry all I have is my gym clothes from the past 5 days or so plus maybe 2 work outfits, so there's usually lots of extra room. I do it because I need stuff, not waiting until it's backed up to a full load.

Sleeping Naked

2 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I doubt she's noticed the laundry pattern, but it's a fair point. Also, her spending was within the monthly budget I give her, so no qualm there. The comment was more about the fact that she bought more ugly clothes than n the fact that she spent money.

Sleeping Naked

2 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I would just cut out the TV part and I would say that is a good compromise.

True, but once every few weeks isn't a big deal - and I like the idea of cuddling up to a show with my kids rather than just going straight to sleep.

Sleeping Naked

2 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Haha, I wish. I have started a pattern that when I do the laundry I only wash her clothes that turn me on. The rest of them I re-bury at the bottom of the hamper and she can get to them whenever she wants.

Unfortunately, this backfired as she went out and bought a bunch of new clothes at the mall this past weekend, saying, "I noticed I never have enough clean work clothes, so I had to buy some more." Fail.

Keto/LCHF

2 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/RedPillWives

I did the Whole30, which is basically Keto on steroids. I've also done Keto for a while. From what I've gathered, it's great for people who have a predominantly sedentary lifestyle, but if you're highly active (i.e. training for a marathon, lifting weights, backpacking, etc.) then you're going to stunt your progress and feel miserable.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

2 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

wtf dude? Children are everything. For many men that alone translates to "Pre-nups are useless".

There's no alternative, though. A single guy has far, FAR, FAR, FAR fewer rights over his children than a married guy. So, if "children are everything," then that alone should be incentive for every guy to get married. Married men have presumed custodial rights over their children. Unmarried men have to start from scratch with default custody being given to the mother, usually they can't even get any rights at all until they get a DNA test first. So, +1 to marriage on the score sheet. Not being able to address the issue in a prenup doesn't hurt the father's rights, but being in a situation where you need a prenup in the first place (i.e. getting married) will, in fact, help his custodial rights.

Isn't marriage to him as good as a con? A scam?

That depends on how entrenched he is into his delusion and if he's one of the 50% who won't ever get divorced. If his marriage is in the 50% that lasts and he legitimately finds joy and satisfaction out of his delusional worldview, great for him. In that case, it doesn't matter whether it's a con or a scam - he's winning. Of course, that doesn't negate the fact that it's a risk that literally has the "flip of the coin" chance of backfiring on him.

If he's a non-Christian guy, it's actually probably worse. If the total rate is 50% divorce and the "dedicated religious people" rate is significantly lower, then that means that the "non-dedicated religious people" rate is higher than 50% to get to that 50% total average. But that's beside the point.

For the married guy: you have to walk on eggshells.

Maybe, and I'm sure that's how several of the 50% who stay together manage to stay together. But I'm sure there are also some in that 50% who don't feel that way (at least not most of the time - everyone feels that way some of the time).

Or at least, its a LOT of work (right women, right earnings, right this, right that... we're not lawyers!!!)

Totally agreed there. That will be true for 100% of couples who remain married.

especially if "keeping safe" involves doing all the things you mentioned in this whole thread.

Point understood, but really, "keeping safe" only involves two things:

- To avoid financial divorce rape, help your wife get an education and job on par with yours. It doesn't have to be exact, but if she's got 40% of the marital income and you've got 60% (that 60/40 magic ratio), you'll probably get out of support, even though your income is 1.5x hers (i.e. 50% higher).
- To avoid custody divorce rape: (a) don't beat your wife and kids, (b) don't do drugs, (c) act like you have sole custody during the marriage. Follow those 3 simple rules and you're guaranteed at least shared parenting 50/50 time.
 - Anecdote time: Our office recently handled a case (I only did nominal work on it) where the wife (our client) accused the husband of using the children to create child pornography, saying the evidence was on his phone. Interestingly, the children were interviewed and affirmed this and the husband's iphone (allegedly used to take the pics) was confiscated by the police and he refused to give up the password (due to the ESCA, the court can't force Apple to unlock the phone; FBI couldn't hack into it either). Dad got his parenting time temporarily suspended and eventually reinstated at the rate of 2 hours/wk. Dad, who otherwise had a good reputation and was a nice guy, requested psych evals. The psychologist found that our client (wife) was crazy and probably made up the whole thing and Dad is perfectly sane. We request two additional independent evaluations - same result. Turns out the kids made up the whole thing because they wanted to live with our client and dad refused to unlock his phone because he thought our client planted pictures on there to incriminate him. He did eventually unlock the phone and it revealed no pics. Next thing we know, our client (wife) is stuck with supervised visitation for 2 hours a week and dad has all the rest of the time with the kids. The court eventually starts realizing that mom wasn't being malicious - any mom whose kids were saying those things would have done the same thing. So, the case ends up in shared parenting with 50/50 time ... as pretty much always happens. The whole thing turned out to be "much ado about nothing." In the end, dad (a) didn't abuse his kids, (b) didn't have addiction issues, and (c) was an active, involved father - and despite all of mom's wild accusations, he still got his time, and for a time even had mom on the defensive.

- An important lesson from this story: women are crazy. AWALT. Even women themselves openly admit that they're all a little crazy. So, if men want to win custody cases, they just need to request psych evals. Women-crazy always shows up. Sometimes the guy is worse, but not nearly as often. Psychologists know what's up.

or that at least you can understand this TRP stance towards marriage is not irrational

From a secular point of view, it makes sense. Because TRP is secular, yes, I agree it is not irrational from their perspective.

As a Christian, I'm confident enough to say that marriage 2.0 is but a corpse, nothing like what God had created.

I agree. But as a couple other divorce attorneys pointed out in one of Rollo's MRP threads a while back, the laws are changing back. One of them even commented that it's more like "Marriage 1.5" now.

I'm not asking you to look for a challenge, only that you test this hypothesis against people who actually know what you're talking about :)

I follow now. In my view, it's not just a hypothesis - it's factual observation from firsthand experience of someone who watches not just one or two cases as an interested party (i.e. the person actually in the divorce case), but someone who sees literally hundreds of these cases a year (and in my office: the most extreme ones imaginable, as that is our specialty) who has an independent/uninterested perspective (i.e. whether my client wins or loses doesn't affect the fact that I get paid and my life goes on).

The infamous MIL ...

2 upvotes · 5 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

You know, I had the exact same thought for OP. But I had once asked the question of whether or not it was okay to share WISNIFG with your spouse because of similar issues as to OP, but the overwhelming response was: "Horrible idea." The main rationale is that it would teach her the tricks of the trade and how to be a better arguer against me, making it harder for me to lead her. She'll simply respond with things like, "Stop trying to fog and broken record me!"

What's your thought on that?

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

2 upvotes · 3 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

No fault divorce

I agree that this is a horrible law, but it's not slanted either way. Men take advantage of it just as much as women.

Do you not think the Law will suddenly change to suit the best interests of women, in an instant?

Given how unbelievably difficult it is to get the laws change, I don't think so. Over time, maybe - but doubtful for lawyering issues alone. Remember, the laws are already backtracking away from women's rights - a shift that has been happening since the 90s. Remember that once upon a time there was just a default assumption that mothers should get custody. The default in most courts now (at least in major metropolitan areas) is shared parenting with 50/50 time. There are now countless guardian ad litem who specifically advocate for men, recognizing that their rights have been gypped for so long. It's a very, very slow turn, and has not yet hit the break-even point, but the direction of the law right now is toward equality and away from favoring women.

Also, you conveniently left out the entire topic of Domestic Violence claims.

No, that's specifically what I meant by "custody issues where women lie in court."

The point here is that the entire system is set up not to favour you but the woman

Agreed. But, again, that's changing. As the older judges and magistrates finally retire (the ones from the 70s and 80s when women had the true power in custody battles) and new blood comes in, the new blood will only know the current law and will not have lived through old days of default power to women.

You know this. We in RP know this.

Not accurately, though. RP looks at a few isolated stories and creates this major boogeyman out of the "court system" and "domestic relations laws." They then exaggerate these things. And when they hear the stories of "divorce rape," you're 99% of the time only hearing the man's side of the story and not getting all of the facts that the judges are. I'm not saying it doesn't happen, but RP certainly exaggerates this. Why? I think it's one of the manipulative tactics that our [and I say that as the possessive because, for better or for worse I'm a part of it as well] communities use to keep people entrenched. I have yet to see a truly fair and appropriate solution to the problem from any MRA or RP source. Their answers are always, "Screw the women, just give men everything we want." That's replacing a broken system with another broken system.

The men who are aware of this are therefore expressing their lack of trust for the Law to look after their interests: a natural reaction. Its therefore irrelevant whether or not they can, as laypeople, mention any specific marriage/divorce law that's unfair: talk about missing the point!

I get what you're saying, but I trust facts more than anecdotes. The divorce boogeyman is a creation mostly of anecdotes - things that happened to a few people somewhere, most likely who are incapable of communicating an impartial assessment of the actual situation because they're still looking for validation from a community and the scarier their story the more validation they get. Those stories are by and large the rarity - they are the exception, not the rule. RP often says for every other area to follow the rule, not the exception (AWALT, for example) ... yet for this one thing they want to go the other way. It seems highly inconsistent and is one of the few areas where I lose a lot of respect for the RP community at large.

Interestingly enough, my opposition on that point is something of an anomaly. My faith-agenda (i.e. preserving marriage, opposing divorce) would actually be better served by giving more power to the fear of the boogeyman. But I cannot in good conscience feed into what I know to be a factually inaccurate representation, so I go against my own purposes in doing so :/

she is still legally the one who can end it anytime she wants, with terms very much in her favour

Only if the guy insists that she not pursue a career or if he marries someone who he knows will never have a comparable earning capacity to his.

This is really hypergamy's advantage more than anything. Women see a man's earning capacity as a significant factor in his SMV. Men don't consider this when evaluating a woman's SMV. The conclusion is that women are instinctively looking for marriages with men where they (subconsciously) know they will have the legal advantage because that's how they maintain the power in the relationship. If a woman marries down, the guy is the one with all the power and protections.

To put it another way, current divorce laws aren't pro-women, they're pro-underdog. I've had countless cases where I've represented the man as the lesser earner and he ended up getting all the same support, property, and custody rights that women typically get. It's the RP insistence to extend the "male dominance/female submissiveness" concept into household economics that is creating their own disadvantage. Now, to be fair, I totally empathize with that extension, but as I've often said before: I do everything I can to encourage my wife to increase her earning capacity, rather than stifling it. This makes my job in leading the household much, much harder when she sees herself as an equal financial contributor (or close to it), but I'm willing to take on that additional challenge to maintain the other dynamics on my terms. If other guys in the RP world are not willing to do so, that's their call and they can accept the consequences of that.

She is the one who legally gets to decide, she is the one who you legally cannot offend. She is even the one who decides whether or not you are the head of the house.

I still don't get where the law gives her this power. You can't just speak generally - there has to be a statute or case law somewhere that authorizes this type of attitude. Otherwise, what you're suggesting is that men are to be controlled by fear of divorce, which sounds counterproductive to the RP agenda. The only way she gets power is if the man cares enough to lose his stuff. Why is he so attached to it in the first place? Attachment to material crap is specifically counter-productive to the RPChristians agenda even beyond the traditional RP interests, where material things might matter a lot more.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

2 upvotes · 3 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Makes sense. Thanks!

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

2 upvotes · 3 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

of the couples who practice NFP, only 2% divorce

You have a source for that? I'd love to have that for future use.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

2 upvotes · 3 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

This is true as long as a feast follows the famine. If the wife is sexually denying during the "on" times, the husband's resentment will only increase during the "off" times, blaming it on her having just one more excuse to avoid him. That's dangerous.

Looking for resources on modern ways to walk into Christian marriage without the state involved. Are there any foolproof ways?

2 upvotes · 2 October 2017 · /r/RPChristians

While I appreciate your other comments here ... on this point I do have to ask: how can your husband know that for a fact, though? Or what about extreme situations? What if he cheats on you, then decides to murder you so he can be with his lover, so he stabs you with a knife and starts threatening to kill your children too? Would it still be "a fact that i won't divorce my husband"? And if there is a line that can be drawn as to when you will, what's keeping that line from moving? Other than pride, of course, which many Christians like to use the word "conviction" as a cop-out from admitting that this is really what it is.

I used to tell myself the same thing: I'll never divorce. Period. Even for infidelity. I know this as a fact. My mind has changed, as has my spiritual understanding of the matter. I realized that I was pretty darn arrogant about my views back then and it led me to make some serious mistakes in one of my early relationships. God had to show me my understanding was wrong and that there are times when he will cut someone off. Maybe 20 years from now your mind will change too. Maybe it won't. But no one can know that with absolute certainty - and to say so at present usually implies that, in arrogance, you're not open to correction from the Spirit on that issue.

Some people, of course, suggest that the Spirit is the one who gave them the conviction in the first place and the Spirit won't ever contradict himself. But I've seen those exact same people (with a 100% rate) eventually have to change their mind on something they were convinced the Spirit had told them. Given your Catholic background, if you lack the infallibility that the pope has in discerning God's will, or even if you have this power but are not exercising it at a given time (and I understand the times when that power applies are extremely limited and narrow in scope), then you can't say definitively whether or not something was from God, and therefore can't know for sure that God won't compel you to change your views on a matter sometime down the road.

James 4:13-15 seems on point here.

College Kid... Relationships are hard

2 upvotes · 27 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

2/2

Get Yourself a Mission

You need a mission apart from girls. Until you have that, you'll never truly be happy or satisfied in life. God didn't create you to be a boyfriend or husband. He created you to be a glory-bearer, glory-giver. Your drive for a physical relationship and to start a physical family is powerful because God uses that as a parallel for the spiritual relationship he wants with you and the spiritual family he wants you to build.

Ever wonder why even the Christian divorce rate isn't statistically different from the non-Christian divorce rate? Because most Christians have never adopted the mission of disciple-making. When you look only at Christians with an active lifestyle of evangelism and discipleship (as opposed to Christians on the whole), the divorce rate is something like 1/8 of the rest of the world. Why? Because they have a mission that transcends the relationship. This is what makes for a successful marriage.

Should I even do what's best for me?

People like this "JOY" acronym for how you should prioritize your love and efforts: "Jesus first, then Others, then Yourself." It sounds noble. But Jesus said, "Love your neighbor as yourself." Not "more than yourself" - as yourself. That is, you can't love your neighbor until you learn how to love yourself first. Then, 1 John 4:20 says, "If anyone does not love his brother whom he has seen, he cannot love God whom he has not seen." In other words, you can't love God until you learn to love his people first (see also Matthew 25:40-46 - amazing passage). So, the real order is that you need to learn to do what's best for you before you can have the type of overflow to figure out what's best for others, and you can't really say you love God rightly until you get to that point.

What about her heart and life and situation?

You goofed. You got into a relationship you shouldn't have gotten into. Mistake made. Now that you're aware, the best thing you can do is get out. Continuing in a mistake doesn't undo the mistake - repenting and turning away is what redeems our mistakes.

As for her heart, it's one thing to say you're not responsible, but I get you're still going to feel that way. Humans are weird like that - feeling responsible for other people all the time. To be fair, Jesus modeled this for us, by bearing the responsibility for our sin on the cross to deal with the fact that apart from him we're utterly irresponsible. And honestly, once you're married to someone, you do need to model Jesus' behavior in the relationship in every way, shape, and form. But not while you're still dating.

AXIOMS to Consider

Here are two new axiom I'm going to create for this sub, just for you ...

AXIOM 1: If your woman is with you for a particular reason, she'll leave you on the grounds of that same reason.

- If she's with you because you're good looking, when you gain 30lbs after the honeymoon, she'll leave you for a better looking guy. If she's with you because you're intelligent, but you end up wasting all your time on Netflix rather than stimulating conversation, she'll leave you for another intellectually stimulating guy.
- Inversely, if she's not with you because of your mission in Christ, your being on a mission for Christ won't do much toward keeping her around. If you don't have that mission yet, you'd better believe she will resist that mission when you get it. Why? Because your mission will interfere with whatever real reason she's with you in the first place.

AXIOM 2: If your woman isn't with you because of your mission, she will interfere with your mission. This will make her miserable, not just you.

- You'll be miserable because you'll feel isolated and alone, even from your own wife, because you don't have a common purpose. I lived this for years 2-8 of my marriage. Don't make that mistake.
- The reason the wife is miserable in this situation is not only because her actual reason for being with you is in conflict with your dedication to the mission, but also because she is designed by God to be a helper, and if she isn't 100% sold out on your mission, how can she fulfill her role as your helper if she's not on board with what you're doing in the first place? And if she isn't really helping you to fulfill something she's jointly passionate about, she will feel empty for not being able to live out the purpose for which God created her.

How does one even behave in this situation?

The same way as every other situation:

- Love God - adopt his purposes as your primary life aim, not finding a girl; repent from your mistakes no matter the cost
- Love Others - be tactful and caring about others, mindful of the implications your decisions to love and follow God have on their life
- Make Disciples - invite Christ into every aspect of all of your relationships; don't make projects of people who aren't ready to commit to Christ, and don't commit to them yourself either.

The real "Red Pill" that you need to swallow

2 upvotes · 26 September 2017 · /r/ExRedPill

Every theory says the same thing.

303 - Fellowship

2 upvotes · 22 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

1. God told us to (Hebrews 11:25-26, I think)
2. Because Christianity is not about puffing ourselves up; it's about giving to others.
3. Those of us who understand godly manliness have a spiritual obligation to impart what God has shared with us to others (i.e. "Ask not what your church can do for you, but what you can do for your church" mentality).
4. Because the church has side/peripheral benefits that we cannot get in its absence, even if we have to filter out some of the garbage.
5. Because, for better or for worse, God has allowed the western church to be what it is and we shouldn't reject what God has not rejected.
6. Because it provides a convenience for finding other believers with whom we can fellowship and minister - something much harder to do in the absence of a local congregation.

There are more, but these are the big ones for me. As I often tell people: Work to improve your church; until it's in great condition, consider it a tool that provides resources you can't get anywhere else; the most important resource is that it brings together believers who might otherwise be difficult to find.

303 - Fellowship

2 upvotes · 22 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

You ever read the book The Insider by Jim Petersen and Mike Shamy? The whole book is devoted to what you're talking about. Good stuff. Great resource for helping new Christians remember to keep ties with their old non-Christian friends without breaking off the relationships because the church gives that unspoken pressure to do so.

due to the lack of frame many Christians have some condemn, others try to change the conversation for lack of knowing how to respond without feeling like they're encouraging the behavior

So, so true.

I wrote a book on discipleship (unpublished) that addresses all of these processes and problems. Some of that will be included (in very small degree) when I get to the evangelism post :)

Therefore, with a strong frame, us Christians can be equipped to interact with non-Christians, maintain Christ's light in us, all without loving the world.

Yeah, I feel like most Christians need to read a book titled: When I hear 'No' I Feel Guilty. When's that one coming out? I suppose WISNIFG will do for now.

303 - Fellowship

2 upvotes · 22 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

What denomination are you guys?

I don't identify with any denomination. I have been involved with countless and currently attend a Nazarene church, but disagree with much of their theology.

Lord's Supper

Yeah, this has long been my position as well. When you look at the way Jesus modeled "communion" (which the Greek of 1 Cor. 11 for that term is koinonia which implies a oneness fellowship/relational bond, not a ritual), it's more about bonding together as believers over the mission to make disciples (i.e. the primary purpose of the church). This simply cannot be done in a "10 minutes at the end of service" ritual. I was once asked to teach a class for my church about communion and had to declined because I told them point blank: "The way you do communion isn't biblical, is not what Jesus modeled, and serves no valid spiritual function." Rather than discussing the matter and re-evaluating, they just found someone else to do it. Sigh.

from personal observation alone... there are many, MANY Churches today that insists that all fellowship and meetups among members today have some deliberate "Christian" intent behind it True. Although I agree that "good Christian fellowship" cannot exist in the absence of a spiritual bond being fostered, it's unhealthy to be all relational or all intentional.

I train small group leaders to include 3 elements:

- Relationship building - fun, games, and just generally getting to know one another. Go bowling, see movies, hang out at a restaurant, etc.
- Life and ministry skills training - Figure out what it is God wants you doing, then teach, correct, rebuke, and train one another in accomplishing that purpose.
- Character building - figure out personal issues going on in people's lives and help them work through it, whether it's grief, sin issues, depression, etc.

Lack any one of these and the group will ultimately fail in what God wants it doing.

Advice on Maintaining Rule #1 and #2 on devices

2 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Hah! Which was it? Please tell me SGM.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

2 upvotes · 21 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Ah, gotcha.

What's the MRP stance on responsive sexuality?

2 upvotes · 20 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

some women initiate in really stupid ways

Yeah, the changing in front of me thing wouldn't communicate anything, and I definitely don't think my wife's trying to initiate that way ... but maybe I'm just ignorant. My wife's typical way of initiating is very defensive: "I'm not necessarily in the mood, but if you want to have sex I could be okay with it tonight." Once I get her going, it's great - but the initiation is so infrequent, weak, and fraught with ASD and "I need to minimize the potential pain of getting sexually rejected" ... it makes me wonder what's actually going on in her brain/libido/tingly area. To be fair, she does have days where I come home from work to lit candles and lingerie - but that's pretty darn rare. There are also days between these extremes.

I find that I'm initiating about 85% of the time (5/6). Even so, I read story after story here about guys who say their wives are coming onto them several times a week, bragging about getting her panties wet with a single word, etc. and I start to wonder how much of that is just BS male ego stroking from what legitimately happens ... or if they just happened to have found a spontaneous wife rather than a responsive one, yet are acting like all wives can and should be that way. I'm curious if the "she rarely initiates" is still common even for the men who have fully mastered RP.

To put it another way, although I don't doubt the effectiveness of RP methods themselves - I am living proof that they work ... but I am beginning to doubt the way some posters characterize the degree of effectiveness, telling extreme stories as if they're a daily occurrence (or should be) when maybe they're really only happening once every month or two, or other forms of exaggeration in the hopes of gaining acceptance by this community. After all, there's nothing men like to hear more than: "Here's a great sex story about all the slutty things my wife does - and here's how I got her to do them. If you do it, you can get your wife to be like that too."

Advice - Keep working on LTR or cut losses.

2 upvotes · 15 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

You're so full of contradictions here I can't even begin to guess at what's really going on.

Example: "she is still receptive to Kino" followed immediately by "attempts at escalation go nowhere." This makes no sense. That means she's not receptive. It means kino is not working on her.

Plus, how in the world is a girl who goes to strip clubs and is hiding things from you "wife material"? You're compartmentalizing and thinking: "These traits make for a good wife, and all those other bad things are on the side and don't affect her wifey status." That's beta thinking - because you're idolizing aspects of her that you like while pushing her negatives into their own separate box of: "I want to keep all this good stuff, but help me kill the bad stuff in her."

Here's the deal: SHE WILL NOT CHANGE. If she's into watching sexy muscle hunks dancing on stage for her now, she's going to be into that later. Your goal shouldn't be to get her to change (i.e. by revealing your knowledge of the pics); rather, it's to become the guy she wants to stare at - so much that she doesn't give a crap about going to strip clubs when she's already got something better at home.

Men are the polygamous ones. No matter how hot their wife is, there's always going to be the temptation to go to a strip club. Women are hypergamous. They go to the strip club to fantasize about a man who's better than they have now. Become the best man and that fantasy shifts to being with you and the strip club will have lost its allure. That's not to say she'll never go again. She may still like the GNO effect. But her reason for being there and her eagerness to go will be very different.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepillled to answer)

2 upvotes · 12 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

What "dirty work" is circumcision enabling men toward?

Why is this "violence against men" different from the cruelty and violence against women that was permissible in that culture? How is that more impacting on society?

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepilled to answer)

2 upvotes · 11 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I still don't see how you're connecting circumcision to "die in a battlefield." The only vague reference is some thinly veiled "because we're conditioning these men to believe that it's okay for them to feel pain, but not women." Again, there is absolutely no evidence to back up the connection between circumcision and being war-prone. All of the non-circumcising countries had warriors all the same. Circumcision doesn't do anything to enhance a warrior mentality.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepilled to answer)

2 upvotes · 11 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

The whole reason this topic, circumcision, is alarming is because it does seem to reinforce this "NO ONE TOUCHES THE WOMEN" gynocentrism. All while shrugging as baby boys are circumcised.

And what about all the passages that let a man cheat on a woman and get away with it, but if the woman cheats on the man she's killed? Or that men can rape a woman and live, but if she does the same, she's killed? I think you're losing the context here. Circumcision wasn't meant as a protection to women, but an elevation of status for men. Anyone who tells you otherwise has clearly not read the rest of the OT law.

let's just assume for a second that circumcision actually is as harmful as our friends over at /r/mensrights claim they are. Would your replies to my points change?

First off, I am circumcised, so I really have trouble believing a lot of the garbage people spout about it.

To your point, though, no, my reply would not change. Again, the point of circumcision is not to protect women from harm, but to be a physical representation of a man's connection with God - an elevation of his status that women were not permitted to share in. They had to use their husbands as a middle-man to have a connection with God. Husbands had the ability to learn an approach directly (I know I'm grossly oversimplifying, but this works as a bottom line without several thousands of words to prove this conclusion).

perhaps gynocentrism isn't the thing I've made it into

I think this is the conclusion. If I'm cold, heartless robot who shows no emotion or empathy in day to day life, then randomly find a joke funny and happen to chuckle out loud - would someone be justified in saying, "Look how emotionally expressive he is! That guy's an emotional nut-job!" That's what you're doing with the OT. You're picking one single point in the face of all evidence to the contrary and saying, "Look how gynocentric it is!" And even at that, you're missing that this one point is actually the exact opposite of gynocentrism.

Question I always had about Christianity (but every pastor/priest is too bluepilled to answer)

2 upvotes · 11 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

if salvation flows ...

This is the flow of discipleship. It's like in Exodus 4, where God says, "I'll talk to you, but you've got to be the one to talk to Aaron, and he can be the one to talk to the people." We see at least 3 places in the New Testament where God affirms this pattern in marriage: "I'll talk to the husband, he'll talk to his wife, she can talk to other."

If the wife refuses to submit or learn from her husband, God won't communicate directly with her any more than he did with Aaron. The exception is when a woman does not have a believing husband, but I can't remember the passages for that off the top of my head.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

2 upvotes · 10 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

they can have it all. That's a lie from the pits of Hell, IMO. (lol)

Totally agreed.

Under those circumstances, it's probably nothing short of miraculous that the husband is getting sex at all!

Agreed. But also remember that those are my exact circumstances right now too ;) Our baby isn't even 3 months old yet. It's true that a woman's body agenda is screaming: "Don't get pregnant again!" while she's breastfeeding, so there's an innate lack of desire. The return to work (my wife is taking a pause from maternity leave to help during a busy season, meaning working 7 days a week) is also exhausting. So, no matter how hard you step on the gas pedal, if you're up against a wall, you're not going anywhere - you're just going to spin your wheels.

But learn to break down that wall and things can change - even in the midst of the inverted body agenda and increased stress and exhaustion. Expectations must change, but they don't have to be turned off altogether.

pick two of three

On rotation, this is fine. When you permanently neglect one, that's when the problems start. For wives, I see those three as: (1) mental/work; (2) emotional/relationships; (3) physical/sex. There are times when all 3 can be great, but at other times you have to shut off your emotions and relationships to get your job done - in these times sex can be a necessary relief. Other times you pull back at work to refocus on the family dynamic, including sex with your husband. Other times sex takes a nose dive because work and friends/family just becomes too much that the desire isn't there.

Other times you can literally only focus on one. When my wife starts working 100+ hour weeks right before a deadline, she never sees anyone and sex is off the table. I accept that. It's not a lack of desire - it's a legit limitation. Other times she has a friend or family member in crisis and it literally consumes all of her time. This is rare, but it does happen. Interestingly, despite how many dead bedrooms I hear of and the number of people who understand this concept, I've never heard of the wife who spends all of her time so consumed with fixing or improving her sex life that she doesn't have the capacity to focus on work or relationships with friends/family. This often shows where sex is in the priority of the three - even when it's clear that a marriage is in crisis because of a lack of sex. In my former days, when we had marriage crises over not having sex, my wife's response was not to make it a top priority, but to put it on the back-burner hoping to fix it over time. But with literally any other problem in her life, she's on the internet researching, asking her friends and family what to do, praying about it, etc. Sex? "Don't worry, I'll work on it, just be patient," and then nothing changed until I started changing.

More to the point: many RP people mistakenly assume that the sex drive can always be there. They then do thing after thing after thing to bring it back. In reality, it never went away, it just wasn't the right time within that balance. So, after several attempts, they then give credit to the one they tried right before her life rhythm cycled back to being able to have free, open sex again.

Picking the right attorney

2 upvotes · 10 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

If you're going to the courthouse anyway, just ask the bailiffs/court officers. They're really going to have the answers you're looking for. They know all the attorneys and how they practice - and specifically which ones the judges like and don't.

If you're looking online, I can't say how your county is organizing cases or whether or not they reveal the attorney name or make it searchable that way. I can only speak for my own county.

FR: 1 Year from the artist formally known as prarrott

2 upvotes · 10 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

2/2 Tag: /u/redeemedpr

She had decided to see this marriage through, and she was going to do that

In the absence of her efforts to divorce you, this is now your job. 2 Timothy 2:[something teen] - If we disown him, he will disown us. If we are faithless, he remains faithful. You didn't disown her, but you were certainly not faithful. Nevertheless she remained faithful to her covenant to you, just as God does to us. She's being the man. Now it's your turn to be the man.

What my wife has requested most of me in this time is vulnerability

Don't confuse this with transparency.

- Transperancy: Completely 100% open and honest. "I'm really struggling with ____ right now."
- Vulnerability: Allowing others access to your weak points, defenses down. "Can you help me with ____? I'm really struggling."

RP ideas to not show emotion

I believe the RP idea is not to be controlled by emotion. Communicating emotion is good and healthy. We just don't want to be reactive; rather, we need to be proactive and responsive. There's a difference between saying calmly, "What you did hurt me," and crying for several minutes before lashing out: "What YOU DID hurt me!"

it could truly spell the death of my sex life forever

As my discipler once noted: Until we are content to be made nothing, God will often only make nothing of us. When we become nothing, that's when God can start working.

I was no longer concerned with trying to be "attractive"

It seemed pointless because it is pointless. Your job isn't to be attractive to your wife. It's to do what God put you here to do. Incidentally, doing that is what makes you here attractive. Most of the stuff you read in RP is the training to prepare you for the ministry God's calling you to: make disciples.

- Lift? People naturally follow fit, attractive people. Also, this is a physical metaphor for developing spiritual strength. They are inextricably linked - don't underestimate that.
- Develop a mission? You can't lead others if you're not going anywhere.
- Strengthen frame? We're in a literal spiritual war. Not a hypothetical, fun to think about battle. A real war. Crap from your wife, your friends, your congregation, etc. are all tools of the enemy and things that you need to be able to overcome to do what God put you here to do. You'll fail if you have a weak frame. Period. I've seen too many Christians die out after only a few years because they have a weak frame.

- OI? You can plant or water, but God makes it grow. The results are up to God, not you. If you're only in it to look successful to all your church friends, you'll be a failure in the mission to make disciples. Look at Noah - everyone he preached to died except his immediate family. Or Moses - the entire generation he "saved" from Egypt? God killed them all off before they could step foot in the promised land. From a human perspective these guys were royal failures. But they had OI. They didn't care about their success - only that they were living in the mission God gave them.

The list goes on ... you should get the idea by now. Everything RP is here to develop you to become the disciple-maker he's calling you to be.

lucky wife, now she doesn't have to deal with the guilt of denying her husband sex

Do you really think she felt guilty about that before any of this? Besides, when has adding guilt ever improved something? Guilt is a powerful manipulator of behavior, but its results are non-sustainable and weak. I do everything I can to take guilt out of the equation. The less guilt my wife experiences, the more free she is to feel more positive things. "I feel guilty because ..." turns into "I feel sexy because ..." or "I feel horny" or "I feel tingly."

the last 2 weeks we have had more sex than we have ever had in our 10 year marriage

First, be careful not to assume this will continue indefinitely. You're in new territory, so it's exciting. That will wear off. Be ready and diligent.

Second, she's initiating = she repented. God's trying to show you that your end conclusion should be repentance of being the harpy, denying, self-entitled bride you've been. He wants spiritual reproduction. Become intimate with God, then go make spiritual babies - or as Jesus tells Nicodemus in John 3, cause people to be "born again."

I am fighting to forgive my wife for years of harpy, disrespectful, bitchy, cold and sexless years

God already forgave you of these things. Now prove he was right to do so. Stop acting that way toward him.

Conclusion

Context for Your Narrative

God gave you three commands we call great:

- Love God - the greatest command
- Love Others - the second greatest command
- Make Disciples - the great commission

Making disciples is the reason God has you on this earth. Loving Him and loving others are the foundation of how you're going to get that done. It's impossible to do any of these the way God intended if you're missing one of them.

Your Actual Narrative

Your marriage problems have always been about reproductive acts (i.e. sex). You had a new baby and both you and your wife saw an inherent need to raise that baby. You realized you weren't reflecting God's character, so you repented and decided to be the man God created you to be. Your wife also realized her failures and contribution to the problem. Her repentance and your striving to be like Christ has revived your marriage. Your passion for one another again in physically reproductive acts has returned.

This all happened specifically to show you that your spiritual problems have always been about reproduction. God wants to use you to cause others to be "born again" - and then to continue using you to nurture them into maturity. When you and your wife both repented to reflect the character of the relationship God has with his church, your physical intimacy and reproductive acts revived. God modeled this in your marriage to point you to the fact that now that you're repenting and trying to be right with Him, you're going to stop being the cold, denying harpy; instead, you are going to have the same passion for spiritual reproductive acts (i.e. evangelism) that your wife is showing you for physical reproductive acts (i.e. sex).

In short, your marriage had to blow up so you could see what you were doing to God by virtue of what your wife was doing to you. Now that your relationship with your wife is restored, you know what you need to do to restore your relationship with God. Just as you're to lead your wife with a mission she can help you accomplish; God's going to lead you with the mission of discipleship that you're going to help Him accomplish.

Digest this for a while until you understand it inside and out. I've alluded to some of these things on r/RPChristians and this will grow as the sub does. Once you feel like you've fully internalized the mission for discipleship and the parallels between your physical marriage to your wife (where you're the husband) and your spiritual relationship with Christ (where you're his bride) AND you are living them out in noticeable ways, after explaining these things to your church (i.e. explaining your new lifestyle) their jaws will be dropped and people will flock to you. That's the power of this narrative. It's not a covert contract: "Do this and people will follow." With God, this is a promise.

FR: 1 Year from the artist formally known as prarrott

2 upvotes · 10 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Best reply here. Great breakdown.

50/50 v. OYS/Value

2 upvotes · 8 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Just made a post reciting most of this comment plus additional information - specifically including the questions to ask. But you're honestly better off asking court staff for a reputation check.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

2 upvotes · 8 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I agree. I didn't mean to imply that caring, responding and assisting are bad things - only that it's bad to associate them with how you increase physical desire, which they won't.

50/50 v. OYS/Value

2 upvotes · 8 September 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I wouldn't say never there. It usually is. What you mean is that divorce is never "get out what you put in."

Calling out your partner's bullshit?

2 upvotes · 7 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

I don't think she was lying about being constipated. But she was certainly abusing it as an excuse to get out of sex.

That's a garbage excuse. AA - "I bet you are constipated. That's why you need me to pound it out of you ... loosen up your insides a bit."

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

2 upvotes · 5 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Beautifully said.

I comment on RPW occasionally, but I don't often take it seriously as an RP sub, as it feels more to be for women with conservative values than about learning and applying RP principles themselves.

I decided to read a Focus on the Family article on developing a "satisfying" sex life.

2 upvotes · 5 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Fair. But doesn't RP do the same? Instead of trying to fix the wife or tell her what to do we say to fix the man.

302 - Bible Study

2 upvotes · 4 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Why/How is this the "Red pill" way of studying or applying the Bible?

If you try to filter everything through a red pill lens, including Scripture, you're probably idolizing the role of "the red pill" in your life. There is no "red pill way" to mow the law, but being a red pill man means you get it done all the same. If someone's totally clueless on how to mow his law, someone's gotta teach him. The 7 basics are things that most people are fairly clueless on. Being a Christian man - even a red pill Christian man - means knowing how to study the Bible. A man cannot lead his home spiritually if he doesn't know how to read and understand the Bible.

How is this any different from the standard FI-infested churchian way of bible study?

Just because the church is "FI-infested" (a point I readily agree with) doesn't mean everything it teaches must be abandoned. We shouldn't diss and abandon Christ's bride because she went on a power trip. Instead, per Ephesians 5, brides are meant to be purified and cleansed. There is still good in the church. Rather than abandoning it and starting over, trying to get Jesus to marry someone else, we're better off purifying the bride he'll never leave. Take the good and prune away the bad. After all, this is exactly what Jesus himself says he does - he just chooses to use godly men to accomplish this task. Our job is to be those godly men who will accomplish the task.

Proper understanding of the Scriptures is how we're going to get there. Proper Bible study is how we get proper understanding.

More to the point of your question, most churches don't teach people how to study the Bible - like this or at all. In fact, when I tried to teach my pastor, who has his masters degree from seminary, how to study the Bible he commented, "This just makes too much sense. How come seminaries don't teach it this way?"

Instead, there are legit liberal seminaries who teach you to interpret Scripture through a cultural lens (i.e. feminism). Others will teach "authorial intent," but just focus on specs and details ("Here's how to use a lexicon" and "Here's how to cross-reference") and reading commentaries rather than the actual structure for how the study should be accomplished.

Some life advice needed

2 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

These types of situations are judge specific, so there's no way of guaranteeing a particular result. Most judges would probably help you out if there was an overt representation that the kitchen stuff would be there when you moved in, but simply seeing it on a walkthrough might not be enough evidence to prove an overt representation if the previous tenant had other stuff there too.

Most landlords are only responsible for providing basic fixtures. Fixtures are defined at law as things actually affixed to the property that cannot be removed without causing damage to the property. A cabinet is a fixture. A stove is not.

If you file something, even if your odds of winning are low, you still have "nuisance value." Don't pay the $250 to hire a lawyer - send a letter to your landlord saying:

I spoke to an attorney and we are ready to file suit. I'd rather not deal with a court battle over this. Here's what I'd like to offer to remedy the situation: ...

Then add at the end: In the alternative, I will accept your releasing me from the lease so I can find another place that has appliances provided.

Bluff or not, see what you can get. If you end up buying new appliances, you'll end up bitter at having to pay for all that, but at least they're yours and you can get what you want. If you go to court, even if you win, you'll probably still be pretty darn bitter, stressed, and will have burned a bridge with your landlord - and still only get whatever crappy appliances she buys off craigslist to appease you.

As a lawyer, take it from me: it's usually better to avoid court if you can. Think of it like a nuke - a powerful deterrent that you hope you never have to use, but the threat of using it can often get you some portion of what you want anyway.

Information too late ...

2 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

This is a terrific response - sees right through all the crap I was missing. Thanks!

Information too late ...

2 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

I am. The appointment just isn't here yet. In fact, on r/RPChristians I made a field report about the conversation where I first told her I was getting a vasectomy. She didn't take it well at the time, but is fully on board now.

Information too late ...

2 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

No. It's at the end of September.

Information too late ...

2 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

Good point. I'm confident I don't want more kids, and I've told her this. As noted to another user, she even attended the vasectomy initial consult with me and has been on board.

Information too late ...

2 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/askMRP

We talked about me getting it done and she attended the initial consult with me, but I didn't schedule the actual procedure until a couple days ago.

302 - Bible Study

2 upvotes · 1 September 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Well, he knew that going in. That's why he asked me to disciple him in the first place. We've been working together to change the culture at our church from "casual and friendly attenders" to "purposeful, loving, and intentional disciple-makers." I happen to know how to do this and he's been highly motivated lately to make some serious changes :)

Dread-game may be the most important aspect of a Redpill LTR or marriage.

2 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

As to that last point, I could not agree more!

What's the point?

2 upvotes · 30 August 2017 · /r/askTRP

Even the guys I consider to be alpha get no attention.

You're probably mistaken in what you consider alpha.

gang members and scammers

These are the guys you need to be looking toward to define alpha. You don't have to make the same moral choices they do - but accept the fact that they're exemplifying the model alpha traits. They're just doing so in a darker context. Dark alpha or light alpha - you figure that one out for yourself. Just make sure you're looking at the right model for alpha traits in the first place.

Filed today.

2 upvotes · 29 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

A key thing to remember is that parenting time is freely modifiable, but property division and (usually) spousal support are not. Relax a bit on the modifiable stuff to get a better result on the permanent stuff (if it makes sense to do so), then a year later go back and modify the parenting time to get your 50/50 when finances aren't at stake anymore.

I do the same thing with mothers in custody cases. Custody itself is tough to modify once it's established (so never settle for less than shared parenting), but child support is easy. So, I have women agree to $0 child support in exchange for sole custody. Most guys are dumb enough to jump for joy at this proposal. 3 months later she "happens to" change jobs and is requesting a recalculation of child support and gets that too. Do the same thing back but with property division/parenting time as the negotiable factors. Of course, only do this if it makes sense in light of your situation.

Own Your Shit - Own Her Sex

2 upvotes · 29 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Makes sense. I've only gotten "jerky" enough so far that she's started calling me a jerk at times.

Mitch's Red Pill

2 upvotes · 29 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I just slap them upside the head. Like I have been doing to u/Red-curious

Heh ... is that what you think you've been doing?

epitome of a purple piller man

Admittedly, I'm still working my way through. But I'd love to hear your explanation on this anyway.

kill the beta completely

And yet Athol Kay and countless mods/flaired people here have refrained that one needs to keep a balance of some beta to maintain sustainability in a relationship.

As I often quote /u/cholomite for saying: Tingles without fuzzies won't last; fuzzies without tingles are worthless. MMSLP highlights that fuzzies come from beta traits and tingles come from alpha traits - and both are necessary if one's goal is to maintain a marriage indefinitely. /u/jacktenofhearts repeatedly talked about using the alpha to bolster one's frame with titanium, but using the beta to add pillows and cushions inside so someone might actually want to live there.

I'm on board that the mental perception of how the world works must come from a red pill praxeology, but I don't think that excludes all signs of beta traits, and I think a single post not only on this sub, but also on r/theredpill will prove that the majority agree: some beta is necessary. I've already seen this conversation happen at least twice on r/theredpill and countless times over here. "Blue Pill" and "Beta" are not the same. Although there is a significant correlation and overlap, there are aspects where each are mutually exclusive - where BP guys leave the realm of beta and where beta traits can be practiced outside of a BP mental framework. In the case of the latter, these beta traits can be practiced within an RP framework.

Otherwise, what are we doing still promoting MMSLP on the sidebar?

301 - The 7 Basics

2 upvotes · 29 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Bible study and Scripture memory would have such a strong correlation as to be able to be rolled into one

I can see how some would think that, but the way I interact with God on each is soooooooo totally different that I can't justify merging them. For me, Bible study is almost entirely an intellectual exercise that deepens my understanding of God. Scripture memory is more of an emotional exercise, as prayerfully meditating on the passages to commit them to heart and mind allows God's Word to permeate my soul in a very deep and intimate way. In fact, although Bible study is my favorite (because it's my natural best), of all of the basics I have never connected with God more deeply than through Scripture memory, which is a higher form of connecting with God's Word than study alone (but that's a post still a few days away).

Grace of the Sacraments

These are certainly important, I won't deny you there. I'm not Cathodox, but I do tend to hold the sacraments as being of higher importance than most protestants. While I agree that the sacraments are a "basic" as far as what new believers should do, my experience is that their growth-value doesn't come until one is more mature.

To reword that: the 7 basics I listed are ways that new and mature believers alike can connect with God in a personal and intimate way. Although new believers should partake in the sacraments, new believers simply do not (on the whole) grow in their faith as a result of partaking in the sacraments; rather, that growth from the sacraments begins to manifest as they are mature enough to understand and connect with God through them, which takes time.

LTR had nudes in her laptop from her phone dated June/July. Pussy and ass pics. She has never sent me nudes in our 9 month relationship.

2 upvotes · 28 August 2017 · /r/askTRP

Haha, cool and thanks! I'm a divorce attorney, so I'm used to advising clients on how to get information without getting caught.

109 - Pursuit, Seduce, Initiate

2 upvotes · 28 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Fair point, but I do seem to recall the book opening with her setting the stage and Solomon's first words are about his attraction to her (i.e. she's made herself pretty enough beforehand to get his attention in the first place).

What to do if SHE has a higher sex drive than YOU?

2 upvotes · 28 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

As /u/sekerzitski noted, up the price. Right now she highly values sex with you and can get it dirt cheap. Make her work harder for it and as effort increases, quantity will decrease - but because quality goes up at the same time, she stays hooked on you and not some other dude. Plus, by shifting/insisting from low-quality to a high-quality sex life, that's a DHV, so she's going to be more motivated not to screw it up.

Another user suggested being more beta. This isn't a terrible idea, and I had a similar thought, but proceed with caution. If you take that route and it lowers her libido to where you want it, fine (I still think it's a mistake, but you can do that if you want). The added beta will increase her comfort level and decrease attraction, so she should ideally be more motivated toward longevity in the relationship. That said, monitor this extremely closely because if you drop her attraction to you and her libido doesn't change then she's going to start looking elsewhere, even in the face of the increased beta comforts. That's not a risk I would gamble with, personally, but if you know her extremely well and can read her flawlessly, then it might be a valid option.

Weekend Challenge

2 upvotes · 28 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Here's my report.

ONE - I did this in lots of ways. An easy example: my wife became obsessed with buying a particular house. She has been hounding me about it for a while and it was literally all day on Friday and part of the day on Saturday. Personally, I think it's out of our price range, even with our combined (almost) quarter-million income, plus we just had a kid. Standard techniques worked to abate in the moment, but she kept bringing it back. I brought up 1 Cor. 4 and said I don't want to increase our standard of living - if anything, I'd be more inclined to decrease or give from our excess. Nevertheless, I agree that we need to move (had 0 kids when we bought our current house; now we have 4). So, I laid out a clear plan: "Chart our post-tax take-home income for the next three years. After you get me that, I'll set up an appointment with a mortgage broker to see what we'd qualify for and what the actual monthly obligation will be under different scenarios. If it works, it works; if not, we'll find out what price range does work." That pretty much put the conversation to rest and she was much, much happier and more affectionate, even touchy-feely afterward. Granted, I assume her being affectionate is trying to butter me up, but she should know by now my decisions don't respond to that.

TWO - I took off work 2 hours early on Friday, so that created an abundance of time. I brought my kids and wife to the gym with me on Saturday, so that killed two birds with one stone (lifting + family time at the pool). I also managed to process a major breakthrough in one of my cases, so a big plus there.

THREE - I had plateaued my lifting for a while, so even without a spotter I decided to do my max for bench and squat and up my max for the shoulder press by 20lbs (I failed; could only up by 10). At the same time, I usually do a bit sub-max for 1 round, then 3 mid-rounds, then 1 light for each workout. This time I did 1-max and 4 just beneath max. In addition, due to the time-constraints of having limited daycare time at the gym, I shortened my rest periods significantly. Also, today I managed to run a 10k at an above-5mph pace the entire time with no breaks. I'd been able to do a 5k like that for a while, but this is the first time I've tried a 10k with those criteria (I've done it before, but usually would walk intermittently after the first 5k or otherwise would just lower my pace to a light jog).

Thanks for the challenge!

Negativity of wife - your opinion?

2 upvotes · 28 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

I wrote about my solution here in Dealing with the stressed wife. It's a short-term exercise, but for me was enough to set the stage for long-term leadership as an overt expectation up-front, not a covert op that takes months of infiltration and gradual redirection.

/u/BluePillProfessor called for field reports, but I haven't seen any yet other than my own experience and that of one other guy I've mentored. So, if you give it a shot, report back for the benefit of the community.

Got married prior to discovering TRP. Now having sadness over the feeling of "not having had sex with enough women."

2 upvotes · 25 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

for the first time since giving my life to Christ, I desired a walk with Him just a bit more than I desired attention and flirting with attractive women

Dang, man. That's a powerful realization and the start of something beautiful!

Thanks for the update and I'm glad you're finding some forward movement in your life here!

Weak pastor comment

2 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Be forewarned that the auto-mod picks up violations of rule 2 automatically. I'll manually approve some of them, but keep that in mind for the future.

Your wife is a whore and you should divorce her

2 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I still don't follow ... where was my ego hurt or if it was attacked somehow, where is there an indication that matters to me?

Your wife is a whore and you should divorce her

2 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I have no clue what you're trying to say here.

Your wife is a whore and you should divorce her

2 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You're the one who mentioned the "cost of doing business." I was just extrapolating on that. Although some parallels may be useful, I prefer to avoid that particular analogy except in select circumstances.

Your wife is a whore and you should divorce her

2 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Totally agreed there. But the new testament does change the nature of the covenant. As I just replied to scurve:

That makes more sense. To that I'd defer to 2 Timothy 2:12-13 - "If we deny him, he also will deny us; if we are faithless, he remains faithful."

So, if she is merely faithless to the marriage vow (i.e. by constant denying sex, for example) then we should follow in Jesus's example (Paul is actually quoting Jesus from Matthew 10:33). But if she actively disowns that vow (i.e. cheating or trying to divorce you, etc.) then we're free to disown her right back. I don't get the impression Jesus would be happy about this second option as many men would be at the freedom to start anew, but we're all still human.

RPW, please don't have this mindset when you get older

2 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

True. I just commented on a rather old post here about this in the Christian sphere, referencing some stats a friend of mine came up with when doing a research study. The conclusion is that for a Christian guy to find a mature Christian girl who's in his age range and be a good relational fit and is still single, he'd have to attend a church of at least 1,250 people and hope he happened to get to know the one girl out of all of those people who meet those criteria. The post is here, for reference.

Hypergamy: Have you ever seriously thought about cheating and/or acted on it?

2 upvotes · 24 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

AWALT

/u/ruizbuja once made a post in r/askmrp about this being a potential inconsistency (if AWALT, then why is "nexting" or divorce a rational option? won't the next be like that too?). The responses were intriguing.

What I noticed out of r/MRP on the subject was essentially that the red berets and mods don't actually believe "AWALT" - it's more a combination of two things:

- Don't be surprised if your woman ends up like that - meaning that you don't know if your woman is one of the 20% or the 80%, and statistics work against you.
- AWALT is useful; denying it is not useful. To believe that you have a special snowflake puts you at great risk without gaining any significant advantages. So, even if NAWALT, it's still more beneficial to believe that AWALT so that you're prepared for the worst and in control of the terms of your relationship rather than walking helplessly into scenarios setting yourself up to fail. In that sense a refusal to acknowledge AWALT, although ironically would be a correct view, also becomes self-fulfilling prophesy in that such denial greatly increases your odds that your woman will end up being like that.

Pareto Principle

This is brilliant - defining how to get to the "unicorn." Obviously 80/20s would be way off - even as to the 80/20 within that. To say that 1/20 girls is truly "cream of the crop" seems optimistic in my book, at least from a Christian perspective. /u/ruizbuja once did a research study and statistical analysis on finding a godly Christian woman in today's society and the conclusion was that if you just wanted a Christian woman, only looking at regular church attenders, you've got about 18.65% of people who are likely actually "saved," half of whom are women, so 9.325%. If you want someone who is truly "godly" in the sense that their faith matters enough that they have an intentional plan for sharing it, you're down to 2.61% of all regular church-goers, and assuming half are women, that's 1.305%.

He then assumes only 75% are in an appropriate age range, only 25% of them are likely to be single, and assuming one third of those people (being optimistic) are actually a good relational fit for you - that's 6.25% of church-goers who are single, in your age range, and a good relational fit. So, if only 1.305% of church-going women are truly mature believers, then .08% are women who you could potentially marry. Convert that to a decimal and invert it and you get 1 in 1,250 people. So, you'd have to attend a megachurch of 1,250 people - and meet all the singles within your age range and vet them to find the one person who would be a good relational fit for you to marry - and then hope she agrees! Haha.

He proposes the better alternative: find someone who is faithful, available, and teachable, and then disciple her into maturity. Finding a woman who is (pardon the acronym) FAT is far easier than finding a woman who is already mature, marriage-ready material. Not to be crude, but it's like buying a house. You can find a fixer-upper really easy, then put in some work to shape and mold it, or you can look for the move-in ready home and have a lot harder of a time and ultimately paying a much higher price.

Starting to recognize and pass Fitness Tests. Am I doing this right?

2 upvotes · 22 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

The food analogy is a bit different (but only slightly). The key difference is that you can go get food without her. If you want it, just go get it. It doesn't matter whether she needs or wants food at the time or not.

With sex, the answer is usually the same with a caveat. If you want it, you go take it. Caveat? Learn to recognize the hard no. A soft no is usually a fitness test. "No, I'm good. I don't need/want sex tonight" is a fitness test. She's trying to see if you'll fit into her frame and let her control your sexual appetite (or at least whether or not that appetite gets fed). Solution? A&A ...

You: I know you don't want me <hop on top of her> ... I'm going to make you crave me.

Now, ignore everything I just said. That's not a good idea for you yet. You try to do that at this stage of the game and mark my words: it will backfire. This only really works when she recognizes you as a high-value man.

Someone else on MRP pointed out that women don't evaluate SMV the same way a guy does. It's not about preferring a 6 over a 5 or comparing the 6 guy to her 4 and then desiring him. He said that women just want a guy who's in the top 20%, which is surprisingly easy for men to do. If top 20% = 6, then it doesn't matter that you're a 5 and she's a 2 - your higher SMV still won't make her want you in the context of a familiar marriage. Note: the unfamiliar increases SMV because of the mystery and hamstering about "what could be," making new guys easier to hop into the top 20% - she just assumes everyone else is better than you and doesn't have your flaws.

Now, where I disagree with that guy is that when a woman's SMV matches or is above the SMV of the top-20% guy, then her hypergamy will cause her only to notice guys whose SMV is higher than hers. So, if you get yourself up to a 6, but she's a 7, even if you're in top 20% she won't care - she's not interested in you because she's above you. Your efforts to pass tests and flirt with her aren't taken seriously. Instead, they're teaching her how to develop an amused mastery mindset against you. This is the often under-discussed aspect of going Rambo. Everyone will point out the "blow-ups" that happen, but there's also a psychological disadvantage in how she views you. You become cute, yet pathetic. It might get you some pity sex here and there, but it's hurting your long-term plan.

However, when you hit SMV 8 and she's a 7, now your efforts are real and produce dread. She thinks, "Dang, he could go get another girl if he wanted to. If he came onto someone else the same way he's coming onto me, she might actually say yes." Right now you're not a threat. You try to come onto someone else outside the marriage and she's confident you'll get rejected.

Long story short: top-20% first. Once you're there, just keep your SMV higher than hers.

Starting to recognize and pass Fitness Tests. Am I doing this right?

2 upvotes · 21 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Truly? What do I want? I want to wake up in the morning and not be afraid. I want to be able to get out of bed eager to get started because the prospect of a new day is no longer terrifying to me. I want that more than anything else in the world right now. If I had that, I'm sure that I would be okay.

Memorize Philippians chapter 4. This is really going to help. Meditate on every word of it.

Peace from God aside, you'd be amazed at how so much of what you're talking about changes as soon as you can see your abs and you're benching 250+. 2 years I would have written off the psychological benefits of lifting. As I stand today, I'm telling you it's massive. It takes time, but drop the weight and get to a point where your muscles start showing and your perspective on life will change. This is the beginning of abundance mentality, which is what you really need right now (oh, and make sure to work in the humility along the way too!)

Starting to recognize and pass Fitness Tests. Am I doing this right?

2 upvotes · 21 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

2/2

currently 4 months pregnant

Huge game changer right there. Read MMSLP and you'll get a lot of info on body agenda in the first few chapters. This all assumes a woman is not pregnant or breast feeding. When she's in either of those modes, her body agenda is reversed - it's telling her to avoid any form of reproduction because she needs to recover and have time to make sure this child is healthy and stable before re-engaging the imperative to make more babies. I will very strongly re-emphasize my recommendation to go into monk mode and not initiate sex. If it happens anyway, go for it - accept it. Train her to understand that sex is not a source of anxiety anymore (i.e. from your prior rejections of her). But don't initiate unless you know her hormones are straightening out and she's likely into it.

To be fair, I just went through this. I have a newborn (2 months old) and my wife probably has another 7-10 months of breastfeeding. So, I feel your pain. During the pregnancy I went into full monk mode (didn't know it by that name at that point). After the birth, she was noticing the changes in me and responding very well. Having lost 40+lbs and having muscles she could actually feel made a big difference, of course, but she had a lot of concerns about whether or not our relationship could handle a 4th kid. If this is your first, she's feeling that even stronger. So, holding frame, practicing amused mastery, stoicism in the face of her hormonal outbursts, etc. were all absolutely fundamental not only to passing negative fitness tests she threw my way, but even in the absence of her sending comfort tests, they were giving her the comfort she needed anyway - the comfort of knowing that our marriage wasn't going to fall apart from the uncanny levels of stress she was feeling and afraid would continue after the birth. Result? A couple weeks after the baby was born she's already responding to me sexually (though we had to do other stuff while waiting for her to heal). Even now, she's still not "all in," but her sexual responsiveness is better now than it has been at any point in the last 7 years (been married for 9), and that's even with her body agenda wanting to avoid reproduction while breastfeeding.

300 lbs at 5'8" even before she got pregnant. She is timid and shy about her body

Be honest - how overweight are you? There's a lot of indication here that either: (1) you're freaking out and this is all just because she's pregnant; when the pregnancy is over you'll be in good shape again; (2) she has a genuine mental health issue and basic RP tactics won't work or will have to be adjusted to work for her; or (3) realities aside, she has no dread and perceives her SMV as being on-par with yours or slightly higher. My guess is it's the third - she knows she's not a catch, but thinks you're not either, so it's not a big deal. Read MMSLP, he talks about this more, especially as to the "how to get her to lose weight" component. Just make sure you're content even if she doesn't. You do you, no covert contracts.

At first I did ok. I kept my frame. I thought sure let's chase this rabbit for a bit.

The beginning of the conversation doesn't demonstrate this. By asking questions the way you do, you're inviting her to control the conversation. You feel like you're in control because you're the one prompting where she goes next, but each question is handing the reigns to her. "You tell me what's wrong. You tell me what 'disrespect' should mean between us. You tell me how I should act that you would perceive as respectful."

Keep in mind that I'm just screwing with her at this point, not actually serious. SHE thinks I'm serious but I'm cracking up. Every time I cracked a smile she got angrier.

This is how you fail a comfort test. She needs to know that you care for her in ways beyond sex. You may think you're communicating it, but she's not receiving it. Read ruizbujc's 205 - How to Lead to find some new tactics to employ that might get through to her. Your current strategy is the "investigator" approach - ask her a bunch of questions that are most likely designed to lead to a conclusion that you want her to reach (that her notion of you disrespecting her is bogus). That's my go-to method as well. It doesn't work well with my wife. She receives best by life-sharing. Figure out what your wife responds to and shape how you engage in these conversations accordingly.

More to the point, though, read WISNIFG. You really should have been fogging the heck out of that conversation.

she said that I needed to make her feel a certain way. I told her that I'm not responsible for her emotions

I may slightly diverge from the rest of the RP community here. They would all agree with your statement, and I do to the degree of day-to-day living. That said, you're the leader in the home and it is your responsibility to cultivate an environment where she is able to experience positive emotions. Imagine how she felt back in her days of abuse. Now, imagine if she complained to her abuser about how he made her feel and that man saying, "I'm not responsible for your emotions. If you want to be happy while I abuse you, just be happy." She's perceiving you like that. You do have a responsibility to cultivate an environment where she can respond positively to you. Lift harder, fog more, go monk until she's done breast feeding. This is probably your best bet for salvaging something long-term here.

She couldn't reason her way out of it

What makes you think she's trying to reason her way through any of it at all in the first place? She's not reasoning through it - she's feeling through it. You were the one reasoning. You will lose this game every time.

I kept ~~countering~~ DEERING her

FTFY

I should have just shut up and walked away long before this.

This. Go monk mode until you figure all this out, then re-engage.

But I was trying to practice frame

You don't send soldiers in to practice on the front lines. This is not the place for practice. If you can't do it and you're in nuclear war, STFU.

She has a problem with me "groping" her because I'm not attractive enough to her.

And there confirms my suspicion from above!

I waved the keys at her.

You were Rambo way earlier in this post - this is just laying it on thick. If you were a nice guy for a real long time, despite what you may read, you have to keep being a nice guy even though you know it's the "wrong way" to do things - and do that until you have the ability to ease RP stuff in slowly. You're trying to make too many bold moves too fast, so stuff's exploding.

Also ... she's 4 months pregnant. Seriously? Contrary to what you may read, not everything is a negative fitness test. Sometimes she just legit needs help. Go back to MMSLP.

Did I handle this right?

No, see above.

Don't worry too much, though. She's pregnant. She won't be bold enough to make any big moves for the next few months. Seriously: GO MONK MODE. Lift, focus most of your reading on MMSLP and WISNIFG, ease into all of this, and continue being a nice guy until you're sure you're ready to start adding each new layer. Practice in safe settings, not during nuclear war.

Starting to recognize and pass Fitness Tests. Am I doing this right?

2 upvotes · 21 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

1/2

Lots of issues here, so sorry if this gets long. But I think this is what you wanted, so here you go.

Been immersed in RP reading

I get the impression you've only been reading posts. Posts are worthless until you've been through all of the sidebar books (or at the very least: NMMNG, WISNIFG, and MMSLP). The books give context for the posts, otherwise you'll think you understand what people are saying, but you really don't. I made that mistake. Don't repeat it. If you say you're reading the books, go back and re-read WISNIFG because you didn't get it or aren't applying it.

Am I wrong for having the attitude that I'm kissing her or touching her because I want to, not because she has given me permission?

That's the right attitude, but I don't think this actually is your attitude based on the rest of your post. It's like she's a closed door and instead of saying, "I can walk through the door when I want," when it doesn't open you just start banging. When you try to be "playful" like you describe, that just comes off as banging on the door. She's still closed. You didn't get permission to enter, and you didn't actually go through. You're still stonewalled.

The problem here is that she likely thinks your increased affection is a sign that you want more sex. In fact, you probably do want more sex. But the way you're going to get it is to drop her LMR shield rather than increasing it. Or, more accurately, to convince her she never has to put it up in the first place (the whole "I can dodge bullets?" "No, when you're ready, you won't have to" thing). The way you do this is to train her that your acts of physical touch are nothing more than that; that you don't expect them to lead to sex. Focus on doing them in times where she knows sex is not a realistic possibility. Kiss her at red lights - and hold it for longer than you should. When you've got company over and she steps into another room, follow her and make out for 15 seconds. When the kids are running around and nowhere near bed time, grab her thigh and start rubbing. Do a ton of this stuff in a day, then kiss her goodnight at the end of the night and don't try to initiate. Stay in monk mode until you're improved enough that she doesn't see rejecting you for sex as a control measure. I wrote a tad bit about monk mode here and here. A key worth noting is that when you train her that your touch isn't a sign of trying to initiate sex, she'll be more inclined to accept your touch. Incidentally, physical touch that she warmly accepts is far more likely to lead to her being aroused, which actually increases her responsiveness to you when you actually are ready to start initiating - or it may cause her to initiate with you as a response to your non-sex-directed touching.

I am not sure if I am expressing love or seeking validation.

Nothing in here indicates "expressing love." I do see some validation seeking, but that's not necessarily the strongest motive I'm picking up. If anything, I feel like your motive is that you just want to have a better sex life and you're trying too hard - Rambo and all that.

Would denying affection be appropriate until she initiates?

Does it sound like a good idea to you to put her in charge of your sex life? Also, what you said doesn't make sense. "Denying" means you're turning something down. If she's not initiating, you're not denying. I think you just mean "withholding." When she's emotionally withholding to you, does that turn you on? If you were physically withholding to the girl at the bar, would that turn her on? Reading up on 106 - What doesn't work could be helpful.

Even at our best times she has always struggled with being affectionate due to childhood abuse.

If she has a personality disorder that changes a lot of things. If you think she has something in that post, reply with how extreme you think it is on a scale from 1-10, acknowledging that most women show tendencies of many of these (often simultaneously) without actually having it severely enough to interrupt daily function of interpersonal relationships. But, if the abuse has caused a personality disorder to manifest (as it often does, usually in the form of borderline), then this affects the conversation. The rest of my advice is based on the assumption that she's just normal woman crazy and not actual crazy.

She didn't speak to me for five days after our last fight ... I kept my silence. Didn't make any concessions towards her anger and butthurt. Didn't apologize. Didn't try to manipulate her into talking to me. Just left her alone.

In other words, you became passive. She gave you the silent treatment and you followed her lead in return. You entered her frame. As the man, it's your responsibility to pull her out of that funk and address the issue, not wait around for her to decide when it's time to fix the problem. The longer you let that go, the more respect for you she loses. Ephesians 4:26 - "In your anger do not sin: Do not let the sun go down while you are still angry." I live by this. If my wife and I fight, we resolve it right then and there. She tries to give me the silent treatment? I pull her out of it and we deal with it. She walks away? I give her 3 minutes to cool down, then I go in there and pull her out of it. Take the lead, don't defer the lead.

Giving her the silent treatment back is the definition of butt-hurt. It's just a less intuitive way of expressing it. It's childish. To develop a mindset of amused mastery, you have to see her antics as childish. My 3 and 5 year old kids love to say in a huff, "Fine, then I'm not going to play with you anymore," then walk away to their room. Your wife is doing the same thing: "Fine, then I'm not going to talk to you anymore," then goes off to do her own thing. She's being a child. Don't be a child back. 1 Cor. 13:11 - "When I was a child, I talked like a child, I thought like a child, I reasoned like a child. When I became a man, I put the ways of childhood behind me."

See it for what it is. When you see her antics the same way you see how a child acts, that's when you'll start to realize how to overcome the issue. Sometimes I have to go in there and comfort my kids, explaining to them the harsh realities of life, while giving them a hug and letting them know that the hard truths that started it all (like: "You need to learn to eat your veggies") don't change the fact that I love them. Other times I have to lay down the law and let them know: "This is a hard boundary and I will not tolerate your crossing it. If you do, here's what's going to happen ..." If your wife is acting like a child, think of how you'd parent a child who acted that way and go do the same. No, she's not actually a child. But when she acts like a child, don't treat her like an adult. Being treated like an adult is a privilege to be earned by being an adult internally and not merely by age.

she didn't push me away but she wasn't exactly warm to it

That's because you're training her to have mixed feelings about physical touch. The combination of being awkwardly playful, your own internal insecurities about whether or not to initiate, a possible insensitivity in dealing with her past physical abuse, the increased effort toward initiating touch coupled with the sudden drop during the 5-day silence, etc. Your touch isn't a comfort to her; it's a source of confusion. Develop consistency here. Have a strategy and don't back down from that strategy, even if she's giving you the silent treatment. Plow through and do your 10-second kiss anyway. If she cuts it off as you try, then back down - but show her that her emotional outbursts aren't going to change your behavior or your mood. You have to keep your mood steady as a rock, unaffected by her mood.

As I was loosening the hug I moved one of my hands down to cop a quick feel on the way out and she violently pushed me away and told me to get off.

I'm not fluent in the art of kino yet, but my understanding is that you're not supposed to escalate until you get a positive reaction from the level you're already at. If a girl is wincing when you touch her hand and acting disgusted, you don't put your arm around her or move in for the kiss. You continue applying game and hold frame with where you're at until the reception changes, then escalate, and do this for each new phase. Again, this is just my own impression, so go read up some posts on kino (I probably need to do the same; I haven't needed to yet, hence my delay).

Starting to recognize and pass Fitness Tests. Am I doing this right?

2 upvotes · 21 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

If it all went south today, could you lift yourself out of the ashes and continue being a man? Or would you be a blubbering pile of goo at the bottom?

This is the key question. I have often held that God does not make much of us until we are first content to be made nothing. If we can be in Job's spot and still say, "God, my faith has not wavered; I will continue to be who you created me to be," that's when we are malleable enough that God can do anything with us.

What we can learn from the feast-day of the Dormition of the Theotokos.

2 upvotes · 18 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

He doesn't next us, we next him

That's a much better way to put it. But the result is still the same: the relationship ends (or is deemed never to have begun at all) and the person is, as you say: "to our own damnation."

Thanks for the resources! I'll try to look into them over the weekend after my trial tomorrow.

Supportive Relationships Linked To Willingness To Pursue Opportunities

2 upvotes · 17 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWives

Oh, I wasn't challenging the connectivity of the content to the sub, or even the usefulness of reminding people to be supportive - props to you for doing that!

I was just baffled at what the researchers were thinking in setting up this test in the first place :p I'd love to see what hypothesis they were trying to test and how it got past the: "Why do we need to interview and test 326 people to figure that out?" phase.

How marriage changes things

2 upvotes · 17 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWives

Having upstanding children is a good purpose - but, as you noted, it's such a common one that you'll never feel like you have a unique impact on your world, plus you won't see the fruit of your labor for so long that you won't be able to experience the up-swing on the curve (18-ish years, to be exact).

But here's the bigger problem with children being the purpose: They're going to move out someday and you'll still be left with your spouse, and now in your 50s trying to rediscover life. That's dangerous and leads to a lot of divorce, cheating, mid-life crisis mode, etc. Plus, the focus on the children is still internal.

I'm not saying don't focus on the children - absolutely place them as your highest priority after your spouse. But, even children need to see that the world is bigger than them, or even their parents - that we all have a contributing part to play in society. So, living out your external purpose will actually give your children a much healthier perspective on their ability to engage with their world as well, defeating notions of self-centeredness. My 5-yr old is starting to get this even at his young age! It's exciting to see how he processes what we do outside the home and why :)

coral reef restoration

That would be totally awesome :) Just make sure it's a mutual passion - something your heart is into 100% and not just something you do just to have something to do. If you're not 100% on board with it, explore other options with him. Let him keep that as his passion, but work with you until you find one you can enjoy together.

Or - give him the chance to get you hooked :) That's what I did with my wife. She was not originally on board with discipleship. She had been at one point, but due to a relationship-gone-sour she backed out and decided it wasn't for her. This was pretty devastating to me for a long time. But, as I improved and she saw the good that I was doing in others' lives, and the ways that she could contribute to that good, she eventually wanted in! I didn't even have to initiate it ... she just saw my passion and the fruit that my life produced and that was enough for her to be fully engaged.

Turning down bad, placeholder sex

2 upvotes · 17 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

I just commented to someone else on monk mode over here. That's one solid strategy if you're early in your process. If your SMV is already higher than hers, you've lost your chance at the primary benefit that I see monk mode as having.

Your key is that she sees that you want sex more - but she herself doesn't want sex more yet. So, my guess is your SMV is still lower. There's no dread. There's no amused mastery. If anything, she's AMing you - she thinks she has you figured out with this placation game. But now that you've read some of the sidebar, you're seeing that she has been employing these very tactics against you that you're now learning to employ back. The difference is that she's doing it instinctively as part of the female psychological default imperative ("lizard brain" and all that).

You're going to do it tactfully. So, while you're using the same weapons, she doesn't know how to wield them.

That said, I agree 100% with /u/-ChillPill-. The goal is to show her you won't accept bad sex. If you turn it down before it starts, she takes it as a personal rejection, not a failure to meet your standard. But even then, you've got to be worth that standard in her eyes first. My wife used to starfish and she's gotten a lot better. I'm now convinced that women starfish when men aren't leading them. You don't like the position she's in? Physically pick up her body and put it the way you want it. This actually often gets her more into it.

Another huge factor I've noticed - women tend to be sexier when they feel sexier. The 10 second kiss is a nice start (one I like using daily as well), but develop other tactics for making her feel sexier - especially in the actual act of having sex. She certainly knows how to have sex beyond just the starfish position, but maybe she doesn't know what exactly you like, or she hasn't done it enough yet to be comfortable - so you need to lead her in the bedroom. There's a time for monk mode, and if you haven't mastered your game yet, you might be able to go back there. But if she's already initiating, in those moments I'd focus more on leading in the bedroom than leading outside - and for the love of all, don't turn her down until she's had a chance to turn you off. If you never let her try to get you excited in the first place, you're not doing yourself any good. When she sees that getting you excited is a challenge, the pressure is on her to step up her game. Whether she will or not is her call, and that mostly depends on how your SMVs compare.

How marriage changes things

2 upvotes · 17 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWives

Great question! I did a much longer write-up on the whole thing in this post, including the concept of what the purpose should be. Being a Christian, I think that purpose for other Christians should always be disciple-making - the mission Jesus gave the church. So, for Christians I'm fairly restrictive on this.

That said, for everyone else I acknowledge that other purposes can and do work. The primary requirement is that it has to be something beyond just you and your spouse. If your purpose is internally focused, it will fail every time. So, "Make $X, buy our dream home, have a great sex life, and raise wonderful children" is not a healthy purpose. You will always succumb to the same pitfall that everyone who pursues the American dream will cave to: Just a little more.

If you pick something beyond your life, you'll realize that you can have a significant impact on your world, but you won't become consumed with a dissatisfied "more, more, more" mentality. Good examples of purposes beyond what I'd recommend for Christians:

- Fighting human trafficking.
- Feeding starving children.
- Becoming a vigilante and stopping criminals.
- Making a difference in local politics.
- Brighten the world with laughter.
- Help people heal broken relationships.

Each purpose then can be carried out in any number of ways.

- Human Trafficking: Get a job at the DOJ or AG's office; join an awareness club; give seminars; start a shelter for victims; counsel victims, or just go talk to them; etc.
- Starving Children: Join city council; start a non-profit; supply a food shelter; help their parents find jobs, tweak their resume, etc.; provide entertainment to the kids
- Vigilante: Okay, that one was a joke.

- Politics: Run for city council; start a petition; attend community meetings; get on the school board
- Laughter: Make business cards with jokes on them and hand them out just to get people to smile; do stand-up at a comedy club; do street comedy at fairs and festivals
- Relational Healing: Participate in online forums like these; get a counseling degree; build deeper relationships with neighbors and develop a voice in their lives

Whatever the purpose is, just make sure it's bigger than you and your spouse. It can be tied to your profession or be purely a hobby - that part really doesn't matter. Just don't be internally focused on your own goals. Have those goals too - certainly desire the big house with 4 beautiful kids and a nice car. But don't make that your end-game.

The Dangers of so-called "Biblical Counseling"

2 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

As ruiz said, I wouldn't idolize the "proper view of headship" aspect when looking for a discipler. In RP it's easy to make this a be-all-end-all of life and ministry because RP praxeology centers around that concept. In reality, God gave us other higher purposes than just "lead your wife." If someone can help you fulfill those other purposes, I'd say go for it!

The Dangers of so-called "Biblical Counseling"

2 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

If it's marriage counseling, this is absolutely true. But remember that many people seek counseling for other issues. Instead of going in to figure out how to deal with her husband, suppose she is struggling from panic attacks and wants to get them to stop. Most husbands won't be trained or equipped to know how to address the issue. In some circumstances, the panic attacks might be induced by the husband's failure to lead and affirm, but other times there are legit deeper issues. If it's something where proper headship can solve the problem, the husband really should talk to someone to figure out how to be a better leader to stop the panic attacks. But if it legitimately has nothing to do with her husband, she might legit need a therapist to figure out what's going on and how to address it.

That said, 99% of the time the answer (particularly for the man) is not counseling, but discipleship. He needs someone who is more spiritually mature who can act as a spiritual authority over him. A counselor merely plays a suggestive role, saying, "Here are some cool tricks I learned through my education that might help." A discipler lives life alongside the man, knows his issues intimately, helps the husband understand the issue, and then models the solution in his own life so the husband can see how it works firsthand.

The Dangers of so-called "Biblical Counseling"

2 upvotes · 16 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That's an interesting article. I don't agree with everything said, but I will note that of over 30 counselors I have worked with in the last several years (professionally, not personally), there is exactly 1 who actually "gets it." Interestingly, it's a girl. Most male counselors aren't actually into male rights, as one might suspect - they're so beta and influenced by the feminist agenda from their education that they want to impress every girl that gets in their office and they just assume that the guy is screwed up. Many women buy into this as well, but there is the occasional woman who knows women well enough to see through the garbage. I find this to be more common than men who want to help men.

But, on the whole, 99% of "biblical counselors" are a joke because they don't know how to incorporate the Gospel as the only permanent solution. Instead, they are really secular counselors who quote the occasional verse to support what their education otherwise said. Every now and then you'll get a true biblical counselor who just misapplies the Bible by looking at other things than the Gospel itself. It'll be good for human-effort behavioral modification, but it will do nothing to lead to the internal transformation that only Jesus can provide.

That said, there are still a wide array of benefits even to secular psychology. So, I wouldn't dismiss the profession entirely.

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

2 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I just went to trial on a case a few months ago where the wife started an argument, recorded the back and forth yelling, then chased my client into a bedroom, drops her phone (conveniently), and starts screaming as she slams the door on her arm repeatedly. She actually did this in front of the kids, which was idiotic on her part (they were old enough to tell the police what really happened, but not old enough to be witnesses in court). Bottom line, even without the kids' testimony the court didn't believe her one bit, even with her video trying to set up him as the aggressor. My client was "hailed out" for a few months, but we got the court to make her pay: (1) all of his apartment and utility expenses during that time, (2) all of his legal fees to defend against the false allegation, (3) a portion of his peripheral expenses (groceries, travel costs, etc.), and (4) make-up parenting time for every day he missed. That case did end in shared parenting, but my client (husband) got more than 50% of the time.

Would the judge still base calculation on her full time potential and/or order the kids into daycare?

I actually had a case last September where this exact issue came up and the magistrate ruled: "Mother's proposed schedule is unworkable because it would preclude her from seeking adequate employment. The child has been thriving while in daycare, and the child will likely continue to thrive in daycare. Granting Mother this additional time would be an unknown quantity, having an unknown impact on the child's well-being, and this court declines to exchange a thriving situation for an unknown quantity."

Do a ctrl+f for "doughnut" in this thread and you'll see more info on this case. Long story short, she was imputed at full-time capacity. Then, to pour salt on the wound, the magistrate actually made her pay my client (father) child support based on an income level she wasn't actually earning - just because she was capable of it.

When I hear all these horror stories, I repeatedly assume that these people are either representing themselves or they went out and got the cheapest budget attorney that no-money could afford. That said, to be fair, the guy in the first case above had a total legal bill of over $100,000 to defend against all that crap (she paid him back for around $30,000 of that, the rest was for other divorce and custody related issues). The guy in the second case had a total legal bill of around $40,000 for the base trial, then paid another $20,000 to defend against his wife's appeal (we won that too). So, yeah, I get that not everyone can afford these kinds of legal expenses, thus they get screwed with the budget attorney.

108 - Life-Path of a Relationship

2 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

we probably skipped that "Honeymoon Culture" phase almost entirely

Yeah, your peak may have been much lower than most others. But, it's extremely rare circumstances where someone never enters that quadrant at all.

We went straight to logistics (ie. Obligatory Interactions)

This happens for everyone after the wedding, but it's not the lower-right quadrant until your relationship is defined by stress and frustration. As long as you're still happy about the logistics and able to function with a positive attitude, you're in the upper-left or upper-right.

Sure, we has sex like rabbits for a while. We had five kids in about 11 years

Heh, that doesn't actually prove a great sex life. My wife and I have had 4 kids in 6 years ... and probably had sex about 40 total times in those 6 years. An entire 18 months in that time was without any sex at all. More to the point, if you're having "sex like rabbits for a while" this is usually from being in the upper-left.

I don't think we ever got to "know" each other in order to bring about the affinity your graph talks about.

The "affinity" line is more about how happy you are in the context of your relationship (as opposed to your individual happiness for its own merit). It's not some super-deep intimacy, which most couples never actually experience until after making progress at the turning point (it will occasionally happen before then, but not often).

Which way will we go once we "know" ourselves? ... We're still in that bottom green circle (divorce or turning point).

I'd say the more important factor is how well you both know God and the plan he has for you. Again, if you don't know that plan, go with discipleship - I'm very confident that in time, as you mature, you're going to conclude that's the ultimate plan anyway, so might as well start there. If something else jumps out at you, give it a shot, but make sure it's beyond just you and her. Your marriage or your own joint life circumstances cannot be your ultimate goal. If you want to know more about discipleship, stay tuned or PM me and I might be able to help you find someone to disciple you in the process in your local area (I have connections all over the country).

I do me. You do you. And that's what I'm doing for now.

Excellent plan :)

I want to receive grace, and I want to give grace ... to my wife, my kids, and to others in our community. And I plan on fleshing that out as we hopefully move forward together.

This is a noble goal. Just make sure you have a clear, observable plan and how to carry it out. General concepts don't make good visions, so flesh this out as clearly as possible. Does "give grace ... to others in our community" mean helping at homeless shelters and food pantries? What's the purpose of the giving grace - just so you can feel good about yourself, or is there something more to it? If something more, what is that and what ways can you tailor the "give grace" plan to be specific and driven toward that directive?

To be clear, the forward-progress doesn't start happening until after the revitalized vision for how your relationship fits in God's plan is already fleshed out and you start living it. Even then, it doesn't work until you both get excited about it and can see the contributions you're making. That's when the forward progress starts. If you're not both excited about it, then it's a unilateral vision, which doesn't help the relationship. If you're excited, but not actually doing anything about it, you're not going to be compelled forward. If you're not seeing the fruit of your labor together, the excitement will die and you'll slide back. Keep these things in mind :)

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

2 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

For many people who were not intelligent about the planning going in, this may well be the case. But I also proposed ideas that can mitigate the suggestion. "Cheaper to keep her" isn't always your choice. If she decides to wait another 5-10 years then screw with some other guy and divorce you, you'll be in an even worse spot. Take steps now to mitigate your potential damage later.

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

2 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Interesting. I spoke to a TX lawyer a few years back (maybe 4) and this wasn't the impression I got - the % calculation was similar to what you're describing, but it's based on % of income, so income does matter. But he also affirmed that TX had deviation factors. I talked to him because one of my clients was relocating there and I was trying to help my client find a good attorney.

Also, "joint custody" doesn't automatically negate support in any state (as far as I'm aware), so that's not unique. It's the deviation factors where the game is actually played.

Fasting and Hard Nosed Prayer

2 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed.

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

2 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

you may as well be divorced

Nah, if she's contributing about equally, it makes sense she'd get about 50/50 out of it. I know the courts will do 50/50 anyway, so I just make sure she's holding up her end of the 50/50 and not able to argue, "I cleaned the house, so he needs to pay me for the next X years." Divorce is only cause for concern if the man lets her get away with not holding up her 50% end. If her services around the house are actually higher value than any income she could produce, I've given techniques for how to mitigate the effect on support (prenup, premature legal separation), but it also just may be that she is contributing half when she does that in low-income marriages. As noted in the other thread on point, daycare for my family is about $4,000/mo, so keeping her home would be of higher value to me if her income was under $48,000/yr post-tax (i.e. $68,500 pre-tax gross salary), and she really is pulling her weight in staying home at that point. It just happens to be that my wife earns substantially more than that, so she's higher value working, so I have her work (with acceptable exceptions that won't put me at risk).

Most guys are going to get divorce raped, they are going to get less access/ custody of their children, and depending on the jurisdiction the courts are going to give her a better share of the money

If guys are idiots and don't plan, then you're absolutely right. The point of the post isn't, "Look at me and how awesome I have it." The point is: "Here's a model to shoot for so you don't let your idiocy put you at unnecessary risk of divorce rape." That's why I gave alternatives where I know many men might not be in marriages similar to mine, such as with the spousal support issue, because most of their wives probably don't earn over $100k.

Men face extreme prejudice in most western jurisdictions. Until those laws and prejudices are fixed, then we have a long way to go.

This comes off as bitter ignorance. The laws themselves have mostly been corrected. The prime advantage women have is in the judicial discretion, not the laws. If you end up with a beta judge who has the hots for your STBE, you're screwed. If you have a SJW for a judge, you're screwed. I actually prefer female judges because they tend to look down on unempowered women with an "I can do it, screw you for not" attitude and they crack down on other women.

But here's the kicker - all of that discretion garbage gets thrown out on appeal if it (1) oversteps the bounds of otherwise fair laws, (2) shows a clear bias, or (3) is based on an erroneous finding of fact. Getting a case overturned on appeal is harder than defending one, but it still happens all the time - literally everyday when these judges try to abuse their discretion. But so many people are clueless about the appeal process or aren't willing to go through another 9 months of dragging things out that they just throw in the towel early and blame the system for being garbage. I have no respect for complainers who got a crap result, didn't appeal, and then want other people to sympathize with them.

Want to know how that will play out?

The cases you're describing happen, but the wife rarely gets the result you're implying - especially if appeal is on the table (and she knows it in advance). You're only explaining what she'll do, not what will happen as a result of her actions. She starts saying things like that to the kids? 75% chance you're getting custody as long as you don't screw up. Why? Parental alienation is a huge deal to the GAL. I'm going to trial on one now where the GAL and psychological evaluator both said that mom was so alienating that her visits need to be restricted to supervision-only because they're so concerned that she'll keep trying to bad-mouth dad. This is the common reality - and that was a female GAL that came to that conclusion.

In reality, I referenced two situations where I recommended the legal separation, but still live together route. In both cases the parties resolved things extremely amicably and they're still together today (after 3 and 5 years). If the wife decides she wants to file for divorce instead, how's that any different than if the husband just skipped straight to filing? You don't get brownie points with a judge for being the reason the case is on their docket.

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

2 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I thought about it. I actually do love minivans, and they are extremely practical. But we already had one and I wouldn't want to deal with parking it in my work garage everyday

Why your wife should work at a real job

2 upvotes · 15 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I literally just made a new post on this (one I've been meaning to write for a while). There are 3 key areas to any divorce, so it's a different one-liner for each:

- Assets: Doesn't matter, this is all 50/50 if you don't back down; be smart about things like tax-effecting and what's liquid and not.
- Support: Get her earning money or at the next main event file for legal separation to get a court-ordered allocation of income, expenses, assets, etc. (essentially: cut your losses sooner before they build further), then keep living together after that to work on your marriage without the fear of divorce clouding your judgment.
- Children: Act like a sole custodial parent during the marriage and your chances of getting custody (or at least shared parenting) soar through the roof.

How marriage changes things

2 upvotes · 14 August 2017 · /r/RedPillWives

Being a divorce attorney is certainly not easy, but I believe it has given me numerous huge advantages in my own marriage, so there's the silver lining!

If you're interested, replying to your post prompted me to do a more full write-up at another RP sub I run on the whole relational life-cycle from the graph I linked to. Maybe people here can find it interesting :) Here's the post. I've actually had one fully-licensed marriage counselor tell me she's using this as the base model for all of her marriage counseling now, rather than what her degree taught her :D (She still uses other techniques and things from her education, but they're applied in the context of the graph rather than as primary models in themselves).

Thank you from a SF Bay Area Christian

2 upvotes · 13 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Good question. I really mean how institutionalization plays out in the western world - more of a cultural institutionalization rather than a rote dictionary definition. In American culture, institutions run on one of two primary operative drives: (1) to grow, or (2) to benefit the people at the top.

- Growth: Ideally, the "growth" will be connected to the primary function. So, if organization's primary function is feeding homeless children, the drive to grow is to feed more homeless children than it could at a smaller size. The key factor in this "growth" section, though, is that the institution itself wants to be the one credited for feeding the homeless children, rather than simply seeing homeless children be fed. So, if a random stranger decides to help feed a homeless child, the institution either doesn't care about him or it will attempt to take credit for it ("Look at the random acts of kindness we've inspired!").
- The Top: This is fairly self-explanatory, but even every Christian institution has some form of hierarchy. It's rare to see someone start a non-profit to help starving children simply because they care about starving children - usually they get some benefit out of it too. If there's no one at the top trying to get ahead, the organization doesn't usually grow.

There was once an article that explained the natural life-cycle of a denomination in these types of terms:

- Visionary: Someone gets a vision for what God's calling them to do and they start doing it.
- Growth: His vision catches fire with others and they follow his leadership to pass it on.
- Organization: As growth happens, it is necessary to get organized so that people on the fringe edges of the growth don't lose track of the original vision (ex. Jesus disciplined Paul, who disciplined Mark, who disciplined ...) like a long game of telephone.
- Institutionalization: People begin to care more about the organization itself than they do about the vision the organization was created to promulgate. As a result, there is a shift in balance from carrying out the purpose of the organization to getting others to join the organization (growth). Those at the top stop living out the purpose and become predominantly administrative in function, focusing on the growth: (1) because they believe it's their job, (2) because that's how they make money or get recognition, and (3) because, as they rationalize (sometimes honestly), that's the only way the cause can advance. In reality, they could have appointed someone else to focus on the growth and kept practicing themselves - but since it's "their vision"/"their baby," they have personal/selfish reasons for wanting to be on the forefront of the growth aspects rather than just doing what they originally set out to do.
- Die and Repeat: When the heart for the original purpose is gone, those involved in the organization become discontented. Internal grumblings about leadership start to happen because of the administrative components ("I really wish they did it this way instead of that"). People start leaving. Someone from within or who has observed this process from outside steps in with a new or revitalized sense of vision and repeats the process from step 1.

Jesus never talked about the church in the way we see institutionalization happening in the western church. In fact, this process really started in the 200s when Constantine officialized Christianity as a religion of the state. So many people started rushing in that fast administrative efforts had to be put into place to accommodate the rapid growth, rather than the more organic processes that had been driving the church before then.

Instead, I see Jesus talking about the purpose of the church and what the people are supposed to be doing. He was a man with a vision and he imparted that vision to a few to carry on his work. He was not focused on rapid growth and maximization, nor was he in it for his own glory (although he got it - that was God the Father's purpose for him, whereas Jesus existed to glorify the Father). I believe Christianity was always meant to be a grassroots movement of the people founded on discipleship as its primary organizational structure, rather than administration.

What's the big deal about this RP stuff?

2 upvotes · 11 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I agree with /u/ruizbuje that this stuff isn't anything new; but the information has certainly been repressed. So, if you ask anyone point blank: "Will a girl be more sexually attracted to a guy who smothers her with affection or who flirts for a minute then goes off to do his own thing?" Most guys I know will get the answer right. The problem is that we're never asked these questions point blank. The answers are in our subconscious and can be pulled up when something evokes it. But without that summoning ritual, we all function on auto-pilot and what we get fed from the media, the internet, movies, etc. dominates our conscious thoughts. Immersing oneself in RP switches the balance - the truths of the world become conscious and you're taught how to suppress the other junk. As a result, your auto-pilot changes too. Stop thinking about RP stuff for too long, though, and that balance will revert - it's got to stay in the conscious brain.

Wife is validation seeking ... how to respond?

2 upvotes · 11 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

"Drive yourself on over and I'll show you how pretty I think you are."

The usual mantra is: don't talk; do. When you're at a distance that's kind of hard ... but, rather than just telling her the answer, you might be able to hold some semblance of that frame by telling her what you'd do instead.

Got married prior to discovering TRP. Now having sadness over the feeling of "not having had sex with enough women."

2 upvotes · 11 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting view. I've never thought about it like that - but I like it! I'll have to ponder that one for a while :)

Divorce Incorporated

2 upvotes · 10 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

California instituted "no fault divorce" laws, after which virtually every other state followed.

Need help pulling my life together after rape charge

2 upvotes · 10 August 2017 · /r/askTRP

Most often the mantra "you get what you pay for" rings true here. Best way to find someone good is to get a referral from someone who had actually been through a trial. If you don't know anyone, call up the biggest, baddest divorce attorney in town over the age of 50 - and say you're looking for a criminal attorney. 99% he knows who's worthwhile. Plus if the referral comes from him, the criminal attorney will be more motivated to do it right to keep his divorce attorney friend happy so the referrals keep coming in.

But more important than finding the right attorney is simply realizing that you, as the client, have the power as long as you pay. He can technically drop you, but not right before a trial - and not if you're still paying, unless he has a legit independent excuse.

Good or average doesn't usually matter in the end - there may be a 5% difference in results (just don't go for "bad" - that does matter). In the end, if you insist on your trial most attorneys will get you close to the same result.

Need help pulling my life together after rape charge

2 upvotes · 10 August 2017 · /r/askTRP

Joining a church can help, but is rarely the right solution in the short-term, unfortunately. That's more of a long-term goal. If you're referencing the spiritual aspect of things specifically, here's what I recommend:

1. Start reading the Bible on your own. There are free versions online everywhere. Begin with the book of John and just ask each time you read, "Who is this Jesus guy? What can I learn about him from this?" Even if it's just 5-10 minutes a day, this will at least give you a starting premise.
2. Find other Christians in your life who you know and trust and spend more time with them. If you don't know any, join us at r/RPChristians (a red pill community for Christian, to be clear). Places like r/TrueChristian can also help. Start spending time with them and ask about what they believe and why.
3. If at all possible, find someone who will meet with you one-on-one over coffee or a meal periodically who you can ask questions to and who you know is a genuine Christian and takes their faith seriously. 99% of the time these people will be thrilled at this type of opportunity, so the fear of rejection should be almost nothing. If you have trouble finding someone like this at first, feel free to PM me and I can do this privately for a bit, although it's much harder to do this online.
4. Pray periodically. It doesn't have to be intense. I don't use any special holy language or anything. I talk to God like he's any other friend, "Hey, this crazy thing happened today - got the time to chat about it? Of course you do, you're God. So, I was at work and What do you think I should do?" Or, if it's more internalized as to your faith, "Hey, I read this in the Bible today, God. What did that mean? Can you help me figure all this out?"

If you find that you really have no other Christians in your life and all of this seems really awkward, then I'd start trying to find a church to meet people who can help you with this process. But finding a good church can be so intimidating for some people, especially trying to meet new people at that church, that you might really get discouraged or frustrated, which is why the above can be easier - you're not trying to do something big and new all at once, you're working with people you already know and trust or otherwise getting to know God by spending time with Him directly and personally through the Bible and prayer. That said, if you think you really do need to find a church in your area, let me know and I'll help you out.

Also, I'm not there yet, but over on r/RPChristians I'm doing a series where I will eventually get into dealing with emotional baggage. I'm actually leading a 2-day conference on this for churches throughout my city this fall. Feel free to shoot me a PM and I can walk you through some of it, as it might really help with how you're feeling with things right now. It's designed for people who suffer from persistent addiction, depression, guilt, shame, fear, etc. (assuming they're mental or emotional at their core and not physical - if it's physical, you need medication).

I hope this helps :)

203 - Lifting and Diet

2 upvotes · 9 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

That's awesome :) Thanks for sharing this. I suppose the "women who lift heavy will bulk up" thing is a myth I had bought into. This is one of those comments where I wish I could show my wife some stuff here. Specifically ...

Women should lift as intensely as a man. I lift to exhaustion, when my legs or arms begin shaking too much to continue.

The very few times I've gotten my wife to do any lifting she takes the approach of doing low weights for more reps, and stopping as soon as she feels a slight burn. The concept of maxing or "to exhaustion" is quite laughable to her :/ Nowadays she sticks to running/walking intervals on a treadmill - with her "running" speed being 6mph and walking at 3mph ... every now and then she'll do a short burst at 7 or 8mph. Usually when she hits a 5k with this balance (at around 35-40 minutes), she notices her body start "glistening" and says that's the perfect time to call it a day. A hard sweat is a huge no-no.

To her credit, her wedding weight was also around 132, but with less muscle than what I'm guessing you have (she's 5'10") - and after our 3rd kid she managed to get her weight back to 137 before becoming pregnant again. Now that we've had our 4th and final child, she's starting to diet and exercise again, but will say things like (as recently as two days ago when talking about maybe doing another run at the Whole30 with my siblings), "I don't know if I could ever give up carbs. I like them too much. I'll just stick to portion control, but eat whatever I want." I can't complain too much because from a pure weight-loss standard, whatever she did before worked well enough to get her close to wedding weight even after kids. That said, where she was "tight" when we were married (at 132), I did notice that even back at 137 that "tight" look was gone. Nevertheless, she's still pretty hot to me in all such circumstance :) ... although she doesn't believe me when I say it or even show it.

Anyway, I really don't mean to say any of this as complaints against my wife (although I'm sure there's a subconscious element of that to it) - I'm quite happy with the progress she does make, and am quite attracted to her even when she's not "tight." Rather, for context: how do you recommend motivating my wife to go the "extra mile" (maybe even literally?) with more high-intensity, lifting and cardio training? Or is the recommendation simply: "Anything you try is going to come off as belittling and push her away; you're better off just letting her do her thing and take what you get, hoping that as you get ripped, she'll be more motivated to keep up." This is what others have told me before. It also seems to be the general TRP/MRP consensus, except they'd add, "And if she doesn't improve, just divorce her and move on," which is a silly thought when the distinction is little more than "thin, but not toned" and "tight body." Focusing on myself never seemed to be all that motivating to her - even when I did have the perfect 6-pack and bulging pecs several years ago (which also did nothing to solve our DB back in those days).

The Sandbox and the Swingset, Introducing MRPW

2 upvotes · 7 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

So, point 2 sounds like "passive aggressively be a bad wife until your husband changes."

2 is actually more aligned with what the other women were saying: "STFU and get out of his way." Or in other words, "Stop trying to take over and do everything yourself. Let him figure out what needs to be done on the ship, then delegate."

she shouldn't just suddenly stop to manipulate him into behaving the way she wants

Let's be clear, this is what they're doing already, just with sex instead of these other things. When a man's not leading, his wife loses attraction, so she stops having sex with him. This is a subconscious means of manipulating him back into leading again. All I'm recommending here is to redirect it into an area where he's more likely to figure out how to respond, and hopefully he'll figure out how to carry that attitude over into the bedroom as well.

Also, some of the responses seem to assume that I'm suggesting all of these things should be done "just suddenly." Most men would agree that "just suddenly" employing healthy RP tactics = going Rambo = bad. If someone "just suddenly" starts doing things, that comes off as (to use a word over-used on these RP subs) autistic. People need to use their brains in how to implement things.

The Taming of the Shrew: A Red Pill Analysis (X-Post from TRP)

2 upvotes · 4 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

See my post. I took about every Shakespeare class my university had to offer - most of them were led by the same Feminist professor. I explain her viewpoint in the first half. It's somewhat laughable.

Can you divorce a woman if she lied about her number of sexual partners? (within biblical rules)

2 upvotes · 3 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I take it "LL" means 'low libido'?

Correct.

I can only imagine the tremendous relief she felt when she discovered that having converted her feelings for you into marriage was actually honorable.

Well, that was only one of many psychological barriers she has. But it was a significant one to overcome.

idea that derives from how we define salvation

I have often said that concepts of "once saved, always saved" or "loss of salvation" only fester into arguments because people define "salvation" differently. If we used the same definition, most of us would be saying the same thing.

As a Protestant, to hear a Catholic insist man can lose his salvation seems ludicrous

Actually, only about 1/3 of Protestants are Calvinist. About 2/3 do believe in a "loss of salvation" model - but again, I believe this distinction is almost entirely a semantics issue. If we go by a Calvinist definition of salvation, I think everyone would agree that that version of salvation can never be lost.

Do you enjoy your work?

Yes, but divorce work is not for the faint at heart.

What advice do you have for someone while in and once he finishes law school in order to be successful on the outside?

Get a mentor ASAP. Suggest for the first year of law school to meet every 2-3 months, then increase as time goes on. Once you're graduated, try to meet with that mentor every other week for a while until you get a grasp of your career. Ideally you'll find a mentor in a niche you want to practice. Finding a mentor is the single most important thing you can do. Don't wait until you graduate.

Get a referral for a mentor, as that immediately establishes context for calling them up and asking. I did this by going to the domestic court and asking several bailiffs: "Who would be a good mentor?" Several of them said the same guy, so I called him up and said, "So and so referred me. Would you be interested?" He said yes.

After graduation, my state gave both the mentor and mentee CLE credit for the entire year if we followed a specific curriculum, which we did as a formality, but talked about more practical things most of the time anyway.

What do you think?

My career is not an end-goal for me, so I'm on board. There's something to be said for wanting to excel, so don't slack and say, "I didn't want to be the best anyway," but do prioritize appropriately and try to excel in all things, as Christ compels us to do.

For now, trial law is appealing.

You'll get more in-court time doing criminal, domestic, or workers' comp work than anything else - probably in that order. BWC stuff is different, though, as it's not directly adversarial in the same way. It's also hard to make money off of it without working yourself to death.

I'd like to work for government. But working on my own is something I'd really like.

If you like trial law, government work = prosecutor or public defender and that's about it. Private work can be anything.

That said, let me caution you that you probably don't really want to be a trial attorney. I am a trial attorney. I thought that's what I wanted during law school. I probably do more trials than any of my other law school classmates. I hate it. It's not what I expected, and it's way too much work. Trial itself is fun, but completely exhausting - and the prep work to get ready for trial just plain sucks. Be prepared for this if you pick a niche that has a lot of trials, like criminal or domestic.

But it's the people one surrounds himself with which make or break a job in a fulfilling field.

I tend to agree - it's not about what you do, but who you do it with. That said, you have to remember that just as often as you interact with co-workers, you're also interacting with opposing counsel, judges, bailiffs, magistrates, etc. This is a unique thing in law that doesn't apply to most other professions. So, even if you find a great place to work, you may still get burned out because of all the garbage from other people you're forced to work with, and changing your employer won't fix that.

I'm sorry if I've encroached the bounds of courtesy here. And I ask your forgiveness if I've gone too far.

You haven't gone too far at all :D

Can you divorce a woman if she lied about her number of sexual partners? (within biblical rules)

2 upvotes · 3 August 2017 · /r/RPChristians

is it any wonder that the disciples then asked in exasperation "who then can marry?"

Haha, that's a great point!

I haven't ever heard a reasonable Christian say Abraham was bad because he was polygamist, mostly it's a judgment about faith in divine promise.

That's a good point - the doubt in God is certainly the primary cause of his condemnation. But most pastors I've heard to preach on the subject have still commented, "By the way, he also committed this other sin - he tried to use sin as a means of fulfilling God's promise rather than faith." The sin here is not polygamy, as he didn't marry her - he was straight up sleeping with someone he wasn't married to at all. She was a servant, so this was culturally acceptable, but you're right in that the law on point isn't super clear.

I'd like to press you to include another factor: public declarations ... just saying two are married because they are one flesh may lead to problems.

You're right it does! I was only referencing marriage in the eyes of God, for which the "one flesh" thing makes sense to me. But if you want to function in society as a married couple, then you're right - there will have to be something to let others know you're married, or else there will be societal issues. So, although it may not be required for God to view two people as married, something as simple as wearing a ring will cause others to acknowledge what is already true before God. Whether or not they respect it is a different matter.

He said because it was all private that it was not authentic.

I don't see this distinction being made in Scripture, and it would have weird implications on people who elope and never publicly acknowledge their marriage. Although I'm not Catholic, I think if you look at the story of St. Crispin you might find this concept come up. IIRC (and I may well be wrong), one of the versions of the tale (most likely not an accurate historical one) involves him being a shoemaker who married the king's daughter in secret and continuing their marriage in secret for some time before finally being discovered. In that version of the tale, the king's daughter had gone missing at one point and the king decreed that whoever could find and return her could marry her. Crispin (who she was with) produced her and their marriage was officialized before the king, but they had already considered themselves married, although it was private. Like I said, this is one of the more bizarre versions of the story, and it's been years since I've read it so my memory may be hazy, but it seemed on point and is quite a fantastic tale if you can find it :) I actually tweaked it and incorporated it in one of my fiction books because the themes fit quite well with what I was trying to convey on a grander scale (each of the books in the series includes a tale of one of the old saints).

I'm not asking you to agree with me but to taste the fragrance of a different perspective.

A good taste, indeed. I've never had anyone critically challenge my view on bare-bones marriage except to say that state-implemented cultural norms should be followed because of Romans 13 and all that. But that brings so many troubles that no one can stand on that ground.

Although I didn't have sex with my wife before we were married, nor did we touch any erogenous zones ... we clearly had times where our make-out sessions were inflamed with lust and pushing boundaries. My wife felt a tremendous amount of guilt over this, feeling as though she had sinned. After our marriage, this contributed to her LL because she felt like God was disappointed in her for lusting before marriage. Somehow she rationalized that into needing to be LL in the marriage to make up for her sin. It was weird.

Anyway, my point is that explaining the "sex + consent = marriage" equation, and her examining the Scriptures for herself to affirm that same conclusion, resulted in her acknowledging, "Even if we did have sex before our wedding day, it wouldn't have been sin because we would be married in God's eyes and the ceremony would only be a formality." That then translated to: "What we were doing was even less than that, so it is all the more appropriate and not-sinful."

That was a HUGE mental block for her to overcome. If we had separated before the wedding, then yes, our lust would have converted to sin - but the fact of our marriage (by consecration, not by ceremony) absolved us of any past lust we experienced for one another because it was toward our actual spouse, not another.

This, then, brings up another very interesting point that is worth noting. When is a person saved? Well, we can say "when they repent" or "say the prayer" or "experience transformation by the Spirit" or whatever you want to call it. But in God's eyes, were they destined for hell before then and then suddenly the space-time continuum changed and their destiny is now toward heaven? No, God knew before the person said "the prayer" (or whatever you want to go with) that they would be saved, and so God knew that person's destination would be heaven long before that "salvation moment." As a result, in God's eyes, the person has always been saved - there's just a point in time that we can look at that consecrates what God always knew to be true.

I think marriage functions the same way. God knew in advance who my wife would be (not to say he predestined it, but foreknowledge at the very least). From his perspective, when she was born he sees: "Red's wife" and when I was born: "that girl's husband." The fact that the context of this relationship is consecrated years later doesn't change the fact of God's knowledge that we are and would be one flesh. To that end, I wonder if any "pre-ceremony" acts are justified before God because you're doing them with your spouse and not someone else's wife/husband - and because God already views you in light of your marital connection that he knows to be an inevitability.

That, of course, doesn't give an excuse to start screwing people and say, "I thought we were going to get married, so God would have been okay with it." That's recklessness. Anyway, that's just some of the weird stuff I think about sometimes. Being a divorce attorney, technicalities about marriage in the context of our faith and God's eyes really fascinates me.

Single Father v. Single Mother Stats

2 upvotes · 3 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'm very familiar with PAS. In my county, you have to be extremely careful with throwing that phrase around flippantly, though. Many people use it, but most judges won't take it seriously without clear evidence, and using it without such evidence can really hurt your case.

Also, it's not an official diagnosis in the DSM-5, so judges don't have a scientific rationale for relying on that language when making a custody determination. Instead, they have to beat around the bush to get to that conclusion. Someone wanting to claim PAS really has to get a psychologist to diagnose the child with "Child Psychological Abuse" and then identify which parent is the perpetrator of such abuse (and sometimes it's both). Fortunately, the DSM-5 actually allows for this, which the DSM-4 did not, so this was a huge development in the last few years.

This article goes well into the reasons why people were fighting for PAS to be directly included in the DSM, although they ultimately failed on a technical level. This article then explains why "child psychological abuse" diagnosis is substantially close enough. For friends of the manosphere, they'll be happy to know that the article itself takes a fairly anti-feminist approach.

Single Father v. Single Mother Stats

2 upvotes · 2 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Remember that I represent female clients too ;)

Divorce Incorporated

2 upvotes · 2 August 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'll try to make a separate post on it at some point.

Anniversary guilty feelings

2 upvotes · 1 August 2017 · /r/askMRP

If you can do so without fostering resentment (which will be your biggest enemy), whenever you think:

i havent given her anything for the last 2 months but the feeling remains..

Ask yourself: does she feel guilty when she's turning you down for sex?

Its strange because i KNOW im not doing it out of pure love..

And what if you were? Would that somehow make it better? Even if you were gift-giving out of pure love, is that motivation change going to solve all your problems? Why are you on MRP in the first place? Go back to that problem and ask: "Will having a motivation of pure-love in my gift-giving solve that problem?"

It seems like you idolize this "pure love" concept. It's a good concept, don't get me wrong. But it's also an elusive and relatively undefined concept that means different things to different people. Be careful with thinking "pure love" will solve all of your problems and remember that nothing is pure. Period. [religious exceptions apply]

The RP Can Only Do So Much Married To An Alcoholic

2 upvotes · 31 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm sorry to hear about your situation. That really sucks. Unfortunately, it's one that I see a lot.

I need to love her like Christ because she hasn't cheated and that's the only "out".

I usually reference the 4 "outs": (1) sexual sin (not just what we classify as adultery) (Matthew 5); (2) unbelieving spouse leaves (1 Cor. 7); (3) believing spouse is treated as an unbeliever b/c of unrepentant sin, but if they continue to identify with Christ, you're to expel them (Matt. 18/1 Cor. 5); (4) death (1 Cor. 7). I'm open-minded to going beyond this, if I can be persuaded through Scripture, but for now I can at least give these as fairly definitive conclusions. There are probably 2 more that I believe are valid, but I don't teach as definitive.

Also, most people are grossly confused about "love her like Christ loves the church." Christ employs very harsh, tough-love a lot of the time. Remember, this is also the guy who said in Matthew 7, "Yeah, if you only pretend to love me, I'm going to kick you out hard because I don't even know you." This is also the guy who loved His people enough to flail whips at them when they were doing wrong. It's also the guy who disciplines people to correct them. Don't be fooled by American notions of "love." Look at what God and Jesus mean when they use that word and do that.

That said, I would still encourage you to try to redeem your marriage, and you are not beyond hope. One of the men I led in my small group went through exactly what you've been through. He had a main event and actually moved out of the home, but was eventually able to turn things around and his wife now has the alcohol issues substantially under control. Although there are still issues, my friend is much, much happier and has a stronger handle on his life and marriage.

I will be letting her know that I know what's going on, and that I will not be married to an alcoholic and under no circumstances will I let my kids stay in this environment.

Although I prefer to avoid the divorce route, it is wise to be prepared. Get your evidence bullet-proof before you have this conversation with her. As many know, I'm a divorce attorney, so I speak with professional knowledge that once you tip her off that you know, her guard will go way up and you're going to have a tougher time proving your case. If you want custody, start prepping now, while she's still ignorant.

I have also reached out to an attorney and soon will be looking at how bad my divorce rape is going to be.

Feel free to ask me any questions. I can only speak as to my own home state, but it should still give you a general idea.

Also, before you're ready to file, save up for a psychological/custodial evaluation (each state uses slightly different terminology). If she's really as problematic as you describe and you're pretty clean, this is the fastest track to custody or having the upper-hand in a shared parenting scenario. In my state, these can range from $3,000 to $10,000, but they're worth more than your attorney, if you can be on the winning end of one.

Did MRP save my marriage? No...but it made me stronger to now deal with this in a completely different way than I would have a year ago.

As /u/BluePillProfessor often says: the stay plan is the same as the go plan. That's why this works. I'm sorry for the divorce, and I do hope the main event pulls her around, but I'm glad that you're in a place where your kids have a rock to rely on and this won't otherwise cripple you so they have neither parent to trust.

Any advice you guys have on how to prep for divorce

There's lots to say, but because I can go on for days, I prefer to stick to answering targeted questions, if you have any.

That said, one key thing to remember is that the law is reactive, not proactive. Very rarely will a judge issue a ruling based on a potential danger. Instead, you have to show that the danger has already occurred or been threatened. As a result, saying that she "might" drive drunk with the kids won't get you very far. If she has a DUI, now you've got some evidence that the judge can react to, or if you have a witness who says, "Yeah, I was in the car with her when she was drunk and the kids were with us too," that's something a judge can react to. But if it hasn't happened yet, don't expect them to get all excited about whatever evidence you think is killer. This is the single most frustrating aspect of divorce law. The courts won't often protect you until after you've already been harmed - and they especially won't protect kids until the kids have already been beat up or put in harm's way.

What's your preferred system?

2 upvotes · 31 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

/u/CowboyBigBoss is actually the guy who introduced me to RP a year or two ago (it just took me forever to really start digging in with it, so I don't count my first introduction back then). I don't know how far, exactly, he dives into it, but at least I know he's theologically sound.

I also know the other users that have been trolling us (at least some of them). Like CBB said, I wouldn't take anything they say seriously. My experience with them is that they are, essentially, non-Christians who like to claim the title "Christian." They are SJWs in the rawest sense. 1 Cor. 5 says of these people, "Do not even eat with them." So, the ban list just grew from 1 to 8 in 3 minutes.

Although I'd love to say that sharing the Gospel would help, as CBB said, it's like throwing pearls to swine. One of the 7 guys brigading us (who are all from r/BrokeHugs) actually used to be a mod on r/TrueChristian. Somehow he got booted and I'm guessing he's still pretty bitter, and probably doesn't like that I referenced a personal connection I have to one of their current mods, so he's taking his frustrations out on me. Oh well ... DNGAFlip and all that. I'll just keep moving on :p

107 - Hyper-Hypergamy, the Comparison Game, and Positive Dread

2 upvotes · 30 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for the encouragement. I plan on it :)

Spiritual warfare and your spouse

2 upvotes · 30 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Well said.

Spiritual warfare and your spouse

2 upvotes · 30 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

This is a good reminder. I do want to caution people that not everything is demonic or spiritual all the time, as James 1 points out that many temptations begin with our own evil desire. Also, sometimes a cold is just a cold, caused by a virus, and is not necessarily some demon prodding us with pain. The same is true with many other negative things we experience in life. That said, it's blatantly obvious to me that genuine spiritual threats often go unnoticed and are explained away as just "life." This is a very dangerous mentality to have, especially when one fails to recognize application of their spiritual gifts or the authority that Jesus gave us.

What's the best way to play this out?

2 upvotes · 26 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

it frame the entire interaction as you being some placating validation seeking schlub

And that's why I asked - I had that blind spot that it might be perceived that way. I opted not to take this course of action. Thanks for the insights.

Honestly, one would be better off being an aloof dick "don't worry where we are going, get a dress, be ready by 7"

She called asking where my old phone was so my son could play with it. I got in mini-crisis mode because there would be notifications from my TRP/MRP/RPC posts on there, which she would see if she turned on the phone. I tried to brush it off, but she pressed the issue. I explained, "I've got an app on my phone where I wrote some details about what we're doing tonight and you know I like surprises, so don't mess with my phone. All you need to know is I'll be home at 6 and you should wear a skirt and a tank top, and bring a sweater in case it gets cool outside." She was excited that there was actually a plan for the night, tried to inquire, but I explained my client was coming back from the restroom. I'm confident she will follow the instruction not to look at the phone (she won't defy direct instructions I give her like that).

It may not have played out like I wanted it to or come up under ideal circumstances, but that's what happened :p

Why are you sabotaging yourself?

Great point! Again, that's why I asked. Someone accused me of trying to humble-brag, but I really wanted to know these things.

The best successes here have come from treating any betabux in you as if they never happened.

That's wise. I've long noticed that a woman's perception of the past is based on how she feels in the present. So, reminding her of how she felt about me in the past would be dumb. I wasn't thinking fully.

You aren't leading, you're demanding (read: not commanding). It's pressure, chicks hate pressure.

Aaah, I see this now.

assume no sex

I developed that attitude long ago. The fact that this area has already shown improvement hasn't made me develop new expectations that I had cast to the road long ago.

Anyway, great response! Thanks for taking the time to help out.

What's the best way to play this out?

2 upvotes · 26 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

Panic Ms panicson hates when everything isn't wrapped around an itinerary. For me, I want to be able to flex as needed. Women will panic when they don't have 100% control over something, you can easily nuke it with a 'not talking about this', and the knowledge you have enough skill to handle stuff on the fly if need be.

This is my attitude as well. My wife is an accountant, so everything is usually done with precision and preparation. I do prepare in advance (been looking into options for a while), but I don't want her to know that because it's going to feed into her extreme Myers-Briggs J attribute, which is the primary aspect of her personality that tries to fight my frame, as I'm usually far more P (though have learned J traits for professional reasons).

107 - Hyper-Hypergamy, the Comparison Game, and Positive Dread

2 upvotes · 26 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

they wrongly feel as though they are complicit in the sins of lust or covetousness if they or their spouse draws the interest of another person

I had a full reply written up to respond to this, but decided it's probably better as a post of its own. So, I'll just put it up separately. Either way, great thoughts and thanks for sharing!

Use red pill to get out of a dead bedroom

2 upvotes · 25 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I only started to send articles after the deadbedroom was resolved with daily sex initiated by my wife.

That makes a lot more sense now! Thanks for that clarification.

fun free date ideas for after work?

2 upvotes · 25 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

That's why I gave other ideas too :)

Use red pill to get out of a dead bedroom

2 upvotes · 25 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

That's great. Your wife was okay with the obvious agenda in you sending her these articles? Was this something where she knew there was a problem and you did this as a joint decision to help her overcome the issues? Or was it more, "You're not having enough sex with me, so I'm going to make you pay attention to the issue and keep reminding you until I see change!"?

Submissive?

2 upvotes · 25 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

AA would have been better. A straight "yes" kinda kills the mood because now you're putting expectations on her = covert contract. "Glad you noticed all my improvements. Now you'd better start responding!" The goal is to make her want to submit, not to tell her she has to.

"Well, I have been eyeing a leather whip lately ... I wasn't actually going to buy it, but now that you bring it up ..."
" <cue devilish grin>

Half assed mrp?

2 upvotes · 24 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

Touche.

Your opinion of open marriages?

2 upvotes · 24 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

That's a good way to put it.

Good Enough?

2 upvotes · 24 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

sexual shame to deal with herself and just doesn't want to be what she perceives as slutty, at least not with me.

And there is the real crux of the problem. I haven't seen anything on RP yet that truly addresses how to approach a woman with genuine mental health problems. The advice is always, "AWALT - mental health problem or not, she looks like a nail to me, so let's keep using that hammer." In reality, she's screwed up and needs a screwdriver.

Maybe it's the years of beta maybe she would worship Brad Pitt's cock, whatever.

I used to believe that even if Brad Pitt or some insanely high SMV celebrity did come in the picture, my wife wouldn't even be remotely tempted. I figured, "She's legit LL, not just LL for me." She was raised in an extremely conservative religious home and was told all of her childhood: "Sex is bad until you're married and when you do have sex, it hurts a lot every time" (her mom had physical problems). Because she wasn't married for the first 23 years of her life, that was 23 years of believing "sex is bad." The "until you're married" part never stuck because that wasn't her immediate context. Her brain naturally filtered it out as irrelevant information because it wasn't applicable to her at the time. So, I just assumed her mental damage was irreversible.

Then, about 3 years ago, after I had turned her down for sex due to beta-anger, a few days later I went to bed to find her crying. I asked what was wrong and she said, "I went on youtube and started watching the 50 Shades of Grey trailer." For her, this was the same thing as pulling up hard core porn. This recontextualized the problem for me: my understanding of her long-term mental health damage about sex was affirmed, but I also saw for the first time that underneath that damage she really did want to feel like a sexual person.

Stupidly, I didn't know how to take advantage of the situation. I was consoling her and affirming that she didn't do anything wrong and that it's good for her to have a healthy sex drive. But I did this all with words, when I should have just STFU and spoke through my actions.

I'm not sure if any of this resonates with you, but I feel like we're in substantially similar spots with regard to our spouses, except maybe I'm a little more hopeful and optimistic.

No question, Just a rant. Fuck you TRP

2 upvotes · 20 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

My favorite is from a movie my kids love: Mulan - A Girl Worth Fighting For

I want her paler than the moon with eyes that shine like stars. My girl will marvel at my strength, adore my battle scars ... bet the local girls thought you were quite the charmer, and I'll bet the ladies love a man in armor ...

Then Mulan, pretending to be a man, chimes in:

How 'bout a girl who's got a brain, who always speaks her mind?

Everyone else:

Nah!

And finally ...

When we come home in victory they'll line up at the door. What do we want? A girl worth fighting for.

Of course, in true Disney fashion, despite one decent-themed song the moral of the movie is still one of feminine empowerment ... <sigh>

The Importance of Qualified Pastors

2 upvotes · 20 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

if your pastor's marriage is not one of headship and submission, or if his wife is a feminist, his household is not well ordered and it would be wise to consider being lead by another pastor.

I've never really thought about that, but great point! But I do want to clarify: headship modeled after Christ and submission modeled after the church. Christ is our head with a firm hand, but much grace. The church is meant to be submissive in all things, but Jesus also delegated much authority to his bride because he has empowered her and guides her through his Spirit.

So, I ask men everywhere: has your wife caught your spirit? Or is she going on her own spirit, motivations, and agenda?

Are you under the leadership of a qualified shepherd?

I have had exactly one masculine pastor in my life, but he moved off to the other side of the country after a few short years. I miss him.

My current pastor is the next closest, but he still loves the "happy wife, happy life" mantra and cracks jokes from the pulpit about "who really wears the pants in the family." That said, I'm pseudo-discipling my current pastor and have been able to teach him several strategies for implementing long-term leadership skills that hopefully he applies in the home and not just the church.

Does your pastor actively promote biblical gender roles?

In word, yes. If someone were to ask him point blank, he'd give the correct answers. That said, when he teaches on tangential matters, not hitting the issue head-on, I get the totally opposite impression - that he emphasizes woman-worship, as if God put our happiness in the relationship as a higher priority than His glory (which is why he let Steven be stoned, the apostles be martyred, etc., right? /s). He will teach "husbands love your wives" for 40 minutes with about 30 seconds of "your desire will be for your husband, but he will rule over you." Sure, this is a key balance to maintain, but when you so drastically over-emphasize the part that benefits women and try to explain away what "wives, submit to your husbands as unto the Lord" to accept it but pluck out all its teeth ... the actual message the Bible tries to convey gets distorted.

What weak qualities or beliefs have you picked up from leaders that you are working on uprooting?

There are two key ones:

FIRST: The idea that the man should always sacrifice his happiness and glory for that of his wife.

This is ridiculous, but it's what gets peddled from the pulpit. When I see how God interacts with the Church, I do see significant sacrifice, but that sacrifice is always for the greater good of the relationship, not just rote happiness. In addition, although Jesus "humbled himself ... and became obedient to death, even death on a cross," the next part is: "Therefore God glorified him to the highest place and gave him the name that is above every name, that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow in heaven, on earth, and under the earth."

The way God structured the Christ-Church relationship is designed for Christ's glory. If Ephesians 5 means anything, it's that the Husband-Wife relationship should function the same way. That's not to say men should get big heads and egos about themselves, but if they're stifling their own glory to appease their wives, how does that adequately reflect to the world what God wants everyone to see about his relationship with the Church? We bear his image not only as individuals, but in our family unit, and if we choose to forego that image then we have failed to glorify God appropriately. Although Moses was "very humble - more humble than any other person on earth," his face shone with the glory of God so brightly he had to hide it under a veil. We can be humble and shine with radiant glory at the same time.

It should also go without saying that when the husband is right with God, happy, and content, this will overflow to his wife. Yes, there are times that we need to be "poured out like a drink offering" (as Paul says), but I have noticed in my marriage that when I am unhappy my wife becomes bitter. When I'm in good spirits, she follows suit. That said, when she's unhappy I have the ability to maintain my emotional momentum through her turbulence and this actually knocks her out of her funk. But when she's happy and I'm not, my unhappiness ends up bringing her down. So, I've changed the mantra to: "happy wife, happy life; but a happy husband is how you get a happy wife." My wife is thankful I've adopted this attitude, despite the fact that most feminists would love to stone me for it. Look how oppressed she is, being so happy like that!

SECOND: That your marriage does not affect your ministry.

No pastor will ever say this. The problem is that they don't affirm the opposite either. By teaching ministry as one compartment and marriage as another compartment, they are subliminally communicating to the congregation: "These are two separate things. They don't mix. You can have a great ministry and crap marriage and vice versa, and your laziness in one area really doesn't affect the other." I lived in this mindset for way too long. I do agree that there is a degree to which God can make someone fruitful despite having a broken/dead marriage, but there is more often a stronger correlation than we'd like to admit. It's easy to say, "I'm really good at ministry, but getting my wife to be attracted to me is hard work, so I'll just focus on my ministry," or "Ministry is hard; marriage is great, I'll just be happy with what God gave me and keep loving on my wife." In reality, we are capping our growth when we do that. Sure, you could keep honing your strength, but you'll be moving inches when beefing up your weakness in the dichotomy could take you miles - and only after men have started implementing this concept do they realize just how immature their ministry and marriages really were and what great heights God has in store for them.

[META] Field Reports, OYS, etc?

2 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

OYS accountability threads. Is this something that we plan to do in RPC or should we contribute to the TRP/MRP threads?

This could be a good idea. I know other subs have code to have an auto-moderator post these up weekly. I'm not sure how to code that, but I can certainly look into it! That said, I wouldn't discourage people from participating in conversation on TRP/MRP either ... just know you're likely to get a different responsive conversation than what I'd expect here.

Field Reports ... high level didactic material ... this question post ... Is this the sort of post that should be encouraged? If so, how?

My hope is that there would be a healthy balance, and I envision that balance as being about 50% questions, 25% field reports, and 25% theory. That said, with the sub being so new and having such a small user-base, we're not going to see a ton of FRs and questions. We have to get content up to show that this is an active enough community to be worth the subscription and participation, and also that people here are competent enough to answer the questions and won't be giving garbage advice - hence the need for an early flurry of theory posts.

Are there any similar challenges that you guys would like to see done here?

Do you have any suggestions? I'm not opposed to all levels of dread. In fact, I believe in latent/smaller quantities it's actually something a wife should enjoy, despite the terminology. But the later phases and when it becomes overt, that's when it becomes more destructive than constructive from a Christian vantage point.

keeping post lengths down should be encouraged

Not a bad thought. This is obviously not part of my nature, but I'll try to be more mindful of this. That said, I have noticed that in TRP/MRP, the post lengths are traditionally much longer than anywhere else on reddit anyway, so I assumed this was an appropriate carry-over.

less cussing here

I have the auto-mod filter that and just made a new sticky about this.

My wife used a stun gun on me and I took it

2 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

I like this.

Reacting v. Responding v. STFU

2 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

She would become more pissed. Ask more questions. Become stand offish and make an issue about it. Tell me I'm being weird.

I.e. re-affirm that you've got a good dread game going.

Draw it out till she gets what she wants.

The fact that you consider this a possibility shows that you're building your frame with straw. That's cool ... straw is a common ingredient in bricks. Just make sure you're strengthening it as you go and not being content with a straw frame that buckles when the big bad wolf comes blowing.

I get annoyed by it

I.e. butt-hurt. That's reacting.

But I try to hold frame

STFU will be fine if you don't know how to formulate the response. That's better than saying something stupid, as long as it's clear that you're not emotionally withdrawing (as per my original post).

I'm partial to the fogging-broken record combo. This doesn't work in every situation, but with my wife it works quite well. In proper WISNIFG form ...

HER: You didn't say ILY to me.

YOU: You're right, I didn't [fogging]. I don't want to cheapen the phrase [self-disclosure]. I'm not going to say it every time you want to hear it [assertion].

HER: But don't you love me?

YOU: Of course I do [self-disclosure; fogging]. But that doesn't mean I have to say ILY every time you want to hear it. [broken record]

HER: But if you really loved me, you would love saying it to me!

YOU: I can see how you would think that. I'm sure a lot of people are that way [fogging]. But I'm not that way because I'm not going to say it every time you want to hear it. [broken record]

HER: You're being really cold and mean right now.

YOU: You're right, I probably am [fogging]. But I'm still not going to say something just because you want to hear it [broken record]. I will say it when I mean it [self-disclosure].

Note: the self-disclosure in your first line is an explanation, which is part of DEERing. But it's not in combination with the other parts, so it's not as problematic. Also, note that you shouldn't get into an argument over why you think that's a good policy to have - that's where DEERing really comes in. You state your policy, even if it's an explanation (that's fine), and then stick to your conclusion.

Bear in mind that these are assertiveness/ domination tactics. We'd be crazy if we assumed that every single one-off conversation must automatically end up in panty-wetting. As MMSLP says, "Things are probably going to get worse before they start getting better." Eventually she will realize her antics won't get you to back down and that she either has to accept your boundaries or move on. If she's like most women, this assertiveness and your willingness to let her go will let her know that you're a high-value man (or at least give her that perception - after all, you're not clinging onto her like she's the best you'll ever get), so she will be naturally more inclined to accepting your boundaries, which usually has the result of fostering attraction.

If I'm extremely lovable and attentive. She reacts better. But I can't always be that Ick ... she's got you trained. Lovable and attentive are good. "She reacts better" as your motive for being that way = she's conditioning you to treat her a certain way when she acts out so that she can get away with more tantrums. More tantrums = more hits against your frame. Stronger tantrums = more opportunity to break your frame.

Here's the thing: women are experts at reverse manipulation. They don't know they're doing it, but they are. They make you think, "I've got her figured out. If I do this, then she'll respond this way." In reality, she conditioned you to get to the "If I do this" line in the first place because that's what she wants you doing. Get that out of your head :p

Also, "If I'm extremely lovable and attentive. She reacts better" is a blatant covert contract. Go read NMMNG again.

Reacting v. Responding v. STFU

2 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

saying I didn't even say I love you. I tell her I don't have to you know I do and I'll show you tomorrow when you come over. She tells me "well it's nice to hear

Yeah, that's DEERing. "I don't have to" = Defending. "You know I do" = explaining/excusing. "I'll show you tomorrow when you come over" = rationalizing that it's okay not to say it today because there's always tomorrow.

Her response = "Screw your excuses and rationalizations; you'd better do things my way." She's trying to pull you into her frame. This is where you have to pick your battles. Is it just a small chip in the corner or is she trying to break through a hard line for you?

My guess is that this isn't a hard line, but the idea of "if I say ILY all the time it'll lose its meaning" probably holds some weight to you and you don't want to overdo it. Overdoing it with ILY forces you to escalate your efforts to make her feel loved. When one tactic becomes stale, you've got to step it up a notch. To avoid those notches getting into absurdity, you've got to be strategic with when and how to dole out comfort and affection. If it seems like a free gift, she'll stop valuing it.

My wife used to get really mad when I'd forget to kiss her before heading off to work. In my beta days, I tried even harder to remember that quick peck on the cheek, thinking that would make her happier. I had pampered her for so long, she got used to it and felt like a princess with her boy-servant. Joy. /s

At one point a few months back I cut that out. I walked off without the kiss, not making a scene of it. She noticed and called me ...

HER: "I'm hurt that you didn't take the time to kiss me goodbye. You said you'd work on remembering."

ME: "Sorry, I forgot. It happens. Deal with it."

... NOT. That sounds "dominant," but would, in fact, be DEERing. "Sorry" is my defense. "I forgot" is my excuse. "It happens" is my explanation/rationalization. "Deal with it" is just being a jerk.

ME FOR REAL: "Crap, you're right. Sorry about that, I guess I'm going to have to kiss my secretary now." [A&A]

HER: "That's not even funny!" [but she laughs anyway, although still obviously a bit miffed that I'd even joke about that]

ME: "What makes you think I was trying to be funny?" [implied wink in the tone of my voice]

HER: [dead silence]

ME: "Getting another call, gotta go."

I don't know how closely this conversation parallels your situation, but it worked for me. I still kiss her in the morning sometimes, but often don't. I do it when it's convenient for me, whereas she used to make me head up and down stairs to give her that kiss because she was too lazy to get out of bed to meet me at the door. I'm not putting up with that anymore. But I do like kissing my wife, so if she's there by my side, why wouldn't I kiss her?

My guess is, you probably do love your girl. So, if she's there and handy, why wouldn't you communicate that in some way? Well, I gave a couple reasons why, but you can work around that by finding different ways of communicating affection so that "ILY" doesn't become stale, but she still gets the comfort she needs - and that this happens on your terms and not her demands.

How does biblical submission benefit wives?

2 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I know my comments may come across to some as "women bashing" and I'm not.

I never got this implication. You're all good in my book :)

Some Scriptures seem "tough" to deal with, especially in our modern era and the "mainstream" ideas pushed by society, and we don't understand or know God's heart, the spirit of the law, and more.

I think /u/BluePillProfessor hits the nail on the head here: these things weren't even questioned in the time the Bible was written. We don't understand it because we've never lived in a culture that actually embraced biblical concepts on gender and family roles, nor am I aware of any such place on the earth today. That said, I'd wager people alive in the time of the Bible itself would have fully understood these Scriptures and they wouldn't have seemed "tough" in the slightest.

Was this the an RP move? Need advice/input.

2 upvotes · 19 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

this maturity is vastly uncommon- however, that shouldn't make someone lower their standards for it.

I get what you're saying, but I don't think the Bible or RP would endorse waiting to find a unicorn. Maybe /u/RedPillWonder has more to say on this, though?

Again, to clarify, I'm not saying you should compromise on hard-next issues, like having a high n-count or having dabbled in homosexuality. Those are pretty big issues. But if your concern is that she's just a passive church attendee who doesn't know who Esther is and she's had dinner with a few other guys ... sure, she's not a perfect image of the iconic Proverbs 31 woman, but she's got room to make it there.

Also, RP says that if you want an LTR, you've got to find them while they're young before they make all these mistakes - that way you can mold them into your frame from the get-go. This is the same thing as me saying, "Find someone within range and raise her up." The only difference is the terminology between "mold her into your frame" and "disciple her."

I think the jist of what you are saying is to keep your standards high, but don't be so quick to write people off because every Christian is technically a "work in progress."

That's a great way to put it :)

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

2 upvotes · 18 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

That's because narcissists get their validation from success. A strong partner will reduce their win-rate in the relationship. A weak partner will let them win every time.

I love negotiating against narcissists because they often don't see it coming. They are used to their weak spouse and assume the negotiation will be against their spouse. They think, "This is easy, I got this. I win against him/her all the time." Then I step in the room and start fogging, broken record, negative inquiry, and all those other WISNIFG tactics I had learned far before knowing them by name. The other party finally backs down and lets their attorney run the show - or they fire their attorney and try to go it alone, which just makes it even better for me.

Was this the an RP move? Need advice/input.

2 upvotes · 18 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

The unequally yoked command applies to dating, but from a different source. That explanation is too long to get into here though.

Once the 'gina tingles kick in and the lack of her being a mature Christian (if one at all?) and two and two adds up fairly easily.

This is where MMSLP explains that for girls, "It just happened" is a good excuse. "I would never do that. I'm not that kind of girl. But I'm not responsible because it just happened." That's how the hamster works.

104 - How to compliment your wife and make her feel sexy

2 upvotes · 18 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Well said.

Was this the an RP move? Need advice/input.

2 upvotes · 18 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm going to say some hard truths below. So, let me explain first that I say it from experience. I have been where you've been - but even worse. I actually did get this particular girl. We dated for about 9 months. During that time she cheated on me with at least a dozen different guys. I took the same mentality you did: "She wants to grow in her faith and develop self-control and to become a godly woman. How can I turn her down?" I should have gotten out of the relationship after the first week. I was an idiot. My male hamster was hard at work and raw emotional flutters at the fact that she was my first-ever girlfriend kept me pretty blind. Every line you mentioned was something I identified with in some way.

With respect that I've been there too, this is the most blue pill story I've seen in a while.

- Severe oneitis? Check.
- Orbiting? Check.
- Giving up your value for free? Check.
- Friend-zoning yourself with her? Check.
- Pedestalizing? Check.
- Letting her define the relationship? Check.
- Getting butt-hurt? Check.

I stood my ground and controlled the flow of the conversation

From what you've explained, you did not. You spilled your guts, put your heart on a plate and said, "Here, this is yours. You can do whatever you want with it."

What do pastors say about girls being promiscuous? Give yourself away for free and people won't value what you're offering for very long. The same goes for you: Give your heart to her for free and she'll throw it in the trash pretty quickly. Nobody values freebies.

I told her that what she did was wrong in using me i.e. "I got all butt-hurt and let her see it."

she conceded that she did use me and that she knew how I felt about her. She never apologized for wasting my time.

i.e. "I'm not sad that I hurt you; I'm sad that you found out I've been manipulating you all this time."

I essentially told her that I did not want a friendship any longer

More butt-hurt.

all of my time and energy would go into finding a good woman to help me through life

Emotionally reacting instead of shutting up until you have a solid response.

I decided that I was done being used

This is the one place where I will give you a solid.

and left on my terms

No, you left on her terms. You just wanted to make sure she felt a sting as she got her way. I'm pretty sure from the tone of your post that you left the conversation far more wounded than her.

dating an unbeliever ... justified it based on irrationality, poor theology ... and emotion

Welcome to the hamster. You're learning.

She proved to me that she wasn't the good catch I thought she was.

I have said this a dozen times I my non-RP account in Christian subs, and will refrain it here: If you can't find the perfect, godly woman, raise one up. As the man, it's your responsibility to lead your SO/wife. I hear guys complaining all the time, "All the girls in my area are so shallow and don't take their faith seriously and will give it up to the first guy who gives her tingles. Where are all the good Christian girls who I really want to be with?"

First off, they exist, but often-times men are too looks-picky to go with one of them. Second, find someone who's already on the path to Christ who you find attractive, enter into a relationship, and begin discipling her. If you have to, go below your bar and raise her up. Is she not very attractive, but has other great qualities? Join in and show her how to become attractive to you. Take her to the gym with you; go clothes shopping with her; help her pick out makeup and perfume. If she's already attractive, but spiritually immature, start a relationship and lead her into godliness.

If you had discovered RP stuff a year ago and this sub actually existed back then, there might have been more we could do to help - and she would eventually see that you would've likely been the exact kind of guy she wanted. But it's too late for that. So, you'll have to get over the oneitis ASAP.

I recommend 3 months of monk-mode for you. Otherwise, you're probably going to be on an emotional swing toward the next girl and you won't fully be able to digest and implement the RP stuff you're learning.

I also recommend reading through the lives of David and Joseph. These are guys who know how to accept the crap that life gives them and take charge anyway. Make them your heroes for the next 6 months and aspire to be as much like them as humanly possible - not necessarily in their faults, but certainly in the way they're willing to accept their faults and move on.

In particular, you were pining over this girl and getting all weepy and emotional while you still thought there was a chance. Now that you see the chance is over, you seem a little more confident and able to move on. Why bother crying over spilled milk? David did the same thing when his baby was prophesied to die. While there was still a chance he wept and fasted. When the baby died, he stopped being butt-hurt about it and went to lead his country. Guess what happened: the next child born by that same woman was Solomon, his great heir. Who's going to be your next, and are you going to be man enough to trust God with the situation?

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

2 upvotes · 18 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Sorry to hear about the divorce. There is hope for working out these relationships, but I do agree it's very difficult. As a cautionary note, if the NPD is in the more severe ranges, you're not going to get very far in mediation. The best way to deal with a narcissist is to refuse to back down.

In addition, under no circumstances ever are you to explain yourself. Narcissists will always be able to out-manuever you from their own flawed perception of logic. They think they're smarter and better than you and deserve more than you, so even if your argument is rock solid, they're still going to assume their argument is better just because they said it. At best, you'll hit a stalemate that way. At worst, you'll come off looking like an idiot to the mediator, who will then start pushing you to be the one to cave.

This is where WISNIFG is immaculate. I could have written that book from a legal strategy standpoint. The fogging-broken record combo is worth its weight in gold when negotiating with a narcissist. "What you're saying makes a lot of sense. But I still want this anyway."

Always make sure you're negotiating from a position of strength with a narcissist. If they're in the upper-hand, they'll know it and milk it. You have to find a way to turn the tables, and if you can't, then start learning to accept your lumps. If you do have the position of strength, because a narcissist will never believe you about your strengths, you must go to a higher authority - someone they can't deny. Get the judge to say at a pretrial, "I'm with 'ImSteveMcQueen' on this one." As soon as that happens, the narcissist is all about saving face and will buckle.

Also, narcissists care more about their image and appearances than actual substance. As a result, if you're fighting over custody, for example, you can concede to do "faux shared parenting," where the narcissist gets a document that says "shared parenting" on top, so she can wave her equal rights to all her friends, but in the document itself have a clause that says, "/u/ImSteveMcQueen has final decision-making authority in the event of an irreconcilable disagreement."

Also, most narcissists are more concerned with their bank account than anything. Use financial leverage to gain the upper-hand in custody. If possible, settle the custody matters first while the financial issues are still looming, that way the stuff with the kids are off the table. Narcissists are prone to do this because they like to be the good guy/girl who "put the kids first - made sure they were taken care of before dealing with all the money stuff." Then, once you get the custody arrangement you want, using the financial pressures, fess up that you don't think you'll reach an agreement on the financial issues and you're ready to go to trial. Also, threats about how expensive litigation will be are fairly effective with narcissists.

Lastly, if custody is at issue, get a psychological evaluation. An evaluator worth his salt will know how damaging it can be to have a narcissist in charge of parenting decisions and how harmful that can be on the kids. Very rarely do psychologists recommend custody or shared parenting rights for a narcissist.

House-wife v. SAHM

2 upvotes · 17 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Good thoughts!

Advice to Young Women Today for a Better, Happier Life and Relationships

2 upvotes · 17 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Plus, we haven't gotten into the discussion of college/university culture and hook-ups, potential indoctrination from professors, heightened peer pressure, etc, all of which is magnified when going off to university.

Great point there too!

Rejecting appreciation ... weird concept, but it works for me.

2 upvotes · 17 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

There are other forms than PIV. That was a mental block I had overcome when initially tuning into RP stuff about 3 weeks ago. I was telling myself the 6-week rule would apply to everything, which was just dumb.

Advice to Young Women Today for a Better, Happier Life and Relationships

2 upvotes · 17 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting take. I like it!

RP Christians: Great Idea

2 upvotes · 16 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I love it! I'll definitely have to look into your book :)

Advice to Young Women Today for a Better, Happier Life and Relationships

2 upvotes · 15 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Beautiful post! I love every bit of this. One follow up question: do you have any insight for younger believers about how to balance the "marry early ... but be patient" part?

My wife and I married at 23. I was her first boyfriend and she was my second girlfriend. We both waited until marriage for sex. Although I have always been confident, she used to have doubts about us early in the marriage because she never really got to experience what a relationship was like with anyone else. It hasn't come up in ages, but she really struggled with wishing she had dated around first ... but I would rather my daughters (3, 2, and 4 weeks) one day follow the same path she did: vet, vet, vet until you find the right guy. Thoughts?

Reacting v. Responding v. STFU

2 upvotes · 14 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Fair enough. I think the post was clear enough, though, that I was referencing a literal silence with no emotional reaction either - complete and total nonresponsiveness. That's what didn't work, but it was a necessary midpoint I went through on my journey from being emotionally reactive to informationally responsive.

Woman's desire is to their HUSBAND according to God

2 upvotes · 14 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Great thoughts :)

Woman's desire is to their HUSBAND according to God

2 upvotes · 14 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I have read his comment and agree. My original perception is that we are Christians first, RP second. As a result, if someone asks for relationship and sex advice to do things that are Scripturally prohibited, rather than being RP first and giving the advice, we would be Christians first and address the sin issue and not support it.

I would prefer to allow the opportunity to discuss with someone why they are experiencing those desires and how Jesus can help fill the void rather than ill-placed sexual attraction ... rather than just censoring and cutting out the conversation altogether. That said, without seeing the character of the community here, I don't know if my preference is a realistic option or if it will end up backfiring and causing more trouble than it's worth.

I know when I've seen this type of stuff get brought up over on r/TrueChristian the community there is more than prepared to address the topic in a godly way that doesn't compromise biblical values and tries to engage with the person both lovingly and in a way that draws them toward Christ. I simply don't know if this community is capable of doing that yet, so I defer judgment on the issue until it actually comes up :p

Woman's desire is to their HUSBAND according to God

2 upvotes · 14 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Your evangelism method seems interesting. I'd be interested to see what the follow-up is like with people who do appear to be genuine. I often find that some people will have a genuine emotional reaction to the gospel but will not invest in it despite having said the prayer or changing behavior patterns temporarily. This is where discipleship after-the-fact is key.

The Ray Comfort model is fine if you're dealing with somebody who actually cares about the fact that they are sinful or the potential consequences of that sin. Unfortunately, most people don't. They think of hell as one big party and if you try to argue otherwise, even knowing you're right, you've just engaged on their terms in an argument that doesn't really matter in order to condition them to accept your method of evangelism, which they will probably still not respond to, even if you persuade them that hell is horrible, because intellectually acknowledging this is not the same as the subconscious impressions they have had of hell for a long time that one conversation will not be able to break through.

My preferred model is to use what I call the lens illustration. It centers around a person's present felt needs. Although it may not be a perfect illustration, because everybody has an actual felt need, whether they admit it or not, it is applicable to every person. It also helps the recipient feel the seriousness in the conversation because you're discussing a matter that is deeply important to them and affecting their daily life. I have reference this illustration once before on this sub and will probably do a post on it at some point even though it does not directly tie to Red Pill principles because it tangentially addresses matters relevant to emotional stability, which is certainly a core RP concept. I believe the gospel is a better answer to emotional stability than studying stoicism.

a person must understand their sinfulness in the eyes of a holy God before they will see their need for Christ

This is true for many, but as I noted above, I think that showing a person how Jesus has an answer to their immediate felt needs can be even more powerful than convicting them of sin, particularly when they don't already care about whether or not they are sinful.

I often wonder how those who call themselves "Christians" but never share their faith can justify that

They can't. It is their hamster running their faith rather than their spirit. To get over this I often ask people what they would do if they found a note under their door saying, "I will kill you and all of your family at midnight tonight." There are three possible options:

- not believe the note and do nothing. Your family will die.
- believe it but not care, so you do nothing. Your family will die.
- believe it and care, so you do everything you can to protect yourself and your family.

Only the last of these will actually save anybody. It is not enough to intellectually acknowledge something, if we really believe something and it matters to us, that belief should inherently prompt action. The action is not what saves us, because we have no power to save ourselves. Instead, if you call the cops they can send a protective detail or protect you in any other number of ways. If you just try to deal with the matter yourself, it is highly likely that you will fail because the murderer likely has a plan and knows what you might do to fight against it. The only solution that actually works is to ask for help. That is why faith in God will save us, but our actions will not.

103 - Desire Cultivates Intimacy

2 upvotes · 14 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Glad it was helpful!

Dealing with the stressed wife.

2 upvotes · 14 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I think /u/bluepillprofessor called for field reports on this. Make a thread of it and share your experience so we can all learn, tweak and apply. We need to know what works and what doesn't, and every application of it will bring out more information than just how your and my wife has responded to this method. Also, others may be able to help you refine things so it goes even more spectacularly next time!

Woman's desire is to their HUSBAND according to God

2 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I take the sexual aspects to be parallel as well :) Malachi 2:15 coupled with Romans 9:8 start to allude to the conclusions.

Woman's desire is to their HUSBAND according to God

2 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed, although Hebrews 10:26-31 has actually given me even more pause for concern than Matthew 7.

Woman's desire is to their HUSBAND according to God

2 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I actually don't mind a little theological debate here and there. I just prefer it stays respectful and mutually edifying ... and at least reasonably close to on topic.

Woman's desire is to their HUSBAND according to God

2 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Hey there! You're definitely doing a good job adding to the conversation.

I totally did not pick up on that implication when I first watched the video. On a second review, I do see how you would get there, although I wonder if the whole video (rather than this 4-ish minute clip) would reveal more about creation that precedes the immediate context of the curse, which is where this clip starts. To that end, I usually give people the benefit of the doubt.

That said, I do (and always have) 100% agree with your interpretation and that any implication that the headship role was first established by the fall is wrong. Given my 102 post about this subject, if you think I left a false implication here, please let me know so I can correct it!

EDIT: This is what I wrote in 102 that related to my interpretation of the first three chapters of Genesis in this context:

God gave the command to "be fruitful and multiply" before the fall. In order to ensure this command would be followed, he gave us all libidos. In order to ensure our libidos did not hinder us from doing everything else he put us on the earth to do, he made our libidos dependent on our actual fulfillment of those duties and our ability to let the other person fulfill their duties in the context of a relationship with us. When Adam and Eve became sinners, they lost the ability to trust their natural impulses because of the new sinful nature. To help set things right, God articulated the curse as a clarification of our duties.

From there, fulfillment of those duties is what we find attractive, though we are all naturally bent to do the opposite. Women's sinful nature gives them a bent to want to control their men (as opposed to letting them lead). Men's sinful nature gives them a bent toward laziness and apathy (as opposed to working hard). Fortunately, in both cases Christ conquers the sinful nature in us so that Christians have and more natural time overcoming these innate weaknesses ... which is part of why I think RP thinking comes naturally to some Christians - because we've been reading it in the Bible all this time, but without a pragmatic world-view to give us context to understand what we're reading ... which is why RP is also a tipping point for many Christians, where the church has otherwise obfuscated more straight-forward readings of these passages by their "say one thing, but establish a culture that does another" patterns.

Woman's desire is to their HUSBAND according to God

2 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I have never really thought about that. Very interesting :)

Woman's desire is to their HUSBAND according to God

2 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Very well said. A man's fitness, ability to lead, etc. are all things that assist the woman in her ability to submit, but are not necessary. The reverse is true: a woman's submissiveness and beauty (internal and external alike) are things that make it easier for a man to lead and want to stay fit, but they are not necessary.

As I noted in 102, these traits develop mutual attraction and can play off of one another - not only to the degree that we see a desirable trait in the other, but also to the degree that we see the other person will allow us to fulfill our role in the context of the relationship, thus satisfying their desires and knowing that what we do matters to the other.

More important than anything is this (which TRP/MRP/RPW alone could probably never conclude): the reason we can live out our roles independent of our physical spouse's fulfillment of his/her roles is that we have a spiritual spouse who always fulfills His role for us, empowering us to be faithful (action) and content (emotion) in all things (see most of Philippians 4).

I'm seeing a need to do a post on this soon, but I have a lot to say about the way physical and spiritual relationships are meant to parallel one another and how we can utilize each to understand and improve the other better. Either way, great job with your comments here!

102 - Desire and the Curse

2 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I expressed anxiety about the move, but never his decision

This is a huge and vitally important distinction to make! Most women would do well to keep this in the forefront of their minds.

I had to do what was best for him and help him make the right decision, even at the cost of my own job. That is what a helpmate does

My previous pastor said it best: It's not submission until you disagree. Otherwise you're just doing what you already would have done anyway.

I can think about the term husband and become aroused. I sort of thought this was common in Christianity but I see I am wrong on that. So my understanding of what a husband is produces physical desire.

Very, very wrong indeed! Haha. But I think your last sentence is key: what a husband is - that's what produces physical desire. Most of MRP (as opposed to TRP) strategy is about making men into husbands the way God designed them. They take roundabout methods of figuring out what a true man/husband is supposed to look like; the Bible is more of a cheat-sheet. It tells us directly and gives us example after example after example. It's interesting to note that historically many church men were the forerunners of true manliness and husband-ness. It wasn't until the church started worshiping culture instead of trusting God that we see this fade among men in the church (predominantly in the 1800s, but a little before too) and it took RP thinking to really pull all these concepts back from the ground up - and they did it the hard way. It gives me a greater respect for our non-Christian brethren.

sex helps seal the bond

Remind me someday to do a post on seals and covenants. I've written about it on other subs on my main account several times, but I bet it would be really helpful to this community as well. I usually use it in a context to people better understand how to relate to God by the way he established physical sex as a parallel to spiritual concepts; but the reverse is often true - when we are spiritually healthy but need help with our physical lives, looking to the spiritual truth can help us set our physical world back in order. This radically changed my life when I started understanding and applying the concepts.

My boyfriend likes that I'm smart

2 upvotes · 13 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Great article. Took a while to get through, but it's really interesting. I feel like I had already figured out most of the conclusions, but it was incredible to read the theory behind why those conclusions work the way they do. Thanks for sharing!

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

2 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

But once a women becomes diagnosably, statistically significant crazy, then it starts being less about successful relationships and more about escaping with your sanity and your life.

That is the conclusion most people come to. That said, I don't think it has to be this way, and it could be very unwise for some men who are late enough in the marriage to assume this as the first option over learning to develop an effective framework for maintaining poise and control in the face of a relationship with significant PD issues.

MRP fixes the man, and this usually fixes the woman, so why bother with diagnosing

As I just noted to /u/GargantuaBlarg29, the beauty of PDs and RP thinking is that PDs are virtually incurable. Until about 5 years ago they actually were deemed incurable.

The resulting conclusion is this: If you're in a relationship with someone who has a PD, accept the fact that you cannot fix them and adjust yourself to orient your relationship toward the results you want instead. This isn't a "do whatever it takes to minimize the expression of her PD" suggestion, but one of establishing a frame that accounts for all relevant facts.

Sometimes I get the impression that people here think that there is only one possible frame and everyone must use that frame and you're not allowed to adjust that one-size-fits-all frame for the specific details of your life.

It takes TWO to form a dysfunctional relationship, so if your woman is sick, you are likely sick in a synergistic way as well or you would be gone already.

This I totally agree with. Very well said.

"Strategies" to deal with ...

Absolutely agreed on that entire paragraph. Even when I counsel men through marriage difficulties (not in a licensed capacity; usually as a mentor-mentee relationship), I do so with a mindset: "Hope for the best, but prepare for the worst."

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

2 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

There hasn't been much collaboration of information in that manosphere that I've seen

I haven't seen it talked about at all either. The only way collaboration can happen is if someone starts the conversation ;)

most weak men try to label their women with something to put the blame on the woman, avoid blame themselves, or just can't handle the fact that people can act this way

The beauty of PDs and RP thinking is that PDs are virtually incurable. Until about 5 years ago they actually were deemed incurable. Recently certain types of dialectical behavioral therapy through intensive out-patient programs in both group and individual settings simultaneously for a minimum of 2-3 years is necessary to develop a lasting change. I have yet to meet anyone who has ever actually underwent this process and succeeded.

The resulting conclusion is this: If you're in a relationship with someone who has a PD, accept the fact that you cannot fix them and adjust yourself to orient your relationship toward the results you want instead. This isn't a "do whatever it takes to minimize the expression of her PD" suggestion, but one of establishing a frame that accounts for all relevant facts.

I believe a lot of "personality disorders" are just BS titles

For high functioning individuals (as most people with PDs are) you're exactly right. But when you meet someone who (under the former DSM-IV standards) would have a GAF score of 50 or less, you'll see all of these traits very clearly pronounced and would readily acknowledge, "There is something wrong with that person far beyond the ordinary things that distinguish unique individuals from one another."

There's nothing "wrong" with them like there's something wrong with a schizophrenic

As a point of clarity on what I just said: sometimes there is, sometimes there isn't. That's why I say: it's a scale, not a switch.

RP aware men don't think they deserve anything

I get that, but I'm speaking as to all narcissistic traits. In the DSM there is something like a checklist and if you hit x out of y of the traits, then on a rote technical level, you have the disorder. A sense of "deserving" something from others might just not be one of the ones that's checked for true RP guys ... or maybe a guy is RP, but that's one of his weaker areas and why he still needs to be on this forum for support and encouragement in maintaining that aspect of his RPness.

AWALT. This isn't a personality disorder, it's AWALT

You're probably thinking about it in the context of casual expression as opposed to manifest expression. You're used to seeing people whose quirks don't have a substantial negative impact on their ability to interact with other people because most people aren't clinically "crazy." But the fact is that many men do marry clinically crazy people without realizing it until after the fact. If you've managed to avoid these women and never run across them or gotten to know them intimately enough to see that level of crazy come out, then props for you. But I wouldn't dismiss the fact that countless men (and women) have a different experience that transcends "AWALT" into a unique mess. Again, that doesn't make it okay to blame the woman, and the point of part 2 is to show men that they're not helpless victims of circumstance ... so there's no excuses to be made.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

2 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Not sure if I like this post because AWALT

Indeed, all women are a little crazy. This post is meant to highlight women who go beyond the ordinary levels of AWALT crazy, even when we don't recognize it. In addition, it's good to know the tendencies your woman have toward which type of crazy.

As for bipolar, it does get confused as a PD a lot. In reality, Axis 1 disorders relate to personality and Axis 2 relates to mood disorders. Because bipolar is Axis 2, I didn't include it. Although there are distinct differences, borderline is close enough to cover a lot of the bipolar concepts anyway. The primary distinction is that mood disorders are episodic (i.e. come and go), whereas personality disorders are consistent (although they produce episodic features, even when the episode isn't manifesting the thinking structures and behavioral patterns are still there in a different way).

What gets really bad is when a person has both Axis 1 and 2 issues. My preferred psychologist expert calls this "the perfect storm" and supervised visitation is virtually always necessary when these are coupled with any substantive degree of manifestation (i.e. GAF score even of 70 or so, if GAF was still being used).

6 Questions for Christian Merps

2 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

mercilessly attack any new guy and use classic shame and blame tactics

This is my greatest fear in what could happen here, and I intend to do everything I can to prevent it from happening. The last thing I want is guys on the right track being intimidated back into BPdom, giving the opposite effect of what I'm trying to foster.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

2 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Well said. My thoughts exactly. I'm baffled how many comments I'm getting about how labeling and targeting is worthless when most of what I read on these RP subs is exactly that.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

2 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Part 2 won't make any sense without part 1. I get the sense you like to argue and criticize just for the sake of arguing. Or maybe you feel like you've got something to prove so you go around beating your chest, trying to puff yourself up or ridicule anyone who challenges your self image. Maybe the NPD section resonated too close to home so you've got to try to tear apart the post in the hopes no one will read it and you won't be outed. Regardless ... I'm going to keep doing my thing and if you don't like it, that's your problem to deal with, not mine.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

2 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This is incredibly ignorant and completely ignores the fact that the whole point of a personality disorder is that it affects behavior and interpersonal relationships. That's why they're so vital in divorce and custody cases.

If they act right, there is no disorder. So, your comment is basically saying, "If she doesn't have a disorder, why should I care if these disorders exist?" The answer is that some people do have these disorders.

Part 1 - Signs your wife might have a personality disorder

2 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

In practicing law for the last 7 years I have only run across two women who did not have a personality disorder, and maybe a dozen or so men. That's why I included the AWALT quote up front and the blurb at the end about severity being key, not just the fact that a disorder exists.

My boyfriend likes that I'm smart

2 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/RedPillWomen

Glad I was able to give you something to think about! And thanks for sharing the article. I'll have to read through that soon!

How did you end up discovering Red Pill truths?

2 upvotes · 12 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Mind sharing some of those Scriptures?

Some of the bare bones, yet core ones are on the sidebar. The rest of them I will be rolling out with the 101, 102 ... series I've started. I just finished a rough trial, so I'll probably be back to posting again either tonight or tomorrow.

true and lasting change comes from teaching the youth and growing them into the next generation of leaders that do things the right way from the start Exactly. That's what discipleship is all about ;) This is my biggest passion and mission in life. I've written a book on the subject, but haven't sought to get it published yet ... maybe I'll look around someday.

To Confront, or Not to Confront. That is the question.

2 upvotes · 11 July 2017 · /r/askMRP

Here's the deal ... tell her you're picking up signs she might be cheating on you. Say it's because of her unusually high/good attention or something. Ask if she's been talking to other guys. Be calm and direct.

If she admits, she did the hard part for you. If she doesn't, she's lying to you and has already violated your trust. Her hamster will rationalize that your violation is worse and she'll get all accusatory, but by now you should know how to deal with that problem ... like any other hamster-caused fitness test.

One thing I've noticed is younger chicks don't seem to care about my career, only older women are impressed. Any thoughts?

2 upvotes · 11 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

Follow other good advice here too ... but here's something I've noticed from practicing divorce law: older women are naturally attracted to narcissists, younger women are turned off by an inflated ego. I don't have answers on why, I just see the data and know it to be true.

Tons of young couples get divorced because the husband was narcissistic (yes, we do psych evals to confirm this) and she didn't realize it for what it was until after the marriage and kid. Very rarely do I find NPD being diagnosed in divorce cases for people over 40, though.

This is weird because NPD is darn near impossible to cure and doesn't just magically vanish, yet these guys all test clean. But I constantly find from my clients that their narcissist exes are getting lots of action with the post-40 crowd (they usually complain about all the strange girls around the kids), even when the guy is under 40. I see similar patterns in my narcissist guy clients. It's weird and I haven't developed a hypothesis yet ... just observing.

I'm not saying you have NPD, but trying to impress people with, "I'm a med student" certainly gives that vibe.

There's my .02 ... take it or leave it.

RP Christians: Great Idea

2 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

other than a Christian lens

Ooooh ... I'll have to do a post on "The Lens Illustration" sometime. I'm leading a 2-day conference centered around it in September. It was a total life-changer for me and would probably help a lot of people figure some stuff out here too.

The RedPill Christian should seek to identify the same problems that any other Red Piller identifies but also provide a better solution than just "go lift," "eat clean," "go have more sex," etc.

One of my good friends once explained: "TRP has done a stellar job identifying a problem; but they have gone too far in offering a solution."

I discussed this issue a lot recently with someone else who insisted that you couldn't "Christianize" TRP/MRP stuff - that it's like swimming and philosophy ... they're just totally different things.

Ultimately, I think the Bible has a lot of answers about how God created sexuality and human impulses. So, I totally disagree and see them as very, very related. Everything TRP/MRP seeks to understand was identified in the Bible first. They're just finding what the Bible would have already told them and contorting it for their own goals.

Rather than being RP people who try to cling to a biblical worldview and not compromise our values, I think it would be better to be utterly Christ-centered in our identities, but implementing the practical truths that TRP/MRP have discovered about human nature which are often overlooked in the way the feminized Christian culture pressures people to interpret the Bible.

Don't aim for perfect game, the bar for sex is not that high!

2 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/seduction

Nah, I don't recommend this. In fact, it's morally atrocious to me. But my intellectual nature gets lost in theory sometimes. "The Nuclear Option" is not something I condone, but it is an unfortunate reality that many guys use it and it applied to the conversation. I have often fought against this cultural attitude in religious circles, but it's not an easy one to break.

I totally see how I came off that way, though. Sorry about that.

EDIT: I should note, though, that there are some people who need their egos knocked down a few pegs. This applies to both guys and girls. I was one of those guys :(

Welcome to Red Pill Christians

2 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Will do. I want to review and implement a few things from MMSLP before trying to do another knowledge-dump though :p I've done so much reading lately I don't want to over-ingest and miss things or have too much to apply that I don't do it in proper balance.

Help

2 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

I'm familiar with what it is to disciple someone. It's a large part of what I do on a weekly basis.

But do you disciple her on a weekly basis?

I struggle to see how I am at all at fault for her outbursts of anger. Even if I have done something she doesn't like, I'm not responsible for her anger

You're not at fault for how she reacts. That's her responsibility. But you do always have some involvement in the circumstance leading up to her reaction. You don't validate the degree of her reaction, but you do need to acknowledge that you did something to contribute to the situation.

For example, suppose you're walking down the street wearing a yellow jacket. Some lady sees your yellow jacket and her eyes follow you instead of watching where she's walking. She trips and gets hurt. She runs up to you and starts cussing you out because you're at fault for her tripping. Sound like a fairly parallel situation?

Instead of getting defensive and explaining why she shouldn't hold you responsible (DEERing = bad), your better option is to say, "I can see how this bright yellow jacket would have contributed to your problem." You're not admitting you've done anything wrong. You're acknowledging her feelings about the situation. That's all that matters for her.

After that, if you want to say, "But I like this jacket and will keep wearing it," that's perfectly fine. If this is a lady you have to deal with every day and she argues back, "If you do that, then I'll keep tripping and getting hurt! You need to stop wearing it." That's when you can either try to find a workable compromise ("I won't wear the jacket during a time of day I know you go on your walks") or you set a boundary ("I will keep wearing my jacket. If this is a problem for you, I recommend learning how to look away or finding a different time of day to go on a walk").

Help

2 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Don't have the time for a full write-up on that, but some things were mentioned in my main post here. The bottom line is that hyper-hamsters means that you have to expect irrational behavior and engage her with parallel emotion rather than attacking emotion. This is super hard for someone like me because I'm not an emotional person on the whole, but I promise it's an art that can be learned. My wife doesn't have BPD, but she has frequently said things like, "You're so cold and robotic all the time" and "Don't you ever feel anything?" It's like working out your triceps. You don't use your triceps for heavy lifting very often in day to day life. For most people, there's no imperative to have super strong triceps. But if you find yourself in an activity where you need to use your triceps all the time, you need to start working out that muscle and it will get stronger and stronger over time.

6 Questions for Christian Merps

2 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

where you were going to draw the line

Although it's not the best standard, the Nicene Creed is an easy one that most people can look up. I'll probably use that for the most part. Mormons can't pass that standard.

Also, interesting article. I'm not sure I agree with everything he says, but it's certainly a unique and rational point of view.

101 - Fitness develops attraction

2 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

Well said. Although I agree, when speaking from an authoritative standpoint (i.e. trying to teach a lesson) I tend to be more cautious when imputing applications beyond the context of the passage itself. Not to say it's wrong to do so or that it's an incorrect application ... just not my style. Thanks for this explanation though.

6 Questions for Christian Merps

2 upvotes · 10 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

In the later levels, absolutely. The only context in which I would use dread is in parallel to the way God models it in his relationship with us/the church, which is never with a motive to foster fear, but to inform of the consequences of what will happen under certain circumstances. Hebrews 10:26-31 comes to mind.

6 Questions for Christian Merps

2 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

This is probably a good question for the group as a whole, so I'll request that you post it as a separate thread for more input and I'll give you my answer there :) More threads will help the group grow and be active!

6 Questions for Christian Merps

2 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/RPChristians

my seminary is actively harming the Church

I reached this conclusion a few years ago when researching seminary teaching models and a biblical basis for seminary.

Quite frankly, there is no biblical basis for seminary. It arose from the same mentality that's been killing God's people since 1 Samuel 8 when Israel asked for a King. God said no. They complained, "But all the other worldly nations have a king. Can't we be like the rest of the world?" So, as Romans 1 affirms God still does, God handed them over to their own devices.

The church, for the first century or two, was predominantly a lay-run thing. There were certainly supported missionaries, as the apostles set the stage for that, but it was more apostolic in nature and not institutionalized. When Constantine officialized Christianity, droves of people started flooding in, sometimes for genuine reasons, but often for societal conformity purposes. The Church didn't know what to do, so it looked at how the rest of the world institutionalized and copied similar formats, which resulted in things like corporate communion rather than communion being about relational fellowship among people with Christ; baptism became about sprinkling a few drops of water instead of a serious commitment that involved a field trip.

As time went on, when education really started becoming a thing, the church did it again: The business world is really good at getting a message to many people; let's copy what they did; they used college degrees and institutions, so let's start our own institutions and degree programs.

Every single time the church does this, we find a Saul-situation ... things start falling apart and we don't really understand why, we just know there's bad leadership somewhere, but with all the division that "bad leadership" is a phantom that can't be pinpointed. I'm pinpointing it anyway: seminaries. Jesus modeled discipleship as the means of training leaders in his church. The apostles modeled discipleship as the means of training leaders in the church. We gave up on what they established and adopted the world's model of academia.

I'm not saying all seminaries are bad. There is still some rote value to them. But I have found that they are a grossly inadequate qualification system for deciding who should be leading God's people.

There are a lot of people who are hungry for "Red Pill Christianity," but they're quiet about it.

Maybe the anonymity of an internet forum like this will give them the guts to start voicing themselves as a first step to doing so more publicly. Spread the word ;)

Marital Confidence Intervals and Probabilistic Stage Setting

2 upvotes · 9 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I understand. That said, I initially read that TRP is descriptive, not prescriptive. Is this incorrect? It sounds like what you're saying is that TRP is about telling men what their goal should be, whether they want to adopt that goal or not.

Marital Confidence Intervals and Probabilistic Stage Setting

2 upvotes · 8 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Haha, I get that. We're all wired a little differently. The same reaction you have to six sigma is how I feel when someone wants me to watch a football game. I love high-intensity activity ... but I'll never understand why people get so emotionally invested in how impressive someone else performs in an activity where I'm not trying to compete at the same level.

Dealing with the stressed wife.

2 upvotes · 8 July 2017 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Haha, thanks! I'll keep that in mind.

I do, in fact, write books ... but I haven't done one on this topic yet.

Am I correct saying that my "job" is to initiate sex and hers is intimacy?

2 upvotes · 5 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

5LL fosters fuzzies. RP/being alpha fosters tingles. Cholomite's law: Tingles without fuzzies won't last; fuzzies without tingles are worthless (for the guy). It's our job as men to lead in reaching the appropriate balance.

Taking an Ex back? It was my fault and I blocked her?

2 upvotes · 5 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

As I recall, the whole point of TRP is that if men don't have the life they want, it's always their fault. If you try to blame the woman here, you'll get stuff like, "AWALT" and "It's not her fault you couldn't keep her attracted." Your story is no different; you just tried to re-package it in an effort to find a loop hole.

More interestingly, you know the loop hole is garbage, but you posted it here anyway. This tells me that you don't really want to get back together with this person - you want people to help you get over her ... to motivate you to move on. Hopefully you've seen some of that here.

Personally, if you've got a bad case of oneitis for this girl (and I'm not as opposed to oneitis as others may be), then head over to MRP to help you get your act together for the purpose of figuring out how to sweep her off her feet again and get her to forget about Chad forever.

Always looking for validation

2 upvotes · 3 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

As /u/Auvergnat said, NMMNG can help, but I think the first 3 chapters of WISNIFG (When I Say No I Feel Guilty) are much, much more on point and applicable. He goes through this "bill of rights" that will probably solve your problem and explains it from an internal psychological viewpoint that will help you agree with adopting that right within your own life. The rest of the book is all about tactics on how to enforce those rights when other people peck away at them.

Why do people like each others company so much?

2 upvotes · 2 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

Part of me wants to comment to help, but the way you get so defensive and flaunt your denial about everything makes me feel like I'd be wasting my time.

Read NMMNG and search the sub for threads about DEERing. That's what you're doing, and no one here will respect you while you do that. Other than that, I do hope you can learn to accept that an objective opinion from an outsider (even if they don't have all the facts) might be more helpful than digging your heels in the ground where you're already at.

If your question is purely a psychological one about what makes you tick and why you're different from most other people, you should be asking it on a sub about psychology, not a self-betterment/sexual strategy sub.

The change in how people treat you once you get fit/bulky is real, and one of the best things that happened to me. Thanks TRP

2 upvotes · 2 July 2017 · /r/askTRP

HISTORY - It's probably worth knowing that back in January I was 275. From January until last week I did almost exclusively cardio (I have a history of being a XC runner and did 5Ks and things long after). From Feb-April I lost 25lbs, then another 20 in May from doing the Whole30 diet, then another 10 in June from more cardio and not stuffing my face. I used to lift a lot in high school/college, so I'm not totally ignorant, but it's been a really, really long time :p (I'm 32 now).

As part of my "cardio," beyond just street and treadmill running I was doing a lot of plyo, insanity, p90x, and mma training videos on youtube. A lot of those included body-resistance strength training. So, I was unintentionally prepping myself for lifting, but nowhere near to the same degree. That said weighing 275 and doing 25-35 push-ups probably isn't all that different from benching 205-225.

BENCH - Remembering that I've only been at this a week (unless you count the body-resistance), if I have a spotter, I do 15lbs less than max and try for 4 reps (i.e. 4 @235). Second and third sets I try for 90% max (i.e. 225) for 8 reps then 6 reps. If I'm really out of it, I'll drop to 205 for the last set and go for 12.

If I don't have a spotter, I just start with 25lbs under max (225) for 8, then drop another 20 or so from there (whatever is convenient with the plates; in this case 205) for 12, then another third set of 12. I usually start with the bench as one of my first arm/chest workouts, doing declined sit-ups between sets, then circle around back to it as the last thing I do before leaving the gym, so I get a total of 5-6 sets in (3 of everything else I do). Gotta get rid of those man-boobs (though they're mostly gone at this point, but certainly not tight ... just not flab).

SQUAT

Because I've only just reintroduced lifting, I haven't tested everything. I've only done legit squats once and stuck with 315 as a safe number, doing sets of 12.

By body weight alone, I can do an easy 100. I rarely attempt more than that because that's usually a nice switching point to something else in my plyo/cardio routine (which changes every 3 days). Writing this actually prompted me to get up and do another 100 just now, after having already spent an hour and a half lifting (finished an hour ago).

If it makes a difference, I more often do the leg press machine, where I max it out at 500lbs. Is there a big enough difference that I should be switching back to squats? I've never cared for those glider machines and don't trust myself doing a free-bar when working out alone (which has been all but once).

DEAD LIFT - Haven't even tried.

CARDIO - I usually run a 10k. I'm still too fat to have great times, but my 5k time is around 26 minutes and my 10k time is just barely under an hour.

PROGRAM - None. Recommendations? My general cycle is 6 days on, 1 day off. At least, that's what it's been with cardio. Lifting might be harder, given that I actually have to go to the gym (45 dumbbells are the most I have at home). I'll probably end up splicing 4 days of lifting, 2 days of cardio (when I can't get to the gym) and 1 day off.

Thanks!

On momentum and self control

2 upvotes · 30 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Not to answer for /u/cholomite, but ...

From what I understand, if your motivation is externalized you're building covert contracts. There is an implied expectation, "If I do this, then ____ will happen in my life." Usually that's, "My wife will be attracted to me and want to screw me more often," but it could be any number of things.

Once you build the covert contract, your motivation dies when the contract is not fulfilled. Pretty much everyone here will tell you that women will never fulfill their end of the contract when you treat it like a contract.

- First, they don't even know you've made this contract.
- Second, even if they are aware of this implicit agreement, adhering to a contract requires rational judgment and women are not rational.
- Third, even if she is trying to be rational in following the unspoken agreement, the hamster wheel gives her loop holes out of the contract:
 - (a) because implied contracts don't have specific terms so her understanding might not be the same as yours
 - (b) because she rationalizes and justifies breaking the contract for reasons that defy logic
 - (c) because things just happen for girls and they're not responsible when it just happens.

Really, you're expecting her to work on your paradigm when girls have a different frame of mind entirely. When your motivation is external, you become ticked when you don't see the rewards, then lose motivation. Even if you do maintain your cool for a while, remember that women aren't dumb; they're emotional empaths. She will pick up on the external motivation factors and perceive you as being manipulative, even if you think you're really good at hiding it. This will turn her off.

"But I'm really, really good at hiding it!" No, you're not. "But my wife doesn't know how to look that deep." Maybe not consciously, but her subconscious will feel it before you can think it.

If your motivation is internal, her emotional-empath super powers will pick up on the fact that you're a man on a mission and not a manipulator, and she will like you for this. But it's all about the internal motivation first, then everything else follows.

I'm a Christian and there's a very similar concept at work in how we balance faith, good works, and God's favor.

- Some people use works as a means of earning God's favor (legalism) and assume that because they have works their faith must be real. These people end up frustrated with God (or too proud to admit it) and often burnt out. These people think they're "saved," but they're not. In Matthew 7, Jesus actually says that these people are evil, even though they're claiming to do good things.
- Others are OI. They love God just because he's awesome and deserves to be loved. The byproduct of this genuine love is that these people end up doing the same good things that the first crowd does, and usually even more. They do it not because they want a reward, but because it's who they are, inside and out. These people are "saved."
- CONCLUSION: Works cannot produce faith; faith always produces works; God only responds to genuine faith. The key is being OI in our relationship with God (lots to say on that, but I'll refrain from the sermon and get to the point).

The same concept is at work in your relationship with your wife. You're trying to balance between three parallel concepts: internal motivation for self-improvement, actual actions toward self-improvement, and lifestyle expectations.

- You use the self-improving actions to prove that you have what it takes internally to be the best you. Just like God sees our hearts, your wife sees this reliance on your actions as a cheap substitute for the real thing. As a result, you get burnt out trying to hide the fact that your motivation isn't actually internal (even though maybe you were too proud to admit this at one point). These people think they're RP, but they're not.
- Other people on this sub are OI. They want to be awesome just because being awesome is awesome. The byproduct of this is that they are doing the same self-improving things as everyone else; but this is coming out of an overflow of their internal awesomeness and not to try to prove something. These are the true RP guys.
- CONCLUSION: self-improving actions will not make you RP or motivated; actually being internally motivated will always produce self-improving actions; wives/LTRs only respond to genuine guys. The key is being OI in our marriages/LTRs.

Another way I've heard it said is: God doesn't give until you stop expecting to get. The parallel is: Your wife won't give until you stop expecting to get. Don't assume she's too dumb to pick up on your motivations. These emotional empaths are far more insightful than many of us give them credit for.

The after/eternally persistent test ... ?

2 upvotes · 30 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Very interesting. Thanks for the input. If it makes a difference:

- I wasn't flirting. I was just answering a question for someone who happened to be young and hot. I get questions all the time. My wife knows this. When she asked about it at first, I tossed her my phone and said, "Here, take a look. I've got nothing to hide." She read some of the conversation, saw that I was telling the truth, but still came at me afterward with the, "I don't want you talking to other girls any more" stuff.
- My wife doesn't flirt. EVER. Even with me (though that's my fault). Her big push-point in this whole conversation was, "I never talk to any other guys one-on-one outside the home, ever. It hurts my career to do that. People probably think I'm sexist because I only meet with other women in the office, but I do it because those boundaries are important to me and that's what we agreed on when we got married."

- I did, when we were first married 9 years go, agree never to be alone with another woman. I viewed it as a boundary with rational flexibility, she views it as a pillar of fire surrounding our marriage. For example, when I have a female client in the office and the meeting goes long so all the other employees leave the office, she expects me to kick the client out so we're not alone in the office together, even though this is grossly impractical and unprofessional. Rather than complying with that request, beta-me just avoided situations where that possibility could arise.

With these things in mind, here's what I'm contemplating saying next time. Let me know your thoughts:

I love you. I want a strong marriage, just like you. What we've been doing hasn't been working. I'm sure you've noticed me changing some things, and I dare say you're liking those changes. A new way of doing things means new boundaries. You'll just have to trust me where I set them.

And then let that be the end of the conversation. If she continues to argue, I just refrain, "Trust me," or if she really needs to hear it [i.e. comfort test], "Trust me, I'm not going to cheat on you."

Regarding the flirting gap thing, that's pretty clever. But again, I think my wife is the outlier on this one. For a myriad of reasons, on that bell curve she's the one on the outermost extreme.

Even if she really does fall into the AWALT category on this issue (which will be really darn hard to convince me, but I'll go with it for the sake of argument), she's been big-pregnant for the past 6 months, and now that the baby is born she will literally be at home with 4 kids for the next 6 months (yes, very long, fully-paid maternity leave) with pretty much no male contact other than me. So, at least as far as temporal proximity goes, it's extremely unlikely that she's been flirting with anyone for the past 6 months, and even less likely that she'll be flirting with anyone for another 6 months to come.

Perhaps that plays into your theory. If she really did have a flirting life that I'm totally oblivious to and she's bold-faced lying to me (again, something I simply can't imagine from her extremely conservative "must follow every rule or I'm a bad person" upbringing), then I suppose the fact of her unavailability to flirting could be why she perceives that gap closing.

In reality, I think her expectation is just: no flirting from either of us at all ever. In that sense, she internally assumes there is no gap. As I'm improving, she's fearful that I will be increasing that gap in my favor when there just should be no flirting from either of us at all, and this makes her upset, specifically because it violates an overt (as opposed to covert) contract that we have explicitly stated early in our marriage.

NMMNG and Divorce

2 upvotes · 29 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

This makes a lot of sense and wraps together several concepts clearly and succinctly. Thanks!

That said, I think I'm going to hold off on MMSLP anyway. I would rather postpone books that are predominantly about improving sex-life until I'm at a point where I can actually have sex with my wife. She just had a c-section, so sex is prohibited by her doctor for 6 weeks ... 4 1/2 left to go. I'd like to go through MMSL and related ones closer to the end of this time-frame so that it's fresh in my mind, and instead focus on (1) fitness, and (2) learning how to pass tests so that she's already entered my frame by the time sex is back on the table again.

NMMNG and Divorce

2 upvotes · 29 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

I feel like this has been directly stated by several people here. I'm still working my way through the sidebar, and I understand that it has to do with sexual strategy too, but many have framed it in the context of sexual issues breaking a marriage and how to fix it.

5 Love Langues v./and (?) NMMNG

2 upvotes · 28 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Pardon my naivete, but can you elaborate? I'm guessing it's because she didn't care to be touched by a pansy beta, so getting you to serve her was the best she expected to be possible from the relationship, therefore she learned to make that her craving, suppressing actual physical desire. Is that about right, or were you implying something else? (Asking to take application in understanding my own patterns with a wife who has constantly rejected physical touch as one of her LLs).

RP and religion ...?

2 upvotes · 26 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Yeah, that's weird. Off the top of my head, I can't think of a time when Jesus ever spoke sarcastically or in hyperbole, although there are a few passages where people impute that attitude on him just because they don't like the implications of what he really said.

A friend of mine used to say things like this: "I did a Greek word study on the word 'hate' in that passage. I read all kinds of dictionaries and looked up the etymology, non-biblical uses of the word, and even asked an expert on Koine Greek. Do you know what I discovered that word really means in the original language? Hate."

RP and religion ...?

2 upvotes · 26 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

You wife will never chase you if she knows you won't ever leave. That puts you in the default position of chasing her, which is really not good for your marriage.

This is something I'm going to have to think long and hard about. One thing that I've really been bothered by his her perception that "godly men are supposed to pursue and chase after their wives." Frankly, I don't see this in the Bible. Read literally any passage about budding relationships and it's almost always the woman seducing the guy to drive him crazy until he finally chases her because he wants her so bad - but it starts with her interest in him and not the other way around.

I brought this up once in a study in the book of Ruth and the entire group's jaws dropped. "Yes, that's exactly what happened. Ruth liked a guy who wasn't her husband, seduced him, and then let him buy her." They couldn't believe it and kept trying to read other things into the text about how Boaz was really the white-knight beta savior who saw a woman in need and came to her rescue. No, she's the one who chased after him.

Regarding the nuke example, we'll have to agree to disagree there. As a philosophy it makes sense, but there are some lines I will not cross and this one breaks two of them: (1) acceptance of divorce without grounds, and (2) using threats and manipulation to coerce behavior. That said, because of my occupation, she's terrified at the prospect of ever leaving me (again, I'm a divorce attorney).

lack of leadership by delegating all decisions to the church

It's more the other way around. I disciple my pastor and he comes to me for input on how to run the church. I'm the one teaching classes, setting policy, and cultivating the culture in our body. I do make sure that my leadership is always aligned with what I understand to be biblical and I will never depart from that. So, I guess you could say that I'm delegating decisions to the Bible, but I don't think there's anything wrong with that when the Bible has an actual directive on point. But there are several matters where I disagree with my church and refuse to conform ... that's been true in different ways for pretty much every church I've ever been in.

RP and religion ...?

2 upvotes · 26 June 2017 · /r/askMRP

Religion

I agree with the "one flesh = sex" reading of the Bible. During my early beta days, my wife and I used to argue about that. When we'd fight she insisted that I sleep in the same bed as her because sleeping in the same bed is a "symbol of commitment in the marriage." I explained, "No, the Bible is pretty clear: sex is the symbol and seal of a marriage. Why should I buy into your personally created symbol when you won't accept the God-given one?" I haven't brought this argument up in years, though, nor do I intend to try to rehash all that. That would just be giving her more power, making her think it still gets to me.

To that end, yes I do know the Bible inside and out ... to the degree that even my pastor acknowledges that I know more about it than anyone he's ever met, including himself and his seminary professors. But knowledge and understanding aren't everything, just as I've seen a lot in TRP/MRP threads that reading up and knowing the theory of frame and all that isn't the same as actually putting it into practice. So, I'm still working on growing :)

Condition of Home

I did add an edit about the condition of my home. We're not slobes and our house is in good shape and clean most of the time, and we have a cleaning lady come in bi-weekly to keep up with the stuff that we don't have time for. My point wasn't that our house is crap - it's that I feel like I'm wasting my time on stuff that doesn't matter to me, making it hard to maintain motivation. I do have a threshold that I'm not willing to dip below, but early in our marriage I wouldn't do anything until it hit that threshold (which was still pretty darn good compared to 90% of people's homes I see); then in my heavy-beta phase I just did whatever her threshold said to appease her.

My bar was high enough that I'd be comfortable inviting attorney friends or judges/magistrates over, but my wife was still mortified when a crumb was found on the floor or the TV had a fingerprint on it and she would take the burden upon herself pick up the difference from my bar to her bar. When I started owning my life, I sucked it up and just started raising my bar to her bar anyway - no longer to appease her, but because that's what I thought I should be doing. But I'm losing motivation and interest in doing things like vacuuming a clean floor simply because it hadn't been done in the last 48 hours. The excess is what's killing my motivation, as I don't see any return/reward for my labor and time.

To go back to the "Captain" example, imagine the wheel needs to be calibrated once a month, but your first mate is insecure about it and thinks it should be calibrated every single day, just in case something went wrong. Even if I buy into the mentality that it's better to be safe than sorry and I fully take ownership of it, at some point I'm just going to feel like a fool doing things that don't actually need to be done.

Expectations

If you are fine with it going to pot, then dont expect your wife to do the work instead

With the above context that it's never really going to get that way, one thing that has always been clear throughout our entire marriage (and maybe this is part of my problem?) is that I don't expect anything from her. If I want it done, I do it. Period. Probably not healthy, but I can't think of a time in our marriage where I've legit asked her for help on a significant project, except a few times where I had to work late and asked her to pick up the kids from daycare. There are probably a handful of times a year where I ask her, "Can you hand that to me?" but that's about it.

She has actually complained about this, saying that it's nice that I don't pressure her to do anything and that I am able to take care of myself and the kids independently, but that it makes her feel like I don't need her, and therefore she's irrelevant in my life. I think that's part of why she raises the bar on taking care of the house - because then she feels like she's adding value in an area that she sees as meaningful, but gets really frustrated when I don't sing her praises for meeting a higher standard that I didn't care to have met in the first place.

Either way, I'll check out Darlock and some of the other recommended reading materials soon.

Dating questions while reconnecting with my faith

1 upvotes · 1 June 2026 · /r/askRPC

In the Greek, the word is "epithumeo," which means "covet." Sexual desire is merely passively appreciating someone's beauty and sexuality. It doesn't become "epithumeo" (i.e. lustful intent) until you actually start desiring to have it for yourself.

- Sexual Desire: "she has nice boobs"

- Lust: "the things I'd do to those ..."

Of course, this still falls into the realm of Romans 14:14 - if you think it's sin in your heart, even if it's not for someone else, don't violate your own conscience because it becomes sin for you anyway. If you feel like you're lusting inappropriately, then stop.

I am considering getting rid of my desires for love

1 upvotes · 2 March 2026 · /r/RPChristians

You can say "porn." r/TrueChristian has a sidebar post on how to conquer porn permanently. I wrote it. But porn isn't actually your problem. It's just the thing you hold so close to your eyes that it blocks your vision and you choose not to see all the other stuff behind it.

God has clear, Scripture-given purposes for your life. Making disciples of all nations is an obvious example, as it's the prime mission of all of His people. How are you doing at fulfilling that command? How many people are you currently discipling? How many have you disciplined in the last 5 years? My guess is the numbers are small and you're using porn as your blinder-excuse. "How can I disciple someone else into spiritual maturity when I still struggle with this?" Wouldn't it be great if when Jesus gave the great commission he hadn't mentioned porn? "Go, therefore, and make disciples of all nations, unless you struggle with porn, then conquer that first and get back to work." I wish that second part wasn't in Matthew 28:19-20.

In Genesis, God gave Adam a job: name the animals, tend the earth and subdue it. Imagine if Adam were lazy and not doing that job. Do you think God would say, "Dang, this Adam guy just sits on his butt all day enjoying the fruit I bloom for him and not doing the work I gave him. I bet he needs even more help at being lazy and ineffective at the job I gave him. Let me make a helper suitable to aid him in his avoidance of my task"? Or do you think God is more likely to say: "Adam's doing great at the work I gave him, but it's a lot. Let me give him another person to help him out and they can do it together"?

99%, if God hasn't pruned you of porn yet, it's because you're not bearing fruit for His Kingdom (i.e. reproducing your faith) - or if you have, it's not become a sold-out primary purpose of your life and is more just something you do "on the side." John 15:2 is clear enough of that. And if you're not doing what God put you on this planet to do, why would you expect to need a helper in your current aim of not doing it?

I am considering getting rid of my desires for love

1 upvotes · 2 March 2026 · /r/RPChristians

Amen.

When Weakness Becomes the Gateway for God's Power.

1 upvotes · 2 March 2026 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I definitely don't see Scripture telling us to strive to become weak or maintain our weaknesses. It's like when Paul writes in Romans that our sin increases God's glory all the more - because it's that much more that His grace has overcome in us. But then he says, "That doesn't mean we should go on sinning," and explains that we should still strive to stop sinning, even despite that our sin brings God glory.

In the same way, our weaknesses certainly bring God glory because it's clearer that He was the one working through us. Sin itself is a weakness in us - and Paul did boast about His own sin as something that held him back, yet God's still choosing to work through Him anyway, to God's glory (Romans 7, esp. 24-25) - but that doesn't mean we ought to keep sinning any more than we ought to keep being weak.

I believe the imperative is to continue growing and improving, but praise God when He works through us even in the midst of our weaknesses. As I just commented to you in the other thread: If people are going to reject what you're giving them, let it be the message itself that holds them back, not the messenger.

How to avoid self-pity?

1 upvotes · 27 August 2025 · /r/RPChristians

This is a weak post. You can't solve your own sins. Galatians 3:3 makes that pretty clear. Only God can prune these away. John 15:2 says he does this for fruitful branches. Focus on bearing fruit for Christ and you'll see your brain warping to think of things on God's terms instead of your own, and the self-pity will wash away naturally because you'll be less worried about dumb stuff and more focused on things that have eternal impact.

Consequently, this will make you a more confident, assertive person with ambitions that would be more alluring to Christian women than "I hope God doesn't see me accidentally sin," so it's a twofer and will probably help your dating life all the same.

Anyone looking for a biblical marriage. Super old fashioned completely submissive godly wife material?

1 upvotes · 27 August 2025 · /r/RPChristians

Gotta also remove the post, otherwise psycho idiots would just DM her after reading the title, haha.

Unknowingly married someone with BPD (and was pressured into doing so)

1 upvotes · 27 August 2025 · /r/RPChristians

PART 3/3

CONCLUSION on What You Should Do

With all of that said, you need to stop worrying so much about her. Grow in your faith. Develop a biblical mission. Be a godly man. Expect her to get on board, and be a good leader to her. If she violates your boundaries in the home, enforce those boundaries instead of letting her emotions rule your life. If she doesn't like it, she can leave.

Specifically, if she is rude and disrespectful to you, she is living in unrepentant sin. Matthew 18 says you must first go to her directly, then bring witnesses to support you (i.e. an intervention-type thing), and ultimately get the church involved - and after all that, if she still doesn't repent and continues these behaviors (as she is mentally predisposed to do, without significant and very fine-tuned psychological help), Jesus says to treat her as if she's a non-believer. That doesn't mean you hate her and treat her like dirt. We love non-believers and treat them with patience in hope that they come to faith.

But 1 Corinthians 7 says that if you're married to a nonbeliever and they are willing to stay with you, you must endure the marriage, but if they want out, you're free to let them leave. You don't have any further obligation to try to "save the marriage." That same passage also says: "Let those with wives live as though they had none" in the context of our lives being committed to pleading God by doing the work he set out for us to do (i.e. "make disciples of all nations").

So the best thing you can do is get your head wrapped around living for Christ the way Scripture tells you, invite your wife to join you. Ask her to grow in faith alongside you, including getting mental help so she's able to stabilize enough to be the helper God designed her to be. If she chooses not to, you can enforce your boundaries by prioritizing your purposes in Christ over her. If this causes her to want a divorce, you're allowed to let her file.

For Re-Emphasis

Under no circumstances do I recommend having a child with her until you are confident she has internalized the skillsets necessary to be a good mother. She will more likely than not get at least (BARE MINIMUM) equal time with your child and spend the next 18 years manipulating that child to think you're a villain-father, and almost certainly will also cause severe psychological harm to your child in ways that you will be incapable of protecting the child from experiencing because it'll happen on her time when you have no oversight. You're just inviting yourself to have a child subject to constant mental trauma when post-divorce you're no longer the focal point of her love-hate cycles.

Tag: u/merebear2

Unknowingly married someone with BPD (and was pressured into doing so)

1 upvotes · 27 August 2025 · /r/RPChristians

PART 2/3

Answering Your Questions

> God hates divorce, but does He call us to endure this kind of constant abuse? Can I even call this abuse?

This is manipulative cop-out wording here. God didn't "call you" to endure constant abuse - and to your second question: no, I'm not even convinced that what you've described is "abuse" yet - though it may get there.

God called you to be faithful to whoever you choose to marry. You chose to marry someone hastily and under pressure. You state that it's your "conflict avoidance and fear" that were the "major contributing factors" to making this choice. It doesn't sound like your choice was rooted in (a) testing the relationship through what Scripture says, (b) prayer, (c) counsel of other godly men in your life, or (d) letting the circumstances evolve and evaluate them (i.e. the 4 things on my "frame" illustration on how to discern God's will - can't remember if this is in the sidebar or not, but I think it is).

Point being: instead of making a godly decision, you made one based on your flesh. Your post blames your wife for everything (perhaps rightfully so), and then your question seems to blame God. While you have acknowledged some faults, at no point in the post or comments have I seen you take clear responsibility that your weaknesses and choices are what put you in this mess. That's going to be starting point 1.

> Does entering a covenant under pressure and without spiritual intention even count as valid?

Yes. I think of the story of Jephthah in Judges 11. He made a flippant statement as a vow - "God, help me win this battle. If you do, I'll sacrifice the first thing that walks out of my house to you." He had no intention of sacrificing his daughter, but she's the next thing that came out. Between the sin of murdering a child and the sin of breaking his vow to God, he chose to prioritize keeping his vow to God and went through with it - and Hebrews 11:32 lists him alongside some of the greats, like Samson, David, and Samuel, even though this is the only thing of any real significance Scripture records Jephthah doing (and I don't believe there are any other known Jephthahs in Scripture it could be referring to).

Point being: when you make a vow to God, it doesn't matter if you were flippant about it, didn't really mean it, were pressured into it, etc. Jesus and James both say: "Do not swear by anything - just let your yes be yes, and your no be no." There's a reason for that: even flippant words matter. In fact, Matthew 12:36-37 even references that "on the day of judgment people will give account for every careless word they speak, for by your words you will be justified, and by your words you will be condemned." God holds you accountable to what you say, even if you weren't being serious when you said it.

> Am I breaking my vows, or was this never a true covenant because I married under coercion and fear?

If you made the vow and you subsequently had sex with her, then you're married. The covenant is agreed upon and sealed by becoming one flesh. The only passage that touches directly on "marriage induced by fraud" is in Deuteronomy 22, where if a woman is found to have lied about her virginity to induce a man to marry her, the solution is to stone her, essentially going along with Paul's statement in Romans 7:2-3 that marriage is for life and you're not released until your spouse dies; so in that case of virginity-fraud, they freed the man by killing the woman. While it's OT law, and therefore not something you're to follow, even if it did apply, she admitted she wasn't a virgin when you married her, and the difference of "1 other guy" v "100 other guys" isn't a line the passage seems to care about.

Tag: u/merebear2

Not sure what to do, need guidance.

1 upvotes · 16 August 2025 · /r/RPChristians

Part 2 - Tag: u/Secure_Fudge2485

- With the kids still living in your home, find 1 hour a week to have one-on-one time with each of them. Do something THEY enjoy, not something you want to introduce to them. Don't resort to "Johnny and I do this, it's our thing." Scratch that out. Maybe Johnny doesn't like it anymore and is too scared to tell you. If you don't know what your kids genuinely like to do, you're way too far out of touch and need to figure it out anyway. Just ask them.

- Make a list of your top 5 best male friends and text all 5 of them at least once a week for the next 12 months, and do at least one phone call a week with one of them. No less than once a month, meet up in-person. Don't have 5? Great, go find some. Small group at your local congregation doesn't count unless you're connecting with those people outside of small group meetings too. But yes, joining a small group is mandatory at this point anyway. Beyond that, another prime option is to join a meetup.com group and connect no less than once a week; if they don't meet that often, join more than one. Get actual friends out of the house.

- Don't initiate with your wife like a pandering fool. You were a failure. She was a brat. Let her be a brat while you work on fixing the "failure" lifestyle so she has reason to stop being so bratty. If she initiates with you, have fun with the conversation - not with the goal of trying to "win her back," but with the expectation that she's probably going to divorce you anyway, so just enjoy doing and saying whatever you want (within godliness and love - obviously I'm not encouraging you to cuss her out just to screw with her, but teasing, pranks, etc. are all good) and just don't worry about how she responds. Don't expect or push for sex. If she initiates, go for it, and let her know with your behavior and attitude toward her (and NOT your words) how much you want it - even if the answer is not at all, and communicate it in a fun/playful way, even if it's disinterest ("Aww, are you coming onto me? How cute. My brain sees what you're doing. This guy down here, though? Floppin' around. Another time, maybe").

- Make a list of your 3-month, 6-month, 12-month, 3-year, 5-year, and 10-year goals. Set a schedule for mile-markers you will have to hit to meet those goals. Have separate categories of goals for career, spiritual growth, parenting, lifts, etc. Meet them for the next 12 months on-time, no excuses.

There you go. That's your plan for the next year.

This plan is not designed to "fix your marriage." But yes, it's the best chance you have at fixing your marriage, by happenstance. The intent is to make you a better man. If your marriage falls apart during those 12 months, don't come back saying, "u/Red-Curious - it didn't work, your plan failed me, she divorced me anyway." I probably won't check this account often enough to see it, haha. So what if she divorces you? You'll just be that much further ahead of the game with your next inevitable relationship. Instead of pulling some fatty single mom on drugs who's willing to tolerate a skinny-fat alcoholic with no mission or motivation in life, maybe you'll be able to pull someone who's only mildly obese. Who knows.

I already know your first thought: "RC, there's literally not enough hours in the day to do all that." For a year, yes there is. Yeah, you'll burn yourself out if you try to do all of this every day for the rest of your life. But for a year? Yes, it's definitely feasible. I've been doing a heck of a lot of this almost daily for the last 8-9 years. I'd burn out if I did ALL of it every day for that long, but for a year? Deal with it. You get 10 days of vacation, but only if you're actually traveling. Have fun.

Why I'm not afraid of divorce rape - and how to get yourself there too.

1 upvotes · 11 September 2024 · /r/MarriedRedPill

If you don't trust it, don't do it. Your call.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (04/29/24)

1 upvotes · 1 May 2024 · /r/RPChristians

If it's a shallow copy then it's not actual joy, right?

No, it's still joy. For example, if we were to talk about "love," the Bible definitely talks about non-Christians loving someone. But that love is still a "shallow copy" compared to what we have through Christ. Are we to conclude, "No, I will only think of the idyllic concept of love and deny anything else as being love" and therefore deem the Bible wrong when it says that a non-Christian loved someone? Or do we embrace that shallow copies are still the real thing, even if a weak expression?

Never get hung up on the idyllic mentality. That's what the mainstream churchianity culture tries to push and one of the reasons why it went so, so, so wrong.

I would argue that under 20% -more likely under 5-10%- of people in the United States who say they are Christians actually have faith.

Nice, we're on the same page here. I did a personal survey of multiple congregations at one point and came to the number 16% of active, consistent churchgoers who I'd say are "actually saved" people and 1.6% or less who were living an intentional plan for spreading their faith to others. So while we're in agreement on the rarity, I do think that 14.4% disparity still exists, and those 14.4% are the people I'm referencing. Perhaps you're suggesting that salvation is even more stringent in God's eyes than I would otherwise think and believe only the 1.6% are saved? I'm not opposed to that suggestion, it's just not where I land presently. My purpose for this conversation is more to note that "being a good person and hoping that somehow people are passively inspired to follow Jesus" is not at all what Jesus had in mind by the Great Commission. So, if a man is trying to determine what his mission should be, "Do x, y, and z and hope that people will passively come to Christ without me having to be active about it" is inherent in his approach to life-mission, I have to oppose that.

And the minutia matters when you're dealing with title insurance.

Not only insurance, but actual deeds too. For example, if you spell the name "John Paul Smith" but the deed says

"John P. Smith" the deed will be rejected by the auditor, so we have to be extremely careful when drafting divorce decrees allocating real estate to one party that the names/legal description match up perfectly if we're going to incorporate "this document shall serve as a deed" language. I've yet to have someone who needed to "clean up my messes" in my career - at least not that anyone has ever had to tell me, haha.

I get too autistic when I have a step-by-step guide. The part that you liked is what I started with before I found your guide and tried to follow your process.

Gotta love irony. Yeah, the whole purpose of that post was to address two things:

- The Great Commission IS IN FACT your mission, and if you end up writing something different, you're wrong and have a crappy mission that's incongruous with God's purposes for your life. Writing it down forces you to come face-to-face with this reality.
- All the other superfluous facts I have people add are meant to inspire thought about the specific ways their lives can be used to contribute to that mission which are unique from how their neighbor might attempt to fulfill it. In the end, we are still beholden to Jesus' model; we can't just make things up as we go.

"Go, therefore, and make disciples" wasn't said in a vacuum - he was telling them, "What I just did for you, go do for the rest of the world." But we still see John's unique expression of love and joy, compared to Peter's fiery temper and brash condemnation, compared to Paul's intellectual presentation - all leading to the "one body, many parts" concept.

Where the problem enters is that someone will abdicate responsibility by saying "That's not my gifting/role/skill-set." For example, if a naval commander ordered the ensigns to "swab the deck," one might press hard on small patches to remove deep stains, another might use wide strokes to create a smooth finish, and still a third might be more interested in the soap-to-water ratio in the bucket. They all bring unique thoughts/skills to the table to get the job done. But if a fourth man says, "I'm good at cooking, so I'll skip swabbing the deck and just go cook a meal to feed the guys who are swabbing the deck," he has defied the commander and failed his mission. Nobody can say, "You make disciples, I'll go do this instead." Yet that is exactly what most people do - "I'll point my finger at parking spots on Sunday morning as my excuse for not making disciples, and tell God that I was doing this to assist someone else in making disciples. I hope it works and he's proud of me!" I believe that is a grossly unbiblical expression of our faith.

When I use the term "missions" I mean sending someone to travel to an un/under-reached peoples group. Not everyone is called to go on missions ... However, everyone is called to evangelism.

On this we agree. I use the word "mission" to define the purpose of a man's life (either tacitly by his own ignorance or through overt, conscious, intentional directive). But yes, I can see that the colloquial concept of "missions" certainly points to an evangelistic effort outside one's normal context - and that not everyone is called to this, even if everyone IS called to a singular and common mission.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (04/29/24)

1 upvotes · 30 April 2024 · /r/RPChristians

Thank you for the recommendation

Solid. You won't regret it. I did just put up a post covering the first 1/3 of the book in summary form. Might be worth reading before you listen so you know what to expect and make it easier to wrap your head around the concepts.

ingrained in our personalities

Humorously, the book denies the existence of personalities and focuses more on "lifestyle." But I'll let you get to that on your own :p

Which is why spreading joy inherently means spreading Christ. You're trying to argue symantics with me. The result is the same - spread Christ. I focus on the process and minutia, you focus on the end result.

I don't think we're saying the same thing here, actually. For example, a non-Christian can spread joy. The joy they spread is a shallow copy of what Christ offers, but can still exist as a goal without spreading Christ. Similarly, there's a stark contrast between: (a) "I will make other people joyful, generically, in the hope that they will see that my joy is from God and find Christ," and (b) "I will share Christ with someone through evangelism or discipling them, and this will have the passive byproduct of bringing joy into their life." In one, joy is the active goal and Christ is a passive hope; in the other, Christ is the active goal and joy is the passive hope.

I focus on the 50 commands of Christ that naturally lead those who are in Christ to share Christ with the world. You focus on the 50th command and trust that that end result is enough to generally cover the 49 commands.

The "naturally lead" line here is what I'd challenge. I know COUNTLESS (I mean that literally) church-attending, Bible-believing people who prioritize these virtues who have never once shared their faith with a non-Christian or taken a younger believer on as a disciple to raise them up into maturity in the faith the way Jesus modeled and instructed. I don't believe that the 49 naturally lead to disciple-making. I do believe that disciple-making naturally leads to a fulfillment of the other 49 because "no disciple is greater than his master," so if you want to disciple someone, you must naturally grow in these virtues independently in order to pass them on so that the fruit you produce actually resembles Christ.

you divorce attorneys only care about getting the order signed

I think you have some misconceptions about my personal practice, but I understand the appropriateness of the stereotype about divorce attorneys as a whole. I've also seen over-minutia cause far more problems than it solved (on many occasions). So I try to find a healthy balance.

final decree stating that one spouse would sell the house for at least $350,000 within 6 months after the order is signed Yeah, I'd never allow a client to sign that.

This right here is why I've always thought mission statements were a waste of time. Just go do the action, because if you try to write it out you'll just end up arguing about what to include in the the marketing department's little exercise in futility

I broadly agree, but do find that having something written does cause people to consciously think about new lifestyle choices they need to make, whereas if they don't stop and write it down they will just keep their "in action" part consistent with what they've always done, and never actually pursue the purposes Christ gave us.

But you are skipping the details that make the gospel so beautiful.

I would argue that the "trees/detail" you reference are the VISION, whereas the forest = the MISSION. Mission = big picture; Vision = details of how you envision accomplishing it. That's where the other 49 things come into play as part of your picture.

Instead you are running to the end and jumping up and down because you know that we -as a natural outflow of our changed hearts- are called to, and will, make disciples.

To reiterate: this is what I believe is wrong. I don't believe this is a natural outflow, nor do I assume it is something that "will" happen all on its own just by virtue of practicing certain virtues, disciplines, etc. I have seen waaaaay too many people live the "don't do bad things" and "do good things" life and conclude: "if it's necessary, maybe I can kinda use words when the opportunity hands itself on a silver platter and is blatantly put in front of my face in a way that I couldn't possibly miss it and I feel a strong reassurance of comfort in saying something, then I guess in those circumstances it's possible that maybe I could say something small that feels safe and won't have much risk of making me feel awkward or hurting the relationship."

I love the trees. Each one is so beautiful in its own right. The changes and transformations that we are commanded by Christ are wonderful to me.

On that we can agree! :)

OYS - Where Progress is Made (04/29/24)

1 upvotes · 30 April 2024 · /r/RPChristians

I believe that my mission is to spread the joy of the Lord, satisfaction in Christ

In follow-up to what I just replied on your prior OYS, to come to this newer comment, this is a perfect example. Phrases like "of the Lord" and "in Christ" are just filler. Joy and satisfaction can't actually come from other sources anyway, otherwise they're just false expressions/shadows. Your mission is now to cause other people to be joyful and satisfied in life. If that's what you produce into the world, that means the seed sown into you is joy and satisfaction. After all, you can't produce what you yourself aren't. A fig tree can't produce thorns, nor a thistle produce grapes.

But if you're not producing Christ, and you're only producing specific individual qualities (even ones that Christ has), then it implies that you are not of Christ yourself. Think of it this way:

- A grape seed produces grapes into the world.
- A fig seed produces figs into the world.
- A joy seed produces joy into the world.
- A satisfaction seed produces satisfaction into the world.
- A Jesus seed produces Jesus into the world - and Jesus has joy/satisfaction as aspects of Himself, but the focus is Him, not the joy/satisfaction.

Does that make more sense? The focus isn't on the attributes. It's on implanting Christ into the lives of others and let Him be the one to produce those attributes. If I can make 1 million people joyful, but have never shared Christ with them, it doesn't matter that I got my joy from Jesus; I've still failed those 1 million people. If I implant a seed for Christ in 1 person, that is better than making 1 million people joyful or satisfied.

I believe that those who love God are called to generously care for the people in their community and to send people to spread the good news of Christ. Therefore, I believe that I am further called to care for the people geographically near me, both spiritual needs and physical needs, and to aid in sending people on missions.

Now this is where it seems you're starting to get it :)

- "Generously caring" is still a virtue/attribute
- "send people to spread the good news of Christ" is awesome! But why send people? Why not go yourself? Do you think missions is only done when you send someone overseas or go on a mission trip? Mission work starts with your friend at work, the guy at the gym, your neighbor, people you chat with online, etc.
- "care for the people geographically near me" - great! What does that mean? You explain: "both spiritual needs and physical needs." Okay, so what does this PRACTICALLY look like in your weekly calendar? The physical makes sense. You mentioned some "help the poor" stuff you do through your congregation. What does the "spiritual needs" thing look like? How often are you sharing your faith with unbelievers? How often are you telling younger believers, "Come follow me, as I follow Christ. Look after my example and watch how I live for Jesus so you can learn to do the same"? Are these things passive background aspirations or actual things you're living out in the moment day-by-day?

On this last point, I'll renew my recommendation toward The Courage to Be Disliked - it's not a Christian book, but very much addresses the fact that thinking backwards or forwards in life is ultimately a waste when we have to make real decisions with what we're going to do today. As I often tell people: Your mission isn't what you write on a piece of paper to tell people what your priorities allegedly are; it's what you're actually doing with your time day-in and day-out, whether you consciously realize how you're spending your time or not.

Overall, I do see that you're starting to "get it" here - but your final paragraph just seems like a restatement of what you had before with a couple words meant to appease a sentiment rather than fully grasping what the Bible is asking of you.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (04/15/24)

1 upvotes · 30 April 2024 · /r/RPChristians

She ... she ... she ... my wife ... she ... she

You're so hung up on what she thinks and how she behaves that you're not figuring out your own life. You're trying to manipulate her through sexual expression techniques. That's why it's not working.

Set aside some other reading material for a bit and go through the book: The Courage to Be Disliked by Ichiro Kishimi and Fumitake Koga. The audio book is on Spotify (not sure if you need premium or not; do the version with the tree on the cover). This will help you figure out what it means to operate in your own frame instead of hers. That's probably your biggest need right now, other than ...

Mission: To love and abide in Christ, being filled with joy and taking up ...

No, these are random excerpts of specific expectations. It's like you're trying as hard as you can to make yourself sound autistic in how you're approaching this. Christ had a clear mission for himself that he passed on to us: "make disciples of all nations." That's the mission.

To use his own terminology: our obligation is to produce fruit. Everything you listed are aspects of the fruit - the way it tastes, feels, what color it is, etc. In essence, if Jesus is planted in us, the fruit we produce into the world is more Christ - our fruit should look like that of the original from which we got our seed. But the PURPOSE or function of a fruit is to reproduce. The fruit is the reproductive organism of the tree that contains the seed that falls into the nearby soil to produce more of what was sown. I can flesh this out more, but I feel like you wrote all this just to yank my chain, so I'll just tell you plainly: your mission is to make disciples of all nations; all the stuff you listed are just examples of what a "disciple" looks like so you know what you're making.

Complaining and Comfort Tests

1 upvotes · 22 March 2024 · /r/RPChristians

Right. There's a reason I referenced comfort tests in the title and only used examples of her complaining about external things. If she's complaining about you, it's not a comfort test; it's a compliance test. Different test = different response. It's that simple.

For the most part, your approach is perfectly appropriate with regard to compliance/fitness tests. I'd recommend a more positive, teasing attitude in those more heated moments, but we all have our own style.

Sex Addicted v. Sex Starved

1 upvotes · 20 March 2024 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'm sad to hear what all you've been going through there. I'm glad I've been able to give some sort of freedom in knowing you don't have a problem that most everyone else will try to project-diagnose you with. I'd encourage you to remain biblically grounded in your marital vows, but knowing that these things can definitely be turned around in time as you continue to work on yourself.

Dealing with ONEitis

1 upvotes · 20 March 2024 · /r/RPChristians

So glad it helped you, brother!

209 - Developing and Articulating Your Mission

1 upvotes · 20 March 2024 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for sharing. Let me push back a bit:

to build close relationships and experience spiritual fulfillment

Will someone feeling close or fulfilled on earth make an eternal impact? Probably not. What's something you could do to change eternity? That will actually store up treasures in heaven? These are the questions that I started asking myself before realizing that it was painted all over Scripture: "Be fruitful and multiply" "I will make you fishers of men" "Your offspring will be as numerous as the stars in the sky" "Go and make disciples of all nations" "The one who produced 5/10 more was put in charge of 5/10 cities, but the one who didn't produce was cast out" "The fruitful branch will be pruned so that it will become more fruitful, but the branch with no fruit will be cut off and thrown into the fire" "The tree that doesn't produce fruit will be chopped down and thrown into the fire" "The vinedresser asked the master, 'Give me one more year to water and fertilize this tree so I can make it fruitful, and if after that year it doesn't produce fruit, then you can throw it into the fire, but if it does produce fruit, it will be well and good'" "[After judgment, in heaven] people from every tribe, tongue, and nation were worshiping at the feet of Christ."

Hopefully that gives some context. From Genesis 1 to Revelation 21, the whole of Scripture is all about spiritual reproduction and spreading God's image across the planet. Go make disciples. That's your mission. Don't settle for feel-good sentiments :)

201 - Healthy Sexual Desire v. Lust/Coveting

1 upvotes · 20 March 2024 · /r/RPChristians

I'd suggest doing a study on "guilt" in the bible. That should clear up how the Bible differentiates between what it means to be/feel "guilty" and what it means when it talks about godly sorrow, grief, etc., which are different concepts. If as a matter of modern linguistics, you use the word "guilty" when you really mean "sorrowful" or "full of grief," I'd be hesitant to impute that term onto Scripture.

I hope this clarifies.

201 - Healthy Sexual Desire v. Lust/Coveting

1 upvotes · 20 March 2024 · /r/RPChristians

I'd suggest doing a study on "guilt" in the bible. That should clear up how the Bible differentiates between what it means to be/feel "guilty" and what it means when it talks about godly sorrow, grief, etc., which are different concepts. If as a matter of modern linguistics, you use the word "guilty" when you really mean "sorrowful" or "full of grief," I'd be hesitant to impute that term onto Scripture.

I hope this clarifies.

201 - Healthy Sexual Desire v. Lust/Coveting

1 upvotes · 20 March 2024 · /r/RPChristians

I'd suggest doing a study on "guilt" in the bible. That should clear up how the Bible differentiates between what it means to be/feel "guilty" and what it means when it talks about godly sorrow, grief, etc., which are different concepts. If as a matter of modern linguistics, you use the word "guilty" when you really mean "sorrowful" or "full of grief," I'd be hesitant to impute that term onto Scripture.

I hope this clarifies.

Question about dating as a single Christian man who's looking for a Christian Woman in 2022

1 upvotes · 7 October 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Makes me wonder out of curiosity if these ugly or unattractive people are Christian simply because they're not desired by people for the most part, thus going to Church out of desperation or for personal comfort that they'd otherwise believe would not be needed if they were attractive?

Right. Isn't this the very heart of why Jesus says it's so hard for a rich person to enter the Kingdom of God? When people's lives are good, they don't feel the need for him. The reverse is also true: when people face rejection from the world, it's natural to turn to God, who won't reject them.

That doesn't make the Truth of God a lie or untrue just because it's more appealing to those who need it. It's common sense. Nobody goes to a lawyer or accountant who thinks they're doing fine on their own. That doesn't mean lawyers and accountants aren't real or that their work is unnecessary.

Doesn't sound like it. If they do exist, it seems that they're too few and far in-between from the way you're mentioning them.

Not at all. They exist in droves. They're just either (1) already married because they're attractive and got "snatched up" fairly quickly, or (2) unattractive and not in the social circles you'd consider "dateable," so you don't even bother to notice them. The women who are like this AND SINGLE are the ones who are few and far-between.

We used to tease the "2 of 3 Rule":

- Attractive
- Godly
- Good personality/mentally stable

If a woman has all 3, she's probably already taken (sometimes it's been the "3 of 4" and we add "single" to the list - if she has all the other 3, she's not single). The available women are likely lacking one of them. Pick which one you're willing to compromise on and you can probably fairly easily find a woman who meets the other two.

From there, the key is to remember that some traits are teachable. This is why we use the FAST acronym. If a woman (or potential disciple, more generally and out of the dating sphere) is Faithful, Available, Saved, and Teachable, you can instill virtually any other quality in them.

- If she lacks attractiveness, is it because she's overweight or doesn't dress to impress? If she's teachable, you can teach her how to lose weight or improve her wardrobe. If she's available, she'll give you the time and attention to figure this out. If she's faithful, she'll do it. (Saved is more a default reminder that you shouldn't be dating a non-Christian in the first place).
- If she lacks godliness, if she's teachable, she can learn how to be godly. If she's faithful, she'll implement it. If she's available, she'll devote the time necessary to continue growing in godliness.
- If she lacks a good personality, you can "teach" it to her, she will be "faithful" to applying what she learns, and she will be "available" to keep working on it.

If you have a FAST woman, you can instill virtually any quality in her. If you have a FAST disciple, you can instill virtually any quality in him. But here's the catch: YOU also have to be FAST. People need a model to know what it looks like. That means YOU have to be Faithful, Available, Saved, and Teachable if you want to lead someone else in these qualities also - and you should express those qualities with the man who is discipling you, or if no one is available in your life to disciple you, you can express them in your own personal pursuit of God. As Paul Tells Timothy, "Train yourself to be godly."

May I ask how young exactly? As in 22 years old at the oldest?

I know women in their 30s who are faithful to God, chaste, have great personality ... and are still single. 22 is not "the oldest." But it's just common knowledge that the older a woman gets:

- The more pressure she has to "find a spouse" because her biological clock for having children is ticking away. That means every year increases a woman's imperative to find someone, even if it means "settling" for "good, but not ideal" (ergo many divorces).
- The more her looks fade. Solomon says that "beauty is fleeting." Despite modern cosmetics, this is still a fact of life. Women inherently know that the older they get, the harder it will be for them to find a spouse. Younger women have little problem remaining single because they have lots of time. Women in their upper-20s and 30s feel more pressure to get married quickly as soon as the chance comes along, so the older you get the less single women there will be.
- The more opportunity she has to find someone. This is just common sense. What are the odds of finding a marriageable mate in 12 months? Low-to-mediocre. What are the odds of finding someone marriageable in a decade? Very high. The older a woman is, the more time she's had to find someone marriageable, so it makes sense that with every year of age there will be fewer single women who meet the characteristics you're looking for in a spouse.

... and the list goes on.

You mentioned they're new to the faith, but are there any who were raised by Traditional Catholics or nah?

I'm not Catholic, so probably not. Also, from what I'm aware of Catholic culture, that's probably another reason you're having a hard time ... but I really don't want to go into that, as that's a different can of worms than what you're asking about here.

I figured that they'd be taken up fast and possibly married with children as well. That makes it harder, but

I'm still up for the challenge. :)

It sounds as if you interpret the challenge as unicorn-hunting. This is the WRONG challenge. You WILL be sorely disappointed with your outcome if you make that your primary strategy for finding a spouse. The better strategy is to find someone who is FAST. There are a plethora of women with these qualities. Among them, build a relationship with the one you like the most. Ask her to grow alongside you toward improving the qualities she has that would keep you from thinking she's a unicorn. Give her the same call Paul gives us: "Follow me as I follow Christ" (1 Cor. 11:1). That could mean inviting her to spend time at the gym with you to take care of her body, if that's a problem. It could mean spending significant time in Bible study together, teaching her how to engage with and learn from God's Word (make sure you actually know what you're doing first!!!). It could mean spending time together meeting neighbors, strangers at the mall, etc. to practice social skills, if that's what's holding her back. Just always remember that you have to be willing and able to model for her in your own life what you expect her to follow in. Don't ever expect someone to follow you in an area that you haven't yourself figured out. As Jesus says, "No disciple is greater than her master." She can't learn from you skills or qualities that you don't also have. If you're obese, don't expect her to be thin for you. If you don't have daily quiet times, don't expect her to value time in God's Word either. If you don't pray, don't expect her to pray. If you don't dress nicely, don't expect her to dress nicely.

These are lessons I wish I'd learned sooner in my marriage. They're worked out now, for the most part, but my expectations were unrealistic to the actual dynamic I had with my wife and it was killing us. You're still single. Work on yourself now.

Are you saying that basically the attractive women who are actually devout Christians and not corrupted, egotistical and bordering on secularism/agnostic-atheism are unicorns and as such, don't exist? If so, then I'm at a loss of what to do now as I don't want to settle for less.

Not at all. I'm saying these woman DO exist. The attractive ones just aren't single. Take the word "attractive" out and you can add "single" back to the list. This is back to that 2 of 3 (or 3 of 4) rule again. While it's a flawed comparison, think about house-shopping. Some people want a house that's "move-in ready." Right? But houses like that are more expensive and usually go off the market extremely quickly. Most people have to settle for a house that has the structure they're looking for, but needs some work. This is the real nature of humanity: we all need some work. Even the "move-in ready" house wasn't "move-in ready" 3 months before it was on the market. The seller spent time fixing it up TO GET IT into "move-in ready" condition.

What I'm saying is: you can't find unicorns in the world, but you can invest time, love, attention, skill, etc. into helping a non-unicorn become one, the same way we are not unicorns when Christ finds us - we're all imperfect sinners - but he invests his time, love, attention, skill, etc. to sanctify us into the type of bride he wants for himself. That's the key in all of this.

Obviously I want to find a woman who'll grow in her faith alongside me, but she should already be humble and true to Christ when I meet her

I'd even remove humility from this list. If she is FAST, you can teach her humility. FAST are the criteria you're looking for.

Alpha or not, Idk if I'm capable of doing that, but I can try to.

"Alpha" is just a buzz word. Don't worry about that. Focus more on learning how to lead someone the way Christ leads up. This is part of that 5-fold discipleship model that we have in our sidebar: (1) Tell them what, (2) Show them how, (3) Let them try, (4) Send them out/keep them going, (5) Pass it on. If you're capable of these things (and I promise you are!) then you are capable of leading someone - as long as you actually exemplify the trait you're trying to lead them in. If you expect them to live in a way that you don't, then you're just being a hypocrite at that point and you won't get very far.

I need to find a woman who's already drawn to the faith

Again, if she's FAST, this isn't a necessary criteria. Useful, absolutely. But not necessary. If you insist on criteria like this, be prepared to sacrifice in other areas. Focus more on leading someone into godliness than expecting them to have already arrived.

No, it's not okay.

1 upvotes · 12 August 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Psalm 1: 1-3. Psalm 119. John 17: 15-17

The word "abide" doesn't appear in any of these, so none of them are defining the word "abide" like the 1 John passage I quoted.

John 15

Two things here:

- Us abiding in Christ and God's Word abiding in us are not reciprocal. They are different concepts, each with distinct value. It says God's Word can abide in us, but it doesn't say that us abiding in Christ is meditating on his word. The concepts aren't necessarily reciprocal. It's like saying, "Food goes in your mouth" is reciprocal with, "Your mouth goes in food." Or treating "A husband enters his wife" as reciprocal with "a wife enters her husband." One makes sense, the reverse has an entirely different meaning. God's Word does abide in us and the result is that we bear fruit (i.e. doing God's work).
 - Sub-point: this passage says nothing about meditating on God's Word. It just says God's Word can abide in us.
- This passage doesn't define abiding. The 1 John 2 passage I quoted does specifically say what abiding entails. This one only uses the word as an instruction ("Abide in me, and I in you") or as a condition ("unless it abides in the vine" or "Whoever abides in me") without actually defining the word. This is much like reading "don't eat candy" and saying that's the definition of eating. It's not. You can't define eating from that sentence. Or it's like saying "Whoever eats candy will have rotten teeth" and then conclude that's the definition of candy. It's not. It's saying the effect of candy, but not what it is.

Now, if you are just here to cause trouble, this conversation is over. But if you have genuine insight that I'm missing here about how the Bible specifically defines the word "Abide" (or "μείνῃ" if you prefer), I'm happy to continue.

No, it's not okay.

1 upvotes · 11 August 2022 · /r/RPChristians

"whoever says he abides in him ought to walk in the same way in which he walked" ~1 John 2:6

God's work is how we abide in Christ - doing what Jesus did.

Smash The Overton Window

1 upvotes · 1 August 2022 · /r/RPChristians

I think the rendering of: "make disciples of all nations" is less clear than the Young's Literal Translation (which I recall you tend to appreciate) as "disciple all the nations" which makes clearer the object of the discipleship.

I do like the YLT :) That said, it's still not perfect. Here, we have two clear textual clues and one point of ambiguity that lead me to the opposite conclusion:

- Even the phrase "disciple all the nations" is, at best, ambiguous as to whether it's referencing intangible national entities or the people of that entity.
- The first real textual clue is that Mark gives a parallel account of the great commission that focuses on the fact of preaching the Gospel "to all the nations," which verbiage is preserved even in the YLT. While a national structure might exist and have a standing before God, it is still an intangible and cannot be preached to.
- Second, the actual word for "nations" is "ethnos," which usually refers to the Gentile people, generally, rather than to specific governmental units. In this, the great commission isn't understood as an instruction to "disciple Crete, Phillipi, Rome, and all those other countries" - it's more akin to: "disciple all the Gentiles." While the word has been used to reference actual intangible national structures, this is the minority use throughout Scripture and it would be a stretch to say, "The Bible only uses the word this way [say, for argument] 10% of the time, but that's definitely the particular use Jesus meant it in this one verse, not the 90% normative way it's used the rest of the time."

The rest is mostly nuance ...

So, to accomplish the macro goal of bringing all nations to kneel at the throne of God under the Lordship of Christ

That's the thing, though. An intangible organizational entity we call a "nation" doesn't actually kneel before God's throne, right? It doesn't have knees. Nations exist according to their organizational documents and are run according to the processes and systems in place to implement what their governing documents say. I always assumed that by "disciple the nations" you were implying: "Get each nation's constitution/founding documents aligned with God's will and conform the processes and systems to enact it."

If that's the framework, then I'd say we're just approaching the same spectrum from two different angles. I would still argue that manmade laws and organizational structures are trite and silly, but that they will eventually conform to God's will as a PASSIVE byproduct of individual discipleship. I have taken the assumption that you believe that conforming manmade laws and organizational structures IS the goal and that discipleship is just a means to get there.

the mission of the church is individual conversion via sharing the gospel

It's broader than mere evangelism, which is why Jesus adds, "teaching them to obey everything I have commanded you." I know the point may seem trite, as I'm sure you were speaking off the cuff, but it's quite significant given how the Church is so focused on making converts and completely undervalues any actual discipleship to help people grow into maturity. Lots of reasons for that, as your original post alludes to a few ... but the "evangelism-only" view is too massively widespread for me to ignore :p

Yet, once we begin to answer that question we've exited your position and have entered squarely into the "disciple all the nations" territory and begun to engage in theonomy.

We haven't exited my position at all. Discipling a teacher means showing him how to teach through a biblical world view. Discipling an electrician includes showing him how to do electrical work through a biblical worldview. Discipling a politician includes showing him how to lead a country from a biblical worldview. The career is never the primary focus, but it's still an essential component.

Another example. Say you moved to a small city in rural America and after a couple years every single person in the city professed faith in Christ. How should such a town be run? Do the elected officials and various other officers get any clues from Scripture, or is it just left entirely up to man how to govern righteously? I would argue that God has given extensive (though not exhaustive) guidance on how He wishes His people to be governed, and it doesn't look much like what we see in most places today.

Right. Those are great questions to ask. But implementing something like this is back to, as you said earlier, working through the micro to even get close to the macro. We don't begin with "let's reform the constitution" and find we have de minimis support for it. Instead, we begin with, "Let's get as many people following Christ as possible" SO THAT we can get to the critical mass of people who are ready, equipped, and sufficient to enact actual change. Further, once we have that critical mass, we will have, by all laws of probabilities, brought in so many people who are able to contribute to the "how should nations be run?" discussion than even we are that there would be even better end-results than if we were to attempt it now based on the very few of us who are actually playing in that arena in the first place. Plus, we'd have a network of actual laypeople to support the structure, rather than trying to create a kingdom of politicians.

In all, I think we're pretty aligned with the practice of what needs to be done and the actual disagreements are primary intellectual-only. Those differences may shape the aspects of our faith that we spend most of our free-time learning about and developing, but we're both still on board that the best way we can, individually, advance God's Kingdom is to (1) spread the Gospel, (2) raise up the immature believers, and (3) bring those who refuse to embrace Christ into subjugation to his will. Political structure is, perhaps, most directly tied to this third point. While politics certainly impacts the other two, the biblical example shows that they can be accomplished with great, thriving success even in an entirely hostile political climate.

Smash The Overton Window

1 upvotes · 30 July 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed. The issue is that the righteousness aspect, from a population perspective, is subjective, whereas form is objective. To a nonchristian, killing babies is he righteous thing to do, to ours/God's it's "unthinkable." The objectivity of righteousness (which is arguable, even from a Christian standpoint) won't be made clear to anyone until judgment day.

From there, the best thing people know to do is to argue for a form of governance that is most likely to achieve the brand of "righteousness" they prefer. This can either be true form (monarchy, dictator, republic, democracy, etc.) or soft form (how the prevailing system will be implemented through their preferred party/candidate/persons of influence).

No, it's not okay.

1 upvotes · 26 July 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Eh, I don't agree with a lot of what I read either. It's not an offense issue. It's just common-sense that you have to filter the good from the bad when you read anything on the internet.

BPD wife - I need a miracle from God

1 upvotes · 21 April 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Bud = marijuana? That doesn't mean anything anymore. If she's on marijuana and you're on meth, you're going to get hammered and they'll overlook her use. Marijuana isn't a concern to most courts anymore, for the most part. If that's your trump card on her, you've got nothing.

I think you're overestimating the significance of T-levels, especially if you're naturally within normal ranges anyway. It sounds to me like you've been drinking the kool-aid with all the "low-T" scare that goes around on certain RP subs.

BPD wife - I need a miracle from God

1 upvotes · 20 April 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Eh. 1 Cor. 7 says if you separate it should be "for a short time" and for the purpose of prayer. I don't personally believe long-term separations are "biblical," even though I embrace them as a pragmatic necessity in the same way that divorce was never "biblical" even in the case of cheating, but Moses deemed it a pragmatic necessity anyway ("because of the hardness of your hearts Moses issued certificates of divorce").

Very Basic "2-2 Dinner Party" Social Skills

1 upvotes · 8 March 2022 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Hah. I'm so confused.

Abstinence till marriage (Advice/Discussion)

1 upvotes · 23 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

there's nothing you've done other than look butt hurt over nothing

/u/redpill-cool is testing your frame. You're failing the test in your responses. This is something you'll learn over time. He insults me this way too. Everyone, in fact. It's his thing. Annoying as it is, it serves a purpose. But yes, he needs to figure out better discretion on when to apply this strategy and not.

I took a dose of finasteride to see how the body would respond. The drug has irreversibly emasculated my brain.

1 upvotes · 23 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Nah, I just like him for his musically-gifted brain. Jeremy Jordan, on the other hand ...

I took a dose of finasteride to see how the body would respond. The drug has irreversibly emasculated my brain.

1 upvotes · 23 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Musicals?

You intentionally trying to bait me? Haha

Fixing Your OYS - Your Life Will Keep Sucking Until You Read and Apply This Post

1 upvotes · 9 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

Hot, sweaty, and fast paced.

Fixing Your OYS - Your Life Will Keep Sucking Until You Read and Apply This Post

1 upvotes · 1 February 2022 · /r/RPChristians

I have. Did the weight start coming on when you had your first kid? That's when all mine began. Once you have kids it gets way harder to keep it off.

Sales and Discipleship

1 upvotes · 31 January 2022 · /r/RPChristians

37, actually.

FR: Spank your wife.

1 upvotes · 24 November 2021 · /r/MarriedRedPill

But not to a woman with a HVM. She thinks she's disappointing me.

I remember when this shift happened. Crap used to happen to her and somehow I was to blame ever single time. A few months later, crap happens to her and suddenly she's not good enough for me. Large-scale shift from fitness tests to comfort tests as her primary operating dynamic (not to say the former don't still come, but it's not the same framework).

Truth be told, I've never actually ventured into spanking. This post makes me interested to try, but purely because you said:

I get nothing out of spanking my wife. She doesn't particularly like it either, at least in the previous context I've done it until now.

We're still in the "I don't care for it, she doesn't like it" phase and I'm not sure if our relational dynamic (not being 24/7 Ds like yours is) would get the same result.

I'm curious how much of this could be tied to childhood conditioning of punishment being associated with resolution of failures. For example, my kids have been known to punish themselves at times, or get upset when I don't punish them when they know they've been bad. Internally, when they know they've done wrong the punishment satiates their guilt or other self-defeatist feelings. It's closure. I can easily see some women still being in this context - "I feel like a failure, but there's no daddy to punish me anymore." Cue Big Daddy instead of Old Daddy, let the spankings roll, and suddenly those failures and disappointments have now been resolved through the punishment she received, so all is well in the world again. Maybe?

What's the end-goal?

1 upvotes · 5 November 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed.

Sexual needs in deadbedroom

1 upvotes · 14 October 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I would not discourage seculars from posting here when the issues about our faith. We know the truth of Scripture. Better for a person to get biblical truth than secular speculation of the truth, however close it may be to actual truth.

Reading through the guide and having some trouble, can someone help me out?

1 upvotes · 14 October 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Top sprinters lift weights.

Distance runners too. My old cross country coach used to emphasize that hill-running had a significant influence from abs and pecs. I'm not sure exactly how he came to that conclusion, but at the time the articles he showed us made a lot of sense.

Reading through the guide and having some trouble, can someone help me out?

1 upvotes · 14 October 2021 · /r/RPChristians justify replacing it with a ~~lesser~~ lazier variant

FTFY

I loved the 2022 Toyota Prius

1 upvotes · 29 September 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I would guess XLE or Limited.

I loved the 2022 Toyota Prius

1 upvotes · 29 September 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Pretty good. You?

Christian Plate Spinning (Part 2)

1 upvotes · 7 August 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Isaac is an anomaly. That's a bad example to look to.

Anyone want to explain how this post is right/wrong? And in what ways? I'm new to RP and still learning what it's all about...

1 upvotes · 7 August 2021 · /r/RPChristians

So many that the joke is quite tired ☹️

The Polarizing, Yet Equable and Rational Male

1 upvotes · 5 August 2021 · /r/MarriedRedPill

It took me way too long to get back to this.

Question is, what is the proper course of conduct? That which satisfies how he wants to live? Or that which gives him the results he wants?

That's for him to decide. And I think this is the thrust of what you're saying, with the caveat that some (most?) people don't know enough about themselves yet to make an informed decision. In that case, they have to explore to figure out who they are before they can begin to prioritize things like personal character and integrity v. results-based living.

The big questions then are: The way you behave, are you exploring? Is she exploring? ... Or are you both following rules that neither of you made...or even like? And if you are, is that rational?

Those last three words are the clincher, and it's one of the reasons that true "off the deep end" alphas are the epitome alphas. They don't even care if it's rational because "being rational" to them is just another one of those "rules" that someone tries to thrust on them.

I do think you're spot on, though, that people need to deviate from the box and challenge the things they're taught. While a biblical example may not resonate well with you, it's one of the reasons I love Acts 17:11 so much - "Now the Bereans were more noble than the Thessalonians because they received the message with great eagerness and examined the Scriptures every day to see if what Paul said was true."

Here we have the apostle Paul - literally the greatest preacher ever to live after Jesus himself, who singularly wrote more than half of the New Testament in the Bible and was endorsed by all of the apostles who had actually been with Jesus - and the Bereans are being commended for challenging what he said rather than just taking his word for it.

If people would learn to challenge the paradigms in their own lives and explore new options (and yes, I've even done that with my own faith on a number of occasion, though always coming back to it), they'd be far more equipped to figure out the answers to the very important questions you're asking.

Christian Plate Spinning (Part 2)

1 upvotes · 5 August 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I completely agree with you on the benefits of having children early. That was one of my goals and I succeeded in it - all of my children will be 18 by the time I turn 50, when I intend to retire.

That said, on a purely marital level (excluding the parental), I've seen so many guys who have found "a high quality attractive woman" who 5 years later turns out to be AWALT anyway and the guy was just too young to see through his emotions, creating a halo effect around her and everything she does. So, I question the judgment of these low-20s men who are marrying - and that applies to me just as much as anyone, as I had missed a lot of warning signs that I am certain I'd pick up on if I were just getting started with someone today at age 36.

Christian Plate Spinning (Part 2)

1 upvotes · 5 August 2021 · /r/RPChristians

While technically correct, a lot can be said about pre-marital processes by looking at what the Scriptures say about how Christ drew his bride to himself prior to his union with the Church or the Spirit's indwelling us as "one." So, I don't think it's fair to say that the Bible doesn't have anything to say about pre-marriage processes. It may not say it directly, but it shows it. Watch what they do, not (just) what they say.

My Daughters Rules for Dating My Daughter.

1 upvotes · 8 April 2021 · /r/RPChristians supposedly it's a Christian environment, but several of these kids seem to be hellions when mom and dad aren't around

That's how it was when I was in high school. The local Catholic school was known for being far more morally bankrupt than the public school - drugs, sex, violence, etc. The teachers were fine, but it forced the parents into the dynamic of: (1) pay lots of money to get biblical teachers, but highly corrupting peers, or (2) get unbiblical teaching with still-corrupting-but-less-so peers. I did it both ways and found my peers had more influence over my beliefs than my teachers, and the peers at my public school were better influences on me than at the Lutheran school I'd attended before that.

Her interpretation seems to be 'he just wanted sex' which has, again, gotten her mad and again she's doubling up on her convictions.

Kind of like the opposite end: "She doesn't want sex, she just wants commitment from me," and he goes into the RP anger phase.

I knew this conversation was going to be a little awkward, but we also got into the discussion about relationships, sex, and what a circus it can be

Ironically, I just had the conversation with my son (9) yesterday about those exact things, including my crazy ex. Fun times. It ended with my son asking me to disciple him (as if I wasn't already, haha! - it's just easier to make it more formal now).

Another discussion was that any date is at her pleasure, so if she wants to call it off for any reason, she's entitled to that.

I'm curious: if we were in a society that did things predominantly through arranged marriages by the parents, would you still agree with this statement?

It occurs to me that if the answer is "no, that would be different," then this is a standard born from cultural lenses rather than a biblical standard. Not to say that's a bad thing. But this whole post begs the question: where is the biblical foundation for whether your daughter's standards are healthy and appropriate or not?

Obviously the Bible isn't going to be so blunt as to say, "Thou shalt have your father present at all pre-marital interactions with a suitor." But what are, at least, the principles drawn on here?

Announcement: Red Pill Christians will now exclusively be a male only space

1 upvotes · 25 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Good point. Consider it done.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/17/21)

1 upvotes · 22 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Ah, I think I see things more clearly now. I agree with this.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/17/21)

1 upvotes · 21 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

The original context you mentioned was: "the party signing receives no benefit under the contract." In this contract you are receiving a benefit: you're getting a month-to-month tenancy.

Yes, the circumstances you're describing could certainly result in a conclusion of duress. Writing "VC" won't do anything in court other than notify the court that you believed you were under duress at the time of signing the agreement. In this case, the court would take testimony about the circumstances, weigh the evidence, and if it believed you actually were under duress, it would void the contract. If it did not, it would uphold the contract, despite your personal belief that it was issued under duress.

I believe in every state any marking that you make on a signature line that is intended to induce someone else to uphold their end of the agreement is considered a valid signature, whether you use your name or you sign it "The Easter Bunny" or "ABCDEFGF."

I believe you previously stated that in court if you were asked if that was your signature you could just say "no," which would be technically honest. But any attorney - even crappy ones - is going to be smart enough to ask the follow-up question: "Did you write this marking on that line?" At that point you're going to have to decide whether or not you'll lie and say you didn't (i.e. "being dishonest" as /u/Proper_Screen alluded to) or fess up and be back on the same legal path as if you'd signed your own name.

I think what this all comes down to is that you believe you've found some loop hole in the law that isn't actually there. Yes, it can be wise to note your belief of duress. But that isn't binding on how a judge will rule on your case down the road. It only gives you a piece of evidence to work with.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/17/21)

1 upvotes · 21 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

If the party signing receives no benefit, then just don't sign. There is no such thing as a unilateral contract.

The notion of "imbalanced power" in the creation of a contract doesn't void a contract. What it does is creates a presumption that the contract should be interpreted in the manner most favorable toward the person who had no power in its creation. That's the proper remedy. I've never heard of a case where a contract was thrown out based on a "disparity of power." I think what you may be referring to are unconscionable contracts, which are a different beast altogether - and those can be thrown out when it's clear that the terms are so usurious that they are objectionable on their face.

But the bigger issue is my own judgement. In the court of my own conscience

Sure. But we were talking about the governmental law, right? If we go that direction, then we open up a whole new aspect to the conversation. To that, I'd just quote 1 Cor. 4 - "I care very little if I am judged by you or any other human court. I do not even judge myself. My conscience is clear, but that does not make me innocent. It is the Lord who judges me."

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/17/21)

1 upvotes · 20 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

I'm familiar with the concept, but it's mostly an urban myth. No statutory or case law has adopted this. All it does is create a statement of belief in the moment. But no court will automatically assume that your belief in that moment was accurate. Many people claim they're under duress when they're not. So, what you're really doing is saying: "I reserve the right to claim I was under duress at the time of signing this document." But that statement is true even when you don't put VC, so the value is minimal.

At best, it creates a "present sense impression" exemption to hearsay, which would be relevant if someone not involved in the court action were the one to have signed it. But because anyone involved in the action giving testimony is generally immune to hearsay about their own statements, the way the document was signed is going to be admissible either way. But the burden of proving duress still exists on the party making the claim, and putting "VC" doesn't prove it any more than standing up in court 10 years later and saying "I was under duress back then" proves it.

In short: I've heard of this myth, but have never once heard of a case where it was upheld without other independent proof of duress that would have been sufficient to make the claim even in the absence of the "VC" signature.

Why Lifting is Not a Suggestion

1 upvotes · 19 March 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, touche.

Why God Doesn't Love You.

1 upvotes · 20 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Because lots of people struggling through the issues I'm addressing will say to themselves, "Because God hasn't fixed this issue yet, He must not love me."

Can Christians pirate? Christians should pirate

1 upvotes · 18 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

This subject has nothing to do with the red pill. Way to be a sore sport about your post being removed.

Can Christians pirate? Christians should pirate

1 upvotes · 18 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Post removed. Surprise!

This isn't the right forum for this type of question. A buddy of mine has a post on the r/TrueChristian sidebar about "Is this sin? Is that sin?" type posts. I agree with it. Go read it and realize why you wasted all that time worrying this post unless you have a good answer to u/TheInventor49's question.

Why God Doesn't Love You.

1 upvotes · 17 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

"There's something so attractive about a person whose confidence is in the Lord,"

That's so, so true ... if he also has pecs and abs.

Contextually, I don't think John 12:32 (not 13:32) applies, but I get your point all the same. I'd just want to be cautious to avoid the "godliness is sexy" fallacy - or even the concept that a man can "confidence" his way into respect and authority without other supporting traits. I know countless men who have an alpha DNGAF degree of laser-focus on Kingdom-building who otherwise cannot make progress because other aspects of their lives are not up to par. There are some initial gut-checks that people give where they won't stick around long enough to see your good qualities if your bad qualities are too at the forefront.

Should things be this way? I don't know. Maybe. Maybe not. But the reality is that they are. And I don't think this is what you're saying, but in isolation without the caveat, it can have that effect so I'm writing this for clarity sake anyway: You still have to lift, sidebar, STFU, etc. if you want to figure out how to earn influence with others, even if you already have an A+ game on your confidence and devotion to a godly mission. I am living proof of that.

Backwards sexual dynamic?

1 upvotes · 16 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Unlocked.

Christian Marriage is not a good sub for young men looking for direction

1 upvotes · 13 February 2021 · /r/RPChristians

You can mention it and even outright complain about it. Just make sure you do it in a way that adds value to the people of this sub. Whining just to whine isn't value-add.

Wife took out loan against my will

1 upvotes · 25 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Another one of your big weaknesses is making compromises.

Book Notes: When To Walk Away, by Gary Thomas

1 upvotes · 25 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Good to know. I'll pass on the referral to my in-laws. Is it biblically based or secular?

LJBF Continued

1 upvotes · 25 January 2021 · /r/askRPC

Part of me wants to ...

Everything from this point on shows just how far in her frame you are. All those "reading more and more RP content" hasn't gotten you very far yet. Get back to it, brother.

Also, what could be some reasons that she is texting me?

I'm going to go with: an alien crash landed in her back yard and asked for you by name, but told her not to tell you about it. Seriously, it could be anything. Why bother wasting a single thought on this?

Book Notes: When To Walk Away, by Gary Thomas

1 upvotes · 25 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

It seems to me that Jesus specifically cites "wife" instead of "spouse."

Right. It's probably worth noting that Jesus didn't say "divorce" in this passage, although he's used the word elsewhere. In fact, I imagine he's specifically not talking about divorce, given that Peter - who did not divorce his wife to follow Jesus - is the one who said, "We have left all we had to follow you!" as the statement to which Jesus is replying. He's giving Peter an assurance: "Yes, you have. And I have noticed and you will be rewarded with eternal life for that choice."

how does a wife, who is called to be submissive, be a helpmeet and to 'win her husband without a word, reconcile leaving a 'toxic' marriage?

I believe this is the concept that I was referencing in my summary when I said: "and also has a generally unbiblical view about how freely he encourages divorce from a 'toxic' spouse."

In this situation, he never quite says it, but heavily implies that he's adding "having a toxic spouse" as a ground for divorce. In the book he insinuates that this would still be sin, but it's a preferable sin over letting a toxic spouse distract you from God's calling on your life.

I have made similar comments in the vein of remarriage before. I've repeatedly stated that remarriage after divorce is always sin, but that sometimes it's a preferable sin over having sex outside of marriage if you're constantly in situations where you can't control yourself. In that case, go get remarried. Yeah, it's an inaccurate reflection of God's character to the world to do this, but rampant fornication would also be an even worse reflection.

As for what an individual wife needs to do in an individual situation - leave or stay - I'd treat that decision ad hoc. I don't want to set out a broadly applicable rule when the Romans 14:14, 23 dynamic is going to be essential to that analysis, which is unique to the individual as compared with other issues.

The most broad things I could say is that if your spouse truly is a "toxic" person, the best strategy isn't to walk away, but do as the author refrains a number of times throughout the book: Let them be the one to walk away from you. In the case of a wife, this is more difficult when part of what God has set out for you includes respecting and helping such a man. In Jesus' culture women weren't even allowed to divorce their husbands. If they wanted him gone, they had to act so vile to make him divorce them - which would certainly be sinful on another level entirely. In this, I can't say that there's any situation where a woman could "walk away" from her husband (divorce, legal separation, or otherwise) without it being sin of some sort, except perhaps as Paul offers in 1 Cor. 7 - that it's by mutual consent and only for a short time for the purpose of prayer. Whether that sin is worse than alternatives or not is, again, an ad hoc issue.

Could you give a couple of more tangible examples to define what 'toxic' versus 'difficult' looks like in a marriage?

I wrote this post until 4:30am because I knew I'd be passing the book on to someone else the next day, so I don't have it in front of me. The key to remember in all of this is that the Bible never uses the word "toxic" in the way the author does. So, trying to differentiate between "toxic" and "difficult" isn't a biblical line - it's just one that the author draws for the purpose of convenience to prevent people from assuming the book applies to their situation when it doesn't.

Personally, I'd suggest a marital situation is merely difficult and does not rise to the level of toxicity until it starts involving a consistent pattern (i.e. not isolated incidents, or once-a-year infrequency) of behavior that involves constant threats of divorce, suicidal ideation, "I'm going to take the kids," calling the cops, false allegations, etc. used in an effort to get the other person to conform his/her behavior OR that the pattern of behavior is so severe that an otherwise healthy person on the other end begins suffering from persistent mental health disorders (PTSD, anxiety, panic attacks, etc.) as a consequence of the first person's conduct, even if it doesn't involve those types of threats.

Of course, that's me being a lawyer and using a standard that I wish the courts would employ rather than the loosey-goosey standards that are actually in place in many jurisdictions. Of course, even this has to be a little bit of an ad hoc determination in the sense that someone might be uniquely prone to mental health problems, so even "difficult, but non-toxic" behaviors could set them off. In that case, the other person isn't necessarily toxic as much as they are just dealing with someone who is extremely sensitive to any form of hostility at all - even reasonable or normal levels.

Toxicity could also be defined by intent. A "difficult" marriage could be two people who mean well, but a "toxic" one involves one spouse (or even both toward each other) who, thinking primarily of themselves, just wants to use the other person for their own feel-good results. Even if their expression of this is minimal, you still have a "toxic" individual who is just controlled/restrained in their toxicity - but it could explode at any moment, so watch out. Such people rarely think of themselves as self-centered; rather, the scale of self-centered-or-not doesn't even register to them because that's not a thing they think or care about.

Here are two real examples from people I know:

- Example 1: Bob and Sue fight all the time. They both want to make their marriage work, but lack the skills to pull it off. As a result, they frequently threaten divorce to each other, even though their commitment to Christ still holds them together. Their weekly threats of divorce are an expression of their frustration in the situation, not a manipulative effort to get the other side to change. This is NOT a toxic relationship but a difficult one.
- Example 2: Jimbo and Kristiana have broken up and gotten back together several dozen times in the last 5 years. Often-times these break-ups correlate with time-frame that would be personally advantageous. But for the most part, each break-up is treated as a way for one or the other to get out of having any obligation to the other. This is a toxic relationship because the behavior is manipulative toward the other for personal gain and without significant regard for the impact on the other person.

But again, this is not a biblical line. It's just one that I'd draw for my own purposes when working with people. And I reserve the right to change it as I learn and grow, especially given that "toxic" is not a category that I'd ever thought of before reading this book, as it was always more of just a generic adjective in obvious situations where it would apply.

You could argue that a spouse is living in unrepentant sin with controlling behavior and a wife is responding in a self-toxic way by overcompensating for the sake of submission, what I believe wives are called to do according to scripture. Where is the line drawn when a spouse should leave the toxic behavior?

Yes, there is room for that argument. But this is where I would veer away from the "toxic" line and look more to a "biblical" line, which the author seems to abandon when he writes the section on marriage. He goes with philosophical thinking absent theological conclusions on the matter.

As a pragmatic matter, he's right. When I talk about the proper theological conclusion, I assume the wife in the scenario you gave is capable of living it out. This might not be the reality. If she lacks the "peace that transcends all understanding" in the midst of her husband's sinful conduct, she might emotionally burst in an even more destructive way if she is not given a pragmatic (however sinful it may be) solution, which I think is what the author has in mind when he wrote this chapter. He seems to know it's wrong, but he tells people to do it anyway because leaving room only for the "theologically correct" conclusion would be about as useful as someone asking Jesus how to get into heaven and him answering, "Be perfect, as your heavenly father is perfect." Yes, Jesus gave that command - but not for the purpose of actually expecting them to be capable of this; rather, it was to show them that the bar is so high that they can't possibly live up to it.

Book Notes: When To Walk Away, by Gary Thomas

1 upvotes · 24 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

The book addresses this. But like you, I didn't find much value in a bunch of quotes identifying what qualifies a toxic, so I left most of that out.

Anything You Can Do I Can Do Better.

1 upvotes · 22 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting. Got a link?

Anything You Can Do I Can Do Better.

1 upvotes · 22 January 2021 · /r/RPChristians

Read the sidebar. The discord link is there.

Also, what type of fiction do you write? I write fiction (and non-fiction) as well - a fun hobby, though I've never really pursued being published.

How to prevent or assess sexual incompatibility in a potential wife?

1 upvotes · 26 December 2020 · /r/askRPC

Is that a dig or a legit question?

How to prevent or assess sexual incompatibility in a potential wife?

1 upvotes · 26 December 2020 · /r/askRPC

Solid. I don't think this guy actually wants to engage, though. He's just looking for a platform to share his thoughts and self-validate by deluding himself into thinking he's "winning" some debate.

How to prevent or assess sexual incompatibility in a potential wife?

1 upvotes · 25 December 2020 · /r/askRPC

If she married you purely because of your personality

Nah, she married me because she was told by the church all her life: "Find the most spiritually mature man you can and marry him." She commented at one point that she regretted it and found it to be horrible advice. She's fortunate that "spiritual maturity," if it continues in biblicality, should inevitably lead to RP-ness and thus development of attraction, eventually. At least that's how my story went.

they aren't exclusive to lifting

Sure, just like reading the Bible isn't the exclusive way to become spiritually mature. But it's the most efficient way and it'd be darn hard without it.

However this sub is highly obsessed with lifting

We're not obsessive about it. But if a guy is asking, "My wife won't have sex with me because I told her I didn't want her to get a tattoo, what should I do?" and he weighs 300lbs, there's a good chance the tattoo issue isn't the actual problem in their sex life.

When you date a girl, there are going to be certain things you'll want to filter out right away. Correct? That's part of vetting. In the first date or two you're going to want to figure out if she has any serious mental health problems, for example. Does that mean you're obsessed about mental health? No. It just means that's one of those early filters you have to go through before you can get down to business. Lifting is like that. It's an early filter that gives us context for all the other important things that come afterward. Yes, it's massively important. But the fact that you have to post your stats isn't to glorify body building - it's to help us vet people for actual problems before wasting our time answering a question that isn't actually going to solve their problems.

Doing a sport consistently will also give you a reasonable physique

Sure. And if you're getting the results you want with that, then go with that. But this conversation has come up MANY times on this sub. Runner/swimmer builds, for example, simply don't compare with the stats on how women are attracted to guys who lift. For that matter, virtually every major professional athlete you see lifts. Football. Basketball. Baseball. You name it. They all lift. It's how you excel at a particular sport. So if you look at professional basketball players and think, "I can have that body just by playing basketball and never lifting," that's straight up foolishness.

RPC aims for maximalizing looks

Funny word. Again, "maximizing looks" is just shifting from hard mode to easy mode. It's the low hanging fruit that makes everything else far more readily achievable. If you don't want to do it, or you go for a pure cardio body build, and she keeps fitness testing you because she can't glean "This man is hella strong!" from your appearance so she has to get it from your frame ... well, then don't complain and say, "Nothing's working!" But if it IS working for you, then do what works.

Personally, I lift big numbers. At one point I was benching 315, squatting 365, and DL 415. Post-COVID a bit down from those, but still way above most people. Yet my diet isn't that great. I don't have a 6-pack. My muscles, while dense and large, are broadly undefined through my skin. But I get the results I want and I don't feel the need to fast 50% of my days just to get my body fat below 12%. Instead, I hover between 15-18%, depending on the month. Take what works and leave the rest.

If bodybuilding was less emphasized

Let me explain this another way. In my profession, I see psychologists using the MMPI2 in literally EVERY. SINGLE. EVALUATION. EVER. It's basically malpractice to fail to do it. Yet I also find most psychologists saying, "I really don't care for the MMPI all that much, and I don't use it in formulating my opinions of a person very often." How can that be?

The answer I get when I ask why everyone has to do it is simple: "Because it addresses major psychological issues. I give the MMPI to rule those out, and then I move on to the more nuanced things that matter." But if the MMPI DID find a personality disorder, for example ... well, that's going to be a major aspect to their evaluation process. If there's something that major and defining to a situation, wouldn't you want to know it up-front? Does that mean you're obsessed with the metric? Of course not.

But the reality is that the vast majority of men in the world DO NOT have an attractive physique. They want to find some miracle attitude that will let them be obese and yet still have girls pining over them. That's just not going to happen.

my claim was simply that RPC puts a very big emphasis on maximalizing looks - making it critical.

So, let's flip things for a second. Explain to me why this is a bad or harmful thing. Maybe it's not to your taste/preference. But tell me how men will be worse off in life when encouraged to take better care of their bodies?

And I am sad to hear that you have such a low opinion about r/TrueChristian or most likely about "non red pillled" christians.

I'm hard on TC because I'm one of the most respected members over there - been around for a decade (maybe more?) and have considerable influence on that sub. As such, I have high expectations of it, knowing the effort I've put in to helping build up the community - and it times it seems to be going strong. But at other times, there are just so many liberals as an overflow from r/christianity that it's disheartening. With a handful of exceptions, I've taken about the last year off from there, coming back in spurts when I'm needed. I love TC deeply, but the fact that its cultural force is so heavily ingrained with a churchianity mentality often makes it more of a time-sink than it is a good investment.

Matchmaker, matchmaker, make me a match

1 upvotes · 21 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

At finding a wife, agreed. But by skipping online connections, he's losing out on a lot of silver-plate improvements that can be made to his social game along the way. Sure, "the hard way" will usually net the better result, but why ignore the easy gains to focus exclusively on the hard way?

Redpilled Christian marriage and pregnancy-bodies

1 upvotes · 19 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

no one has been able to give you an answer to your legitimate question about how to maintain sexualized attraction to your pregnant wife

Because you can't negotiate attraction. You can't will it into existence. We are biologically wired in ways that are beyond our power. As /u/OsmiumZulu occasionally says, if Rosie O'Donnell were your wife, there's nothing she could do to make you spontaneously horny for her. She might be able to get you worked up into it with serious effort, but no matter how great her lingerie or haircut is, you're not going to drop your pants the minute she walks in the room.

Now, in the reverse it's not quite as true. There are more things a man can do to cause a woman to be sexually attracted to him beyond rote physical appearance. But from the perspective of men looking at women - I have yet to ever hear an answer, and this question has been brought up many times on this sub in various forms. Nobody has ever come to a conclusion. So, until someone finds that magic wand, I'm going to operate on the premise that it doesn't exist.

How long did you wait till the next pregnancy?

1 upvotes · 18 December 2020 · /r/askRPC

At one point my wife and I had kids who were 0, 2, 3, and 5 years old - 4 kids who were 5 and under. I wanted kids close together (1) so they could play with each other and (2) because one of my life goals was to have all my kids turn 18 by the time I'm 50, facilitating early retirement at that point. Yes, there are aspects where this is more difficult, but I am extremely glad we did it this way.

What do you want to see covered on the Red Pill Christians podcast?

1 upvotes · 18 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Anecdotes about disciplining

Did you actually mean disciplining or really mean discipling?

OYS - Where Progress is Made (12/16/20)

1 upvotes · 17 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

OYS - 12/16/20

PHYSICAL: This is my "feasting" time of year. I'm doing a better job controlling the food intake than I have in past years, but definitely feel the tension between all the celebrations (not just holidays, numerous birthdays as well) and fitness goals. Still hitting the gym, but I remember after a single bowl of chili feeling like I was going to vomit with every deadlift. Lifting is on track, though. I lowered my weights to go for higher reps, so currently doing 225 bench, 300 dl, 275 squat, 165 ohp, 155 row. Sex is great right now. Wife still responding to initiation. She's asking to try new things, giving more and clearer openings to initiate. I'm finding that some things might look hot externally, but just aren't as enjoyable when you actually do it.

MENTAL: Constantly learning and growing. More so this week than past weeks. I've set aside more time for reading, and am actually engaging on reddit again, after having to take a few months off.

EMOTIONAL: Work is starting to stabilize again, though I have a case that I just started that's going to stretch me soon. Fortunately, I'm bringing in a buddy to help me with it, which should take a lot of the pressure off, as he'll be primary, but if all goes well I could make bank and he does most of the work ;)

SPIRITUAL: - 7 basics: AoS 10, QT 6, BS 9, SM 4, Prayer 3, Fellowship 8, Evangelism 6. I'm hovering in the 4-6 range on too many. I need to pick to set it aside or give it more attention rather than trying to play the field. I'm less effective and grow less when I'm spread too thin and not balancing better. - Mission: Going great. Disciples are being made. I've connected with 3 new people who I expect could evolve into discipleship relationships over the next month or so if I wanted, though I'm not sure how much more I can add to my plate at this point. I may keep it casual and see where things go.

IMPROVEMENT: Dieting, better balance in spiritual disciplines.

The Church

1 upvotes · 16 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Jesus sang a psalm

Cool, in that same meal he also called Peter "you Satan" in rebuke. So let's make sure we incorporate into every single weekly meeting harsh rebukes against those who aren't submitting to Jesus properly.

Ephesians 5:19, Colossians 3:16, James 3:5

Right. Nobody is saying "don't sing songs!" But are you really telling me Paul intended these passages to be a how-to manual for weekly meetings? More specifically: James' example references singing as a personal expression of cheer, not corporately. Paul's examples both connect the singing with admonishment of sin toward one another.

1 Corinthians 14:26

Yep, it also assumes revelations are being shared, tongues are spoken, interpretations are given. Are you suggesting that we must mandate that all of these happen every single week too? Of course not, because the next verse says: "IF anyone speaks in a tongue." If. Paul didn't expect these things to happen at every meeting.

Also, the passage says "each of you has ..." - so why does only the "worship leader/team" get to pick the songs? Or if each person has a word of instruction, why do only pastors or staff members get to preach during services?

Again, I'm not saying to stop singing songs or preaching sermons. I'm saying that the way we organize Sunday services in modern churchianity isn't an accurate reflection of what we see in the Bible. Yeah, as you have attempted to do, there are some verses that could be used to make us feel good about the current model, but you have to bastardize every trusted interpretive practice and eisegete a desire to justify current cultural practices before reaching the (false) conclusion that our structure today is exactly what the Bible contemplated.

Singing was a normal and expected part of synagogue and temple worship ... I find it ample instruction to not only defend the practice, but to require it.

Yikes! Really?!? Jesus constantly condemns the Jews for inappropriate expressions of the faith, and the apostles condemn the notions of mandating Gentiles to follow Jewish practices ... and you're going to tell me that because the Jews sang songs, the Bible "requires it" of Christians today also?

Back to the point: even if it's required, the degree of emphasis relative to the model we see from Jesus and the apostles is disproportionate. I hope you can see that cherry-picking verses to support cultural norms about "church meetings" is an eisegetical approach to self-validate those who are too scared to defy social expectations with how they operate their services.

They don't call us to watch other people putting on a performance. So it's important to select music that encourages that- congregational singing.

Wouldn't the 1 Cor. 14 approach make more sense in that case? You're trying to control too much. What would be the harm in just asking the crowd: "Does anyone have a song they'd like to offer up to God?" Remember: "each of you has a hymn, or a word of instruction" - so if you want individual investment, let each of them participate as they feel led. Why strip that away from the people and give it to one particular leader/team?

And I'm sure the temptation is to programize it. "It's too logistically difficult to let the Spirit speak in the moment, so we must make people give suggestions a week in advance." Control, control, control. Are you trying to manufacture God's presence or the movement of the Holy Spirit by creating an emotional environment during your services? Or are you interested in hearing what the Spirit is actually and already doing in the community as it happens? To be clear, this is one of those rare areas where I see a problem, but don't have a clear solution. But they're things I think about - and the more I meditate on Scripture and the picture we see of how Jesus and the apostles modeled life for the Church, the more I'm persuaded that our current structure is way off.

1 Corinthians 14 and other passages definitely teach that this must be done in good order, that people ought not interrupt

I don't see that in this passage. Are you suggesting the disciples violated 1 Cor. 14 when they asked Jesus questions while he spoke to the crowds? I see that we shouldn't let two people talk simultaneously over one another. "One at a time, please." So why is it "one at a time" for tongues, but "only one person a week" for words of instruction? Why do tongues get interpreters for those who can't understand, but if someone can't understand a word of instruction, "Too bad! No asking questions during the sermon!"?

"Because it would ruin my groove to get interrupted," says the pastor who apparently speaks from a groove of his own prepared thoughts rather than from the Spirit to engage the actual needs and curiosities of the people.

Again: "each of you has a word of instruction." Are we really going to interpret that to say that only staff members have a word of instruction? Be consistent in interpretation.

the public proclamation of the Word of God by one set aside for that purpose is central, and is repeatedly commanded in the New Testament.

Ah, the old "centrality of preaching" or "primacy of preaching" movement. Again, I'm not arguing against preaching. I'm arguing for a Scriptural expression of it that falls in appropriate balance with the model given to us by Jesus and the apostles.

The New Testament refers to preaching as a central part of worship quite a bit more than I think you're allowing for. The fact that we don't have a lot of full sermons recorded by Jesus I think doesn't make as strong a case as you'd think.

I'm actually fully aware of it all. I think you're arguing against "a case" that I'm not actually making.

Fellowship-- here's how it looks in my church

Seems very structured. That's not a bad thing, but it begs the question: how much are people engaging with one another OUTSIDE the structured times? That's how you're going to gauge the authenticity of the relationships in your congregation.

I ran a survey one time, accounting for over 1,000 people. I asked several questions about relationships in a congregational setting. Going from memory, here are a few of them:

- "Do you have friends in your local congregation?" Overwhelming "yes" answers.
- "Can you name 5 by both first and last name." About 80% could (or at least came close).
- "How many days in a month do you spend time with any of these people outside of a church/ministry context?" The majority (75%+) of answers were 0 or 1, with a small subset of 2s. Only 2-3 people answered 5 or more. Apparently THIS is what leaders mean by "doing life together"? haha
- "Do you feel comfortable spontaneously asking 2 or 3 of the people on your 'friends list' to do something with you, such as going to a movie on a Saturday night?" About 70% of the answers were no.
- "Would it have a significant emotional impact on you for longer than 1 day if one of your friends in your congregation moved away?" The majority of answers were no (don't recall the percentage, just that it was more than half).
- "Who is your best friend in life?" Less than 20% of people listed the name of anyone on their 'friends list' from the second question. About 30% of people said they didn't have a best friend.
- "What makes that person your best friend?" Surprising to me, not a single person mentioned: "We are in small group together." Most answers were along the lines of, "I love hanging out together," or "We had a blast when we went white water rafting together and have been close ever since" or shared some other experiential story of them having fun together. Having "deep and meaningful conversations" was rarely mentioned.

- I also asked pastors uniquely: "Do you spend time with your congregants in context that are not scheduled for any ministry purpose and which do not ultimately transition into ministry-related conversations (i.e. you just enjoy each other's company and that's it)?" I think the number was over 90% who said that this never happens.

Interpret that however you like. Suffice it to say: I'm persuaded that congregations today are not good at facilitating authentic relationships. It's as if they think, "Close friends talk about deep things, so if they talk deep, they'll be close." It's not causal both directions. It just comes off as contrived.

Men that I'm in a more on-going mentoring relationship with I see more often than that.

Perfect. Are they now going out and doing this with others? Or are you the only one being intentional about building these relationships with people?

But yeah, not 30-45 seconds after singing. It's actually a lot of work

I'm glad to hear you've at least beaten that curve! Do you think developing friendships SHOULD feel like work? Or is it that the culture in your congregation isn't naturally a "friendly" one so you have to manufacture it through structure?

which is why most don't do it

You noticed ;)

it's always been my experience, in almost 20 years of pastoring, that people who engage in the life of the church (and the more the better) grow spiritually

I won't necessarily argue with the conclusion, but I'd question how you define "grow spiritually." Often-times the super-participants who attend 3 services a week, show up to small group, lead a Bible study, serve on the parking team, etc., etc., etc. are the least active producers for the Kingdom. They're too busy doing churchy things to be useful to God.

To quote Dawson Trotman:

If I were the minister of a church and had deacons or elders to pass the plate and choir members to sing, I would say, 'thank God for your help. We need you. Praise the Lord for these extra things that you do,' but I would keep pressing home the big job — "Be fruitful and multiply." All these other things are incidental to the supreme task of winning a man or woman to Jesus Christ and then helping him or her to go on.

The Church

1 upvotes · 15 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

2/2

Jesus Himself went to the synagogue meetings regularly, and those were more formal gatherings

Yep - he invaded groups of non-believers to teach them the truth. This is just like my discipler, when he was a missionary in Thailand, attending buddhist temple services for the purpose of sharing Christ with the people there. If you want to go attend Jewish synagogue services to preach the Gospel from their pulpit, and you can get away with it - by all means, do it!

I'm not saying any of this to disagree or contradict what you're saying. I think you're making some really helpful and important emphases here.

I really appreciate that. And while I may be bold in my speech, do know that I'm not saying we should abandon the modern structure of the church we see today. While it is a flawed structure, it is still a useful one. All I'm saying is that we look at the map and try to re-proportion the way we give attention to things. If you want a big building, go have your big building. There's nothing unbiblical about it. It doesn't fall into the "Biblically Contradicted" category, so you have freedom in Christ to gather a bunch of people into a large building.

But when you meet in that building, are you going to perpetuate a distorted picture of the Church by over-emphasizing things the apostles gave relatively little attention to, or are you going to re-prioritize your leadership to make sure your body much more closely reflects the lifestyle of Jesus and the apostles?

Clear example: we already addressed music, above, so let's dive into sermons. How many uninterrupted sermons do we see Jesus actually preaching? Relatively few. And when he teaches, does he teach on the latest fads for Jews of the time, or do we see him explaining the Scriptures and how people are misunderstanding them and offering them a correct understanding? "You have heard that it was said ... but I tell you" and all that. Those are his "sermons."

And yet look at the maybe 2 uninterrupted sermons that Jesus preached compared to the countless times the biblical authors represent him engaging with the community in conversation, question-asking, public reprimand to the unrepentant listening in, etc. Look at all the times the biblical authors reference conversation with those they were leading rather than preaching at them. The very context of their writings makes clear that they knew each other passionately and intimately - something that's not born from a soapbox model.

So, should we really be insisting on uninterrupted sermons as the mandatory "gotta do that EVERY week!" and give a distorted picture from what the biblical authors thought to emphasize? Or do you reorganize and say: "Yeah, maybe we have a sermon once a month and the other 3 times we use our Sunday service time to foster conversation and do Q&A sessions from the pulpit, or to life model!"

One congregation in my city, which is one of only three congregations I've ever known to practice discipleship in a model that I would see as consistent with what Jesus did (not to say they're, by any means, perfect congregations) started one Sunday morning, saying: "I talk a lot about discipling people, but it occurred to me that many of you may have generic ideas about it, but may be intimidated by it because you've never seen what it actually looks like and how simple it can be." So the leader invites a guy he was discipling up to the stage and says, "This is Bob. I meet with Bob not just every week, but we chat probably every few days - not because those are our 'set meeting times,' but because we're friends and I love him. We text when we have thoughts to share. We swap funny stories. We send each other memes and go to the movies together. Our families get together to play board games. We love each other. But sometimes we also have intentional time together. And I'm going to show you what that time looks like." He then proceeded not to preach at the crowd, but to have a meeting with Bob in front of the congregation for everyone to watch. It was a conversation, not a lecture. Bob had questions, but the leader had even more - and the things they discussed were a lot of the same things others in the room told me afterward they were thinking about also.

It was beautiful. But it wasn't a sermon.

Now imagine if you could have that level of peer-to-peer interaction not merely with one person in front of the group, but if your congregants felt the freedom to cut you off mid-thought and say, "Teacher, I didn't understand when you said this. Can you explain this to us?" After all that's what the disciples did to Jesus, right? That's what the crowds did. And sometimes Jesus looked out at the crowd and the Bible says, "He could see that they were thinking this," and then Jesus addresses it. Have you ever stopped yourself in your tracks, looked at your congregation and said, "I can see that this is what's really on your mind right now, so let me shift gears to address that"? I've seen it happen, but it's extremely rare. Jesus did this kind of stuff all the time.

So, what's your norm going to be for your congregation? Are you going to distort your map to over-emphasize uninterrupted sermons based on the rare examples that we see in the bible of Jesus speaking this way? Or are you going to ALSO (not instead of) incorporate conversational components to your teachings, as the apostles wrote about far more, and gave greater emphasis when writing the Gospels to the various Christians around the world about how Jesus lived - with the understanding that they were inviting those congregations to live as Jesus lived?

Just some more things to think about. Again, I'm not against the standard church model. I'm hard on it, but I don't think we should abandon it. I believe we need to readjust it - but with a unique emphasis on personal discipleship outside of Sunday services. The corporate gatherings are nice, but the apostles were abundantly clear that they were never Jesus' focus. His 12 were his primary ministry strategy, not the 5,000 he preached to. Jesus never ignored the masses, but he always stole away to train up his 12 as his primary concentration.

The Church

1 upvotes · 15 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

1/2

I do think a lot of what the traditional church does on a Sunday morning is defensible Scripturally

Right. Nazis, racism, pro-slavery, LGBT, pro-choice ... are all also "defensible Scripturally." I can find verses to back up any cultural notions I get in my head, if I want.

I often teach that there's a difference between:

- Scripturally Contradicted: the Bible directly says it's false. Example: "Jesus didn't rise from the dead." Direct contradiction.
- Scripturally Clueless: the Bible just doesn't address it. Example: "My mother's name is Betty." The Bible doesn't say. Might be true, might not be. No way to tell.
- Scripturally Consistent: the Bible vaguely alludes to the topic, but without taking a particular stance. Example: "Unicorns exist" or "The earth is flat." There are some passages that could inspire this thought, depending on the translation you read and how inspired you think it is. But when you look into it, you find that it's a term of art, not a set-up for theological conclusions. Yes, you can hold these views and not defy the Bible, but the Bible doesn't affirm the truth of the views either.
- Scripturally Circumscribed: the Bible creates a topic and gives a framework of governing principles for understanding it, but there is room for interpretation within the framework of passages on point. There are almost certainly correct answers, but there is legitimate room for disagreement on what the actual, correct answer is. This is where most theological differences exist. Example: "James 2:24 says, 'a man is justified by works and not by faith alone'" v. "Romans 3:28 says, 'For we hold that one is justified by faith apart from works of the law.'" Nobody would be debating this but for the Bible, so the Bible is the only text that creates the framework for understanding the truth. But there's no biblical explanation for how the passages are to be reconciled, so we endeavor to explain it ourselves - our explanations being circumscribed by the boundaries of Scripture. If I say, "I believe one is justified by drinking a glass of orange juice every morning," I have left biblical circumscription and skipped into "biblically contradicted" territory.
- Scripturally Compelled: the Bible tells us plainly and we ought to live by it. Example: "Jesus died as an atoning sacrifice for our sins" or "Husbands ought to love their wives, and wives ought to respect their husbands."

Everyone agrees that Scripturally Compelled things are mandatory. But the Bible doesn't compel much in the way of Church structure. Off the top of my head, here's the framework I see insofar as biblical structure is concerned:

- Apostles oversee the body.
- Women aren't to have authority, teach, or speak.
- Two or more people shouldn't prophesy or speak in tongues at the same time.
- No false teachers are permitted to speak.
- If someone identifies as a brother, but continues in unrepentant sin, they are to be expelled.
- The apostles set a model for living that was to be taught and passed on in local bodies.

There are examples of what some fellowships looked like in Scripture, but there's no mandate that we must be exactly like them. In fact, the apostles were constantly rebuking the church at different cities for handling things inappropriately.

When we talk about "sing x songs and preach for y minutes," we have definitely left Scripturally Compelled territory, and almost certainly even Scripturally Circumscribed territory. Other than very vague principles, the Bible really doesn't give clear commands on what MUST occur within biblical communities, other than to adhere to and pass on the model of living demonstrated by the apostles (i.e. discipleship) ... the one thing that virtually no congregation actually does anymore. In modern terms: "How dare a pastor be so arrogant as to tell me to be more like himself. He's a sinner too!" ... yet this is exactly what Paul did and instructed us to do also.

Instead, the current model of Sunday service structure we have falls squarely in the "Scripturally consistent" category. The actual format is maybe vaguely alluded to in a few passages, and there are certainly passages that might indicate it's a good idea to sing songs and listen to sermons. But the way it has permeated virtually every known body and has become indistinguishable on an identity level from culture's perspective ... that has so far deviated from "these are good things to do while exercising your freedom in Christ" toward "if you reject participation in this particular structure, you're a deviant in violation of Hebrews 10:25" - and it's super unhealthy. The degree of emphasis placed on otherwise useful concepts - especially at the exclusion of other even more essential aspects of Christian learning and living - is completely man-made.

It's like this image of the world, re-proportioned to be consistent with the amount of media attention. Anyone looking at that would say: "THAT is definitely NOT the world I live in." It's a gross distortion of what the world actually looks like and what maps should represent. And yet this is how the media portrays the world. Likewise, the modern structure of churchianity has grossly distorted what Christ's Church was meant to look like by only paying attention to the things that jive with current cultural trends, like "x songs" and "a y minute long sermon." Yeah, they may be biblically defensible as good ideas, just the same way I can defend the fact that the US should have significant media coverage, doesn't mean the final product is at all an accurate representation of what the Church should look like if we balance all things in proper proportion.

Look at that map again. When the world watches the media, that's what they think the world looks like, right? Now, look at the modern expression of churchianity and tell me if they're seeing a map like that or they're seeing an accurate portrayal in appropriate balance of what Jesus intended for his Church to look like.

For example: how many times do we see Jesus singing songs? How often do the apostles engage in corporate worship through music? The only example I recall is when Paul and Silas sing hymns to pass the time in prison. Yeah, we may want to assume that they may have been doing this, but the biblical authors clearly didn't find it fit to give any acknowledgment or emphasis to this aspect of the faith. So, why do congregations insist that we MUST sing songs and sing them a certain way with certain instruments in a certain style - be it an organ in hymnal tunes or distorted guitars and rock music? It doesn't matter because that debate only falls within the trap itself.

but also make sure we provide plenty of spaces for discussion as well. Small group gatherings, personal interaction, casual fellowship, counseling- all these things play a role in the whole process of making disciples

I'm not against you, but I'd challenge you to look closer at whether or not your particular expression of these things is consistent with the WAY Jesus and the apostles modeled them, or if they're token nods to say, "See, we included that!" For example, "casual fellowship" often exists in many congregations I've attended by giving 30-45 seconds after singing is over to "greet the person next to you" or repeat a prefabricated phrase to them, like: "I'm glad you're here today." Do we see this as the way Jesus implemented fellowship with those around him? Certainly not. Instead, churchianity has taken buzzwords from Scripture, like "fellowship" and completely redefined them to lose all of their substance.

Or an alternative is, "Well, fellowship happens when people stick around to chat after service." Okay, but what is the leadership doing to facilitate that? Are you actually encouraging it or just randomly seeing it on its own. Because if it's on its own, you can't take credit for fostering that within your body. But even at that, the 5 minutes you chat before picking your kids up from the back room is still hardly following in the biblical model we see.

Some will say, "But our fellowship happens in small groups!" Okay: How does your small group implement fellowship? Virtually every small group I've attended (not led) falls into one of three main categories: (1) content-driven teaching and/or discussion, (2) group therapy, or (3) fabricated bonding, usually through, "How's your week been?" type questions and general casual conversation. The fact that you call it "casual fellowship" makes me think that your body may fall into this type.

I used to be lured by these models as well, as they're easy to structure for people. But when I started (a) observing the results of these types of groups, and (b) seeing what fellowship in the Bible produced, I saw a total misalignment. So, I started studying concepts of fellowship, koinonia, and the way the apostles connected with their followers and I saw an intense passion and loving bond. Paul talks constantly about how he is constantly overjoyed for his disciples, longs to see them, can't stop talking about them, etc. He even notes the reciprocity in Galatians 4:15 - "For I testify to you that, if possible, you would have gouged out your eyes and given them to me" because they loved and trusted him so much. Is that kind of bond actually being fostered in your body, or casual acquaintanceships that we pretend are authentic biblical friendships or purposed fellowships?

the four canonical gospels are not our only source for what church ought to look like. There are the epistles of the Apostles also Completely agreed. And I'm CONFIDENT that if you re-examine them without the lens of modern cultural practices, you'll see what I see.

23 year old woman desperately looking for help.

1 upvotes · 10 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I could still see room for lots of holes. I'm leaning more and more to the point of saying: that's an individual conviction you have to reach before God. At the end of the day, it's not my place to judge what Scripture doesn't set forth. I'm okay with that conclusion.

Calling BS on Red Pill gurus

1 upvotes · 8 December 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I'm more curious: why was this posted here?

Prayers Unchained Initiative

1 upvotes · 3 December 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not sure how this has anything to do with our sub.

The Basics of Female Frame

1 upvotes · 13 November 2020 · /r/RPChristians

You're about to be banned for trolling. I've told you what to do if you have a legitimate question.

Grieved that wife will never treat me how she treated others

1 upvotes · 29 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is by far your biggest issue

Glad somebody said it.

Look at what they do, not what they say

1 upvotes · 25 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

That would be cause for distrust.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (10/14/20)

1 upvotes · 19 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

You've got deeper issues to address than this conversation warrants. You need a discipler and as helpful as OYS can be, it's nowhere near the same.

From there I'll just say:

1. Even Jesus preached fire and brimstone. Perfectly valid way to share the gospel in some circumstances.
2. Get in the word more.
3. Start memorizing scripture. Start with the book of philippians.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (10/14/20)

1 upvotes · 18 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I mainly resent God because of him sending people to hell

Have you ever stepped on a spider? You don't think much of it because you're such a higher life form with such a higher degree of intelligence that the spider's pitiful expression of sentience is so heavily inferior that it hardly even registers in your brain that his feelings, physical pain, terror, etc. might factor into the decision to chase him down and kill him. All you care about is that the spider is interfering with your plans and that's the end of it. In fact, if there's a whole colony of spiders infesting your house, you're not just going to kill one or two. You're going to call the exterminator and wipe out the whole doggone lot of them, right?

Now imagine you develop sympathy for spiders. You decide to love them and learn how to communicate with them on some extremely basic, rudimentary level. You are passionate about their well-being and care for them so personally that you recognize each of the thousands of spiders in your basement by name. In response to your kindness and provision of food and a place to live, most of them behave. But others repeatedly bite you and leave the basement that you've allocated for them to live, and when you have guests over they attack the guests. You give them repeated opportunities to stop, but as they continue and it threatens your plans for your home and your enjoyment of the house you've built for yourself ... well, what are you going to do? You're going to kill them or kick them out of your house to live outside your love, care, and protection. That's what most people believe of hell.

The fact that we step on spiders so nonchalantly immediately makes moot any argument that we may have against God for being cruel or vicious in his casting people out of his presence, which (by definition) is hell. It's my personal theory (not theological fact) that the fire, weeping, and gnashing of teeth isn't something God creates in hell; rather, it's a byproduct of the fact that without God's grace holding a semblance of civility together, humanity would burn the world to the ground all on its own - and that's exactly what will happen in hell, as the cruelty of man will cause them to torment one another, rather than God being the one to do the tormenting. God simply says: "You don't want to live in my house under my rules? Fine. Go live outside my house and figure out your own way of life."

him sending people to hell

From another angle: is this a situation where you can say, "God, I don't like that you do this. I would do things very differently. But you also know a lot more about how the universe and humanity function than I do, so I'll trust this is one of those areas where you know better than I do. Can you help me understand why this is what's best?"

I, of course, have theories on this - not the least of which is the simple question: what happens to humans when you reward bad behavior? They keep being bad. If God rewarded the wicked with a spot in his glorious presence, what incentive do people have to bring his Kingdom on earth as it is in heaven?

I'm calling it foolish because I know exactly why it's wrong, what it does to my state of mind and still want things my way.

I'm going to to out on a limb and suggest you don't actually know why it's wrong. This is an old post, but one I wholeheartedly agree with:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/cnoykj/understanding_why_sexual_sins_are_sin/.

In short the deal is that I believe Jesus died to pay the wages of sin for the world, but I massively struggle with the important part of actually orienting my life toward modeling Christ.

So, going to the "faith" section of this post, it sounds like you're in the middle category. "Yeah, I know it's all real, but I don't care enough to do anything about it." That's a dangerous place to be, friend. James 2 is clear that this form of intellectual acknowledgment doesn't save anyone.

I thought the whole point of RPC is fundamentalist biblical teaching.

No. RPC is about TRUE biblical teaching. Fundamentalists are quick to read the Bible outside of its context in order to force overly literal interpretations, which are often extremely wrong and equally inappropriate as feminist and blue pill teachings.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (10/14/20)

1 upvotes · 18 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I resent God for a number of reasons and can't get over it in prayer or reading the bible.

As a former pastor once commented to me: "It's not submission until you disagree." Many biblical figures have questioned and even directly opposed God's perspective on things. Yet they still obeyed, and that's what mattered. Consider the wife in 1 Peter 3, who is told that she ought to submit to her husband - even if he is an unbeliever - and that her gentleness and internal character and submissiveness are what should win him over to Christ. This passage is couched between slaves submitting to their masters and Christ submitting to the government that crucified him. This is how women are told to submit to their husbands. Do you expect that the solution to the "I resent God" problem is going to be any different? Yeah, you may think God to be evil for whatever reason - and you didn't elaborate, so I won't guess. But your opinion of him matters very little in comparison to the fact that you: (1) Believe that Jesus died to save you, and (2) choose to orient your life in a manner consistent with the character of Christ.

This whole "I resent God" thing is way too feelings-oriented. Feelings matter, but they're subservient and less significant in comparison to what you think and what you do.

I've been rebuked for rejecting what popular commentaries say on some topics, but I'm a God's word first person and make my own call on discerning the text.

Expect that from churchianity. Just don't go fundamentalist. Make sure you interpret things in their proper historical and spiritual context in light of God's plan throughout history.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (10/14/20)

1 upvotes · 16 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I don't know what I want to do with my life.

This is a clear sign that you're not being sanctified. Christ has a plan for you. If you become like Christ, his plan for you will become your own plan for yourself. That plan is to make disciples, which was Jesus' own plan for himself too. The more you are like Christ, the more this will become your plan also.

I have my doubt's that making disciples would be wise for me considering I might not be saved or even be unforgivable.

Fair enough. Figure yourself out, then. Discipleship is a luxury. This sub is a luxury. Ultimately, you have personal responsibility to train yourself to be godly (1 Timothy 4:7), and God has already given you everything you need for just that (2 Peter 1:3-4). There are no excuses here.

If your attitude is, "I may have committed the unforgivable sin, so I might as well just give up," then it doesn't matter whether you're wrong or right - giving up dooms you to hell either way. Of course, if you're wrong you're condemning yourself to hell for no reason, so believing you've committed the unforgivable sin is ultimately an idiotic position to take.

About lifting the GYM's in my state have been closed

Body weight. Cardio. BodBot app. Find heavy things, like jugs of water or a spare tire on your car and lift them. There's lots of stuff. This has been discussed at great length on this sub. /u/skimthedross has a post on this from when COVID first started all the shut-downs. Look it up.

I tend to study while reading and use a range of tools to do so. I never really get much out of opening a bible and just reading it. Maybe it wouldn't meet your standard, but it's why I decided to combine them.

Then you're misunderstanding the function of each. First, if you're using "a range of tools" for study, you're most likely not studying. The bible should be 99% of what you use. I advise men I disciple to avoid commentaries for at least 1 year, preferably 2, just until they figure out how to study the Bible for themselves. Same goes for various blogs, websites (ex. gotquestions.org), forums, and other sources, with limited exception.

As for quiet times, that goal isn't for you to "get much out of" it. The goal is to relate with God. I don't get fuzzy feelings every time I talk to my wife or listen to her drone on about her day. But it's an essential aspect to a healthy relationship anyway. I'd be a fool not to do it, even though I don't "get much out of" it.

As for scripture memory I don't really find memorizing single verses that useful.

This is sheer ignorance, probably born from the fact that you're not doing it.

I don't have photographic memory so I doubt very much I'll ever be a 10 or even an 8 in scripture memory no matter how long I looked at it.

Neither do I. My rote memory actually sucks. But I work hard at it, and it pays off. I hated Scripture memory at first and found no value in it. Now, I find that it's perhaps the singular most valuable of the 7 basics when I engage in it. It is perhaps the most significant pathway to maturity - not because it's more important than the others, but because it's often the weakest link, and when it is brought up, all the others come with it.

I need to fix it, but just haven't. And I haven't been able to develop a solid firm mission statement beyond what I already have. I would like a better one, but had no luck on developing it.

Glad to see you're getting it. Now by next week's OYS, resolve these two things so you can see progress.

What are Your Thoughts on Cold Approaches?

1 upvotes · 3 October 2020 · /r/RPChristians

My thoughts exactly. It's a skill worth developing for more reasons than merely picking up girls, though for some it can have that benefit too.

Don't Be Autistic

1 upvotes · 24 September 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You can learn probably more from in-person friends than on here

Something I wish more guys on reddit could figure out. Part of the reason I'm not online as much these days. Too much crap in the real world to get done. Let the internet be a hobby, not the primary.

Don't Be Autistic

1 upvotes · 22 September 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

No clue. I assumed that's a mod thing.

Edit: Hey, there it is! Thanks for the fix.

Don't Be Autistic

1 upvotes · 21 September 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Every now and then I joke with people that I have "obsessive OR compulsive disorder" ... just never the two together. A psychologist laughed when I said that and added: "that's why conjunctions in the DSM matter."

any Eastern Orthodox on here?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is for /r/askRPC.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/02/20)

1 upvotes · 3 September 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Much appreciated.

The Origins of the Ekklesia ("Church")

1 upvotes · 19 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Not that I have any plans to look up again. Whether it's German or Proto-Germanic doesn't really make a difference because the base definitions still fall within the framework of my original post.

https://en.wiktionary.org/wiki/Reconstruction:Proto-West_Germanic/kirik%C4%81 - Even a simple wiki search on the word kirika that you're referencing shows this. It doesn't really change anything, so it's not worth the effort.

The Origins of the Ekklesia ("Church")

1 upvotes · 19 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

In all my studies on the subject, every resource (with extremely limited exception) has pointed to the English word coming from the German-speaking populace where kirche was the term ultimately transliterated to "church." There was no direct transliteration from Greek to English. That's not to say the German word wasn't related to some Greek word before that - it's certainly possible. But by the time we got the English "church," the cultural baggage from the German kirche was already carried with it and the original Greek definition that the German came from was lost.

But I already addressed this in the original post:

The word we derived "church" from is actually German: Kirche. Some suggest that this may have come from the ancient Greek Kuriakon (or sometimes conjugated Kuriakos).

- Kirche in the German referenced a building or location.
- Kuriakon in the Greek generally means "belonging to a lord."

Break up hurts

1 upvotes · 19 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Your post got removed for profanity. Also, you didn't follow Rule 2, which requires adding your stats for advice threads. This may also be a good question for r/askRPC.

Do you have any concerns about how it seems like this view errs on the side of control of your wife over her personal growth and freedom?

1 upvotes · 15 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

it must've been worded differently.

Or maybe I'm just learning more as the days go by.

"How do I become Kingdom oriented to the point where I am not concerned with the feelings and actions of others towards me?"

Yes-ish. This is the point of my "mission matters, nothing else" post in the 200 series.

I say "-ish" because technically there's value in being "concerned" in the sense that the way others think of us affects our ministry. I know a ton of hugely obese preachers who take the view: "I don't care what people think of me, I just focus on advancing God's Kingdom, and that means I don't have time for the gym." Well, that's a fairly idiotic approach because their obesity loses them a lot of respect from people who otherwise do think looks matter, right?

Jesus preaches about how we should use our worldly wealth to gain friends for ourselves to serve eternal purposes. In this, there's the impression that having a good reputation matters. In fact, Paul even gives this as one of the requirements for being an elder - that he must have a good rapport with the community. So, the way other people feel about you does matter, to some degree. Of course, Paul also wrote this as a man who was widely persecuted, imprisoned, beaten, and literally cast out of entire cities and nations without an opportunity to preach the Word there. So, interpret Paul's requirements in the context of how he modeled them.

A picture of a relationally solid church community

1 upvotes · 12 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Of course, we would all like to say that if we were held at gunpoint and told to renounce Jesus or die, that we would choose death, but we can't really be completely sure...

I'm not even talking about that situation. I'd wager far more people would be willing to die for Jesus than live for him. Dying is easy. But the same people who legitimately would take the bullet before denouncing him are the same people who on a random Tuesday are going to watch porn and not have a passing thought about whether or not their neighbor is going to hell, and who aren't discipling anyone. Again: it's easier to die for Jesus than live for him.

I picked Muslimtown (a metaphorical place, obviously) not because of the risk of death, but because of the absence of ability to use a congregational structure as a crutch. It's more representative of how the early Church existed under the oppressive Roman government during Nero's reign. The Church was not a series of congregations from city to city, but underground meetings in people's homes, hence Brian Sanders' book Underground Church. When we remove the structural components that didn't come into play until much, much later (notably post-400AD), we get a better picture of whether or not people are really committed to Christ or committed to the structure that makes everything seem easy, doing all the heavy lifting for them so they don't have to do it themselves.

A picture of a relationally solid church community

1 upvotes · 12 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

One of the guys I reached out to and brought to church is doing very well, and he's discipling others.

That's beautiful to hear! Is he doing this because you intentionally trained him how and he saw you doing it with others, or is he doing it because of the congregation's teachings and what he's picked up from his time there?

Our leaders have commented before how 2 Timothy is like THE handbook on how to do discipleship

I'm glad to hear that! Personally, I preference John 13-17, if you want to be more comprehensive, but 2 Timothy 2 is good too ;)

2 Timothy 2:1-2. That means discipleship for 4 generations: Paul (1), who discipled Timothy (2), who is now called to entrust to faithful men (3), that can teach others also (4).

Fantastic! Matthew 28:19-20 takes it even further into infinite generations.

- Command 1: Make disciples of all nations.
- Command 2: Teach them to obey everything I commanded you.
- Implication 1: We must teach them to obey command 1, so all people must be taught how to make disciples.

- Implication 2: We must teach them to obey command 2 (which includes command 1 also), so all people must be taught how to make disciples and how to teach their disciples to make more disciples, and how to teach those disciples to make more disciples, and so on.

Our church is talking about succession plans since our top leaders are starting to get old. I don't know what that will look like, and I know that will be hard transition.

It shouldn't be hard at all! If they've been discipling guys, they should already have a laundry list of men who are capable and qualified to take over.

Think about it: Jesus started a movement and left it, in everyone else's eyes, extremely prematurely. But he had no concerns because he had a succession plan in his 12. Who are your pastor's congregation leader's 12? If he has them, they are his succession plan. If he's struggling to develop a succession plan, it's because he hasn't been discipling people properly yet.

I hope we can uphold the model of 2 Tim 2:1-2, and continue discipling people down to the 4th generation.

... and beyond until ALL NATIONS are part of the generational lineage. The book of Numbers didn't stop recording the genealogies after 4 generations. It kept going.

A picture of a relationally solid church community

1 upvotes · 12 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

For singles houses, there's often an older man/woman who serves as the house manager

Ah, crap. And you had me going for a second. Then it became overly structured and rules-driven yet again.

Husband and wife just each do what needs to be done around the house.

Right. But why? And according to whose standards? Suppose it's been 4 days since the floor was last vacuumed. Husband thinks it needs to be done once every 2 weeks, wife thinks it needs to be done every 3 days. How do you deal with that?

Traditionally, the wife does it, but resents her husband for being a slob because he's not an ultra-clean freak like her. Then he resents her for resenting him because she can't relax for 5 minutes like he can. So, he starts feeling pressured to start meeting her cleanliness standards so he doesn't get the cold shoulder - and when company's over he puts on a nice face, but behind the scenes he's harboring bitterness at the fact that he feels this internal (sometimes even self-created) pressure to maintain his wife's standards. That's the norm.

It is human nature, you are right. Which is why we must resist it.

I don't follow. Not every aspect of human nature is sin that needs to be resisted. I know some of the other mods and I have done some writing here that hypergamy is something God designed into women originally, but was merely perverted by the fall the same way every other healthy inclination was. The idea isn't to resist hypergamy or "repent and ask for forgiveness" any more than you would resist having sex with your wife or ask for forgiveness afterward. As I say, it's something you make work for you rather than allowing it to be expressed in sinful ways.

I mentioned in the original post that long distance relationships usually have couples fly to meet once a month, generally for the whole day. The reason it's for the whole day is so they can get a more well-rounded picture of each other, to see how the other person handles life situations beyond a well-prepared 2 hour date.

That way, they can see how they'll react to unexpected changes in the plan, handling transitions, their driving/road rage, weather issues, improvising, etc.

Wow. A whole day, huh! Impressive amount of time to really figure out what it's like being around someone else. At the rate of once a month, that's a whole 12 days together in a year! You'll surely know everything there is to know about a person in no time at all. And I'm totally sure that these people are being completely themselves and willing to express things like road rage rather than being on their best behavior during their one shot to impress.

Not even a weekend? Most people in that one-day get-together are going to try to "make the most of the short time we have together" that it creates an artificial closeness and enhances the halo effect during that time. I recommend reading more on LDRs on any of the red pill forums for more information on why they're not viable options. And I say that as someone who was in an "LDR" for the first year of knowing my now-wife. I'm not ignorant of them. I'm just not blinded by the blue pill ideologies surrounding the concept anymore either.

I'm also guessing that if these people really like each other it's not the congregation's mandate: "Thou shalt fly to meet each other once a month." These people should be struggling to stay apart for that long on their own! You make it sound so much like your congregation is full of these wise elders who have laid out extremely detailed plans on how everything should work, but a lot of what I imagine are the "cultural" rather than "rule-driven" aspects of this are really just the product of typical human nature within the hyper-purity context.

I thought the red pill mentioned in this sub however, was just what the Bible taught as inerrant truth

There's a difference between "biblically sound" and "red pill" when it comes to Christianity. The red pill beliefs we profess here are virtually entirely drawn from Scripture. There are other prescriptive concepts that are taught in the secular circles which go against Scripture (like banging multiple women outside of marriage) that we do not prescribe. As Rollo notes, the red pill is descriptive of a culture, not prescriptive - it's the truth of it, not what you do with it.

Things like hypergamy, fitness tests, amused mastery, etc. - these (and many more) are all concepts directly found in Scripture. They are just rarely preached on as such because ~~pastors~~ congregation leaders view Scripture through the feminized lens of the modern age rather than trying to understand how someone 2,000 years ago would have interpreted the passage in a more patriarchal, anti-feminist culture - they being the original audience the author was writing to.

I do believe a congregation can be red pill. I just don't believe any of them are, even if the lead ~~paster~~ congregational ... leader happens to be red pill. The reason is that the modern culture would reject it so thoroughly that it would crumble before it got off the ground.

The red pill lingo is just language developed to describe certain phenomena, but it itself is not necessarily directly from the Bible

No, these phenomena are often found in Scripture. There are, admittedly, certain concepts that the red pill discusses that we don't talk about much here that aren't as clear in Scripture - like the existence of the "alpha widow." When's the last time you saw a post on that in RPC? Probably never - because the Bible doesn't give us examples of this. And how could it? In the biblical patriarchal societies there would be little foundation for women to have the type of entitlement to become an alpha widow in the first place.

But those situations don't arise often.

the Bible (which I thought was the "true red pill" of this sub)

The Bible is the source of all truth, and the final authority on matters of conflict. It is not itself a "red pill" document in the sense that its aim is much larger than the red pill. It's like saying the declaration of independence is a "red pill document" because it has a lot to say about declaring each person to have the right to operate out of their own internal point of origin (i.e. frame) - but we all know it literally had nothing to do with the red pill as we know it today, and much of its content is entirely distinct.

This is why Rollo and I often distinguish that the red pill is not merely "truth" - it is specifically the "truth about intergender sexual dynamics." The creator of those dynamics is going to have a lot to say on the subject, hence the Bible being a valuable resource. But it's not the only source - it's merely the only definitively reliable source.

Yet nobody will read the Bible and say, "Well, it didn't say $2+2=4$, so we better stop believing that." There are some things that observational reality shows us is true. If I put two oranges next to two other oranges, I can observe that I now have 4 oranges, not 3 or 5. I can observe that alpha widows do exist. We can collectively observe patterns in their life experiences that brought about their existence. These observational realities are no less true. And they are equally descriptive of intergender sexual dynamics - and thus can be equally a part of "the true red pill" insofar as we embrace them as true, just as we embrace $2+2=4$ as true.

Yet I also have at least one post and many comments on the knowledge hierarchy. The order is theological truth > observational/scientific truth > philosophical/logical truth. The secular red pill is based widely on observational/scientific truth (in the form of praxeology) with a little philosophy mixed in. RPC is based primarily on theological truth with a little bit of the others mixed in where theology may be silent - and only to the degree to which there is no conflicting theology.

But how much authority and control is too much authority and control is honestly a very culturally contextual question

That's a good point. To that, I'd answer that it depends less on the culture and more on whether or not the degree of control is hindering internal transformation by mandating behavioral modification. I have a post on that as well.

A picture of a relationally solid church community

1 upvotes · 11 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Okay, now go back and re-read what you just wrote here. You have recognized the first step: that people developed an unhealthy codependence on the original congregational structure.

The second step, then, is that they need to have the goal of starting a new structure in order to get their spiritual life back on track.

One of the things I write about in my book is the difference between a non-Christian -> convert -> disciple -> discipler -> leader.

- The non-Christian doesn't have Jesus.
- The convert will fall away or never grow if left to himself.
- The disciple could be thrown in the middle of Muslimtown and still maintain his faith, though he won't ever produce for Jesus.
- The discipler could be thrown in the middle of Muslimtown and not only maintain his faith, but also reproduce it in others.
- The leader wouldn't just reproduce his faith in others, but would also be organizing the spiritual reproducers around him (which, in the Muslimtown example, would be the people he himself brought to Christ and disciplined) in a common effort to get the Gospel to the entire country and beyond.

Yes, it's ideal when people grow through a fellowship, and that fellowship can be expressed through a congregational structure. But what you're describing are people who are dependent on either the original congregational structure or their commitment to a new congregational structure they're planting in order to keep their faith active.

Instead of supporting a pastor of a new plant by being one of the founding attendees, how would these people fare if they were thrown into the middle of Muslimtown, where being a Christian meant death? Would they still follow, or let it fade away? Would they continue to share the Gospel with those around them? Would they see those around them bearing fruit with even more? Would they be starting congregations on their own from scratch, or keep it private to themselves and maybe a friend or two?

These are the types of thought experiments that examine the character of a person's faith. To be clear: I'm making no accusations. I'm simply suggesting that the answers aren't as easy as, "Once they join another plant they take their faith seriously again."

A picture of a relationally solid church community

1 upvotes · 11 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I've seen how plenty of people interact with their kids

Because they're discipling you and intentionally inviting you to watch that interaction? Or as a passive observe? Huge difference.

I've even literally lived with my leaders before and seen how they live

That's more like it. But when you say "my leaders" do you mean "I stayed with the pastor for a while because reasons made it a good idea at the time" or do you mean: "The pastor was discipling me and asked me to live with him for a time so he could intentionally and consciously show me what his life looks like in practice"? In most cases, I see the former, rarely ever the latter.

I didn't mention these things though since the focus on my post was specifically about relationships in the romantic context, since this is RPChristians.

Ah, then you are misunderstanding RPChristians, my friend. If you've read much of anything I've written, you'll note that above and beyond relationship advice, I push and will continue pushing the call to make disciples the way Jesus and the apostles modeled for us. If we can get this right, the relationship issues fall in line - most notably because that relationship IS the model for marriages as well (Christ-Church parallel with husband-wife).

How discipleship is implemented in the congregation tells me far more about what they believe about marriage and relationships than the technicalities of whether or not you can flirt with someone or if your wife is on a text chain with a client of the opposite gender, which would break attorney-client privilege if you're an attorney (like me).

What kind of evidence are you looking for that discipleship is happening? I think the fact that a lot of people in our church progress from non Christian to Christian to members of the church to team members to being willing to quit their job and move to help start a church somewhere else in a different state as evidence

From everything you've described here, it sounds like you're closer than your previous descriptions would have indicated. Maybe there's a semantic issue that your congregation may be actually making disciples without realizing it, whereas the contexts they use the phrase "do discipleship" for are those which actually have relatively little to do with biblical discipleship. I'd prefer to give you the benefit of the doubt on this one.

But what I'd really be looking for is a multi-generational familial structure that would look something like

"Abraham began Isaach, who began Jacob, who begat Levi, Benjamin, Judah, etc., who each begat others," and so on.

The majority of congregations that try to implement a biblical model of discipleship get stopped up in the first or second generation.

1 - The first generation is a stopper because in many cases the leadership are the only ones actually doing the discipling. They're not training the disciples to make more disciples. So, the person being disciplined eventually walks away thinking, "Great, I'm a more knowledgeable, mature believer. I'm not capable of reading my Bible and praying on my own without oversight," and that's it.

2 - The second generation is when the leadership is able to coach the person he's discipling on how to begin discipling someone else. Instead of "I'm more mature now," he walks away thinking, "I should go do with someone else what my discipler just did with me," and he takes personal ownership of the vision so that the leadership of the congregation is not expected to make all the disciples - rather, EVERY person in the congregation is eventually intended to be incorporated into the vision. But the 2nd generation barrier (the most common one) arises when THAT person makes a disciple, yet fails to instill the vision of discipler-making (notice I don't say disciple-making) into the person he disciplines, so his disciple (the 2nd generation man) walks away thinking, "Great, I'm more mature now," but with no imperative to disciple anyone else.

I know some congregations that actually pass the second generation barrier, but it's extremely rare. I can say in my city that there are only 2 congregations that have done it and at least 250 that have tried and failed (not to mention the thousands I'm ignorant of altogether).

Also, when you say that people "help start a church in a different state," I often interpret this as them attending and maybe leading a ministry team (parking, children's ministry, greeting, etc.) or a small group, but not actually taking ownership of the discipler-making process within the congregation. It's still a centralized structure meant to bring people into the building as the operative goal. Maybe I'm wrong about this - and I'm sure you can come up with anecdotal examples of certain individuals who haven't functioned this way, as every congregation can do. We all have our super-stars who actually get it. But is everything functioning properly on the whole or is it still a centralized "come hang out with us" ideology?

Not sure what you're seeing as a major failure.

Blue pill purity culture among the mainstream. It was a huge flop. Your congregation seems to be saying: "Well, it's because they weren't being pure ENOUGH!"

I think a tree should be judged by its fruit, no? Divorce rates, number of committed Christians, salvation decisions per year, tithing amounts, and just general satisfaction and joy that I see on people's faces seem to indicate at least something is working well.

I've written an incredible amount on the "judge a tree by its fruit" concept. It's probably the thing I discuss most here. I'm fully persuaded that the "fruit" is tied to those who are following Jesus today because of our life and effort.

- Divorce rates: I'm still calling BS on this one, but "not divorcing" isn't the same as making disciples
- Number of committed Christians: Committed to what? I'm hearing lots about commitment to the congregational structure and the community. You might say "committed to Christ" - but what does that even mean? Lots of people are committed in the sense that they won't abandon Jesus because they don't want to go to hell, but that's hardly indicative of anything. Committed to the mission of Christ? Now we're getting closer. Christ commanded us to make disciples. How many people in any of these congregations can actively identify at least 1 person and say, "I am discipling <Bob>," and that relationship he has with <Bob> actually mirrors the relationship Jesus had with his 12?

- Salvation decisions per year: I love Dawson Trotman's talk, "Born to reproduce." He says, "An Armenian boy came into my office one day and told me about all the souls he had won ... and had the list to prove it. Is said, 'Well, what is this one doing?' He said, 'That one isn't doing so good. He is backslidden.' 'What about this one?' We went all down the list and there was not one living a victorious life." This is all too often the answer. /u/praxology and I had a good talk about this recently. Congregations are often more interested in getting people to say "the prayer" in an emotional moment than they are in parenting that person after they do. The majority of these "emotional moment prayers" never actually result in conversion. But they do give people a false sense of hope. Someday they'll stand before God and when he's turning them away they'll say, "But /u/Citadel-3 told me if I said these words in a prayer you'd let me in." Imagine God slowly turning his head to look at you. Yes, I'm sure some people in your congregation are disciplined after saying "the prayer" - but I'm skeptical to believe that it's the majority/norm. I'm more interested in how many of these "salvation decisions per year" are making disciples of their own next year. That's the stat I want to hear. Because if they're not, they're a fruitless vine - the one Jesus says in John 15 will be cut off rather than pruned.
- Tithing amounts: Don't even get me started on this one, haha!
- Satisfaction and joy on people's faces: You don't think attendees at Joel Osteen's congregation have this on Sunday mornings? I promise they do. I know people who have seen it and reported on it. It tells me nothing of their fruit.

Matthew 7 is key here. You appropriately reference the fruit, but seem to indicate things as the fruit that Jesus would seem to dismiss in the very next passage, where he talks about those who are preaching, prophesying, performing miracles, etc. - and yet will be cast away.

A picture of a relationally solid church community

1 upvotes · 11 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

there's a lot of context and nuance that's probably being lost

I thought about that, and am still hopeful that this is the case with a lot of what you've written! :) That said, I do believe there are some things that are so blatantly unscriptural and blue pill'd that I'm not sure how "nuance" could explain them away.

All I can say is that I have not lived alone for many years, and have lived with other church members (often times with 10+ people) sharing a single apartment or house, and so have seen the way they live.

This is more encouraging in light of a discipleship framework. Now you're talking life-on-life. The only thing it's lacking is intentionality within an authoritative framework. It sounds like they pair up peers to peers rather than the mature with the young when it comes to living together like this. If you make that switch and add an imperative on the mature one to disciple the younger, then we're much closer to what Jesus modeled.

The living arrangements also sound a lot like an extension of the college environment, which could explain why the culture you're describing has a greater feel of commitment to it - at least among the singles. Living in the dorms at college, there's a much greater sense of community than we get living in isolated family units in the suburbs. Instead of 5 minutes walking, you've got to hop in a car, and there's often a different expectation of the presentation of one's living space that affects things. There's a lot that makes it different. But this type of communal living among the singles certainly explains a lot and, no doubt, is a benefit to your community. I'm still quite skeptical about those who are married with kids who aren't in this communal lifestyle.

What kind of objective evidence would satisfy you?

It doesn't matter because your obligation isn't to convince me. If it works for you, it works for you. The only real hurdle here is that some of the teachings that are presented are contrary to what we teach here, and that's why I had to give a cautionary to the post.

For example, flirting is discouraged to the extent that it's distracting for people who are here to study God's Word. If people are not distracted from the goal, which is evangelism, then flirting would be okay. But if it does, you will be asked to stop.

That's also true for most every congregation I've ever attended. But you also didn't make that dichotomy clear in your original post. The tone you originally gave seemed to cave to the hyper-purity culture that is, thankfully, in the minority among congregations now. You're just closer to hyper-purity than the standard "I won't ask if you won't tell me" culture we have swung to in the majority of churchianity today - which is the danger on the opposite end. If you have to err one way, I'd prefer erring on the side of purity for younger believers and going non-communicado for the more mature.

I'm not sure what's meant here by sniper mentality versus shotgun approach

Read the "Shotgun Logic" section: <https://therationalmale.com/2011/08/19/plate-theory-2/>

The danger of the sniper approach is that it precludes a man from ever developing natural abundance, which causes him to become codependent on his singular woman as his primary and only hope for intimacy. This is unattractive and makes his woman withdraw from intimacy as soon as other attraction-producing stimuli (most commonly NRE) are gone, creating a negative feedback loop that results in the destruction of marriages.

I'm not sure what else you can tell husbands. Don't help their wives??

That's exactly what you tell them! You don't help her. She helps you. The problem is that too many men are used to deferring their entire domain to their wife, at which point she's incapable of managing it, so she asks for help and rarely gets it. The advice to "help your wife" perpetuates the problem by allowing the woman to keep the domain and suggesting the man simply have more of the responsibility with less of the privilege. The reality is that it's his domain, which includes all the privileges that come with it, as well as the responsibility - and she is there to help meet those responsibilities if she wants to continue enjoying the privileges of the household he runs. I just wrote a post on this today.

I think it's just to avoid people comparing their current boyfriend/girlfriend with another potential option, if whomever they're currently dating would have been a perfectly fine and happy marriage

YIKES! Seriously? First, how do you know it "would have been a perfectly fine and happy marriage" without a crystal ball to look 50+ years into the future? Second, hypergamy is real and will rear its head no matter how much you try to stifle it. At some point the wife WILL get the hots for another man. She WILL start comparing her husband to him. This is human nature. I just wrote a post on it last week. By not allowing her to see if there's a better option, you're essentially convincing people to settle with the person in-hand, always wondering if it really was a good choice or not. This is totally absurd. I can say first-hand that my wife experienced this and on much less than what your congregation pushes, and it almost tore us apart.

I did not say long distance relationships are encouraged. I said they are common.

Semantics. They're not opposing them either, or acknowledging the practical limitations. Or is there another rule you forgot to mention where couples have to be in close-distance relationships for at least a year after being long-distance before they're allowed to marry, so they have a chance to actually get to know the other and experience a more natural relational context?

I think you yourself married young at 24, correct? That would definitely be young for the secular world.

Right, and I've also commented that it was an unwise choice for me to have done that.

This goes both ways, not just for men

I assumed that, but it doesn't change the point that you're still virtually insuring that dread is never ever a possible viable option in any relationship. Good luck with that.

I think the older people and the top leads are [red pill]

When was the last time they preached on hypergamy or passing fitness tests or plate theory? If they are preaching on these things, then I'm completely wrong about this place and I'd be interested to learn more. If they're not, they're not "red pill."

I've written posts before (or maybe just comments, I can't remember) on why no congregation is "red pill." Too many people assume that "red pill" is synonymous with "teaches headship" - and even that doesn't seem to be taught in this congregation. Embrace the fact that there are going to be blue pill aspects to every congregation and you can work toward giving them a more biblical understanding. Otherwise you're going to end up falling into the churchianity mentality of "I love my congregation, so I'm going to believe everything they tell me." Don't be that guy. Be the Acts 17 Berean. I encourage that even of the things you learn here!

Spiritual Orphanages and MGTOW

1 upvotes · 11 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Notice the language - "The Church in/at" implies, "those within the Church who are at this city." Paul expresses this sentiment more clearly in Philippians 1:1 - "To all God's holy people in Christ Jesus at Philippi." I believe this is what the apostles meant in all their letters when they say "the church at ..." - not that they're validating congregational structures (which, for the most part, didn't even exist in those cities at the time), but the fact that God's Kingdom included people in those cities.

For reference, the first historical example we see of a congregation didn't arise until the 200s AD. Before then, the Church (proper) was meeting individually or in people's homes as a network, not a centralized unit. Brian Sanders' Underground Church is a great example of a decentralized means of connecting believers. Rather than pulling people in to a centralized hub, he's sending them out into communities as the primary function of his structure, and the only semblance of a centralized structure exists primarily to build up the people who will be going out into the world, as the Church was always designed to do.

I just saw this comment I'd started writing last week. Apparently I never finished it, but I'll send what I had anyway.

Update: Looking for guidance

1 upvotes · 11 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I know many wonderful Christian therapists and I don't know a single person who had regretted going to therapy

Christian therapists are extremely rare. Secular therapists who happen to be Christian in their private lives and want to make a dime off a Christian client-base and are willing to quote a Bible verse every now and then (and therefore fraudulently call themselves "Christian therapists") are the norm.

People walk away from "therapy" happy because anger subsides naturally over time. Many of the people who need marriage counseling are repeat clients. They aren't finding permanent solutions. They find placating solutions. By the time they meet with the therapist a time or two, the issue has substantially died down and the therapist gets all the credit when in reality "time heals all wounds" is what's going on.

Therapists (not just "even" - but ESPECIALLY the Christian variety) are blue pillers because they give blue pill advice. Through my career I have known more marriage counselors, therapists, social workers, psychologists, psychiatrists, etc. than I know what to do with. I've interviewed them carefully - either on the witness stand or because I vet people before entrusting my clients to them. They all rely on secular education and they all completely misunderstand intergender relational dynamics. Typical advice is "do more chores for her and she'll want to have sex with you more" - and guys hang their hat on this to get more duty sex rather than desirous sex. The reality is you can't negotiate desire. Or they'll be advised, "learn to communicate better and she will love you for who you are," when the reality is that he's a fat slob who no woman would want to have sex with, so he gets pity sex that's generally unfulfilling. But people don't know that "better" even exists at all, so they take the scraps the marriage counselor leads them to (which in most cases would have evolved naturally even without the counseling) and start praising Jesus for the fifth-tier nonsense they end up with.

it certainly can help you and your partner find the way in which you both communicate best and can help both parties to feel heard and understood

Any middle-man can do this. Grab a random person off the street and they're capable of mediating that type of conversation. That takes no special degree, and there's nothing inherently biblical about it.

But the real point is that the emphasis is still on communication as the "life blood of marriage," as so many people often say. It's not. And any model that values communication over, for example, attraction - that's a model that's not trustworthy for long-term results.

Maybe therapy won't fix 100% of your problems, but maybe fix 1 or 2 or 50 and you and your partner will be in a healthier place than when you started

Right. And therapy very well may fix 1 or 2 problems. But it does so by instilling false and damaging frameworks for how marriages should operate, thereby patching 2-3 nicks in the wall by tearing down another, leaving the house in worse condition than it started. People see those two holes get fixed and aren't facing the torn down wall yet, so until they actually turn around and see the damage done, they feel satisfied with those nicks in the paint being covered up.

Bottom line: with how many marriage counselors there are in the world and how many people use them, the fact that divorce rates are still skyrocketing is an EXTREMELY clear testament that marriage counseling, on the whole, is not working and is likely doing more harm than good.

Spiritual Orphanages and MGTOW

1 upvotes · 6 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with the premise of what you're saying, but not the practice of it.

We're adopted as sons! And we're being built into God's household!

Right, except the household is being built. Jesus is preparing the place for us. It doesn't exist here on earth and we're not living there yet.

First of all, these converts are not abandoned by their heavenly father.

Agreed. But it also has the practical effect of a distance relationship. Jesus said he was going away to prepare a place for us, and we have the Spirit he left for us instead. I also agree with Jesus that the Spirit is better for us than his physical presence. But the reality is that commissioning a new believer to be raised by the Spirit without the Church fulfilling its obligation in mothering Christ's children with close to 100% consistency will result in the person falling away. The statistics on new converts who never fellowship with other believers are extremely clear on this. They don't maintain the faith.

For those who do plug into congregations, instead of parenting, they get classes and mass teachings. The practical effect is: "We're a mom who doesn't want to invest in you, so take what you get and if you want more, go let your dad raise you." If we don't want to call them "spiritual orphanages," that's the closest we could call it.

Of course, the practical effect is that such a mother - even if an actual mother and not an orphanage - is still doing the exact same things an orphanage would do, and possibly even less. Even in orphanages we see lots of one-on-one time between the children with their care-givers. This simply doesn't happen in most congregations.

Can the evangelist say to the teacher, "I don't need you?" No. And of course we can also cross-train. But maybe someone's role really is to evangelize and leave the discipleship to others.

I've heard this argument a million times. It's not a very good one. It would make sense if discipleship were a specific gift or role given to some people in the body of Christ. But notice that "disciple-making" is not in the Ephesians 4 list of roles within the Church, nor is it listed among any of the spiritual gifts. There's a reason for that, which is as I often say: your function and gifting within the Church are the context within which you make disciples, not a replacement for your obligation to make disciples.

Even then, did Jesus say at the Great Commission, "Go, therefore, only you who are given the spiritual gift of making disciples and make disciples"? Of course not. The great commission was given to all and compelled to all. The very wording of the commission makes this clear:

- The 12 commanded to make disciples of all nations. That means every person in the world is part of the mission field - not just those gifted at discipler-making.
- They were also commanded to teach those disciples to obey all the commands.
- That includes teaching them to obey the command to make disciples, meaning everyone in the mission field is to be trained in how to fulfill the command to make disciples of all nations - not just the people "gifted" at it.
- It also includes the command to teach others to obey every command, so you also have to teach them how to obey the command to teach others how to obey the command to make disciples ... and so on.

Discipleship is the mission for all. Our roles and giftings within the Church are the context in which we fulfill it. An evangelist will make disciples of the people he converts. A pastor will disciple those within his flock. A teacher will choose from among his students people to disciple.

And the gifts play in uniquely as well. The generous should disciple those in need of their generosity - not merely giving, then walking away. The merciful should disciple those who are suffering, not merely consoling them and leaving. The hospitable should disciple those invited into their home, rather than forgetting them the moment they leave.

Paul does call himself the Corinthians' spiritual father, but he doesn't mind handing over their tutelage to someone else such as Timothy Right, as he does with the Philippians as well. But this confirms what I'm talking about. Paul was functioning as a patriarch or forefather over all those who would believe through his ministry. Timothy functioned as a child to Paul (Philippians 2:22) and was sent to function as a spiritual parent to the Philippians (v. 23) - and Paul also disciplined others while he was at Philippi, and gave them authority to function as spiritual parents, modeling a Christ-like life to the rest of the believers at Philippi (3:17).

But Paul was called to travel and spread the Gospel through preaching and couldn't stay still in just one place, nor could he bring throngs of churches with him from all the places he visited

Correct, which is why he disciplined people at the places he went so that there were people local to each body who could function as spiritual parents - and when this was found lacking, he would send someone like Timothy who he knew would set them back on track.

The congregational structure today is abandoned this concept altogether. Nobody is being sent to us to get us back on track - and when something appears to be fulfilling this purpose, it has very little to do with living and more to do with theological discrepancy that needs sorted out - "Why are you teaching that?" kinds of questions.

I think about Apollos in Ephesus in Acts 18. He was zealous for Christ but only knew the baptism of John. Someone had evangelized him, but Aquila and Priscilla took him under their wing and filled in what he hadn't learned yet. He then went on to preach to others including the Corinthians.

Right, John was killed, so Aquila and Priscilla adopted him, taking on the parental role. I don't imagine the story is suggesting their version of "fill him in" was "we don't have time for you, personally, but you can come once a week to sing some songs and hear an hour and a half lesson, and maybe talk to others throughout the week if you feel like it."

Anyways, your main point seems to be to admonish people to evangelize and disciple more, and carry through on the roles they have, and at that level I completely agree.

Correct - and I'm glad we see eye to eye on this.

But the Church, an orphanage? No.

I want to be clear on this: I never said The Church is a spiritual orphanage. I wrote: "Congregational structures collect spiritual orphans, becoming spiritual orphanages." The congregational structure is not The Church. There is no "my church" or "your church," as those are only references to the congregational units and not The Church, proper. The congregational structures are a tool The Church has utilized - and a very useful one! I encourage everyone to make good use of the structure, once recognizing it's actual beneficial function. But the fact that COVID has shut down congregational structures, and yet The Church still exists is a testament to this distinction.

The only verse I have trouble interpreting within this framework is where Jesus says, "For where large groups of people gather in a building in my name, there am I in that building with them."

I gather that the thrust of your comment is this:

1. We are not orphans if we have a father. I agree. We are not technically orphans. But the way the modern congregational structure raises spiritual children is far more akin to an orphanage than being raised by a mother. That's my point.
2. It's commonplace throughout Scripture for the evangelist and discipler to be different people rather than the same person. I also agree on this. While the structure itself makes more sense to have everyone parent their own spiritual children, there is a practical difficulty to this when one is so successful an evangelist that they cannot parent all of those who are born again through them - and that's a problem I'd gladly welcome of anyone, and I will happily discuss the issue with just such a person, as with Paul. As for the parallel, I will note that, as a matter of technicality, The Church is the bride of Christ and responsible for spiritually parenting those who are born again through them, so the actual person who plants or waters isn't extremely vital (though wise and convenient if the same). My point is more that congregational units aren't even spiritually parenting at all. They have abandoned any notions of parentage and followed more of a mass-produced classroom setting. This is addressed heavily in my walk-and-talk conversations with u/r_horizon, /u/paexology, and /u/TheChristianAlpha. Those have been recorded and likely start being posted next week.

3. The Church is not a spiritual orphanage. I agree. The congregational units we confuse for The Church are what function as spiritual orphanages. Members of The Church attend these congregational structures (though not exclusively - there are a lot of people outside The Church who also attend, whether they realize they're out or not), which is why they are often confused for The Church itself.

When you have "feeeeeelz" for someone else

1 upvotes · 4 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I guess what strikes me with this movie is this idea that you fell out of something good that you know you won't get back Right - another commonality with La La Land.

a relationship that made you happy that is something to not take for granted

True. Key word there, though: made. Past tense. What happens when a relationship made you happen, but doesn't make you happy anymore? That's what happens. The relationship, in this case, isn't what you take for granted. It's the happiness you had in the beginning.

Note the title of the movie: The Last Five Years. They didn't even make it 5 years before losing their happiness! They basically got through NRE and gave up. If that's the model for the relationship marketplace (as compared with the SMP), it's a pretty crappy one - yet as equally blue pill as those who misunderstand the sexual dynamics. The two overlap substantially, though not in every way.

Hell could be a little bit like this

On that, I completely agree.

And thanks for the despair correction, i'm getting there with english

Oh, despair was certainly the right word for Anna Kendrick's character in The Last Five Years. I was saying that La La Land had a similarly powerful ending, but was more hopeful in the way that it concludes, despite the permanent nature of the loss.

Who should you listen to on RPChristians?

1 upvotes · 4 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Huh ... I could have sworn yours always showed up blue for me.

Who should you listen to on RPChristians?

1 upvotes · 4 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right. I get things wrong. I always encourage people to challenge everything they read against Scripture - including the things I write. As I've alluded to before and in the podcast, if I were doing things again today, there are significant chunks of even the sidebar material that I'd re-write. If anyone finds anything that needs correction or updating, just let me know and we'll talk about it.

In this, there's a delicate balance between TEACHING and NOTE-SHARING. RP claims, primarily, to be the latter. But when expositing Scripture, it often takes the form of the former. Even I can't keep straight sometimes when I'm teaching or passing along an experiential note - though the difference is definitively found in the Scriptural foundation between the two.

I've also acknowledged that there have been times when I've intentionally posted partially complete information, knowing I didn't have the whole picture correct, relying on Cunningham's Law to get the content where it needs to be.

So, again: don't just take my word for something. Use your own brains every now and then ;)

The Origins of the Ekklesia ("Church")

1 upvotes · 3 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Gotcha. While scripture doesn't directly address the issue, it's a fascinating thought that could lead to some interesting results.

The Origins of the Ekklesia ("Church")

1 upvotes · 3 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

What would this do on a national spectrum?

This is one of the structural aspects I do, personally, reject. The apostles are clear that they had the right to demand compensation through the Gospel - though they often refused to do so if it would compromise their ministry, contrary to many congregations' positions today. More to the point, there's plenty of precedent that even the local gatherings required some sort of funding - though certainly not to the degree we see it today.

I don't believe people should actually be paid to attend gatherings of the Ekklesia. But I do agree that the ekklesia, on the whole, should be internally financially self-sufficient and outward-flowing, rather than inward-taking. If you haven't yet, Underground Church addresses this a lot more.

I never understood why the Church doesn't come together as the full body and figure out how to lay seige on the hearts of their community

Because local congregations are more interested in growing their brand than they are in growing God's Kingdom. To them it's more about getting PEOPLE IN the door than getting CHRIST'S NAME OUT the door.

there were suddenly 120 people gathered in front of a super market? THAT would be interesting. What kind of attention would that draw?

Underground Church talks about this too. They have a network of small house-congregations that are what I'd call their koinonia groups, but when they meet corporately, because they don't put a mega-building in their budget, their 10k+ people often find places outdoors to congregate, and it's done at random intervals when the time is right, not weekly.

To be clear: the book fascinates me. I don't agree with everything in it, though. It's just one person starting to become woke to a lot of the ideas we discuss.

The Origins of the Ekklesia ("Church")

1 upvotes · 2 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Gotcha. Your position on wanting to have perfect theology is supported by such passages as:

- when Jesus cast the legion of demons out of the man by the decapolis and told him, "Now study the Scriptures and learn everything about them before you tell anyone what happened to you.

Or ...

- when Jesus healed a blind man, he said, "Make sure you understand exactly what happened and how it happened any why before you talk to anyone about this." And when the pharisees questioned him he said to them, "Sorry, I have to study more before I can testify about what Jesus did for me."

Or ...

- when the woman at the well wanted to tell everyone she know about her conversation with Jesus, but he stopped her and rebuked her for wanting to speak of such things without having perfect theology about them first.

I think you're onto something here ;)

OYS - Where Progress is Made (07/29/20)

1 upvotes · 2 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right. This all makes perfect sense to me and I agree. The only place where I might clarify is that I've seen a distinction between two camps of "full preterists":

- (1) those who believe Jesus returned and the 1,000 years are over, yet the New Earth/New Jerusalem are still yet to come (maybe you'd call this "partial, yet mostly full"), and
- (2) those who believe this world we're living today actually is heaven, and being sanctified to its described state in Scripture, thus literally every single thing is already fulfilled (which I've occasionally heard referred to as hyper-preterism).

When I talk about "full preterism" as a direction I might lean at times, I'm only referring to the first of those two options - and even that is iffy.

The Origins of the Ekklesia ("Church")

1 upvotes · 2 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

My concern about the correct interpretation, including mine (I really want to nail it right and I fear otherwise) is not of atheistic or worldly origin; I really want to do exactly what God wants.

Name the last 5 people you've discipled and the last 5 you've brought to Christ and when each of them was.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (07/29/20)

1 upvotes · 2 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I was under the impression you did believe or push full preterism

No. I'm undecided on the issue. I've noted in the past that I lean in that direction, but only to the degree that I admit it's a possibility and would explain a lot. I believe that partial preterists and futurists are less logical in their approach and that the evidence for full preterism resolves the logical conflicts about the return of Christ and its timing, which cause Christians to come under a great deal of scrutiny that's wiped away if we give credence to the texts that imply it may have already occurred. That said, this means that the partial preterists (as I actually place myself in) and the futurists are relying more on faith than on logic, and that's generally a safe place to be for a believer.

A position I don't think has enough evidence to support

Or, in the reverse, there's absolutely no evidence to support futurism. It's a belief structure based exclusively on faith because you can't prove something that hasn't happened yet - you can only believe that it will.

At most, a futurist's evidence is proof by omission, which means demonstrating that what allegedly already occurred has, by some evidence, been proven not to have occurred. But even this is hollow and weak. It means explaining away evidence rather than providing actual evidence. In the battle between evidence and no-evidence, at least from a rote logical perspective, evidence usually wins out.

But again: logic isn't necessarily the default conclusion-source for a system of faith, so at least in Christianity there's every reason for those suspicious of the historical record to insist on faith in futurism than the admittedly limited sources relied upon by full preterists (which I empathize with and acknowledge as possibly valid, but do not commit to on my own).

A number of versions of preterism have enough objective evidence however that I believe it could be true.

And even if you didn't, it still wouldn't matter much. This is, ultimately, a disputable matter that has relatively little significance other than shutting up the crazies who can't stop false-prophecy that Bill Gates is ushering in the apocalypse.

Tag: /u/DeChef2

Also: /u/OsmiumZulu - Because I know you have a similar leaning as I do and I'd be interested in seeing your thoughts on the discussion here sometime.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (07/29/20)

1 upvotes · 2 August 2020 · /r/RPChristians

To be clear, I'm not intentionally a preterist evangelist. I don't care one bit if anyone wants to be a preterist or a futurist. It doesn't matter nearly as much as it is interesting to think about. That's all. I wouldn't urge anyone to spend more time on the issue than is warranted - which is none at all if you haven't mastered the art of raising up spiritual children first already.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (07/29/20)

1 upvotes · 31 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

/u/Torn4_025 wrote:

God is not the author of confusion

I've heard this phrase chanted many times regarding revelation, and I used to buy into that belief. And while it sounds like a feel-good notion, it's not a reliable metric for understanding God's communications to man. 1 Cor. 14:33 is where the phrase comes from, but it's in the context of explaining orderliness in worship and part of a command not to cause disruptions and instability. The word is akatastasia, which is defined as "instability" and most commonly translated as disturbance, upheaval, revolution, political/moral anarchy. This makes sense in the context of the verse, as it's talking about not having multiple people speaking in tongues at a time, or multiple prophets prophesying simultaneously; rather, it should be done one at a time - because God is not a God of anarchy or disorder in how he wants his people organized.

Now, having given the context for why 1 Cor. 14:33 doesn't mean God will never say anything confusing, consider all the times God DOES intentionally do and say confusing things with the express purpose and knowledge that it would be confusing and defy logic/common sense. I'll limit myself to 5 examples.

- When Daniel was given visions, there are numerous times where it says things like, "I was appalled by the vision; it was beyond understanding" - and that was even AFTER Gabriel told him what the vision meant! Gabriel didn't give a similar explanation of Revelation, the visions are of substantially similar content, so why would we assume God meant for Revelation to be any less confusing? I mean ... this is DANIEL we're talking about - the guy known throughout all of the Bible for being able to interpret dreams and visions (Joseph may be the other one to fit that mold).
- In Mark 4:11-12 Jesus explains that he speaks in parables because he did not want those outside the Kingdom of God to understand what he was saying. That is, he intentionally spoke in a confusing manner that precluded some people from following along. The thought was that the disciples would get it, but they didn't, so he proceeds to explain himself, realizing that his parable was too confusing even for them without further explanation.
- 1 Cor. 1:27 talks about how God uses the foolish things of the world to confound the wise.
- Isaiah 55:8-9 talks about how God's ways and level of thinking is beyond our ways and level of thinking.
- Isaiah 19:13-14 talks about how the princes of Zoan and Memphis became fools and were deceived, leading Egypt astray because "The Lord has poured into her [Egypt] a spirit of confusion. Egypt has been led astray in all she does, as a drunkard staggers around in his vomit."

What I see all throughout Scripture is that God does intentionally speak in very confusing ways so that those outside his Kingdom will not understand. His hope is that his people will grasp his intentions, but the parable of the sower shows that even Jesus's closest disciples couldn't always grasp what he was trying to say - and there are several other incidents throughout Gospels where the authors seem to add notes about how they didn't understand something at the time, but only much later realized what Jesus meant.

I'm not sure how we could say that Revelation should be something neatly obvious and understandable when something as simple as the parable of the sower (which yet even many pastors today fail to understand!) couldn't even be grasped by the disciples when it was first shared. Further, most scholars believe that John was intentionally trying to confuse his words to prevent the Roman government from understanding the contents of his book, lest it cause him and the churches to fall under even greater persecution because of the things said in it.

The website in question pushes a very figurative world view of the bible

I'm not sure how that could possibly be said in comparison to futurism. Most of preterism is dedicated to showing literal fulfillment of virtually everything Revelation has said. Futurism is the camp that hangs its hat on a figurative or metaphorical interpretation. More to the point: preterism focuses on interpreting prophetic visions consistently with known interpretations of prophetic visions. The beast, for example, is virtually always interpreted by futurists as a singular person. This might make logical sense because of a few things Revelation says about the beast, making it seem like an isolated, sentient being. Yet in Daniel's vision of the 4 beasts, those are also described as individual beings, yet the explanation given is that they represent kingdoms, not singular people. So, when preterists suggest that the best in Revelation is the Roman empire/kingdom, it's a matter of interpreting it consistently with how Daniel's prophesies about end-times were interpreted, using Scripture to interpret Scripture rather than taking a face-value approach. If Daniel had assumed that the beasts in his vision were individual people because that's how they appeared in the vision, he would have been wrong - and the angel explaining it to him had to make the actual meaning clear to him.

That being said, I fully endorse everything /u/DeChef2 said in this comment I'm replying to. Well-put. And you're right that I do not push the idea of full preterism, nor am I fully persuaded. I just acknowledge that there's enough objective evidence that it could be true - not that it actually is true. I haven't spent enough time exploring that angle of things. I believe /u/OsmiumZulu is in the same camp on that one.

Episode 10 - No Frame, No Game Part 2

1 upvotes · 31 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

You're interpreting the verse to read:

When you show affection for an older man, encourage him as you would a father ... younger women as sisters, in all purity."

It looks to me like this verse is talking about how to approach someone when they need to be rebuked.

Also, I prefer to assume this couple is married - and there's no reason to believe they're not. Why assume they're sinning when we can assume the best in people?

40 million reasons and not a single excuse

1 upvotes · 29 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

To say you are responsible for either of those things is foolish and a lie, you are responsible for neither.

I agree. We're not responsible for everything. But in my hypothetical between myself, the other attorney, and the judge, I was the one who was late. I have to acknowledge that or respect is lost - even if my lateness was due to uncontrollable factors.

Part of this also comes into the believability of so-called "uncontrollable factors." People hear excuses of uncontrollable factors all the time. If the dog really did eat your homework, was that actually uncontrollable? Maybe you shouldn't have left your homework where the dog could get it. Maybe traffic really was bad - but why didn't you leave even earlier? Sure, a drunk driver hit you - but maybe you could have been a better defensive driver.

Now, it's possible that you hid your homework in a lockbox where only you knew the code, but your baby brother was spinning numbers and it randomly opened and the dog crept up and ate it at that point and you really did take every possible precaution. But at some point, when all you have is your word for it, it's just going to sound like excuses. Telling the judge that it's not your fault because traffic was bad is often going to be interpreted as an excuse, no matter how legitimate it is.

And this is the thing: in situations where you're reporting to an authority what matters more than the reality of the facts is the perception of the one in authority. In this, if they're not likely to fully believe your story, you're better off just owning up to the portion of the scenario that's relevant to them rather than shifting blame on the parts that are only relevant to you. "I'm sorry, your honor, that I'm the one that held up the hearing." This goes a MUCH longer way in earning respect than blame-shifting.

Now, in an ideal world everyone would automatically know how much a person can be trusted and would believe true stories and see through lies quickly and appropriate blame-shifting would be able to occur by nature. But we don't live in an idyllic world. So, we can't always look to the idealism of "genuine situations where it's not my fault" and instead embrace the fact that most people only care about the frustration you caused them without caring about the reasons why you had no choice.

In all this, I think you're getting too hung up on the technicality of "there is no such thing to apologize for," when most people won't perceive it that way, even if it's true. When you're with your subordinates, don't worry about it. You don't owe them an apology on that anyway. But with a superior, like a judge, being respected is often more important than being right on a technicality.

Locked down and lacking motivation

1 upvotes · 28 July 2020 · /r/askRPC

It'll be posted next week.

Saw a post asking about porn addiction the other day. Here is a really great video that's helped me a lot already.

1 upvotes · 27 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I get what you're saying. The rule on the sidebar is, as /u/rocknrollchuck referenced, that posts must have a reasonable quality. In the case of link posts, people are arguing that the link is where the quality is found. But that doesn't mean the post itself is of a reasonable quality. The quality relates to the post on this sub, not the content off the sub that's being referenced.

40 million reasons and not a single excuse

1 upvotes · 27 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

couch, verb: (a) to arrange or frame (words, a sentence, etc.); put into words; express; (b) to express indirectly or obscurely

The idea is that you're framing the way you communicate in a manner that will be received the way you want it. If you're too blunt about some things, it can work against you. But if you're not blunt enough, it can also come off as evasive or deflecting. How you "couch" your words/express your situation can make a big difference on how it's received.

your definition for 'reasons' precludes things you truly have no control over

That's fair. I suppose I don't necessarily see a point to this on a theological level, though. Romans 9 talks about how we're still responsible for things that are exclusively under God's control, right? We have to accept that responsibility regardless of our lack of control over the situation. I'm okay with that.

Example: I'm late to a court hearing because traffic is unusually bad - and I even left 15 minutes early just in case. That's beyond my control. But how do you think the judge would react if I went in saying, "It's not my fault. Traffic was really bad"? They're going to lose respect for me, even if they believed me.

Instead, I still accept responsibility for the situation and say, "I'm sorry for my tardiness. I was caught in traffic. I will make sure it does not happen again." The reality is that the judge just wants to start the hearing. I'm the one not there. Often-times they don't care - reason or excuse - why I'm not there, they just want me there so they can get started. In this reply, I accept responsibility for the fact that I was the one holding up the hearing. But I present it ("couch it") in a way that evokes sympathy and understanding from others around and likely increases their respect for me for not being a pansy by avoiding the acknowledgment that they were waiting on me.

I can't really follow the "rear-ended by a drunken driver" or "workplace accident" examples you gave because you haven't given a context for why you'd be giving excuses/reasons in the first place. Are you just assessing the situation yourself? Or is someone harassing you about why you're not wealthy yet? Or is a friend questioning whose fault the accident is? The way you approach the situation changes based on those contexts. The existence of the situation itself does not inherently imply any form of reason/excuse.

Anyone else frustrated with their church leadership re: COVID?

1 upvotes · 20 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Haha. "Actual meaning of ekklesia"? You do realize the original ekklesia was an outdoor meeting of the Greek populace and didn't involve a building, right? The ekklesia was a reference to the people, not the location. It's like the word "council." The council might meet in a building, but the building is not the council itself, and many council meetings happen outside the normal meeting place, such as at restaurants or even over the phone.

And the fact that a group of Christians in 233AD in Syria decided to use a building is a FAR CRY from suggesting they glorified the building location itself. I do agree that building idolatry did indeed develop over time. But there's no evidence it began that early.

Anyone else frustrated with their church leadership re: COVID?

1 upvotes · 19 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

As I understand it, the apostles and early believers were going to the temple courts and synagogues not to congregate with one another, but to preach the Gospel, and their participation in the eucharist afterward was, as Jesus modeled, a time to share the Gospel and discuss the imperative to spread it to the nations.

This is clear from not only the many examples where they were proclaiming the Gospel in the temple courts, but also the examples where the Jews were running them out for doing this. They were, on the whole, not welcome there.

In Acts 2, specifically, they had a number of converts at Pentacost, which was a singular day event. Jews from all over the known world were congregating at the temple courts and stayed for some time to pray and worship there. It was the primary reason for their travel and the apostles knew this. So, they would preach in the temple courts to share the Gospel with all the Jews amassing from everywhere before going into the homes to get down to business.

More to the point: when Jesus was kicked out of the temples, we see him gathering with people in homes, on a mountainside, in front of a fountain, on a road, in/from a boat - basically wherever he could. The apostles seem to have followed suit, as we see ministry happening on the road, in open fields, on ships, in homes, etc. There's actually scant little that supports the idea that they congregated in centralized locations - but a great deal that shows them meeting up in smaller settings in homes rather than large structured buildings.

I simply don't see the foundation in Scripture for what you're proposing - yet if you look throughout Acts and the letters, it's much, much clearer that homes rather than buildings were the norm for most meetings.

Anyone else frustrated with their church leadership re: COVID?

1 upvotes · 9 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Yikes. That's some of the poorest exegesis I've seen in ages ... if it can even be called that.

How the Truth Set Me Free From Masturbation and Pornography

1 upvotes · 6 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I don't mind recording anything. But let's chat further in PM.

How the Truth Set Me Free From Masturbation and Pornography

1 upvotes · 6 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Haha. Want to make it a recorded walk and talk? Let me know the topics in advance and we'll make it happen. But deliverance/healing is a more prominent thing I've been involved with, having led a team in putting on a conference on the subject last year, and being one of the keynote speakers. I didn't see eye to eye with everyone involved, and my primary function was to keep the more ... "spiritually minded" people grounded in scripture rather than demonic philosophy or spiritualized psychology.

How the Truth Set Me Free From Masturbation and Pornography

1 upvotes · 6 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm confused.

Reformed? Or Arminian?

1 upvotes · 5 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

If you'll forgive a "No True Scotsman" logical fallacy

It's not a fallacy if there's an actual authority who gets to decide what's true and not.

God's intentions and decrees are compatible with man's sinful nature and behavior. Hence compatibilism.

This is not the definition of compatibilism I'm accustomed to.

"limited free will" position ... man is free to do whatever he wants, but he is not free to want whatever he wants

Right, this is the first "predestines our circumstances in a way that he knows we will only be inclined to choose the path he wants" route I mentioned. In this case, the "predestined circumstances" are the desires God created to be associated with their nature.

But your argument also opens itself up to numerous holes. Perhaps those particular Jews killed Christ because it was part of their nature. Yet there were other Jews who had that exact same nature who were not part of Christ's death. So, why is it one person's nature to kill Jesus and not the other's, if they both have the same nature? Well, then we're stuck saying that there are technically unique finger-print-like natures for every person, devised by their own circumstances and one set of Jews' circumstances were more associated with Christ and their hatred of him than another's, and that God, having designed for Christ to die, molded their circumstances to cause their will to be carried out in accord with his will. This is still a phantom "inevitable choice" argument that is not the same as compatibilism. It's a way of pretending to be compatibilist while really undermining free will to get there.

All of this also doesn't account for the believer's spectrum nature where, at different points, we are less sanctified and more sanctified, having a perfected spirit with a sinful flesh (Romans 7:25, for example) and that nature is constantly changing.

Also, the entire concept of being a slave to one's nature, while certainly having some biblical foundation, undermines the point of free will in the first place. My point in saying this is not to say it's definitively wrong, as there are good cases to be made for a "non-free-will" position. Rather, my point is that these explanations are still not aligned with compatibilism which fully embraces free will and sovereignty together without compromising either to make the compatibility work.

To be fair, it's these varying definitions on "compatibilism" that have caused me to be hesitant in the past in identifying as a compatibilist. Perhaps you've persuaded me I should stop using that word to define myself, as the way you mean the word is clearly not what I intended when I said it.

Reformed? Or Arminian?

1 upvotes · 4 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Like I say, I'll have to look into this more. This is in contradiction with most everything I've heard from every other self proclaimed "reformed" person. At best, I've heard people try to give explanations that pretend to give room to free will, while undermining its validity by arguing things like (as only one example): "Good lets us choose, but predestines our circumstances in a way that he knows we will only be inclined to choose the path he wants" - which I call the inevitable choice argument.

Another explanation takes away the function of free will by saying it's valid, but never of any significance (this, for example).

My understanding of compatibilism is that it rejects these ideas that render one side of the coin to have no valid function.

Reformed? Or Arminian?

1 upvotes · 3 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting. I've attended 5 ish congregations in the last few years that self identify as reformed who preach predestination in the absence of free will as their soteriological model, and this has also been the position of those identifying as reformed on r/TrueChristian. Of the many, you're only the second to tell me that reformed believe in compatibilism. I'll have to research this more sometime because my anecdotal evidence of those who call themselves reformed, while vast, may end up being wrong.

Religious Gf of 4 years broke up with me a month ago. Messaged me today that she wants to get back together. But she doesn't not want any sex during the relationship. Need advice?

1 upvotes · 2 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is not a mission. It's a set of vague career goals. If it is technically a mission, it's clearly not influenced at all by your faith. I recommend examining this further and why your life ambitions are separate from your faith.

Religious Gf of 4 years broke up with me a month ago. Messaged me today that she wants to get back together. But she doesn't not want any sex during the relationship. Need advice?

1 upvotes · 2 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I have no idea where you're getting this paradigm from. Please elaborate.

Refreshing words and an encouragement to start conversations

1 upvotes · 2 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Most of it is already in the 300 series. But yes, some of them could use more expansion.

Feeling discouraged with many churches' support of the Black Lives Matter movement, including my own.. Are there any truly alt-right/conservative churches left that don't buy into this?

1 upvotes · 2 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right. The problem is that someone who's a true comic book fan will realize all the ways superman has been over-feminized by different writers over the years, so he's not always the ideal man. He always has absurd oneitis for Lois, for example - and that strings through even some of the better portrayals of him. Of course, this is going to be true through virtually every heroic character because they're off doing so many other things on their mission that there's not enough pages to write about them shotgun approaching a few dozen hotties. But some of the more recent writers have at least caused him to ditch Lois for Wonder Woman, who he has less infatuation for because she can take care of herself.

But the fact that he puts his mission above all else, and always succeeds despite Lois's constant penchant for getting in the way, is still an admirable quality in Superman among all his writers.

Anyone else frustrated with their church leadership re: COVID?

1 upvotes · 1 July 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right. But the current congregational structure folds without the pastor. So, if the pastor chooses within his own conscience not to attend Sunday services, then the whole thing falls apart anyway and it'd be better for the congregation just to hold out longer until the pastor does feel comfortable and safe again.

Don't get me wrong, this whole setup is a tragedy in the first place, which is why I embrace, yet simultaneously fight against the congregational structure. But it's worth spending time meditating on every now and then.

Anyone else frustrated with their church leadership re: COVID?

1 upvotes · 30 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is wrong. I assume /u/CentralParkWst (OP) was referencing the stats for his own age group, which is generally referenced as (I'm assuming) 25-34 or 35 to 44. The .5% number is combining all age groups into a single statistic and focusing on only corona-related deaths, whereas the 4.8% number (I usually see it as 5%) is the percentage of corona-positive deaths (even if the cause wasn't corona itself) relative to total deaths from all sources.

This link shows that .676% of all corona deaths occur in the 25-34 age range, and 3% of all deaths within that age-range are corona-positive.

If we bump up an age range, it's 1.722% of all corona deaths occur between 34-44, with 5.3% of all deaths in that age range being corona-positive.

My point is: by quoting numbers that incorporate ALL age-ranges, you're giving misinformation as it relates to the users talking within their own context here. If you can provide other evidence that the age distribution on this subreddit is identical to the age distribution in the world, generally, then I'd be happy to reconsider and start giving more credit to statistics that account for the 80+ or even 70+ demographic. Do we even have ANYONE at all who's in that age range? I have yet to see a commenter identify as such (highest I've seen is in his 60s).

INFECTION FATALITY RATE

Now, you'll notice that many statistics that purport to be corona death rates are really showing the rate of corona deaths relative to total deaths, or the rate of corona deaths in an age range relative to the total corona deaths. But what we should really be looking at is the rate of death relative to infection within a particular age range. Even then, we want to consider it by locality, as different locations are better equipped to treat patients, affecting the risk of death.

Wikipedia has a page devoted to this and breaks it down by state, in many cases. Most of their numbers are current through late-May/early-June. The HIGHEST rate in the US for someone in their 20s is .5% in Mississippi. 0.0% is more common in states like Idaho, Kentucky, Minnesota, Oregon, and Virginia. .1% exists in Connecticut, Indiana, Massachusetts, and Missouri. .2%, as OP referenced, is applicable in Colorado, Maryland, Washington, and Wisconsin.

Even if we bump the age range up to people in their 30s, Idaho, New Hampshire, and Oregon have a 0.0% death rate. .1% for Massachusetts, Minnesota, and Virginia. .2% for Colorado, Indiana, Kentucky, Missouri, and Wisconsin.

The point is: .2% is, for many people, a realistic number for a death rate. By sharing a misleading statistic that compares people's risk of death outside of their own demographic, you give in to the social agenda that supports all the liberalism that's already taking over the country.

Always question everything you read from the media these days. Make sure when you see a statistic that you know exactly what that statistic is actually reporting and whether it applies to anyone's individual context. My guess is that the primary demographic on this sub is 18-40. These are extremely low-risk cases and it's not fair to be pushing all-age statistics on this community where those statistics do not apply, unless you're specifically making an argument about the impact a user can have on the older communities outside of this sub.

Why You Must Be Willing to Nuke Your Nuclear Family

1 upvotes · 23 June 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

In order, they're 1 Cor. 7:29, 1 Cor. 7:15, and Luke 14:26. There is a LOT more, though. I was just giving the low-hanging fruit relevant to the post. I created a whole sub for this: r/RPChristians (as well as the newly created r/RPCWomen) to talk about all of these things from a biblical angle. Our sidebar content goes into the Scriptural foundation of pretty much everything. Enjoy.

RPCC Episode 3: The State of Marriage

1 upvotes · 20 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Get me a more specific time-stamp. I'm hearing nothing at 3:30-5:30 about BPP.

Are women really "saved through child-bearing"? Yes.

1 upvotes · 18 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting perspective.

RPC Chat - Episode 4: Christian Dead Bedrooms

1 upvotes · 18 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, exactly.

Thoughts about fraternity/sorority culture?

1 upvotes · 17 June 2020 · /r/askRPC

Fraternities have value in the sense that you learn to relate with other men, which is a skill many men end up lacking. Most guys lack this type of relationship with a variety of men, instead only having one or two close friends. The life-on-life nature of fraternity culture also has value in understanding what discipleship can look like when you're living alongside others so closely.

Of course, in fraternity culture you're among peers, not under a true authority structure as the foundation of your "life-on-life" nature. Also, the men you're being influenced by may not be the greatest influences.

So, there are pros and cons. There's nothing inherently red pill or blue pill about the structure itself. There's nothing particularly Christian or unchristian either. It is what you make of it. I've had friends who joined fraternity culture in order to witness to the other men there, and they had great success doing it. I had others who went in passively and ended up worse off for it.

The Narrow Way

1 upvotes · 17 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I just noticed this was removed. If that happens again, just message us and we'll approve it, as long as it generally follows the rules. The post is approved now.

Are women really "saved through child-bearing"? Yes.

1 upvotes · 17 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

So the reason for the Holy Spirit inspiring Paul to include that verse/phrasing in regard to women is to point to spiritual reproduction?

Yes, That's how I'd take it.

We have studies today that show how children in single parent households fare in comparison ... It's not a stretch to think the same is true in regard to godliness.

You'd think, logically. But the stats on retention rates within the church are extremely low. Now, I attribute this more to the failures of churchianity in its lack of spiritual parenting (discipleship). But even still, it could just as easily be argued that united households lead people not toward godliness, but to embrace the coveted things of the world - monetary gain, scientific insight and understanding, etc. I could be wrong on this, but my guess is that the stats do not support a higher correlation of genuine, world-changing believers among united homes over non-Christians within united homes. I'd be more inclined to believe that those from broken homes are apt to seek and embrace what Jesus has to offer. Of course, I may be biased in that my parents divorced within a couple years of my becoming genuinely saved.

Because God wants godly seed, and if/when a couple has children, marriage is the best environment in which children will turn out to be godly.

I think you're missing Malachi 2:15 by focusing too much on 2:14. Marriage is not the context in which children are most likely to become godly. 2:15 says that the parents are meant "to PRODUCE godly offspring." As noted in my original post: this isn't merely toward the production of offspring, generally, which Adam and Eve did through the time of Noah, yet God wiped them away. What I didn't emphasize clearly in my post is that the operative of the PRODUCTION is the godly aspect. That is, it should not read "to produce offspring who are godly," but instead: "with their offspring, to produce godliness." That is the better interpretation of this passage.

Marriage in itself will tend toward the former interpretation, whereas parents committed to discipling their children (which is rare) are the prime context in which godliness can thrive within a home. Again the operative compulsion is to produce godliness in the offspring, not to produce the offspring themselves. This is why it is a reference to spiritual reproduction and not mere physical reproduction.

Of course, somewhat implicit in this Malachi interpretation is that a married couple will have children (but it doesn't seem to compel it), but the focus is on the covenant between the two, and not on the main purpose being procreation.

If you take 2:14 and exclude 2:15, that would seem to be the case. Yet 2:15 unequivocally states that the purpose of marriage is to produce godly offspring. I merely take it in the context I just explained, which from a completely different angle agrees with your conclusion that the focus is not on procreation - yet it disagrees with your alternative conclusion about the covenant. The focus of marriage is not on the covenant, but on the compulsion to produce godliness in one's offspring (whether physical or spiritual). The covenant is referenced as the context in which this union should exist, but the purpose of the union is not for the covenant's own sake. That's like saying, "The purpose of buying a car is to enter into a contract to own a car." No, that's not the purpose - that's the vehicle through which it happens. The purpose of buying a car is so you can drive places.

That said, these are good and interesting thoughts all around.

You did tag 4 people, so no one will get the notice, but I'll tag the other three for you: /u/OsmiumZulu /u/Deep_Strength /u/rocknrollchuck

Thoughts about fraternity/sorority culture?

1 upvotes · 16 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Read the sidebar:

r/askRPC - While RPC proper exists for higher quality content, r/askRPC is available for quicker questions or content you're unsure about, but for which you'd like feedback. Substantive questions, the answer for which would be beneficial to all, are still welcome on RPC - especially as they pertain to field reports. But if you're asking about a more niche issue, go to askRPC. Yes, the mods do actively check both subs regularly.

Actual conversations with "abuse" victims.

1 upvotes · 13 June 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

It's funny how riled up you get over a disagreement with a rando on the internet. You don't have to read any of this if it upsets you that much.

Actual conversations with "abuse" victims.

1 upvotes · 11 June 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

You're missing the point. What you're describing may be a form of coercion, but it isn't abuse and there's nothing unlawful about certain types of coercion, such as what you're describing. At the end of the day, if she didn't like it, she could leave and the laws will help her do it. "He gets angry and makes me lose sleep every now and then" v. "I'm being sexually abused/maritally raped" aren't even close to the same spectrum.

You ask any woman: Would you rather be sexually abused and raped by your husband, or have him get angry and call you names? The answer is a no brainer and the fact that they make the opposite choice in practice makes it clear that at least in the moment it doesn't feel like sexual abuse or marital rape - they only want to recharacterize it that way after the fact when it suits their purposes.

RPCC Episode 3: The State of Marriage

1 upvotes · 9 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Unfortunately, I sold my psych 101 book as soon as the class was over. I do know there are mixed opinions on the subject, but most people I know in person - especially those who like to zoom through podcasts, as /u/OsmiumZulu and I apparently do, affirm the conclusions of the study.

I believe slower speech rates can assist in comprehension if you're working with children or people with generally low IQ who need lots of time to process information.

Also, I've read that quantity of information affects preferred communication style too. For lectures, it's better to talk fast, as you can get through more content, keeping the brain engaged, in a shorter time. If you speak slow to get through the same degree of content, people will lose interest and become distracted over time, losing focus on the message being shared. Slow speech is also less exciting, which contributes to interest-loss. Contrarily, fast speech on very short bullet points gives too little time to process everything, so if you're just citing off conclusory points to remember, it's probably better to go slow because instead of explaining why it's significant (which would require fast speech), people need to figure out why the conclusory statement is being made on their own, which requires additional time for the brain to process what's being said.

Also, different types of mental health issues can affect this. I have a teacher friend who has reported that his training suggests people with ADHD should speak slowly to help their brain speed adjust to their speech levels without tripping over their words, whereas you should speak faster when talking TO a kid with ADHD because it gives him less room for distraction, helping to maintain the focus.

A Complete Idiot's Guide to Conversation

1 upvotes · 7 June 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Always assume they do

Indeed. This is my standard mode of operation. I've found that it's true about 95% of the time.

As Blarg notes, there are rare occasions when someone legitimately doesn't want to talk, but even those are usually just a tact issue. The only examples I can truly think of where that's not the case are when people are sleeping or pressed for time and you can't help them.

Actual conversations with "abuse" victims.

1 upvotes · 6 June 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

As expected, she is totally on board. I do not think it is unreasonable either.

My own children do not live with my full time.

I'll never understand guys who don't get this.

When do you realize it is the right person?

1 upvotes · 1 June 2020 · /r/RPChristians

You sound like a woman. Are you a woman? Sure, you said "(M21)" but I'm not convinced.

- "Do you go with your gut FEELINGS?"
- "Do you have to FEEL strong connection?"
- "We both have FUN. But when we go on a first date ... [the fun FEELING is] just not there."
- "No super magical ~~moments~~ FEELINGS we would be really EXCITED from."
- Because for a long time I haven't FEEL any super romantic EMOTIONS whatsoever."

Did you even read what you wrote? Emotions are an awful metric to go by. They're fickle and change constantly. They are guaranteed to change at some point after you're married.

A better metric would be a combination of genuine attraction and the FAST qualities, among any other personal preferences and boundaries you may have. Are you attractive enough that such girls are swarming over you yet?

Also, you're trying too hard. Have you read the sidebar? Have you read the "How to Find the Girl You Can't Keep Yourself From Banging" posts? This is very basic stuff.

What is the Christian right's future in American politics?

1 upvotes · 20 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed.

What is the Christian right's future in American politics?

1 upvotes · 20 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

the government isn't the one calling the shots. It's people with enough money

I disagree here, at least on the political level. The rich have influence over their own sphere. But the government is influenced by the rich on both sides of the line. There are countless liberal rich people and conservative rich people who are lobbying for conflicting results. Do you think Trump, as rich as he was, had much influence over Obama? Or do you think the fact that he didn't have much political sway during Obama's time was part of what compelled him to run for the presidency?

become so rich is that you could pick and choose who will be leaders

Notice that democrats always spend WAAAAAY more on campaigns than republicans, including in the Hillary/Trump campaign. Trump still won. Money has influence, but not as much as you seem to be giving it.

Of course, you would have to be doing this for the right motives and this would have to be done out of faith As Romans 14 says. At this point it wouldn't be considered rebelling.

Right. The Navigators is already doing this. College ministry was actually the third area they got into. They started as a military ministry, then moved on to disciple political leaders, and only after that did the move into campus ministry. Of course, most of us aren't in the military or political figures, so we mostly just hear about the campus ministry aspect.

Either way: I agree that discipling political leaders is not rebelling at all. It's highly encouraged! But no amount of discipling is going to get the country to a point of shredding the constitution and starting all over.

If we take Romans 8 into consideration then it could be said that our founding fathers were in violation of God's commands

Right. And I believe they were. But they weren't doing it because of the Bible. The true history of our nation isn't as "Christian" as some like to make it seem. That's why someone like Thomas Jefferson created his own edited Bible that removes every reference to miracles or supernatural beings and events and only tells the history and moral teachings.

The revolution was going to happen whether the Christians wanted it to or not. The Christians piggy-backed onto that and became influencers to make sure the new government was as godly as possible. I'm okay with that. Not with rallying believers together to upturn everything.

The one exception, of course, would be if there was divine prophecy where God ordered the US to secede from Britain. But I don't see any evidence for that.

I personally don't think we are very oppressed, but at what point do we draw the line?

I suppose if Caesar Nero's reign wasn't far enough to cross it, I have no idea how far that line would have to be, but we're nowhere near it ... prophetic compulsion exempted, of course.

Do you wait for it to go to hell or do we act proactively and do something now?

Perhaps it going to hell is God's judgment against the nation or the Church. After all, he did it to Israel whenever they were wayward. I believe he will allow the Church to become persecuted and veer away from his protection if we stray as well.

With how much we talk about how far the Church has strayed, don't you think it would be appropriate for God to use secular authorities to kick it in the butt, just like he did to Israel?

I don't see any direct correlation where is Jesus relates a government to its people akin to a husband and wife. You can't impute that model to the husband-wife model that Jesus gives with the church

You're right - and I knew I was stretching it when I said it ;) But if it's the closest parallel we have between a leader-follower dynamic, that's all we have to work with.

I suppose a better correlation would be to say it'd be like Jesus coming off the cross and whipping Pilate and Herod for being so oppressive against him and his followers.

What is the Christian right's future in American politics?

1 upvotes · 20 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I blame the country less for it and more the church for getting lax at best and scared to upset someone at worst

Oh ... you mean because the men who run it have lost their masculinity? You're describing a beta - passive and always in someone else's frame. This is why biblical masculinity is so critical today - and always has been.

Is marriage worth it?

1 upvotes · 20 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm a divorce attorney. I have drafted many prenups. I've also shredded many that other attorneys drafted. So yes, if a crappy attorney does it, it's worthless. I've never had any of mine be discarded by the court.

And no, she doesn't have to keep her job. She just has to keep current on her credentials to qualify for the job. The will can impute income to someone who isn't working at capacity.

If she quits, file for legal separation instead of divorce. It splits the financial entanglement under the law while keeping the marriage intact.

There's a preventive solution to most every problem.

Is marriage worth it?

1 upvotes · 18 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Is marriage worth it?

Yes.

Your answer here shocks me in the face of 1 Cor. 7 and Matthew 19, where Jesus and Paul both say that it's better not to be married if you can avoid it. I don't see any way to interpret this than as a de facto way of saying, "The benefits of marriage are not worth the cost of marriage." Even though marriage is recommended in the case of one who cannot remain sexually pure, it's still phrased as, "The one who marries does good, but the one who does not marry does better."

As for your passages, Hebrews 13 is a reference to the imperative for purity in marriage (i.e. no adultery), not that married people are to be honored as better than single people. 1 Timothy 4 warns against forbidding marriage, but this is a far cry from being interpreted so as to compel everyone that they must marry or even to suggest that marriage is better than non-marriage. It's just telling men not to forbid someone from doing the only thing that might otherwise validate their sexual activity that would otherwise be sinful.

In this, I believe your comment was not necessarily from a biblical standpoint and more a pragmatic assessment of the general benefits of marriage compared to the legal issues OP was talking about. In this, I agree - with proper legal planning, the legal benefits of marriage certainly outweigh the legal risks associated with it, especially if you're already intending to have sex with the person - not just because of the "premarital sex" issue (which is effectively resolved through spiritual marriage), but because of the child custody/visitation/support laws.

But if we're talking on a pure spiritual level, I have to agree with Paul in 1 Cor. 7 that getting married does more damage to your devotion to God than it benefits, and therefore "the one who marries does good, but the one who does not does better."

Tag: /u/benjiii1995

Is marriage worth it?

1 upvotes · 18 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Is marriage worth it?

No. Paul says in 1 Cor. 7 that it is better not to be married. Jesus also says in Matthew 19 that if you have the ability to avoid marriage, you should. This is definitive biblical evidence proving that being married is NOT better than being single.

The only exception in Scripture is if you can't keep your pants on, then you're better off marrying than having extramarital sex - and there's nothing wrong with this. Yes, you make a sacrifice by tying yourself to another person, and there are many beautiful things that come with this. But the imperative from Scripture seems obvious: the benefit of having a woman at your side will always be outweighed by the cost of the impact it has on your ability to devote yourself to God and your mission.

How to evaluate sexuality compatibility as a Christian with no pre-marital sex and only chaste behavior

1 upvotes · 15 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

She and I were both taught FAT in a ministry we were both part of. I added the S. But yes, she's well aware of these traits.

What is your opinion on women who have had a breast reduction?

1 upvotes · 12 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

No asking for pics.

Discovered an inappropriate relationship

1 upvotes · 11 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Sure. But Jesus also judged the pharisees pretty harshly for adding rules and laws that weren't from God. So, if you have a biblical basis for saying that "Emotional intimacy with anyone of the opposite sex is cheating" - knowing full well that people will interpret "cheating" as synonymous with "adultery" - then you'd better back that up.

Or if you mean something different by "cheating" and that your view of "cheating" is that it's not actually sin at all, then explain that.

Or maybe you don't equate "cheating" with "adultery," but you do still call it sin. In that case, what's the other definition and where's the biblical premise for calling it sin?

You can't make conclusory statements like this without some kind of explanation - especially when it pushes the same garbage blue pill notions of marriage, relationships, sexuality, boundaries, etc. that churchianity is already pushing.

Discovered an inappropriate relationship

1 upvotes · 11 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

That's not at all apparent from your comment and the context of his frequent references to initiating divorce.

Discovered an inappropriate relationship

1 upvotes · 11 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I suppose this is where one's views on exist soteriology actually matters. Some believe you can go in and out of salvation, which would be akin to a couple getting divorced and remarried a number of times (most I've seen in my career is 5; 2-3 is common).

Others believe that you can't lose your salvation at all. That is, once you're one with Christ, you're one forever. The "never really saved in the first place" card can't be played when translating this to human marriages because there are extremely clear indicators to show that you actually were married ... especially if there are kids involved.

The last, more interesting (and perhaps largest) group believes that you can lose your salvation, but once it's gone it can never be regained, as if you committed the unforgivable sin (Hebrews 6:4-6, among others). In this situation, once the door is closed, it's closed forever. This group holds that when God sets a boundary, he sets it hard and the penalty for willful, consistent violation is being permanently kicked out (Hebrews 10:26-30). So, as 2 Timothy 2 indicates, God is generally faithful even when we are faithless, but when we are blatantly defiant against him, that's the end. I believe that's where /u/lololasaurus is.

The question: Is your behavior consistent with your theology? That question matters more to me than where you fall on a relatively debatable issue.

Frame Fail?

1 upvotes · 7 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right now my immediate mission is just to be the best man, husband, father I can be

This is fine in the immediacy. Long-term, you're going to need more than this. If you stay on this path too long, you're going to end up having your life defined by their expectations. If your "mission" (if you can call it that) is defined by your relational context to them ("husband, father"), then it's too easy to slip into letting them have too much influence in directing how you live your life.

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/6toetn/108_lifepath_of_a_relationship/

What's up fellas. Would love to hear your thoughts. I am also a strong believer.

1 upvotes · 6 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Removed. Please don't do link posts. Just copy/paste the text into a new post here so it doesn't redirect people.

Roosh V on Jessie Lee Peterson

1 upvotes · 4 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right on.

Idealism and Opportunism are not sex specific

1 upvotes · 1 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

both are what we would call blue pill idols ... For women, it's creating an image of a Prince Charming (that no man can meet)

Right - but why does any woman want a prince charming? Because he's always rich, gives her all kinds of emotional validation, treats her like a queen/princess, etc. But even in the Disney fairy tales, why does prince charming like her back? Certainly not for what she brings to the table. She's just pretty ... but far be it from Disney to sexualize that attraction, so it comes off more as an altruistic love for its own sake with the princess usually being as flawless as the prince, except on more womanly terms (not overweight, doesn't nag, supports his mission, etc.).

men think the rule applies 100% of the time which it obviously doesn't

Agreed. But again, that doesn't make it useless. It just means your post is written for the low-minority of men who aren't in the norm. But that also makes it dangerous because it means the majority of men reading this might feel validated in thinking, "So maybe my wife truly is a special snowflake!"

It's the same with Christian men reading secular RP and coming here with the attitude that all women are whores and terrible people

Right. Now this is certainly a trope that defies the evidence by exaggeration. I actually wrote a much longer multi-paragraph section here elaborating on how this identity exaggeration without context affects other areas of life ... but because it mostly poked fun at the Ray Comfort model of evangelism, I decided it wasn't worth ticking off chuck ;)

but simultaneously have some nuance as men start to understand more.

Agreed ... but ONLY for those men whose wives actually break the mold. It's possible that a man completely overhauls his life, is biblically well along his way in sanctification, has a solid body, is leading like a hero, etc. but his wife still loves him opportunistically. Just because he changes himself doesn't mean she will change how she loves him.

This is kind of like the Brad Pitt Thought Experiment post you did, but in reverse. Instead of putting Brad Pitt in front of her, test the altruistic nature of her love by making her husband, who she claims to love unconditionally, 300lbs, jobless, struggling with depression, verbally abusive, and he demands constant replenishment of his beer can while he watches 12 hours of football a day. Of course, he's sensitive enough that he doesn't demand his beer while she's at work trying to earn a living to pay his mortgage. There, now that we've made him the opposite of Brad Pitt - how well is her altruistic love going to hold up in this situation?

Because I know men whose wives are EXACTLY like that on the feminine side, yet they continue to maintain their altruistic idealism in how they interact with her. Any guy who's ever married a borderline knows how this goes. As soon as his value goes down far enough, she drops him like a rock. Maybe she did love him altruistically, but hypergamy won out over her altruism. But can we really call that an altruistic love if it was still conditioned on him satisfying her hypergamy?

Idealism and Opportunism are not sex specific

1 upvotes · 1 May 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Well said. I obviously missed that when I watched them a decade ago. I keep waiting for my son to be old enough.

About to file for divorce

1 upvotes · 1 May 2020 · /r/askMRP

He did put it up. It didn't have the issues I was expecting. I mostly agree with what he says, though there are certainly some differences in our underlying framework for understanding it all. I gave him the benefit of the doubt and filled in the gaps.

Refreshing words and an encouragement to start conversations

1 upvotes · 30 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Who says I'm afraid or encourage anyone else to be?

Are there some worship songs you enjoy?

1 upvotes · 28 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Very encouraging to hear!

Do you think the pandemic, is the foundation for the mark of the beast?

1 upvotes · 28 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This.

Is compatibility essential (or even useful!) in a marriage? No, not really.

1 upvotes · 28 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right. My point is that compatibility in itself is a myth. Consider ...

- Birds of a feather flock together /// Opposites attract

So are "birds of a feather" more compatible or are opposites more compatible? There's really NO usable pragmatic definition of "compatibility" to base a relationship off of because everyone is going to have a different theory of compatibility.

Question about my youth group

1 upvotes · 27 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right. TRP was born out of PUA discussions, but the MRAs, PUAs, MRPs, and TRPs all splintered in different directions.

So, what if you're into military type men?

1 upvotes · 27 April 2020 · /r/RedPillWomen

I'll give this caution: men are men, whether they're in the military or not. Each one is still an individual, and each one has the same attraction triggers. Each one is going to have their own plate of issues - and they're going to be different from one military guy to the next, though some may overlap from time to time. You might find military guys more susceptible to things like PTSD and highly controlling behaviors - which is fine if that's your gig. But don't exchange the CONCEPT of a military man for the fact that he is still just a man.

This is, of course, no different from the way men tend to have a "thing" for certain types of women. Sure, lots of guys think they'd love to marry a porn star. Yes, they have lots of inherently attractive qualities. But they're still women just like anyone else with a vagina is a woman.

Military guys can beta up and become unattractive just as easily as any other guy (I've known many). So, make sure your "thing" for military guys doesn't blind you to the reality that he's still a man, for better or worse. To that end ...

You ask about advice for vetting. Figure out his life mission up-front. This is an easy first date question: "What do you want to have accomplished in life by the time you're 80?" A guy who can't answer that question isn't worth following. A guy who can answer it, but with an idiotic answer is slightly better, but still not worth following.

Choosing and Developing Hobbies

1 upvotes · 27 April 2020 · /r/askRPC

This is an excellent start. I recommend taking it down, I can give you a few pointers, and then you put it up on RPC AND MRP. This is the type of content they could use over there too, if developed properly - and I rarely post even my own stuff over there. If you're up for it, shoot me a PM and include the text of this post (as I won't be able to access it if you delete this).

Is compatibility essential (or even useful!) in a marriage? No, not really.

1 upvotes · 27 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I second this. Also, vaginas don't have MBTI distinctions. Just their brains. If you want work her brain a certain way, knowing her MBTI can be helpful (though less than many would make it seem). If you want to work her vagina a certain way, MBTI isn't designed for that.

Need some advice, long post. And apologize for the scatter brain

1 upvotes · 26 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I think you're foolish if you sideline the importance of lifting just because your wife told you so. Other than that, what you're saying makes sense.

Is compatibility essential (or even useful!) in a marriage? No, not really.

1 upvotes · 26 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Sounds like you got it all figured out. Go write a book.

Is compatibility essential (or even useful!) in a marriage? No, not really.

1 upvotes · 26 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Seems hard to assess. A trait only has value if you can discern it. But really, what you're describing is a unicorn. Good luck finding one.

Need some advice, long post. And apologize for the scatter brain

1 upvotes · 26 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

If she's denying you, she does. It's taking you too much effort to get her worked up before she's started. A girl doesn't say no (with limited exception) to a man she trusts after she's already wet. She's saying no to you because it takes you too long to get her worked up. She should start with the tingles before you even initiate.

Need some advice, long post. And apologize for the scatter brain

1 upvotes · 26 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Your listening to what she says. Feel he panties after she watches Magic Mike, then we can chat.

How important is compatibility for marriage?

1 upvotes · 25 April 2020 · /r/askRPC

Women will always change. Accept it. This means that whatever "compatibility" you had when you got married will only remain in place as long as you keep changing with her. Men are averse to change. We can, and sometimes do, but not as fluently. If you're changing with her, you're in her frame and headed toward destruction.

You're better off having her change to mold to you. If you're already compatible up-front, then it means you have to keep growing and developing in the direction you want to go in order to give her something to keep morphing to, otherwise she's going to get bored and morph away from you. If you're not compatible up-front, you just bought yourself a few months/years (depending on how incompatible you are) before you have to worry about her getting bored with the relationship.

Also, what do you even mean by "compatibility"? Like, your personalities are a good match for each other - you're extroverted and she's introverted, so you've got both bases covered? That one of you is really good with house work and the other is really good in a professional career? That one is really talented at kissing and the other one's exceptionally good with his/her hands?

Or do you mean you're "compatible" because you both like the same kinds of music and TV shows? I love my brother's comment as he neared the end of his 20s, "I wish I knew in high school how unimportant liking the same music was in a relationship." He literally only dated girls who liked the same bands as him. Idiot.

My wife once commented that when she was a kid she thought, "How are my aunt and uncle ever going to be happy in a marriage? One is a [sports team 1] fan and the other is a [team 2] fan? How did they ever get married?" See how juvenile those thoughts are? Yet the world still thinks this is true - that if you don't like the same things it will never work. It's laughable. This is probably worth a post. I might write one soon.

Let's Have a Little Talk About Respect

1 upvotes · 25 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Literal and metaphor has nothing to do with forcing a 2020 definition onto the way a word was used 2,000 years ago.

Also, conflating biblical exegesis with an alpha/beta designation? We don't take kindly to the "anyone who disagrees with me is beta" attitude. Take a 3 day ban and learn to knock it off during that time.

Let's Have a Little Talk About Respect

1 upvotes · 25 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I seriously hope you don't take that approach to word meanings when you study Scripture.

Let's Have a Little Talk About Respect

1 upvotes · 25 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

semantic problem ... "respect" in English ... noun: a feeling

That's really all you had to say. Emotionalism culture has redefined every word of biblical substance it possibly can. It's even taken words that aren't of biblical substance and tried to make them substantive. Good luck having a rational argument with an emotionalist without having to spout out semantic differences half a dozen times.

Let's Have a Little Talk About Respect

1 upvotes · 25 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Titus 2:4 also more directly answers the question without having to beat around the bush.

Tag: /u/Willow-girl

OYS - Where Progress is Made (04/22/20)

1 upvotes · 24 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Don't forget teaching them to pass it on too ;) You want spiritual grandchildren, right? Just as a man must teach his sons about relationships, sex, and reproduction, you have to do the same with your spiritual children.

“Why won't he be the king I know he is, the king I see inside?”

1 upvotes · 23 April 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

"Good this" and "Good that" ... but really the +1 is for a post inspired by a musical reference ;)

Bible Studies for Men's small group

1 upvotes · 22 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I've heard mixed reviews on Tony Evans. Some people really like him around here. Others say he caves to the same "everything is the man's fault, women are never to blame" type of thinking that the rest of churchianity pushes. I haven't done the studies he has, but for those looking, treat it the same way as with everything else (including this sub - and even my own posts): (1) always challenge everything against Scripture, and (2) take what's true and works and leave the rest behind.

Find Something to Lift around the House

1 upvotes · 20 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

But Jesus isn't a pussy. So why would I say that to him?

Someday is a dangerous word

1 upvotes · 18 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right. You go find me one.

Someday is a dangerous word

1 upvotes · 17 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I haven't seen any other content online that breaks down how to map out a person's life goals through various categories, mile-markers in each category, timelines for accomplishing the goals, etc. Feel free to refer me to as many as you think are better. But the most I've seen are people who generically say, "Write down your goals and set mile-markers," but give no actual example to look off of.

If you can't handle hearing someone share their own sinful thinking, how do you even exist in the world? Do you not have any non-Christian friends?

Someday is a dangerous word

1 upvotes · 17 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

You're still missing the point. I didn't tell anyone to watch this for its fantastic financial advice.

six words only

1 upvotes · 16 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm removing this. Feel free to repost on askRPC if you want. But this is too much of a low value gimmick post for the main sub - especially in light of u/OsmiumZulu's latest post.

Living Out of Yourself

1 upvotes · 16 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Beautiful story, sister. Thanks for sharing this! You should post this note publicly. If not here, r/TrueChristian could benefit from this too :)

A Primer to Visual Arousal Patterns

1 upvotes · 14 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Good points. Hopefully this post adds some substance to that list if/when you create it.

Living Out of Yourself

1 upvotes · 11 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

That's my issue here. If becoming a new creation is exclusively the work of the Holy Spirit

Yes, that is certainly the issue. I don't believe this view is biblical. That said, as already noted, I'm a compatibilist, not a hard-core Calvinist. This is probably where we're not seeing eye to eye.

Black pill has been generalized to mean "truth of a hopeless reality" just like red pill is generalized to refer to truths suppressed by society

Good luck trying to use that definition with any of the mods or ECs on TRP/MRP.

I do agree with your last chunk, though :)

is love between women and men real?

1 upvotes · 10 April 2020 · /r/askRPC

I think you're trying to boil down all types of love to a single kind. On that, we'll have to agree to disagree.

is love between women and men real?

1 upvotes · 10 April 2020 · /r/askRPC

God's love is defined as extending to all of humanity, even in their sin

That's not the same thing as being unconditional. It's like a TV announcement that says, "Anyone who comes to our store will get a free handbag." The invitation goes out to everyone, but it's not unconditional. They're not giving the handbags to everyone. They're conditioning the gift on you actually going to their store to get it. The benefit of God's love is absolutely conditional - if nothing else, on faith. People who reject Jesus - who don't have faith - will not get the benefit of God's love. In my view, this is the unambiguously clear truth on the matter from Scripture.

I think where you're getting hung up is that you quoted, yet ignored my clarification: "at least in regard to our ability to have access to the benefits of it." I agree that God's goodwill extends to all of humanity without condition. But God's good wishes toward you don't get you into heaven; they don't, on their own, warrant his blessings over your life; they don't give you any reason to expect something from God without SOME response on your part. Go back and re-read all of the verses you quoted, assume you're a non-Christian doomed to hell, and see if those verses still mean what you think they mean about everyone having "unconditional" access of all of the benefits of God's love, even without Jesus. That makes no sense at all.

Living Out of Yourself

1 upvotes · 9 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Very good point!

Living Out of Yourself

1 upvotes · 9 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I struggle to see how to apply it all the way through. Much of this is outside the human sphere of influence.

The primary application is to have guys really stop and look at what they want to do so that the desires of their heart are more naturally exposed. This paves the way for authentic repentance when they realize they are not who they thought they were based on the outward behaviors they present to others.

The only way this works is if the Holy Spirit intervenes. Otherwise, man is doomed to a cycle of empty behavior modification Right, which is why I didn't include this on MRP. I have to assume the Spirit is always at work in us. I suppose there are situations where this may not be the case. But I'd wager the times it's not the case are more because of people stifling the Spirit, not because the Spirit abandoned them.

The doctrine of predestination turns this into a black pill or at the very least, a divine application of dread.

I wouldn't know much about that. I tend toward compatibilism, so I don't think of things from a pure predestination mind-frame. OZ would be better for that end of the conversation. I believe I'd mentioned to him in the past my view that there are aspects of Calvinism that are incompatible with a biblical overlay. That is, one can still acknowledge the truth in each, but they no longer overlap smoothly.

How does one die to oneself without living in a perpetual state of struggle against the sinful nature, which is the true self of the unredeemed sinner?

Christians are redeemed. Non-Christians don't die to themselves. Christians do. Dying to yourself is the process of sanctification. "I must decrease, he must increase" is an apt summary of the work of sanctification (granted, not the proper context, but the phrase still applies).

Man's efforts to change are fruitless because he cannot cure himself of his sinful nature without divine assistance. So, man asks for divine assistance.

Right. But divine assistance works alongside our will. I know that concept is often lost on a Calvinist - especially if you're a hyper-Calvinist (i.e. even the choice of which socks you put on in the morning is predestined). But that's how I must answer the question all the same.

You don't know if you're 1 or 2 unless God intervenes

But I'm only talking to Christians, so only referencing #2. Or are you suggesting that God will save someone and then refuse to assist him in sanctification afterward?

Those afflicted by this must confront the reality that they might fall under category 2: no divine action. This is a black pill.

I think you're misunderstanding or misusing the black pill term. The black pill is the view that looks are the only thing that matters - that genetic factors put a rational cap on how attractive someone can be (ex. birth defects), and therefore everyone should accept their own lot with who they can pull after reaching a reasonable plateau.

But again: I'm speaking specifically to Christians, who I do believe have the capacity to ignore and reject the work of the Holy Spirit in their lives (at least for a time), otherwise all believers would be fully sanctified even in this life - or else we reach the conclusion that the Spirit is ineffective in his work or otherwise wills that people perpetuate in sin they could otherwise be sanctified of. There are way too many holes in that angle for me.

Living Out of Yourself

1 upvotes · 8 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I like that. And good reference. I'd completely forgotten about that post. Glad to hear it helped you!

Living Out of Yourself

1 upvotes · 8 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right. When they're young, they need to listen to their parents, but the goal is always to instill an internal character in them that they innately do what you would have them do without telling them to do it. This, I believe, is God's goal with us. I like the reference here.

2 "Redpill" lies and deceptions built to enslave us.

1 upvotes · 7 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

What would He want me to do? This is a/should be a Christians primary/ first thing on our minds.

Wrong. I just put up a post to address this.

But is the chase for excellence in a lot of Red Pill men out of a godly stand point or is it more primitive and debased?

If you were writing on one of the secular subs, this might make more sense. But on a Christian sub, your point is still off-base. Yes, many men might be doing it for secular reasons, but the underlying premise of the biblical reason is a godly one. If you want to say, "Stop chasing excellence the way non-Christians do and start doing it in a biblical way," that's better, but telling people it's a fallacy altogether is wrong.

our MPO is still him. That never stops

Right. But is he in you and one with you so that there, as sanctification progresses, becomes no distinction between the "I" and "Christ" in your life? Or are you still viewing Christ and his standards as external to you (i.e. behavior modification)? You seem to be missing that point.

If we're talking about virtues that we acquire and the desire to please God then I agree

We're not. Imagine a man wants to accumulate worldly wealth. He covets his neighbor's possessions. That is his internal point of origin. Does the sanctified man still have that desire for wealth and covetousness in his heart that he has learned to control? Or is the sanctified man the one who no longer sees the need for accumulation of wealth and coveting and can, instead, from the bottom of his heart rejoice with his neighbor at his successes? You act like this is an unreasonable transformation. I suggest it's not at all. I know MANY people who have EASILY been able to make such small strides.

I think your overestimating our ability for our desires to be magnified by God

I suggest you're underestimating the power of God to transform someone's heart. I'm guessing this is because you're still so tied to churchianity's behavior-modification way of doing things that you're not used to seeing those with an internal heart-change. Read through Scripture and tell me if you believe Elijah, Moses, the apostles, etc. had the type of heart you expect people to day to maintain and be unable to break free of. No, they were not perfect. But they certainly were a lot further along in their own internal point of origin than you seem to think is possible. And I see those around me daily who are living proof that this internal point of origin growth and sanctification is an actual reality, not a mythical notion.

those desires will never fully go away

In 100% complete and total fashion, sure. There will always be some desire toward sin. But you're speaking as though you don't believe God can and will actually conquer issues for us. You seem to take the view, "Once an alcoholic, always an alcoholic," believing that God will never free someone from any form of addiction - that the underlying desire will always be there.

This is simply wrong. I know MANY alcoholics, cigarette smokers, (legit) porn addicts, druggies, gluttons, gamers, etc. whose desires have actually gone away to the point where the compulsion to return to their sin isn't even remotely present - even when they re-experience their past vice. I know alcoholics who can take a drink once in a while and experience ZERO temptation to drink a second one, former porn addicts who can see a popup ad click away without the thought even crossing their mind to click on it and watch, or ex-drug addicts who legit are disgusted at the thought, even when in the presence of it (tag: /u/rocknrollchuck - haven't you affirmed this in your own life?).

I disagree tho that the MPO needs to be yours. You can have a strong frame in an MPO that is of God

You're still acting as if God is external to you. This might have been true in the OT and while Jesus walked the earth, but the whole point of sending the Spirit is so that God would be IN YOU, not external to you. Study this further.

The self- Sacrificing narrative is a biblical one, we are infact sacrifices on the altar to God

This is another HUGE misunderstanding of churchianity. Self-sacrifice doesn't mean sacrificing your desires in exchange for the behaviors God wants you to do. That's totally ridiculous.

Jesus actually says to DIE to yourself and to "take up your cross." The goal here is not to sacrifice every day your own will for his - an impossible task. It's that your internal point of origin dies away as you become sanctified and more one with Christ so that YOU die and CHRIST lives IN YOU. Isn't that the point of Galatians 2:20? That "I have been crucified with Christ and I no longer live, but Christ lives in me"?

I already know the true nature of my heart, and so does most

Right - and this is where churchianity has lied to you. It tells you that YOU are sinful as your operative identity and that sanctification is external behavior modification against your internal sinful desires. This is why churchianity is so doggone bad at getting people to stop sinning and start living rightly. Because they misunderstand the internal beauty of sanctification - that our heart is actually being transformed. "I will remove from you this heart of stone and give you a heart of flesh," right? It's not just an external behavioral change to cover over our perpetually internal evil state of being. It's that our internal state of being is in the process of becoming like Christ because we are one with him.

Infact its required for repentance,a requirement for salvation

But you're describing repentance as behavior modification. It's like you're saying, "Repentance is when you get to keep your sinful desires, but you just choose to ignore them as much as possible." That's ridiculous. Repentance is not a mere recognition that we DO evil, but that we ARE evil, and then repenting not merely of what we DO, but of who we ARE and letting who we ARE be what gets changed.

You've got a lot of potential, brother, but I think you need to keep reading the Scriptures more and more to discern some of these things and much more! I'll be excited to see where you are 6 months from now.

The 3 wisdoms

1 upvotes · 7 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm going to take this down as it seems a little bit too unrelated to the purposes of this sub. Your last post, while off, was still worth thinking about. This would make a better edit into that post than a substantive separate post of its own.

Lifting Troubleshooting Questions

1 upvotes · 6 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

The wrong thing to do is try to force it and muscle through it. That increases your likelihood of injury

Whoops. I've been lucky then ;)

You're getting heavy enough now that you will have a much harder time making progress if your form isn't really solid

I'll echo this. After all my early noob gains when I got back into lifting plateaued after about 6 months (and I know /u/SkimTheDross is much longer in than that). I had to take another 3+ months with no gains at all, just working on doing my existing lifts with better and better form, then went to start pushing up again.

and did hard-resets (completely set the bar down and come to a complete stop between reps) and built back up

Is this not how it's always done? I was unaware of other forms.

Lifting Troubleshooting Questions

1 upvotes · 6 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Good progress, brother. Others have already given good and clear input. I know my general rule of thumb is that my 5-rep sets are based on 90% of my ORM.

Remember also that a brand new ORM exists within an error margin. I've had some really good days where, at my peak last year, I was able to put up 300, but the next day I couldn't. That means that my error margin is on the low-end. So, if I were to try to bench 270 (i.e. 90%), I might only get 3-4 reps out of it on some days because I haven't fully normalized at the new PR level.

On the other end, if I can bench 300 as an ORM with high confidence and consistency, but still can't get the second rep or bump the weight to 310, maybe my real ORM is 308, and so hitting 270 for 5 reps is much easier. My ORM hasn't changed in that range, but being new to it v. acclimated to it makes a difference.

Also, the last time I was in the gym before the lockdown was with my dad. I put up 275 for 4 reps. And that was after trying 295 and failing to get even one. Logically, that doesn't follow the math of what you'll read online at all. But the body isn't always subject to those formulas - they're only rules of thumb and nothing more.

For another formulaic difference: when I was benching 300, my max overhead press was still 185. If you look at normalized benchmarks, it should have been significantly higher than that for other people with my comparable body weight and other lifts - but that's still the most I've ever put up on that particular lift.

Other times, a person has stabilizer muscles that work perfectly with one particular grip on a particular day, but the next day you're balanced ever so slightly differently that causes your stabilizers to work from a different angle, making it slightly harder to lift. This effect is exacerbated for leg lifts where it's easier to space your legs an inch or two differently, or you lift at a slightly different angle, whereas a bench is extremely mechanized in form (comparatively).

Or perhaps your particular body doesn't work on a 90% of ORM for 5-rep set rule of thumb - maybe your flow is 3-4 reps for 90%.

Regardless, I wouldn't get hung up on not being able to do something unless you were able to do it 10 times in 10 previous weeks and suddenly you can't do it the next 5 times at the gym. Then there might be something going on. Otherwise, this sounds more like a fluke.

Have you swallowed the Red Chewable Tablet?

1 upvotes · 3 April 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Now I'm curious what he said.

When do the lines begin to blur in Christianity?

1 upvotes · 3 April 2020 · /r/askRPC

/u/UpTanks is spot on. His second paragraph is pure gold. That's a great summation of my thoughts on these issues.

Most Christians Do Not Love Women

1 upvotes · 2 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

They can't force you, but they can punish you for not feminizing yourself. Yes, this is happening. The impact of the APA study finding "traditional masculinity" to be "harmful" is already reaching the courts.

Most Christians Do Not Love Women

1 upvotes · 2 April 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'd argue that a single woman can be 100% fully satisfied in Christ in this life, but she won't be "complete" as a person until the resurrection when her marriage to Christ is manifest more pragmatically and physical marriage, as we have on earth, will be done away with. To that end, I'd also suggest that the "completeness" any man or woman has on earth is still little more than a shadow of the "heavenly things" - whether they're married or not.

If a man were able to change the bible would that prove they are the 2nd coming of Jesus?

1 upvotes · 31 March 2020 · /r/askRPC

I still don't see how all these concepts are connecting for you. My underlying point hasn't changed: just because someone changes what the ink on the page says doesn't mean they can change what the original authors wrote. To do that, you'd have to be able to travel through time. And I'm pretty confident Einstein proved that backwards time travel is impossible (at best, one could travel forward in time at a slower pace than the rest of reality).

As for the end times stuff, I'm a partial preterist, so most of your conversation is lost on me as I believe a lot of it already happened. So, there's little point talking about a future anti-christ.

Married Man's Guide To Dating

1 upvotes · 31 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I can agree with that.

Is kissing before marriage a sin?

1 upvotes · 31 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

First you're going to have to read this:

https://www.reddit.com/r/TrueChristian/comments/f8vuke/is_this_a_sin_is_that_a_sin_not_the_right/. It's along the lines of what /u/Deep_Strength commented, but much more fleshed out.

Second, we have a post titled "An Official Stance on Sex Outside of Marriage," indicating that the question early on in this sub's history was whether or not SEX before marriage was even sin (conclusion: it is). Now you're suggesting that even kissing might be too?

Per ruiz's post I linked above, you have to look at Romans 14:14 and 23. If you're doing it because of your faith, it's not sin. If you're doing it for any other reason, it is. 14:14 makes it clear that there are no particular acts that are always sin no matter what, so don't get hung up on whether "this" or "that" is sin. Like Deep said, focus more on the direction you're moving.

Wife is 8 months pregnant. Need advice.

1 upvotes · 23 March 2020 · /r/askMRP

I've been a lot better at this whole alpha male stuff

This sounds like the epitome of the purple guy. "I want to maintain all my blue pill hopes and dreams, and maybe by sprinkling some alpha on it I can actually get them." Don't be like that.

When women comfort test it's not just for empathy. They want to know that it's actually safe for them to be in your frame. You can't display this if you're still weak-minded about how you view your relationship. It's like a civilian telling the Hulk when he became a pussy after getting whooped in End Game, "Don't worry I'll take care of Thanos for you." If she views you as weaker than her, she sees herself as the hulk and you as the puny civilian. It's not enough just to act alpha - she'll see through that. You must actually be it. By wording it as "this whole alpha male stuff," it tells me you still see alpha as "other" to you that you're just dabbling in. It hasn't pervaded your identity of who you internally are now.

What I'm more asking is how can I comfort her when she is depressed and feels like poop?

And pregnant. You forgot the "and pregnant" part here. You're separating her mood from her condition. Bad idea. Why? Because the "and pregnant part" is the part that pretty much guarantees you can't comfort her. No matter how hard you try to logic her brain or fuzzy up her heart, she's going to keep feeling this way.

You're too hung up on her here, which is also destroying your frame, which cripples your ability to provide her any actual comfort. If she wasn't pregnant, the answer would be simple: Hug her, let her vomit at you about all her worries and concerns, kiss her on the forehead and tell her everything will be okay. You can still do that here. But it won't actually pass the test. It'll just get her off your back while she still carries on with those worries because pregnancy hormones don't go away. They abate and come right back 5 minutes later. She will have to figure out how to self-regulate so she's not hanging on you 24/7 and you can have some time to focus on your mission.

My point here is, most guys will say: "Don't fix her problem, fix her feels." That's a solid answer. But in pregnancy, sometimes you just can't. Accept that, do what you have to do to be the oak, but ultimately be okay with moving on even if she still feels that way.

Whose game are you winning?

1 upvotes · 23 March 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Of course. A woman can and likely will divorce a man without warning as soon as she's decided she doesn't like being married to him anymore. There's never a guarantee.

That said, MRP doesn't give any guarantees on anything. Ask any mod you like. All of them will tell you: If you're doing any of this to get guaranteed results, you're a fool.

And I did note in other comments (or perhaps it was in my r/RPChristians post on these comments) that a guy would waste his time having a crappy mission that's too small and uninteresting. If his mission in life is to kill all women - that's a epic-size mission, but one no woman will ever get on board with (though it'd still probably give her the tingles seeing such raw, unashamed ambition). On the other hand, if his life mission is to eat a cheeseburger from McDonald's, even if she absolutely loves cheeseburgers and is the biggest McDonald's lover in the world, she's not going to be aroused by this because it doesn't show off any masculine qualities.

At some point, the masculine display and her affinity to your direction in life have to meet for the mission to be a binding force in your marriage.

That said, most women are willing to drop their own personal ambitions and life mission when they see an attractive man with a better life mission than their own. They will want to leech off of his drive, feed off of his passion, and orgasm off of the masculinity it takes to get his job done.

Ultimately, women WANT to be their husband's biggest fan. Unfortunately, most can't because most men are so weak and unambitious that there's nothing to cheer about in the first place. Nobody cheers over a basketball player just dribbling the ball (low ambition), nor will a PETA-lover cheer over a world-record buck a guy bags (lack of affinity). But history and experience does seem to show (as is discussed often here) that women are like clay - they will mold to their man, which includes adopting his mission, if he is attractive. That is the byproduct of satisfied hypergamy.

Whose game are you winning?

1 upvotes · 23 March 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Generic success, yes. Highest-tiers of success ... possible, but unlikely. So, I suppose this depends on how you want to define success. If it's something that can be accomplished while being fat and/or ugly, my guess is that your bar for success is too low. Think bigger.

As for the money component: "get rich" is a crappy mission, if you can even call it one. Your mission is the way you get there. Many of the examples I gave do have the end-result of becoming wealthy, but the wealth isn't the point - it's the passion for something that drives you that those around you (such as your wife, people in your social circle, etc.) can see and your excitement rubs off on them. Everyone wants money, but no one loses sleep just looking at it (except maybe Scrooge McDuck). People will, however, lose sleep and make other huge life sacrifices to write their book/play, work in the lab, make sure their organization keeps running, train their body (or their team's), hone a skill, practice their singing, or disciple other men.

Again, "make a lot of money" is a passionless pursuit. How you're going to make it, if you're passionate about it, is of value. A B-Tier replacement would be what you intend to do with the money once you've made it.

I encourage my American friends to be fully stocked, supplied, and able to effectively work from home by Sunday, 3/22, though EOD tomorrow would be ideal.

1 upvotes · 20 March 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

My setup ...

- A stationary bike. This is the one I use; goes for $200.
- A bench. This is the one I use. $100. Note: I don't have the bar, I just use it with dumbbells.
- Some dumbbells. Highest I have are 45lb. They're $90 for a ste at Walmart. That said, I probably need to get a couple more sets - 45s aren't enough to curl with anymore, but 100s would be perfect for doing heavy sets of the standing row and high-rep sets on the bench.

Now, I've bought these things over the past few years, not all at once. But even if you do have to buy it all at once, the point is that you can get basic crap for pretty cheap that will get the job done. The things I mentioned here should be enough to at least do maintenance work and collectively would be around $400 (with tax). I'm paying $75/mo for my family gym membership that we can't use anymore. If yours is comparable and this lockdown ends up lasting into summer, like some people are projecting, you could easily break even. While you might not get AS good of a workout as you will in the gym, you'll have access to keep using these things indefinitely even when you do go back to the gym. At that point, you have options. If you don't have time one day to drive to the gym, you have alternative things to do at home that knock off the 20+ minutes on your round trip.

Whose game are you winning?

1 upvotes · 19 March 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

1 and 2 just seem too focused on your wife/partner

They were meant to be. It was an explanation of how your mission improves your attractiveness. If I were addressing general benefits of having a mission, I'd certainly have included your third point, among many others.

I would just hope it's not at the expense of her own

A woman's mission IS her husband's mission. She is called by God to be his helper. God gives him a mission (i.e. he follows God), and the husband gives her a mission (i.e. she follows her husband). It would be unbiblical for a wife to adopt a mission of her own other than the fulfillment of the role God has given her. If she is married, that role is to submit to her husband. If her husband is a non-believer, than that role is to win him over to Christ through her submissiveness (1 Peter 3).

This, of course, doesn't mean she can't do other things on the side, sharing the Gospel with women she knows. And perhaps she has a weak husband who asks so little of her that she has freedom to do other great things for the Kingdom. That's fine too. But her primary role and obligation is to her husband.

For example, my parents ended up divorced. One of the primary reasons my dad cites for why he left was the fact that my mom was so committed to ministry activities with the church that she never had time for him or their kids (including me). Was it good that she was supporting the church and sharing the Gospel with other women and children in the body? Absolutely. But it was also sin to the extent that she actively defied her husband (my dad) in order to go off doing what she thought God wanted her doing at the time. Both of my parents are far worse off financially, relationally, spiritually, etc. because of all of this. It's sad to see.

Are women allowed to post?

1 upvotes · 17 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting. So you think her husband is 100% at fault for all of this? At least, that's how your reply reads. Even if that were the case, it's better to challenge people to take ownership over their problems rather than give them more and more encouragement to point the finger at someone else.

Whose game are you winning?

1 upvotes · 16 March 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I wouldn't say it's so linear. The stages can (and likely will) come in different orders for different people, and you can repeat stages if you're not paying attention. They're more like zones on a map. Some people just wander around the map and randomly find themselves in different areas, whereas others select a destination and purposely plot out the best path to get there. Obviously I believe the latter is the best, as even when the wanderer gets where he should be, if he doesn't know that's where he should be, he'll still wander away. I had that experience a number of times.

As for posts about switching up the game, u/RStonePT has done some writing on the "main event." Those posts would be a good starting place. But you have to be well on your way before you're even ready to start that discussion. Children with dynamite and all. Generally, the people who are ready to have that conversation are already self-aware enough that they don't really need it anymore.

Whose game are you winning?

1 upvotes · 12 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Right. But it would make more sense to assume some degree of common sense rather than pretending I operate on some extremist attitude.

is love between women and men real?

1 upvotes · 12 March 2020 · /r/askRPC

Right. Just be cautious with the "God's love is unconditional" bit. I believe this is part of the blue pill lie used to manipulate men into presenting an unconditional love toward their wives, letting them get away with anything, whereas women are still permitted to have conditions on their love toward their husbands.

Nothing in the Bible says God's love is unconditional - at least in regard to our ability to have access to the benefits of it. If it were unconditional, Jesus wouldn't have been a necessity. Instead, God makes faith a condition of receiving the benefit of his love. Those without faith will be cast into hell and not get that benefit.

... unless you're a universalist, in which case I'd have to argue that your personal philosophical idealism of unconditional love has eisegeted its way into how you view Scripture. But I'll give you the benefit of the doubt that you're not. But universalism is the only theological line that can actually claim God's love is unconditional; yet it's not biblical.

Whose game are you winning?

1 upvotes · 12 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

If she saves up, there will be funds in the account to cover it and I wouldn't say no.

Whose game are you winning?

1 upvotes · 12 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm confused. What are you talking about?

Whose game are you winning?

1 upvotes · 11 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

If there was any recent history of that working on me, I'd entertain the notion. But she knows very well right now that when I make a decision, that's the answer. And she hasn't tried to bring any of her requests up again since.

Whose game are you winning?

1 upvotes · 11 March 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

u/Sepean is correct. You can read more about my mission and goals on r/RPChristians, but the bottom line is that it doesn't really matter what it is as long as it's something you can get her on board with. There are some things you'll just never get a woman on board with, though, so there's that.

Does plausible deniability & hypergamy absolve women's sins?

1 upvotes · 10 March 2020 · /r/askRPC

I agree with everything /u/helaughsinhidden said to your original post. As to this particular question, I'll simply add that the prevalence of blue pill ideology throughout the world is evidence, to me, that men are even more delusional, on the whole, than women. It takes a special kind of delusion to accept such fantastical notions of how the world should operate - and the fact that I lived in that delusion for so long makes me all the more confident of the capacity of men to be at least as, if not more so, delusional than women.

What's worth noting in this is that men are conditioned this way from the start. There's no rationalization that happens - we just innately want to believe in Disney notions of "love and happily ever after." For women, there's certainly a cultural element that enables their rationalization/hamstering, but the mental gymnastics many of them go through seem to be case-by-case, meaning it's self-taught, not universally and uniformly conditioned. In other words, they come up with their own lies that they tell themselves, but they're trained by culture to believe it's okay to lie to themselves as one of their vaginal powers.

How has God humbled you?

1 upvotes · 9 March 2020 · /r/askRPC

God's humbled me in a number of ways, but the most consistently effective is that when my pride rises without my realizing it, I notice an impact in my ministry in the way it becomes off-putting to those I'm trying to reach for Christ, and this is a clear reminder to get back on track. In short, God hinders my mission until I am right with him so that I am clear that it's on his power through which I work, not my own.

Appreciation Post - For advice given 1.5 years ago and Question about how to identify Masculine Churches

1 upvotes · 9 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

Removed for link spam. A link here or there isn't a problem if you're explaining what you're linking to, but you can't just start spewing off propaganda videos.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/04/20)

1 upvotes · 5 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm disappointed with the comments you're getting on this. It seems like people are trying to get you to empathize with the position the leadership is taking here. But the fact is: they're wrong. Not just for failing to give you up-front notice of their rules. Their rules are wrong too. They are uniquely designed to prevent actual discipleship relationships from forming.

If they want to have a rule that says you can't interact one-on-one with girls in your ministry, I can at least understand that. I'm not opposed to guys discipling girls, but unless she's your wife it's probably best to stick with other guys if there are any available.

But by removing the individual relational component of discipleship leaves them with the garbage philosophy (not theology) that church work is best left to arm's-length teaching and interpersonal relationships have no part of it. Biblically, the relationship IS THE VEHICLE through which teaching occurs, not classroom environments, pews on Sunday, or couches at a small group meeting. Lesson's don't make disciples. Sermons don't. Bible studies don't. Relationships do. If they are taking out the relationship component, they're basically saying, "We don't want God to work through you in their lives; we just want you to communicate content to them and let them decide what to do with it." This is wrong and it's offensive to the Spirit and Scripture.

So what do you do with this? It boils down to a flow chart. Making disciples among the students in your ministry is impossible under their rules, so let's start there.

- Are you satisfied to communicate content and never actually disciple anyone? If so, then stay where you are and follow their rules.
- Are you committed to making disciples? If so, then where? If you're fine with communicating content to the students and making disciples elsewhere in your life, then stay where you are and follow their rules. Your vocational ministry will fail, but you will at least succeed in what God has called you to do. The leadership will simply not get credit before God for the work that you do despite them.
 - If you're committed to making disciples among your students, you have two options: (1) stay where you're at, ignore their rules to the degree they become a hindrance (follow them insofar as you can without hindring your disciple-making), or (2) leave and find another place that will not prohibit you from building relationships with the people you're trying to disciple.

Now, I know a million people are going to slap Romans 13 in your face and say that because they're your spiritual authority, you are obligated to submit to them. But remember that Paul wrote Romans 13 under the rule of Caesar Nero, who had standing orders that all Christians be killed. Do you think Paul was really compelling Christians to obey their government by turning each other in to be slaughtered? Obviously not. When Paul describes submission to our authorities, we have to take it in context of how HE submitted to get an idea of what HE meant when he wrote that. Paul's form of submission was to do what God called him to do without regard for human rules (and good luck finding in the Bible: "don't snapchat with people in your ministry" or even "adults shall not build relationships with minors"), but when he was caught he accepted the consequences of his actions, even when he had an opportunity to escape (Acts 16). He certainly defended his actions. He didn't go down fighting. And he leveraged his voice in his defense to preach the Gospel! You can do the same here. Do what you know is right, and if they want to take their human rules to protect the reputation of their brand over doing God's work, then use your defense as an opportunity to teach them why their rules are unbiblical and counter-productive to authentic relational discipler-making the way Jesus modeled it for us.

This is too big of an issue to back down on. If you give up on relational discipler-making now, you're going to lose a taste for it and end up indoctrinated to the stale, unsalted garbage that I throw away from my pantry. Your best solution is to focus on the guys, but never stop your one-on-one relationship-building. As long as you're not doing it with girls, they have less cause for concern and you can focus where you're going to be most effective anyway.

Tag: /u/rocknrollchuck - you wrote:

I know you mean well, but you're in the wrong here brother. 1 Thessalonians 5:22 says "Abstain from all appearances of evil." As much as it sucks sometimes, appearances DO matter, especially when it comes to those in official church positions.

I agree with you to the extent that keeping up appearances advances one's mission (which is often). However, in situations like this, I'd suggest you have to step on some toes to get people to move.

Also, that verse doesn't say what you quoted it as. This is why I often tell people to avoid the KJV for interpretive value (read it for pleasure, sure, but not for understanding). It is literally the only translation I know of that uses the word "appearances" there. Every other translation, especially the original Greek, translate it as form/type/kind. When the KJV translated it that way, they meant it in the sense: "When evil appears, avoid it," not the way we mean "appearances" in a colloquial sense today.

To be fair, someone else called out /u/Deep_Strength for making this same misquote, and I reamed that guy for being overly technical. But in that case, there were plenty of other passages to prove Deep's point: don't do things you know will cause others to stumble. In this situation, he's not causing anyone to stumble. He's just dealing with overly pious people who don't want to risk their good name being harmed. Sound like anyone else? The Pharisees. And even though they were the religious leaders over the Jews (and yes, Jesus was a Jew), he ignored them through and through and kept doing what God called him to anyway.

Note that several times throughout his ministry, people accused Jesus of doing evil and inappropriate things too. How many times throughout the ages have people accused Jesus of sleeping with Mary Magdalene? How many times did the Pharisees accuse him of blasphemy? Or working with Satan? People thought Jesus was doing wrong too - he presented the appearance of evil to them. Just because these people THINK he's doing evil doesn't mean he's actually doing evil and he doesn't owe them any obligation unless his behavior is in a position that will cause them to sin by doing the same things in an inappropriate way. I see no evidence of risk that this is actually going to happen, especially since the main complainants are the other staff members who have already demonstrated that their own personal boundaries are high enough that they're not going to be tempted by his actions.

Sorry, I know when you asked us to weigh in this might not have been what you were looking for, but this is how I understand the situation and what OP needs to hear.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/04/20)

1 upvotes · 5 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

For the most part I am very concerned with how others see me

Galatians 1:10 - "For am I now seeking the approval of man, or of God? Or am I trying to please man? If I were still trying to please man, I would not be a servant of Christ."

Everyone is afraid of what others think because they think others have some power over them. They assume that a wrong impression will make them not want to be friends anymore, which will lead to loneliness and depression. The irony is: over-worry about what others think of you is the EXACT thing that is keeping them from building any meaningful relationships.

Worrying about what others think is a great way to develop casual acquaintances. But you can never go beyond that. You're always too withheld to pique their interest beyond, "Oh, that person is nice." But when you stop caring, you start engaging. Yes, you're going to do some stupid things. But everyone is going to end up laughing at the stupid stuff anyway and those are part of what build the bonds of friendship - especially among men, who connect through ribbing, jabbing, and teasing each other. I have a post in my history about the differences between how men and women relate and utilize the statistics about loneliness to demonstrate that while women are generally viewed as more relational than men, it's obvious that men have much better success at building meaningful ties with others, whereas female relationship strategy (especially if you've read much about the feminine social matrix) is designed to keep other women at arm's length.

My wife was just in tears over this issue yesterday. We just moved into a new house. The neighbors have been around each other from before we moved in and she feels excluded. But she's also too introverted to do anything about it. Even when she does engage, standard female relational norms make her think she has to remain courteous and polite. But she's never going to build the relationships she wants if she stays like that. There's a task for me this week: work with my wife on her relationship-building skills.

I find myself frequently analyzing other people's actions and attempting to relate them to myself, or compare my actions to others, or question why someone did a certain thing to someone else and not me

You're acting like my wife. Stop being a girl.

This has something to do with some belief in my head that the world revolves around me

Your world does. Their world doesn't. Do you think Indiana Jones, when he's questing for some lost artifact, is worried about whether or not the people at the party he's infiltrated like him, or why they're talking to each other and not him? No.

Why? Because he's got more important things going on in life.

What's your mission? What are the more important things going on in your life? When you've got bigger fish to fry than making friends, you stop caring about making friends, and ironically happen to make more friends because you're not worrying about it and your passion for something of value attracts other people with a similar passion. From there ...

my mission is ...to become a disciple ... Now I say this, but I don't think That I truly live it out

Then it's not your mission. It's a vague obligation you feel in the back of your head that you should be living up to.

Your mission is what you're actually doing with your life. If all you're doing is just surviving from one day to the next then your mission is "to survive." That's a crap mission. But if you don't care about making disciples or being a disciple, then you can't call that your mission. It's what God told you to do, but you have to take personal investment to make it your mission.

Own Your Shit Weekly - March 03, 2020

1 upvotes · 4 March 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Right on.

Question regarding classification of beliefs

1 upvotes · 4 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

This is all kinds of screwed up. If that's really your only purpose for the question, I'm taking your thread down, as this forum isn't designed for ego stroking and personal questions that have no application to the rest of the community.

Own Your Shit Weekly - March 03, 2020

1 upvotes · 4 March 2020 · /r/MarriedRedPill

IF there was a god...do you think it would please him more that you followed his way and did well in life because his priests told you to? Or because you took ownership of your life and CHOSE to live a life he gave you?

Certainly the latter. I take the view that doing anything "because I'm supposed to" is just as much sin as doing it maliciously. While priests/pastors may at times have wisdom to share (and at many, many other times, trash to share too), if one fails to operate within their faith from their own internal point of origin (frame), they have missed the entire point of what faith is in the first place. It becomes about behavior modification rather than personal growth and development. It's like the blue pill guy who wants to sprinkle on some alpha, thinking this will get him the results he wants. It will work for a time before he utterly falls apart, unable to maintain the facade indefinitely - because he, himself, as a man, has not actually changed.

if there was a god, why wouldn't he show himself?

Missiologically, it's because God has determined that the Church (his "bride," per countless passages) would be the more glorious vehicle through which he would send the Gospel into the nations (i.e. spiritual reproduction), rather than if he were to do it himself.

By way of example, imagine if you could produce children through masturbation or genetic incubation. Would you prefer to create your offspring this way or by screwing your hot wife? I'd rather bang my wife and have her carry my children. God prefers the same - and I believe this desire of ours comes from God's desire for the church infused in us, giving us a compulsion toward sexuality to reflect his desire for spiritual reproduction through the Church.

On a more technical, theological level, I could alternatively note that God has always valued faith over knowledge.

- Jesus tells Thomas, "Because you have seen me, you have believed; blessed are those who have not seen and yet have believed" (John 20:29).
- Paul explains his methodology in 1 Cor. 2:4, "My message and my preaching were not with wise and persuasive words, but with a demonstration of the Spirit's power [which I interpret to be his testimony (i.e. story of how his life turned around)] so that your faith might not rest on human wisdom, but on God's power."

- The Bible repeatedly down-plays those who think they know something, often stating things like, "Although they claimed to be wise, they became fools" (Romans 1:22) and "Knowledge puffs up, but love builds up" (1 Cor. 8:1).

More to u/ancient_resistance, now:

I'm where I am because I followed people who told me they knew what was best.

Your anger here is certainly understandable. But it's also pointless. Everyone vies for power in some form or another. Whatever our motive for wanting that power, it's easiest to get it from other people rather than manufacturing it for ourselves or discovering it innately from within. So, it's not surprising that whoever you're referencing (I'm going to assume it's a pastor/priest) would try to get people on board with his way of doing things - because the more people who are committed to his way, the more power he has, the more he can accomplish his goals. Those goals may be noble goals, but they're still inherently his - whether he adopted them from someone else (i.e. God/Bible/another pastor/whatever) or came up with them independently.

You were the one who decided to give power over your life to him and his intellectually incompetent way of observing and understanding the world. As soon as you realize that the responsibility for your trust in him is on you and not on him (for he's just a man doing what men do, just as your wife is a woman doing what women do), you can finally enter into your own frame and begin moving forward.

As long as you're blaming someone else for your actions, you are inherently succumbing to the view that they have a power over you which they do not. This power keeps you in their frame. Even when you defy them, you only do it BECAUSE of them. Instead, you need to stop thinking about their thoughts and judgments of you altogether and figure out what you want for yourself.

Example: Imagine my kids act out. I plan to discipline them by doing X. Before I get the chance, my wife says, "You need to discipline them by doing X." If I act on it, she's going to think it's her idea. Do I change X to Y instead just to show her she doesn't control me? No. That's idiotic. Do I try to explain that I already had that idea so that she'll realize I'm doing it for myself and not her? Of course not. I just do what I was going to do anyway and let her think whatever she wants. Why? Because my life isn't defined by what my wife thinks. If she wants to think I acted on her idea, let her. If she figures out on her own that I probably already planned X anyway, that's fine too.

In the same way, don't react to the people who were running your life before. Don't get mad at them - that anger will only keep you in their frame even longer. Don't even separate ties with the person/organization/whatever. Instead, utilize the position you've already got and the connections you've made to advance your own purposes, whatever they may be. It's tempting to start fresh once you learn something new, but starting over also means giving up advantages you've built where you already are. Don't make such a decision lightly. Even if the only advantage you have is familiarity, that's still something that will take time to build elsewhere.

Question regarding classification of beliefs

1 upvotes · 4 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with /u/Praexology. You are very obviously eisegeting your own personal philosophies in how you interpret Scripture. When you do this, you're always going to deviate from the mainstream denominations because your line of theology is your own personal concoction. There are as many combinations of interpreting the numerous Scripture passages as there are people who have lived or ever will. Some of your views overlap with Catholicism, others with Orthodoxy, and others with numerous Protestant sects. For that matter, some of your views overlap with Satanism, Mormonism, Islam, etc. - as do mine. There will always be things we agree on and things we don't.

That being said, why get hung up on which denomination is closest to your theological viewpoints? I've already discussed many times on this sub that it's a relatively useless notion to pick a denomination based on who you think agrees with you the most.

I have yet to find a single denomination that 100% aligns with everything that I believe. I do find that I believe at least 1% of what every denomination teaches. Figuring out which denomination is 94% from 95% really doesn't matter much in the grand scheme of things.

From there, with regard to the "ego" concept, the way psychologists discuss the ego today is not found anywhere in Scripture. The use of the modern conceptualization of the ego is a secular interpretation of what psychologists observed in the natural order of the world under the rules and consequences God set in motion. It's the same thing with hypergamy, for example. I can talk about hypergamy until I'm blue in the face, but will never find an example where the Bible uses it as a concept the same way the secular red pill means the word. And yet I know God created women to be hypergamous all the same - and the underlying foundation for the concept has always been evident in Scripture, but under different words that lead to the same conclusions about the nature of the human race.

In the same way, unless you're witnessing specifically to psychologists (as we do to the red pill community), it's best not to over-use psychological terminology out of the context of your target ministry. Among people who will not readily identify with your terms, you're better off speaking in biblical terminology to explain your conclusions rather than using secular words that most people will not understand or identify with. Doing this makes it look (as I have suggested up-front) as though you're eisegeting Scripture rather than exegeting, which is a dangerous practice and where cults spring from.

What about BDSM and Roleplay?

1 upvotes · 2 March 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with /u/Deep_Strength. If you're asking the question, you're already in the wrong framework for understanding godliness.

A friend of mine who mods r/TrueChristian just wrote a fantastic post addressing these types of questions in great detail. I strongly recommend you read it.

Q&A on Sexual "Brainwashing"

1 upvotes · 21 February 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I don't think the connection to a workplace romance would be at all apparent to most people outside the red pill. When I first got here, I didn't understand how it connected either.

Q&A With an untrusting wife

1 upvotes · 11 February 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I'm guessing it will be too long to transcribe. I'm anticipating it to be 1+ hours per session - more akin to red man group than BPP's audio series.

Are all missions related to becoming a Pastor or Missionary? Or can it be anything?

1 upvotes · 28 January 2020 · /r/askRPC

Hah! An amusing analogy.

Are all missions related to becoming a Pastor or Missionary? Or can it be anything?

1 upvotes · 27 January 2020 · /r/askRPC

I do believe career missionaries are perfectly appropriate and necessary. The apostles and Jesus model it both ways. That said, Paul was careful never to let his financial needs compromise the message. If a vocational missionary is asking for money in a way that causes anyone to be skeptical of their ministry, I'm automatically skeptical because Paul would sooner take up tent making again before allowing his ministry to anyone become compromised. Vocational missionaries (whether local pastors or overseas workers) should follow in this example. I very much stand against almost every mega church I see because of this incongruence (among other issues).

Are all missions related to becoming a Pastor or Missionary? Or can it be anything?

1 upvotes · 27 January 2020 · /r/askRPC

It's more a frame of mind thing. To say, "I am both a missionary and IT technician" implies that they are separate vocations, as if you do your missions work when you're not doing IT work. Wording it the way he did, while sounding "sneaky," as you put it, is really a misnomer to communicate the broader concept that missions work is an underlying foundation of our identity and function in the world and that our day job is nothing more than context.

Are all missions related to becoming a Pastor or Missionary? Or can it be anything?

1 upvotes · 27 January 2020 · /r/askRPC

The guy who discipled me (Justin) often told a story of a guy we'll call Bob. Justin discipled Bob while Bob was in college. Bob was studying for a career in IT. Justin often asked him for updates and Bob would waver: "I can't decide whether to be a missionary or an IT technician." At graduation, Justin pressed him: "The time to decide is up, so what's your answer? Is it missionary or IT worker?"

Bob answered, "I've decided to be a missionary ... disguised as an IT worker."

This is the proper framework for understanding your day-job. Whether your day-job is to work in a hospital or people's homes or an office or a sanctuary, we're all missionaries. Our job merely creates context for living out our common mission to make disciples of all nations.

David and Michal

1 upvotes · 15 January 2020 · /r/askRPC

Yes, not the other way around.

David and Michal

1 upvotes · 15 January 2020 · /r/askRPC

Right. We can notice the overlap when they occur. But seeing something "through a lens" usually means you're letting that lens affect how you interpret it. We should not go into Scriptural study trying to force red pill concepts into the way we interpret the Bible; rather, we let the Bible speak for itself and marvel at the way the secular red pill crowd has independently discovered through observation of creation the same things the Bible could have told them if they'd only looked.

Empirical evidence to support RP in general?

1 upvotes · 12 January 2020 · /r/askRPC

I thought he went Orthodox?

Are all relationships that explore sexuality prior to marriage headed towards failure?

1 upvotes · 12 January 2020 · /r/askRPC

Well-put.

One Year FR

1 upvotes · 12 January 2020 · /r/RPChristians

I had fun reading this. I see a lot of growth, but I'm more impressed at your recognition of your ongoing areas of need for improvement. Keep at it, brother.

How would a turnaround for the church look like? Making it more RP than Feminist.

1 upvotes · 22 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Yes we have :p

I don't think the debate is as big as you think, though. I know a lot of people (pastors even) who will vouch for the validity of old testament law off the cuff, but I have yet to meet a single person who maintains that view after studying that particular issue directly.

How would a turnaround for the church look like? Making it more RP than Feminist.

1 upvotes · 22 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Note the context of the conversation was my telling him you can't use old testament law as an authority on the issue of homosexuality. OT law is informative, but non binding on all issues.

FR: Fatherhood. Some early observations.

1 upvotes · 17 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

splurge on conveniences for the first month

That's fair. The biggest convenience, in my view, is having a decent swing. With a good enough swing, you can have your life back for several hours. I know you're not technically supposed to, but I used to let my kid sleep overnight in those things when they were particularly cranky. Worked every time.

My son pisses straight through the disposables

Weird. I've only ever had that happen twice and it was because we went hours past a normal changing time without realizing. My experience with the cloth diapers, though, is that the pee always soaks through.

working out later on suits me

Me too. And that was my pattern at my old gym. After moving, the new gym closes at 9:30. Kids go to bed at 8 (aren't actually done with night time routines until 8:30). Add in the 10 minutes it takes to get there and time to walk in, drop stuff off in the lockers, etc. plus buffer time ... I'd end up with like 35 minutes, which just isn't worth the effort. So, night time lifting is out as an option for me for now.

invest setting up a modest home gym

I already have a bench. I just need a decent bar and weights (right now I only have dumbbells to go with it). My wife also bought a stationary bike for my birthday. I've had a treadmill before, but too many things can go wrong with them that they're just not worth it in the home.

What programming are you running?

I do a modified greyskull. I focus on the 5 main lifts still, but I drop it down to 3 sets instead of 5, and reduce the weight, up the reps each set. So, my first set is about 90-95% of my max, then I usually drop a 5 or 10 off of each side, depending on the type of lift it is for each successive set with the expectation of doing an AMRAP for the last set. The only lift I do every time is the bench (the other 4 alternate), and I do leg raises on the bench after every set to hit my abs. After doing 3-4 of the main 5 lifts, I usually pick a couple peripheral things to work. Most often it's lats or biceps.

I believe the reason for my losses has less to do with my current routine and more to do with the 2 months off from moving, then another month off after taking over my law firm. I just haven't had the time to rebuild yet. I haven't lost much, but am certainly not able to repeat a 300lb bench again.

Are you eating enough / getting enough sleep?

I probably still eat too much, so that's not an issue. If anything, my biggest aesthetic gains need to come from better dieting. As for sleep, that's always been a big, fat no for me. I average about 5.5-6 hours a night. I've been that way since high school. It's only recently (within the last 6 months) really started to affect me to the point I feel myself wanting more sleep, but my body won't let me even when I try. I'll have to work on that.

I am blessed to have a registered dietitian for a wife

That's definitely helpful. I remember commenting to my wife when we were dating on how much food she eats - most of it junk. Her reply: "It's a blessing from my dad's side of the family. I can eat whatever I want and really never gain weight."

This has mostly held to be true. While she's not flat-abbed, she does often get comments from people about how she stays so "skinny" (skinny fat is probably a better term - thin, but no toning/definition). It probably has something to do with her height too - she's right around 5'10", which is tall for most girls. Either way, the effect is that she can still eat whatever she wants, which makes it less likely that healthy foods are getting put on the table if she's in charge of the cooking for a day. I do most of the cooking and for family meal days (i.e. when we don't have company over) it's usually chicken/steak with broccoli and my son eats cereal or peanut butter.

On the kid thing again: the easy way I've resolved the food issue is simply to offer a default option if they don't like whatever I make for dinner. So, my son, who is incredibly picky, never has to eat what I make - but when he doesn't, he's stuck with PB&J. After 4-5 days of PB&J in a row, he starts to become more adventurous and willing to try new things ... then about vomits and goes back to PB&J. I know he doesn't like PB&J that much and he complains about it, but that's the point. He has to default to something unpreferable so he stays motivated to keep trying what we make.

How God Saved My Marriage

1 upvotes · 17 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent FR, brother. I bet this lesson would have been a whole lot easier if someone put up content on the sidebar about how having a mission can turn a marriage around. I mean, does anyone even talk about these things? It's so important that maybe someone should write a very simple step-by-step guide for how to develop a solid, biblical mission.

Teasing aside, I'm glad it finally clicked and you're well on your way! The next challenge is refining your mission into something that actually matters. Then you've got to develop a vision for how you're going to accomplish your mission. Then you've got to figure out how your wife and kids fit into the team that's going to carry out the mission rather than you being a one-man show.

But always bear in mind that the mission cannot be vague and directional. The mission is the destination. The vision is the direction for how you'll get there - and it must include mile-markers. If your mission is big enough, you'll need help, and that's where they come in. If you could accomplish it alone, it's not big enough. For reference: "Grow closer to God" is not a mission (it's a direction, not a destination) and you can do that by yourself. Some people like to use the cop-out: "Grow closer to God as a family" to force-in a way to need your family. But that makes your family the mission, which means they can't be helpers on the mission if they're the mission itself. Bad idea. Lots more to say, but hopefully you get the point for now.

The Truth About Porn

1 upvotes · 12 December 2019 · /r/RPChristians

It's a mutual thing.

1 Cor. 7:3-4 - "The husband should fulfill his marital duty to his wife, and likewise the wife to her husband. The wife does not have authority over her own body but yields it to her husband. In the same way, the husband does not have authority over his own body but yields it to his wife."

Some good news and some questions

1 upvotes · 26 November 2019 · /r/askRPC

I was going to respond, but /u/Deep_Strength (and several other people) already said everything I intended. This relationship is headed for long-term disaster. How do I know? Because I too have been exactly where you are. Underlying problems aside, let me skip straight to your actual questions and then not answer them:

How do I make her feel more comfortable being the one to initiate physical affection?

You don't. Men are spontaneously sexual. Women are responsively sexual. Yes, they will initiate from time to time. But don't expect that to be the norm. If she does, she's not your unicorn - she's just lying to you about her sexuality.

Is that something too awkward to talk about?

This very question is in her frame. Why do you care about how awkward it might be? If you want to talk, talk.

she never initiates herself. I guess it's just not how she is? What do I make of this and how should I react?

You don't react. Reacting is bad. It lets her create the baseline and your behaviors depend on what she does. You initiate and let her react. What you make of this is that she's a girl - not a unicorn: a girl like any other.

I'm having a hard time discerning exactly how much affection I should be showing her.

Exactly as much as you want. Not as much as you think she wants.

If I'm the prize, I can still adore the beautiful gift that she is, but too much adoration can obviously shatter that frame

You seem to be misunderstanding frame. You're trying to define your frame by "a man she's sexually attracted to" - and if you do anything that makes her less sexually attracted, somehow you "broke frame." Don't let her perception be what defines your frame. Let that come from within you. As Rollo says, it's your "internal point of origin." If your thoughts originate from external stimuli, it's not YOUR frame.

I want to tell her I miss her when I'm gone for the weekend, I want to tell her how special she is, I want to tell her I love her, etc.

In other words: you have serious emotional connectivity problems that preclude you from thinking rationally during this infatuation stage. Welcome to the club. I also married a woman who'd never dated a guy before me. She'd never kissed another man, much less slept with anyone. She verbalized her desire to be submissive to a husband. She had everything you describe and more. Yet you know my story because we've had phone conversations over exactly this. It turns out she was just like all the other girls. I just hadn't known her long enough to realize it.

My ONEitis had to wear off before that became apparent - and once you marry this girl, you're going to realize the same thing also. Not in every way. My wife isn't the slutty, branch-swinging AWALT type. Everyone expresses their AWALT tendencies in different ways and to varying degrees. My guess is that the girl you've found isn't going to go full slut or branch-swinger either. Instead, she'll express herself just like my wife did. There's a type.

But RP principles and social psychology have ingrained into me to withhold much of that (because women fiend for mystery, emotional longing, a chase, etc.)

Cool. So you know the psychology. You also know what you want to do. Make your choice and reap the consequences. That said, the fact that you still feel compelled to pedestalize her more and more and more - and verbally directly to her, even - tells me that you're still in the uncertainty phase. You know what RP says, but you don't quite believe it's true. So, you think that you'd better treat her the way you were culturally ingrained to treat a woman you like as the "safe" route, and because it's all you really know. Or perhaps there's an emotional weakness that precludes you from controlling how you feel. I don't mean controlling how you express your feelings - but how you actually feel. You should really learn this emotional self-control before delving too much further into feeding the ONEitis.

Can you guys just offer me some thoughts on how to reconcile these principles with a situation where a genuine love is really there?

You have yet to describe anything that I recognize as genuine, biblical love. All I'm seeing is emotional infatuation. This explains why you can't reconcile the concepts. The principles you referenced are irreconcilable with unrestrained emotional infatuation, but they are not at all irreconcilable with biblical love (yes, that's in the sidebar too ;)

FR: Phone Repair (WISNIFG)

1 upvotes · 26 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I rarely see anyone writing about WISNIFG techniques being applied to everyday situations, most men tend to only make use of it in their relationships

I use them in my job every single day.

Thank you Jesus

1 upvotes · 26 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Sorry, this is too low quality. You're welcome to repost this on r/askRPC.

Tips for Utilizing Passive Dread, Isn't It Toothless?

1 upvotes · 21 November 2019 · /r/askRPC

Yeah, my point was simply that there's more to it than just qualities that prove you're a good leader. You get that, though. The way you had it worded made it seem like leadership was the primary focus, though.

Tips for Utilizing Passive Dread, Isn't It Toothless?

1 upvotes · 21 November 2019 · /r/askRPC

Solid.

Women usually get offended if you bring up how pretty other women are

The one exception I'd give is passive comments about TV/celebrities. They know you're not trying to make them jealous because it's not realistic, so they're not hurt or offended. But it does show them that you have sexual thoughts broadly and not merely for her alone. Or to put it another way, it's more honest about the sexual thoughts you have, bringing out overtly what most men are too afraid to communicate in front of their wives.

It also alerts her to the types of things you find attractive without you having make it personal toward her not fulfilling that desire.

women/wives are still attracted/aroused to a man that other women find attractive regardless of moral character or not Right, as I often note that dread is a byproduct of preselection post-marriage, not jealousy itself. That probably deserves a post at some point. Even the secular guys will acknowledge that if you're trying to make her jealous, you're doing it wrong. At that point, you're in her frame, worrying too much about what she thinks or feels toward you.

"Passive dread" is becoming more attracting by being a godly, masculine, muscular, confident leader.

As well as developing wit, a better fashion sense, learning kino, etc.

Attention Whore Starter Pack

1 upvotes · 19 November 2019 · /r/WhereAreAllTheGoodMen

I was once told: "You're not really a practicing attorney until you're grossing a quarter-mil. Anything less than that and it's just a hobby that pays."

That's about what photography is for most women: a hobby that pays. And it usually doesn't even pay - or when it does, it's like $250/yr because they charged 5 friends $50 to take a few shots.

Service and Mission

1 upvotes · 12 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

He means my book on discipleship, which I wrote 9 years ago :p

Service and Mission

1 upvotes · 12 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

As the beginning of discipleship, yes. I don't think they have to accept the gospel to be served. But they do have to show that they're at least not obstinate against it and that they want what other believers have. I mean ... do we see Jesus washing the pharisees feet?

Sharing church with soon-to-be ex-wife

1 upvotes · 11 November 2019 · /r/askRPC

The legal/psychological term is parental alienation. Also ...

even if you've done nothing wrong it doesn't mean she won't twist the narrative into you being the bad guy

No matter the situation, there's always some contribution to the problem, even if it's unknowing or unintentional. And an ex will always spin it against you in court.

The Truth About Porn

1 upvotes · 10 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Very interesting idea. I like it. I'll think on it. Any suggestions?

Proposal, Engagement and Marriage Traditions

1 upvotes · 7 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Integrate better into society. Tell her: "It's sexist to assume the man should bend his knee. You should bend your knee to me when I propose." Win win, right?

Sex and Sin

1 upvotes · 6 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The role of correction is only among other believers. This is clear from every time it's brought up in scripture. It's impossible to get a nonbeliever to stop sinning anyway, so correcting them is the definition of futile. By their very nature, everything they do is sin.

The Truth About Porn

1 upvotes · 6 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

What's the story there?

what is the RPC reason for not engaging in hookup culture?

1 upvotes · 5 November 2019 · /r/askRPC

Why don't RPCs spin plates? Game lots of girls?

We have more important things in life to do. As Rollo often says, RP isn't about prescribed behaviors; it's about knowing the truth - and what you do with that truth is up to each man. The secular subs have a strong bias toward making sex with multiple women their primary mission in life. Those of us on RPC find that to be a relatively weak and useless mission and we've prioritized other things over sex such that we maximize our sexuality without having to sacrifice our higher priorities in the process.

I'm not asking for rule-centric Bible verses, moralistic judgments, or such. I'm asking for experiential reasons

Chances are, most of us have "experienced" much greater satisfaction in life through our higher priorities than those who spend their lives chasing tail.

Part of the draw for me to women is pure sexual attraction. I wanna slay as much p*ssy as I can.

Yep, we have that desire too. We just have other desires also. Part of the process of becoming attractive enough to "slay as much p*ssy as I can" is having higher priorities than pussy.

I've never had that life where I'm banging multiple girls a week.

Part of it is because you seem fixated on getting it. It's somewhat of a catch-22. You have to let it go and focus on other things than girls before you can become naturally attractive in this way. When you make it your aim, you care too much.

Most of the things I learned in church I don't know how I feel about them. The niceness and the emasculation

Yeah, we're not for much of that either. Churchianity is more interested in stereotypes and tropes than truth.

I'm wondering if this whole monogamy thing is really doable or even smart, or just part of the beta male feminist universe

Look, at the end of the day you can make whatever choices you want. There will be consequences to those choices. Heaven and hell are real places. If you want to accept the consequences of such an eternal decision, that's on you. No one can force you to choose Christ. If you want to go screw around with a bunch of girls making the same choice, go for it. But if we're right about the Bible, there really only seems to be one logical conclusion - only one "smart" choice.

As for monogamy itself, I often teach that men are inherently polygamous. We live in a monogamous culture, though. The laws enforce monogamous relationships insofar as marriage is concerned. So, either don't get married and screw whoever you like, or get married and deal with the pains that come with divorce. Or stay monogamous. Again, you pick whatever path you want, then deal with the consequences. Yes, there are negative consequences to being a Christian. We've simply decided that the benefits outweigh the costs. If you come on the other end of that spectrum, I believe you'll come to regret it one day, but that's still your decision to make, not any of ours to make for you.

what a Christian alpha is

There is no such thing as a "Christian alpha." There are alphas and there are non-alphas. There are Christians and non-Christians. It's like you're asking, "What's it like playing the piano as a black man? Tell me about being a black piano player." The answer is clear: It's exactly the same as when white people play the piano. The color of their skin doesn't make the instrument work any differently. Yes, they might play a different song with the instrument because of their cultural experiences that differ from others - or maybe they play the same song. It doesn't really matter. At the end of the day, the piano and the skin color are separate entities in themselves.

In this context, non-Christians might use alphaness to slay pussy because that's their highest mission in life. Christians might use it to advance other purposes we think are more valuable to our long-term interests. At the end of the day, alpha is still alpha regardless of whether it's coming from a Christian or non-Christian.

On creeps and romantics and obedience to God

1 upvotes · 4 November 2019 · /r/RPChristians

As I noted elsewhere, I think what /u/lololasaurus was alluding to is the fact that a man's compliance to his wife is what's unattractive and makes him less attractive to her. The guy could be earning 6-figures and still doing most of the household chores himself. The issue isn't one of whether or not he does chores. It's the reason why he does them. If he does chores because his wife nags him into it, then his motivation is to appease his wife - an unattractive reason. If he does it because he's a responsible man who doesn't need his wife to tell him what to do, then he's attractive.

Encouraging leadership in with non-rp husband

1 upvotes · 31 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

And speaking for myself I don't mind a little (or even a lot) of extra weight. And again, speaking for myself, attraction is a large part mind game

But that's just the thing - you're only thinking for yourself here. Are you so sure that he thinks the same way on this? If he's at all like 99.999% of other men, he doesn't. He might make you think he does because he's too afraid to disappoint you or to sound shallow in any way. Culture has conditioned him to give these types of responses. But you're not dealing with what he says; you're dealing with his biological impulses and how to trigger them.

I am not talking divorce

You said this to someone else too. Whenever you say, "I know we're not supposed to divorce, but ..." it doesn't matter what follows the but. You're talking divorce. The thought is running through your head. You wish you could divorce. If it wasn't unscriptural, you'd already be gone. Kind of like when a guy is tempted to lust - he sees another girl. If he wasn't bound by marriage, he'd be gone. Jesus says he has committed adultery in his heart when he's hit that point. You've committed divorce in your heart, hence the second of the two options you gave to /u/Deep_Strength - "2) I disconnect."

And I emphasize things like my choosing and expressing gratitude in this Christian subreddit as that is common advice for people in situations like these - particularly Christian women - to focus on the good and positive.

Ah yes, the typical Christian advice that works so well for most couples. Laura Doyle has some good stuff, for sure. And I'm not saying it's bad advice. But, as with most Christian advice - while good, it's utterly incomplete and only accounts for the way things should be without considering how they actually are.

That advice assumes a woman's inner character and attitude toward her husband should be the most important thing to solve every problem for her in marriage. Why? Because they (mistakenly) think that's what the Bible says should be true. But the fact is that weight issues, for example, are not "contributing issues." They are foundational. That's why the only bolded post on our sidebar is "Lifting is Not A Suggestion."

I am certain there are fat couples still having passion and intimacy in their lives

You may be right. There are also people under 6'0" who are good enough to play in the NBA. So yes, there are overweight people who are exceptionally skilled enough in other areas to maintain physical passion. If you're not there, start with the low-hanging fruit first. Rather than trying to up your respect/submission game from an 8 to a 9 and hope that solves all your problems, try upping your physical appearance game, as that's where most of your easy improvements will come from. Not to say it will be easy. It won't be. Losing weight is HARD work. I know first-hand. And when you start to see some results, you'll be tempted to get complacent and quit. Don't.

To be clear: I do get what you're saying. This isn't the only issue. There will be other things that need addressed. Other insights you're getting here are good too. But, in my candid opinion, you're wasting your time working on things you're already competent at. Could you get better? Absolutely. But start with your weakest areas first. This is not one of those situations where you play to your strengths - especially if doing so hasn't been working for you so far.

Killing the Blue

1 upvotes · 31 October 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I can't believe I'm the one saying this, but you and /u/Blarg_Risen are way overthinking this.

My point was simple: rather than letting a woman or culture tell a man how he must lead his family and what roles he will or won't fulfill, he should decide for himself. It doesn't matter what is nature from nurture - he can deny them both if he wants.

The reason this doesn't go into an "everything in the entire spectrum" result is that there are still clear data points that are attractive and not and which will trigger sexual tingles in each gender. A guy can choose not to live up to these data points if he wants, as long as he agrees to bear the consequences on his sex life. He can choose what his priorities are. He can't let his wife or culture or Rollo Tomassi or some random endorsed contributor on MRP or TRP tell him what his boundaries should be. At best, they can give insights (whether reliable or not) on strategies that can help him accomplish the goals he sets for himself. But if they're telling him he must change his goals, that's where it all goes awry. Yet this is exactly what wives and culture demand of us. Hence many of the points in my post.

Is my marriage salvageable?

1 upvotes · 23 October 2019 · /r/askMRP

Then support isn't as much an issue. Who saves more for retirement?

Is my marriage salvageable?

1 upvotes · 23 October 2019 · /r/askMRP

Right ... so he read the books before he ordered them?

Is my marriage salvageable?

1 upvotes · 23 October 2019 · /r/askMRP

If he's a reasonably higher earner (i.e. more than 20% higher income than her), right now he's looking at 6-7 years of support. If he waits too much longer, that's going to turn into lifetime support. It also means another several years of accumulating retirement benefits, interest in the market, asset value appreciation, etc. that's all going to be split rather than nipping that in the bud now.

That decision's got to be made quicker if he wants to limit his damages. Of course, doing another separation, but legalizing it this time would offer some protection.

Amused Mastery, Outcome Independence, Agree and Amplify, Frame, etc.

1 upvotes · 21 October 2019 · /r/askRPC

In addition to what /u/Praexology said, the way you explain how "they come together" is really, really broad. It's like saying that (1) having a stable prayer life, and (2) memorizing tons of Scripture are basically "not separate from each other per-se" because "the higher one's spiritual maturity, the more easily one will be able to" do these things regularly.

The fact is, they're very different concepts. You can be great at one and awful at the other - even among "spiritually mature" people.

App Review: BodBot - Two Thumbs Up

1 upvotes · 19 October 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Yes, I use it off and on. It's not as good as one of the standard gym routines, so I don't use it for that. But it's excellent for home routines once you learn to filter out all the worthless exercises it throws in there.

Question: Understanding Passive game vs. Approaching

1 upvotes · 18 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Passive game sets the difficulty. Active game is the game itself. A guy who has mastered passive game (physique, confidence, social status, etc.) is playing on easy mode and doesn't need to apply much effort to win the active game. A guy without good passive game needs immaculate excellence at active game to have success - but it's still doable.

Another way to think of it: passive game sets up for longevity, whereas active is about short-term wins. Without a passive foundation, the active game can never be maintained indefinitely, turning you into a fraud. If passive game is the foundation and active game is what's built on top of it, what happens if you have a tiny foundation with a massive active game on top - like an upside-down pyramid? It's going to topple. Focus your effort on the foundation and you really don't need much at the top to be effective, though it still helps.

Wouldn't God's mission for us to become like Him in passive game by acquiring the Holy Spirit and then the active (thoughts, words, deeds) game that proceeds from that will be more "powerful" and attractive in that one is rooted on the foundation of God's mission and then the mission is able to translate into active game more fluidly?

This question is somewhat incomprehensible to me and seems to confuse concepts. If you're talking about evangelistic/spiritual game, then it makes more sense. Yes, learning how to follow God and do so in front of others is a good parallel to passive game (i.e. what I call passive evangelism in the 300 series). Actively and verbally proclaiming the Gospel to others is parallel to active game (what I call proclamational evangelism). But these are the spiritual truth behind the shadow that we call dating. Don't confuse the shadow and the real thing.

Now, as a matter of technicality, anyone who lives by the Holy Spirit will invariably take care of his body through exercise and dieting, will be maintaining his household in good order, will be effective at building relationships and earning respect in his community, will be diligent at his job, and will know how to season his conversations with salt. So, yes, living the Biblical life will inherently encompass all necessary aspects of passive game in a dating context as well. But when you say "acquiring the Holy Spirit," it gives the impression that you mean something more akin to what churchianity would put out as the Christian lifestyle, which almost certainly doesn't include things like going to the gym or learning how to say no to people, etc.

The main part I get stuck up on is that I approach women I find attractive, but feel as if I'm expending too much energy on that. I usually try to invite women to Church and things that I'm already going to, planned myself, etc. so that I'm not wasting the valuable time and resources that God gave me. Where I struggle is the "attention" part and valuing that.

You're thinking about this too much. Your mission is to make disciples (which is not to be confused with evangelism alone). This process is 5-fold:

- Tell others what to do
- Show them how to do it
- Let them try in front of you
- Send them out to do it on their own
- Commission them to pass this process on with others

How does a girl fit into any of these roles? It could be that you're teaching a small group and you want her to help (1) invite more people to learn from you, (2) type up hand-outs for your content, (3) tell stories that support your message, (4) invite you into her networks that could use your teaching, (5) take care of logistics so you can focus on teaching. Interested in a girl? See if she'd do any of those for you. Then her time is worth your attention.

But it's not just about teaching - you also have to show people through your own life. So, if you believe a disciple serves the impoverished, ask her to (1) help you serve at a soup kitchen, (2) raise funds for kids without lunch money at school, (3) research what social needs are greatest in your city, (4) contribute her own funds to a cause that helps your influence in making disciples, etc. Or perhaps you're not trying to prove service, but you do want to show that a disciple knows Scripture, so you ask her to (1) help you review verses you memorized, (2) quiz you on a passage you studied recently, (3) study a passage with you, (4) brainstorm different ways to apply a particular verse, etc. And in all this you're showing her through your own lifestyle what you value as being a disciple, and asking her to help develop your own character for these things.

Part of the process is letting them try - so perhaps you start delegating responsibilities to her that help your mission: (1) ask her to study a passage and show you what she comes up with that might give you a new perspective, (2) you test her on her scripture memory and perhaps learn some new important passages for yourself, (3) ask how she values serving those in need and if you can watch her do it sometime, connecting you with those she's serving so your social network expands, etc.

See how this works? You disciple her, but you're also using that as the context for getting to know her better - but in a way that advances your mission. And as you get to the "send her out" phase, you've really got someone who is doing your work, but in a social network that you couldn't otherwise reach because she knows people that you don't and she can reach a gender that you won't have as much influence among. And then when you invite her to pass on all of this to someone else, the people she passes it on to will now be advancing your mission even though you've possibly never even met them.

That's not to say you can't employ active game for more typical things like going out to dinner or watching a movie. Rather, I always try to find a way to link those things with my mission, redeeming them rather than abandoning them.

For example, I enjoy watching Netflix with my wife. Rather than picking a random interesting show, I strategically pick shows that I know other people are watching so that I'm doubling my effort: quality time cuddling with my wife on the couch, while also ingesting an aspect of culture that will help me relate with someone else who enjoys that same aspect of culture. Watching that indie film that no one has ever seen before, but happens to be a really good movie ... does nothing for my mission.

On the flip, she got me onto this "big picture" show on Netflix. It's totally not my normal taste, but it's full of interesting trivia. The first episode was on the crime industry and its significance (both good and bad) to the world. Within 24 hours of watching that episode, I found myself in conversation with a police officer, referencing the things I learned in the episode to build a conversation. He loved the fact that I seemed to understand his world better than most people - all because I watched a TV show episode and learned a few tidbits of information. That's value - not because I know random tidbits, but because I was able to repurpose my TV time toward building a new relationship through fascinating conversation on stuff I otherwise never would have thought about, which can now be leveraged for disciple-making as he and his wife will be in our small group.

In the same way - if you're going to employ active game through non-missional activities, contemplate ways that you can repurpose these activities to be missional. Otherwise, the focus is purely on her and "the relationship" which for Christians leads to blue pill ideologies of what could evolve and the way to go about doing that.

Question: Understanding Passive game vs. Approaching

1 upvotes · 18 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Assuming you're single, yes, approaching women is still a good idea. The reason for the approach is what changes the value from a positive to a negative. If you approach because you have these fantasies of getting married and having lots of sex, you're going at it the wrong way and ultimately doing yourself more harm than good. If you're approaching because you've got important crap going on in your life and you need help getting it all done, then you're doing it properly.

As /u/Deep_Strength said, the passive things you do to improve your life are going to increase the quality of the person you invite to help you. The active part of it is actually inviting her to help you. The passive aspects are worthless if they don't become active at some point - but make sure that your active mentality is always mission-focused, not tied up in the notion that you want to get married just because it's "the thing to do" or because you think it's going to make your life full of all kinds of joy just by owning a ring. If you're using game (passive or active) to fulfill blue pill fantasies, you're still blue pill. I'm not even convinced that "purple" even exists at all, though I still use the term from time to time as a matter of convenience.

So, as Deep alluded to, passive "game" is self-optimization toward your mission. God called you to make disciples. You can be mildly effective with mild stats. An obese guy who's addicted to video games and still lives with his mom because he has no job - he might be able to make a disciple here or there, but it's going to be super hard for him to gain much traction for Christ within his sphere of influence because he really has no sphere of influence. Get him a 6-pack, a decent wardrobe, charming personality, social status with a large network of friends and acquaintances, etc. and suddenly everyone wants to be discipled by him and people will hang on his every word. That includes women. And the larger a guy's following becomes, the more he's going to need help managing everything going on in his life - and what better way to get that help than to start asking hot, single women to do things with and for him? And the more helpful they are, the better a candidate they become for marriage.

[FR] "Happy Life, Happy Wife" & Empathy Theory

1 upvotes · 18 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Hamilton is my jam! But my love of musicals is no surprise here.

Women typically value group success over individual success

This is only true among women

I disagree with you here, because if a guy is doing loser-ish things it will lower her standing within her girl group ... women use men to raise their status around other women

You're not disagreeing with me here - you're just still talking about her status as among other women. But between a husband and wife alone, taking out the other women, the wife almost always becomes competitive against her husband for authority, playing the martyr on who does more work around the house, who cares for the kids more properly, etc. This is not a group-benefit dynamic at all.

I am very direct if I like or dislike something, and while I agree that removing attention is effective at training

That's not what I was implying. I simply meant that you should show her your good mood through your actions rather than announcing it up-front. Again, I'm happy to be proven wrong, but this type of announcing/verbalization often undermines the effort. The way you talk also makes it sound like you're stiff in your communications. Better just to be fun and friendly and let that rub off naturally rather than commanding her to accept it, which is often received by women as a challenge rather than an invitation - and you don't want to put them in a mood to fight back.

You are pigeonholing yourself into just classically conditioning your wife

I wouldn't even call this conditioning at all. It's just a guy doing what a guy wants to do. If your goal is to condition your wife, your strategy may be slightly more effective ... but it also puts you too much in her frame. Long-term, you might win at conditioning her, but you're going to lose attraction in the process. A woman attracted to a man will adapt to him on her own; a man trying to condition his wife becomes unattractive over time and the conditioning ultimately loses ground when he stops making an effort of it. Stop worrying so much about what she thinks. You do you. Let that be that.

I believe this is a cultural disposition and can be trained out.

Again, you're worried too much of what she thinks or feels. The more you try to train her, the more resistance you're going to get. It may work in the end, but it's going to take multiples more effort than the more broad "you do you" approach. Don't live in her frame.

I'm of the mind that, even if I'm not sure why it works

Works to what end, though? To improve her mood in the moment? Sure. To improve her attraction toward you? Less likely.

[FR] Comfort Test About Finances and More

1 upvotes · 16 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

They're won't be for everyone, but will be for some. I do have exclusively joint accounts with my wife, but have contemplated doing away with this, as it gives her too much access to spend money without me knowing what on. This has been an issue at various points in our marriage. For us, we make enough money that the problem is less about what's actually being spent than it is sm authority issue ... but I'd hate to be in that position on a tighter budget.

Also, there are legal and psychological benefits to consider.

[FR] Initiate Often, Confident Always

1 upvotes · 15 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

If a man is divorce-proof, and his wife would lose immensely more by losing him, would her perception of the power dynamic favoring him raise his SMV to her specifically?

No. I see this ALL THE TIME in my career. The woman just feels trapped. She does not like him more. She just knows she can't leave ... until a white knight comes to save her.

Developing charm?

1 upvotes · 15 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Is that research based on what women say or what actually makes them tingly?

[FR] Initiate Often, Confident Always

1 upvotes · 15 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I just gave a reply to that last bit to the other guy. Feel free to read my answer there.

[FR] Initiate Often, Confident Always

1 upvotes · 15 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

did/does this make you lose respect/desire/love for your wife?

Too many people try to lump words like "love" and "respect" as holistic concepts. "Do you love your wife?" could simultaneously evoke both answers. I love her smile is just as valid an answer as I don't love her nagging. The refrain comes: "Yes, but do you love HER?" But who is she? What defines a person? Is it a mere balancing act, asking if the things I appreciate about her outweigh the things I don't? You can see how quickly the conversation can become existential and so theoretical as to be moot.

To break away from the holistic view: Yes, the constant rejection in that phase of life made me lose an incredible amount of respect and desire for my wife in a sexual context. No, it did not decrease, for example, my respect for her ability to crunch out tax returns (her job) or love for the way she'd help care for our kids.

I'm curious if the interrelational RMV shifted between you and your wife, putting her in the position of losing more if you left

You might be blending RMV and SMV in a weird way here, when I think you really mean to reference the power dynamic in the relationship (i.e. the cardinal rule of relationships). RMV doesn't quite touch on this in the same way, as it draws from principles of not only sexuality, but also contribution to entirety of a person's life. Beta guys, for example, have relatively high (yet capped) RMV because they bring a lot to the table in terms of personal servitude, financial provision, flattery, validation, etc. SMV describes only the way those things affect sexual interest in another person. A high RMV makes a woman think, "You have a lot to offer me," whereas a high SMV man makes a woman think, "I need to have a lot to offer you." Power in a relationship is characterized by the balance of each of these respective scales relative to the other.

There are two ways for a man to increase his power and assume a position of dominance in a relationship (i.e. the attractive position that makes a wife sexually attracted to him): (1) up his SMV/RMV to a point that surpasses hers; (2) decrease her SMV/RMV to a point that falls beneath his. This latter one sounds stupid because why would a guy want a less attractive wife? But in reality, this dynamic functions on two perspective planes:

- The wife's frame: If a wife perceives her man's SMV/RMV going up or hers going down, the power dynamic will change even if the objective qualifiers are unaltered. A great example of this is battered women. Objectively, any outsider to the relationship will reject this man as having an incredibly low RMV to a degree that undermines any SMV he might otherwise have. Nobody wants to be in relationship with an abuser, even if he is otherwise sexually attractive. However, the battered woman is already in a relationship with him, already depends on him, already has a psychological bond with him, and therefore perceives his RMV as way higher than it actually is. As a result, he maintains the position of dominance in the relationship, even though he is objectively a bad-egg. More commonly, rather than her perception of his SMV/RMV is a wife's perception of her own. Highly self-conscious women post-marriage will often not realize the value they bring to the table, and therefore might believe their husband holds the position of dominance in the relationship when in reality he's the lucky one, as he's generally less attractive and has less to contribute than her. This also occurs when a man is skilled in the art of playful (rather than mean/harsh) negging.
- The man's frame: The wife's framing of the power dynamic matters to the degree of receptivity she has toward her husband. Perception is everything, so his being objectively attractive means very little if she doesn't find him attractive (or at least more comparatively attractive than she believes she is). However, the same is true in the inverse for a man - if the man doesn't realize he has more power than his wife, even though she sees him in the position of dominance in the relationship, he won't ever make use of the power he doesn't realize he has. Interestingly, flip the roles slightly and let him perceive himself in a position of power, even if she does not see it (perhaps the most common circumstance that leads to Rambo-ing) and suddenly he is happier all the same, even if she is not yet responsive to his self-perceived dominance. Why? Because a man who has regained his sense of self-worth has abundance, options, and confidence. This attitude, then, becomes attractive, having the eventual effect of raising his SMV to his wife's perception - not necessarily past her perception of her own SMV/RMV, but at least some change in the dynamic.

My point in saying all of this is simply to say that the power dynamic doesn't actually change until a perception shift takes place. The internal balance from rejection "killing my confidence" to "improving my confidence" did not improve my self-perception of my SMV/RMV, but it did decrease my perception of my wife's SMV/RMV - because what good is it to have an attractive wife she isn't willing to be sexual with you (i.e. rejection)? So yes, the balance of power shifted slightly in my favor - not because I became a better man, but because I perceived her as a worse wife. I became less attracted to her and therefore needed her less - not necessarily to a tipping point that I perceived myself as higher-value than her on the open market, but it was a start.

In terms of her frame, her rejection of me and my succumbing to her rejection probably validated her view that she was in the position of power: because she could decide whatever she wanted and I would go along with it like a good little boy. This did not make her perceive herself any higher, but it did decrease her perception of my SMV, therefore validating her position of power.

So, while I felt more empowered in the relationship through this constant rejection, so also did she - so no, she was not put in a position of losing more if I left. This is particularly true when you realize that all of this only effectuated internal changes in our own perceptions, but did not affect objective reality on the outside either. The fact is: despite my increased confidence and decreased perception of her SMV, she was still an attractive woman and I was still an obese man-child who didn't bring much to the table except a paycheck, which wasn't even a necessity given that she had/has a comparable job. So, in that sense, no changes were made to the balance of power in any objective sense.

it gives me the relational upperhand because I am able call bluff and not lose more than she would

I think your previous sentence hit closer than this one. It increases your confidence. It does not actually give you the upper-hand in an objective sense or relative to her frame. And until she is in your frame, her frame still matters to the degree that perception matters.

Am I sinning by robbing my SO of the chance to validate me?

Where does the Bible give her that right to be your validator? It doesn't. In fact, it is sinning to let your validation come from her in the first place. As I often cite Paul, "I do not care if I am judged by you or any human court. I do not even judge myself. My conscience is clear, but that doesn't make me innocent. It is the Lord who judges me" (I think that's in 1 Cor. 4). See also Galatians 1:10 about not worrying about what other people think of you. This includes your spouse. Jesus's emotions aren't hung up on our validation of him.

I'm curious if your approach to your relationship is that you: A) Don't lose confidence by being rejected, but also don't feel validated by being accepted.

First, rather than "don't lose confidence by being rejected" I would re-write it: "gain confidence by being rejected." As for the second half, it's not sin to feel validated; but it certainly becomes damaging to a relationship if your enjoyment of validation from the relationship becomes something you depend on. In that sense, I would prefer a guy receive no validation from his spouse at all and have that come purely from God rather than that he would depend on validation from his spouse. Somewhere in the middle is more appropriate, but when first getting started guys don't know how to find a balance so they need to be pushed to one extreme or the other.

B) Don't lose confidence by being rejected, but allow yourself to be validated by spousal acceptance/confirmation

It's probably worth noting here that in addition to enjoying validation when it comes there is a point where one enjoys it too much, even without depending on it, that it can negatively affect his frame, as he starts to weigh his appreciation of her validation of him more than his own internal sense of self-worth, even if he had his sense of self-worth to fall back on all along.

C) Something else entirely

Probably the best way I'd put it is: (1) Increase confidence by being rejected, (2) appreciate validation when it comes, but don't depend on it or revel in it for too long.

[FR] Comfort Test About Finances and More

1 upvotes · 8 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I don't necessarily pick up on this from OP, but for reference purposes: what you're talking about is a covert contract.

AWALT and M/W-Complex

1 upvotes · 8 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting story. You should elaborate on that a bit more and what lessons you've learned since then and make a post on it.

AWALT and M/W-Complex

1 upvotes · 8 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, true. That's the difference between RMV and SMV.

A Friendly Plea

1 upvotes · 3 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, without any knowledge of what you teach on those subs, we can't let them be publicized. Thanks for your efforts, though. Maybe as we get to know you and your views on things, our thoughts here will change.

Is there a subreddit for people who are real christians but don't go to church?

1 upvotes · 1 October 2019 · /r/RPChristians

When you want to speak as a mod, click the "distinguish" button under your comment - preferably even "distinguish and sticky" if you want it to appear as the top comment.

Men of Iron

1 upvotes · 25 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

Well, every website that claims to talk about biblical masculinity will claim to have some unique insight on what it means to be a "true man." Even RPC.

But talking about men's issues, and even supporting men in a modern feminist culture doesn't make something "red pillled." Noobs do this all the time - "My church is pretty red pillled." Why? "Because they believe in biblical marital roles, headship, etc." Okay, but that's not what the red pill is.

The red pill is inherently an understanding of intersexual relational dynamics as they actually function, rather than how people say they function. That's all. It is not a prescription on how a person ought to behave. You can do with that knowledge what you will.

However, just as with "faith," it's 99% probable that if someone doesn't adjust their behaviors because of what they believe about Christ, they probably don't have actual, real faith; and if someone doesn't adjust how they relate with women based on what they learn from the red pill, they probably haven't actually swallowed the pill, despite having some rote intellectual awareness of the ins and outs of it all. So, if a guy claims to have red pill awareness, but still holds onto his blue pill hopes and dreams, or otherwise doesn't seem to live up to any rational implications of red pill knowledge, he is at best purple - or in faith terms, "luke warm," claiming to have knowledge of God and to be a believer, but not actually living up to it in practice most of the time. It's playing games instead of playing the game.

So, before calling another organization "red pillled," I'd want to know: are they aware of things like fitness tests? Do they realize that things like AA or fogging or whatnot are effective conflict resolution tactics that increase respect and attraction, or are they using other methods that are less effective? Do they know the difference between a "nice guy" and a "good man"? These types of questions and more are what give greater insight into just how "aware" the organization's communicators are about how intersexual relational dynamics actually function today. Simple puff pieces for men mean squat in deciding if someone is red pillled. It doesn't mean it's unimportant; it's just distinct from being red pillled.

Lifting Questions

1 upvotes · 23 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

Is it a good idea to have a recovery week every few cycles to lift light (65-70% of training load)?

The guys to listen to say yes. I realized my best gains without any off-time or light weeks. But I was also going for rote strength, not physique. The recommendations are different. Physique inherently relies on lower weights for more reps, which is a lot easier on your body in general.

How long should you stay on a program before switching?

I agree with Deep. Go until you plateau.

Is testing your 1RM's worth the risk and something to do periodically?

I only do it with a spotter. I haven't done it in 4 months. No, it's not worth it other than bragging rights.

Is going to failure and set it down on the safeties the better way like I am or de-load the WM to where I can get 20?

That depends. If your goal is strength, stick with the higher weight, even if you can't get the full 20. But the fact that you're doing WMs at all tells me you're going for physique, in which case you're better off lowering the weight to go for the higher reps.

Indonesia to outlaw sex outside marriage

1 upvotes · 20 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

Right. Respect does still have to be earned. That's another backwards aspect of liberal culture that assumes respect should be your default attitude toward people, even if they haven't earned it yet.

Indonesia to outlaw sex outside marriage

1 upvotes · 20 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

Right. But the gospel is one of those and yet I can still respect many of those filthy heathens who believe it's false.

How does Christianity affect AWALT & Hypergamy?

1 upvotes · 20 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

Does your gf have an arm? Dude! My wife does too. I guess AWALT. Oh wait, God shouldn't want us to stereotype women, so we'd better just never assume that a girl we meet has an arm. For all we know, it's just a really good prosthetic.

Awkward to talk that way, right? Of course women have arms. There are general rules, and there are outliers. But there are also women with long arms/short arms; fat arms/skinny arms; dark toned arms/light toned arms; etc. The fact is, God created all women with arms. He created all women with hormones. He created all women with the purpose of helping. And when we sinned, he decreed that all women would be cursed through Eve. AWALT represents the inclinations inherent in women (whether or not they express them) that are a product of (1) creation, or (2) their sinful nature. It's that simple. The red pill figured out what those trends are through observation; we see it through reading the Bible.

Hypergamy is also a God-created phenomenon that was perverted by the fall. God designed it for good. Women perverted it for evil. But it's a sub-category within AWALT. God created all women to want to follow a capable leader (AF). The curse of the fall is that all women then want their man to be subservient to them (BB). That's hypergamy.

"she's not yours, it's just your turn"

This is a concept straight from the Bible as well. "You are not your own, you were bought with a price." We belong to Jesus. God gives others into our lives within our responsibility - our students, disciples, a wife, children, etc. They belong to God; but he gives us a turn with them, and we are to steward our time and relational energy with them in a manner best suited to advance His Kingdom.

Per the fall, this concept has become perverted. Instead of, "I'm not yours, I'm God's" it has become, "I'm not yours, I'm his." And men do this too. AWALT. AMALT - "I don't belong to my wife, especially now that my heart is really with some other woman."

The fact is, some men get to keep their turn for an entire lifetime before giving her back to God. Others get to keep her for a few years before she runs into the arms of another, before she ultimately goes back to God. But no matter how it plays out, she's on loan and is never yours to begin with.

Even under secular terms, the goal of the phrase isn't to convince men that their wives absolutely will cheat on them, which is absurd and grossly against observable reality. It's to point out to men that you don't own your wife, so stop pretending you should be able to control her every move, emotion, decision, etc. Enjoy her while you've got her, but don't wrap your entire life around keeping her by your side. If she leaves, deal with it. Oh well. But don't try to force her to do anything because you're just going to end up in her frame and digging yourself into an even deeper hole. That's it.

How does Christianity affect these "truths"?

It doesn't. The truths are a product of the way God created the world. That's like asking: "I heard we're supposed to love our neighbor. How does Christianity affect this concept of loving my neighbor?" Uuuh ... it doesn't. Christianity is the one that came up with the concept in the first place.

Help! Stunned by wife

1 upvotes · 20 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good word, brother. Glad to see you take the time to comment this.

An Interesting Study Indicates Men and Women Sin Differently

1 upvotes · 18 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I couldn't have said it better myself. Seriously ... if I tried it would have been way too long and convoluted.

[FR] Wife goes off the rails, did I 90% pass my fitness test?

1 upvotes · 18 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Maybe we need some F.R.s of women being good humble and obedient to the husband REGARDLESS of his poor planning and health etc.

You're not going to get them.

1. Women don't act properly "regardless" of their husband's poor choices; their good behavior is a byproduct of his right choices. Toss in the husband's "poor planning and health etc." and you get an upset woman, not a magical unicorn.
2. FRs like you're suggesting would essentially communicate: "Men, you don't need to get your life sorted out because women will just automatically treat you right even if you are a fat loser who doesn't know how to handle conflict." Very counter-productive. They would undermine the work we're trying to accomplish here, even if an extremely rare outlier event like what you're describing were to occur once in a blue moon.

Now, to be fair: I can give plenty of examples where my wife has chosen proper behavior over improper behavior, even without my prompting. It's just not the default state and it's not the problem situation we're trying to help men figure out how to work through. If it's not broke, don't fix it - so no FRs necessary to tell guys how to deal with the functional times. We're here to help through dysfunction when it arises.

[FR] Wife goes off the rails, did I 90% pass my fitness test?

1 upvotes · 18 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

It's a fine line. Athol Kay in MMSLP talks about the difference between fitness tests and actual needs for help.

I learned that early on when my youngest was a baby. My wife is breast feeding and asks for the remote. It wouldn't make sense for her to stop feeding the baby to get it, especially when I'm right there. This isn't a fitness test - it's just a matter of practical convenience.

However, if it's something she's perfectly capable of doing herself, it's a fitness test. My wife and I are sitting next to each other on the couch. She asks me to get her a cup of water. She's the same distance from the fridge as I am. The answer is no. That's a fitness test. Add in that she has a broken leg and now it's a legitimate need for assistance.

In this case, OP specifically outlined that his wife was only doing things that were already part of her daily routine - things that she could handle perfectly well on her own, but on this particular day she decided to get fussy with him about it. This doesn't strike me as a legitimate need for help - it's more that she doesn't like some aspects of being a mom and decided to take it out on her husband. Reasonably so. I've had 4 kids, so I know how hard that time of life is. But she also signed up for the job when she agreed to stay home while he works. Yes, he can share responsibility. No, she doesn't get to dictate the terms of how he does that.

My Wife's Emotional Affair

1 upvotes · 17 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Most people, unless they deviate severely from the norm, have options.

Ah, good point, as it leads to an aspect I didn't address before. The quality of the options matters. A woman who believes, "There's no way he could get another woman like me" is more prone to feel empowered and entitled in the relationship and less likely to find her husband attractive. In her mind, she's at the top-tier of women he could get, which means he's at the low-tier of men she believes she could get.

So yes, we all know that somewhere down the line another option might exist. But the fact is that most people don't have many other good options. That word "good" should always be a qualifier before "options" here.

"The bride" (the church) is a collective Agreed. Singular bride. Not sure how that changes things, though. Collectively, we know that Christ could reject his church at any time if he wants, raising up stones or enjoying the praise of the angels instead of us. But he didn't choose stones or angels - he chose us. And this, in itself, is valuable and motivating. If Jesus had no choice of stones or angels or pagans or any other possible bride and he HAD to work through the church, imagine how empowered and self-entitled the church would become?

Oh, we already have sects that have this mentality, so it's not hard to imagine it. I won't name names, though.

Biblical marriage doesn't give the man the option of ditching his wife and taking up with some other woman who expresses interest in him, so that's an idle threat

Again, you're misunderstanding this for active dread. I'm not suggesting men cultivate back-up plans in case his wife wakes up on the wrong side of the bed one morning and disrespects him. But the fact is that marriages do end. A woman is more likely to walk away from a man if she feels like he's a deadbeat that nobody wants for a husband - and certainly not her, than a man who is very attractive and could get a "better" woman at the drop of a hat - because how's she going to get a better man than that?

The fact is, and I know this from professional experience as well as statistics: the overwhelming majority of divorces are filed by women walking away from men, not men walking away from women. Women are the ones with the commitment problems, not men. I believe the 2011 study on the topic found that 80% of divorces were filed by women - leaving 20% for men. That's 4 times as often that women initiate the divorce. That's a LOT. Why are they doing this? Because they believe they can do better. Hypergamy.

Now, if the guy is the best they're ever going to get and she knows it, they're not going to file for divorce. This is obvious from even some extreme cases we see, like women with battered wives' syndrome. Their husbands are legitimately awful people. But the wives can't find it in them to leave him or file criminal charges. Know why? It's certainly not because they like their beating. It's because they have been psychologically conditioned to believe that they are worthless and couldn't get anyone better. So, as crappy as that guy is, if she doesn't believe she can do any better, she'll stay. The ones who do leave do it because they have friends who press hard: "You don't need him. You can do better than him."

Now, take a guy who isn't a wife-beater. A legitimately grade-A type guy, like the kind we try to breed here. Put him in a marriage where his wife doesn't feel worthless, but genuinely knows she's got one of the good ones and that other women would long to have what she has with him. Is that undermining the integrity of their marriage, or bolstering it?

It seems to me like you're arguing that this would weaken their marriage bond instead of bolstering it - but even with theology aside, I'm not even sure how we make that logical leap.

The only possibility is that you are assuming the man in this situation, because of his options, might leave the woman. Well, the fact is that women with options absolutely do leave their men. So taking these good options away from the man certainly isn't keeping those marriages together - it just makes the wife feel like she's married to a loser who could only get lower quality girls than her. But we know that men, on the whole, are more likely to remain in bad marriages - for better or worse (and I say this because a lot of that rationale is cultural conditioning). So, a woman with options is highly likely to lead to divorce. A man with options is mildly likely to lead to divorce. Between the two, I'll take the latter any day, even if "marital strength/integrity" is the only criteria we're accounting for here.

rationalize the pleasant ego-stroking that comes from receiving attention from a woman other than your wife

Why would I need to rationalize such a thing in the first place? You speak as if there is something wrong with a man having his ego stroked every now and then.

the dividends you reap from making your wife feel insecure

Who ever said my wife feels insecure? Again, you're imputing too much thought from secular readings here.

I once commented to my wife on our very first date: "Everyone must be wondering how a guy like me is so lucky to be holding hands with a girl like you." I thought I was being sweet, paying a clever compliment. Instead, it really upset her and she almost didn't go out with me again because of that compliment alone. She explained, "I don't want to feel like I'm with some loser, as if everyone is thinking, What's she doing with THAT guy? I want to know I'm with someone who I can be proud to walk around with and would make them think, Wow, good for her!" If only I'd understood what she was saying back then ... I could have saved myself a decade of trouble.

My wife likes the thought that other women find me attractive. This doesn't make her feel insecure; it makes her feel like she made a good choice. I'm not actively out soliciting other women. I've never cheated on her. But when other women notice me, she perks up a bit and gets happier. As much as you talk up your man, I'm curious why you would jump to feelings of insecurity around him in such a context rather than the more typical appreciation of value.

I think it was Dave Chappelle who once said, "I don't actually mind it when another man stares at my wife's breasts. Most guys get all jealous and want to fight the dude. To me, that's the biggest compliment another guy can pay you - if he ogles your wife. It's like he's saying, 'Good job, brother. I wish I had that.'" Now, apply that in the gender reverse and that's my wife's mentality - even verbally stated by her. It has nothing to do with insecurity.

My Wife's Emotional Affair

1 upvotes · 17 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

You're still putting words in my mouth. I didn't encourage him to go off flirting with other girls. But the fact that the option exists helps defeat the codependency that most men feel toward their wives, which ruins marriages. And it is useful for the wife to know that she's got a good one, rather than some dud that isn't going to turn any eyes.

We see this in at least two places in Scripture with regard to our relationship with Jesus/God:

- In Luke 19 (around verse 40) the Pharisees tell Jesus to rebuke his disciples for praising God and him, and Jesus says, "Surely if they didn't, the rocks would cry out." That is, God has abundance. It's important for us, as his bride, to know that our groom is one who has options and that he will be praised whether we're the ones living up to his expectations or he does it without us.
- In Matthew 3 Jesus says something similar when rebuking the pharisees, who thought they had some exclusive right to be called the children of Abraham. They had the comfort in the relationship that you talk about husbands and wives having, and that let them become everything we think of when talking about Pharisees today. Yet Jesus rebukes them and says that God can raise up children for Abraham from the stones if he wanted. That's Jesus' way of saying, "God doesn't need you, so you'd better get back on the ball with how you follow him." This is the same concept as a man having abundance and his wife knowing that he's desired by others.

What I don't see in Scripture are examples of the types of boundaries you're encouraging. Logically, I agree with you. It sounds like a really smart idea to put those kinds of boundaries in place to protect the integrity of your marriage. But logic is lower on the totem pole than theology. Theologically, I can say with great certainty that my spiritual groom is worthy of praise, obedience, adoration, etc. and that if I don't give it to him, he can get it from even the rocks, if not other people. This is a healthy thing. And if I am to model my marriage after how Christ relates with his bride, this must be incorporated.

Yes, Jesus commits to his bride - but he doesn't say, "And I'll never do anything to keep others from noticing me ever again." He intentionally flaunts himself to the world and asks us to be his biggest advocates in doing so! How great if a wife were to praise her husband to everyone she meets, rather than hiding him away like her own special secret. It's no wonder why people are so backwards about evangelism these days.

My Wife's Emotional Affair

1 upvotes · 17 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Me:

husband is attractive to other women

You:

man spending time and giving attention to some other woman

We're talking two different things here. Active v. Passive dread. Active dread is not necessary or beneficial for all relationships - and is especially prone to backfire, as you say, if a guy is actively trying to create dread.

An actually attractive guy doesn't need to pander for the attention of other women, though in some cases a touch of validation is a necessary prerequisite to building an abundance mentality before we encourage guys to strip that validation-seeking away again. Women can find a guy attractive and hit on him even if he isn't "spending time and giving attention" to her.

What do you think about courtship?

1 upvotes · 16 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

True - I just assumed everyone would be competent enough to see the full link in the reddit post. Probably stupid of me to assume competency.

What do you think about courtship?

1 upvotes · 16 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

when do you know it's time to marry/make someone your bride?

When you can't keep from having sex with each other much longer. 1 Cor. 7. Yes, that could be relatively quick. I'm okay with that.

Once you determine that a woman is FAST and EASY, and is ready, willing, able, and actively contributing to your mission, is that it?

Not if you're not horny for her, or her for you. If you're not horny for her, get out. As time ticks on, she will become less attractive, not more. It's unlikely she will post-marriage up her attractiveness game from where she was at pre-marriage.

If she's not horny for you before marriage, get out. Not because you need to find someone who finds you attractive as you are - which is total garbage. It's because you're not attractive enough to warrant getting married yet. A man can keep growing in attractiveness well into his 30s. If she's not attracted to you, you haven't hit your peak yet - and chances are, once you hit your peak, the girl you got before you hit your peak won't hold a candle to the ones you can get when you're there. Then it's just a matter of maintaining your peak as long as possible - your frame: the best version of yourself all the time. Age naturally has an impact on this, but honestly not much.

Since you seem to be in the same demographic as another user on the RPC Chat, I'll paste to you what I wrote to him about dating. For context, he asked: "Can you expand on why you don't like 'scheduling a date'?"

For non-Christians, dating is great. It's an opportunity for a guy to prove quickly that he's the prize by displaying his SMV in the marketplace itself in order to get a quick hookup. The goal of the date for the non-Christian guy is sex. As soon as possible. Preferably on the first date. But a lot of guys will bail on a girl after 3-4 dates if sex is off the table. Why? Because that's too much time, emotional energy, money, etc. to be worth investing into a girl who isn't going to put out.

Now, pop in a guarantee that she's not going to put out - because you're not asking her to, due to your faith - and what's the point?

You might say "vetting her" is the point. Great. But why do you have to be in a date context to vet a girl? In reality, "dates" are the absolute WORST context to vet a girl.

- She primps herself up, so you can't see what she's actually like.
- She knows you're actively vetting her, so she's on guard to hide the information she doesn't want you to know.
- You're also meeting up in a non-mission-oriented context so she gets no idea what your life is all about [other than through your words, not through your actions].
- The focus, being solely on each other and not on the real world out there puts you in somewhat of a bubble that artificially creates emotions without giving an accurate portrayal of life together.
- Women seek emotions, men seek sex; and Christian dating only feeds the emotional side for women. You might say, "Ah, but I'm a man and I LOVE the emotions of dating too." Great, we all do. But those emotions make you want to have sex with her, which you know you're not going to get for some time, whereas her emotions don't lead to anything - she just enjoys them, so she ends up full and you are left wanting.

Song of Songs refrains a number of times: "Do not awaken love before it so desires." This, in essence, translates to: "Don't get yourself horny before you're ready to tie the knot."

Classic dating is uniquely designed by culture to facilitate strong emotional connections as fast as humanly possible. This is the very definition of awakening love before it so desires. Instead, wait until love desires to be awoken naturally, then pump the emotional steroids.

Again, that's not to say you should never go on a date. Rather, it makes more sense to vet a girl by you staying on mission and seeing if she'll follow first. If she won't follow you before you start dating, then any following after dating is more easily understood to be a ruse to get you to keep seeing her.

Of course, I could be a little jaded there. Many of you know that my wife specifically told me 7-8 years into our marriage, after refusing all that time to join in on my mission: "I tricked you. I lied about being on board with disciple-making in order to get you to marry me." It took becoming red pill to get her following my lead - and now past our 11-year anniversary, she's genuinely on board.

I don't want to see other guys get duped in the same way because a girl is trying to put her best foot forward. If you're going to vet at all, vet first, then date, then marry. Or just vet then marry, for all I care. Or make your mission the context for your dating first, before moving on to classical dating - no vetting at all.

More on the futility of vetting from u/RStonePT here:

https://www.reddit.com/r/marriedredpill/comments/chp2w6/vetting_why_bother_when_boundaries_are_way_better/ Not to undermine u/RedPillWonder's posts on vetting too much - but I tend to agree with a lot of what RStone says here. I'd be curious what RPW thinks of it all.

[FR] Unstoppable Emotional Inertia

1 upvotes · 14 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

You know - of thre response I've gotten to this post on both here and MRP, what's shocked me the most is all the comments about the display of physical strength. Is this not something most guys can do? Are their wives that fat or they just that weak? This should be easy stuff.

Confronting the myth that you have to “earn sex” in marriage, and that if your wife deprives you, or worse, cheats on you with another man, it is completely your fault as a man for not being “red pillled” enough to stop her. This attitude is blue pillled, and takes away responsibility from women.

1 upvotes · 12 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Fortunately not! It is one of the few legitimate avenues a man has left to keep his wife in line.

I will note: it's highly probable my client will have to pay spousal support on final orders here. You don't have half a mil disparity in income on a 34 year marriage and walk away scott-free. But she'll be stuck with half the cost for all his steaks and lobsters too.

Confronting the myth that you have to “earn sex” in marriage, and that if your wife deprives you, or worse, cheats on you with another man, it is completely your fault as a man for not being “red pillled” enough to stop her. This attitude is blue pillled, and takes away responsibility from women.

1 upvotes · 11 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Very true - I'm speaking in terms of spiritual marriage, not legal marriage. If a guy wants his autonomy back from the civil obligations of marriage, let him file a civil divorce and live only under his spiritual marriage.

But you're also confusing fault and responsibility, as OP did. Eve was at fault for her choice. Adam is still responsible for how HE handled the situation. If he chose not to eat when she gave it to him, he himself would be blameless, but as the man it would be his decision what to do with the mess she made. Her made the irresponsible decision instead and ate also.

If my son hits a ball through our neighbor's window, who is at fault and who is responsible? He's at fault, I'm responsible. He's a child under my care. Do you yourself not say a wife is the oldest child in a man's house? Either she's a child under our responsibility (spiritual) or an autonomous adult (legal).

What if I see my son hitting balls at the neighbor's house and watch him do it, knowing with great certainty he's eventually going to break a window and I'm going to have to pay for it, but I let him do it anyway - now am I at least partially at fault? Maybe not for his hitting the window, but I'm certainly not innocent in my obligation to pay anymore.

... again, from a biblical perspective, not a legal one. I agree with you on the legal side, which assumes women are competent, autonomous, responsible adults.

Confronting the myth that you have to “earn sex” in marriage, and that if your wife deprives you, or worse, cheats on you with another man, it is completely your fault as a man for not being “red pillled” enough to stop her. This attitude is blue pillled, and takes away responsibility from women.

1 upvotes · 11 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Could be. He'd be the type to do that.

Getting better "game"

Vision for a Biblical Church

greater freedom to take bigger strides in influencing people within local congregations, whereas before they felt subject to the leadership of those congregations in stifling ways.

Not sure if this is making sense, but I hope that helps.

FR: The Spell is Broken

1 upvotes · 10 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

only an understanding wife can give duty sex

Yeah, that's not what I said. I said that a wife who gives sex only because she understands her role/obligation and without attraction will always be duty sex.

Frequency and denial have nothing to do with quality of sex, only quantity. You can have high-frequency duty sex or passionate sex, as well as low-frequency duty sex or passionate sex.

Personal Finance and Peace

1 upvotes · 10 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Risky, sure. But the bank has always refunded us everything whenever there has been an issue in the past. The risk is extremely low in those situations.

My wife and I get fraudulent charges on our credit card at least once a year. It's only happened twice on our debit card in the 11 years we've been married.

Self-conscious about things I cannot change immediately.

1 upvotes · 9 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

If you get married, are you going to have sex with your shirt on too? Gotta get used to it, brother. Use it as motivation to get in shape.

Personal Finance and Peace

1 upvotes · 9 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

True. We use our debit card as backup. It still gives points, no fees, but gives us something in those rare occasions when our credit card has unusual charges and is blocked.

Thoughts on the fall from my RPEP

1 upvotes · 6 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Hmm ... I'm not sure the actual language agrees with you here - and in guilt of the same technicality. Correct me if I'm wrong, but as I recall, the curse doesn't suggest Eve would desire to rule over Adam. It says: "Your desire shall be for your husband but he shall rule over you." What's interesting here is that the verse actually uses the word rule to describe Adam toward Eve, but it does not mirror that word from Eve to Adam. This implies that it's talking about two different things.

Now, we always interpreted this as Eve's desire to RULE over Adam because of Genesis 4's parallel language to describe sin's desire for us, which we associate with a controlling desire because of our other connotations of sin in us.

But what if there's a reason the word "rule" is conspicuously absent from Eve's desire? Wouldn't it be more consistent to read this as Eve's desire for Adam to live up to her expectations. That is, the crux is what Eve desires FOR him, not Eve's desire for HIM.

- For HIM: "I want him to be mine to do with as I please." But no, he will own you.
- FOR him: "My desire for my husband is that he ... get in better shape ... be smarter ... make more money ... etc." But no, he's the one who gets to set expectations over her.

The second one jives much better with the actual wording of Genesis 3. It also makes the desire and the ruling juxtaposition much more coherent. The alternate view would also imply that we are trying to circumvent the curse by failing to treat women as objects to be possessed or owned, rather than as helpers subject to the expectations of their ruler.

This view then assumes the disconnect is that Eve will always expect more from her man, as suggested in the original post.

This also works with your "punishment of increase" framework because she never had an ownership interest over Adam of which this desire is an increase, and to say that Adam's rule over her is an increase would go against the evidence you appropriately point out for headship being true before the fall. Instead, Eve always had expectations for Adam, but her expectations for him increased beyond his post-fall default.

Thoughts?

Thoughts on the fall from my RPEP

1 upvotes · 6 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good thoughts, brother. Curious, though ...

In general, I don't think Eve wanted a better Adam, but it was one of the obvious consequences of the temptation to be like God

Isn't the temptation to be like God a de facto determination that she wanted better than she had now? In the case of her own eating, that's one thing - but in the case of her giving it to her husband too, doesn't that automatically imply that she wanted him to be like God too, and therefore better than he was?

Thoughts on the fall from my RPEP

1 upvotes · 6 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

"And Adam, you will never be the alpha you wanted to be" ... He says this based on what?

Not to speak for him, but I'd guess he's using "alpha" interchangeably with "leader" here. That phrase is also in the context of the curse, whereby Eve will desire mastery over her husband. God created Adam to lead, which presumably means he had a desire to lead as well, and the curse is saying he's not going to have the easy-street on this now that they're fallen and Eve will be vying for that leadership role. I think this is a perfectly fair statement to make.

I don't think he worried about being more "alpha."

Again, the "more alpha" comment is in reference to the curse. When he writes "The curses coincide with: you will always want more alpha" I interpret this to mean that Adam's greatest failure in the fall was not leading his wife (i.e. what he calls alpha), and therefore man will always want to have that leadership role back, but always struggle with it in comparison to what he could have had if the fall had not occurred, ergo: "Now that you're fallen, you will always want more alpha/leadership" - or perhaps he was referencing Eve wanting more alpha, which works too.

I think much of your comment is written on the mistaken assumption that he was talking about Adam wanting to be more alpha before the fall.

They had nothing to compare themselves to at that time (other humans, that is)

Right. But they did have God to compare to. And we know with certainty from the passage that their comparison to God was the driving force behind the serpent's temptation: "You will be like God." So, when he suggests that Eve wished she was married to God instead of Adam and wanted to give him the fruit to up the "quality" of her man, that's hardly a stretch.

Most especially, we don't know what Adam thought or knew would happen if he hadn't eaten of the fruit. Did he wonder if God would make him another woman? (assuming she died/was killed/banished/etc) God had already done a sort of psychology job on him ...

This kind of outside the box thinking is why I love conversing with you. I love it, brother!

Eve wanted more alpha

I'm genuinely curious, based on what?

I'm pretty sure he's referencing the "you will be like God" as part of the temptation - that they can be more than mere humans. Remember: this is the EXACT same temptation Satan himself fell for. He wanted more power, dominance, control, authority, leadership - whatever you want to call it. These can reasonably be described as "alpha."

I actually wrote on this exact topic in 107 a couple years ago - the "Satan's Ploy" section, and how Satan tried to tempt Eve with the same desire that corrupted him - Satan's desire to be the alpha over God, so to say, and Eve then takes the lead (alpha?) over Adam in eating the fruit and giving it to him, and presumably wants him to be more like God too.

why would she think eating it would improve Adam or their kids in other ways?

From the serpent's targeted temptation to Eve: "You will be like God."

There's so much we don't know.

Completely agreed. But like you say, it's interesting to speculate - and this seems as reasonable a theory as any, especially if we swap out RP lingo for more classical terminology.

But again, keep in mind that during this entire time, there's no sin, no sinful nature, no tugging or pulling or proclivity to indulge desires

I don't know that I agree with this bit. The sinful nature is our internal temptation. But those desires can be (and actually were) piqued from an external source: the serpent. If there really was no desire to sin at all, then they wouldn't have been tricked in the first place. That desire just had to be put in them from the outside rather than happening spontaneously because of their own internal compulsions.

The difference with the sinful nature today is that we don't need a serpent prodding at us. We just come up with these bad ideas all on our own. James 1 and all.

He's a pastor and he only recently learned this? A plain reading of the text highlights this.

I'm confident that what he meant is that he didn't realize the significance of this distinction until recently. It's like reading the story of Peter meeting Jesus walking on the water and saying: "I just realized the other 11 stayed in the boat." Obviously. Anyone reading that story can see it plainly in Scripture. But I had read the story dozens of times before actually noticing that aspect of the story for the first time, and it was an "ah ha!" moment.

I look forward to reading your thoughts!

Hopefully I haven't disappointed ;)

Vision for a Biblical Church

1 upvotes · 5 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

I've been in too many Churches that never have a building ever, and they have to move and relocate every few years

This right here is the framework issue.

First, you're still confusing congregations for the Church. They are not "churches" any more than I am Christ's bride. Christ has one bride. I am only one small part of the body of his bride. Individual congregations are not "the church" or even "a church" - they are one small part of a much larger body. Getting off the idea that a congregation is somehow a sacred biblical organizational structure can really clarify a lot of Scripture and open up options for more Spirit-led influence in the world rather than the modern strategy of structure-led influence.

Second, once we realize that The Church proper is a network of believers and not defined by individual congregations, we see that individual buildings are a convenience and not a necessity. Jesus did not own a building for his ministry. The apostles did not. Were they poor stewards? No. As I noted in my original comment, they crowd-sourced. They worked from the resources of their followers, just like Uber works through the resources of their drivers, running an entire company without owning the cars they ship people in or employing the drivers. The same thing is true for wikipedia - the largest encyclopedia that hasn't paid for a single article. Or consider Air B&B or Google's traffic tracking algorithms or any other number of ways a visionary has used the resources of the people they serve to serve the people. And this is what Jesus did.

The only time a building becomes necessary is if we feel a compulsion to centralize ministry into a "come to us" model instead of Jesus's "go to them" model. Modern congregations even confuse this thinking that "go" really means "go tell them to come." That's still a "come" model and not a "go" model.

Jesus didn't meet with the 12 and say, "Let's grow this group, and when we get to 24 we'll split into two groups; and when each of those grow, we'll split again - and just keep splitting as long as people keep coming." That's the modern churchianity model of small groups, and even larger scale with plants and carvers.

Instead, Jesus met with the 12 with the express knowledge that he would cut them off and send them out at some point. When's the last time you heard a pastor say: "I've taught you everything I know to teach. You're ready to lead your own ministry now. So get out of my congregation because you're only being held back while you're here." And yet this is exactly what Jesus and the Spirit did when Jesus left and the Spirit scattered the apostles all over the world. And even as they discipled others, it was never to build up their own ministry, but to train them to go out. Paul didn't say, "Timothy, stay with me by my side until I die, and then take over my ministry." He sent him out from city to city to go raise up more and more people who could be sent out. Everything Paul knew he instructed: "Entrust to reliable people who will also be qualified to teach others." That's the model.

While I use the term colloquially for ease of communication, I'm really not interested in disciple-making. I'm interested in discipler-making. Huge difference. Disciple-making requires buildings because the disciples keep congregating in one spot. Discipler-making doesn't require buildings because the disciplers go out to wherever people need disciplined - and they teach them how to be disciplers too.

The modern "we need a building" or "mass gatherings are the way to go" model is born not from Jesus or the apostles, but from necessity when Theodosius I mandated that all people become Christian. The floodgates opened up and waves of people were allegedly "converting," and the Church didn't have the capacity to disciple all of these hordes, so they developed fast-food Christianity that formed the basis of most "tradition" that the Catholics and Orthodox rely on today - tradition meant to satisfy pragmatic needs rather than rely on theologically sound models for ministry. As a result, the Church became overwhelmingly watered down as the focus became the masses instead of the few, and buildings became a necessity, whereas most of the early church was still meeting in small groups and at people's homes before then. Theodosius I really screwed a lot of things up for everyone and we see the effect of his ruin today in the modern institutionalization of the church.

That Girl at Work

1 upvotes · 5 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

Those do sound like subtle IOIs, but VERY subtle - questionable, even. More overt IOIs are things like privately winking at you while in a group setting, giving her number without solicitation, touching you while she laughs at one of your jokes, just "happening" to be going the same way you are at the same time, then "randomly" forgetting they need to go back somewhere (because they didn't need to go that way in the first place, but don't want to admit it).

These are the types of things I was seeing regularly a few months ago, before I started the whole moving process, which interfered with my gym time. I'm hoping to be back there in 2 months.

/u/OsmiumZulu has written a lot in this thread - his advice is solid. Follow it.

That Girl at Work

1 upvotes · 5 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

One or more of these things ain't true and your perception isn't correct.

That was my EXACT reaction when I read this too. I'm guessing the girl is another HB6 who got inflated in his mind because through mental masturbation he believes she'd be more sexually exciting than his "no intercourse yet" wife, making her feel more attractive than she actually is. I've been through this a number of times, where I see another girl through rosy glasses, and then a month later I see her again and she's just meh.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/04/19)

1 upvotes · 4 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Amen. Pascal's Wager always seemed a reasonable beginning to faith, if not a permanent place to live.

Is it ok to go out to bars a few times/week and socialize?

1 upvotes · 3 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

The biblical mandate is to maintain a sober mind. I have no problem drinking one or two here or there, including at bars. Scripture shows godly people drinking regularly. Solomon even notes in one of the proverbs that wine should be given to those who need to drink their sorrows away.

But drinking won't solve your social issues. There are better options out there. I just posted two links to a couple of my past posts to another guy on the main sub who was asking about loneliness or isolation. Check that thread and read those posts. They should help solve the social issues you're experiencing.

Is it ok to go out to bars a few times/week and socialize?

1 upvotes · 3 September 2019 · /r/askRPC

You didn't answer /u/Deep_Strength's most important question:

- What's your mission for God?

As he noted, what you're going through is a byproduct of lacking a mission. Start that mission and give it the weight that eternity would have it, and you'll find yourself naturally building the skills you need to engage socially.

What do you think about courtship?

1 upvotes · 3 September 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I think /u/OsmiumZulu meant to reply to you, but it went to another user in this thread instead. He suggested you post this on r/askRPC. I agree. I think this would be a fascinating conversation and would be worth having over there.

[FR] A Changing Dynamic

1 upvotes · 30 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Ah, I've heard mixed reviews on his stuff but have never been through it myself.

[FR] A Changing Dynamic

1 upvotes · 29 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

What material and book?

r/askRPC is live.

1 upvotes · 29 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

It was. Reddit is weird and booted this announcement rather than last week's OYS when the OYS for this week came up. Not sure why it didn't rotate out the oldest announcement, but we only get 2 at a time.

[FR] A Changing Dynamic

1 upvotes · 29 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Fair. But in your example you're actively trying to cook to his taste, so his adding salt makes you feel like you got it wrong. In my case, my wife can't handle any hot sauce at all, yet knows that I always like my chili with hot sauce. I don't fault her - she shouldn't have to burn her tongue to cook chili that I like when I can just put hot sauce in my own bowl much easier. But the fact is that she's asking me to enjoy something that she already knows I won't fully, because even if I made it myself exactly to my own taste I'd still prefer that hot sauce in there.

It's not a big deal, but my point was to say: yes, in my own home when the situation calls for it, I'm going to tweak the food to my own taste instead of bearing through with something that could be made so much better in mere seconds :p If she is offended that my taste buds aren't the same as hers, that's her problem. But if she was trying to be unique to my exact taste, then by all means I'd give it a shot first.

[FR] A Changing Dynamic

1 upvotes · 28 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

My wife asked me on Monday: "If I make chili and add corn wok you eat it?" Her chili usually tastes like water with calories in it. I said: Use half the water and sure.

Got home, consistency was perfect. Scoop some in my bowl. Grab the hot sauce and she gets huffy: "Can you at least try it before putting that in?"

Babe, I'm the chili king. Nobody makes better chili than me. You know this. But even as good as it is, I still pour hot sauce in MY OWN chili before eating it.

I took a bite anyway and said, It needs hot sauce.

Own Your Shit Weekly - August 27, 2019

1 upvotes · 28 August 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This is the right path. I have no idea how this case could have ended up the way it did, even if you did hold a knife to her throat. Seriously: our state has case law that says even fully proven DV against a spouse shouldn't affect custody if it wasn't against the kids. Now, it still affects things anyway, but not nearly that much and not on a he said/she said.

Was your trial lawyer not also an appellate attorney?

Edit: Also, you do psych evals? That's where the money becomes worth it. Women always bomb that crap. I have a client who was a full on meth addict and kept testing positive well into our case and I'm still going to get him custody over her because of the psych eval. Powerful stuff if you get someone worth their balls.

Struggling in my faith

1 upvotes · 28 August 2019 · /r/askRPC

Glad to see you here, friend. I've known plenty of guys in your shoes. The most recent was a life-long atheist who started going to small group with his wife because he was suspicious of what she was doing. He ultimately decided it was good for family bonding because he wanted to talk to her about something she was passionate about. Then he started deciding that many of the moral philosophies were worth his time, so he began serving alongside the group when they would go out and preparing for the content in advance so he was fluent enough to talk openly and engage. The fellowship itself was entertaining for him. Eventually he noticed how his internal compulsions were gradually being transformed the more he started following Christ alongside these people, even though he didn't believe in any of the Jesus stuff in the first place. He noticed that the changes happening in his life through following Scripture (even as an intentional skeptic) were more significant than the changes that happened in his life during countless runs through secular groups for things like alcoholism, a history of drug addiction, a gambling problem, etc. He noted: "Even though I don't believe it, I can't deny that there's something to this Bible thing that works that all the PhDs and professionals out there are missing."

So, he started bringing his Bible to those secular counseling groups, led by PhD trained psychologists. He really respected their intelligence, but as they would teach a counseling tactic he started saying things like: "No, I've tried that for years and it never actually worked. I've watched the men in this group try it, and we're still here." Then he'd pull out the Bible and quote a verse and say, "Then I started trying this and suddenly it worked. I'm still an atheist, but if this Bible stuff works, why aren't we using it to help more people like it helped me?" The psychologist would argue that not everyone believes in the Bible, so it wouldn't work for everyone, but that if he found value in it because of his faith then he was welcome to keep using it. Of course, he replies: "But I don't even believe in the Bible - and yet it's still working. Why not give the other non-believers here a chance?"

Now, the guys in his group were pretty desperate with how broken their lives were, so they chose to give it a shot and asked my buddy to lead a few sessions on how the Bible helped him. The psychologist wasn't okay with this, so they stuck around after the meetings to start reading the Bible with him - and that lasted for about 2 months before many of the guys reading the Bible with him (which was about 1/3 of the group) started noticing the same changes in their lives.

One of those people was so overwhelmed by the transformation that the Bible brought that the world never could that he finally asked my buddy: "I can't help but believe this now. I didn't believe, but I tried it and I was wrong. It works. How can you still see all the good that's coming from this and not believe it's true?"

That was the moment he changed his mind and realized: I guess I've actually been a believer all along, I was just too tied to my atheist identity to admit it.

I don't know if that story is helpful to you, but it's one man's journey. To finish the story, yes, he's a full-on believer now and planted a ~~church~~ congregation as a layperson (i.e. no pastors) to the homeless community in my area that his primary congregation eventually adopted and now fully funds. They've been meeting for a few years now and seeing numerous homeless in the area come to Christ.

If you want to believe, here are a few things to note ...

Don't try to persuade yourself. Logical argument can certainly persuade you toward Christ. But as easily as you are persuaded toward Christ, you can be persuaded away when a better argument on the reverse side comes up. Don't abandon logic, but remember that the boundaries of logic are higher than the boundaries of our awareness and thinking capacity. Even the best argument you've heard in your life can have a better argument on the other side that you're simply unaware of yet. In this sense, logic-ing your way into the faith creates unstable faith on sand, but logic can certainly help you understand what you believe once you're there.

Jesus tells a parable of two sons who are asked to work in their father's field. One says no, but relents and does it anyway. The other says he will, but is lazy and never goes. Who is the faithful son in this scenario? You are saying no to your Father. But are you going to follow him anyway?

It's also important to understand what faith actually is. Many people try to make it look like faith is absolute confidence. It's actually quite the opposite: room for doubt is what creates the possibility for faith, otherwise it's false knowledge. Consider:

A note is slid under your door threatening to kill you and your family. What do you do? You've got a few options:

1. You deny that the threat is real, treat it like a fake threat and go on your way.
2. You acknowledge the possibility that the threat is valid, but just don't care enough about your own life that you go on your way anyway.
3. You are absolutely convinced the threat is real and take measures to protect yourself by setting up security cameras, calling the cops, buying a gun/baseball bat, etc.
4. You have serious doubts about the validity of the threat, but you figure you'd be a fool to take chances, so you take protective measures anyway.

Which options will save you?

Yes, this is a rhetorical question. The point is simply to note that the 4th is still faith. It says: "I have no clue if this is right or wrong, but I'm going to orient my life and actions around the truth of it anyway because I'm not willing to bet my life on it."

Faith in the biblical sense can also mean: "I have no clue if Jesus is God or rose from the dead for me or not, but I acknowledge that it might be true and I'm going to orient my life and actions around it being true anyway because I'm not willing to bet my soul on it."

From there, I've had countless conversations with atheists who have told me that the "true atheist position" is not that there is no God, but that they don't know if there is a God or not, and therefore they decline to let the possibility of God affect their life. They call this agnostic atheism (as opposed to gnostic atheism, which claims to have affirmative knowledge that there is no God).

Gnostic atheism is the first option. If it turns out they're wrong, they die. The second option is nihilism, and that man still dies. The third option is blind confidence, but his confidence is placed in the right direction, even though he has no real way of knowing his belief on the matter is true, but he is saved all the same. The fourth option is faith. And such a person is saved from the oncoming threat.

There are, of course other options beyond those 4. I could add #5, for example: the man investigates the threat by looking for finger prints on the note, locating the guy, and discovering his base where you can see the weaponry he intends to use to carry out the threat, and then overhear him talking to someone about his intent to kill you. Now, technically you still don't know for sure - it could be a really elaborate prank and you're on candid camera the whole time. There's never absolute certainty of anything. But at this point you've jumped into a higher category I call "informed faith."

Faith and faithfulness are heavily linked. You're welcome to entertain doubt for any amount of time, but it is faith that compels you to live as if it is true even despite your doubts. This is what Jesus means when he says, "Blessed is the one who has not seen and yet believes." That is, blind faith is better than knowledge. But even better than blind faith is informed faith - the kind that acknowledges, "I still can't know, but I trust enough to investigate and orient my life around this and as I see the results and receive confirmation, I become more and more persuaded."

That's what my friend did throughout his story - he went from absolute rejection to nihilism (though I didn't go through that part of the story), into being the son who says "no," but does it anyway, and on to subconsciously blind faith and ultimately consciously informed faith.

First argument in a while

1 upvotes · 27 August 2019 · /r/askRPC

I just put up another comment to AlanNoles in this thread giving a much more detailed explanation of frame. I'll probably turn it into a post eventually ... not sure when I'll have the time though.

First argument in a while

1 upvotes · 27 August 2019 · /r/askRPC

Ah, I haven't started season 3 yet.

First argument in a while

1 upvotes · 27 August 2019 · /r/askRPC

What show?

Any tips/resources for evangelism in the west?

1 upvotes · 27 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I would not trust Todd White. I've known one guy and heard of more who came from his ministry and would do these "healings" with him and were trained by him. It's really the power of suggestion, and they are trained to create a suggestive psychological connection with someone that makes them feel something that doesn't actually happen.

He also has serious doctrinal things wrong with his teachings. For example, he tells people he's sinless just like Jesus. He also teaches that God saves us not because of grace, but because we are so innately valuable to God that he'd kill his own son to buy us because we're that valuable.

His evangelism style is also based off of a complete misunderstanding of 1 Cor. 2, which says, "My message and my preaching were not with wise and persuasive words, but with a demonstration of the Spirit's power." People assume this means miracles. This isn't true at all. We actually don't see Paul or any of the apostles bringing many miracles to the table when witnessing to non-believers. The greatest example of how Paul evangelized was in Acts

22. How did he do it? He shared his testimony. The power of the Spirit he demonstrated was not miracles, but the way the Spirit had transformed his own life so dramatically from the Christian-killer he was to the disciple-maker he became. This is consistent with Revelation 12:11, which says that the enemy will be defeated by (1) the blood of the lamb, and (2) ~~miracles~~ the word of our testimony.

I'm also not a fan of Ray Comfort's Way of the Master (which is not based on Jesus's model of evangelism AT ALL), but it's much better than Todd White's phony garbage that he uses to get donations to buy himself that huge mansion he lives in.

I would much rather follow a method of evangelism that Jesus modeled for us, as the disciples modeled as well. More on that if you re-post this in askRPC.

Rethinking about MGTOW as a Christian

1 upvotes · 26 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right on.

why did christianity adopt "christian pacifism" despite it going against the bible?

1 upvotes · 26 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Do you have a plan for doing this that ordinary citizens are legally authorized to execute in order to effectuate the goal you're asking for?

It sounds to me like you're making a plea to the director of the FBI, CIA, ICE, etc. While I may be on board with some of what you're saying, it's valueless content if there's no actual plan to solve the identified problem.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (08/21/19)

1 upvotes · 23 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

about as luke warm as they come. Really lacking the motivation to want to mingle with the churchians

Do you feel luke warm because you're not aligning with churchianity's expectations of you and therefore you feel like they would judge you as luke warm? Or is it because you're not committed to your mission in Christ and are whittling your days away on the generic secular grind with nothing more than hopes of one day making a difference for the Kingdom?

OYS - Where Progress is Made (08/21/19)

1 upvotes · 23 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

rut of "needing to be cheered up" though - in the long run it's a DLV if displayed with any regularity.

This is a good word. Over time, sexual favors will become associated like Pavlov's dog with the man's negativity, and that only spells disaster when she starts feeling like he's in a negative mood every time they have sex because that's usually when she engages.

A Man and His Struggle

1 upvotes · 22 August 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

How far do I live from the first aquifer? If he's draining my aquifer I'm going to tell him about the other one. He can go drain his own crappy well.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (08/21/19)

1 upvotes · 21 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Why do you think this is?

Company in town every weekend, and she was on her period one week.

You said she was acting bratty, did she give you attitude?

She started the conversation with a bad attitude and a sense of entitlement to the whole of the desk space. To her credit, yesterday was the first time I'd used the desk, though the plan was always that we would both utilize it as a home office. She just works from home more often than I do, so I've usually let her have it when we're both home. She got used to this generosity and exclusivity, so she didn't like it when I finally started using it like I always said I would.

Amen! I look forward to hearing more about this when you're ready.

I've already shared a lot of it in our Thursday group last week. Good stuff in line for this week too, I hope.

More Than Marriage: How churchianity has screwed up friendships too

1 upvotes · 21 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Glad to have helped, brother.

PSA: The "Reformed Slut/I've Been Hurt Before. Are You Willing To Wait For Marriage?" Shit Test.

1 upvotes · 19 August 2019 · /r/WhereAreAllTheGoodMen

Apparently you haven't seen Netflix's rendition of the show Lucifer (they bought it for Season 4). Hint: Eve is STILL a raging party girl and nymphomaniac who wants nothing less than the devil himself.

The "Closer to God" Myth

1 upvotes · 18 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

True dat.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (08/14/19)

1 upvotes · 17 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

It's a running joke between the two of us. She has curly hair and I run my hands through and sometimes it gets stuck on the curls. She gets mad every time, but eventually starts laughing.

Looking for advice, Need help. +Apology.

1 upvotes · 16 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

He was asking about the entire sub, not just you. But as to your specific context, that makes sense.

Looking for advice, Need help. +Apology.

1 upvotes · 16 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with everything you've said here, including the disgusting perversion that people call the "church" today. Mainstream evangelicalism is certainly sickening in the way it approaches a number of issues, even beyond sexuality, though that's certainly one of the most central problems.

In your church, does your pastor address "sinful" male sexual behavior while women and girls are present?

There's a broader framework issue with this question. Individual congregations that we refer to as "my church" or "your church" are not actually the Church. They are a gathering. A congregation. The ekklesia in Scripture is The Church singular. There is one body of Christ, not many bodies. The many congregations are each a part of that singular body. One might be an eye, another a foot or hand. Some congregations are merely knock-offs designed to look like part of Christ's body without actually being connected to his body at all.

While The Church is a singular corporate entity, "my church" is best understood as the relational network I have within that corporate entity, which isn't confined to a singular congregation. The people I have consistent regular meetings with (be it on Sunday or any other day of the week) are people I'm leading and pastoring, so there is no pastor over "my church," as I am the pastor - just in the biblical sense, not in the secular vocational sense. To that end, I address both sinful male sexual practices and sinful female sexual practices both when women and men are present for each. I also teach what non-sinful sexual thoughts and practices are, including the Word epithumeo, which you appropriately noted means to "covet" and not to "lust," and that this coveting assumes intent and not mere desire, so that those I lead are fully aware that they're not condemned for every passing sexual thought they have toward a girl they're not married to, as the rest of the church suggests. I have a post on that in our sidebar too.

As for a congregation itself, these are nothing more than tools that can be utilized for the advancement of my mission. In theory, they're supposed to have the same mission I do, as it's the one Jesus gave us ... but we all know how well most congregations stick to what the Bible actually says.

More specifically to your question, I just moved. The ~~head-pastor~~ leader of the previous congregation I attended was extremely off on his teachings of male/fame sexual dynamics, which was part of the reason I felt no displeasure in leaving, though I had stayed because the associate pastor was red pill and I had hope that his influence could produce a change.

Since moving, I have attended exactly 1 service at a new congregation that I intend to utilize for the purpose of making disciples. I don't know exactly what the ~~pastor~~ leader there teaches on these issues yet, but after a 3.5 hour 1-on-1 conversation with him yesterday, it's apparent that this will be a fantastic place that will pursue the same mission alongside me. So there's that.

Looking for advice, Need help. +Apology.

1 upvotes · 16 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Is there something you're referencing in particular? Need some context.

Looking for advice, Need help. +Apology.

1 upvotes · 15 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This is a potent start all the same. Well said.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (08/14/19)

1 upvotes · 15 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

From an Evangelism standpoint, I'm improving.

Cool. That's what we'll be chatting about tomorrow.

He's the worst when he's just with his mother and his sister. He pushes their buttons so bad.

My son does the exact same thing. He's got a genius level intellect (99.99 percentile in all his standardized testing, except reading: 99.79 percentile). He intuitively understands human psychology at the age of 7 to a degree that is frustratingly complex and impossible to fool. He then uses that against my wife - and I think he knows her psychology better than she knows his - and at a conscious level, not merely the way kids generically know how to manipulate parents. She gets so mad and he just snickers, and he can out-argue her any day, until she pulls the "I'm your mother and I said so" card - because she knows he's right, but it's still not what she wants anyway. As WISNIFG says as one of their bill of rights: "You have the right to be illogical." She innately gets that ... but probably because she's used to her history of arguing with me :p

So, yesterday I'm trying to get my kids to clean up the living room and dining room. I tell them that I'll give them an extra show before bedtime if they can get it all done in 10 minutes. My son says, "That's not worth it. Besides, we only have 8 minutes left on the episode we're on." I told him it would be a full show. He says, "That wouldn't make sense, because we wouldn't be able to finish the one we're on." So I said, You've convinced me. You can finish the one you're on AND watch a full extra one too. Sound good? He goes and gets the vacuum. Then he stops himself and says: "Dad, I know you just say 'you convinced me' in order to get me to do it because you knew I would think you were giving me something extra, making it feel like a better deal. But I also know you were going to let us finish that first episode anyway, so I'm not really getting anything extra. I also know that you're going to make me clean the room either way, so I'm better off getting something good out of it than being punished for not doing it at all. I'm pretty sure I could have gotten a better deal if I had said this instead of that [he was right! haha], but I didn't think of it until 5 seconds after I said that. But I also know that because I just told you, it probably won't work anymore. I'm just telling you because I want you to know that I knew how you were trying to trick us into doing the cleaning with only getting 8 more minutes of our show, which isn't really a lot. But I think I've got this game figured out now, and next time I might be able to get you to give us not just 1 show and 8 minutes, or even the extra show I could have gotten today, but maybe even 3 shows."

Yes, with the exception of the italicized words, that was virtually an exact quote from my 7 year old son. I'm pretty confident that his "3-show" plan has something to do with him proposing just guy time between the two of us after the girls went to bed. I asked him today why he went to bed instead of trying to trick me into giving him more shows and he said, "Because tomorrow is the first day of school and I knew that's too big of a deal that it wouldn't work on you today, so I have to pick the right day for you to be in a way of thinking that it'll actually work." HAHHAH!

I'm so proud of my boy. But goodness is this going to be a mess raising him.

I have had lots of teasing, flirting and kino but haven't hard initiated this week

I get the impression from your OYS posts that you're not really all that upset about the frequency. Sure, it could be a bit better, but you seem pretty chill on that subject. I can't tell if that's OI or DNGAF or having better things to do or if you really do care more than you're letting on. Whatever the reason, if the frequency really isn't a huge deal, what are you doing to up the quality? That's where the game got more fun for me.

Who should disciple women?

1 upvotes · 13 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Yes, they're called Anglicans, Episcopalians, Presbyterians (PCUSA, specifically), etc. u/osmiumzulu probably has a better list than I do.

But I'm not aware of a secret cabal of women with the Express goal of feminizing the church. It's more seepage from culture, where there are secret cabals that do have this express purpose on a national level.

As for resources, start with Deep's book on the sidebar. Then go to The Church Impotent.

Who should disciple women?

1 upvotes · 13 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed.

Who should disciple women?

1 upvotes · 13 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

That's not right. Seminaries didn't exist in the bible. Graduating from one certainly doesn't make a person a pastor. But this is probably tied to the confusion that we call most congregation leaders "pastors" when they're not fulfilling a biblical pastoral role at all, but something more akin to a combination of administration and preaching (usually not even teaching).

One of my recent "pastors" used to comment on this from time to time. He'd say, "I don't know why they call me a pastor. Nothing I do has anything to do with that biblical role. At best, I'm an elder, and perhaps not even that. Our 'head pastor' is really a preaching administrator. These titles are handed out as a sign of respect, but I bet they really confuse a lot of people."

Who should disciple women?

1 upvotes · 13 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting. They call her a pastor though?

Who should disciple women?

1 upvotes · 13 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

True. But most female teachers in the mainstream today are teaching original content from their own studies. Yes, somewhere out there, a man in church history probably said it first. But if she didn't get it from him she's still playing doctrine dynamite herself.

The Kingdom of God is a Party

1 upvotes · 12 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

While that's certainly an interesting approach, I'd be curious of its long-term effectiveness. It sounds like it's highly effective at getting people to join a meeting. But churchianity is already really good at that. That's why I often push against the weekly Sunday meeting model in the first place, as if it were some ultimate goal to fill the seats. It misses the whole point of Jesus's model of ministry.

What I did find really cool, though, was that the congregation I visited just yesterday had a dance party outside the building with music, games, gelato, etc. It was relatively spontaneous. They didn't announce it as some event. Someone just brought some gelato to service to share. Someone else decided to play music. Kids started dancing. Adults joined in. It was fun without an agenda, but which still fulfilled a purpose.

The Kingdom of God is a Party

1 upvotes · 12 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

include everyone in the church and not judge people based on social class

Are there any congregations out there that actually kick out people who are below a certain income threshold? I haven't seen one yet :p

spiritually party about him

Does that mean an actual physical party from 5 to midnight? Or something more cryptic, like having the attitude (you know, in our spirit, since it's a spiritual party and not a physical one) of someone who parties a lot ... but to have that attitude toward Christ a lot of the time?

physical parties in the Bible and their importance

Right on. Now I can follow that.

again how everyone should be invited

Am I missing something here about the church being a tough-nut club to get into? If anything, I see congregations being over-including as the ultimate problem that has led to our inability to discern who is genuine from who is fake, and giving no application of 1 Cor. 5.

the worlds version of a party is not Gods version of a party

So he wants to change the definition of a party. Interesting.

Can I say that my definition of flogging is when a Christian serves their neighbor, and then recommend that Christians start flogging each other a lot?

importance of small groups instead of huge congregations as well as what a proper small group looks like.
50% personal/emotional talk, 50% actually just enjoying the company of others "partying"

Now that I can get on board with! Though I actually split it out into 3 categories:

- 1/3 on fun/games
- 1/3 on addressing character issues (i.e. personal/emotional talk)
- 1/3 on leadership and life skills training and development

Don't forget that last one. It's arguably the most important one, in my book. Most people can intuitively figure out the other two eventually, with enough time and motivation. But the third rarely comes without intentional leadership making it a specific point in the group.

preface where he said the Great Commission is the #1 thing and how "partying" ties into it Works for me. That'd get me interested too!

definitely some good nuggets in it

I'd love to hear more of those nuggets as you reach them. Please update.

The more I think about it, the more genius that God's creation of man and woman becomes

1 upvotes · 12 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

And yet God is sovereign. The wisdom is only problematic if a husband is living in apathy toward or active defiance of God's will. If he is seeking first God's Kingdom, then God's sovereignty can be trusted to ensure he does not lead the family astray.

The key here is the authenticity of the seeking. You can't pray about a major life decision for 30 seconds as a formality and say you legitimately sought God's input on the matter. You can't ignore the great commission (i.e. the primary means of seeking the interests of God's Kingdom) and assume that hours of prayer and asking godly counsel are at all going to lead to wonderful life decisions.

I can't control my diet.

1 upvotes · 12 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed. /u/Insatiable-Curiosity - knowing your physical stats is extremely relevant to your situation. But knowing whether or not you've read the 400 series is also useful, as that really addresses how to resolve addictive issues, as well as 202, and a handful of other posts sprinkled throughout.

Also, spiritual maturity is incredibly relevant here because it's directly tied to your ability to find satisfaction in Christ rather than through worldly vices, such as gluttony.

Finances are probably the least relevant of those items, but it can be more understandable if someone is extremely poor that they're going to struggle with weight issues because junk food is generally cheaper than healthy food. So, if that's an issue, make sure to boost your income enough to afford a better diet.

Ultimately, addiction is evidence of a weak frame. Develop your frame and you become master over your own life rather than something else becoming master over you.

Denominations Question from Newcomers and Those Seeking to Return to the Church

1 upvotes · 11 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting. I've certainly heard of Arminian Baptists, but every Baptist I've ever met was a Calvinist with a Calvinist preacher. Weird.

Denominations Question from Newcomers and Those Seeking to Return to the Church

1 upvotes · 11 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I usually don't recommend new Christians attend a congregation right away. Doing so usually subsidizes a believer's willingness to entertain what Scripture actually says in exchange for the cultural imperatives of the church. That is, they think Sunday service teaches them everything they need to know from Scripture (which is incredibly wrong) and that serving the congregation is their way of serving God (even more wrong).

If you can resist these compulsions by committing to reading Scripture on your own and testing everything your congregation leader says against it (per Acts 17 Bereans) and also maintain a commitment to making disciples independent of any ministry involvement you may have within your congregation, then you are in a healthy place to attend a congregation. Until you're stable on those two things, you're better off finding other like-minded believers to fellowship with as your means of meeting together with other believers.

Once you are ready for a congregation, I most recommend interdenominational congregations, as you'll get a broader span of teaching and they're often more willing to learn from denominations rather than fight against them. After that, the Nazarenes probably have the best missiology (though it's still far, far off from what Jesus modeled.), and the Lutherans, Missouri Synod, tend to have the best theology (though still quite a ways off on several points).

More than their missiology or theology, though, I'd be interested in the character of the people within a congregation. If they're faithful, available, and teachable, go there and leverage your relationships with the people there for the advantage of the Gospel. If they're not, keep looking until you find a congregation with such people. Faithful, available, and teachable people are plentiful enough that I'd be shocked if you couldn't find anyone, though you may have to look outside an age or socio-economic demographic than you'd normally be comfortable with.

Denominations Question from Newcomers and Those Seeking to Return to the Church

1 upvotes · 11 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Calvinist at heart, but I attend a Baptist congregation

Not sure why that's a "but." From what I can tell, most Calvinists are either Baptist or Presbyterian.

I was labeled a misogynist because I said that I preferred someone who was conscious about modesty

1 upvotes · 3 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Well put.

The Main Event

1 upvotes · 2 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good stuff. I'm pretty sure I agree with your position on all of this, including #2. #3 takes too much of a straw man on how non calvinists view salvation to be deemed credible, and falls apart horrifically when we recognize that congregations that tout themselves as "churches" are not actually the Church at all, but a man made institution that intended (and failed) to organize the efforts of the Church in fulfilling the purpose Jesus gave his bride.

But I'm not sure any of this actually answers the question I thought I was asking.

A fundamental aspect of the red pill is dread, right? This primarily involves the wife recognizing that her husband has other options and therefore she is not eternally secure. Whether you want to view eternal security from an individual or corporate (The Church) standpoint doesn't change the question. If Christ gives his bride eternal security AND tells us about it through Scripture, then there is no room for dread. At that point, we either:

- say that we should ignore the way Christ relates with the church on this point in our own marriage, maintaining a (secular) red pill view on this, or
- follow the example of Christ and just deny dread in our marriages as contrary to Jesus's example.

At the end of the day, if you believe in OSAS then you believe Jesus told his bride - and what would that do to a marriage if the man openly told his wife, "No matter what, I will never leave you, just as Jesus will never leave his bride. You have absolute security in our marriage"?

Tag: u/lolosaurus u/thechristianalpha

The Main Event

1 upvotes · 2 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Makes sense, but from that position it's impossible to distinguish between:

an adopted son or daughter of the Father loves the Father and actively wants to be like our Father and

I would just call someone who outwardly follows Christ for a time but falls away, a false convert. They didn't lose their salvation; they never had it to begin with

And if there's no way to externally distinguish between these two, then the definition of "salvation" becomes a fairly useless one. It may be technically and theologically accurate, but it holds no pragmatic value, which is why Jesus and the apostles often talk about salvation in terms that could be seen and expressed on earth, even if this led to some dissonance on a theological level.

I just think that it's relevant that Christ doesn't leave us or forsake us

Right ... but what about us leaving him? Again, "If you disown me, I will disown you." That's not just Paul in 2 Timothy 2 saying that, but Jesus himself in Matthew 10.

And this same concept works in a marriage

So would you call those "never were" Christians God's "concubines" instead of his bride? Or are you suggesting that Jesus would never have an FMOFY conversation (regarding spiritual reproduction) with his bride? Which would seem to undermine the parable of the fig tree. This is where I'm not seeing how the reality of physical relationships can follow in the example of the spiritual reality of our relationship with Christ, taking after his model, if there isn't room for him to let his bride walk away - other than to say it's a unique exception. Or perhaps your view is that the "RP Christian" should take the Calvinist approach that because it's impossible for anyone to separate from Jesus once genuinely in that relationship, a husband should model this and never leave his wife no matter how downright nasty and vile she becomes - because she's still legally your wife and you should never leave her nor forsake her. Because at that point you can't say, "We weren't ever truly married" because you are.

Let me be clear: I'm neither Calvinist nor Arminian. Or perhaps I'm both. I believe under the most technically accurate definitions, salvation can never be lost. I also believe that under more pragmatic definitions, salvation can be lost. So, I'm not trying to beat down Calvinism - only explore the ways that it portrays a disconnect between the model of Christ and the RP advice. So either Calvinism is more at odds with red pill praxeology than Arminianism, or Arminianism's pragmatic model simply explores the practical world in a way that Calvinism simply doesn't address, and therefore gives us a model for expressing Christ's example that is consistent with red pill praxeology and Calvinism is simply silent on the issue due to its insistence on remaining technically accurate, however useless that technicality is.

The Main Event

1 upvotes · 2 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

marriage is a "growth machine."

I've heard this a million times from mainstream ~~pastors~~ congregation leaders. I'm totally unconvinced. Yes, marriage can produce unique growth that wouldn't have happened without marriage. But I can say the exact same thing about having a difficult job, being in an abusive family ... for that matter, being in a loving family, or running a farm, or being a stay at home parent. All of these are contexts in which people grow in unique ways that you wouldn't learn in the absence of that particular context.

But this isn't the PURPOSE of marriage.

Malachi 2:15 says the purpose of marriage is to produce godly offspring. If you want to connect it to growth, you can also take my view that all OT things are road maps to point to a spiritual truth, and therefore the purpose of physical marriage is to help us understand our spiritual marriage to Christ, and in this sense is primarily about spiritual growth specifically toward the end of learning to produce spiritual offspring, and not just physical offspring.

But 99% of the time people say "marriage is a growth incubator" they aren't talking about disciple-making. They're talking about character issues being challenged. I can get character issues challenged anywhere in the world. Marriage doesn't corner the market on mechanisms for character growth. At best, it does corner the market on giving practical wisdom for spiritual reproduction and parenting.

People usually do whatever they can to avoid reaching critical mass. This makes them willing to engage in anxiety regulation through accommodation for years.

This is a wise phrase - and something guys would do well to remember. In this sense, a guy hasn't reached critical mass - he's only hit a plateau shortly before the apex. In sexual terms, he's edging. He avoid eruption, but also isn't willing to let the tension run down. Of course, in one case the eruption and the other ... not so much.

The main event - or Critical Mass is not low value. It is the way to exit the Gridlock and reach for something better!

But critical mass and a main event are clearly two different things, from what's described. At best, critical mass could be described as the demeanor that can lead to a main event. But it is not the main event itself.

The way he describes critical mass, it's almost as if it's a resentment that causes you to shut off the other person emotionally and just start focusing on yourself for a change. This can certainly be beneficial (though preferable if the motive isn't reactionary due to resentment). But it doesn't turn into a main event until the other side realizes they're losing you and they start to care again - enough that they pull every emotional trick in the book to get your attention and reassurance.

To quote /u/SteelSharpensSteel quoting /u/RStonePT - "if there's not snot rockets, it's not a main event."

The Main Event

1 upvotes · 2 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right on.

The Main Event

1 upvotes · 2 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

She almost left, but I ~~think we're through that~~ called her bluff

FTFY.

lost the battle for frame, my frame is what won the war

It's not so much putting two people in the ring together to duke out a victory (despite my MMA analogy elsewhere). It's more like Frodo trying to get to Mordor and Golem keeps trying to take the precious from him until he ends up actually journeying alongside them - and for a brief moment even coming to appreciate his time with them. There are better examples that don't end up in one of them falling into a volcano, but you get the idea. It's more of a journey/"you can't distract me" than a "my frame will beat your frame" kind of thing. That's the missional focus aspect of it all.

This is the strongest frame of all because it's Christ's frame, when in its pure form.

You get it! Too many people get caught up in the whole "once saved, always saved" line of theology. It may not be technically wrong, but it also leads to an incredibly feminized view of marriage - that "ship out" is never an option to Christ. In reality 2 Timothy 2 says, "If we disown him, he will disown us. But if we are faithless, he will remain faithful." Jesus is always on the move. If he invites us to follow and we say, "Screw off, Jesus. I'm going my own way," ... well, he just keeps walking and we get left in the dust. Are we okay with that in our marriages?

Not that I'd ever impute RP praxeology into theology, but if one were to do so, it'd be a heavy push against Calvinist soteriology. I'm curious how /u/OsmiumZulu would reconcile this - or if he'd perhaps suggest there is no reconciliation, and it's an "outlier example" where the physical relationships on earth simply aren't meant to follow in the Christ/church example in this isolated situation.

The Main Event

1 upvotes · 2 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

As well the Bible said they would be ;)

The Main Event

1 upvotes · 2 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

More to /u/OsmiumZulu - I've had a main event ... but it was in my beta days and I was the one trying to keep her around. I haven't had one in the reverse since the tables turned ... just small pockets of, "Are we okay?" and "Is there something I need to know about?" that lead to enough gentle course-correcting that a main event never needs to happen.

In fact, she had that conversation with me this morning: "You're acting like everything's normal, but I'm feeling like something's off. Are we okay right now?" followed by, "Stop laughing, this isn't funny. Is there anything going on inside your head that you're not telling me?"

Yeah, we're good. We're gonna have sex tonight too. Be ready.

The Main Event

1 upvotes · 2 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I do remember that post - and it was a good one. I think we're both describing the "main event" as a clear turning point. But this could just be a matter of perspective - it's a main event for the guy if his wife finally cedes the power because she can no longer control his frame. Women can have a "main event" where their guy gives the "I'll do anything to keep you" reaction that typically precedes (or follows) ILY, BINILWY. Regardless of the source, they're both parties to the "main event." You don't have Conor McGregor without Khabib Nurmagomedov (yes, I had to Google how to spell his name).

In my line of work, I guess I'm too used to seeing the main event turn into divorce - usually because the party in power has already checked out too far and isn't willing to come back even with all the promises of submission. So perhaps that slants my view.

The Main Event

1 upvotes · 2 August 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed

Joshua Harris, author of "I Kissed Dating Goodbye" is getting divorced and has fallen away from the faith

1 upvotes · 30 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

To be fair, at least he used one of Luther's worst quotes ;)

More Than Marriage: How churchianity has screwed up friendships too

1 upvotes · 30 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent comment. Very thorough, added new insights, and challenges new action. I like this.

More Than Marriage: How churchianity has screwed up friendships too

1 upvotes · 30 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Very interesting quote. I like it, but without the context I'm not sure I understand it fully.

Older female Virgin

1 upvotes · 30 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I really have no clue what any girl on here looks like. But as a matter of cold, hard factual reality, most men assess their sexual interest in a woman predominantly on looks. I would be lying to pretend otherwise. And it doesn't do girls any good to lie to them about their looks or even to say that looks don't matter when they do, just to protect her feelings.

Yes, my wife is post-wall. Yes, I believe she's hot and I agree women can be hot for years post-wall. But they will never be as hot as their maximum potential pre-wall either, except maybe to a guy who has a fetish for older looking women.

But notice in my comment that I did give room for husbands to appreciate their wife's looks even through aging. While women have retroactive emotions, men have retentive memories about how women look. A man will remember his wife's former beauty and often still see that in her, even past the reality of its fading. But this isn't true for new women he meets, as he's never known them in their glory days to be able to remember, and it only applies within a reasonable range. For example, a guy might not notice an extra 20lbs on his wife, but after 200lbs a threshold will be crossed.

Oh, and we just hit 11 years a few days ago!

OYS - Where Progress is Made (07/24/19)

1 upvotes · 26 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

PHYSICAL

I've made good progress on my cutting this week. 2 days of sub-500 calories, 4 days of 1500 and 1 day of 2300 (my average daily idle burn). I've also added running and home exercise back to the mix and will be finding a gym by the new house this week in the hope of starting lifting again by next week.

MENTAL/EMOTIONAL

I'm feeling great, leading well, and being productive. If anything, work is taking a mild hit due to the things around the new house that need done, or going out to buy things to furnish the new house, etc. My wife has more flexibility in her schedule than I do right now, so she's been handling a lot of the day to day stuff with unpacking, so that's been helpful. When I get home I focus less on the decorating and more on the essentials - things that really need to get done but where you don't feel like there's a ton of progress when it's complete. Like yesterday, setting up the water line on the new fridge that came in. It probably took me an hour to work it all out. I could have unpacked 5 boxes somewhere in that same amount of time with a visible dent, but instead all I can say is that the refrigerator runs. I'm okay with that, but noticed for a brief few seconds that I felt as though I wasn't accomplishing much. Time to keep going.

SPIRITUAL

No real updates here since last week, except to note that prayer has suffered and I'm less intentional with my kids, which needs to get fixed. I've been rushing through night time prayers with them so I can focus on getting other stuff done rather than taking the time to model the importance of their relationship with Christ.

No Real Man Fallacy

1 upvotes · 25 July 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Right. And sometimes the "mentors" do this intentionally - whether because they themselves are misguided or because they're testing everyone else's frame (or probably both). This is why a man can share his ideas on masculinity and half a dozen people will call him a faggot or autistic. They're communicating, "You are worthless as a man because your thoughts on masculinity don't measure up to mine."

So, I wouldn't blame that dynamic entirely on the new guys, though I'm sure they have more than a fair share of this problem going around as well.

No Real Man Fallacy

1 upvotes · 25 July 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

No.

Are wives a gift?

1 upvotes · 25 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Is your wife a gift?

Yes. We have good sex, she earns a great income, she works hard around the house, she responds well to initiation and leadership, she has insights I don't, she provides an extra set of hands, she does a great job teaching our kids, etc.

A car is also a gift lots of people get. It is great to have one - you can drive around in it, impress your friends, listen to music, keep air conditioned in the heat while you travel, etc.

But you also have to oil the car, fill it up on gas, pay for insurance, clean it out from time to time. The gift comes with responsibilities if you don't want it to crash and burn.

Even the best wives, who are genuinely a gift from God, still require an incredible amount of care and maintenance. It comes with the territory. Gift doesn't mean "all benefit, no responsibility." It means that you get more benefit than responsibility. It's not much of a gift if someone "gives" me a car that I'd have to put more money and time in to fix it up (or even the time to sell it for scrap metal) than it's worth to me.

What is a good measuring stick to know if it is appropriate thankfulness and not worship?

Is the degree to which you express your thankfulness hindering your mission, or are you doing it from a place of perceived compulsion?

If I decided I wanted to take my wife out on a nice date to show appreciation to her for the hard work she's done to help me, that's great. If I skip meeting with a guy I disciple to do it, that's a problem. That's not to say that he's more important to me than my wife (though in the grander scheme, he might be - and that's okay!), but that I can exercise flexibility with how and when I choose to reward my wife, and I have no internal compulsion that tells me I MUST reward my wife to show my thankfulness to her.

When you catch yourself saying, "Well, she really deserves this; and while it's not the most convenient time for me, it's the only real chance I'll have for a bit to show her my appreciation, so I'd better do it now" ... that's when you've switched to compulsive thinking that's unhealthy.

As far as raw positive thoughts toward your wife go, feel free to get as emotionally uplifted as you like. No need to stifle your excitement to be around her, as long as it's not getting in the way of your mission. But most guys go beta when they let that emotional excitement cause them to smother her. She becomes the source of their feels. Let her contribute to your feels without being the primary provider of them. Icing, not the cake.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (07/17/19)

1 upvotes · 22 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

At the time I wrote that, we hadn't moved. We moved on Saturday and are still working on unpacking and setting up the new house, which will likely take 2 weeks. Motivation on losing weight is always helpful, though I'm usually good at maintaining goals once I set them. I'm starting today with a quick detox - 2 days straight of only fruit/veggies, 1 day of 2k calories, and 2 more days of fruit/veggies. After that I'll revert back to the same diet I was on when I was losing 1.5-2lbs a week with /u/thechristianalpha.

Time to redevelop a habit of consistency. What's the hardest exercise at the gym?

Right now it's going to have to be home routines for a bit. We moved a bit too far from our current gym to make it out there consistently. So, I need to cancel membership soon and open one somewhere closer. But I don't want to lose the access to the pool just quite yet. The kids enjoy it too much.

But ask yourself, what is God trying to accomplish in your life right now by allowing this?

While often a useful question, I don't think it always has a valid answer. Sometimes God lets us make our own choices and bear the consequences of them. Moving was a choice I made - one that he didn't force me into, but allowed. The consequence of that is significantly reduced free time. I'm not sure I'd say God is intentionally trying to do anything through this, other than to show that he lets us reap what we sow. That said, there are certainly passive benefits I can keep an eye out for, such as increased discipline, training toward higher productivity, etc., as compared with the pitfalls that could affect me if I chose to drop the ball on the many things going on right now.

Hey, an opportunity to practice Frame and brush up on A&A and AM. Woohoo!

Right. Of all things, I find it hysterical that the one that she has harped on the most is how I fold towels - complete with the phrase, "Can't this just be one of those things where you show your wife you love her by folding the towels my way?" I smile and say, "Absolutely. I will fold them my way from now on." A silly pun I use on the kids all the time, but an effective one nonetheless.

I take it you're still shopping around then?

I view it less as me shopping for them and them shopping for me. But yes.

Right now the system is backwards. Congregations are so desperate for people (scarcity mentality) that they'll put on the best show they can to get the attention of anyone and everyone who might walk by. It would be so much better if I could put my spiritual resume out there and congregations were selective over the people they accepted. Someone like either of us would be begged to be taken, whereas the average pew-sitter would be put on a wait list until they showed how serious they were about following Christ ... which, by the way, is pretty darn close to how Jesus did it. Instead of congregation leaders salivating over the potential of someone like me working alongside their ministry, they're content to just keep on keeping on and if someone happens to show enthusiasm, then great - they'll drain them of all their time, money, and energy and still keep on keeping on with no real change or impact. It's so frustrating.

Could it be that God is giving you a breather so you can put some additional time into RPChristians and possibly your book?

I don't have the time yet, but it's certainly a possibility - and one that I've considered. I still want to give Deep's book a year before I start teasing mine much, as I don't want to undermine him. But that doesn't mean I can't be drafting in the meantime. It has been a couple months since I did any serious writing.

Feeling Guilty and Redemption

1 upvotes · 22 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Have you gotten through the 400 series yet?

The Second Kiss of Death

1 upvotes · 18 July 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Well said. I enjoyed this comment thoroughly.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (07/17/19)

1 upvotes · 17 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

PHYSICAL

- I've slacked off the past 2 months. Of the 25lbs I lost, 10 are back. I'm assuming 5 is water weight, which is unsurprising, but I've not been careful enough with my eating to account for the lost gym time while doing everything associated with moving.
- Despite not being at the gym nearly as much, my lifts have only suffered slightly. I went once this week and with great effort was able to lift about 90% of what I was two months ago. That's not as much loss as I was expecting.
- I've decreased my initiation due to higher priorities. But quality has been high. Wife is still following my lead. I bought a vibrator - our first toy (unless you count cuffs/rope). This was definitely a boundary-stretch, but a worthwhile investment. It was awkward at first, but she followed and now she loves it, and it makes things easier/more fun for me too. The first time we started with external use only, but she was the one who asked to try it inside, so that was a positive sign of intrigue and sexual exploration. We don't use it every time.

MENTAL/EMOTIONAL

- Having 1/10th the free time I'm used to sucks. Still able to keep a smile on my face most days, though, so that's good.
- Relationship with kids has boosted significantly. I'm getting better one-on-one quality time with each of them, doubling this into my exercise, talking with them while I run.
- Finally had the sex talk with my 7 year old son. He has lots of questions, some of them are hysterical. I'm glad he's asking me than someone else, though.
- Wife and I are getting along well, despite the moving process. There's definitely some head-butting. She likes the packing to be done her way. I don't do stupid things that waste my time. She gets mad, I crack jokes. It turns out fine.

SPIRITUAL

- I'm doing about as expected on the disciplines, perhaps regressing slightly due to time constraints.
- We visited a new congregation that my wife was excited about. I'm shooting it down hard. Two clear and obvious misuses of Scripture and one of their staff telling me that they're not open to trying new ministry models related to making disciples. I'm out.
- Now that my red pill ex pastor has moved away, I don't have anyone local to spiritually spar with. This is going to wear on me quickly. While I can stay faithful, it's easy for me to get derailed or lose sight of my mission without someone like this who I'm regularly meeting with.

Question regarding men being the ruler of the family

1 upvotes · 16 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I actually count death as an increase too. I believe humans were created with the capacity for mortality before the fall, with the option of sustaining life indefinitely via the tree of life. That's why when they were banished the tree of life is specifically referenced as what would cause them to live forever, and why it shows up again in the New Jerusalem.

The fact that they would surely die is an increase from the fact that death was a mere possibility before then, but not a surety.

Jesus can Free you from the system and Save you!

1 upvotes · 12 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

For posts like this, which clearly violate the rules, I'd just remove them and not lock them. Locking them still lets others see it on our page.

MRP/TRP says it's my fault if my wife cheats on me. What does RPC say?

1 upvotes · 10 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

it's your fault. Wait, WHAT? How?

Fault really matters very little. We can play the blame game all day and it won't get us anywhere. I think what /u/ReddJive was referencing was the fact that blaming someone else is pointless because you can't control them. AWALT. You can control yourself, so that's not pointless.

There is no such thing as a one-sided conflict. Both people have always contributed to an issue, even unknowingly. The "you're to blame" attitude in on TRP/MRP is not a statement that it's 100% on you. Rather, if you contributed 5% of the problem and 95% is on her, then you're better off working on the 5% you can actually do something about than twiddling your thumbs wishing she didn't do what 95% of women would do if given the chance without moral constraint.

What does this sub say?

For purposes of Judgment Day, God holds each person accountable for their own actions. Period. There are no exceptions.

For purposes of improving yourself, your sexuality, and your relationships, blaming her will only increase your resentment and decrease your attraction, and also hinders you from working on yourself when you aren't willing to acknowledge your own contribution. So, as a practical matter, while it's not technically accurate, it's idiotic to focus on her blame when you could actually do something about yourself.

It did not say, "You shall not make your wife commit adultery."

It does charge husbands with a responsibility to lead in the home, though. A guy's got to be a pretty crappy leader if his first officer is quick to jump ship when the opportunity comes.

Is this the extent I am to see it from a RPC perspective? And what other takes (if any) I should have on it?

It's just a matter of different wavelengths.

Anyone who wants to talk about philosophical truths and technicalities will readily come to the conclusion that the wife is primarily to blame for her actions in cheating, and the Bible makes it clear that God will agree on Judgment Day.

Anyone who wants to talk about what will actually solve problems and keep a man's wife from cheating will need to be FORCED to stop blaming her because as long as he's doing that he'll never work out his own issues. The easiest way to get him to stop looking at her fault is to get him to look at his own need for improvement.

It's like when the secular community calls people "faggot" and "autist" all the time. They don't mean that they believe these people are actually faggots and autists. They're communicating something that's untrue in order to force a mental shift to get the person to have the reaction they need to start making progress.

I'll also note that most men who hear the "if she cheats, it's your fault" line are guys in failing marriages whose wives have not actually cheated yet. As such, there's no actual fault to go anywhere. But if a guy could have done something to prevent it and declines to do so, how should we take that?

Suppose there's a mountain of candy on my street that smells wonderful. But there are alligators swarming the area. My kids love candy, but have no clue how dangerous alligators are, and they're too young to understand it even if I tried. If I:

- let my kid play outside without supervision
- fail to put a fence around my yard
- fail to call an alligator control facility

etc. ... then when my 4 year old wanders off to get some candy and is eaten by an alligator:

- Yes, it's technically her fault. She chose to go over there even when I told her not to.
- But I'm also an idiot and to blame because I knew it was in a child's nature to go after that candy and I didn't do my role in preventing it.

AWALT. Women have a nature. If you know RP, you know their nature. While it may be different for spiritual purposes, for pragmatic reality, if you know women are prone to cheat and you have the means to prevent it, but you turn a blind eye, that's on you. She's no different than the child with candy.

"But they're grown adults and should be able to control themselves. The 4 year old child doesn't have that same mental capacity," is probably what you were thinking, right? There's a reason we call wives "the oldest teenager in the house." This type of response demonstrates a lack of understanding of hypergamy and the power female emotions to control their decisions. While women are capable of thinking logically quite often, when emotions are strong enough logic goes out the window and they're back into the same mental state as the 4 year old who sees a pile of candy.

We talk about how "hamsters" run wild in their brain to create logical rationalizations for emotionally impulsive decisions because that's what women actually do.

- "God wants me to be happy."
- "If I'm this unhappy with my spouse, maybe it's because God is leading me to another man."
- "I haven't felt close to God since I've been distant from my husband, so maybe he's the one holding me back from being closer to God."
- "When I had sex with that hunk who wasn't my husband, I felt incredible! God wouldn't let me feel so good about something if it really were wrong. The Holy Spirit would convict me. So my good feelings about this must mean that God supports the decision."

- "This other guy is so much more godly than my husband. Yes, we had sex outside of marriage, but that isn't what determines godliness. He's engaged in so many other ministry things and doing God's work that I think I could make a much bigger contribution to God's Kingdom if I kept having sex with him instead of my husband. He needs my support and help more than the deadbeat I'm with now."

Yes, these thoughts are idiotic. They're also things women actually think. How do I know? Because I'm a divorce attorney and they've told them to me. While not exact quotes, I have heard each of these rationalizations expressed to me from various clients.

Women will always do what's in their nature, even if it defies logic. Expect them to be like a 4 year old child when temptation comes to your door. That's why, as /u/Deep_Strength often points out, the whole point of Ephesians 5's bit on marriage is that the husband is responsible for sanctifying his wife - not that he's to die for her happiness, but for her holiness. She can't be trusted with her own sanctification any more than the church can be trusted with its own sanctification without Christ.

So yes, a responsibility is created. Yes, the husband is in some biblical respect responsible if his wife is so unsanctified that she cheats on him. Yes, she will be held primarily responsible. But for practical purposes ... come on. What did you expect her to do if the guy is an overweight porn addict with no real direction in life?

MRP/TRP says it's my fault if my wife cheats on me. What does RPC say?

1 upvotes · 10 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I like this. Excellent break-down.

MRP/TRP says it's my fault if my wife cheats on me. What does RPC say?

1 upvotes · 10 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Spot on.

RedPill in Scripture: Genesis 39 - Joseph

1 upvotes · 10 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good to know. That's how I usually took it, though I often assumed one word referred to his body (form) and the other to his overall look (appearance), which included grooming, hygiene, etc. I could very well be wrong on that though.

I'm meeting her dad tomorrow. Any advice?

1 upvotes · 9 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Nothing immoral about it. We're all sinners, right? So should I "be myself" and keep adding because it would be "misrepresenting myself" to act like a non sinner? The moral thing is to be better - who I want to be before God, not who I am now.

"Be yourself" is a woman's advice so women can identify quickly which guys are worth their time and which are losers. Being yourself is not attractive if you're in the latter group, and there's nothing immoral about being more attractive as you practice toward improvement.

Matthew vs RP

1 upvotes · 8 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent reference.

Matthew vs RP

1 upvotes · 8 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Kind of like /u/NoFaithInThisSub described, Maximus from the movie Gladiator is the epitome of meekness. He has incredible strength and skill, but uses it only when necessary. There are two ways to look at this:

1. A man who has no strength cannot choose to be meek. At best, he's automatically meek; at worst, he's only weak. If he's not choosing to express the virtue, he can hardly claim the credit of having the virtue.
2. Alternatively, you could say a man is being meek by choice - by refusing to lift, OYS, etc. He is responsible for his own weak position in life and doormat qualities. He has chosen a foolish and ungodly path that forces him into expressing the virtue. Now imagine slaughtering your entire family. Naturally, you would mourn their deaths. The fact that this mourning is self-inflicted doesn't change the fact that you'll still mourn the loss and what you've done and what you've become. Is this the type of mourning that will cause a man to be blessed? Will God bless someone who uses ungodliness to create the conditions that Matthew 5 says will be blessed? That's pretty foolish and sounds like manipulating God. But if one is godly he is strong, and if he still expresses meekness despite his strength in godliness, then he will be blessed. He will not be blessed for being meek because of ungodly choices.

Another thing to note is that the beattitudes don't inherently suggest everyone should aspire to attain these qualities. Jesus isn't suggesting we all strive to mourn over something so that we can be comforted. He's saying, "Some people mourn. This isn't bad if it happens. It's a good thing because you will be comforted." In the same way, meekness isn't a virtue we are all called to adopt at all times. Rather, there are times that we will be meek (and other times we ought to be meek, just as one can refuse to mourn when they should), and the blessing is reserved for those times. Or you could even argue that some people are designed for meekness and others aren't - and those who are designed for meekness get a unique blessing, and this doesn't mean that those who aren't meek are somehow sinners.

The passage only says the meek will be blessed. It doesn't say the non-meek will be cursed or punished or deemed sinners.

Tag: /u/Dumblydorewitit

What does the bible say about the existence of modern day prophets?

1 upvotes · 6 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Cool song. Been a while since I heard it. What does imogen heap have to do with prophets?

Jekyll and Hyde

1 upvotes · 2 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Yep. I track with all that. But I also have seen people cast out non sentient spirits. Some people call them demons.

Jekyll and Hyde

1 upvotes · 2 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting. Do you think there's an unusual concentration of demonic activity there? This seems to be common for you, but even among the people I know who are most trustworthy with deliverance ministry, seeing a sentient demon is incredibly rare. The people who experience this as a common phenomenon (myself included) almost always experience it as evil spirits and not sentient demons. Sentient demonic exposure in America seems incredibly rare and I'm curious why it would concentrate around you so much.

Awesome girl that doesn't take care of herself

1 upvotes · 2 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

When I wrote the sidebar I used "FAT" but decided it didn't make sense to tell guys to look for a FAT girl, so I changed it to FAST, as "saved" was something of an unspoken prerequisite. The "EASY" part was added as a joke during a Bible study session and I decided I liked it enough to keep it around. It's not on the sidebar anywhere, but I did include it in one of my recent posts here:

https://www.reddit.com/r/RPChristians/comments/c27btu/the_second_kiss_of_death/

While I would never compromise on any of the FAST qualities, the EASY ones make a relationship work "easily" in most cases, but they're really to taste.

Wife pushing back after upping my SMV and holding frame.

1 upvotes · 2 July 2019 · /r/askMRP

"are you just going to fucking ignore me?!"

Acceptable response: Well, I've already done the ignore part, so that just leaves the F-ing. I'm game.

I set my phone down, told her not to be shitty with me, in firm tone

I.e. got butthurt. "No, I was setting a boundary." That's not how setting boundaries works. You got upset by her tone and showed it with your sternness.

Got up, took care of kiddo, and then changed clothes and went to work out

So you gave into her demands anyway, despite her bad attitude, then gave her the cold shoulder. So many guys haven't watched /u/BluepillProfessor's youtube videos yet. You don't walk out right then and there as a display of your anger (unless things are so heated that you have to to protect your legal safety). You wait a while. You generally withdraw your presence, not withdraw it in the heat of the moment. The first is conditioning, the second is emotionally reacting.

She also stated she doesnt want to have sex then go on about our separate missions (not sure what to make of that?)

This is perhaps the most significant thing in your entire post. If you can bear through the Christian stuff, I made a post titled "Mission Matters, Nothing Else." The 16 Commandments of Poon has this as one of its main points too. Your mission is your greatest asset toward improving sexuality and respect in the marriage. If you don't have a solid mission, you'll be spinning your wheels in the mud on everything else. If she's on a different mission than you, then your top priority is getting her on board with your mission. If your mission is something garbage, like "having a great family, good home, and being happy in life," you're wasting your time. It has to be tangible and presently out of reach - and preferably something you can't do alone, ergo needing a wife to help you at your side. Like every bond chick who is not only his arm candy, but also has a role to play in the plot.

She wants better communication, which I agreed to

Yes, because communication is the life-blood of marriage and something every man should strive to improve on. /s

You ceded to her frame.

She dislikes that I "shut down and refuse to fight"

Classic guy move. Most guys think this isn't butthurt because they're not getting angry at her. In reality, it's just a different manifestation of butthurt. Incidentally, the very next post I wrote after the one I linked above was An Anatomy of Butthurt, which goes a lot more into this "robot mode" form of butthurt. That was my go-to. Trust me when I say that yelling and screaming butthurt is better than robot-mode butthurt. With women, emotion is always better than no-emotion. Robot mode guys get crap for make-up sex. Angry guys get the better end of the make-up sex deal because when the relational tension has been resolved their anger is interpreted as passion (note: women have retroactive memories, experiencing past events through the lens of their present emotions; so if they're emotionally positive toward you, they will interpret your past anger in an emotionally positive way ... ergo every battered wife after the make-up).

I've invited her multiple times to join me on my journey

Good. What is that journey? Is it something actually worth joining?

She asked "What if I couldn't have sex for 6 months, or a year? Would you leave?" I answered honestly and said I didnt know Comfort test failed. Acceptable answers:

- "Babe, that's what threesomes are for."
- "There are other holes I can work with."
- "Yes."

asked if she would grow with me. She said she needed to think

She throws out a possible future contingency. You say, "I don't know what I'd do in the future if that happened. But follow me into the future." Her: "Hmm ... I need to think about that." What's so shocking here?

I realized I was DEERing and decided it was best to just STFU

Yes you were. Good thought. But that's not what you did.

told her to stop, and left for work with no affection given

I.e. you "told her" instead of STFU, then got butthurt again.

So, advice? How do I move forward, keeping my frame and keeping attractive traits? What can I expect? Critiques?

What frame do you want to project? You just projected your frame as the guy who gets upset and can't handle it when his wife gets pissy at him. If that was the frame you were going for, bravo! You played it masterfully.

If you want to project the frame of a fun-loving guy who DNGAF about silly complaints and emotional outbursts, instead finding them cute and laughable ... then learn to AA, practice AM, develop your fogging and negative inquiry skills to buy you time while you figure out how to AA and AM, and just have fun screwing with her when she's angry. Yes, it will tick her off more at first. But when she realizes you're not an angry, butthurt guy anymore ... well, I'll let you figure that out for yourself.

Also, get your mission stuff figured out. You say you have one, but I'm skeptical about the utility of your mission in your marriage and sex life.

Cold-approach? Day game? Night game? What are the specifics?

1 upvotes · 1 July 2019 · /r/RPChristians

General social engagement is the next best alternative. I never posted it on RPC, but I did a post a while back on social influence and what I call "no-context conversation."

https://www.reddit.com/r/TheRedPill/comments/88dyg6/social_influence_and_defying_context/

DHV "battle" between me and my wife; question.

1 upvotes · 1 July 2019 · /r/askMRP

It's the reverse: her making more than him is actually the insurance policy. By her earning more, he takes a huge step toward becoming divorce-proof, where divorce-rape is unlikely.

In a sense, she doesn't "need" him with regard to finances, so it might look on the surface like she is more likely to run off with some other guy. But women don't evaluate men on money alone. Yes, it's an important factor, but a high-value man doesn't rely on his income alone to keep women following. He's also fit, charismatic, confident, OYS, DNGAF, knows how to employ kino, is a wonder in bed, etc. Where else will she find a man who is all of those other things - especially when she's used goods at this point? She could probably find such a guy to sleep with, but not to stay committed to her. So a shift in balance in the incomes may cause her to lose a small modicum of respect, but but the other factors keep it in balance and OP should be fine if he wasn't placing all his eggs in the "I make more money than her" basket.

If OP really knows how to play his cards right, this is actually a huge opportunity for uncommon dread. By making less, there's little room for financial legal repercussion. Assuming he's on-point with the kids, as his job is more flexible, he has little to worry about on the custody front as well. This will eventually sink into her mind: that he could leave with the kids and not owe her any form of support - she might actually end up owing him - and there's nothing she could do about that.

This is the pressure that gets many a man to supplicate to their wives. A wise man in this reversed position could leverage his own freedom the same way. He just has to be high enough value that the threat of him leaving is real. For most moderately attractive women, any guy knows she can find another guy in a heart-beat, so she doesn't have to do much to make that threat a reality. But if the guy takes the typical SAHD approach, he free-loads off of her, making it clear to her that no other woman would want him, undermining the possibility of this advantage.

This is all more to /u/ke3bsf6

The Second Kiss of Death

1 upvotes · 25 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The easy answer is to dress sexier when you're at home and modestly beautiful when you're out and about.

Probably the better option is to show him the passages on modesty and say, "I'd love to dress sexier for you, but I also want to obey these passages on modesty. Can you help me find the balance?" From there, if his definition of modest is different from yours, that's a submission issue. If his definition is plainly wrong (ex. wanting you to wear nipple clamps and a thong to the grocery store), you'll have to suggest he research it further and get input from other godly men.

It's also worth noting that I don't recall "causing other men to lust" as the reason for the biblical passages on modesty. They're really about not looking like a hooker so that the world didn't confuse Christian women with temple prostitutes that were common among other beliefs at the time.

Logically, you could make an argument for the "don't cause men to lust" line of thinking, but when Jesus talks about not causing others to sin, he means: don't do it intentionally. When he turned the water into wine at the wedding, he knew people would get drunk off of it. But his motive wasn't to entice them to sin. It was submissiveness to his mother. If other people sinned because of it, that was on them.

In the same way, your duty is to your husband, not to randos on the street. You can't use them as an excuse to avoid following your husband's lead. If other guys look at you with lust, that's on them - unless you're intentionally plotting to make them covet your body. If your motive is submission to your early authority, you're in the same boat as Jesus turning the water into wine.

The Red Pill & Religion – with Conk & Sam Botta

1 upvotes · 24 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Why'd you delete the link? I just got back from vacation and was planning to listen to it. Shoot it over if you still have it.

The word "nice" comes from the root word "nescire" in Latin, which means "to not know"

1 upvotes · 20 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good to know. Would be nice if there were reference to patriarchy as a system rather than as a person, but this does at least give some framework to derive an inferential definition.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (06/19/19)

1 upvotes · 19 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

What has motivated me on my lifts this week was my wife getting all hot and bothered making comments about some guy who is super jacked (probably 8-10% body fat) in a show we are watching

Once you're in shape, this will play out in the reverse.

The word "nice" comes from the root word "nescire" in Latin, which means "to not know"

1 upvotes · 19 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Sure, that makes sense - but where is that definition found in the Bible? Technically the word "patriarchy" doesn't actually appear in the Bible, right? So, we can look at several aspects of biblical history:

- As you note, men were the leaders and decision-makers in the home.
 - Does that mean that if a guy leads his home today, but raises his daughter to lead hers when she's married, that he is part of the "patriarchy" that everyone talks about?
- The Israelites tracked genealogy through the male heirs 99% of the time. To a smaller degree, even only the first born male heirs.
 - Does that mean that if I reference my father's father's father as my great grandfather who I really look up to, that I'm following patriarchy? What if I also reference his wife as someone I look up to and I'm proud to be her descendant too? What if my great, great grandmother was famous and I often tell people, "I'm her great, great grandson," and therefore people associate me with a female ancestor more than my male ancestors? Am I now spitting in the face of the patriarchy?
- The Bible also had a legal system of heirship that allowed a double portion to first born sons, and other men to inherit property.
 - If I leave a portion of my estate to my 3 daughters and don't give a double portion or 100% portion to my only son (who happens to be the oldest), then am I no longer part of the patriarchy?

See, the Bible doesn't define the word, and all of these contexts have been referred to as "patriarchy" by different people in different contexts.

So, while it's easy to say that patriarchy is "male led Churches and families," my guess is that 90% of the people in the world today who hear the word patriarchy will think you're talking about something a lot more than just that.

The Second Kiss of Death

1 upvotes · 19 June 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Oops ... good catch.

Faith, Works, Mission, Disciple-Making

1 upvotes · 19 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Tell that to Wayne Grudem.

The Second Kiss of Death

1 upvotes · 19 June 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Excellent. This should be a post of its own.

The Second Kiss of Death

1 upvotes · 19 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

You're speakin' crazy talk!

The Second Kiss of Death

1 upvotes · 19 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good stuff, brother. Great addition.

The Second Kiss of Death

1 upvotes · 19 June 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Well said. +1.

The Second Kiss of Death

1 upvotes · 19 June 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Point well taken. I assumed we were talking about positioning.

I have fallen in love with my step sister and need advice

1 upvotes · 17 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

to some degree

Gravitational Centers - A Case Study on the MRP Journey

1 upvotes · 16 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I don't see that being the case from women to men in the majority of marriages I've seen. Dating, absolutely. Marriage, not at all. My range of observation, of course, is mostly from my divorce cases and what I see from couples in the church.

Gravitational Centers - A Case Study on the MRP Journey

1 upvotes · 15 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Aren't we to desire to please Christ, our groom? And while there's certainly an appropriate "fear the Lord" component to it, isn't it enough to say that Christ is so good that he deserves our effort to please him?

Gravitational Centers - A Case Study on the MRP Journey

1 upvotes · 15 June 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Nice. I did get through some of chaos theory in an abstract math class I took in college. We just never discussed strange attractors.

Gravitational Centers - A Case Study on the MRP Journey

1 upvotes · 15 June 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Agreed on all points, including that the lines in the graph could use significant reworking. While the graph is broadly descriptive of about a dozen and a half relationships I've seen that inspired this post, it's prescriptive value is only as good as the degree to which those dozen and a half relationships are typical of most other relationships. I think technically I'd have to have a sample size of 30 to be considered reliable under modern statistics, and my 17 doesn't cut it to meet statistical research standards.

The familiar phrase is an axiom you once dubbed "cholomite's law." I thought it was a staple phrase in MRP, but looking into it at the time, it turned out to be something cholomite randomly said in one of my first MRP posts that's just stuck with me ever since.

Gravitational Centers - A Case Study on the MRP Journey

1 upvotes · 15 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I didn't say Jane was stressed and insecure. I simply said she felt a need to please her husband and make an effort in the relationship. I think you're assuming some baggage into this type of relationship. Bob and Jane are absolutely "pair bonded." At least from what I know from them.

I have fallen in love with my step sister and need advice

1 upvotes · 15 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The post on oneitis didn't help because out of the 4 solutions I gave, you tried the first one and it didn't work. Hmm ...

I need help, and I have no one to share my struggles with.

1 upvotes · 15 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

How far are you into the sidebar here? Starting points:

1. Get those lifts up. People want to be friends with attractive people. Your fitness will matter more than your height. One of the first guys I brought to Christ was 5'4", but benched 300+. People flocked to him even more than the smart or charming or witty people. Lifting matters more than you realize when it comes to influencing people and making friends.
2. What's your mission? You never said. That will singularly affect every possible insight I could give you into why you're having this struggle and how to fix it.
3. Have you gotten through my posts on social influence or evangelism? Those will be the biggest starting points.

On Marriage And Mission

1 upvotes · 13 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

That's not the right question. It is: How far are men willing to let women go?

Absolutely right.

I think the answer is "all the way to the 9th level of Hell."

And right again.

There's a saying: "Strong men breed good times. Good times breed weak men. Weak men breed hard times. Hard times breed good men."

This cycle was true for most of history when men had freedom to express their strength when times were rough and called for it. Now our society is trying to pussify men so that when the hard times come there is no one to revolt. No one to fix the problem. Those in power remain in power, even if it means the world goes "all the way to the 9th level of Hell."

The Pareto Principle of 80/20 will still apply

If by this you mean that there will always be a bottom 80% and a top 20%, then yes. But the pareto principle in itself is not an infallible law - it is a trend that people gravitate toward without a force acting on the system. Some systems can and do break the pareto principle. The Underground Church model of ministry that I've talked about a few times has an entire section in their book by the same name about how they have reversed their pareto principle: 80% of their people are doing what the 20% at any other congregation would do.

While I completely agree with you that hypergamy doesn't care, at some point the line between one guy and the next is too fine to see with the naked eye. Chad 1 has a 6-pack, earns $100,000/yr, and his DNGAF attitude turns her on. Chad 2 is ripped, but not quite as buff; he makes $125,000/yr though, is connected to people who she could brag to her friends about knowing, and is a grade-A smooth talker who gets her swooning. Which one's the higher value guy? That's really hard to say.

Women get torn between two guys all the time - and it's not the classic romance plot between "Great Guy Gus" and "Hot Hunk Hank." Sometimes they're both high-value guys, and hypergamy doesn't know which one to decide. They both give her the tingles. Eventually the men decide for her - and oftentimes that decision is, "I've had my fun. Good luck with the other guy." But if enough guys do up their value, the line between Hank and Gus becomes the line between Chad 1 and Chad 2 - and I do think that would have an impact on the sexual marketplace.

I also believe having a greater population of (birth control) "sponge worthy" males might even get them off the CC quicker and into the arms of a suitable husband/former Beta. Further, if the marriages are based on RP principles, they will last longer and be more fruitful.

I do completely agree with this. I didn't mean to advocate against upping the competition in the marketplace - only to note that there were more variables to consider.

I don't see the major downside to unplugging everybody. Of course I don't see the major downside to nuking the whole Matrix into melted radioactive rubble so grain of salt and all that.

Hah, I'm with you. I'd prefer everyone unplugged, personally. But it's easy for me to say that as a guy who isn't intentionally competing in the SMP right now. I'm also an advocate for truth, regardless of how the chips may fall in its wake.

On Marriage And Mission

1 upvotes · 13 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

True, true. /u/skimthedross should be there by now, but you're right that other guys might not be. Also, tactful communication of a bold concept eases the blow without having to pussy foot around the issue for months.

Gravitational Centers - A Case Study on the MRP Journey

1 upvotes · 12 June 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Interesting ... never heard of it, but if I ever get time I bet it'd be fun to learn about.

The world we live in

1 upvotes · 12 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Why wouldn't I? She's beautiful, follows my lead, doesn't deny me, helps me with my mission, is faithful to growing in Christ.

I said her interest in "going to church" is a sign of spiritual immaturity more as a theological point to make you rethink your own priorities that likely led to you asking if she went to church. If that were the biblical standard of maturity, she would be leaps and bounds more mature than me.

The fact that she has this fetish about attending a Sunday service doesn't mean she isn't actually mature. She does still live up to the biblical standard of maturity in many ways - more so than about 85% of the women I know, and I know some of the most spiritually mature women.

So to be clear, things are not "rough" by any means. I've got the best marriage and wife of anyone I know IRL and wouldn't trade her out for anyone else even if God gave me a free pass to do so :p

The world we live in

1 upvotes · 12 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The short answer is that she's more interested in "going to ~~church~~ Sunday service" than I am. She is diligent about wanting to go each week and make sure our kids are raised "in ~~the church~~ a congregation." But this is actually a sign of spiritual immaturity, on that level.

What's more significant is the fact that she's on board with my mission to make disciples.

Gravitational Centers - A Case Study on the MRP Journey

1 upvotes · 12 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, the graph is more meant to be demonstrative than actually descriptive. If I were to be more accurate, the slopes of the lines would be drastically different and everything would be slanted way more in balance toward the vertical as having more weight than the horizontal axis (I think /u/Deep_Strength alluded to this) ... but again, I was short on time. You can figure it out from there.

Based on what I know of red pill thought it seems like this sub recommending marriage over living as Paul did being single is illogical.

1 upvotes · 12 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

As for hypergamy I thought the whole point of the red pill was that men need to out do women in every way including resource production order to win them over.

This is incorrect.

Who should disciple women?

1 upvotes · 11 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

For instance, the woman who thinks she doesn't have to love her husband if he isn't being "nice" to her.

"Honey, there are times my husband isn't nice to me either, but I show him love all the same. Here's how to show your husband love even when he's not nice." No doctrine.

Teaching doctrine is certainly one method of addressing the situation, but our personal testimony and example will always be more powerful in advancing the message of the Gospel in people's lives than intellectual doctrinal teachings - and I say that as an intellectual who has gained much of my influence both locally and online from doctrinal teachings.

My other concern with tackling such a situation without Scripture is that you are training her to look to someone or something other than Scripture as her authority.

In biblical times, that actually was the status quo. The New Testament wasn't compiled during the early history of the church, and Paul's letters arguably weren't considered Scripture until after his death (around the same time 2 Peter was written). Paul didn't write 1 Cor. 11:1 saying, "Read my letters and Peter's and John's letters and I'll read them to follow Christ too." He said, "Follow me as I follow Christ."

If Titus is followed, a more mature woman will lead a younger woman by showing her from her life. While pointing people to Scripture is likely a more ideal solution, perhaps there's a reason why God might want younger women to build relationships with older women to learn - a reason that is undermined if younger women believe they don't need older women because "All I need is me and Jesus," as the slogan goes. If 1 Cor. 11:3 is true, then it makes sense that men should learn directly from Scripture - but the implication is that women should learn from men.

Am I saying women shouldn't read the Bible? No. I'd assume that reading it is better than not reading it. But I do think 1 Cor. 11:3 seems to establish that the ideal context is for men to teach women, not for women to teach themselves directly from Scripture ... which is no doubt how a lot of feminist interpretations of Scripture came about in the first place.

It's the same thing with the apostles and the churches, by the way. When studying any of the epistles, I often ask: "Why do you think God told all this stuff to Paul? Why didn't he just tell it to the leaders of the church at Corinth or Ephesus or Galatia or Philippi? Why didn't he tell Timothy these things directly? Why work through Paul instead of all these other people figuring it out directly for themselves from their own examination of Scripture. After all, they had the Holy Spirit too, right? They could have been inspired to the same conclusions, right?"

The answer is, of course, that God values discipleship as his primary model of seeing the Gospel spread. This inherently necessitates a chain of passing information from one person to the next rather than each person going directly to Scripture to create their own personalized thoughts and interpretations.

A great example of this: churchianity's obsession with having a "daily quiet time." Is this a good practice? Absolutely. Go do a Bible study on the topic, though. Tell me how many times you see Paul or any other apostle - or even Jesus - commanding others to do this. We're told to pray continually - not just daily, but continually. We're told to obey God's Word. But this notion of "read your bible for at least 15-30 minutes a day" is curiously absent.

I'm not saying we shouldn't do it. I'm only saying that the way the Bible encourages spiritual maturity is not always identical to the way modern churchianity thinks a person should become spiritually mature. There's scant little about the importance of studying Scripture and a heck of a lot about learning from each other and following the example of others who are more godly than ourselves.

When Paul says "all of us who are mature should take such a view of things," it is not in saying, "read the Scriptures and know them inside and out" - it's in saying, "join with others in following my example, brothers, and take note of those who live according to the pattern we gave you." Discipleship. Not independent study.

Does Scripture indicate that she, Judas Iscariot, or those movie producers will receive an eternal reward for these works?

"Some people got saved" is not the same thing as "they were making disciples." A person is not a disciple the instant he is "saved" - if we can even pin point that exact moment for anyone in the first place. We can guess, but my study of Scripture often leads to different conclusions - even when there are extremely strong emotional experiences involved pointing to a particular time-frame.

Judas hung himself before making disciples of his own. The movie produces aren't discipling their viewers. The followers made from this people are not because of their efforts, but in spite of.

We are getting married next month

So ... you discipled a girl and now you are presumably excited to marry. And you're telling other guys this is a bad thing? Are you regretting finding a wife this way? If so, why not call it off? If you don't regret it and are glad you've built this relationship, why tell other guys not to go about finding a wife the way you did, which i believe is also the implied model of 1 Cor. 7?

Who should disciple women?

1 upvotes · 10 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

if they can't teach doctrine, they also can't teach application.

I see what you're saying, but I'm not sure I agree with your point. I'm not sure that any of the issues in Titus 2:3-5 are doctrinal in nature. He's not giving them a command to exegete the proper method of loving a husband or refraining from alcohol or why these things exist. It's simply a woman saying, "I've been married for some time now. Here's how I've loved my husband and helped him in the home. You do likewise." This requires no doctrine.

The woman could develop an unhealthy emotional attachment to him, become attracted, and begin following him not because he is teaching sound doctrine but because she is attracted.

And as long as he's clear about his intentions - what's the harm in this? Paul says, "Follow me as I follow Christ." Such a man would have a woman following him as he follows Christ. I'm not sure why her having romantic feelings for him somehow invalidates the fact that she's following Christ.

Someone says, "Because she's doing it for HIM and not for Jesus." That's a discernment for the disciple-maker to make, and if he decides this is somehow dangerous, he can cut it off at any point, right? Who says he must keep discipling her forever?

But the point of discipleship is to bear fruit. Is she bearing fruit for the Kingdom? Philippians 1:18 says, "But what does it matter? The important thing is that in every way, whether from false motives or true, Christ is preached. And because of this I rejoice." If she's not bearing fruit, there's no point in continuing to disciple her anyway.

Perhaps a man can disciple a woman in a more roundabout way. Compile a list of resources (solid teachers, books, sermon series, etc) and give them to the woman.

But that's not discipleship in the slightest - not even in a round-about way.

It may also be possible to do this in a group setting. A man teaches doctrine to a mixed group, and then they split into sex-segregated groups to discuss application.

This is still not discipleship.

I think the hangup people get about "men discipling women" is based on foolish notions from modern church culture that discipleship is some inherently deep, emotionally bonding relationship between two people. It can certainly become that, but it doesn't have to. I can disciple someone toward bearing fruit just fine without going into graphic detail about my past sins or crying on the floor together over some sorrow one of us has experienced.

I wrote in my 208 post a very basic outline of Jesus' discipleship method:

1. Tell someone how they ought to live.
2. Show them how by doing it in front of them.
3. Let them try it in front of you.
4. Encourage them to keep doing it when you're not around.
5. Show them how to teach the same thing to someone else.

I just don't understand where this pattern automatically translates to sexual temptation and intimate relational bonding. "OMG! He just explained the difference between spiritual baptism and water baptism. My panties are getting so wet right now, and not from the baptism!"

Who should disciple women?

1 upvotes · 10 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Fair enough. To that end:

- Priscilla AND Aquila instructed Apollos. There's no evidence that she was the one teaching doctrine.
- Mary worked hard. Junia was likely a dude. It also doesn't say he/she was actually an apostle (huge split on that subject). Also, no doctrinal teaching mentioned here.
- Deacons are servants, not doctrinal teachers.
- Lydia was a single woman with her own business. It doesn't say that she was prominent in the city or taught doctrine.
- Chloe was appropriately submitting to Paul's authority by seeking him to lead in the dispute at Corinth rather than trying to head it herself. There's no indication she was married or usurping her husband's authority or that she was teaching doctrine. Nympha's home was used to host a church, not that she was the one leading/teaching in it.

Yes, there are ways to interpret all of those passages that would imply women as doctrinal teachers. But there are also several ways to read those passages that remain consistent with the rest of the Bible. Which way is more likely true: the interpretation that's consistent with other Scripture, or the one that would imply all these women were breaking God's law, yet somehow still revered?

It's not like Paul said, "I do not permit a woman to teach or be in authority over a man ... except for the ones I like and send greetings to."

Experienced RP Newly Returned to Christianity

1 upvotes · 10 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

If you want to get technical, when Jesus says "but for sexual immorality" in his bit on divorce, the Greek word he uses is porneia, which was the broadest word in the Greek language at the time to encompass all forms of sexual sin - including denying a husband his conjugal rights. This was a form of sexual sin.

That said, on a theological level I believe this technicality lends itself to the wrong conclusion and that Jesus isn't trying to expand the scope of when people are allowed to get divorced; rather the entire context of that passage is Jesus showing them that more things are sinful than they ever realized. So, it's unlikely that Jesus was creating new law to let men divorce their frigid wives - just as all those pastors are wrong who preach that this verse gives women cause to divorce their husbands because of their porn problem. Jesus was not trying to give all women an excuse to get out of a bad marriage because virtually every guy has lusted and/or beat off at some point, nor was he trying to give every man an out because he has been denied at some point.

Now, that aside, I'm more interested in the fact that you're asking about technicalities of sin in the first place. I have this spiel I usually go through when someone asks, "Is ____ a sin?" I'm tired, so here's the short version.

Whatever "____" is, suppose I could look through God's law and find a justification for why it's not sin. A legitimate justification and not some hocus pocus word-play. In doing so, you have just looked to the law to justify your behavior. But when you submit to the law at one point, you submit to it at every point. You cannot say, "I didn't commit adultery, so I'm good!" and claim to be a law-follower while you're a closer serial killer. As James 2:11 says, "If you do not commit adultery but do commit murder, you have become a lawbreaker."

James 4:17 also notes: "If anyone knows the good he ought to do and doesn't do it, for him it is sin." Jesus told you to "make disciples of all nations" in Matthew 28:19-20. That's a good. Are you doing it? If not, then the question of whether the Bible justifies leaving your wife in some circumstance or the other means very little because even if you obey that command, if you're not obeying the command to make disciples, your other obedience becomes moot. You're still a law breaker all the same.

To put it more simply: if you look to the law to justify you at any point, you must also let it condemn you in every other point where you have not met its standard. That's an impossible standard to meet. I'd rather be judged by grace through Christ than by the law. So, I no longer look to the law to vindicate me in things I want to do; rather, I live for Christ, letting my faith prompt my actions and guide my decisions (Romans 14:23), looking little to the technicalities of whether something may or may not be sin, as nothing is inherently sinful anyway (Romans 14:14).

Now for the RP part. Is there a fundamental disconnect between the RP concept of nexting a frigid wife and the apparent biblical compulsion to keep one's wife around?

First, we have to remember that RP is about maximizing a person's sexual gratification, not his eternal well-being. The goals are a bit different. In the sidebar I wrote a post about "defining the red pill for Christians" and noted that the secular RP guys have certainly mastered the art of maximizing sexuality - but that as Christians we have higher goals than our sexuality alone. I'm confident that I could have more exciting sex by hopping from hookup to hookup than by maintaining a monogamous marriage, but that's not my real goal in life. So, does RP demand that sex be a man's highest goal, or is RP about helping men accomplish their own goals, whatever they may be? There's a split even in the secular community on this point, so I won't pretend to answer that here - only that the "next your wife at the first sign of frigidity" is advice purely for those guys whose goals aren't going to be compromised by taking that advice.

Second, the starting point to any question on marriage and relationship advice is: What does Jesus model for us in his marriage to the church? I've often said that physical reproduction is parallel to spiritual reproduction. Is there any time that Jesus says "next" to a believer who won't reproduce with him? Luke 13 holds that answer. Jesus tells the parable of the fig tree. The master goes to get a fig off of it. The tree is alive. The master has every reason to believe there should be a fig on the tree. Yet there are no figs. Master's conclusion? "Cut it down!" The gardener says, "Give me one year to water and fertilize it and help it grow fruit. If it still doesn't bear fruit, then go ahead and cut it down." The fruit being referenced are the disciples we produce in our lives, just as the parable of the sower makes it clear that when the Gospel springs up in us the fruit is what causes us to "yield a crop 30, 60, or even 100 times what was sown." Are you seeing 30, 60 or even 100 people coming to Christ because of your life? Back on point: if you're not engaging in evangelism (i.e. spiritual sex) with your groom, he cuts you off. Does this mean a man can cut off his frigid wife who isn't engaging in physical sex with him? In doing so, he certainly still reflects the image of Christ to the world. In fact, to keep her around would be to confuse the world as if the parable of the fig tree (and many other such passages) didn't exist. It would communicate a false image of Jesus to the world - an image that is so lovey-dove that he never draws a line in the sand. Funny that the passage about Jesus drawing a literal line in the sand is one that modern scholars like to say may not have actually been true (see the footnote in virtually every translation of that passage).

Now let me be clear: I'm not using that as an excuse to say it's okay to leave your wife on a whim. You still have to account for 2 Timothy 2, which says, "If we disown him, he will disown us. But if we are faithless, he remains faithful." I'm not going to dive into balancing these concepts. I just want to put them out there to prompt your curiosity so that you'll engage with the Scriptures on your own to start looking into these things. These questions should give you a passion for God's Word and a renewed excitement every time you reach your conclusion - and don't let anyone else do all the work for you because most of the spiritual maturity growth happens not from learning a new answer, but from the time spent in God's Word alongside him.

Third, go ask around MRP and see if any of the endorsed people there recommend nexting a wife the instant she seems sexually disinterested. Of course not. They're going to advocate for keeping your options open, but to use your wife like a practice dummy or sparring partner. You train your skills in verbal discourse on her to prepare you for the world of women out there. And in the process, many men on MRP find that ... waddayaknow: RP actually works and their wives are suddenly with the program and there's no longer any real imperative to next them anyway. I remember the mods boasting in response to a critic at one point that only one of the mods/ECs was divorced after becoming red pill. This is a clear testament that the "is willing to next his wife" is more about the willingness than actually doing it. You can't fake the mentality, but the real deal (which I came to terms with myself) is itself what makes its own imperative moot because that mentality is one of the most attractive things to a wife in the first place. It's also one of the most attractive things about our God - that he is so glorious that if we didn't worship him, the rocks would cry out in our place. The fact that he doesn't need us is all the more alluring to the reality that he chooses to use us anyway.

You don't need your wife, and mine knows it. But the fact that I choose and prefer to accomplish my goals through her than directly on my own shows value. If I needed her, I might not value her because having her in my life is a compulsion rather than a choice - and having a woman who adds value to your life is certainly even MRP grounds for keeping her around. Jesus could post the message of his Gospel in the sky for all to see, so he really doesn't need the church. But he prefers to work through his bride anyway. He doesn't need us, but he does value us anyway.

Enough tangents. Hopefully this clears some things up.

Based on what I know of red pill thought it seems like this sub recommending marriage over living as Paul did being single is illogical.

1 upvotes · 10 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

you claim women would be abandoning their faith if they became head of household, but that's exactly what effectively happens when they get a man to sign the worldly legal contract

Imagine a king on his throne. He holds no weapons. The general of his armies comes with an axe across his back, a sword sheathed to his belt, and a dagger in each boot. He asks the king, "Where should I attack next?"

Who is the ruler in this scenario? The one making the plans and delegating responsibilities or the one with the weapons? The fact that the general could overthrow the king if he wanted (because of his superior weaponry) doesn't change the fact of who is actually exercising authority in that situation.

But what you don't realize is that a proper understanding of hypergamy is actually an even bigger weapon that men have in their arsenal than divorce is for the woman's arsenal. As a divorce lawyer who has written much of the MRP sidebar content on the subject, I can say quite definitively that divorce is a relatively small threat to a man who knows what he's doing with his life.

To that end, your entire line of thinking is faulty because you give way too much emphasis to the divorce threat, like you're some scarey cat, and you give no credit or even an indication of understanding to the power that hypergamy gives to a man who knows how to wield it properly. I still don't encourage men to marry, and there are a wide variety of reasons for that. But "you'll get divorce raped" is a low reason on that list if the guy's willing to take even basic advice on relationships and life planning.

It's why women almost never "date down" and that the number of men who actually "win" in divorce is very low

I'm not sure how you see these things as related. Most men who lose in divorce courts are idiots. It's that simple.

Yet you claim the fix to men avoiding divorce rape is to marry a woman that would have the most direct authority over resources due to being the one earning more

You're definitely misunderstanding something I've said. It's also further evidence of your misunderstanding of hypergamy if you believe that it is entirely decided by whether a woman has a higher income than a man or vice versa.

My point is that I believe Christians should avoid partaking in a system that will do more to tempt them with sin than actually grow in faith

Right. Which is why we encourage men to avoid marriage if at all possible, just as Jesus did in Matthew 19 and Paul did in 1 Cor. 7. And yet they both (Jesus, at the very least) seemed to have a clear understanding that only a few people would actually be able to live up to this.

I don't see a red pill man being able to avoid being controlled in a prolonged relationship as pair bonding often makes men submissive even when they know this stuff

HAHA! That's hysterical. I assume this is simply because you are not a red pill man - and it seems you are more interested in the MGTOW agenda than the RPC agenda. So, at this point I'm going to assume you're just a troll and stop reading.

Who should disciple women?

1 upvotes · 10 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I think most men would be uneasy with their wives having one-on-one sessions with an attractive male "spiritual mentor"

Right. But note that I didn't leave room for a married woman to be discipled by a man other than her husband ;)

and wives wouldn't be too pleased with husbands having a Bible study with the attractive divorcee down the street!

True, but how much of that is simply a frame issue versus an actual biblical problem? Note that I'm primarily looking for biblical responses. I can, as you have done, give a laundry list of reasons why it doesn't make human sense. But I can also make a laundry list of reasons why it would be unwise and idiotic for Jesus to trust humans to get his Gospel into the nations rather than posting it in the sky ... yet God's Way is God's Way.

relationship begins but doesn't work out for some reason, and the mentee's spiritual growth is derailed in the process

I've heard you mention this before, and I'm pretty sure I get what you're saying. But let's elaborate on this point - because my gut reaction is to say:

- If the person doing the discipling isn't mature, he's not ready to disciple single women in the first place.
- If the person doing the discipling is mature, he's going to be clear and up-front about his boundaries in the first place.

So, if she gets hung up on the possibility of a romantic relationship, that's on her and not the discipler. That would be her blaming God for her own misinterpretation, right? Or how else would this play out that I'm not seeing?

To be clear, I'm not as interested in situations where the disciple walks away. Even in same-gender discipleship, I see disciples walk away all the time. I've walked out on someone. I've also had several guys walk out on me. It happens.

But as disciple-makers, it's our job to make disciples, not to avoid every possible thing that could keep someone from walking away, right? We make disciples from Christ's frame, not to please the person we want to reach.

It isn't hard to see how this runs contrary to a romantic relationship

To what culture currently says of romantic relationships, sure. But one of the first tenets of relationships we learn in RP circles is also the very first thing taught every time we preach the Gospel: OYS. We don't get Jesus to marry us by trying to impress him, but by confessing to him. Shouldn't we model this in our earthly relationships so that this is also the context in which human marriages are formed?

A person simply can't do both at once

Now, if you're saying this is impossible, I'm going to need more backing there. I agree that it's counter-intuitive for people to try to build a romance by being vulnerable and showing weakness ... but I've also seen this happen countless times - especially if the person can own their weakness, just as Paul says in 2 Cor. 12, "I will boast all the more gladly about my weaknesses. For when I am weak, Christ is strong."

For the same-sex-attracted, I suppose this may mean going with an opposite-sex mentor!

Now that's an interesting point! I'd be curious to explore that at some point.

Who should disciple women?

1 upvotes · 10 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I believe that's the exact question I'm asking ;)

Who should disciple women?

1 upvotes · 9 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Are there enough priests in the world to teach every woman in the world?

This also seems to deny the concepts from Hebrews and 1 Peter that we are a kingdom of priests - not just a few who go religious schools (which didn't exist in the early church), but all of us are meant to hold the office of priests to the world.

While I agree that priests should do this, it seems an unfeasible model if the priesthood is limited to only those who wear a collar.

Who should disciple women?

1 upvotes · 9 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Sure ... I don't think anyone here disagrees with that, and I'd wager most mainstream congregations would agree with this too. But this is a different issue from what I'm asking.

Who should disciple women?

1 upvotes · 9 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

What if they don't have questions? What if they're generally uninterested in growth? Should no one reach out to them?

In defense of the missionary position

1 upvotes · 8 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

There has never actually been a documented female-led culture

Governmentally that may be true. But I wouldn't say as much on a cultural level. America today is a female-led culture, mix-gender led government. There are countless scholarly works that attempt to show that Israel was both a matriarchal and patriarchal society simultaneously (such as this one) - not that this is by God's law, but how their culture organized itself anyway. When my dad was in seminary he was taught that God deemed Israel to be a patriarchal society, but that it was actually dominated by matriarchal influences in rebellion against God and that female influence was at the core of most major developments in Israel's history outside God's direct decrees (ex. God calling Abraham to leave Ur and move to Canaan, which was God's choice, not Sarah's).

Stories about women like Esther and Deborah and Ruth/Naomi further validate the way that men in those societies were culturally influenced by the women around them, constantly living in their frame. You'll notice the way those books are written to tip toe around the fact that these women really shouldn't have been doing this stuff, but God was going to use it to serve his purposes anyway.

- Esther clearly understands that she shouldn't be telling her king what to do, but if the King was going to reject God's people and let them be killed and no man was going to step up to save them, then what else is a woman to do?
- In one of Israel's lowest moments and without proper equipment for an oncoming war, Deborah recognizes that the man, Barak, should lead, but he refuses unless she leads at his side. She shames him for this saying that a woman (either herself or Jael) would get the credit for his victory because of his weakness.
- Ruth and Naomi are often preached in the church as shining examples of strong women who had a purpose and that God used them - outsiders to Israel - for such a great function that he rewarded them with Jesus being born from their line. What, exactly, did they do that was so praise-worthy? Nothing, really. They didn't save Israel from a major battle. They didn't speak up against a king. They plotted to seduce an old man. So while the story may be about the women, the context is their efforts to respect and revere Boaz's position and that he was the ultimate decision-maker over whether or not to be a kinsman redeemer over Ruth.

So, was Boaz influenced by Ruth or was she submitting to his authority as a man when she slept at his feet? Was Esther influencing Xerxes or fearful of what it would mean if he found her behavior wasn't respectful enough of his authority? Was Deborah actively taking charge over Israel or simply filling in a void because the men weren't willing to lead without a woman telling them what to do? Can't we interpret from her words that she would have preferred Barak to take charge and get the credit?

I don't really know where I'm going with this other than to say that there certainly are arguments that cultural matriarchies existed - even to the point of Israel being governmentally led by Deborah for a time - but that this is still never God's plan anyway, and even the women who influenced their men knew that in the broader scheme (their individual circumstances notwithstanding), they were working against the grain of God's intent and were only vindicated in what they were doing because of unique and abnormal circumstances.

Based on what I know of red pill thought it seems like this sub recommending marriage over living as Paul did being single is illogical.

1 upvotes · 8 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed, I can easily see the MGTOWs being the insurgents to start the next era of political revolution by force. I'm more just shocked to see you encouraging marriage at all.

I hope this guy can get some advice from this sub

1 upvotes · 7 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

In that case, it'll be eternity before the book holds any relevance, so you might as well wait eternity anyway ;)

OYS - Where Progress is Made (06/05/19)

1 upvotes · 7 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This is an encouraging comment to read, brother. I don't comment on the OYS threads as long as I'd like - and haven't been on reddit much in the past few weeks anyway due to a lot of life circumstances. But I did appreciate reading your update here and the dedication you give to consistent OYS posts. Keep up the good work.

I have a problem with either ... (c) thinking about what I'm going to say next

I used to struggle with that. I found for most people this stems from one of two things:

- First, it could be because you want to sound brilliant (or at least competent), so you pick one thing to reply to that makes you look interested or interesting. This is usually an ego thing. Kill the ego, fix the conversation. If you look like a fool to someone else, that's just another opportunity to practice frame. In the meantime, you're also practicing thinking on your feet rather than engaging in a rolling premeditated conversation.
- The other reason could be because you're uncomfortable with silence. Everyone has a different silence threshold. Either they don't like the silence themselves or they're afraid that other people around them will think less of them for not breaking the silence. This is heightened in a 2-person conversation when they're done talking and you don't say anything, making it clear that you're the cause of the silence. Learn to increase your silence threshold - the amount of time that you're comfortable with before feeling compelled to speak - and this problem often goes away. I used to have a silence threshold of about 1.5 seconds. Now I'm near infinite. This makes a huge difference in conversational skills and can also be a highly effective power-play conversational technique. It's also STFU 101.

Hope this helps.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (06/05/19)

1 upvotes · 7 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I encourage her to continue to cum again. She often complains of pain or the wetness making her itchy, basically significant arousal drop. I try all DEVI and nothing raises arousal. I guess it's attraction.
#justKeepWorkingTheMap

I assume you're talking about multiples here. Some women are inclined toward it and others aren't. I've heard of some who can do one right after the next, but other women who get so sensitive that they need at least 30 minutes for their bits and pieces to cool down before they can go again.

I've heard that the most effective strategy for moving toward multiples is letting the first be external then shifting to internal so the outside can get a break. But trying to force it through overt acts of dominance when she's not mentally on board with it can be tough. She has to want it if it's going to happen. You telling her to want it isn't going to be any more effective than telling her to be more attracted to you.

As for internals, this is something that my wife and I are starting to experiment with more, as she believed she was incapable for years. It's often blogged that some women simply can't have internal orgasms - and I'm becoming more and more confident that this simply isn't true, as I had bought into that about my wife for almost a decade before realizing I was wrong. My guess is that most of the people who write that simply haven't had good enough sex to get them there. There's a lot of techniques for stimulating internal orgasms, and that's certainly the most effective way I've seen of moving into multiples, but that's a much longer conversation.

All of that aside, it doesn't sound like this is her not being attracted to you; it's probably more a mental block in herself or a physical sensitivity issue. However, if you're talking about her not being able to have a first orgasm - that's probably an attraction issue.

I hope this guy can get some advice from this sub

1 upvotes · 7 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

There are better things to read for a single guy. Wait until you're in a relationship then go at it.

RooshV Forum is now essentially a larger alternative Red Pill Christian forum...

1 upvotes · 7 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I like this. This is close to a house church model, but with one crucial difference:

Once a church exceeds the 20, one of the people in that group who is considered a good leader goes out and starts a new church home

The traditional house-church model falters because it is still a "come to me until my thing is so large that we must split." This model isn't about splitting - it's about raising up a leader and sending. That's good stuff.

In a model like this, I would also encourage setting duration limits on how long a "house church" will continue to meet. Some people will never take up the mantle of making another disciple because they're content to spend their entire lives being participants - someone else's disciple. Jesus trained the 12 with the up-front calling: "If you follow me, you'll be fishing for men yourself by the time I'm done with you." He knew going in that it'd be a short-term endeavor - that after 3 years he'd leave and they'd scatter and not stay clustered. They were never to invite the 12 until it became 24 and then 50 so they could divide out. Their group was always intended to separate so a new wave of leaders could be raised.

The standard house-church model of "grow, grow, grow, then give half of your people to one other leader" is still focused on using the few - the 20% in the pareto principle - to reach the many - the 80%. The model of "train, train, train, then we end our training group and start up a new generation" is closer to what Jesus did.

Good stuff, brother. I'll have to check out Letters to the Church. What you're describing seems very similar to the Underground Church model with some tweaks both good and bad.

RooshV Forum is now essentially a larger alternative Red Pill Christian forum...

1 upvotes · 7 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, touche.

RooshV Forum is now essentially a larger alternative Red Pill Christian forum...

1 upvotes · 5 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for the reply. What's Francis Chan's model? I've always been a fan of his messages, but didn't know what he was doing in the grander scheme.

I lied to make myself look good, and potentially hurt a good friend/disciple in the process. Could use some advise.

1 upvotes · 4 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not a "wonderful person"

That's the start of the Gospel, my friend. Recognizing that you're imperfect and need a savior in the first place. As Paul says, "I will boast all the more gladly about my weaknesses" - because our weakness proves God's grace and strength.

What do you guys think?

Apart from telling the truth to the guys, it really just depends on what you want to do.

What value is this girl adding to your life other than feelz? Is she a competent disciple-maker who can help you reach countless women that you'll never disciple but she can? Go for it. Is it just that you want to have sex with her and that's about it? You can easily find another girl you'll want to have sex with who also adds value to your life and mission in different ways.

Don't get hung up on feeling like you have any further obligation to her than to clear her name. What you do with the relationship from there is entirely up to what you want to get out of it.

I lied to make myself look good, and potentially hurt a good friend/disciple in the process. Could use some advise.

1 upvotes · 4 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The fact that you keep calling it a church is amusing ;)

I lied to make myself look good, and potentially hurt a good friend/disciple in the process. Could use some advise.

1 upvotes · 4 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

That's the first thing that crossed my mind too.

I hope this guy can get some advice from this sub

1 upvotes · 4 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Have you read Married Man Sex Life Primer? Outside the Bible, it's the single best book I've ever read on marriage. While the author is a non-Christian, I found myself questioning consistently through the book if I was wrong about that because what he, as a secular person, has discovered from observing the ins and outs of functional marriages is so closely aligned with what the Bible says already.

He has a section in that book entirely devoted to the "I love you, but I'm not in love with you" speech and why it creeps up and how to handle it. As with all things, filter out the bad that comes with a non-Christian book, but do take the good.

While I don't know much of your specific situation, I've written most of the sidebar here (much of which does need significant revamping) and would be happy to help ... I'm just a bit late to the party. But MMSLP is going to be the place to start, unless you're already fluent with how to interpret the parallels between the Christ/church relationship and your marriage (which it sounds as if that isn't the case, given the situation you're in).

RooshV Forum is now essentially a larger alternative Red Pill Christian forum...

1 upvotes · 4 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good stuff.

his frame had been about extracting things ... Jesus frame was about giving

This reminds me a lot of the stuff I've been harping on lately in regard to a decentralized church structure. u/ruizbuja has taught me a lot about this and made a comment over here that went more into detail, the most relevant part being:

This is why people are drained and don't feel filled attending ~~church~~ Sunday service. Because the ~~pastor~~ congregation leader is more interested in getting their money, getting their time, getting their energy, getting their skills, etc. - draining them of all of these things to serve the ~~church~~ congregation members who don't want to contribute, or maybe a few people in the community (hoping that a small fraction will start showing up on Sunday). Jesus was more interested in giving his time, giving his energy, giving his skills, giving his followers to the world. And these people changed that world.

When was the last time you ever heard of a ~~pastor~~ congregation leader who came across a spiritually mature person in his church and said, "You look like you could do great things for God's Kingdom. Let me share with you what God's given me, then I want you to leave my church and do the same with others"? How often do you see a ~~pastor~~ congregation leader find such a person and say, "I'm so glad you're here. You'd be a great fit to spend your time in this ministry we've got going. We could really use your skills on this project. Your financial contribution could really help with this need." Drain, drain, drain.

Those of us involved in the weekly RPC video conference/bible study have been talking about this for a few months now. If you have any thoughts on how to contribute to shifting churchianity structure to a giving/sending approach rather than a draining/keeping approach, share away!

Fiance withholding information about rape

1 upvotes · 4 June 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good example.

Fiance withholding information about rape

1 upvotes · 31 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I had the same question.

On Sodomy by bonald

1 upvotes · 21 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm so confused.

New to the Forum, seeking insight

1 upvotes · 13 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

If you don't have anything better to do, withdrawing time and attention doesn't actually work. The point of doing this is to communicate, "I have better things to do than spend time with you right now." If you don't have better things to do, it comes off as: "I'm mad and don't want to spend time with you right now." This is butthurt and is unattractive. A man with more important things going on is attractive. Getting the attention of such a man is valuable. Making a difference for eternity is the most valuable and important thing. Start there before going Rambo on any other course of conduct.

New to the Forum, seeking insight

1 upvotes · 11 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Lots and lots and lots to get in here - but before I waste time on an uninformed response:

1. How much of the sidebar here have you read? and
2. What is your mission?

This second question is the most vital to your situation - and the fact that it's not mentioned is very telling.

I swear, not lifting must be a sin

1 upvotes · 11 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Haha

I swear, not lifting must be a sin

1 upvotes · 11 May 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I know, brother. All the muscle it took to break that bread in half.

Women Feeling Threatened by Hyper-Sexualized Social Media

1 upvotes · 30 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

See my reply to your other comment.

Get Woke - Go Broke...

1 upvotes · 25 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

'The way the world responded (to the man tax) showed us how fragile masculinity is and solidified the necessity for us to confront and dismantle patriarchy,' the post said.

Wait ... who was the one whose ideals ended up broken here? I'm pretty sure masculinity still exists (in some form) and the shop that tried to fight it is the one that was fragile and broke.

App Review: BodBot - Two Thumbs Up

1 upvotes · 22 April 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

To be fair, by their picture you do get to brace your feet on a ledge, which takes some of the weight off. Personally, I walk my feet up an empty wall for balance.

Raiders of the Lost Covenant

1 upvotes · 22 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Correct.

Raiders of the Lost Covenant

1 upvotes · 22 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Trusts and whatnot can remedy this - not that I'm trying to persuade you of anything; just noting that there are options.

Ruined a relationship with female disciple

1 upvotes · 21 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed to disagree, then. If they're just playing God, sure. But if they're both mature I've seen these types of separations work out just fine.

Ruined a relationship with female disciple

1 upvotes · 21 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right, if the intent is to keep it platonic this makes perfect sense. But if he's attracted and wants to start a romantic relationship intentionally, there's no harm here.

Post cut rebulking

1 upvotes · 19 April 2019 · /r/askMRP

That's quite exciting and motivating.

Post cut rebulking

1 upvotes · 19 April 2019 · /r/askMRP

I lift au naturale, other than the occasional protein shake. Probably need to step those up a bit more too.

Post cut rebulking

1 upvotes · 19 April 2019 · /r/askMRP

Very helpful reply. Thanks. I noticed that after the first 2 weeks my ORM did go up from 290 to 295. But yes, I do see some tapering several weeks later, as 275 for 5 reps never used to be an issue before. I'll definitely work at beating the psychological game in this.

Post cut rebulking

1 upvotes · 19 April 2019 · /r/askMRP

Good to know what to expect. Thanks!

Are Christian women really different?

1 upvotes · 15 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I've seen this phenomenon since long before my red pill days. It's sad, but as you say: distressingly common.

Biblical marriage vows

1 upvotes · 11 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Third point was about a spiritual family and leave a spiritual lineage of children - not a physical one. Otherwise, good stuff here!

Discussion: Is it okay to masturbate to thoughts of your wife?

1 upvotes · 10 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Let's play a thought experiment. Can you find any verse that says masturbation or lust is sin? If not, why would we assume it's sin? No assumptions here - just questions for the sake of thinking.

What to do about boundaries being crossed?

1 upvotes · 8 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

True.

I'm a f@ggot.

1 upvotes · 8 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

exhasperating to have people think it's just in my head

This is the problem. Why do you care so much about what /u/egc6 or any other user here thinks? Whether your stories are true or not, there's a difference between getting a girl on the hook and keeping her by your side. Let's assume you do get her on the hook and you reel her in. This incessant DEERING and validation-seeking is going to cause her to run for the hills as soon as it creeps up. And if you can't bump elbows with other guys without getting butthurt, your prospects at avoiding butthurt with a prospective wife are very low.

At the end of the day, you can pull women, but you're making the choice to stay chaste until marriage. This means you're in a great spot, at least as far as starting relationships. From there, if your mission would be advanced by having a girl at your side, start inviting some of these attractive girls to join you. As you get to know them, if the temptation for sex gets too great, ask one of them to marry you. Beyond that, I'm not sure what else you're really looking for here, other than for a bunch of guys to pat you on the back for doing what you already should be doing anyway: staying chaste despite temptation. I haven't murdered anyone in my lifetime. Do I get a pat on the back too?

Discussion: Is it okay to masturbate to thoughts of your wife?

1 upvotes · 7 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, it seems like you missed the context of this post.

Discussion: Is it okay to masturbate to thoughts of your wife?

1 upvotes · 6 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I don't see anything wrong with that.

Discussion: Is it okay to masturbate to thoughts of your wife?

1 upvotes · 6 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

True, but that's not masturbating to thoughts of your wife - it's masturbating to a live stream of her over the phone or video chat. The context is a bit different, but your point is well taken.

Masturbation when your wife withholds: Go, or no-go?

1 upvotes · 6 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

True. But proper tact in our communication can be effective in helping others receive the gospel through us.

Masturbation when your wife withholds: Go, or no-go?

1 upvotes · 6 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Sadly, those outside of RP circles would never understand the theology behind this and would assume it's degrading toward women. Yet people have no problem saying when a man has Adam's spirit - one defined by passivity ... or when women say, "what a typical man" as if that's not insulting.

Discussion: Is it okay to masturbate to thoughts of your wife?

1 upvotes · 6 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Definitely not looking for a green light. I have no need or imperative to this right now. But I can remember days when I did. This post was more prompted to separate out the rote theological discussion from the more directed advice in the original post by icy.

Masturbation when your wife withholds: Go, or no-go?

1 upvotes · 6 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I'd definitely argue against racism being a new phenomenon, but that's beside the point.

Female rebellion is inherent in everyone who hasn't received a new heart from God, right? I mean, it's literally right there in the curse at the start of the bible. So why wait until Jezebel to name it? Why not just call it: "She has a woman's Spirit. AWALT."?

Masturbation when your wife withholds: Go, or no-go?

1 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

A couple questions to clarify:

1. When you say "Jezebel spirit" are you referencing an actual demonic spirit (of a particular type/specialization) with its own independent sentient thought, or character attributes in a woman that are similar to Jezebel's characteristics?
2. What do you mean by "even a little bit"? Either you have a spirit or you don't. It's just a matter of how capable someone is of controlling the impulses of their inner spirit that would make it look like she has only a "little bit" of the spirit in them.

Just curious. Especially on the first point I've heard people argue both sides.

Masturbation when your wife withholds: Go, or no-go?

1 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Why do you feel you need toys?

Discussion: Is it okay to masturbate to thoughts of your wife?

1 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Can you make it 2 days without release?

Discussion: Is it okay to masturbate to thoughts of your wife?

1 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Makes sense - especially from a single perspective.

Masturbation when your wife withholds: Go, or no-go?

1 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Body fat and lifts? Those are going to be the biggest prerequisites to getting started.

Masturbation when your wife withholds: Go, or no-go?

1 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Ah ... so this is a frame issue. I was in that exact same mindset for years before I found the red pill and started understanding what Jesus actually modeled about sexuality.

I believed that the more pleasurable I made sex for my wife, the more she'd want it - maybe even crave it. That strategy straight up doesn't work.

Worrying about how she thinks or feels about sex is the definition of being in her frame. Caving to her frame is highly unattractive.

I still love giving my wife orgasms - but not for her sake. It's because he orgasms turn me on like crazy. My frame. Totally different reason for trying to please her that results in an attitude she can respect and is attractive.

Discussion: Is it okay to masturbate to thoughts of your wife?

1 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The faith question is probably better worded through a statement.

- Because I believe that Jesus is the son of God and that he died and rose to save me from my sin and build his kingdom through generations of spiritual disciples following from my life, I get the impression that I should masturbate to thoughts of my wife to help me accomplish this goal.

Is this how your heart is processing the situation? If so, how do you biblically rationalize that conclusion?

I can say this about watching TV or cooking tacos for dinner. But can you say it about this?

Discussion: Is it okay to masturbate to thoughts of your wife?

1 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Affection and reproductive climax are very different. Isaiah refers to God as Israel's husband, but his feelings toward Israel are not indicative of a spiritual sexual/reproductive relationship. That would come in the form of whether or not God actually reproduced through Israel.

Jacking off is also more tied to reproductive efforts that you know will not result in reproduction and without a wife. Does God ever try to create new spiritual life in a person: (1) Without using his people (bride) as the vehicle, and (2) without any actual intent to succeed?

I might be able to think of a rare example or two if I try for a while, but none come to mind off the top of my head.

Masturbation when your wife withholds: Go, or no-go?

1 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians threatened divorce and told her that her lack of sexuality was going to drive me to find someone else

Not ideal, but still has dread value. I'm not worried about that bit, as far as you saying it. If only be concerned if you acted on it.

I compared her to women on the internet

There's the problem. Even this wouldn't have been as damaging from an attraction standpoint if you were comparing her to your hot coworker: "Why can't you wear leggings like her?" It's still coming from a place of sin, but again, has some dread value.

But there's nothing attractive about references to porn, as even the ugliest beta chumps could watch porn. No attraction value there. Even if you're talking about Facebook or Instagram, if it's not a girl actually in your sphere of influence, it's unattractive and won't instill dread.

and tried to push her to do things she didn't want to do.

That's not much of a problem. You went about it the wrong way, I'm sure. But you should constantly be pushing your wife's sexual boundaries.

Discussion: Is it okay to masturbate to thoughts of your wife?

1 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I don't think I took a position, so I don't have a thesis. Nevertheless, the same questions still apply:

- How is your faith the one causing you to do it?
- How does it glorify God?
- As u/deep_strength alluded, is it going to make you less interested in pursuing a healthy sex life with your wife because now you have an alternative that doesn't involve her?

That last question is interesting. If it's not problematic, what's to stop a guy from marrying the hottest girl possible regardless of how sexually disinterested she is, just so he can claim biblical immunity whenever he masturbates to thoughts of her? Theology can lead to weird applications like this.

Masturbation when your wife withholds: Go, or no-go?

1 upvotes · 5 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

She's using 5 months ago as a copout. Have you ever had sex since then in a way that she enjoyed?

Again, this is an attraction issue more than anything. 5 months ago you called her out on it, but in a way that simultaneously made her less attracted to you and gave her a good excuse not to have sex with you anymore. Become attractive and all this goes away.

Materialist Hypergamy in the Church

1 upvotes · 4 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right on.

3 Year Girlfriend with Sexual Past

1 upvotes · 3 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Either you want help or you don't. Enough people on this sub have met me in real life to vouch for my authenticity - and I extend everything I do through this sub beyond my keyboard. How about you? Defiance and snark won't get you very far here.

Gentlemen, we should take more risks - We are god's people!

1 upvotes · 1 April 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Those are certainly good passages that could refer to authority in heaven. While I'm certainly open to the idea that they're talking about heaven, here are some other interpretations:

- 2 Timothy 2:12 - The most common interpretation I've heard of "reign with him" is that we will be part of his "reigning kingdom," not that we will be reigning over that kingdom as its authorities. This is consistent with Matthew Henry's commentary, which interprets the phrase: "set down at the right hand of the throne of God." Gill's Exposition of the Entire Bible also notes on this phrase: "they reign with him now in the kingdom of grace; grace reigns in their hearts, where Christ, the King of glory, has entered, and has set up his throne, and where he dwells by faith, they being made kings and priests unto God by him; and they shall reign with him in his kingdom here on earth, for the space of a thousand years." The eternal component, to Gill, is that we are part of his glory in heaven - that it is his reign of which we are a part, not that we reign over anything on our own.
- Revelation 2:26-27 - Benson's Commentary interprets this: "That is, shall share with me when I do this." Barnes' Notes says, "The evident meaning of what is said here, and in the next verse, is, that in accordance with the uniform promise made to the redeemed in the New Testament, they would partake of the final triumph and glory of the Saviour, and be associated with him. It is not said that they would have exclusive power over the nations, or that they would hold offices of trust under him during a personal reign on the earth; but the meaning is, that they would be associated with him in his future glory." Gill says, "this power over them may be understood in a spiritual sense, through the preaching of the Gospel, which being attended with the power of God, is the means of converting sinners, and so of weakening the kingdom of Satan, and of antichrist; and which had its fulfilment, at least in part, at the time of the Reformation, and onward."
- 1 Cor. 6:2-3 - Ellicott's Commentary says, "we may take these words as referring primarily to the conquest of the world by Christianity, which has since been accomplished, though by slower and more spiritual processes than were then anticipated." Barnes says that the "true interpretation" (after listing multiple others) is that it refers to the believers on the Day of Judgment, sitting beside Christ, not that it must be a judgmental authority in heaven.

It looks to me like we will have literal authority in the next life

That's one legitimate interpretation, but not the one I see as most likely. Most passages that refer to judging and authority seem to be referring to judgment day, not positions in heaven.

This is also supported by the common-sense view that there will be no non-believers in heaven to judge. Moreover, if all believers are to be rulers over nations in heaven, who would be in those nations? Surely some must be subjects and not rulers, but the passages referenced seem to imply that every believer will be a ruler, and the conditions for who gets to be a ruler and who must be a subject in heaven are curiously absent. While I recognize that some people believe in different rewards in heaven based on earthly conduct, and can point to a select few passages that seem to imply this, which could be interpreted as the conditions as to who gets to be rulers as opposed to those who are subjects ... this is also a concept I've generally disagreed with, as I most often see the "rewards" we get described as the crowns of glory, which the leaders of the tribes in heaven throw at Jesus' feet. I can't imagine doing anything otherwise. After all, it is not me who does the good I do, but Christ working through me - so who else should get that reward but Christ? And if I get to keep my crown(s) of glory instead of throwing them at Christ's feet, does that mean I have authority over the heads of the tribes who gave their crowns to Jesus?

I want to know the criteria for being the good servant that brings forth fruit a hundred fold and gets to rule in the large matters in the next life

And that's just the thing - the fact that there is no such criteria makes it clear that one of two options must be true:

- There's no criteria because it's not a position that actually exists.
- There's no criteria because God doesn't want us to do things just to get the position - it must come from a more authentic place in our lives. So, even if there are different positions of authority we get in heaven (which still seems to undermine much of the unity of the body of Christ preached throughout the epistles), we're better off assuming they don't exist because this guarantees that our lives are authentic and that we're not doing something merely to reap a reward.

Is it more generally influencing others toward salvation and righteousness?

If by this you mean evangelism and discipleship, this is the exact mission that Jesus gave in the great commission. But instead of "generally influencing," I'd say we must be intentional and purposeful.

Specifically, based on my study of Jesus' life, I define his pattern of disciple-making as: Intentional and purposeful relationships designed to produce spiritual generations of disciple-makers into the nations.

Hopefully this helps some. Again, I recognize that my view is not the only one - that your view also has some merit. It's just not the way I see it.

Gentlemen, we should take more risks - We are god's people!

1 upvotes · 29 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'd love to study this topic more. What verses are you thinking about? Off the top of my head I can only recall passages that talk about those things in the context of the church on earth.

Open Letter to a Christian Incel

1 upvotes · 28 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Cool. Phone, reddit chat, or through DMs?

How to proceed in my relationship in God honoring way?

1 upvotes · 28 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

my girlfriend has been having doubts the last week or so

Because she's not as attracted to you as she once was. This is usually either because you have been slipping in your own attractiveness qualities or because she found out she has the ability to pull a more attractive man.

She said that she hasn't felt close and connected to me ... neither of us have done anything wrong

Part of charm/charisma is addressing a woman's feels. While you may not be doing anything bad, if you're lacking doing the good things, that's also problematic. "Not bad" just feels stale and like she's settling.

she's been searching for a solution for us to stay together and her still be happy, but she can't find one

Right, because you can't negotiate desire or will-power attraction.

I asked her if any of the closeness and intimacy was real

I.e. "Please, I need your validation! Give it to me!"

she said she thought things would be different

Code for: "It turned out you're not as attractive as you seemed at first."

we agreed to continue dating for another month

Translation: "I agreed to remain exclusive to her while she's already checked out and won't feel much guilt looking around for a new man; and if she finds one, she just has to keep him on the hook for a month while still feeling like she's maintaining her integrity."

Sadly, I don't have any stats to go off of. So, while you ask:

I'm writing this post in hopes of advice, prayers and comfort

Advice - I can't give any if I don't know where you're at currently.

Prayers - What do you think the prayers will accomplish? That's a big question and you haven't addressed that.

Comfort - "Please, validate me because of this hard time I'm having."

I desperately want this to work

You've pedestalyzed her and the relationship, which is almost certainly a contributing factor to why she's disinterested.

Check out Rule 2 and post again.

Also, this version is getting removed for linking to another sub. Let's keep the discussion here, as many guys who may reply might not realize they're commenting on /r/Christianmarriage instead of here, which can cause some hassle. The approach to relationships between this place and that is vastly different. /u/Deep_Strength can go more into that.

To be clear: I do want you to re-post this. I just want you to do it as an RPC post and with the Rule 2 information. This could prompt some decent conversation :)

Open Letter to a Christian Incel

1 upvotes · 28 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

You're confusing the red pill and the black pill.

You're only born with your looks and your sin. Virtually everything else is learned behavior. Even your looks are a product of your choices - how much you exercise, diet, etc. The aspects of your looks that you're born with are, in most cases, not things that women actually care about - they're only the things women say they care about, like a man's eyes or his cheek bones. In reality, if you've got a 6-pack with bulging biceps, etc. and are also mindful of your facial hair grooming, head hair styling, the clothes you wear, etc. these are going to do more to attract a woman than your facial features. Even an ugly face won't disqualify a man from top-tier women if the other aspects of his SMV are on point. As I often say, looks make the game easier, but in the absence of clear deformities, even an inherently unattractive man can get the same quality of women as the one born with natural good looks.

As for sin, this is something Jesus can change.

In short, a man's propensity to attract women is certainly NOT something he's innately born with. The innate things he's born with simply determine how much work he's going to have to do in other areas of his life to make up for those shortcomings, if there are any shortcomings at all. Some guys are overly self-conscious about themselves without justification.

Open Letter to a Christian Incel

1 upvotes · 28 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Specifically, how would one tell if a woman's attracted to your body vs money vs game

What does it matter? They're all components of attraction. If you have money, she'll be attracted to it. If you have a 6-pack, she'll be attracted to it. If you have charm, she'll be attracted to it. It's all of the above, not one or the other.

Some guys have this false impression, as I'm sure /u/OsmiumZulu would agree, that women should be attracted to you for a specific, right reason. "She should love me for my ___, not for my money/social status/body/whatever." Get that notion out of your head. That's trying to change women. You can't change them. Accept the fact that they're going to be attracted to you in different ways from how you want to be attractive to them.

How can a man stay on track with his faith while "seemingly" everyone around him is either lying/still BP

By being mission-minded. That's how you get to the top of the totem pole in the first place. Secular men make sexuality their mission. Ours is disciple-making. As long as your mission is something you're actually living out and succeeding at, you're making an impact that is attractive and precludes her from being pedestalized in your mind, which is half the battle. If there's no pedestalization, there's not much room for giving way to seduction - she may want you so bad that she'll tempt you with everything she has, but if you've got an iron-clad frame you won't have any problem holding course on your mission, which will only increase her desire for you. OZ has also written about this in his posts on the sidebar for singles.

Open Letter to a Christian Incel

1 upvotes · 28 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Love the post, especially the unique perspective. I hope the guy you're writing to is a real person and not a general concept.

Gentlemen, we should take more risks - We are god's people!

1 upvotes · 28 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good question. It's a metaphor for discipleship. That's why the reward in the end is authority in God's Kingdom. He's not talking about heaven, but God's Kingdom on earth - the church. He's saying, "I've given you a Gospel and placed people in your life who need it. If you share the Gospel, multiply it in those people (a la Genesis 1:28, among others), and are faithful to discipling them so that your investment comes to fruition, then because you have been faithful with these few, I will give you even more responsibility in my kingdom - authorities over whole cities even."

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/20/19)

1 upvotes · 21 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm excited for it!

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/20/19)

1 upvotes · 21 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

trip to Florida

Gotcha. Still not a fan, but I'll let you do you ... or you do her, or whatever.

evangelism

Good stuff. Seems like we have similar views. Tracts, street preaching, outreach events, etc. pretty much never work. At best, they point people to a congregation, rarely to Jesus. I don't use the roman's road or similar gimmicks either. It's more a "follow me" approach. I care more about who they follow than what they know. If they follow me and I follow Christ, they're following Christ - and eventually I can walk out of the picture and they just keep going. That's discipleship.

Normally I try to keep $1000 emergency fund

Yeah, that just doesn't seem like enough. I try to keep 6-7k, which might be overkill, but it gives a safe enough buffer. Up that stash.

I am working down some debt and paying that off instead of saving more.

This part I do understand. When I had enough to pay off my student loans, it brought us under $1,000, but it was worth it to see that gone.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/20/19)

1 upvotes · 21 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

No sex in three weeks. I've still not initiated. Last week I was 100% cool with it, this week I'm more frustrated Hmm ... hasn't initiated ... no sex ... frustrated. Huh? Yes, you definitely need to relearn how to initiate. Don't expect her to initiate.

I'm finding myself frustrated that I'm working hard to improve and she doesn't seem to care much/isn't along with me - as I'm writing, it's clear this is partially validation seeking on my part

Definitely validation-seeking in there. But what I'm really hearing is: "COVERT CONTRACT! COVERT CONTRACT! COVERT CONTRACT!"

After the massage it was pretty funny, she was happy and kept asking what I was thinking because I was really quiet

You're rubbing her body ... she asks, "What are you thinking?" ... and you're not connecting the dots? Come on, brother. You're smarter than this. She's trying to reward you for the massage. Now, she interprets this as you still being in her frame, but sex is sex. You're not trying to convince her you're not in her frame by ignoring her advances or turning her down. If you want sex, have sex with her, regardless of how she interprets the dynamic.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/20/19)

1 upvotes · 21 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

she burned in the tanning bed

Eek. She's gotta get off that. Don't let her tan. So, so, so bad for you. I've known at least 6 people who ended up with skin cancer by age 30 due to tanning beds. I've never known someone under the age of 65 who had skin cancer who didn't use a tanning bed.

Evangelism: 7 Anytime, anywhere, ready to preach Christ crucified, raised from the dead, coming back, his promises, his authenticity, his Holy Spirit, his power, and his gifts.

Curious - 7 because of your readiness, or because of what you're actually doing?

Career/Finance: 3 Unexpected car repairs are coming up and I don't have the budget for them

I just did my break pads last night. Tried to do it myself, as I usually do, but this is the first time since I got this particular car and I couldn't get the wheels off, so I ended up paying a buddy of mine who has all the equipment. Also need to do get an entire set of new wheels on both of my vehicles ... going to add up.

Do you have an emergency stash saved up for things like this? That should be worked into your budget and should be at least 3 months of your living expenses (some recommend 6, though that's too much uninvested cash, if you ask me).

The submissive wife

1 upvotes · 20 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good word. I like this!

Solving a Foundational Problem on This Sub: Enabling Closet Bloops

1 upvotes · 15 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Yes, absolutely correct :)

Solving a Foundational Problem on This Sub: Enabling Closet Bloops

1 upvotes · 15 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Following Jesus is not a mission. It's a method. The great commission is the mission Jesus gave us. Following his life example reveals how we ought to do this. This is all over the sidebar, so I don't think more clarity is needed here.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/13/19)

1 upvotes · 14 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Glad to help, brother.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/13/19)

1 upvotes · 14 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Oh, I'm not concerned about them finding people - I'm concerned about not being able to use them to help me. If everyone were local I'd delegate some of the new guys in need to other guys I've discipled so I'm not doing it all myself.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/13/19)

1 upvotes · 13 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good stuff, brother. I'm glad to read this.

YouTube Channels I've Watched/Follow

You've got a lot of stuff on your list here and if I correlate the amount of time you're spending listening to other people's thoughts on following God and managing relationships with the indicator you give of Bible study (i.e. learning from what God has to say directly to you through His Word), I'm a little confused. That number should not be right in the middle like that - at least not for long. I believe in one of the first couple 300 posts I talk about how the numbers should be either very high or very low, depending on what season you're in and how God is trying to connect with you. I'd wager this number should really be higher right now, but that you're placating it through hearing other people's thoughts rather than engaging with God in a critical, in-depth capacity yourself.

Just a thought. Evaluate on your own and decide for yourself.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/13/19)

1 upvotes · 13 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

PHYSICALLY: Cutting sucks. I can feel my lifts starting to fall off. I've been cutting for 2 weeks now and made some progress, and while my lifts are still at the same levels as earlier, I've had to compromise my form a bit to do it - not cool. Going to have to drop a bit until I'm done cutting. Hopefully not too much.

MENTALLY: Top of my game. I'm engaging socially with new people, doing well in my career - last few checks have been good ones (though the pipeline indicates a tapering soon, unless some of the initial consults we've had call in soon), and I feel with-it.

SPIRITUALLY: While I feel things are in a great place, I can see coming up soon that I'm going to be overwhelmed if I don't start delegating. The problem is that some of the guys I disciple aren't local to me, so I can't really tell a guy I'm discipling in Kansas to begin discipling someone new in my church who lives down the street from me. The guys I disciple locally don't have pre-established relationships with some of the new people I'm coming across like I do - my fault for not fostering that sense of community, as I should have started connecting guys more readily. The one guy who I could delegate to doesn't go to my church and he's already capping out on his capacity anyway. Long story short, I need to start fostering relationships not only between myself and others, but also among the others themselves. I need to start building a community that's focused on helping other people connect with each other so that these discipleship relationships can form naturally rather than me being at the pinnacle of it all - this is somewhat of a new revelation to me and I'm starting to feel a lot like an underground pastor in the types of ministry challenges I'm seeing coming up. My congregation is simply a dispersed web rather than a centralized community. I imagine this is a lot of how Paul felt traveling all over the world rather than ministering in a singular location. Anyway, it's wonderful for my mission, but I never expected to have this problem. It's a good problem to have, but I still need help.

MMG Part 1: Know Yourself

1 upvotes · 13 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good call. Edit made.

Married Man Game Part 3: Sexting

1 upvotes · 13 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good stuff. Thanks for the field report!

It took a couple tries for her to get the idea/in the mood

Probably because you opened with "What do you want me to do to you?" Don't ask her to lead. First, that's not her role. Second, it's unattractive. Third, this is a new thing for her so she's not going to have a clue what to do in the first place anyway.

Other than that opener, good work.

Breaking the Nice-Guy: Take Ownership, Ask For Help

1 upvotes · 13 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Ah, that's sorry to hear of his inactivity - I hope all is well. Unfortunately, while I do recognize some of his comments after skimming his profile, I didn't have a clue who he was until I did just that. I have no clue how to contact him. Keep me posted if you find anything out.

Breaking the Nice-Guy: Take Ownership, Ask For Help

1 upvotes · 13 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Strictly legally, I readily concede that point ;)

The submissive wife

1 upvotes · 13 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Haha - jars. My wife still hands those to me. To re-frame my earlier comment, the guy will still clean, just to a different standard than a woman. If his cleanliness threshold is a 5/10 and hers is an 8/10, he's going to clean it to a 7/10 - enough that it will stay past his threshold for a while until it gradually degrades back to a 4 again. But he may never clean it up to an 8. Or maybe he gets it to her 8 standard all on his own, but the very next day ordinary living fades it back down to a 7 and it's right back to below her threshold.

Yes, he'll clean. He just has a different standard.

For the record, we do hire cleaners, so maybe I'm not the best person to chat with on this subject anyway :p

Addressing the Blue Pill Hate: Manipulation

1 upvotes · 13 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

But "RPC" doesn't seem to even consider that a question worth pondering. I would argue that trivial fitness tests and irrational games are part of their sinful nature.

Oh, we've definitely had this exact conversation many times. I believe /u/Deep_Strength is on your side - that hypergamy, fitness tests, etc. are all a product of the fall. I'm not as convinced, though I'm certainly willing to accept that as a possible valid conclusion.

The point is less about where it came from and more about accepting the fact that we cannot change women - only God can do that. And, of course, we should pray for the sanctification of our wives regularly, as it's a task God has charged us with. But beyond that, I can't stop my wife from being a sinner. At best, I can curb certain sinful behaviors, though any other behaviors that take their place - even seemingly good ones - are still going to be sinful if not coming from faith (Hebrews 11:6, Romans 14:23). So, in the absence of effectuating an actual heart-change of our own power, the best we can do for the time being is learn to relate with a broken wife, the same way Jesus came to earth and related with broken people in order to accomplish his purposes.

It makes excuses for the woman's bad behavior ("that's just the way women are").

That's not an excuse any more than I would excuse a sinner for being a sinner simply because he was born with original sin and a sinful nature. Yes, that's just the way sinners are. But they're still guilty for it. They still need Christ. We just don't have the power to do Christ's work for him. So, until Christ moves, we accept that sinners will be sinners and women will be women - whether their hypergamy is sin or not is beside the point, though we have debated that exact point here, so I'm not sure why you keep saying RPC won't discuss that. Granted, it has been some time since anyone actually addressed that question.

It cow-tows to that bad behavior, just in a different way ("you gotta play the game.")

Right, in the exact same way that Paul says in 1 Cor. 9, "To the Jews I became like a Jew to win the Jews; to the Gentiles I became like a Gentile to win the Gentiles; to those under the law I became as one under the law (though I myself am not under the law) to win those under the law. I have become all things to all men that some might believe."

I've often compared evangelism and dating, as I believe they are directly linked. If the Bible encourages "playing the game" by understanding non-believers in order to reach them (i.e. God's method of drawing his spiritual bride to himself), I don't see why it would be inappropriate to do the same thing with a person you want to draw into being your physical bride.

This doesn't mean we become sinners alongside them, nor does it mean we become hypergamous like women. It does mean that we should attempt to understand our target culture and make use of the knowledge we glean in order to work within their context.

And it sets sex up as the ultimate standard of success ("well, it works.")

Beta. Beta. Blue Pill.

Well, it depends on who you're talking to and what their goals are. Go try telling anyone over at TRP or MRP that having lots of sex is blue pill. See what you get.

"Oh, but they're wrong about what it means to be red pill." I've heard many people make this claim. They come in with some novel idea of what the "real red pill man" is and how he behaves and thinks. They want to redefine the "red pill." This is quite idiotic, if you ask me. CS Lewis says as much in the preface of Mere Christianity, using the words 'gentleman' and 'Christian' as examples of how well-intentioned people end up ruining words by trying to change the common and actual definition of a thing into something that suits their own ideologies, rendering a lot of our language defunct because we can no longer tell if "gentleman" means "landowner who has a coat of arms" or "a really nice man," nor can we figure out if "the red pill" means sexual strategy or understanding the truth about intergender relational dynamics or being a true biblical man or any other definition that gets put out there. Personally, I say to let the people who created the concept define the concept, and if we want to change the concept, we carry our qualifiers at our side.

I'm looking for men who want to improve themselves AND not make excuses for their wives. I'm looking for men who realize that women have fallen natures too, and that we need to acknowledge that fact in order to lead them well. And I'm looking for men who want to work together on ways to lead their wives out of sinful habits and into a happy and healthy sexual relationship. I thought I'd find that here.

Then you are, indeed, in the right place. I'm pretty sure /u/Deep_Strength is also on board with me that an essential component and difference between TRP/MRP and RPC is the fact that we acknowledge that wives need to be rebuked and that it is perfectly appropriate to discipline one's wife in love, just as God disciplines those he loves.

Counterproductive Desire and the Fallacy of Unconditional Love

1 upvotes · 12 March 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Fair enough. Of course, the "values" are part of the bath water, as they're not going to get you into heaven, if heaven ends up being a real place. Organized religion is the bath water too - and dirty bath water at that. Faith itself is what saves - that's the significant component and would, in this case, be the baby. If we could "know anyway," it wouldn't be faith.

Counterproductive Desire and the Fallacy of Unconditional Love

1 upvotes · 12 March 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Cool story. I'm sorry you had to abandon your faith to reach this conclusion. Over at r/RPChristians we vehemently believe that the Bible actually contains all of the information to affirm and enhance your sexuality. What stifled your sexuality was not your faith, but unbiblical church culture. In that sense, I wouldn't throw out the baby with the bath water.

I recommend you post more of your story over there and see what the community has to say. You might just be surprised how compatible faith and sex are. After all, God is the one who created you as a sexual being with the capacity for mind-blowing orgasms and the ability to make a man hard just by bending over - regardless of which way you're facing.

As a side-note, I believe the mods have said they ban women on sight here. It's supposed to be a male-only space. Tread carefully.

Dealing with a girl who's intentions I don't know

1 upvotes · 11 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Glad to hear you want to change. Have you posted in the weekly OYS threads yet?

Dealing with a girl who's intentions I don't know

1 upvotes · 11 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

If she wants more, then I'll ruin her because I'm a pretty horrible person and not a good boyfriend at all.

Fine. So become a better person. What's the problem? Based on your other comments, you sound as if you're content in your sin and that you have no intention of changing. If that's the case, you have significantly bigger problems that you should be posting about rather than whether or not to ask out a girl.

To that end, I vote no. Do not ask her out.

Married Man Game Part 3: Sexting

1 upvotes · 8 March 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

How are those hard lifts going for you?

My First Successful Fitness/Comfort Test [FR]

1 upvotes · 8 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

True story. I enjoy that one too.

My First Successful Fitness/Comfort Test [FR]

1 upvotes · 8 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Not particularly. I just remember doing a report on him in college and I found his interpersonal strategies fascinating. He was the original master of STFU.

I may have messed up (F/R)

1 upvotes · 7 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent strategy.

Question about reading in sidebar.

1 upvotes · 7 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm working through the sidebar.

Glad to hear. I'll assume you haven't read the posts on "mission" yet and not get into that until you do.

Moving on: I did a write-up on the first half of the poon commands. Here it is, for your reference. I never did write part 2, addressing the others. Maybe I need to get back to it. This is not on the sidebar, so you may have missed it.

Should I think the GOLDEN RATIO suggests I should initiate and touch less than she does???

The golden ratio is predominantly about communication, not sexual initiation. It's okay to express yourself sexually however you feel appropriate.

Isn't punishing low value? Shouldn't we really be applying amused mastery, or just an I have more interesting things to do here?

Withdrawing time and attention to do something else IS your punishment, as far as non-Christians are concerned. From a biblical standpoint, God doesn't punish believers at all (1 John 4), nor do I have any interest in punishing my wife. But God does withhold his blessing and his felt presence from people who are walking in opposition to him, just as I will withhold my blessings or physical presence from my wife if the situation calls.

an apology as a tool to keep the conversation moving is almost like a fog I would think.

This probably deserves a post of its own. To be extremely brief, an apology recognizes an obligation. If you don't owe anyone anything, you don't have to apologize for failing to live up to that obligation. That obligation can be affirmative (I owe you $10 and didn't pay it) or by omission (I owe it to you not to slash your tires). While we are conditioned by culture to affirm the existence of such obligations to other people, this is merely a social construct and not a biblical one. Our only obligation is to God.

So, if I want to punch my neighbor in the face, what's holding me back? Do I have an obligation to refrain from physical violence to him for his own sake? No. Do I owe it to society not to do so? No, I can accept the social consequences if I choose to follow through. But because Christ is in me, I do owe it to God - he does not want me to exercise irrational physical violence against my neighbors, so for God's sake I refrain - not for my neighbor's sake or the government's sake.

The same is true with my wife. If I yell at her and call her horrible names, did I have an obligation to her not to do that? No. But I do have an obligation to God and he would not have me do that. If I violate that obligation, my sin is against God's standards over my life, not my wife's standards. I can violate my wife's standards any time I want and have no concern for it. She is not my judge. I owe her nothing. But I do owe God something, and his standards include boundaries for how I must treat my wife - and just as David repeatedly fell in love with God's statutes in the psalms (especially 119), so also do I love and genuinely internalize and enjoy the standards God has for how I interact with my wife. This is a beautiful thing, not a series of boundaries I despise.

To go a bit further with David, Psalm 51 takes place after David caused Bathsheba to commit adultery, then killed her husband (one of his own mighty men and close friends), and ultimately was the cause of their baby dying. Did David sin against Bathsheba? Did he sin against Uriah, her husband? Did he sin against the baby that died? No, he says to God, "Against you, you only, have I sinned." David understood that Bathsheba was not his judge and he had no obligation to her apart from God.

For the secular crowd, there's never a need to apologize because they don't have God. Apart from God they owe nobody else anything. They are not bound by the judgments of the rest of the world, except to the degree that physical force makes them. So, it makes sense to be entirely unapologetic. But for the believer, we do have an obligation to God, and this includes boundaries for interacting with his children - both the saved and unsaved ones, whether we're married to them or not. So, my apology is to God when I violate those boundaries.

That said, I agree with you in concept that that an occasional "I'm sorry," when appropriately warranted, isn't going to cause much harm and can demonstrate a degree of humility that can be advantageous at times - but I'm not sure the same would apply to secular relationships the same way, if we're looking at it purely pragmatically and not theologically. And yes, that's the short version.

aren't we supposed to make wives feel like H10?

Absolutely not. No pedestalization. As /u/OsmiumZulu said, there are times when it's good to reinforce good behavior when she dolls herself up, but you should not make her feel more attractive than she actually is. That is highly counter-productive.

Be irrationally self-confident

This is referencing the dark-triad trait of narcissism. Extreme self-confidence is attractive. I used to run experiments on people when I was younger, seeing how far I could persuade a person through sheer confidence alone. The typical challenge I'd give myself is to persuade someone that German soldiers under Nazi command were actually highly moral people and that we should all strive to be like them - even the ones who were in charge of the gas chambers. For most people, that statement alone is ludicrous - and it should be! But presented with enough confidence, I found I was able to persuade several people to agree with me and even more people to acknowledge that, while unpersuaded, there was enough of an argument that they had a newfound respect for Nazi sympathizers. And then I would tear them down and go off on how the whole thing was a set-up and they fell for it. I wasn't very kind in those days.

My point is: irrational confidence is highly alluring. Even today I can stand in court with a weak argument, knowing it is weak, but because I present it with extreme confidence, I can often persuade a judge to accept my theory of the case over the opposing attorney's. Logically, they shouldn't. But they do. That's what this commandment is about - that type of attractive confidence.

Give good sex ... more a goal than a commandment?

Right. I don't remember where I wrote it, but I know I have some content on how the secular world has different purposes than we do. Apart from God, evolutionary biology and psychology is all that matters to the rest of the world. If evolution is true, advancement of the species is the primary imperative of every person. This means sex, sex, and more sex. The better you are at it, the more people will want to procreate with you to advance the species. So, from a secular vantage point, making this a command makes perfect sense. It is commanded by evolution that we must procreate.

From a Christian vantage point, the command to procreate (Genesis 1:28) was fulfilled in Christ from physical procreation and transitioned to a spiritual procreation, giving life to new believers who would be "born again." And yes, this type of spiritual procreation absolutely is a command - and not just any command, but the "great" command/mission.

Is there a list of the MAP items somewhere outside the book?

Not here, necessarily, though our sidebar covers a lot of it.

Am I missing something about how the poon commandments break most of the RP tools/concepts?

I think so, see above.

Is it just me are a few of these books more focused on progressing through the relationship or understanding hypergamy instead of focusing on self?

There's a split on what it means to be "red pillled." Some people believe the red pill is purely about sexual strategy. Others believe it's about men's legal rights. Others believe it's about becoming your own man and being the best you can be. Others believe it's about knowledge-based awareness of the sexual marketplace. Your answer depends on how you define the red pill. For some definitions, understanding hypergamy and sexuality is the most red pillled thing in the world; from others, it's counter-productive and frame-breaking.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/06/19)

1 upvotes · 7 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

and get her input

Input is good. Just be cautious that her "input" doesn't turn into: "That's definitely what we have to do because once the wife has spoken, she won't change her mind or do otherwise." Especially in this area, you have to be the one to make the judgment call. Women often don't know what's best for themselves, spiritually. Left on their own, they will often pick and choose the comfortable, easy things that they like to do and not be willing to stretch boundaries into what God is actually calling them to. While her input is valuable, you ultimately have to be the one to decide what's best for your wife's spiritual well-being. Keep up the good work!

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/06/19)

1 upvotes · 6 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent questions. Before I respond, have you read the anatomy of butthurt post on the sidebar yet? For that matter, how much of the sidebar have you read?

OYS - Where Progress is Made (03/06/19)

1 upvotes · 6 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

We've typically re-worded it to Own Your Self. You could also use spirit, struggles, shortcomings, or lots of others.

I do have a lot of advice on evangelism and not being annoying. Have you read the 300 series on the sidebar yet?

Married Man Game Part 3: Sexting

1 upvotes · 6 March 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Tease away. Glad I could help with your case some.

Married Man Game Part 3: Sexting

1 upvotes · 6 March 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Nice. Not sure I understand the last line, though - what other guy's posts?

Married Man Game Part 3: Sexting

1 upvotes · 6 March 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I keep a general idea, but no specific tracking mechanism. I'd she's on her period it's obvious. I know ovulation is a couple weeks after that ends. Her cycle is not regular though, so even she can't always predict it when she's tried.

[F/R] That escalated quickly...

1 upvotes · 5 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

You had the exact same reaction I did. I like it.

RPC: a place to stay (or at least return to)

1 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right. I'd suggest that whatever your way of "maximizing Christ" is, it's going to fall short of what God actually intends for your life if you're not accounting for how to maintain healthy biblical relationships and sexual expression in your model.

You're like a business coach trying to show guys how to have successful careers. You go to an AA meeting and say, "That's all good guys. Learn everything AA has to offer, because alcoholism can certainly get in the way of having a successful career. But I've never been an alcoholic. I haven't even had a drink before. I don't need AA to be a successful businessman, and you shouldn't either. After all, every businessman knows that being an alcoholic can ruin your career. If you just stuck to the fundamentals of business you'd learn that, so that's all you need to know. So, whatever you feel like learning from AA, learn it and get out before you get distracted from the real important stuff: being successful businessmen."

1. Do you think it's really good for those guys who have a life-time pattern of alcoholism to just abandon what's holding them accountable after they've acquired the tools AA teaches? Or do you think they should stick around and maintain relationships that are holding them accountable?
2. Do you really think that world-class business experts who have studied human nature through the lens of business techniques and practices will be more equipped to help a guy cure his alcoholism than someone who studies the same patterns of human nature through the lens of helping alcoholics conquer alcoholism?
3. Do you really think the true alcoholics who can't get their butt off the side of the street because they've blown every dime they have on booze, and they've lost custody of their kids, got fired from their jobs, had their family members disown them, etc. - that they care one bit about being successful businessmen in the face of this raging problem that's destroying their lives?

The way you talk just sounds unbearably arrogant and unsympathetic, like you have no clue what anyone here has struggled through. And you don't have a clue. But I tell you: those alcoholics, once they've mastered their troubles and have gone on to study business and advance in a career, will have a lot more to offer the business community than the guy who has only ever viewed business from a businessman's lens - and yet they will still be attending those AA meetings faithfully and be happy they never left.

RPC: a place to stay (or at least return to)

1 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

If we are talking about me, speak plainly

I didn't want to call you out and make you look bad, if I could avoid it. But yes, I'm referencing you.

what would be my bannable offense

Concern trolling. I have no problem with the message you preach. What I don't approve of is the way you present it as an either/or and encourage people to leave this sub.

Imagine if I walked into a church and started preaching to everyone: "We should love each other. This church likes to talk about a lot of other things, but at the end of the day we should really just be loving each other. You don't need to stay at this church because once you've learned whatever this pastor has to preach, you can leave and be fine on your own by just knowing how to love people." No pastor will disagree with his message. But such an attitude is toxic to the community all the same. Such a person would be addressed calmly, as we have done with you for months, and then ultimately asked to leave if he won't stop.

Instead he's trying to say, "Oh you said you're leaving and you're not".

He's not trying anything. He was literally quoting you and noting that you didn't follow through on what you said.

Celebrate!

1 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

My thoughts exactly. I see this constantly.

Lifting Program for Aesthetics?

1 upvotes · 4 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

There's certainly a difference between strength and aesthetic training. Strength must precede the aesthetics and losing weight, even if it's just fat, usually means losing strength too.

You need a foundational degree of strength to make the aesthetic training workable, otherwise you end up getting the swimmer's build, which is "ripped," but too skinny to be attractive. From our 203 post by u/RPChristof:

"Trust me when I say there is nothing worse than cutting to sub-10% and realizing that you just have tiny abs."

I'm reminded of this article, which goes into a university research study on the topic and notes: "Even if you're a bit overweight, looking strong can buffer that. Basically, being a strong, fat guy is OK, which I think would bring comfort to many." I'd add emphasis to the "A BIT" part before "overweight," but no matter how many reports I found online on this study, they all wanted to couch it with some phrase to make it seem like it's okay if you don't want to get fit because girls will still love you anyway.

Long story short, get your strength levels where you want them, then go into cut-mode while maintaining that strength. You can't expect to improve strength during a cut, and improving it after a cut is almost just as hard. Take advantage of the extra weight-training you've got going on right now and get your muscle where it needs to be with a 5x5. For me, that's benching 300lbs. I'm close - closer than I've ever been in my life. Once I hit that goal, even if my bench drops back down to 290 (where I'm at now, almost 295) or even 275, that's fine because I'll still have a nice bulk of muscle to show through the skin after the cut. If my bench capped at 225 and after the cut I was struggling to pass 200, I wouldn't have much muscle to show through my newly lean figure, which would defeat the purpose of the cut. That's why we start with 5x5 before moving onto a hypertrophy routine.

Accidental Desire Negotiation and OYS, advice? and a bonus question.

1 upvotes · 2 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Such is the hand dealt to us

You mean such is the hand we picked when we chose to marry someone - and we even got to look at the cards before we picked them to make sure we were picking wisely.

Also, legal divorce doesn't mean spiritual divorce. It can often mean being wise in protecting yourself from someone potentially ruinous while recognizing the intact nature of the spiritual bond (in which case legal separation is the state's version). Remarriage after legal divorce is what makes it adulterous because you're still spiritually married.

In OP's case, divorcing for lack of sex isn't protecting him from potential financial or legal ruin, nor will it result in him getting more sex without becoming an adulterer. So, there's no point to divorcing unless he's willing to commit adultery, in which case there's still no point divorcing because he can do that while married. All it would do is make him feel better about compromising his faith because he'd do it in a more socially acceptable way.

Tag: u/deep_strength

How do you guys view/approach ghosting?

1 upvotes · 1 March 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Solid.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (02/27/19)

1 upvotes · 28 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Think more "discussion" and less "lecture."

Amen. I made the same comment. While true open-ended discussion (where there is no predetermined answer) can be dangerous, using questions to evoke discussion that leads toward a predetermined conclusion is highly effective.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (02/27/19)

1 upvotes · 28 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'll start training her on starting strength or SL5x5 next week.

Excellent story, brother! So glad to hear she's following. Is SL5x5 the best path for female lifting, though? I tried this up-front with my wife and she gave up on any form of weight-training for months afterward. She was afraid that a heavy-lifting routine would make her look bulky when she only wanted to look fit. Practically, that's ridiculous if you look at the way heavy-lifting actually shapes a woman's body, but she wasn't ready to get that through her head. Instead of SL5x5 I started having her do toning lifts, which she adapted to a LOT better. Not saying 5x5 is wrong - just recognize that women may not take to it as quicky as men because they're not as interested in strength; they care more about the aesthetics. Quite frankly, I care a lot more about my wife's aesthetics than about her strength too! :p

Bible Study - 9 - Reading the Bible in a year

I'll tell you the same thing I told /u/rocknrollchuck a while back - reading the Bible is not the same as studying it. Your quiet time is when you read the Bible. If you're having a quiet time and having additional reading time, you're just having more quiet times.

Bible study is spelled out more on the sidebar - are you researching the passage, looking into the context, reviewing commentaries (when you're desperate), listing out your observations, contemplating the grammar, looking for parallel passages, drawing inferences and asking questions about the things you notice, reaching interpretive conclusions, condensing the content into concise "tl;dr"-type statements of the purpose of the passage in its greater context, and ultimately making application points to live by? This is what Bible study looks like. I'm ashamed at what passes for "Bible study" in most churches today, where people might read a few verses and talk about them and think they're studying.

Evangelism - 2 - My weakest area.

When was the last time in your life, if ever, you would have rated it higher than a 5? It's okay to be weak/low for periods of time - a few months here, a few months there. But if it's habitually low, that's when you know it's likely a sinful neglect issue and not a "God wants me focusing on other things right now" issue.

One starfish again this week

I wrote a post quite some time ago about duty sex (I think on MRP, not here). My conclusion was that duty/starfish sex doesn't actually exist. All you need are two things:

- You have to be strong enough to move your wife's body however you feel like.
- You have to have a frame that isn't shaken by her emotional level of enjoyment of sex.

If you can do those two things, you can have the kind of sex you want every time you walk into the bedroom.

Why does this work? Because women are emotional empaths. They feel what other people feel. If her acceptance to sex is weak/starfish and I am visibly unenthused, she will remain unenthused. If I don't care about her unenthused nature and I get excited about it anyway, she gets excited about it.

This works particularly well if you can get her on the verge of an orgasm consistently. Let her edge it out for a while. While she's on the edge, she'll gladly contort herself into any position you tell her and start bucking around however fast you like - anything to keep it going so you finally let her get off when you're done with her. In fact, this can often lead into a game where she wants to get off so bad that she tries to force me to orgasm so that my arousal will fade and I'll be more motivated to let her finish too. But it all starts with me being excited even in the face of her disinterest, and then having the physical strength to toss her around the sheets.

If you haven't yet, read Sex God Method. While I'm not super thrilled with everything in the book, there are a few strategies that once employed started changing the game radically. The book centers around the acronym DEVI - Dominance, Emotion, Variety, Immersion. Of the 4, kicking up the "emotion" game with talking during sex has been the single most influential thing in ramping up the quality of sex and turning starfish into five-star.

Who would have ever guessed that the sweet, quiet Christian good-girl would love to hear: "Your pussy is mine" and "I'm going to pound you until you're too sore to walk" and "No, you can't go yet. I want to taste it when you cum"? She objected at first. It was quite awkward because I felt like it was out of character for me to say those things during sex. Then I realized that I decide what my character is. Guess what: once I did it 5 or 6 times suddenly it's normal and in-character. Funny how that works, right?

I also noticed that those types of phrases - the dominant, highly sexualized, hard-core type comments - were even more potent and effective when I balanced them with: "I love you" and "You're might just get pregnant on this one." Something snaps in her. I don't engage in degrading talk (calling her a slut, whore, or anything like that), but there's something to be said for emotionally driving her up and down - rocking her back and forth between feeling loved and treasured by you and feeling controlled or even objectified by you. Yes, I said it: I objectify my wife during sex - and she likes it! Especially when in balance with other statements of positive emotional value toward her that communicate non-objectification.

This is where women are weird. She wants to know that you love and care about her and the thought of being a sex-object to her, when she's not Immersed (the I in DEVI) sounds repulsive. But when Immersion happens she wants to know that she is the object of your desire and she keeps chanting in her head: "use me. use me. use me." Beta guys will never get the idea that women want to be used. They just also want to be valued. It's not an either/or.

u/Red-Curious OYS this week and last was a big encouragement that I can change the dynamic.

Hopefully the above can give some better insight on how to do this. I will note that it only really works once you already have a foundation of attraction. If she's repulsed by you and the thought of touching you makes her cringe ... go back to the fundamentals. But it sounds like that foundation is already there for your. Your stats are under control, she's following your lead, she respects your parenting. I don't see why she wouldn't be enthused about sex other than the possibility that she's not seeing high-energy enthusiasm coming from you, so there's nothing to empathically draw from.

Try this next time you get home from work: walk in, say hi, and take your shoes off to create awareness that you're home and a natural pause. Casually ask her, "How's it going?" while you walk up to her. Don't listen for her answer and don't give eye-contact, nod your head, or other signs that you're actually listening. Give her a hug, rub her back. Sway side to side a bit and turn it into a slight dance. Shift your hands from being around her to holding both of her hands, raise them in the air and start waving them around while you smile and laugh with her. Let her hands go, put both your hands around her cheeks and kiss her for 10 seconds. Walk away and tell her you're going to start cooking dinner for the kids.

This move works every. single. time. At least for me.

1. It gives her an incredible amount of emotional energy to siphon.
2. The fact that I'm proceeding with behavioral communication without regard for her verbal communication (I let her talk, but continue doing what I'm going to do) shows a clear dominance of frame.
3. It sets the tone for the rest of the evening. The last time I did this she was going on about how awful her day was and that she was ready to break down and cry ... then when I got to the part where I raised her hands up, instead of elaborating she stopped herself, said, "Oh, nevermind," and then just had fun with me. All of a sudden - in the span of only 7 seconds - her day went from "I'm about to cry" to "I'm happy and laughing. I love my husband. He makes me feel so good and I don't even want to think about those other things anymore because it'll ruin the moment." Yes, they came out later during post-sex pillow talk, but instead of, "Woe is me, my day was so bad ... whine, cry, whine," it was more: "This happened today. I didn't like it. Isn't that crazy?"

I really don't want to be a "facilitator" and just hit play on the video. I'd rather be a "teacher" and give the lesson myself.

I'm excited to hear you say this - but I wouldn't discount the facilitator approach just yet. My church has been pushing a "facilitator" model because we don't have many qualified teachers. As a qualified teacher, this greatly frustrates me. They also like to use the "push play for the teaching" model because it's easy.

But most people think of teaching as lecturing. I have a long rant I could go on, but this comment is long enough as-is. Suffice it to say that people don't learn through lecturing anymore. Don't tell them the answers. Learn to ask questions that evoke the answer out of them. If they can learn it for themselves through strategic questions they're far more likely to understand, retain, and apply what you're trying to teach. This is tough because most of us are used to a lecturing model, but I promise this is 10x more effective if you can learn to lead people down a path with questions rather than statements.

Interesting site...

1 upvotes · 28 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

do I look fat in XYZ dress then I would probably say no to my wife. I then said I would try to view the world as God does, seeing her as a child of God and focusing on my wife's inner beauty.

You're joking, right? Me: "Is that black-and-white striped horse looking thing a zebra?" You: "No, it is not a zebra. It is an animal, created and loved by God."

Are you that entrenched in the liberal agenda? A zebra is a zebra. Fat is fat. A woman can have incredible inner-beauty and still be fat. Deflecting the question asked to answer the one you wish was asked is not an answer. Do you think that God doesn't know when someone is fat and another person is fit? Is God incapable of discerning between the two? Does gluttony no longer matter to God? The theological dissonance is abounding here.

Here you have to go into a long discussion, strawman your "opponent", Garner likes and public approval (a successful response is the upvoted one!)

If you think any mods here give two hoots about how many up-votes or down-votes they get or about "winning" arguments, so much stuff is going over your head. We're here not to impress people, but to help people. You're one of the people we're trying to help - that's why I bother to write these replies to you at all. I believe you have an incredible capacity to do great things for God's Kingdom and a wonderful perspective on the primacy of following Christ and living by the Spirit. I hope and pray that God will use this in great ways someday. But I also want to see you growing physically, mentally, in leadership skills, etc. While we don't pretend to be the arbiters of every aspect of the Christian man's life, we do have a lot to offer that I think could hone your influence for God's Kingdom into greater degrees of effectiveness long-term.

This has nothing to do with trying to "win" an argument with you and everything to do with helping to point you in the right direction because I can't change the world for God's Kingdom alone. I'm going to need you and many of the men here to work in-tandem as one body for God's purposes. Why constantly fight against this? Why not be united in our common effort to advance God's Kingdom into all nations through spiritual generations of laborers, living and discipling among the lost?

There are 2000 subs, I doubt barely anyone will ever meet, ever talk to each other

There are at least 2 dozen men from this sub who I've had personal conversations with off Reddit. 3 of them I've had in-person face-to-face meetings, 1 of those regularly. 4 more guys I talk to by phone on a regular basis. These numbers are increasing every month. No, this is not just a random internet forum.

I know Warrior Jesus and OZ have also had some face-to-face conversations. I've also connected chuck with people I know IRL, which shaped where he vacationed with his family. I've connected other users to friends of mine in different parts of the country.

Don't project your own impersonal use of this sub on everyone else here.

There's little effort to make peace or come to agreements, instead you create a bubble of people who all agree and vanquish those who aren't in 100% agreement.

Are you even reading the same sub? I see lots of support and encouragement with random respectful differences being discussed from time to time. Another post from a few hours ago by u/Adamjensen2030 and the replies in that thread show exactly what I mean and the opposite of what you're saying. Again, you're projecting your experience on the rest of the sub simply because you feel like you're always at-odds with the people here.

The Bible has enough. Jesus is enough. But it would be helpful to have a guide to show men they are being lied to by the culture.

What do you think this sub is? It's just a guide that you don't like, apparently. Or perhaps you prefer us to take Rollo's alleged approach: theory-only, no practical-application points suggested (though he does this anyway, despite saying he doesn't - the Iron Laws of Tomassi being a great case in point).

Jesus taught principles

You're telling me he didn't teach practical application points too? Are you kidding? You started with a reasonable premise, but the more I kept reading the more and more ridiculous this post became.

Tag: /u/Deep_Strength

Women are expected to do so much these days

1 upvotes · 28 February 2019 · /r/RedPillWomen

This all stems from the balance of privilege and responsibility.

Once upon a time, men had the privilege of dominance in the workforce, which compelled responsibility for maintaining the nation's economy and being productive in their careers. When that privilege was taken away and shared with women (the "rightness" of which I'm intentionally not commenting on here), men stopped having any motivation to bear the responsibility of maintaining the workforce. So, we see a lot of guys abandoning profitable careers to content themselves with dead end positions.

Men also used to have the privilege of headship in the home. This came with the responsibility of leading the home and providing for it. When that privilege was taken away and given to women to run the show, the men stopped taking the responsibility for being leaders or providing for the home either.

Men used to have the privilege of authority over the children. This came with the responsibility of staying informed about their needs, making decisions regarding their care, and setting up a plan within the household for how to meet their needs. When that privilege was taken away and given to women with modern custody laws, men stopped bearing the responsibility.

I know it's a lot more complicated than the simplicity I'm trying to lay out right here, and there's value in nuance and the way that women had privileges and responsibilities in the past too. My point is simply to say: women wanted all the same privileges men had in past societies, but this also means bearing a greater burden of responsibilities as well.

Today, virtually all societal privileges are either shared equally with women or are given overtly to women over men. And then many women are upset by the fact that men aren't stepping up to bear the responsibilities to earn the privileges that they couldn't get back if they wanted to. This is why there are so many man-children who treat their wives like mommy 2.0. If they're not going to get recognized and rewarded for all of their hard work, and in the event of a divorce she's still going to get all the custody rights, all the spousal support, half of all the assets that she didn't work to earn, etc. ... why bother putting in the hard work? While most men don't think this consciously, they still instinctually recognize that they have more to gain and less to lose if they shift all the burden on women, since those women are going to end up getting the privileges either way.

Again, I'm not commenting on the rightness or wrongness of any of this - just that this is what happened, explaining quite clearly why women are expected to do so much today. This is not how I run my home, but I also have a wife who is readily submissive and supportive of my leadership, which simply doesn't exist in most marriages today.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (02/27/19)

1 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The naughty blanket is very similar to the "time out mat" that we use from time to time. I stopped using it when, as a test, I wanted to see how long my son would sit in it after being "naughty" and he made it over an hour without fussing or complaining ... showing that it really didn't phase him. That was when he was 3.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (02/27/19)

1 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Have you discussed sex and girls with him at all yet?

We've discussed general relationships, crushes, desire to kiss girls, etc. We have not had the PIV talk.

ask him what kinds of new foods he would like to try, and then maybe you could teach him to cook some of them.

This is something that I actually do with all of my kids (except the baby). I like to teach them how to make wise choices and resolve conflict, so I'll give them 3 options for some meals and tell them they must agree, then I guide them in cooking it. The 3yr old basically just pours the ingredients in, whereas the other two are able to mix, saute, bake, microwave, etc. - just not take things out of the oven yet.

The key here is Daddy/daughter reading time.

Right on. I probably frame it too much as "teach you to read" time.

Get her into a sport as soon as is practical

We just signed her up for ninja training classes ... should be good. Outdoor stuff is more difficult in the snow, but I may start taking her to the track with me and my son to burn off some energy.

I'm curious what kind of discipline you use when she acts up?

While I'm not opposed to spanking when necessary, it's pretty rare. My most common route is to sit her in her bed and say she is welcome to leave when she's calm and ready to apologize, after which I will employ any discipline suited to the punishment. For example, if she started the tantrum because I turned off her TV show, she loses TV the next day.

this is one reason I've battled my weight all of my life.

Me too. I've come to the conclusion that the worst thing my parents ever taught me was: "Eat everything on your plate!"

What do you Christians think of MGTOW?

1 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

There's value in the secular label, just as we are "RP Christians" and not just "Biblically masculine Christians." The key distinction for /u/Adamjensen2030 to clear up is:

- Are you a MGTOW who happens to be a Christian, or
- Are you a Christian who happens to agree with MGTOW thinking?

MGTOWs are certainly welcome here, /u/Adamjensen2030, and I'd guess you will agree with many of the things we say about the state of relationships in most first world countries. Just remember that our goal is never to affirm you in being MGTOW. It's to guide you into being biblical, which in practice may have the same practical conclusions that secular MGTOW thinking would lead you to anyway.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (02/27/19)

1 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

x8 ... x8 ... x8

Try upping the weight until you can only do 5. That should increase strength a lot faster. Once you're at 2 plates on the bench (i.e. 225) you can shift to a more toning-based model, which would be more like x10-12 ... x10-12 ... x10-12

I mentioned that in a post yesterday

While my reply may have been critical, it was a fun post to read and I appreciate that you put it up! Getting guys to recognize the framework issues in what their churches put out on marriage and relationships is very important and your post can help expose some of that.

The main thing I can do just to support my wife and let her know she is not going in alone and let god do the rest.

Pray with her before you go. Have a quiet time together. Soften her heart. Remind her that God loves your dad, despite all of his flaws, just as he loves her despite her flaws. If necessary, frame it as a ministry opportunity - that you and her have a voice in your father's life that can be worked for good and he will be won over by her gentle and quiet spirit and by love, not by sending nasty text messages outlining all of his flaws to his wife.

It goes to show how strongly The Great Commission is and how that is the main thing important for us to journey on.

Amen, brother. You're getting it! I'm encouraged to see where your journey takes you in the coming months.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (02/27/19)

1 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Background/Stats: 34 years old, 6'0", 225lbs, 16% BF. Married 10 years, 4 kids (1, 3, 5, 7). Read MRP, TRP, RPC sidebars.

7 BASICS (present cycle)

- AoS: 10
- Bible Study: 10
- Quiet Time: 3
- Scripture Memory: 1
- Prayer: 8
- Fellowship: 10
- Evangelism: 9

Physical/Lifting: Pushing boundaries. While I haven't tried to up my ORM in the last week, I have upped what I do for 5x reps. Bench: 275, Squat: 335, DL: 335, Curls: 60lb dumbbells, OHP: 175. I've been at the gym 5 times for the last couple weeks and on track again this week.

Diet: My usual area of need for work, but I'm functioning effectively on a calorie deficit, taking protein shakes again to compensate for the heavier lifting despite the reduced calories. Was stagnant in my waist size for months, but dropped a belt loop this week, so that's progress.

Career/Finances: Had one of my largest checks in a long time come in last billing cycle. Another high-end one just came in today. Got a couple new cases in this week. Business is good.

Mission: Co-leading a conference this weekend. I'm not thrilled about the conference itself, but the follow-up series we're doing for the small groups should be highly connected to my mission and provide a solid platform to launch the church into a disciple-making model of ministry. Still need to get the lead pastor on board, but my red pill'd pastor fully gets it and is working to move things in the right direction.

Sex: Best it's ever been. Wife started shaving herself more diligently and even bought some hair-removal cream to get a smoother finish. She's initiating more than I am nowadays. She also downloaded an app called "kindu" that matches couples up with new sexual ideas to try (I had gotten it a long time ago and she wasn't interested back then so I deleted it; she remembered it and brought it back). I very much encouraged that type of thinking. Also, the sex has been so high-energy and gratifying lately that over the last couple months I've been legitimately shocked at how wet a woman can get. I'd felt high degrees of lubrication before, but to the point where she's just dripping down and drenching the sheets with her fluids (not mine) ... I didn't even know that was possible in the absence of squirting. Any signs of vaginismus from a couple years ago are now completely eradicated.

Parenting: Things are fantastic with a few areas of need.

- 7yr son - He is a certified genius. He just got into the gifted program for all areas, scoring in the 99.9 percentile in math and in the 96th percentile for reading, and his IQ test came back in the 99th percentile. Even within the gifted class, we're receiving reports that he's leaps and bounds beyond the other kids. While our gym won't allow him in the weights area, he does pushups and small dumbbells with me at home and he runs the track at the gym with me regularly and is excited to keep getting strong and developing his physical body, though he probably needs more caloric intake to keep from being too skinny. He's also the popular kid in all of his classes and at daycare. He's also showing early signs of having a crush and talks occasionally about the girl he likes. He's also growing in responsibility around the house and being a model to his sisters, though he still picks on them at normal levels as I'd expect for his age. He constantly asks questions and wants to grow in his understanding of the Bible and theology. His primary areas of need right now are to (1) open his palette so he's not as picky an eater, and (2) work on complaining less.
- 5yr daughter - She is a classic teenage ditz in a 5yr old's body. Everything to her is about looking fabulous, wearing the right clothes, having gorgeous shoes, and overall being beautiful. I did a post recently on 1 Peter 3 - she's the girl that passage was written for! That's a challenge for me: to take that passage to her this week. Other than that, she's not very interested in learning how to read. She can do basic 2 and 3 letter words, but things beyond that just aren't clicking for her. She gets bored of learning after a couple minutes. However, she is very practically wise and receives advice well. I taught her how to minimize getting in trouble when she makes mistakes and she has followed the advice very well ever since and even started teaching it to her sister saying, "Daddy taught me this and it really works!" She's also very mild and submissive in her general demeanor. She genuinely wants to be helpful and will offer to do chores even without prompting. If she can get over acting self-entitled and being so worked up about her looks, she'll make for a fine wife someday.
- 3yr daughter - She's a gorgeous nightmare. While her older sister works hard to look beautiful, this one has it naturally. She's a lot like her brother in that she's hungry to learn, highly intelligent, and socially popular. However, her energy levels are so exaggeratedly high that she can't focus, and it often comes off as being tom-boy-ish. I chalk this up to being 3, as our other kids went through this as well and managed to chill out by 5, but it's certainly a bear to deal with right now. Her biggest needs from me as a father, right now, are for clear and enforced boundaries (temper tantrums can be out of control) and to fuel her existing desire for learning.
- 20mo daughter - She's still young enough that her personality is only just developing. She has learned the word "no" and is willing to receive it. Her language development is excellent for her age, as she can say several words and even small phrases and isn't even 2 yet. She also understands far more than she can talk and will follow basic instructions: "Go upstairs and get your pajamas" - and she'll bring them down. "Go wash your hands" and she heads to the sink. "Bring me my shoes," and she heads right to the basket and knows which ones are mine. She even goes to bed when we tell her to, without complaining or fussing. Areas of attention for now: my wife feeds her as much as the other kids, despite that she's so much younger, so she needs to slim down (it's not bad, but noticeable), and she could also use improvement on learning how to eat neatly (she's learning to use silverware, but mostly skips to smearing food on her face and in her hair).

Social Development: Solid. I've found a new group of men in my area who are 100% on board with the same mission I'm on and who want to revolutionize church structures in my area, some of whom are already pastors and elders, and others who are in positions of influence in prominent congregations in my locality. I've also built new relationships with the divorce care group at my church and am continuing my practice of meeting at least one new person every Sunday morning. I've also made new professional connections that should increase my income stream in the long-term - and all this in the last 2 weeks alone.

Personal Areas for Growth

- Ongoing diet management
- More intentional effort toward parenting in my children's needs rather than just having fun with them
- Follow up with several new relationships
- Need to follow up with the lead pastor at my church

Does this sub find it a good idea to wait until marriage?

1 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

There's a real incentive to close your eyes to potential dealbreakers because you don't want to lose access to that gratification

This is crucial. While it mainly applies to men who use sex as a validation-gratification device, that's pretty much the majority of men in the first place.

I'd hope that after internalizing what we teach here, a man could easily walk away from that gratification when a red flag arises because he has an abundance mentality, stoic frame, and several other virtues. Of course, somewhat ironically, once a man is free from his dependence on that sexual gratification from an RPC framework, he won't be pursuing premarital sex in the first place, so he'll never have cause to prove he has conquered its hold over him, and having sex just to prove that point would prove just the opposite: that he's outside of Christ's frame and separate from what we teach.

training information

1 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Hmm ... I was kind of hoping you'd actually elaborate with useful information rather than just posting a link. What did you learn from reading that content that was helpful to you? What in there do you believe other guys could find helpful? I'm not saying your thoughts are a replacement for good content, but there has to be something presented to show that the resource is actually worth the time invested to get through it all.

Should I be baptised at the beach rather than my local Church?

1 upvotes · 27 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

That's what my church does by default.

Spinning Plates

1 upvotes · 26 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Huh? I'm so confused.

Spinning Plates

1 upvotes · 26 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right on. The first couple sentences raised my eyebrows in doubt, but by the end it became clear you were just saying: An attractive man doesn't need to worry about attention games and isn't at risk of giving too much attention anyway.

On this I 100% agree. The struggle isn't between too much and too little. It's between enough and too little because the attractive man has a mission that precludes oneitis type attention from ever occurring in the first place. While he may still have the capacity for too little attention, part of his being aggressive is knowing how to flirt, kino, be charming in conversation, socially active, etc. which all naturally implies communicating with his girl anyway, and a total failure of attention is ultimately an attraction disqualifier.

In short: be attractive naturally, not by playing games.

How do I pray?

1 upvotes · 25 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Given that it's a direct modification of 308, I just added it to the post itself. It won't be in the compendium, as I don't have access to edit that, but for anyone just clicking through the links, they'll see it that way.

How do I pray?

1 upvotes · 25 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

More to /u/WarriorJesus1915 - I like your PRAY acronym better than the standard "ACTS" one. You're combining Adoration and Thanksgiving into "Praise," replacing the confusing word "Supplication" with "Ask," which makes a lot more sense, then adding "Yield" to show a general heart disposition.

But it still lacks the reason why I adapted ACTS into REACT, where the R is for "Relational" - recognizing that the purpose of prayer is not to get stuff from God, but to build our relationship with him. I had also replaced "Supplication/Stuff" with "Entrust" - which is basically the same thing as your "Yield" word gets at. In order to make a comprehensible word, I'd adjust "Entrust" to "Entertain." Hear me out.

- Praise
- Repent
- Ask
- Yield
- Entertain
- Relational

Now we spell the word "prayer." While I'm sure the E could be replaced by a lot of other words, this one seems best suited to the way people naturally talk with others in conversation. It gives a new emphasis on being relational, where most Christians can hear the word "relate" or "relational" and assume it means you must be emotionally invested or sharing some deep, dark secret, because that's what most of the church world thinks when they hear that word.

When I pray, people are often shocked. Something typical can go something like this: "Hey Jesus, what's up? I'm feeling kind of tired/happy/sick/whatever today. How about you? I'm sure you're feeling all kinds of things right now, as you're connecting with all kinds of people. I hope I'm one of the ones making you happy, though! Haha. Oh yea, I saw a really good show last night. It was about some superhero family trying to stop the apocalypse and these celestial agents were trying to make sure it happened. I was kind of torn because I want to empathize with the ones trying to save the world, but part of me is actually excited for the real apocalypse and I'm not sure why I would ever want to postpone your coming back! Do you know anyone who might benefit from talking about that tension? I'd love to have that conversation with them. Maybe they could grow a little closer to you because of it. Anyway, I feel like hitting the gym later. Want to come with me? My wife and I might watch a movie tonight too. You should totally join us. Are you thirsty? I'm thirsty. Let's get something to drink."

The way I chat with Jesus in this context is the same way I would a guest in my home who I'm entertaining. Maybe that's not the best word for it, but that's my mind-set.

In modern Christianese that same prayer would read: "Dear Jesus. You are so great and higher than us. Instead of feeling tired, please lift my spirits and give me energy to do the tasks you've set out for me. Your knowledge and wisdom and experience is so vast, and I'm amazed at how you know each one of your people. Please help me to be one who pleases you. Keep me from wasting time on TV shows, but please find a way to redeem all things to yourself. Keep my heart and my spirit aligned with your purposes, and bring people in my life who need you. Give me the perseverance and dedication to take care of my body, for it is your temple. Fill me with your motivation and your spirit to make wise choices with my life. Be with me always, and never leave my side. Let me remember your presence in every waking moment. And though I may be thirsty, quench me with your eternal love, and let your joy be what satisfies me rather than the water I drink."

Which one of those two conversations sounds like a person I'm actually friends with - the way God called Moses his friend, and then said "With him I speak face to face, clearly and not in riddles" (Numbers 12:8)?

While there's nothing "wrong" with the Christianese way of praying (at least not that I've noticed off-hand), and there are certainly times in prayer that warrant addressing Jesus like the king he is, if this really is a marriage relationship, I'd prefer to talk to him like I'd want my wife to talk to me. And maybe in the process, as she hears me pray, my wife can learn how to talk to me from the way I talk to Christ.

A Reply: Yes, the church and Christian writers really say these ridiculous things.

1 upvotes · 23 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Do it up! I'm looking forward to reading it and tweaking my routine.

A Reply: Yes, the church and Christian writers really say these ridiculous things.

1 upvotes · 22 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Within small boundaries, sure. When was the last time you heard of a woman whose personal taste was to have the hots for the elephant man as her perfect 10, though? Saying it's subjective can only take you so far.

For Single Guys - An Intro to the Red Pill, A few pieces of advice, and a Farewell

1 upvotes · 22 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Hah! That's crazy.

For Single Guys - An Intro to the Red Pill, A few pieces of advice, and a Farewell

1 upvotes · 22 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Nice

For Single Guys - An Intro to the Red Pill, A few pieces of advice, and a Farewell

1 upvotes · 22 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

RPC would not need

I long for that day.

For Single Guys - An Intro to the Red Pill, A few pieces of advice, and a Farewell

1 upvotes · 22 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I noticed that too.

Is it just me? Are modernist Churches very feminine oriented?

1 upvotes · 22 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Many of those are true for most other institutionalized incarnations of the church also.

Addressing the Blue Pill Hate: Objectifying Women, 1 Peter 3

1 upvotes · 21 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'll make a post.

Addressing the Blue Pill Hate: Objectifying Women, 1 Peter 3

1 upvotes · 21 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Nice

OYS - Where Progress is Made (02/20/19)

1 upvotes · 20 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with the other guy. A woman on her period isn't an excuse, unless you're personally that grossed out by it. You can still get a BJ, do mutual hand jobs, or just deal with the blood. My wife actually initiated with me last time she was on her period, which is a relatively new development, as it was usually me who would initiate during those weeks. She's getting less self-conscious about it and more interested in just having good sex when we know we both want it.

Addressing the Blue Pill Hate: Objectifying Women, 1 Peter 3

1 upvotes · 20 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Amen

Addressing the Blue Pill Hate: Manipulation

1 upvotes · 19 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Then we probably mean different things by the term "red pill." The red pill is the truth about how intergender relational dynamics work. The secular red pill is, by their own terms, an incomplete canon. They're still swapping notes. They're still experimenting. The bible is that closed canon, but it has yet to be fully explored in this context because it was written for many other purposes as well. The secular world is trying to figure out what the bible says on this subject without actually reading it.

What I'm guessing you mean by the red pill is the series of recommended attitudes and behaviors that are presented by guys who call themselves red pill. Ask any endorsed contributor on even the secular subs like MRP - especially Rollo - and they'll tell you the same thing: the red pill is understanding truth, not a set of behaviors. While the secular red pill subs will discuss the behaviors they observe, the bible tells us why people behave this way and how we can best respond.

So, when guys who are having sex with tons of girls say, "He's what made those girls horny for me," and a bunch of other guys try it and find that it works for them too ... we can't say they're teaching falsehood. They're just sharing what they observed, and they're right. Those girls did have sex with them and they are teaching truth about their observations (unless they're just flat out lying). It's just an incomplete truth without the bible to fill in the full picture.

Any RPChristians Near Dayton, OH?

1 upvotes · 15 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I know a few throughout Ohio, including myself.

Michael's Story?

1 upvotes · 15 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

There's a reason I have significantly slowed down the frequency and quantity of my posts. If I don't have useful content to submit, I don't submit anything. Rollo, in order to maintain an active reader base, is compelled to submit periodic posts. I have no similar compulsion that would affect the quality and integrity of my posts ;)

That's not to say everything I post is a gem. I just commented to squizzo last night that my latest post was more an effort to flesh out ideas than it was to communicate a clearly refined diamond - and I'm okay with that from time to time. That's part of the beauty of reddit: it's more about the conversation than the teaching. But a blog is different. They're meant to be refined because the comments are not the highlight, whereas on reddit the comments are where the magic happens.

Aristotelian Categories: Essentials, Accidents, and Alphas

1 upvotes · 15 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Amen. I was already planning on writing a post on being alpha before I read this. I may use this to piggy back off of. Great post overall.

Michael's Story?

1 upvotes · 14 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

If you want to read Rollo on this subject, I'd recommend this post instead. It's foundational from a time when he was almost always on point and not stretching boundaries to pretend he has something new to say.

Michael's Story?

1 upvotes · 14 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Why was he bombing things? That's the question that matters. Alpha and beta don't align with moral designations though. Many alphas are highly immoral.

Ideas to consider for men who follow Jesus...

1 upvotes · 11 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I just wrote this as ideas to think about

Makes sense ... but wouldn't that be better received and invoke higher quality discussion if you asked these as open-ended questions rather than presenting them as if they are teaching points?

behold, the kingdom of God is in the midst of you.". A better translation is the kingdom of God is within you.

I've often heard "among" as the proper translation. That is, the Kingdom of God is the church on earth, not an army that would descend upon the earth. It doesn't have physical boundaries, but spiritual ones.

when we are beahving and doing exactly what God wills which is to become in the likeness of his son which is living and walking by the spirit

Great - and what does that likeness look like? In a modern society, what will a man look like who is in Christ's likeness? What types of things does he do? How does he talk? What is his mission? How does he interact with other people?

"Be Christ-like" is more vague speech. It's like asking someone what the color of an apple is and they answer, "It is the color of a fiery anger and the color of our hearts - the color of the blood that fills our veins." It sounds poetic and cool, but what the person really needs to hear is: "Red. An apple is red."

like how do I do that now and today? I don't know exactly but it's a target

Right - my exact question, haha. The problem is that this isn't a target.

Suppose I throw you out into the middle of the woods with no compass and I tell you, "You must go to Kansas City to accomplish your mission." Great: you have a target. But you don't have a map, you don't have a compass, and there's nobody around to ask for help other than the one guy who only knows how to say: "Go to Kansas City. It's that easy. Can't you figure it out? That's all you have to do: Go to Kansas City."

How do you get there? Well, if you're east of the city, you need to go west, but if you're north then you need to go south. But you have no idea where you are or where Kansas city is in relation to where you're at.

"Ah, but the Bible is like a road map," you may say. "Just read the map and you'll know how to get there."

Cool. So you take a look at the map and realize that you still don't have a "you are here" stamp on it. You take a good guess from some surrounding landmarks and start moving in a certain direction, but you find that maybe you're holding the map upside-down. Or maybe it's sideways. Or maybe that green area wasn't meant to be a grassy field, but a forest. Which is it?

You ask your friend: "Help me out here," and he says, "Just go to Kansas City, dude. That's all you gotta do." Nice ... so helpful.

This post was not an attack on RPC as much as it is a warning for men about the red pill and enhancing SMV as a centralizing life pricniple.

But you can see how an attack on "the red pill" would readily be interpreted as an attack on anyone who calls himself a "red pill" Christian, right? Certainly the label "red pill" should not be part of our core identity, but labels have practical value all the same.

And again: if you're preaching against "enhancing SMV as a centralizing life principle" and leaving your suggestion as to what we should focus on as something very vague, that's like going to a cooking sub and posting: "Guys, you might really want to consider this ... that some ingredients go really well together. I mean, that's what cooking should really be all about. You shouldn't make your central message about how good apples taste. I think we should all just focus on the fact that certain ingredients, when mixed together, taste really good. I'm not accusing you of focusing only on the taste of applies, but I still thought that avoiding that focus was something you should really consider. Oh ... and you probably shouldn't be too specific about which ingredients go well together in specific meals, because that might not apply to everyone. Maybe some people don't like those ingredients together. We should just stick to ingredients, generally and not talk about specific ones."

How quickly would you be laughed out of such a forum? And yet I get the impression that this is the gist of your post here. The mods over at r/cooking (and I know at least one of them), would probably ban you and say, "Hey, if you don't like a recipe, then don't make that recipe."

Ideas to consider for men who follow Jesus...

1 upvotes · 11 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Look at the mod comments on the post you linked. There's a reason I have chosen the mods I have and don't let every Joe Schmo be endorsed.

As for the book, you say with one side of your mouth that you don't care about popular opinion - only God Word, but out of the other side: "I will be interested to see how it is reviewed and received." I agree that all things should stand on God's Word alone, but don't be duplicitous like this. Pick one or the other. Reviews are not my measure of success.

Lastly, and on that line, I don't know what it is you think you're leaving toward? Are you saying you'd rather believe cultural lies and have a bad marriage because you think this is what the Holy Spirit wants? Or are you saying the Holy Spirit wants you to go MGTOW and abandon relationships entirely? I really don't get your end game here. Either:

1. You're giving up on relationships, so RPC has little application for you, or
2. You're going to pursue a relationship, but do it in a way that you believe is "Holy Spirit led," which somehow involves ignoring either pragmatic reality about relationships or theological consistency (or both).

Which is it? What is your model for what will bring about a successful marriage? Or do you think God doesn't care about whether marriages are healthy?

OYS - Where Progress is Made (01/30/19)

1 upvotes · 1 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Chuck gave a good reply, but this stood out to me:

To preach the gospel to all who will listen.

Don't limit it here. Part of the point of the parable of the sower isn't to move on from bad soil to people who are good soil. Jesus was speaking to an agrarian society who would have known that you should pull weeds and till the soil so that it's ready for the seed to be planted.

That said, don't merely preach to those who will listen. Take those who won't listen and prepare their hearts until they are ready to listen.

Finished the 200s, - Question Alpha Positive

1 upvotes · 1 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Acts 16 - It doesn't say that Paul yelled or shouted. It says he got annoyed and "said" to the Spirit to come out. I can see how it would be interpreted as shouting, and it may have been shouting ... but again, he's dealing with an evil spirit and not his wife. A stern rebuke is in order. It's not losing frame for a warrior to shout in battle.

The post you're referencing is about drawing attraction between men and women. The situation with Paul doesn't warrant an "alpha positive" response in the same way because he's not trying to seduce the evil spirit.

309 specific to RPC or does it also have a RP equivalent?

1 upvotes · 1 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Let me be clear: There is no "Christian Version" of anything. You're reading the 300 series as if I'm trying to create Christian versions of secular RP concepts. I'm not. I'm just reading the Bible and pulling out BASIC, foundational concepts of following Jesus. They're not a complete series - they're just the starter points. If they happen to have a secular equivalent, that's because the secular world has found in the physical realm a truth that parallels a spiritual concept. Given that physical marriage parallels our spiritual marriage with Christ, it's not surprising that those who study physical intergender relational dynamics will also discover spiritual truths about how God relates with his people.

If I try to force a connection, as you do, it would go something like this:

1. Bible study - "Read and internalize the sidebar"
2. Fellowship - "Spend time around other masculine men, not just around your wife/women"
3. Evangelism - Pre-marriage game (i.e. picking up girls)
4. Quiet Time - Meditation and reflection
5. Scripture Memory - Internalize sidebar content; meditation
6. Assurance of Salvation - Confidence and frame foundation both derived from your mission
7. Prayer - Our fitness tests to God; it's not about getting what we want, but learning to trust his leadership
8. Discipleship - Have lots of sex and raise your kids, don't be an absent father

Note: #8 is not an "8th Basic." It's another section entirely, and one I haven't written yet - the 300 series is incomplete. The 400 series has a lot I could add to it, but I don't have any plans to do so right now.

Finished the 200s, - Question Alpha Positive

1 upvotes · 1 February 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I don't understand what you're asking. Any examples I can think of where Paul may have come off as angry were situations where he was rebuking someone sternly for grave sins so they could receive correction and instruction. The situations you're describing in this post aren't things where she has sinned overtly, she's just been conditioned to act self entitled. Reconditioning is very different from harsh rebuking.

Is there something like "lifting weights" for your soul?

1 upvotes · 30 January 2019 · /r/askTRP

For Christians the RPChristians sub has content for developing spiritual disciplines much like you're talking about. Check out the 300 series.

Too Little, Too Much

1 upvotes · 27 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I can only speak to the laws in my own state, but I'm suspicious about the actual facts of these scenarios you reference. There's a difference between being divorce rape and feeling divorce raped.

Do feminists ever "see the light"?

1 upvotes · 26 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Every feminist sees and knows the red pill. They just think it's the darkness and that they're the light. They're not ignorant; they're just wrong.

Too Little, Too Much

1 upvotes · 25 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I assume you're not implying divorce in your last paragraph.

Also ...

If I pull the trigger and it turns out that AWALT, then that was on me for not vetting properly.

No, it just means that AWALT. Unicorns don't exist. Vetting is about finding a woman who has a track record for controlling her AWALT tendencies, not that sur doesn't have them at all. And everyone is liable to lose control at some point. It's not a vetting problem; it's a sinful nature problem in her.

Lifting Is Not A Suggestion

1 upvotes · 25 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good answer.

Too Little, Too Much

1 upvotes · 25 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Is it possible that vetting is not about eliminating all possible issue, but about embracing and accepting great, more burdensome issue than before.

I normally appreciate any effort to think outside the box ... but no.

God rewards ... making strong those who accept a greater challenge than usual.

"My yoke is easy and my burden is light." I don't think God calls us to take on challenges for their own sake. Challenges from God are always associated with a clear purpose. If your purpose is the same as Hosea, sure, he's going to give you an incredible challenge through your spouse. But I do agree with the general principle of vetting, even if one can't do it perfectly.

Too Little, Too Much

1 upvotes · 22 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

All Women Are Like That - more info in our glossary on the sidebar.

Too Little, Too Much

1 upvotes · 22 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Not true at all. I call bull.

Too Little, Too Much

1 upvotes · 22 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Nice comment. I like it.

For Women: Getting Your Beta to Man Up

1 upvotes · 22 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Give me context.

Is My Girlfriend Wife Material? Need Help.

1 upvotes · 18 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I just had a conversation with my pastor two days ago about how all the high schoolers fell away over winter break, and he wanted my advice on how to prevent this from happening when they go to college. I gave him the same solution you present. Premarital sex is, in part, a product of the American dream as one's mission. They're trying to get the fruit of that dream early. Give them a better mission and they'll push for that fruit quickly as well. College is life on 10x speed. Wherever they're pointed when they go in, it's hard to redirect at those speeds.

Validation and Interdependency

1 upvotes · 13 January 2019 · /r/MarriedRedPill

No, I don't think most do, just as there are distinctions between things like being religious and being faithful that people don't often think about.

Validation and Interdependency [MRP Draft]

1 upvotes · 12 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I can see that. John Eldridge poses the opposite on your later example, though - that the child who gets no validation will never move past the phase of childhood life where parental validation is essential, so he'll seek validation as an adult in other ways to get what his parents never gave him. This is discussed in The Way of the Wild Heart.

Validation and Interdependency [MRP Draft]

1 upvotes · 12 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Haha, well played.

Validation and Interdependency [MRP Draft]

1 upvotes · 11 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right on.

We've done it, guys. "Traditional Masculinity" is now officially deemed "harmful" by the American Psychological Association. High-five to culture!

1 upvotes · 11 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

This is a little too conspiracy-theory-ish for me, but I think you're missing the point. Nobody here is fooled by the article or thinks it's credible. The problem is that the world at large believes it's credible. Laws get made on these things, and decisions on who gets custody are made by psychologists, whether you want to call it a pseudo-science or not.

We've done it, guys. "Traditional Masculinity" is now officially deemed "harmful" by the American Psychological Association. High-five to culture!

1 upvotes · 11 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

They corner the market. The other groups are significantly smaller and less influential.

Instagram and Sex Robots - How Technology is Changing Male/Female Interactions...

1 upvotes · 10 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right. There are certainly numerous unfair laws that all stem from no fault divorce. I think we agree there. But if someone like Bezos was dumb enough not to have a prenup, do you really feel all that bad? It's like the kid who kicks a frozen pole in winter. He's an idiot. I don't feel bad for him for doing something stupid in a dangerous climate. A prenup could save an overwhelming majority of property disputes in divorces like that, unless the guy struck rich during the marriage and wasn't expecting it.

As for child support, my state has a cap. Once the joint income hits $150k, the support numbers stop going up. The court can extrapolate the tables if they find it appropriate to do so, but I've had cases with people who earn over $1m/yr and the court still didn't extrapolate, so support was the same as if the guy had only earned $150k/yr and it didn't go up simply because he was vastly more wealthy. So again, there are some unfounded fears that guys have about divorce laws that can mostly be mitigated by a man who knows how to plan.

Instagram and Sex Robots - How Technology is Changing Male/Female Interactions...

1 upvotes · 10 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Good thoughts all around ... except the first bit. Are you really suggesting that no child support should be exchanged at all?

Dealing With Emotional Strong Arm Tactics.

1 upvotes · 9 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

I'm pretty sure you're misusing those verses, but it's not a big enough deal to be worth getting into it on mobile. I'll leave you be for now ;)

Dealing With Emotional Strong Arm Tactics.

1 upvotes · 9 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

The only passage I'm aware of where it says to publicize someone's sins is when a leader of a church commits a sin (and many people interpret this predominantly to mean sins that would affect his capacity for leadership or which are against the body). I'm not sure where it says this over individuals who are not in church leadership.

Dealing With Emotional Strong Arm Tactics.

1 upvotes · 9 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

But this needs to happen at a legal or national level. It's a pointless battle in a small church.

The law can't get in this situation, nor can the nation. The way it becomes a legal or national issue is when enough "small churches" and individual people take action that the numbers start to show a trend that the law-makers can't ignore.

Quite simply: if this case is not news-worthy enough to get a lot of social media attention to reach the larger public and start law-makers thinking ... then only the cases that are news-worthy enough will ever get addressed by the law, and then cases like these are left by the wayside ... unless they can show value through consistency among individuals to push at the small levels.

For the unmarried - is marriage worth it today?

1 upvotes · 9 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

if you are married to a woman in a lower socio-economic class than you are, you will likely be forced to pay for her for many years

Only if you stay married for longer than a decade.

Hypergamy dictates that women will not be loyal if they see an opportunity to jump ship for a better deal.

It doesn't dictate this. It suggests that the desire to do this is inherent in all women. That's a big difference.

Different women are able to control their innate desires to different degrees. This is particularly true when God changes a person's heart. Don't impute secular tendencies on those who are renewed and restored by God. While the flesh is still present, their default desire is now to wage war against those desires and not to give in to them. Just don't assume that any girl who says, "Yeah, I'm a Christian," actually is a Christian and has a changed heart. I think we've used u/ruizbuje's study a number of times here, where he found it to be close to 15% of church-goers would actually meet a basic definition of salvation ... or something like that. It's in one of u/OsmiumZulu's posts on the sidebar where he linked to the study.

More marriages are sexless or have such infrequent sex that it's basically sexless.

A lot of your post is doing this. You're looking at marriage stats for the average beta and asking: "Is it worth getting married?" As a beta, obviously not. As a secular alpha, certainly not - you can get the milk without buying the cow, as the saying goes. As a Christian alpha, who is genuinely attractive and can lead effectively, the evaluation becomes different.

The real question in that latter scenario is whether or not the Christian alpha wants to or can't keep himself from having sex. At that point the question turns to a matter of value: are the risks associated with modern marriage worth taking on in order to (1) have sex, and (2) maintain integrity within their faith. Even this evaluation must account for the degree that the risks may be mitigated by his commitment to maintain attraction within the marriage and the mitigation of her having a reformed heart by God. While the risks are not eliminated, they are significantly reduced as compared with women from the rest of the world, if a man properly vets to find a truly saved woman rather than trusting her words or surface-level behaviors alone.

The woman you marry today might be perfect. But on 12 months or 84 months, you could be married to a card carrying feminist ready and willing to take full advantage of the divorce and alimony torture machine.

If he's a horrible leader and lets her walk down that path, sure. And if it happens in either 12 or 84 months he probably won't be out all that much, financially. If it happens after 120+ months, it starts to build gradually until the 300+ month mark, when he's really in the hole for life if they divorce.

Why should a man get married? To have kids.

Come on man ... you can't think of a single other reason? This seems like a ridiculously disingenuous straw man.

Follow the Red Pill but Do Not Sin...

1 upvotes · 8 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Right. This is sad but true.

Question - Book Recommendation on Finding Your Mission?

1 upvotes · 5 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

That's great to hear!

how do you guys get on the other side of your own anger/rage?

1 upvotes · 4 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

"Want to know my secret? ... I'm always angry."

Anger is usually a result of one of the following:

1. A lack of perspective
2. Heightened investment in an outcome

3. Obstruction of one's goals
4. Confused passions
5. Failed standards

The cures are as follows

- Amused mastery
- Outcome Independence
- A strategically mission-oriented life
- Stoicism
- Maintaining clear boundaries

Not all anger is bad. Handling it inappropriately is bad. Those are appropriate ways of handling different types of anger.

We are all going to hell

1 upvotes · 4 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

My red pill pastor uses the line: "Who's your king?" Another disciple making church says, "What's your pledge of allegiance?" Mine is: "What's your mission?" They all come down to the same thing.

Michael Jordan was hailed as the best basketball player ever for a long time. But he quit to play baseball, even though he had everything going for him in the basketball realm. He was willing to change missions in life. Others will too, if they are unfulfilled, have maximized their current aims, or find something better.

I change men's missions by making them a part of mine. I disciple them - occasionally without their knowledge - and through that process instill in them the vision for disciple-making as well.

Question - Book Recommendation on Finding Your Mission?

1 upvotes · 4 January 2019 · /r/RPChristians

Lost Art of Discipleship, by LeRoy Eims

Master Plan of Evangelism, by Coleman

Sermon: Born to Reproduce, by Dawson Trotman

We are all going to hell

1 upvotes · 29 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Truth.

Humility in leadership. Opposites in distinction. Or not?

1 upvotes · 27 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It's not a post about a relationship issue. I specifically drafted that rule to make exception for predominantly theological questions.

Humility in leadership. Opposites in distinction. Or not?

1 upvotes · 27 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good reply.

How do/will you raise your kids?

1 upvotes · 26 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed on all counts, except the clarification that the person to "have control over the programming" oys not the parent, but the child, who is taught to control his own programming.

I don't keep safeguards on most of my kids' stuff. They know what they can watch and what they can't. At first they tested those boundaries, not realizing how easy it was for me to catch them. It's been almost 2 years since they've made that mistake.

Even with new shows I've overheard my 7 year old son telling his 5 year old sister that she shouldn't watch a show because he could "just tell" that it wasn't the type of show they should be watching. She agreed and they picked something else, never realizing I could hear.

I give my kids incredible freedom, but also teach them the responsibility to use that freedom wisely. This method probably results in significantly more blunders by the kids up front (which is ongoing), but I'm confident that it will pay off in the long haul, and I'm already seeing evidence of this.

How do/will you raise your kids?

1 upvotes · 26 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Teach them to develop frame. A strong frame is immune to psychological and emotional bullying. If it's physical bullying, off to the gym.

Best Man Speech at My Brother's Wedding

1 upvotes · 26 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Disciple, not discipline, though the two do go hand in hand. The word choice makes it easier for the mainstream to swallow.

Christian Redpill books

1 upvotes · 25 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

A lot of that depends on beta readers. I will probably self publish.

Christian Redpill books

1 upvotes · 25 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It won't be well received by the mainstream, but it should be bearable, as it removes the red pill branding.

Help with over-controlling parents?

1 upvotes · 21 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

We'll address an imbalance in the types of posts if/when it becomes a substantial problem. I agree that the personals ad post should have been removed, but by the time I logged in to see it, it had already been up long enough to be worth dealing with.

Responsibilities and Privileges

1 upvotes · 20 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed. But now we're blurring the line between sex being a right that husbands can demand or a privilege that a woman decides to give. How is it a right if there's no legitimate way to enforce it against the other person's discretion to deny you that right?

Responsibilities and Privileges

1 upvotes · 20 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed. Then that raises the issue: does God have the right to force us into evangelism (spiritual reproduction) against our will, and if so - why doesn't he do that more often if it would result in more people being saved?

Responsibilities and Privileges

1 upvotes · 19 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I think we're mostly on the same page. I fully agree that privileges must be earned and warranted.

Not to imply a conclusion, but do you believe sex within marriage is a privilege a wife gives her husband when he has earned it (or vice versa) or a right that each spouse maintains that the other simply and sinfully refuses to comply with at times? This is a subtle distinction that can make a big difference to a man's frame, as proven on r/deadbedrooms constantly.

How did you reach the conclusion that marriage is the "primary physical representation" of making disciples? There are other means, such as proselytizing. How does marriage rank above the proselytizing?

You're confusing methodology with symbolism. Marriage is a symbol, not a method. The parables are great examples. Jesus wasn't saying that farmers are the best people to grow God's kingdom through seed planting in the right soil. He's saying that farming is symbolic of what spiritual seed planting is like. In the same way, physical marriage and child rearing is the tangible example of what our spiritual marriage and reproductive efforts should look like. When the physical representation is broken, the world can't figure out what God wanted on a spiritual level either, hence discipleship as Jesus modeled it (which is the best method on a methodological level) has become a lost art.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (12/12/18)

1 upvotes · 16 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good call. I do meal prep when I'm in town, usually chicken, steak or salad. Part of the issue is that I've only been in town 2 weekends beaten October and the end of the year, forcing a lot of eating out. Also, even during weekdays there are a lot of mandatory eating out times. My fault for being careless with what I order, though.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (12/12/18)

1 upvotes · 16 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I've been struggling with maintaining a diet lately. I could type up a huge list of reasons why, but that doesn't excuse the regression in progress on my gut. My OYS for the week is getting my diet back under control, even despite all of the opportunities for delicious feasting that have been throwing themselves in my face for the last couple months - and that will keep coming up for the next 3 weeks. More self-control is needed.

Is repentance required in order to be saved?

1 upvotes · 14 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's my point.

Do Looks Matter – The Maroon Pill and The Apex Alpha Predator...

1 upvotes · 12 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm out of time, but your reliance on this study about women not liking asians is misplaced. Watch what she does, not what she says. Those studies, by your own acknowledgement, are 100% what she says. Then she'll go have sex with an alpha Asian and say, "I never do this. It just happened."

Do Looks Matter – The Maroon Pill and The Apex Alpha Predator...

1 upvotes · 12 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I should also note that you're conflating a few ideas inappropriately. For example:

Just like some women will never consider some races. They have a hard no. They won't even talk to them long enough to learn or know anything about them.

First, you're now talking about extremely unique outliers. If we're only talking about outlier women, I'm more open to the possibility that those random, obscure women really will follow things exactly as you say. But it's not the norm.

Second, you're also conflating SMV with RMV. A girl can be sexually attracted to someone who they will otherwise refuse to enter into a relationship with. If a girl is dead-set that she wants to marry a hispanic man and she won't consider white men, she may still find white men incredibly attractive. So, this type of thinking is really off-base.

Is repentance required in order to be saved?

1 upvotes · 12 December 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's kind of my point.

Relationship agreement - what do you think?

1 upvotes · 26 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That type of agreement is completely different. He's getting consent up front so she can't sue him later for all the stuff he does to her, pretending she was raped. You want a "He didn't rape me" contract? Go for it. That makes sense. People have been doing that for long before that book. But what you're proposing is completely different.

Recommendation Pastor Charles Lawson

1 upvotes · 26 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm removing this. If you want to repost with more details that actually relate to this sub, feel free to do so.

Relationship agreement - what do you think?

1 upvotes · 26 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Always look to the parallel Christ gave us. You're getting it! :)

Disturbing Things in This Group

1 upvotes · 26 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

There's an ongoing study across thousands of churches in America that is looking at many things, but peripherally notes the divorce rates among believers with an active plan and lifestyle for evangelism and discipleship is around 2%. Mission. That's the difference between this group and the general church going population with a 53% divorce rate.

Worried about never being in a relationship

1 upvotes · 22 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

For curiosity sake, which OU is your name referencing?

What to do, now in business debt. How to communicate with wife about it

1 upvotes · 15 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Don't volunteer information she doesn't need. If she asks, OYS. Tell her what's what. Own it and move on. Don't pout or cry or try to evoke emotional sympathy from her to keep her from being mad at you. Tell her you're filing for bankruptcy, if it's appropriate. Nice guys hide their faults. But men aren't compelled toward disclosure either. Be a man, not a nice guy.

How common is this really?

1 upvotes · 14 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm pretty sure women surpassed men in infidelity since around 2010.

But that's really beside the point. All I'm really saying is that men don't act on their impulses as often. Not that they don't do it at all.

How common is this really?

1 upvotes · 14 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Absolutely. Just because AWALT is more popular to discuss in RP communities doesn't mean AMALT doesn't exist. They're just different tendencies.

What I will say is that in modern culture men have, generally, developed a greater ability to control their tendencies because of the social stigma if they don't. There's relatively little social stigma against women acting on their hypergamy. It's often encouraged by the media, movies, politics, divorce laws, etc. For men, we no longer have the same recourse, so we have been trained by culture to be more cautious in how we control our AMALT tendencies.

Some people would go so far as to say that men are innately better at self-control and that it's not merely a product of an anti-male culture, but I can't really speak on that point because I don't know how men act in other cultures without feminist influences to compare how they would express these innate tendencies under those circumstances.

Where's the best place for a 21 year old man to meet other christian singles?

1 upvotes · 14 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, between the two of you, you hit most of them.

I'd also add: on the street, restaurants, taking the bus/subway, hosting parties or social gatherings and asking people to bring their friends, concert, when depositing a check at the bank, grocery shopping, walking around the mall ... pretty much anything can be an opportunity to approach.

Tag: /u/11-Eleven-11

Online dating apps?

1 upvotes · 14 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

1. I'm not against them, but they're a cheap way of finding people. It takes away your ability to demonstrate confidence in the approach. It also guarantees you find someone who is more controlled by hypergamy than not - because those apps are 100% endorsements for hypergamy.
2. No. Mission first.
3. Depends on whether you want to bait-and-switch her or not. If you want to trick her into dating you, go for it - and then break up immediately when you find out she's not a Christian either, because the whole point of doing this would be to attract non-Christian women who otherwise would ignore you. Or you can just be up—front about who you are and what you're looking for. Or you can just go meet people in real life like a confident alpha man who doesn't need his computer to do everything for him like he uses it for everything else in his life.

Long story short, it's a desperation move for guys who aren't attractive enough to find girls naturally. So, if you're desperate, go for it. It's just not what I'd recommend from an RP framework. But even the beta guy has to have an avenue to meet people.

The only other thought process I might consider is to use it for training purposes. While figuring out who you are and developing confidence, online dating can be a transition point between omega and alpha. It's better than the guy who's too afraid to talk to a girl at all because it actually increases your chances of starting those conversations. From there, you can get practice talking to women without having to cold approach because it gives you a context for the conversation in the first place. Once you are confident talking to women, drop the app and let your confidence direct you.

How should I handle these two disciples?

1 upvotes · 12 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

He ended up screwing things up with his ex ... and despite my best efforts things went South

If it's not a match-made in heaven, why are you helping him stay in a failing relationship? Marriage is one thing. When they're just dating, let it run its course.

After that situation he didnt come to church for about 5 months, citing that it was a long drive for him (45-50 minutes which I understand)

Then he can go somewhere closer to him. The fact that he didn't go anywhere at all affirms that he was only going for her.

I'm so confused by what's happening now.

You're too invested in the situation.

she thinks he has a crush on her and she just doesn't want that

Yeah, because she likes you, not him.

I told her to not lead him on and to be very clear with her intentions.

Great advice.

theres always the chance that she was being a bit flirty and enjoyed the attention she got from him and encouraged it until it became too much

Almost certainly the case. Even if you hadn't said this, I always just assume this is what happened. It's true virtually every time a girl gets unwanted attention from a guy. It's part of "plausible deniability." She acts fun and friendly - flirty even - but as soon as she changes her mind about something she can recharacterize her behavior away from flirting into just being nice and polite.

How did I handle this, and what should I do moving forward to deal with this?

You handled it fine. Offer to train her to disciple other women and revolutionize the culture of your church with a disciple-making ministry started by the two of you. That's what I'd do moving forward.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (11/07/18)

1 upvotes · 9 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

After reading 210 in RPC Compendium, I'm going to carve out a day in the coming weeks to do a mini-retreat where I'll pray, read the Word and get my mission, vision and core values written down.

I'd love to hear the results afterward :)

The King of Amused Mastery

1 upvotes · 9 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Sarcasm is a behavior, amused mastery is a mental framework. That mental framework is someone who sees things from a larger perspective and realizes that stepping on someone's foot isn't a big deal to get all huffy or even apologetic over. It's a trifle that can be laughed at. Having that mindset leads to certain behaviors, like cracking jokes, being sarcastic, or whatever, but it doesn't have to be.

In the reverse, someone without AM who employs sarcasm can, as you easily note, be viewed as a jerk - and not in the attractive way. This is usually because the sarcasm or joke comes from a darker place or is presented with a snippy attitude or even from an even-tempered mood, not a light-hearted "life's a game, so let's have fun with it" attitude.

I address a lot more of this in my "anatomy of butthurt" post. What you're asking isn't technically about butthurt, but the concept is still addressed there all the same, I believe.

Boldly sharing the Gospel - is it unloving?

1 upvotes · 7 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good points and well said. You're right that my off the cuff allusion to the death and resurrection did not do it justice.

A question about tears in front of your LTR.

1 upvotes · 5 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Legit. So many opportunities to share the gospel with other fans who are nonchristians ... the show makes it too easy, not to mention how good it is.

Finding a Tribe, Rasied Weak, Lds, the one myth.

1 upvotes · 5 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Solid.

Finding a Tribe, Rasied Weak, Lds, the one myth.

1 upvotes · 5 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I know you're not going to want to hear this, but I cannot in good conscience give you any reply without mentioning that Mormonism preaches a false gospel that cannot save anyone. Most of the advice I give people here about the importance of their mission has, at its foundation, the assumption that it is a mission that God actually supports. Accordingly, following the advice of much of what I write on RPC may not achieve the same results if you are pursuing a mission that God directly opposes. Although I don't support everything CARM says or does, here are two links that provide information on this: (1) an address to those who are mormons, and (2) a resource library for information on Mormonism from a biblical perspective.

For the record, my brother is marrying an ex-Mormon in a few months. I've talked to countless Mormons over the years. I've had friends who are Mormon. I've known people who have converted both into and out of Mormonism. A lot of what I'm saying here isn't just something I read on a blog somewhere, like CARM - it's based on things that I've heard from people who have actually been a part of the church in different levels of authority and who have either been blunt in their honesty or who have left and later saw the error of what was going on.

With that out of the way, let's get to the heart of your questions. First off, I can't make sense of half of your sentences. The grammar is so bad that I literally don't know what you're saying or asking half the time, so here's the best I can make of it.

Would they be able to help if a conflict happen "Scratch" no

It doesn't sound like your existing community would have your back if you needed them. Mormonism is an inherently selfish religion that exists almost entirely for one's own eventual gain. This is starkly different from Christianity, where Jesus teaches us that we should not act for our own gain or what rewards God might give us for our good deeds (though those will certainly come), but because we love God and he deserves everything.

The appropriate biblical attitude is one shared by Brother Lawrence in The Practice of the Presence of God: "I did not engage in a religious life but for the love of God, and I have endeavoured to act only for Him; whatever becomes of me, whether I be lost or saved, I will always continue to act purely for the love of God." That is, Brother Lawrence appropriately recognized that our obligation and desire to love God is completely independent of what we get out of it. While Mormonism teaches that God will give you things in exchange for your devotion, the biblical attitude, as professed by Brother Lawrence, is that he would continue to love and serve God even if he knew he was going to hell for it anyway.

While Mormonism may teach selfishness as a bad thing, it's impossible to eradicate it when it is at the core of their theology. There is no intense camaraderie among brothers who would stand by one another to the death. There is only a sense of doing what needs be done to maximize one's rewards in the afterlife. Don't expect them to jeopardize their eternity for the sake of any love they say they have for you.

Are there not any women that have my standards or "the one myth" there is a young single adults 18-29 but i am 30 and it seems like a problem within the Lds "mormon" according to google

Mormonism is such a small niche within the religious sphere that you are very unlikely to find a single girl who meets whatever standards you may say you have. That said, based on your story, it sounds like you have a lot of work to do before you are a high enough value man to attract that kind of girl in the first place. Get your past traumas and communication skills in order and that can be a big step.

the one myth: sure i bet if look hard there will be a someone hiting the wall looking to snag me up born again virgins all that jazz and Ill get told i should be happy I am with them

You don't have to settle. I would never encourage you to try to convert a girl to Mormonism. But if you are a high value man, a woman who is attracted to you will follow you anywhere you go. In my single days, I had several girls who professed that they would convert to Christianity for me. The pool can be larger than you realize - just don't evangelize. At best, evangelize with the prospect of dating afterward.

They put on faces "or fake act" if you show up to any lds house it will be clean you show up unannounced you will see how they really live

Most people do this. That's not unique to Mormonism or any religion, though I will say that even with 4 kids I do a pretty darn good job keeping my house in order every day.

It seems like a lot of the members are putting on an act and if you try to break out of this act and show your true way of thought you would be shamed

Not to beat a dead horse, but that's because (at least in my view) Mormonism itself is an act founded by someone (Joseph Smith) who put on an act. There have been psychological studies done to demonstrate that if something false is repeated to a person often and frequently enough that their brain will actually rewire itself to believe the falsehood - even if they know it's false (example study).

A great example of this is in being sick. I remember a few days where I would stay home from school claiming to be sick. I got pretty good at faking it. I knew I was faking it. But after faking for long enough something started to happen by the end of the day: I actually got sick. Or at least I thought I was actually sick. My nose would run, my throat get scratchy, my chest congested, etc. Then suddenly the next morning I'd be fine again, as if I was never actually sick. I had psychosomatically developed the physical condition I had deceived my brain into thinking I had.

This same thing can happen on a spiritual level. That is why Mormons place an incredible emphasis on a person's emotions and feelings as a source for discerning truth. How do you know the book of Mormon is true? someone asks. "Because the Holy Spirit has affirmed it in my heart through a powerful experience and burning joy when I read it," is a common response.

But the Bible doesn't give any such weight to emotions. This concept of emotionalism in spirituality is very dangerous and one that I actively combat against in churches that I visit. I have had to fight against it in my own home church until the leadership finally got on board. When that much weight is placed on emotion, it is easy to deceive anyone into anything by manipulating their feelings.

And let me be clear: feelings are very easy to manipulate. I used to make it an intentional point in my life, back in high school, to discern how to evoke emotional reactions out of different types of people. My goal at the time was to use techniques of emotional manipulation to cause people to believe in Jesus. It was twisted and dark, but I essentially had the same plan that Mormonism employs: use people's feelings as a rope to drag them wherever you want them to go. Don't fall for it. Don't be like I used to be, and don't fall for people who do what I used to.

There for trying to act or talk of red pill without slamming bible in it some how will be looked down on.

The red pill and the Bible will always be frowned upon.

Family is Every thing. I do not want children/cant.

Family is everything in Mormonism because that's how they keep Mormonism alive. If two people have 4 kids, they just tripled the number of Mormons in their home. If those kids each have 4 more, that's now 22 Mormons starting with 2 people.

It is very cult like and if my parents were not this way I feel i would be more willing to go.

It's cult-like because it actually is a cult. Don't let your relationship with your family destroy your relationship with God or hold you back.

I have a few goals in my life but I am indifferent if going will help me achieve them

Without knowing those goals, I can't say. If your goal is to become the leader of the Mormon church, then going will not help you achieve that goal. If your goal is to get into heaven someday, then leaving the Mormon church will absolutely help move you in the right direction. If your goal is to stay single for life (as it seems is the case right now), then leaving an environment where everyone is pressuring you to get married and have kids is probably a good idea.

btw i hate it when people give the advice pray and read the book because it seems like the answer when they do not know what to say also my friend got told that when i was around 14, she hung her self later that night.

I'm sorry to hear that. I agree with you that "just pray and read the Bible" is horrible advice - but it's common because many people don't know the answers in the first place, so all they can do is tell you how to find them on your own.

BF hasn't said I love you...

1 upvotes · 2 November 2018 · /r/RedPillWomen

Makes sense. I agree that there's a lot of semantics issues at play when we use the word "love," which is part of why I say that hearing the word doesn't actually mean much - because no one really knows what's being communicated when they say that word. The person hearing it might receive it differently than it's intended.

Again, that's not to say it shouldn't be said - only that it has no real value unless it's clearly defined, and any viable definition that could have actual meaning relates better to behaviors and priorities over emotions. That's all.

Part of this, of course, comes from the fact that I look at things from a biblical perspective, in which love does have a very clear and defined meaning. I do recognize that the way most of the world that speaks modern English has totally different conceptions that aren't biblical. I accept that and don't assume everyone must follow biblical standards of definitions who haven't otherwise signed up for that, but it does explain some of the semantic differences.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (10/31/18)

1 upvotes · 2 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I apply kino way too often. As in every time I'm near her.

It only comes off as needy if she thinks you're trying to touch her sexually every time. Try engaging in non-sexual types of touching instead and you can still get that physical contact without her feeling pressured or feeling like sex is another chore she has to check off her list.

How to date "evenly" as a Christian

1 upvotes · 2 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent reply.

Intro + question

1 upvotes · 1 November 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It was like 95% torn off. There were still a few ligaments attached to his body, which is why he miraculously still has some moderate mobility. They were just the right ones, apparently.

Fun fact: he started a business a few years back in which he travels the world training SWAT teams on how to locate and raid sex trafficking dungeons. His entire life is actually a list of fun facts and these are on the bottom of the list.

The Consciously Crazy Wife

1 upvotes · 1 November 2018 · /r/askMRP

Good stuff. Hysterical video. No clue when that became a thing.

Boldly sharing the Gospel - is it unloving?

1 upvotes · 30 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Amen on all that! I often use Matthew 12 as well, though I think he is speaking literally and not in a parable in that passage (unless you want to say that comparing us to a house is parabolic).

What's more interesting is the thought about what to fill our house with? If we can't leave it empty, what should go in? I searched the Bible specifically on that question and I could only ever find three things that the Bible references as indwelling within us that are of any positive value:

1. The Word of God
2. Jesus
3. The Holy Spirit

Now, to tie this back to my comments about discipleship/evangelism being the source of assurance, consider what the Bible says is the natural byproduct of each of those things indwelling us:

1. The Word of God - In Matthew 13, the parable of the sower, Jesus says that when the Word of God is planted in good soil, it yields a harvest 30, 60 or even 100 times what was sown. That is, other plants in nearby soil spring up because of us. That's evangelism/discipleship.
2. Jesus - In John 17 when Jesus talks about being one with his disciples ("I in them and you in me," v. 23) he says this in the context of commissioning them to go make disciples ("As you sent me into the world, I have sent them into the world," v. 18, and also all the other verses around it showing the outreach focus). In essence, Jesus modeled disciple-making as his method for spreading the Gospel to all nations and he implies heavily in John 17 that this is part of what it means for him to be in them. In Colossians 1:27 Paul also talks about evangelism to the Gentiles in connection with "Christ in you."
3. Holy Spirit - In Acts 1:8 Jesus says that when the Holy Spirit comes on you, "You will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth."

Conclusion? If we take Matthew 12 to mean that we should fill our house after casing out the evil, not leaving it empty, then we must fill it with one of those three things, and the natural byproduct is a lifestyle of disciple-making.

The Consciously Crazy Wife

1 upvotes · 30 October 2018 · /r/askMRP

I deal with BPDs on a weekly basis. I'm confident my wife doesn't have it. If this were weekly instead of less than an hour every 6 months, I'd be more concerned.

The Consciously Crazy Wife

1 upvotes · 30 October 2018 · /r/askMRP

I want her to reduce her hours during non busy season. She wants this too, but is unsure how much. I'm fine with anything between 50-85%. We've tried her stopping altogether between busy seasons and it doesn't work. She gets a ton of vacation time, which she uses liberally anyway.

The Consciously Crazy Wife

1 upvotes · 30 October 2018 · /r/askMRP

If I told her to, she would. The question is if I really want her to. She's also in the tax department and has no experience with the audit side.

The 16 Commandments - Part 1

1 upvotes · 29 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You're saying Jesus is jealous for devotion that is rightfully his. This is differen from making an effort to inspire jealousy.

I think you missed the point. I may be willing to agree with the bottom-line conclusion that God/Jesus does not intentionally make people jealous - but that still only applies to active dread anyway. I was referencing a passive dread whereby people are innately jealous simply by virtue of the fact that they have something that's in high demand.

However, Jesus healed people, served people, loved people, etc. One could argue that's all discipleship I guess? Yet if I get a book on discipleship does it talk about giving to the poor, serving those who are less fortunate, giving away $?

This is a framework issue. Most people have a very limited view of discipleship by assuming it merely means a teaching session between two or more people; whereas others have an overly broad view by assuming it means anything that leads someone closer to Jesus. That's why you're not going to read about this in very many books. The Lost Art of Discipleship is a good one where you absolutely will read a lot of this. Also: the book I wrote on discipleship.

In reality, Jesus gave a very clear example of what he meant by discipleship. The things you listed were things that he did not merely for their own sake, but in a manner that he was showing his disciples how they ought to live as well. Per my 208 post (I think), "show them how" is one of the prime steps of the discipleship process that Jesus employed.

So, yes, I do absolutely argue that all of those things are part of the discipleship process. Raking your neighbor's yard is not discipleship in itself. But doing so in order to develop a character that you're trying to instill on someone else - and especially when you are showing them your character by telling them about the time you raked your neighbor's yard, or by doing it in front of them, or by inviting them to join you in raking that yard - that absolutely is all discipleship.

When Jesus did all these things, they had value on their own, but only in an extremely limited, self-contained context. What gave these things lasting impact and value was the way that he utilized them in a discipleship context so that other people would practice these things the same way he did.

I do believe my point stands that Jesus did much more than vertically disciple people.

Correct. Because much more of the discipleship process is focused on horizontal relationships than the vertical connection. We never see Jesus teaching about how to increase one's faith. But when the disciples asked how to get more faith we do see Jesus responding, "If you have faith as small as a mustard seed [at the time, the smallest known organism capable of producing life], you can tell this mountain to walk into the sea" (paraphrasing). That's not to say we ignore the vertical relationship; rather, we recognize that the vertical relationship only has value if applied in a horizontal context.

if you use persuasion to get someone to do something for your gain that's manipulation. If you do something to do something for their gain, that's leadership

Fair enough. Then you've inappropriately characterized my original comment/process as manipulation and should have called it leadership instead.

While I agree that the word "manipulate" often has a negative connotation to it, I don't believe it has to or even that it should. I very much despise the way that liberals have formed emotional connotations to words that should otherwise be neutral, and I will often do what I can to fight against this grain.

The Price of Sex...

1 upvotes · 29 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I remember that post. I think I commented back that given the circumstances of my marriage, she was paying me per hit.

The point is that the model doesn't make sense when converted into reality. Even if it did, it would only work in a setup where everything could be boiled down to a dollar figure and the husband is the only one working.

Learning from the life of Esau

1 upvotes · 29 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good post. I'm a little shocked, though, that it's the third highest voted post on the front page right now, but has no comments ...? I suppose it's just not oriented toward discussion and the questions are a bit rhetorical.

I look forward to more posts like this. Just try to ask more critical-thinking (i.e. not yes/no or where you answer the question immediately after asking it) and application-driven questions.

The 16 Commandments - Part 1

1 upvotes · 27 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Several things you say make me think you missed that I'm providing a commentary on something else. Heartiste wrote in his blog the "16 Commandments of Poon." This post is commenting on the first 8 of them. So, I state the exact wording of his "command" first, then I go into my commentary on whether or not it's a biblical concept.

I just don't see jealousy as a positive, nor would I say that it's something Jesus exhibited

And yet there are several places in the Old Testament where God identifies himself as "a jealous God." I absolutely agree that it can be applied in very unbiblical ways, but it is also a concept that God identifies with himself and I believe it is appropriate to take after that model.

While I don't think I referenced it in my original post, an example of Jesus being jealous in the submissive role, is when he saw the way that God's purity was being tainted by the money-changers at the temple before he started driving them out.

point III - awesome, shouldn't this be #1

It's the third commandment of poon. I kept the numbering the same order Heartiste used.

I'm not saying discipleship isn't important but it seems like one element of many Christ taught

No, it was his entire lifestyle. Discipleship was not part of what he taught. Everything Jesus taught was part of the discipleship process. Too many people get hung up on Jesus' teachings and think we merely need to follow those, but then leave out Jesus' lifestyle. What did Jesus actually do? What was his ministry strategy while on earth? Is it enough to say, "Well, Jesus taught these x number of things, so I'm going to do that, but I don't need to live like Jesus lived"?

You don't even describe what the golden ratio is referring to.

That's fair. I assume that most people on this sub have been through some of the foundational red pill reading material, and therefore would already be familiar with the 16 commandments of poon. Perhaps that familiarity would fill in the gaps where you believe certain things weren't explained clearly enough.

I wonder if manipulation is truly necessary? Maybe it is.

Let's be clear: we're always manipulating people all the time. The only real distinction is between styles of manipulation that are perceived as immoral and styles that are not. If I push someone away from an oncoming truck, I have manipulated their body against their will to save their life. Most people would agree that's a moral form. If I ask a friend to help me move a dresser and he agrees, I have manipulated him according to his will because he is now doing something that he would not have done had I not asked. Most people would agree that this is moral. If he said he did not want to help me move the dresser and I hold a gun to his head and ask him again, most people would agree that this is immoral.

But there are all levels in-between, sometimes on different scales entirely. If I am in a conversation with an atheist who hates God and I play a relational long-game with him, often steering conversations to things that will soften his heart and ultimately share the Gospel with him and he accepts - if I let him know up-front what I was doing, he would have said no and refused to be my friend. So, my long-game manipulation was against his will when I began the process. But is it immoral for me to have done so? I think not.

If I merely ask my friend to help me move the dresser, the fact of my asking puts certain social pressures and considerations into play that prevent his response from being in a vacuum. Because of my friendship with him, he may innately assume that friendship comes with occasional obligations and feel pressure from that social construct to help me, even if he didn't want to. Or perhaps he may fear that if he doesn't help me I may stop being his friend, and therefore helps me against his will. But is it immoral that I would have asked him?

More on point: I have 4 kids. They are often bad. As a parent, I am their leader and they are my followers. They are to follow my instructions. If I use a combination of positive reinforcement and negative reinforcement to train them up to be well-behaved and good followers, is that immoral manipulation or is it something that both the Bible and society instruct us to do? Clearly the latter.

Likewise, in the marriage relationship, the husband is to lead his wife and she is to follow. This means there has to be some type of pressure to elicit that following. It could be spiritual pressures, whereby she understands that it's her role as a wife from the Bible, and therefore she feels compelled, despite not wanting to. Or it could be that her husband is effective at teaching, rebuking, correcting, or taining in righteousness with his wife. Or it could be any other number of things. But at some point he's going to have to "manipulate" his wife in order to be an effective leader over her.

Or maybe if you are masculine, go on your own path and have your own purpose and truly don't need or desperately want her and let her join if she wants - maybe that is enough? I don't know.

I actually just had this conversation with my wife this morning. She was frustrated with me because: "I feel like you have your own life purposes and you're going down this path and I know you want me to follow you, but sometimes I just don't know how and I need you to help me figure it out. I need you to let me know what I'm doing right, what I'm doing wrong, and help me figure out what exactly I'm doing. I need you to actually lead me and not just expect me to follow all on my own." Pretty similar wording to what you used. She was right, by the way. I wasn't being intentional enough in the way I influenced her. I took the attitude, "I'm just going to go and she'll come when she's ready," but I had veered too far toward that mentality and too far away from the intentional manipulation mentality.

your writing in this is not very clear ... I think in writing these commandments maybe you purposely made it vague so it could apply to a lot of instances, but it's just not clear and therefore not helpful

Another indication that you might not be familiar with the 16 commandments of poon. That's my mistake for assuming everyone would be familiar with them. I forget that not everyone here found this place after being on the secular subs first.

But when God acts in a displeasurable way toward us, how often does he apologize?

Apologies are an acknowledgement of wrongdoing, not of displeasing someone else. We can say, "I'm sorry" in an empathetic context, like, "I'm sorry that your dad died" - but this is not an apology. God has no need to apologize because he doesn't do anything wrong.

I don't know if we can use God as a model in all things - like, we can't create the world, we can't judge or condemn sinners - I don't think we can use examples of what God has done to guide our behavior. Now Jesus example on earth, I think we can use.

I agree that Jesus is the preferred model, whenever possible. But God the Father is also described as a groom to us. For example, Isaiah 54:5 says, "For your Maker is your husband, the LORD of hosts is his name." Also, the entire book of Hosea establishes the same parallel of husband/wife to describe the relationship between God and his people. While I agree that there are certain behaviors we cannot emulate, I do believe the character and principles that describe God's decision-making patterns should most certainly be emulated in our own lives.

He's my simple criticism, "what does love require of you?"

This is an absolutely appropriate thing to ask. But only if we have a complete picture of what "love" includes. Most people today have a romantic, emotionally fuzzy view of love that doesn't recognize things like, "The Lord disciplines those he loves" or that because "God so loved the world ... he sent his one and only son" to die for us or that "God is love" and yet that same God, who is love, ordered the deaths of countless people, demanded sacrifices in his name, whipped people at the temple, called his followers "Satan" for saying something dumb, etc. So, "What does love require of you?" doesn't necessarily mean some soft-hearted, squishy attitude that always sublimates oneself beneath another.

Say sorry when you think Jesus would say sorry or the Holy Spirit would lead you to say sorry.

That's a fair conclusion.

Many of these commandments are built on weak principles.

They're not weak principles. Truth is truth, whether we like it or not. But I agree that it is an incomplete set of principles. It only paints one side of the story - and I'm okay with that, as I'm not expressing these as an exclusive set of commands. I'm merely evaluating someone else's proposed set of commands.

Open thread

1 upvotes · 27 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Greetings to you too.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (10/24/18)

1 upvotes · 26 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I wouldn't sit them down to do this. Do, don't tell. Practice it as application opportunities come up or they won't take it seriously.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (10/24/18)

1 upvotes · 26 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent thoughts here. You could easily develop this into an MRP post.

Based on things I've seen in the Bible, I've developed what I call "proactive obedience." The goal is to take all the "no no" things for kids and instead of being reactive/responsive when that negative thing occurs, you proactively address things more generally (which addresses your last comment on kids acting out).

So, if there's a rule in the house that kids are not to tell lies, I have trained my kids to proactively tell me things about themselves that they wouldn't want me to know. For a while it was from me asking them: "What's something you did lately that you don't want me to know you did?" and when prompted, they'd answer. Now my son (almost 7) has no fear of telling me when he gets in trouble at school or when he's mean to his sisters. He knows it will result in discipline, but proactive honesty is part of his character (at least for now), rather than "don't lie" being something we only think about when we're reacting to a lie.

For my daughter (5), the "no whining" rule used to be a big deal. She was punished for that one constantly, but the punishment never corrected the behavior. I contemplated how proactive obedience would apply and began modeling polite communication toward her (when I was careless in my speech, she was careless in hers) and would invite her to repeat certain phrases after me when I knew she'd want something, but before she'd ever ask - "Daddy, may I please have an orange?" in a bright and chipper tone, instead of, "I'm hungry!" By proactively addressing her speech patterns before she ever needs to whine in the first place, whining stopped becoming a habit (because she hadn't had a chance to do it in weeks) and now she know how to use the proper tone of voice by default without my needing to proactively preempt her anymore. Even better: her example is now rubbing off on my 3-year-old.

Rather than the dichotomy between active v. passive punishment, it focuses more on active v. passive obedience. It's not often that I have to discipline my kids anymore - and when I do, it's because they're with someone else (school/daycare) when they were misbehaving (which just means I have to work on consistency and not merely their behavior when around me).

My premise in all of this is that the goal of any rule and discipline is to correct behavior toward compliance with that rule. But if we're only talking or thinking about the rules after a violation has occurred, then rules become associated with punishment and are viewed very negatively. The child never internalizes the value of obeying the rules - only the lack of value of disobeying them.

In reality, (with limited exception) the rules aren't about enforcing parental preferences in the home; it's about helping my kids to become the type of people who will thrive and be successful in the future. It's not about bad-character-shaming, but good-character-creating. So, to break the association between rules and punishment, finding ways to create proactive obedience to what would otherwise seem reactive situations (i.e. all the "do not" things) has been, at least in my home, a far more effective way at producing the results I want of positive character development in my children.

Tag: u/rocknrollchuck - your kids may be older, but maybe this can still help in some way

Can't get physicaly strong: Advise needed

1 upvotes · 24 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Go for endurance lifting instead of strength building. You'll still get the size and shape of the muscle, but won't trigger any injuries. As you do endurance lifting, you'll notice that even with injuries, the muscles surrounding the injury get strong enough that you can still increase the weights over time anyway. It's just a lot slower-going and you will reach a plateau. But that plateau will be after you have gained an appreciable size benefit, so you won't look scrawny anymore.

For Women: Getting Your Beta to Man Up

1 upvotes · 18 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It sounds to me like you've been heavily conditioned by the "there is no I in team" philosophy. "A team is greater than the sum of its parts," they say. It sounds inspirational, but on a pragmatic level nothing in nature actually works that way. You cannot get more energy out of a system than what is put in. You cannot create new matter - you can only rearrange it into more convenient and useful shapes. Two people, when they get married, don't become 2+ - they're still just two people.

I do agree that on a spiritual level two people do become one, and that this temporarily happens physically during sex, which is a symbol of what's happening on the spiritual level. But that spiritual oneness between spouses is not something that directly affects the pragmatic realities of responsibilities and resource allocation in a home. I still have to eat X calories a day, and so does she. I still have to perform X tasks to keep the ship afloat, and so does she. I still have my emotions, and so does she.

The only place where it could be confused for a "we" is when there's a mutual agreement to reorient each person's individuality to better align - so that instead of trying to force two puzzle piece bumps to fit together, you put together a bump and a hole. Someone has to be reoriented for the pieces to fit together in harmony. That doesn't mean that you're suddenly one puzzle piece instead of two. It just means that you're two puzzle pieces that have now fit together better than when you were misaligned.

"The woman should live in the man's frame," is a bit pat and glib, also a recipe for resentment if the husband is the type to ride roughshod over his wife

Right. That's why for a long-term relationship to work, the man has to make his frame a desirable place to live in.

I think both parties need to feel their imperatives are being served in a marriage in order for there to be contentment. Probably the key is having (for the most part) the same imperatives ... then you are working as one to achieve them.

Yes, having the same imperatives is ... imperative. Trying to compromise between two different people's missions is what usually results in disaster, as I have experienced in my own life and marriage. The preferred (and biblical) way of addressing this is not to pursue two separate goals ("no man can serve two masters," as Jesus says), but for one person to set the goals and the other to submit.

In most relationships that I've observed (including my own), and also from a biblical perspective, it makes sense that the man would be the goal-setter. Most women I know don't even know what they want out of life in the first place, other than general concepts like ease, comfort, happiness, etc. - which aren't visions/missions, but emotional states that can be experienced along any mission path.

For Women: Getting Your Beta to Man Up

1 upvotes · 18 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

they still want to try what doesn't work: nagging, berating, and demeaning

Darn straight. It's the inverse of my 106 post on what doesn't work for men.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (10/17/18)

1 upvotes · 18 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

OYS #3

PHYSICAL - After a few weeks off my diet, I'm back on. Lifting has been consistent throughout the whole time, so my body is back to aching with the lower calories. I'm thinking of switching from a heavy lifting routine to an endurance lifting routine to work on muscle shape over density, which will also balance well with the lower calorie intake.

My fashion sense has gone up. I bought a new line of workout clothes, specifically, noticing that I'm at the gym enough that I can't keep up with the laundry. This time I went for a size smaller than I've been wearing, which is nice in that it's more form-fitting, but given that I don't have a 6-pack yet, I can feel a little self-conscious about wearing the tighter clothes. Part of me wants to NGAF, but the other part wants to use that as motivation to keep slimming down to 12%BF, whereas I'm down from 16% to 15% right now.

Sex life hasn't changed much from last time. My wife is readjusting with being done with her busy season (Monday was the last day). She's struggling a lot with the adaptation back to being with the kids more often, so I'm not overly pushy, but she was responsive when I initiated, so that's good.

MENTAL/EMOTIONAL

Interestingly, my wife reports resenting me for being "superman" while she's in busy season - working full time, being a single-dad, handling all the housework (laundry, home repairs, cleaning, cooking, etc.), and still engaging in a ministry life-style. She gets off busy season, has the kids for one evening after daycare while I'm at a meeting, and starts falling apart because she can't handle them. I practiced passing comfort tests here. I assume she's still jittery from the insane work hours and that she'll renormalize soon. Either way, my plans haven't changed. It just means I get extra help doing what I always do anyway.

Reading is still researching. I have not been writing in my book as much this past week as I'd hoped. Part of that is laziness, part of it is meditation on the best direction to take certain components.

Practicing the basic relational techniques in the home has been going well. My frame is solid and my kids have learned to live inside even, which is excellent. It is part of what's causing my wife so much grief, though. They're so attuned to "that's how Daddy does it" that when I was at my meeting yesterday my kids were telling my wife, "We don't like it when you're here. We want Daddy back" and my daughter actually said to her, "You don't control me. Only Daddy does." That's obviously not cool, but it is an indication of the level of respect I've developed with them, as evidenced by their obedience when it's just them and me. Sadly, when my wife is present, they don't listen to me as much anymore. I'm not sure why that is, other than that they perceive a possible disconnect where they can get away with things - especially given that my wife doesn't approve of all of my methods and parenting style, so they feel like mommy will let them get away with more, even if I'm there. I need to work on this.

SPIRITUAL

AoS: 10

QT: 3 - I really haven't been having much passive time in the Word and with God as much lately. I'm okay with this.

Bible Study: 9 - I've been doing a lot more in-depth study on various subjects and meditating on some of the things I believe and why. I also just got another article posted on gotquestions.org to their public site (most of the questions I answer are private responses).

Scripture Memory: 1 - I haven't done anything with this lately, other than reviewing a few past verses. I'm okay with this.

Evangelism: 8 - My intentional relationship-building with non-Christians has been solid this week.

Fellowship: 10 - I'm connecting with other believers better than ever.

I've also told people before that one piece of my mission - a short-term vision - is developing a discipler-making ministry in my church. I've already red-pilled one of my pastors (he's even read NMMNG and WISNIFG and has posted his "Assertive Bill of Rights" in his house) and he's working with me on building a discipler-making ministry in our church. He has discussed it with the head pastor, but the response was, "We're already doing that. We're just not doing it your way." He appropriately took it as a joke and pushed back this week: "How many people in the church today would be competent to individually lead someone else to Christ and help that person be established in the faith, then cast a vision for that person to reproduce and do the same thing? The pastor didn't have an answer. He recognized that he would like to see that happening, but thinks it's an impossible goal and that the church should "outsource discipleship to the church systems rather than rely on the people" (RP Pastor's interpretation, not the head pastor's actual words).

Anyway, we had a meeting last night at the church among all the leaders of the church's primary "system" (of which I am one) and the RP pastor and I were able to steer the conversation toward a one-on-one discipler-making ministry in such a way that the other leaders all took ownership of the idea and thought they came up with it themselves. RP Pastor then communicated how overjoyed he was that there was near unanimous consent among the "systematic process" leaders in the church that the existing process the head pastor was relying on is not working and that we really do need a more targeted discipler-making ministry. We'll see how he responds, knowing that his team of leaders disagrees with his perception.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (10/17/18)

1 upvotes · 18 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Wife commented that I was looking slimmer the other day, so that's a win!

Be careful of that validation orientation. She's not your judge. The more those comments from her affect your measure of your own success, the more power she retains over you and the longer you'll be stuck in the blue pill.

Paul has an interesting phrase: "I care very little if I am judged by you or by any human court; indeed, I do not even judge myself. My conscience is clear, but that does not make me innocent. It is the Lord who judges me" (1 Cor. 4:4).

This concept could be applied to anything, including your body. Is your wife's expectations the standard of what shape you should be in? Some guys would say you should set your own standard and decide when you're happy with your body and not try to live up to someone else's expectation. While that's good, an even better standard: What does God want your body to look like?

A great place to start with answering that question: the end of Exodus (25 to the end, I think). I kid you not. You're God's temple. The tabernacle was the first "temple" God instructed Moses to build, and you can get an idea of how specific and intricate God intended it to look. 2 Chronicles 3 and 1 Kings 5-8 also go through the building of the actual temple. Let that sink in as to how important God cares about the design of his temple and then go to 1 Cor. 3, where it says that your body is the temple of God and ponder how intricately and intentionally God wants your body shaped.

We're also praying about planting a church with some close friends in a few years

Not until you figure out that social networking piece.

On the whole, though, it sounds like buying is a bad idea for you right now. Wait until you know where you'll be long-term, otherwise you'll lose any equity you put into it on realtor fees selling it 2 years later. It sounds to me like you already have a leaning on this issue, but your wife really wants to buy the house, so you're feeling pressure from her. Maybe I'm getting a wrong vibe on that though.

devote a lot of my free time while there to readying and working on some projects i've been long neglecting

Like Scripture memory.

Also when i'm away it's always more tempting to look at porn.

Because you don't have any higher priorities in the moment. Pick a goal for the weekend. Make it to "finish X book" if you want. Or make it to memorize the first chapter of Philippians (my recommendation). If you set a goal and make that a priority, you'll find it's a lot easier to avoid temptation when you have a higher priority.

Why StrongLifts over GreySkull for beginners?

1 upvotes · 18 October 2018 · /r/askMRP

And pulling. Gotta balance the pulling in there too.

For Women: Getting Your Beta to Man Up

1 upvotes · 18 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

How can "we" do anything without each person individually participating?

For Women: Getting Your Beta to Man Up

1 upvotes · 17 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I really like this. Good thinking :)

"I think I was just raped"

1 upvotes · 13 October 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Hah, that's funny. Makes sense.

Beta is always bad: Change my mind

1 upvotes · 12 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

God gives them, right? I'm not sold on this idea anyway ... just tossing out some gut reaction stuff and seeing what people say.

"I love you"

1 upvotes · 12 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

What would you say to my wife, who frequently says that she prefers her food bland with no spices, sauces, or seasonings? ;) No joke, that's how she eats.

"I love you"

1 upvotes · 12 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, that's not a joke reply. That's a legit one I use all the time. But as you allude to: show, don't tell. Telling is fine, but it's meaningless if it doesn't have the active history to back it up.

Help me out of this pit

1 upvotes · 12 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent comment - the only change I'd make is to substitute "Lost Art of Disciple-Making" for Purpose Driven Life ... for many reasons.

Why would a foreign wife be a bad idea?

1 upvotes · 11 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

1 Cor. 7/Matthew 19:11 MGTOW is fine ... but don't adopt the secular attitude of MGTOW.

"I think I was just raped"

1 upvotes · 11 October 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Makes sense, I guess. I tried to keep the story in the context of showing how my wife lives in my frame and now views these issues the way I do because of my leadership, and therefore assumed it was perfect content for this sub. Oh well. No spilt tears over it. There just seems to be an incredible inconsistency in how my posts get moderated.

"I think I was just raped"

1 upvotes · 11 October 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

True. I just went through that with a case where my client had hundreds of hours of audio recordings of his ex-wife threatening him and the kids. She refused to settle, even after having listened to all of it herself and recognizing the evidence she was dealing with. Go figure.

Out of curiosity, why was this post removed?

On Biblical Justice and Rape

1 upvotes · 10 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

No pardon necessary, brother. You're just looking out for the good of the sub in an area where there could have been confusion. Thank you. Keep it up!

On Biblical Justice and Rape

1 upvotes · 10 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with all of this. I think you may have misunderstood something, which is why I was making clear not to confuse soteriology into anything I was discussing.

On Biblical Justice and Rape

1 upvotes · 10 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Right on.

To expand a little more, hama was only the prefix/root. Hamartano was the archery term and it goes beyond merely missing the mark. Hamartano was a measurable distance from the exact dead center of the bull's eye to the place the arrow struck. Even if the arrow was on the bull's eye, if it was even slightly off center, it had a hamartano distance. This goes along well with my framework of sin being the default state of all people still living on earth, even when we think we're doing good, and that the only true "good" we can ever do (i.e. something completely devoid of sin) is when God does it through us - which is not a difficult state to achieve, but is impossible to maintain indefinitely.

The other major conjugation is hamartia, which was a literary term, not an archery one. It was used to describe a single flaw in an otherwise perfect character. Examples would be Achilles' heel or Othello's jealousy. Hebrew literature knew this term in the context that it only took one small flaw to ruin the whole of a man and his entire life, even his noble virtues. For example, if a man's one flaw was jealousy, the fact that he was an honest man, devoted to truth wouldn't redeem him; instead, his honesty and passion for truth would be redirected away from good pursuits toward hunting down an alleged lover who might not actually exist. Hopefully that adds some value to you.

As for "loving others as Christ loved them" - what's your view on how Christ loved them (in a John 13:34-35 context)? Because I very rarely see a good answer to that question.

"I think I was just raped"

1 upvotes · 9 October 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The crazy thing to me is that she actually believed she was raped. I mostly assumed the girls doing this knew they were lying or exaggerating to some degree and on a power trip of some sort. Apparently it's worse than that.

"I think I was just raped"

1 upvotes · 8 October 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Good word.

"I think I was just raped"

1 upvotes · 8 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I can see how that would look creepy. I debated including that for longer than I'd like to admit, but in retrospect, my reasons for keeping were probably unnecessary in light of how the rest of the post unfolded.

At the time, I was more concerned with my wife getting caught in the middle of someone else's drama during a time that she's already way over taxed on her time and stress levels. I wasn't thinking about the guy as much as I was her - to my own discredit.

Looking for a Relationship Tip

1 upvotes · 8 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You should really read all of the sidebar content ;) Just because a lot of it references married people doesn't mean it's irrelevant to singles.

Our Appeal of the Quarantine to the Reddit Admin

1 upvotes · 4 October 2018 · /r/TheRedPill

I'm fully aware. But if you want results, there is a certain amount of tact that must be applied. That's all I'm saying. Here's a good example:

We see no terms in the content policy that we have violated. And yet you allege we have broken this unwritten policy.

You link to the written policy, then call it unwritten. You're probably referring to the unwritten standards that cause them to discriminate against one sub, but not another, but that's not made clear, so it just looks like you're incompetent.

Here's another one:

To me, this seems like an immeasurably bad way to run a social media site which depends on its users for long-term survival.

They have all the data about how this works. They know that even if the outright banned TRP a certain % would still stay on reddit and they wouldn't actually lose that % of users. As for those that do leave permanently (which would be very few), they're inclined to suppose they're the types of users they wouldn't want around anyway. So, you're not proving a point about the financial harm TRP can cause to reddit if the userbase leaves - you're only proving ignorance about how insignificant a ban on TRP would be to reddit's overall profit margins. There are good arguments to make (and you made some), but this isn't one of them.

Here's another one:

Misogyny is a very nebulous term, one that I disagree with heartily.

Your point about it being a nebulous term is a good one. It could range from anything like, "Women are evil and deserve to die" to "Every woman I've ever known has abandoned me, so now I have difficulty trusting women in my life." But when you say you "disagree heartily" with that term - what definition are you going by? You're undermining your own point about it being nebulous by doing this.

To be clear, I'm not saying your post is bad - just that there are lots of pot holes that could be shored up. I wouldn't want to see them miss your major points (which are good) because they get hung up on stupid stuff like this. But in argumentative writing, people will always focus on the small errors to discredit what you have to say rather than addressing the main thrust or admitting you're right.

Feminism changing the modern American woman?

1 upvotes · 1 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

They only die hard if they were the reason you're living. That means you have to find a new purpose in life.

If you're already fully satisfied in Christ you will be fine whether you're single the rest of your life, if your girlfriend dumps you, your wife dies, your kid becomes disabled, or whatever else.

Avoiding awkwardness. We see each other every Sunday.

1 upvotes · 1 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yes, it's all available whether you use the main reddit app or "reddit is fun." They call it community info.

Feminism changing the modern American woman?

1 upvotes · 1 October 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It's not that "many comments are true" - I'd wager virtually all of them are true.

Short story: I was on the road with my wife the other day, driving to my nephew's birthday party. I'm telling her about one of my cases and had to call the client mid-conversation. She was having an issue with the school, so I told her to text me their number and I'd make sure they did what we needed them to do. My wife was a little shocked about this, and said that "we'd be having a very different conversation" and that she "wouldn't stay married to a bully."

Now, I could have defended myself: "You mean you'd rather the school sit idly by while this kid is stuck going home with his abusive father?" and started an argument. I didn't. There was a deeper issue at play. I asked, "So you'd be willing to forego your marriage vows and biblical principles that easily - that if I were too aggressive with people you'd just up and divorce me?" I laughed, poking fun at the fact that she'd obviously boxed herself into a very bad spiritual corner.

Her answer: "No, I meant that I'm glad you're not that way all the time - only when you're on the job, and that you're more gracefully assertive about how you handle our personal affairs. If you were always being pushy in a forceful or blunt way, I'd have a really hard time being married to you. That's all."

See how evasive her answer was? More significantly: my "good Christian wife" is not beyond divorcing me if I deviated too far from her expectations - something she used to say she'd never resort to, no matter what. Her principles were high when we were dating, but hypergamy had its way with her mind during our low years. I'd be truly amazed if I ever found she had cheated on me during that time - but it wouldn't phase me at this point. Why? My shock wouldn't be that she'd have let her hypergamy get the best of her; it would be that she could have hid it from me so well for so long. I now realize that even the most spiritually mature women are susceptible to their base programming ... just as my wife wasn't shocked when she found out I had struggled with porn for several years. She was only shocked that I'd managed to hide it from her for so long. My conversation with her this past weekend was merely another of many sobering reminders that AWALT - even the sweet, innocent ones who in my former judgement I thought could never have been like that.

What's my point here? Do you think I'm fuming at my wife for being so weak and unbiblical that she'd divorce me if I cranked up the assertive pressure on my son's school teacher? Of course not. If it bothered me, I wouldn't have screwed her that night. Women are women. Just accept that you'll never have their permanent, unconditional commitment and enjoy your wife while you can. Trying to keep her from being a woman - from being AWALT - will only increase the risk that she acts that way and leaves. Instead, just stop caring, have fun with life, and let her do what she's going to do. That's going to maximize the chances she wants to stay anyway.

Now, I'm not saying Christian women shouldn't be bent a different way than secular girls. "The Bible says so" can be a motivator for some - even if only slightly. Even more powerful is an in-depth personalization of the reasons why God says so in the first place. But I wouldn't ever become too confident. Embrace women the way they are, and don't try to control them or get mad at them when they're not living up to your expectations. Be happy that they perceive and make decisions in the world a different way than you. That's what makes them women and why we love them. Otherwise you'd have to marry a man ... and I can't endorse that either.

We're talking about practice!?

1 upvotes · 27 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

My favorite evangelism book is Robert Coleman's Master Plan of Evangelism. It takes a very in-depth look at how Jesus went about spreading the good news and how the apostles picked up his method in how they began the church. It also conceptualizes evangelism in a discipleship framework, so you kill two birds with one stone.

Another solid book on evangelism: The Insider by Mike Shamy and Jim Peterson. Master Plan is the framework, The Insider is more of a how-to guide.

Tag: /u/bobbymckee

We're talking about practice!?

1 upvotes · 26 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Paging u/macmeeler

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/26/18)

1 upvotes · 26 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's great to hear! Shoot me your phone number in a PM with some times you'd be available (convert to EST if you can), let me know what country you're in, and give me a bit of background on where you're at spiritually and with your current church as well as any questions you may have up-front.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/26/18)

1 upvotes · 26 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

At least a couple of them are old enough to be able to clean up after themselves, right?

Two of them, yes. I do this most of the time, but they're really slow and don't actually get a good job done. It's helpful, but there are still certain limitations. For example, if they're wiping the milk off the table, they don't have the strength or fingernails to scratch off some of the caked-on bits. So, I always end up having to do a second job after them.

dry-erase chore board

Only one kid can read fluently, so that would be highly unfair to him to have a board that only applies to his chore obligations. Good thought, though! I might have to find another way to communicate it. Maybe pictures to represent chores.

Perhaps you'll do a post sharing what you learned?

Yeah, I've been meaning to finish the 300 series and have just been incredibly lazy on that topic. Anything new I learned will be incorporated as I continue to flesh out the discipleship process there.

Wife pulled a knife on me last night

1 upvotes · 26 September 2018 · /r/askMRP

My response ended up being too long. I'll just make a post out of it. It may not be a popular one, but it's a strategy that can be incredibly effective when dealing with a mentally unstable and hostile wife in divorce litigation. Tag: /u/jakethesnake5000

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/26/18)

1 upvotes · 26 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

OYS #2

Background: 33 years old, 4 kids, 6'0", 240lbs, 37 waist, 16%BF, Married 10 years

Physical

- Last week I upped my max bench to 290. DL/Squat: 365. OHP: 175 (new PR). Barbell Row: haven't tested max lately, but 170 for sets.
- Goals: 300 on the bench by the end of October, 14% body fat by Thanksgiving - I stopped my random interval fasting two weeks ago and need to pick it back up again. Life has been chaotic for the past few weeks, so I've been eating poorly, usually chipotle on the way back from the gym. I really need to get my eating back under control, but as soon as I stop dieting, it becomes twice as hard to pick it back up again. I'm not gaining weight, but I am noticing more inflammation and my old cravings have returned, which I need to kill again.
- Fashion: I bought a couple new outfits and am starting to increase my selection of "Large" size shirts rather than the baggier XLs I had been wearing. I hate the tighter feel to it, but it obviously looks a lot better when I'm wearing clothes that actually fit.
- Income was great during the two trials I went through recently, but took a small dive due to some days I had to take off for a conference. It levels out. Because the trials were so much, I'm probably slightly ahead of my goal for the past month.
- Sex: Due to my wife's 80-100hr work weeks right now, sex is acceptably infrequent. She makes up for it in quality about once a week. I had my sister over last weekend and the night my sister left she called me upstairs wearing lingerie saying, "I've been dying for this all weekend!" Good stuff.

Mental/Emotional

- Most of my reading has been research for my book, but personal reading has been more spiritually inclined than masculine inclined. These balance each other out well, especially given that I'm supplementing with red man group videos while working around the house.

- My frame is solid. I haven't had any real arguments in quite some time, though my wife has been testing how much slack I'll give her. So, my mission is to make disciples. I'll encourage her to join me in that mission. She'll say she doesn't want to, but that she's happy to support me doing it. She's not asking for anything from me or criticizing me - she's just testing how much laziness I will let her get away with. More on that in the mission section.
- I'm more OYS than I've ever been and it hasn't been bothering me, except as to my kids eating cereal. My wife feeds them cereal for breakfast every morning before she goes to work. They make a mess. It's all over the floor, on the table, milk splattered everywhere, etc. By the time I have them all ready for school and dropped off at daycare (or for my son, on the bus) and get back home to get myself ready, the wet cereal is dry and caked onto the table. This gets particularly bad if I have a hearing and don't have time to clean it until I get home from work. Sometimes it's so thick I have to get a dry wall putty scraper to get it off. I'm not sure if I need to set a "no cereal" boundary in the mornings until my wife's off her busy season to clean it up herself, but something's got to change. It's consuming too much time every single day to have to deal with this. So far I've just cleaned it up and don't give it a second thought by the time my wife's home because I've already moved on with my day. But I do notice a subtle frustration growing over time.

Spiritual

- 7 Basics: AoS: 10, QT: 7, BS: 7, SM: 2, Fellowship: 10, Evangelism: 8, Prayer: 2
- Mission: Better than ever. I attended a discipleship seminar last Thursday and a 2-day conference the last couple days. Interestingly, the seminar was more helpful to me on a personal developmental level than the 2-day conference, but I got to bring our executive pastor to the conference, which went a long ways toward getting him on board with the mission of disciple-making and understanding that it's not one component of the Christian life; it's the context in which all other aspects of the Christian life fit in. His goal is for us to start a discipleship ministry in our church within the next 2 weeks, subject to the senior pastor getting on board, which could cause some slight delays. The conference also provided practical input on how to implement this at a church-wide level.
- Mission: Another part to note, per the bit on my wife, above, is that when I was updating her on how the conference went I urged her to look for someone to disciple as well. This was probably poor timing, given her work schedule for the next month. She said she just wants to be a sideline supporter right now and has no interest in discipling anyone. She listed other women in church I should partner with who she thinks would do a better job. This is somewhat absurd, given that I know these other women and my wife is far more equipped. She's thinking in the moment and not long-term. In the moment she can't take on more responsibility, so she can't perceive doing that long-term either. I'm going to have to work out a better strategy to get her on board again, as she used to be. I've done "tell her what" and "show her how," but can't cross the gap into "let her try." I think the solution is going to be joining a co-ed small group so that she can build relationships with other women organically rather than feeling like she has to find someone to disciple just for discipleship's own sake. Then, as she builds those relationships, I can encourage her to take one of the girls in the group out to coffee, then to a movie, then to invite them over for dinner, and let it naturally develop into a discipleship relationship without my wife realizing that's what she's doing - yet she will always come back and tell me what they talked about (she loves doing this) and I can give her better input on how to be more intentional with helping whoever this woman ends up being. I expect that once she's doing it organically again, she'll remember that discipleship doesn't have to be a high-commitment investment in a relationship like she's thinking now because everything else going on right now is high-commitment.
- Mentorship: My executive pastor is discipling me. Going to the conference together gave us some really good time to chat. We had 2.5 hours in the car each way, as well as the evenings at my mom's house, where we stayed while out of town. This also gave me a lot more opportunity to influence him even further toward incorporating my mission of disciple-making as his own now. As I often explain it, I can be a firehose of information. Untended, a firehose sprays every which way. His job is to take everything I have to offer - all of my knowledge, experience, and unbridled passion - and point it toward the fire or throttle the flow to something more manageable.

- Long-Term Goals: While disciple-making is my mission, my vision for carrying it out is to have disciple-makers planted and actively reproducing in 60 countries from my spiritual line by the time I'm 60. I'm 33 now and have 15 of those countries covered - 4 of them having been added in the last year alone. If you want to make discipleship your mission and you live somewhere outside the US and speak fluent English, let me know and I'll make time to train you for a lifestyle of Kingdom building.

What do you think about Objectivism?

1 upvotes · 26 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Cool. I'll read and follow up soon.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/19/18)

1 upvotes · 26 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm glad to hear the changed orientation of your heart. When you get around to recording yourself reading the bible, that can seriously solve your scripture memory issue. I used to do that too, then listen to the recording on loop until I had it all memorized.

What do you think about Objectivism?

1 upvotes · 26 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree.

Women are pigs...

1 upvotes · 24 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm liking all your comments in this thread. Well done.

Dread levels and having an infant (told to chill tf out)

1 upvotes · 23 September 2018 · /r/askMRP

If it works for you, it works for you. I just wouldn't ever assume it's easy to meet a woman who would be naturally inclined that way. In my divorce practice, these are the marriages that end with both parties saying, "Things were fine ... we were just living two separate lives, so we figure it's time to make that official."

Dread levels and having an infant (told to chill tf out)

1 upvotes · 23 September 2018 · /r/askMRP

Ah, then I'd wager we agree. I wasn't suggesting a man tailor his mission to suit his wife; only that he can't expect his mission to contribute to her attraction of him if it's not something she can have any part in.

Imagine if Indiana Jones met the girl and said, "I know you want to come, but I'd really prefer you clean my house and water my plants while I look for the holy grail." Or even worse: he has a map to the holy grail and he tells her, "I'm not really all that interested. I'd much rather focus on getting tenure status as a professor! Isn't that exciting? Wouldn't you love to help me do that?"

Having career aspirations can be a noble goal ... just not an attractive one if that's all you've got going for you - unless what you're doing is truly novel, like starting the next google or something. "I want to qualify for a challenging a competitive, yet relatively common position" just strikes me as normal self improvement, not a life aspiration. Now, if his goal was to use that position to invent a new medicine that saves thousands of lives or reinvent the stock market ... well, that might be a different story. And there are all kinds of scales in between.

But at this point I'm back to arguing against "vacuous missions" so I'll just stop there.

Dread levels and having an infant (told to chill tf out)

1 upvotes · 23 September 2018 · /r/askMRP

Absolutely, I can see many women being attracted to any of those things by getting caught up in the excitement of the competition on that level.

In the reverse, for a time in college I held the position of third in the world for fastest minesweeper time on expert ... but no one was orbiting me over the excitement over whether I could step it up the last place or two. It certainly wasn't going to cause any women to drop their panties for me. I do give a very small niche exception for people like these guys where they're engaging in legit tournaments, however cringe-worthy it may be. But these types of things are so niche that you're extremely limiting yourself to finding a girl in that niche or you're back to the blue pill hope of finding a girl who loves you for the star craft playing champion you are.

Now, when I first gave the world of warcraft example, I wasn't making that up. That was legitimately my neighbor's life mission (though his aspirations were actually higher). He went to Blizzcon (?) in San Diego back in 2015 and made it in some WOW tournament to something like 5th place. He had corporate sponsors who paid for his flight, lodging, food, etc. and bought him a $20,000 gaming computer and contracted with him to pay something like $25k/yr just to post weekly videos about his gaming strategy and plug them every now and then. Yet I often found him on my doorstep in tears wondering why his LDR girlfriend/in-game wife who he'd only met a few times in real life left him for a higher ranked player. If only I knew them what I know now, I might actually have been able to help the poor kid.

All that to say, even non athletic competitors can be exciting to follow if their competition involves actually leaving their basement. But in the context of this conversation, we're not even talking about that. We're literally talking about a guy who is trying to pass off general life obligations and self improvement as his mission - things that, on a categorical level, all men should be doing anyway. That's like a guy saying his life mission is to pass fitness tests and learn to be emotionally composed through his wife's temper tantrums. That's not a mission. It's just part of being a man.

Dread levels and having an infant (told to chill tf out)

1 upvotes · 22 September 2018 · /r/askMRP

Does that include the countless men who have told me their life mission is (to use one of many similar examples) to make the top 100 strongest players list on world of warcraft?

Qualities to look for in the men you spend time with

1 upvotes · 22 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Oooh, I like this! I may steal this sometime ;)

She liked me the whole time!

1 upvotes · 22 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, you're way too hung up on this. I just replied to /u/RedPillWonder with more info, if it helps.

She liked me the whole time!

1 upvotes · 22 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You hit this one out of the park. I actually didn't look at your username and was getting super proud at whatever rando typed all this up, haha. This is the best part:

Finally, unless God has give you clear thoughts and impressions upon your heart about this girl, don't hang around waiting for her.

The clear ONEitis is the biggest struggle I see here. Even if he does start the relationship he's going to be in for some serious, serious disappointments. This post is the definition of "I want to stay blue and just sprinkle some alpha." Actually, I didn't even see the "sprinkle some alpha" part reflected here, other than that he got the confidence to approach. He wants to use red pill strategies to fulfill his blue pill fantasies. This is the danger. OP, this is what I meant when I said "I'm so sorry ..."

That confidence in the approach is great. But what's the point at the end if you're still living in fantasy land? It's just a setup for failure. I'm quite glad she shut him down - not because I wish ill on him, but because it gives him some time to kill the blue and get himself figured out before starting a relationship and ruining it. If she really is a great girl, I'd rather he have a chance when he's ready than to reflect one day, in the words of Tobias Funke, "I'm afraid I prematurely shot my wad on what was supposed to be a dry run, if you will, so I'm afraid I have something of a mess on my hands."

She liked me the whole time!

1 upvotes · 22 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I know ... that's the problem.

She liked me the whole time!

1 upvotes · 22 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Wads of cash like that can't get lethal doses of ONEitis. That's why she'll take the cash.

Purple Pill and the Christian Red

1 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Hah. I wish I had the time to engage in more of these conversations myself. Too much time writing my book on Christian dating and marriage ...

Purple Pill and the Christian Red

1 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Also u/deep_strength - reddit only allows three tags per comment

Purple Pill and the Christian Red

1 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a great response. It reminds me of a lot of my old conversations on r/truechristian with guys like u/fictitiousfishes where we could talk circles around each other just for the fun of it only to discover that we agreed all along, but were coming from two very different avenues to get there. I respect everything you're saying, brother.

Let me also say, thought experiment aside, I also agree that we should not use the word selfish in these kinds of conversations when they come up organically because most people are not in the right spiritual place or frame of mind to utilize that language the way I have been experimentally discussing.

Has she hit a wall or is she really saving herself?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Ah, I totally misread that. Thanks for the clarification! While the fruit of the Spirit can easily be faked by non-Christians (and often is), I do agree that it's one of the easiest filters we can apply to at least sift out the obvious frauds ;)

Has she hit a wall or is she really saving herself?

1 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Great response.

Purple Pill and the Christian Red

1 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good thoughts again :)

I'm still a bit hung up on the word "selfish" though. So ... I'm a branch on the tree, right? So all I care about is what's good for the tree. Why should I care about what's good for the flower bed or the grass if it doesn't benefit the tree? If there's no glory in it for the tree, shouldn't I lack the consideration for those other things out there?

In case I'm not making much sense, should we really care about others in a capacity that doesn't glorify God? Does God do anything apart from his own glory? And if God has a "lack of consideration for others" to the extent that he derives no glory from such consideration, isn't that "selfish"?

This is, of course, related to the age old accusation that God is the chief of all sinners due to his immense pride, wanting to be glorified all the time. And then we say, "But it can't be pride if he deserves it." But yes, it is pride. It's just appropriately placed pride. In the same way, "Isn't God selfish?" Yes, he is selfish. But it's an appropriate selfishness. And if my innermost being is also fully aligned with God to the point that all the desires of my spirit (my flesh notwithstanding) are fully aligned with God's because of the new man he has made of me, then shouldn't I be selfish in those pursuits as well?

"But God loves everyone and wants everyone to be saved - even the people he knows won't be saved." Isn't that a blue pill fantasy, though? Sure, God wants all people to be saved. But at some point God puts his foot down and stops concerning himself with the affairs of many people.

- In the parable of the great banquet the nobleman is so frustrated with the disregard of his wealthy friends that he forbids them from entering. He stops having any care or consideration for them.
- In the parable of the unmerciful servant, the master forgives his servant, then after seeing his unforgiveness imprisons and tortures him for eternity, showing no more care or consideration for that man's well-being.
- There are a handful of passages that say God hates certain people. That's not an easy truth to swallow, and I know all the ways people try to pretend it means God really hates their sin ... but the Bible says what it says.
- Jesus instructed the apostles when they were rejected to wipe the dust off their feet and move on to the next town, showing no care or consideration for that town's salvation or spiritual well-being.
- The very concept of hell in the first place is evidence that at some point God cuts people off and shows no care or consideration.

What I take from all of this is that God's love, affection, and care for humanity only exists in the bounds of his own glory. If it stops glorifying him - if it doesn't benefit him in some way - then God cuts people off. I'm okay with that. Obviously many people are not, which is why there are various theories of universalism running around. But let's be real here: do you really believe universalism has any basis in Scripture? If not, then at some point we must admit that God's selfish - that his consideration for others gets cut off.

To be clear, this doesn't necessarily mean that God stops loving people. Even in hell, God can love someone - or more appropriately: have affection for them. But he stops giving consideration to their wants, needs, desires, feelings, etc. and lets them to themselves for eternity.

I don't mean to propose this as an effort to prove you wrong or anything. I consider it more of a thought experiment. You seem to be quite intelligent and articulate and I'd love to hear what you think on this.

Purple Pill and the Christian Red

1 upvotes · 21 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's for the thoughtful response. The only thing I'll note is that if you're in Christ - fully one with him - then yeah, be all the selfish you want. Because every inclination of your spirit is what Christ would want you doing anyway. The exception, of course, is what comes the flesh, ergo my brief caveat on the dual nature of the flesh and the spirit for Christians.

Purple Pill and the Christian Red

1 upvotes · 20 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I would guess not many. More importantly: have you crossed that line?

"I spoke to a lawyer on Wednesday"

1 upvotes · 18 September 2018 · /r/askMRP

I have a post for that:

https://www.reddit.com/r/DeadBedrooms/comments/760ehc/is_your_wife_disgusted_by_your_touch

Field Report: Beginner Moves - this works!

1 upvotes · 17 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Don't think I need the first

That's pretty ignorant. The title of the book isn't the value of the book. If the book were (more appropriately) titled "How to NGAF and be more alpha" would you think it'd be beneficial then?

An introduction

1 upvotes · 17 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Maybe we need a few posts on how to date for Christian guys

That's a good point. I'm making good headway in my book. Hopefully when I get to the dating section I can cross-post some content onto here. That will still be a few weeks away, though, depending on how quickly I write. My business for the rest of the year just finished on Friday, but now I've got to play catch-up on all the stuff I missed while in trial for 2 weeks. Writing is a fairly low priority at the moment but will rise again on the list soon.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/12/18)

1 upvotes · 13 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for the reply. I understand you may get more specific later, but right now this seems too vague to be useful. "Becoming the (blank) that God wants me to be ...

- What exactly does God want?
- who is that man?
- what does he do?
- how will you know when you become him?
- what impact does that man have on God's kingdom?
- what steps do you have to take today to grow into this man?

I used to be pretty vague with these kinds of things too. I later discovered that it created a subconscious copout where I could do whatever I wanted and not actually make measurable progress while still rationalizing not having an actual direction in life - because I told myself I had a direction, but it was so vague that anything could fit inside. Be cautious not to make my mistake.

When you're standing before God's judgment seat and he asks you, "What did you do with your life? What fruit do you have to show me?" How will you answer? That's your mission. Consider:

- "God, I was a good and moral person." God asks: Okay, and what did you do with that morality to help me?
- "God, I was a leader to my family." Okay, and how is my heavenly kingdom going to be any better off because of it?
- "God, I studied the bible a lot and learned a lot of theology." You're about to have eternity to learn everything you ever wanted to know. What use to me was all that knowledge while you were on earth with very limited time?

There are good answers to all these questions. Do you know them and are you living them?

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/12/18)

1 upvotes · 13 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good stuff here. What's your mission and what steps have you taken to advance it this week?

will there be a difference?

1 upvotes · 13 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That link only shows verses that say lust is wrong. Sure, we can all agree about that. Now what about flirting?

Field Report- Dropping the Betas, Standing my ground.

1 upvotes · 12 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with pretty much all of this. Thanks for the reply!

The only thing that I still question is the viability of the shotgun approach for older men. I do still believe it's valuable - especially so in that an older man doesn't want to get stuck in a 2 year committed relationship with a woman only to find it's not working out and he had nothing else in motion all the while.

By employing the shotgun method, he's keeping his abundance, maintaining a good head about what his actual options are, not feeling "pot committed" on someone just because of the time invested, etc. - which can all lead to an over-commitment in a less than ideal situation. Of course, as you note, he should be up-front: "Until engagement, we're not exclusive." But from there, as you say, once he finds someone he's ready to pull the trigger on, it makes sense to hop straight into an engagement, which would be natural if they'd had that connection beforehand.

What I'm suggesting is really a modified version of courtship. I've known several churches (including one of my old pastors) who preach this method and had found spouses that way. They just had a lot of "friends." It was understood that sometimes these "friendships" were looking to see if something more could develop, but there was no exclusivity. At some point, when vetting was done, it hopped straight from "friends" to engagement. I'm simply proposing that instead of hiding what's going on by calling it "friends" we just call it what it is: they're dating. And instead of saying to have lots of "friends" we simply say: "have lots of people you're dating."

Field Report- Dropping the Betas, Standing my ground.

1 upvotes · 12 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I can only go on the information you give.

Living in Christ's Frame - Defeating the Anger Stage and Finding Emotional Stability

1 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I look forward to it.

Lift, Faggot, Lift

1 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Good point.

Lift, Faggot, Lift

1 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Rather than using weight as a standard for cutting (which can be easily fabricated through overeating), I'd use strength benchmarks. I used to say to myself, "Don't even say the word cut until you're benching 300," but it eluded me for too long, so I eventually caved and started cutting. Now that I'm back on again, I'm seeing that I should have just stuck to my original goal, as the plateau wasn't as hard to break as I thought - 10lbs away now, then another cut.

[FR] "Lost" Frame for the First Time in a Long Time.

1 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Agreed, ergo my response to him ;)

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/05/18)

1 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for the OYS! A few things to keep an eye on:

Cologne she loves, some new clothes that she likes

That's evidence of living in her frame. It doesn't matter that she likes it. It's more the fact that you seem to be proud of pleasing her with these things - enough that you commented here in a way that emphasizes this. Saying you wear cologne and some new clothes would have sufficed. Of course, it also could have hidden the frame issue that needed to be called to attention.

She told me this past week "you will be hotter than me soon"

Again, this is an indication that there's a frame issue - that her perception of your hotness is the standard you're using to judge yourself, which is why it triggers something in you that she won't admit your SMV is higher. Of course, why would she? That would be ceding some of her power.

Never in person, I think she's afraid I might try to initiate Well ... do you? Why would she be afraid of this?

she loves me, but she doesn't want to have sex with me ... emotional affair

Ouch. ILYBINILWY.

super horny, and then cold as ice

Any chance this is on a monthly cycle? Or are you talking hours/days?

Spiritual - not good

This needs ironed out first. What's your mission? What steps have you been taking to live it out? How have you been leading your wife to join you in that mission? These are the core questions that I believe will have the strongest impact on fixing your marriage. I wrote more about this earlier today in another comment here. In short, your wife is bored. Yeah, you're a great guy, but she's lost the excitement. At 6 years of marriage, this is incredibly common. That's why 7 years of marriage is the most common time-frame I see people getting divorced (I'm a divorce attorney). Usually at 2 years they realize the emotional fuzzies are gone, they spend another 2 years fretting over why they're gone. They spend another 2 years being bitter, but trying to make it work, sometimes thinking that having kids will solve the problem. Then, by year 7, when they realize all else has failed, they file for divorce. Don't let it get there. Nip this in the bud. Find your mission, start pursuing it, invite her along, keep improving yourself along the way, give her something in you to keep chasing.

I have trouble maintaining my frame

Thank you for acknowledging this.

I'm known by all our friends to be "bear strong" "Mr fix it" "Crazy about my wife" (breakfast in bed multiple times a week)

Yeah, stop supplicating. Why isn't she bringing you breakfast in bed?

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/05/18)

1 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Solid OYS. Just going through this after not being all that active for a few days.

struggle with depressive thoughts

How so?

Progress on the book I'm writing is slow this week due to ...

And you just reminded me to stop making excuses for my slow progress too! What's your book on? Writing is definitely tough when engaged in a long-project. It's totally different from posts/comments on reddit, which can often just roll indefinitely.

Am discipling a couple of people informally

That's awesome to hear! What's your strategy/plan to move them forward? What short-term goals do you have for them?

Memorization is doing better than it has in a long time.

This is wonderful to hear. Scripture memorization is incredibly under-valued in the church, especially in the age of cellphone bibles where people don't feel the need to commit things to heart because they can look it up. They don't understand the true value of memorizing Scripture - that it's not about being able to summon a passage at will, but it's about how you spiritually ingest it, mulling it over in your head periodically throughout the day, letting God's Word transform you. This just can't happen when you have the attitude, "I'll just look it up when I need it." Chances are, you won't remember to do so when you actually need it.

Field Report- Dropping the Betas, Standing my ground.

1 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Just because a feminist might say it doesn't make it a feminist statement. I'm sure feminists would say the sky is blue, but that doesn't mean the concept is a feminist one.

If one wants to argue that ending one relationship to immediately begin another time and again because she keeps finding something better or more interesting, they're welcome to it, I'd simply say don't be surprised if her actions after marriage mirror her dating life.

I agree with this concept whole-heartedly. I just didn't get the impression that this girl had a history of hopping from guy to guy to guy.

Besides, are you trying to make an argument that Not-AWALT and that the guy should keep looking for a unicorn who would never branch swing? Under the "premature commitment" model of dating, all of those women would be taken up or jaded once they have their first boyfriend, so you'll likely never find one anyway, unless you meet her in her mid-teens.

I suspect this strongly colors your opinion on this issue.

This could well be. I know my wife was adamant that she only ever wanted to date one guy in her life. She fulfilled that goal. She later decided it was a stupid goal and that she would raise her kids to get a better picture of what they like and not before blindly committing like that. Of course, I agree with the conclusion, but for different reasons, though I certainly understand where she's coming from, as I also had a very limited dating history before getting together with my wife (only 1 other). That's not to say we're unhappy by any means. It's merely to say that there were undue complications that neither of us were prepared for - things that weren't resolved until I stepped up to the plate and started taking care of business.

Not to mention human nature being what it is, it's not always easy for many to date and keep it casual without one's emotions getting intertwined with another, and then it leading to heartbreak and other negative consequences that may be carried forward into future relationships.

Perhaps, but I do make the assumption that men on this sub are sufficiently cautioned against this type of ONEitis.

Just be honest and upfront

I agree as to the couple in the relationship itself. The issue is that OP was a third party who wasn't in the relationship. He couldn't re-define the context of their relationship for them. So, he has a choice to make: (1) treat them like they're engaged when they're not, or (2) treat them like they're in the exploratory phase of figuring out who's marriage-material and not. Between the two assumptions, the second makes more logical sense to me for the outsider to go by. Getting all wound up in what they might be thinking would be operating in their frame.

More to the point, acta non verba. Maybe the girl and her boyfriend had a verbal understanding of their commitment level, but if OP hits on her and she's ready to leave her boyfriend, how much commitment was there in actuality? And if she was only committed in word, but not in heart and behavior, then is there really any harm done? I get your point about character - that a man should be cautious of a woman who willy-nilly breaks commitments like that. But again, if the commitment was only in word and she was never actually invested as deeply in heart and action, then does this reflect as poorly on her character for commitment-breaking? Certainly it reflects poorly on her character for honesty about how committed she actually is, but she hasn't broken a strong commitment in the first place, so it's less cause for concern from that angle.

But again, a lot of this comes back to AWALT and whether a man should be looking for unicorns. I still agree that OP screwed up in how he handled the situation, but apparently on different grounds :p

When I talk about dating (unless I reference something casual), I think of an exclusive commitment in dating that person and seeing whether they are or are not someone to marry.

What you're describing is the sniper methodology of dating. Or maybe trying to use a shotgun to snipe. Giving the benefit of the doubt, I assume you're suggesting that one apply a shotgun mentality to getting a girlfriend - abundance, putting yourself out there, etc. If you differ on even that point, we've got bigger things to talk about ;) After the "getting a girlfriend" point, it seems like your view is once you actually hit something with a pellet, a guy should offer up all of his commitment, putting all his eggs in that one basket until he figures out whether or not that's the best long-term option. I don't know that I can support this method. It seems way too blue, relying on ideologies that are unlikely to be helpful, long-term.

It also seems to create more of a distraction than a help to a man's mission. If the man applies a true shotgun mentality, he (presumably, if he's high value) has enough abundance that any one relationship will not consume his time, energy, etc. away from his mission for Christ. As a practical reality, when a man prematurely commits to an exclusive relationship with a woman, life becomes about that relationship. In order that the couple aren't wasting their time, all of their energies have to be re-focused on figuring out whether or not the relationship is really a good long-term option - and that's even IF they can manage to avoid having ONEitis and infatuation with each other. If it doesn't work out, assuming the guy did have abundance, he's quickly in the next relationship. The result is that he engages in a pre-marital pattern of serial monogamy that ultimately has his life focused on hopping from girl to girl to girl until he can finally find his helper ... all the while, his mission is side-lined, crippling his ability to vet the woman for whether she'll be a good helper for that mission in the first place - which is why I suggest men use their mission as the context for meeting these women. But I also suggest that guys not enter into a string of committed relationships with exclusivity until they're really darn sure they've met the girl they're going to marry, at which point the exclusive bit should be merely to give them time to get things in order before announcing the engagement.

To be clear, I'm not saying I think a guy should never be in an exclusive committed relationship. There is certainly value in exclusivity as you approach the marriage phase. But, in my view, this phase is best reserved for engagement or a very brief time preceding engagement as the couple prepares for marriage.

If you continue to date them, it's with the understanding that you still consider them someone you're thinking of moving forward with, with an eye (but not an obligation) toward marriage and progressing toward that point.

I'm not sure why you would enter into an exclusive committed relationship without marriage being an explicit intended outcome of the relationship. What are you actually "committed" to if not to the concept of marrying the other person?

- "We're committed to each other - to being exclusive" - okay, but why? What is that exclusivity actually accomplishing? I suppose you could be testing whether or not someone will break a commitment to exclusivity, but how long do you have to remain "exclusive" to really test this fully? Most women don't cheat within the first 5 years of marriage - only after things fall apart. Should everyone be "exclusive" for a decade before marrying in order to test this?
- "It's a way to test marriage before it happens" - you've got to know that argument is total garbage (not to straw man). In no world does any form of pre-marital relationship actually resemble marriage, even when the couple lives together.
- "It's to protect emotions. If there was no commitment to exclusivity, we'd all be worried about losing the other person to someone else all the time." First, what's so bad about that? Doesn't that cause people to strive to excel, as they should pattern themselves to doing before the marriage so they can keep it up during the marriage? Second, most relationships end because someone concludes a better opportunity is available (whether it's immediately present or not), showing that the commitment is a sham in the first place. It's merely a way of saying, "I'll be exclusive as long as you're my best option." This is true for both guys and girls - and if there are better options elsewhere, why would you want to commit in exclusivity anyway? That just doesn't make sense. Third, who are we kidding? The fact that pre-marriage, pre-engagement relationships have such great commitment is precisely what causes so much emotional harm. No one's emotions are being protected by maintaining commitment to exclusivity out of turn.

Moving on, let me note two things:

- I know your original comment was more about the character issue than developing a model of dating. But in the context of this conversation, I'm not sure how we really separate the two concepts when the character issue is directly tied to how one views a model of dating.
- Also, I'm speaking somewhat off-the-cuff here. I know there are holes in some of what I'm saying, but I'm saying it anyway - not because I'm committed to every view I've expressed here, but because laying out an idea, for better or worse, is how we flesh out truth, and to some extent I'm using you/this conversation to help me figure this out so I can give wise advice to other guys in the future.

Thanks, brother!

[FR] "Lost" Frame for the First Time in a Long Time.

1 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I haven't posted on it, but it certainly would make a good one. I suppose I'm just not as fascinated ... at least not enough to put in the time.

[FR] "Lost" Frame for the First Time in a Long Time.

1 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Indeed, a wonderful case-in-point.

[FR] "Lost" Frame for the First Time in a Long Time.

1 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Yes.

Field Report- Dropping the Betas, Standing my ground.

1 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good response. The only thing I'll note is that "every appearance of evil" is a poor translation. It's more accurate to say type, kind, incarnation or the like. Or if one insists on the word "appear," you could say, "avoid every time evil appears."

Field Report- Dropping the Betas, Standing my ground.

1 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I very much respect this application of 1 Cor. 8. Indeed, OP is showing that he is not as mature as I assume of most men here. Perhaps I should just stop giving the benefit of the doubt altogether. Like Paul, I like to get to the meat, but it can kill a baby to do that if they are too young and can only take milk.

Field Report- Dropping the Betas, Standing my ground.

1 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This would make sense to me if dating was about finding commitment as fast as possible. That's a very feminist way to look at it though. Women want commitment, men want sex. Why do you think dating went from "figure out what you like and not" to "dating is about commitment"?

See my other reply to you on someone else's comment, but suffice it to say that we should not encourage a model of dating that emphasizes commitment earlier than it belongs, defeating the purpose of dating in the first place. That's very dangerous.

That said, the way OP went about it was tactless and wrong.

Tag: u/deep_strength

Field Report- Dropping the Betas, Standing my ground.

1 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You're welcome to comment any time, Christian or not. The first half of this comment is rock solid. The second half has some good points too, though I question the level of actual commitment people should have prior to engagement.

After all, the main point of dating is to get to know what's out there and figure out what you like. Suppose someone (like my wife) views dating as a high commitment endeavor with incredible loyalty that must be associated with it. She finds her first boyfriend (me) and feels undue pressure from this hypothetical self-imposed obligation to stay loyal and committed. How likely is she to leave if it's a bad thing? How likely is she to be honest or hide things to make it work? If she does leave, won't that make her feel jaded for assuming there was more commitment than intended? Once they're married, will that leave her wondering what could have been if she'd only looked around and not jumped head first into assuming "dating" or being bf/gf meant high commitment?

By treating the bf/gf relationship like a mini pre-engagement we really do a great disservice to the point of dating in the first place. It creates unhealthy premature bonds. This presumptuous over commitment caused a lot of problems for my wife and our marriage that I'd rather others not bear through - and that's even with us getting married! How much harder or more destructive that premature over commitment must be if it results in a breakup.

Tag: u/redpillwonder and u/deep_strength - I'll let this serve as my response to your comments. I stand by my suggestion: if there's no ring, people should have the freedom to explore what they like and not. I wouldn't want to encourage people to have ideologies of commitment levels in dating that (especially en masse) can be very destructive in marriage, as was true in my case.

Field Report- Dropping the Betas, Standing my ground.

1 upvotes · 11 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Be cautious with the insults. Again: practice humility. Don't let your pride get the better of you. All you're doing is breaking frame by showing that their comments are getting to you. Remember WISNIFG. You have no obligation to respond. Practice some fogging here too. It will be helpful later.

Should a man be friends with women he doesn't intend to marry? Let's chat.

1 upvotes · 10 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I think you may be confusing preselection with passive dread. They're closely related, so I can see why. Preselection only occurs when one woman sees you in the company of other women. Passive dread is when a man's status inherently causes his wife/LTR to be conscious of the fact that other women would want him, whether she observes it or not. Active dread, by contrast, is when a guy actively causes his wife to believe this by some direct and intentional act. Neither active nor passive dread requires any other women actually to be involved.

Another significant distinction is that dread's power comes from the woman's drive to want to keep her man loyal to her - to give him a motive or reason not to go with the other girls she suspects he could get. Preselection, however, is more about the man himself. It tells a woman that there's more to him that she was previously aware. This works on LTRs/wives when a man improves himself and she isn't seeing it yet. The fact that other women are taking notice matters. To that end, it doesn't matter that the women show him a particular kind of attention, only that they show him attention at all, because most women know (without being willing to admit it) that they generally ignore guys who are unattractive in the first place, often finding them creepy or gross or awkward.

Should a man be friends with women he doesn't intend to marry? Let's chat.

1 upvotes · 9 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a good point.

Introduction + Question

1 upvotes · 8 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I don't know how I replied to another comment in this thread without actually reading the post itself. Sorry about that - I must have been in a rush at the time.

So how do I build up my girlfriend?

The 300 series is the place to start. Get yourself there, then ask her to start doing all of those things with you. Read 205 and 208 for more information on the way you invite her to join you. (1) Find the most effective strategy for leading her, then (2) follow the step-by-step outline Jesus gave for how he raised up his disciples.

As for what values to instill in her other than spiritual maturity, I'll defer to any content that u/RedPillWonder puts out - he's got some good things to say on what to look for in a potential spouse. Even better is if you look at those things as to what you want to lead your potential spouse into.

I think my lack of knowledge in this area is related to my lack of knowledge around discipleship in general.

That's a fair point. Most people are relatively clueless. I can send you my book on it if you want to PM me your e-mail address. The 300 series covers the first phases of this process. I always spend the first 6-12 months with any guy I disciple working through the 7 basics. It's not just a matter of teaching people what it is - discipleship isn't about education, it's about transformation. They aren't ready to move forward until they've mastered each of those things and it becomes second-nature to them when a context arises for them to practice it. So, if someone struggles with having a regular quiet time (assuming they're in season for it), then they haven't moved past that part yet, even though they may otherwise be fully aware of how to have a quiet time and have done many. At this phase, the 7 basics should be more geared toward instilling these spiritual disciplines as an underlying way of life than about merely learning what they are and how to do them. That's why it's impossible to disciple someone in an online forum like this.

Introduction and Backstory

1 upvotes · 8 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well said.

Should a man be friends with women he doesn't intend to marry? Let's chat.

1 upvotes · 8 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I completely agree with the premise of what you're saying. But I do think you're talking about something that transcends friendship. As such, we're talking about two different things.

I'm also not sure how you interpret "cleave to your spouse" (or more accurately: "join with") as "separate from everyone else." Putting on my pants doesn't mean taking off my shirt, right?

Should a man be friends with women he doesn't intend to marry? Let's chat.

1 upvotes · 8 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well ... that's true at least for friendships among men. "Girl time" is often encouraged on a societal level.

Should a man be friends with women he doesn't intend to marry? Let's chat.

1 upvotes · 8 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I understood Stryker to be using a far more intimate definition of friendship. I agree with most of your points, but still don't see the Scriptural basis for it. I do appreciate the attempted reference to Jesus - and you're absolutely right to point out that Jesus had more male friends than women, but that doesn't mean he didn't have close relationships with certain women as well. They're not going to be the koinonia "one in spirit and in purpose" relationships that Jesus was trying to foster with the 12 ... but that's way beyond friendship in the first place.

Should a man be friends with women he doesn't intend to marry? Let's chat.

1 upvotes · 8 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is an interesting response. Are you suggesting a man can't be friends with his mother or sister?

Should a man be friends with women he doesn't intend to marry? Let's chat.

1 upvotes · 8 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed 100%.

OYS on Red Pill Christian

1 upvotes · 7 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks! It looks like whatever the last thing I did was, it ended up working, as the post came through. I may just not have been giving my tests enough time. I do appreciate the offer, though!

Should a man be friends with women he doesn't intend to marry? Let's chat.

1 upvotes · 7 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

What you're describing far transcends friendship - even what I would call "close friends." You're talking about a koinonia "one in spirit and in purpose" bond between two people. Even that is not prohibited in scripture between the sexes (I'd suggest it's even encouraged). Your argument so far is predominantly philosophical in nature ... so let me just ask: is there scripture to support this conclusion?

NoFITS September Update

1 upvotes · 7 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Are they joining you on your mission yet? Get them doing that first, then decide if you want to date them. If your mission isn't something that requires help from a woman, then you're thinking too small or you don't need a helper in the first place.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/05/18)

1 upvotes · 5 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm glad to hear this report! Have you always had a fear of heights?

Also, do you feel like God's calling you to improve your quiet time depth and frequency, or that he intentionally has you focusing on things like Scripture memory, prayer, and fellowship for now?

Props for the evangelistic effort with that kid! Whether he knows it or not, your influence in his life can be the single most important thing he's got going for him.

OYS - Where Progress is Made (09/05/18)

1 upvotes · 5 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

PHYSICAL

- My lifts are solid. I'm expecting to top my ORM on the bench this week (hoping to go from 285 to 290) with a goal to hit 300 by the end of October. My squat and deadlift has fallen since my car accident on July 4 (vehicle totaled), but my doctor cleared me last Wednesday to start doing those again and I'm right back to doing the same reps/sets I've always done, so I didn't lose much ... it's just harder to do it than it was before.
- I haven't checked my body fat % lately, but I know I'm down another belt loop from where I was last month.
- My diet has been per my post on "random interval fasting" - it's working quite well.
- Struggle: I'm not employing much kino or initiating sex often. Part of this is because I just don't feel like it with how busy I am (I have two cases going to trial between now and 9/14). The other part is that she's working 80-100 hours a week right now - and will be until 10/15. She initiates about once a week and gets really into it when she initiates. Beyond that, there are probably 1-2 times extra that I've gotten horny but haven't initiated. I'm not sure how to balance my sexual drive with her legitimately exacerbating work schedule. Am I in her frame for holding back so she can get stuff done? Maybe. It hasn't bothered me yet, it's just something I've noticed. I'll continue to monitor. Feedback is welcome.
- Time management and income are great. I've been more productive at work these last few weeks than normal, giving a needed boost to our budget as we prepare our house for sale next year.
- I am exhausted far more often, so with limited exception, I've been falling asleep a lot sooner than before, which is both good and bad. My most productive hours are after everyone else goes to bed, but my body is also needing the extra energy after the simultaneous work and gym fatigue, hitting me both mentally and physically almost every day. Struggle: I need to find a better balance of getting necessary sleep while also remaining productive between now and 9/14 when my trials are over. Perhaps less time on Reddit is the answer.

MENTAL/EMOTIONAL

- Most of my "reading" time has been redirected toward research for my book. So, it's very targeted reading with a specific purpose, often reviewing old content that I want to reference as inspiration. Note: This has been very beneficial in drudging up concepts that I thought I'd mastered only to realize I'd forgotten to keep applying them. Back to work.
- My frame is stronger than it's ever been. I feel in control of my own world and my wife readily joins me in it. She commented recently how happy she is to be with a guy who "has it all together" and how she gets to brag about me to all the other girls at work who whine, "How do you do this [busy season] with 4 kids? It doesn't even seem possible!" Note: This reminded me of my post on the comparison game. She thought she was winning, which is fine. But at the end of the day, I'm not here to impress her friends. I'm here for my mission and to own my domain, and it's only a passive byproduct that she gets to brag to her friends. I'm continually pulling her away from other people's frame (i.e. trying to impress them) and into mine ... still some work to do there.
- Leadership in the home is going strong. My wife's work schedule has probably helped this a good bit, reigning in the 1,000 foot rope at super speed. She no longer has any interest in fitness tests or to question what I'm doing. There's no more stream of: "Make sure the girls brush their teeth" or "Don't forget to pack She just accepts that I have a plan and that my plan gives her sufficient time to get her work done, so she rolls with it. I'm hopeful that post-10/15 this ongoing precedent will continue and she will not regress into wanting to tweak and adjust and nitpick. Regardless, even before her busy season started, the nit-picking was greatly reduced from a year ago.
- I have a strong internal emotional security right now. Even in the midst of both of our crazy work schedules and the demands of having 4 young children, for whom I take primary responsibility, the stress just rolls off like butter. All my life I've been a low-stress guy, but in light of the present pressures I do feel like I'm breaking new ground.

SPIRITUAL

- 7 Basics
 - Assurance of Salvation: 10 - This is generally unfaltering. I'm continually bearing good fruit and God is affirming me in this.
 - Quiet Time: 7 - I miss days here and there. It's not a strict routine for me every day, as I spend time with God in other ways.
 - Bible Study: 10 - Especially on days when I miss a quiet time, I'm spending focused time in the word, digging deep into new concepts. Sometimes this is researching for my book, but it's most often related to answering questions from the myriad of people who ask them, most often IRL, but occasionally here or through my involvement with gotquestions.com as well.
 - Scripture Memory: 2 - I haven't invested much into this lately, though as I study the Word I've been creating a better memory for where frequently relevant passages can be found so I don't have to look them up in the future - I just know, "Oh, that's John 17" or whatever. It's not actually memorizing the passage, but memorizing where things can be found in the Bible has been useful as well. I'm okay with this being a 2 for now.
 - Fellowship: 9 - A few months ago this would have been much lower, but I've started building connections with some of the other guys at my gym and most recently got a purple pill Christian friend of mine (not that he knows those terms) to start driving 25 minutes to work out at my gym with me at least once a week. This has led to some great conversation and male bonding that I had been missing for a while. Also, weekly meetings with the new (add-on, not replacement) pastor at our church has been very refreshing and encouraging. I think I red pill'd him last week and I'm eager to see what he's been doing with that knowledge ... but it was somewhat mind-shattering for him in a good way. The concept of "treat my wife like Jesus interacts with the church" was somehow totally foreign to him, especially as to all of the hard-line boundaries Jesus creates for the church. His marriage could use a 3-part field report in itself, it's that complicated, but if he can avoid going Rambo I think he's on the right track. Either way, having two guys in-person who I can discuss RPC content with openly is quite refreshing.

- Evangelism: 1 - I have not been building new relationships with non-believers. Even the non-believers presently in my life are somewhat distant right now. Most of my efforts lately have been working with building up existing believers. Evangelism was pretty high about 6 months ago, so I'm not worried about it being in a low point today. After all, once people come to Christ there has to be a shift toward discipling them before going back to evangelism with others.
- Prayer: 5 - This is up from where I was a month ago, but still pretty weak. I'm being more intentional about lifting things up to God throughout the day as the thought crosses my mind, rather than letting it pass; but on the whole, I'm not making an intentional point to set aside time for this, nor am I incorporating it into my Bible study time - only quiet times, in which prayer is relatively short-lived.
- As noted above, I'm making giant strides in advancing my mission and getting others in my church on board. I also visited a church in my hometown recently (I disciple a guy who goes there and wanted to meet up with him) and they are trying to recruit me for a discipleship conference they're organizing later this month. I'm planning on accepting the invite, which should give me an opportunity to train several pastors on how to incorporate discipleship into their churches and also hone my ability to communicate the same message to the pastors in my own home church as well.
- I'm also going to be participating in (possibly co-leading, it's undecided) a small group leader training through my church later this month. My recently pseudo-red-pill'd pastor has asked me to oversee the small group ministry at our church alongside him, so I'm assuming this will be a starting point for working together in that role, which we'll discuss when we meet up in a couple hours.

I look forward to reading the other comments in this thread! Leave some feedback as you feel led.

NoFITS September Update

1 upvotes · 5 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for the update!

NMMNG

The point of the book revolves around breaking the nice-guy paradigm, which many men are stuck in. The core concept is that "nice guys" really aren't all that nice at all because they live with hidden expectations (covert contracts) and become bitter and act out when their expectations aren't met. They believe that by acting nice and hiding their flaws people must love them, give them affection, or somehow that they deserve more sex from their girlfriend, wife, etc. from it. The solution is to be a little bit more of a jerk - a concept that most foreign men (especially Christians) simply cannot fathom.

No, I did not do most of the exercises.

WISNIFG

Glad you're going through it! Interestingly enough, the concept of feeling guilty for saying no is really only alluded to in the first 3 chapters. The value of the book is in the conflict-resolution strategies presented, most notably being fogging and negative inquiry.

Alphaness

WISNIFG is another good starting point. Again, it gives techniques on being assertive, which is a base-line character trait to develop alphaness, though it's certainly not all-encompassing. MMSLP covers it a lot better and should be your next read after WISNIFG (I always recommend the trilogy in that order). Even though I get that you're single, it will still be useful in preparation - just be cautious in that it's a fairly explicit book at times, in case your self-control is pretty low.

STFU

Sounds like you've made good progress with this. I'm glad you're learning to employ this with a frame of humility and love. That can be tricky to do for some.

Game

So this area could use some work for you.

offered an neighboring female acquaintance the spare seat

That's a "nice guy" move. Clearly you missed the point of NMMNG ;)

More playfully, see her hovering, interrupt her, say, "I know you were dying to sit next to me, but this seat's taken by my grandpa's ghost. He should be back from the bathroom any minute now." Or just make up some other off-the-wall comment. The point of game at this stage isn't to learn how to talk to women; it's to learn how to talk to them in a way that lets them know you DNGAF.

obvious conversations but out of respect for the BP dude i avoided it

Why do you respect him? Your later statement makes more sense - that it wasn't worth it to you. But even then, your rationale is because of his potential white-knighting. I'm not sure you're using that phrase right (I think you mean mate-guarding - don't worry, the mods are working on a glossary to help!), but the concept puts you in his frame. Your actions are decided by how you think he would react. If you want to talk to her, go talk to her. They're not married.

hot atheist chick ... I started evangelizing, and she started thinking about Christianity ... again, not my priority, mission 1st

Well done on your priorities and sharing the Gospel! Perhaps she could be someone you "raise up" to be worth dating someday. Just make sure the evangelism precedes the dating (i.e. no evangedating).

What books to read for alphaness after WISNIFG, Rollos books? gimme something good.

It sounds like NMMNG went over your head or you just didn't know how to connect the deeper content to your personal life, so I'd go back there too. But MMSLP goes a lot more into the differences between alpha and beta. I'd recommend that before Rational Male, though they're both solid as far as non-Christian content goes.

Is it true Frame is more important than Game and Fitness etc?

In my view, game is a subset of frame. But yes, frame is probably the single most important thing in attracting women and keeping them attracted to you. It's what gets them on board with your mission. It's what provides them the comfort they need to stay committed. It's what shows them how tough you are and how sexy that can be. Just don't confuse "frame" with being a cold, emotionless robot. Frame isn't about how you express your emotions. It's about your identity, reason for living, and determination to pursue that reason.

Any other things you can point out, let me know

See above. Also, the way you write communicates an incredible and unwarranted pride and arrogance (especially the Prov. 26:4-5 comment, but many other insinuations here too). I want to give you the benefit of the doubt and assume you're writing that way to try to impress a bunch of guys on the internet, but that you actually have some humility in real life. Don't feel like you have to impress us. We're not your judge. You're not even your own judge. That position is reserved for God. So, just be straight-forward.

Thank you for the September update :) I really appreciated reading this and hopefully this helps nudge you forward a bit.

I'm still single ... just married [MRP Draft]

1 upvotes · 5 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks! Outline sent.

As for an interview, I'm happy to join in. I've really enjoyed your videos, and have even incorporated pieces from them into the outline I sent. Skype could be a little tricky, as I don't have a webcam, so I'd have to do it on my phone, though I'm willing to make it work if that's your preferred option. Recording with pics is fine too.

Will I see the questions/topics in more detail in advance to help prep or is it more spontaneous?

As for timing, due to a few trials coming up, among other things, late-October or especially early-November would be ideal. Let me know if you'd prefer to do it sooner than that and I'll see what I can do.

I'm still single ... just married [MRP Draft]

1 upvotes · 4 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed. I'll be happy to get your assistance once I've got a first draft done. I may even bounce some ideas off of you before then. To that end, would you be interested in perusing my outline for structural issues and missing content? I'm probably 25% done with the first draft, but I'd rather figure out the overarching stuff sooner rather than later in order to avoid having to do major re-writes on structural stuff ex post facto.

As for u/Rollo-Tomassi, I'd love to get insights from him as well. I tend to connect with his thinking style better than any of the other content in the manosphere. That said, I don't anticipate much overlap. He commented here that his book will be "From a secular perspective to Christian men." Mine will be from a biblical perspective to Christian men. That said, I did use Rational Male: Book 1 as a heavy source of inspiration for the first half of my final outline before I started drafting.

Phil's July update

1 upvotes · 4 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Props for another good update, Phil. I'm glad to see you're still making some good progress. Your OHP is now up to what I do for sets, so good job there! You're pushing me to up my game again and shoot for 175 today :) I am a little curious at the ratio, though - your bench is just shy of 100lbs less than mine (I'm back up to 285), but your OHP is at where I am. I must have weak shoulders!

I'm recognizing this and working on it

That's huge. Well done. Now, as you note, the next step is the follow-through.

If I should focus on all of them, just one of them, or none of them.

Pick one and start there. If you find you don't care for it, move on. If you do like it, keep doing it and decide at that point whether or not you want to add something else.

Married Man With Girl Friends

1 upvotes · 3 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Play, "Hi, have you met Ted?" with her ... just with other girls, not other guys. I've done this a few times with my wife. She felt like she was on the outside from the "popular" girls in church. Neither of us really ever talked to them. We walked by them in church one day. I introduce myself and my wife, then excuse myself to go talk to someone else, leaving her there to talk to them.

To be clear, my wife is insanely introverted and is an internal processor. That's the type of thing she's typically afraid of. But when she realizes (1) that she can hold a conversation with these girls on her own, and (2) that these other girls aren't as stuck up and snobby as she thought (only a couple of them were), she became far more comfortable and started initiating conversations more and more with some of them after that.

New Here and Relieved to Find This Sub

1 upvotes · 2 September 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Short on time right now, but I fully endorse the Navigators - and I was even on staff for a time. Not everyone there is perfect, but I've yet to find a better organization at helping people discover and develop a biblical life mission. Some of the content on this sub even originated from my time with the Navigators. I still keep in touch semi monthly with the Nav guy who first discipled me in college 15 years ago.

Curious: is the guy who contacted you named Nate or Ivan? It's doubtful they'd know me, but I'm familiar, at least by name, with a lot of the staff - especially those in Colorado. Last I knew, they were the guys doing Nav20s out that way.

Financial prep for marriage?

1 upvotes · 31 August 2018 · /r/askMRP

More to u/JDRoedell - that tactic would never work anyway. My office had a case exactly like that. The court considered it a technical defect to an otherwise legitimate marriage. Having a ceremony is enough that it can screw a guy if the court wants to.

Also, even if you don't have the ceremony, we had one where they started filing taxes jointly and that was enough for them to be deemed legally married. Common law marriage being revoked is merely a facade, based on some of the stories I hear and see.

Financial prep for marriage?

1 upvotes · 31 August 2018 · /r/askMRP

To /u/wtg2989:

This is a good answer. A pre-nup is doable, but it is very difficult to draft them in a way that will actually be upheld. I've never had one of mine overturned (not to say it won't ever happen), but here's what I make sure to include:

- An exhibit at the end outlining all known assets and liabilities of both parties showing the institution, last 4 digits of the account number, amount, and date of valuation. This exhibit also has a stipulation for the other side to sign that they have personally reviewed your statements and assured with their own eyes that the numbers are accurate and that they have no reason to believe you have any assets and/or liabilities not mentioned on the sheet. You'd have to be an idiot to hide a premarital asset anyway - the more you disclose on the sheet the better.

- It's got to have a paragraph defining "income" for support purposes. Do you want to include phantom stock options? Do you want to include personal injury settlements? Do you want to include untaxable sources of income? Do you want to include passive income from assets regardless of whether or not you withdraw it from the asset? Make your definition very clear.
- Still on support: make sure you have a mutual stipulation of each of your anticipated earning potentials. Inflate your earning potential as much as possible within reason. Have her agree, "I understand that with his career he may be able to earn up to $400,000 annually as an accountant, and I still agree to these restrictions on spousal support even in that situation." But don't say "up to $400,000 annually if he ever changes career paths from his current profession of being a janitor" - no court will buy that. If you're a janitor, put the maximum income a managerial janitor could potentially earn ... who knows, in some prestigious places that could well be over $100,000 anyway.
- Make sure to include a provision specifically acknowledging that nothing in the agreement intends to limit or restrict child support, but that any child support award would be a dollar-for-dollar offset against any spousal support payments otherwise contemplated by the prenup. You cannot legally (at least in my state) prenup away your child support obligation, but you can do so constructively by taking it out of your spousal support obligation.
- Make sure the other side also has an attorney who signs the document. This is a mandatory prerequisite.
- Include a choice of law provision stating which state's laws will apply for the enforcement of the prenup - and make that state reasonable in light of where either of you are living at the time, but pick whichever state has more favorable laws for prenup enforcement (yes, there is a difference from state to state).
- Include a provision affirming that BOTH active and passive income from FINANCIAL separate property assets shall remain separate to the degree of any historically applied patterns. For example: if you have always contributed $500/mo to your 401k, technically after the wedding day that's $500/mo of marital funds and not separate funds, which could be construed as commingling; but I have managed to successfully argue to a judge that maintenance of a historical pattern of contribution to separate property pursuant to a prenup can still be qualified as separate property even after the marriage. So, if after the marriage you start contributing $600 to the account, you either lose the provision entirely or you lose half of the extra $100 (each judge will feel differently). Needless to say, the safer way to do this would be to create a separate account just before the marriage so that this continuation of historical payments doesn't present any risk of commingling the bulk of the assets.
- Include a provision regarding NON-FINANCIAL separate property assets that both active and passive increases in valuation shall remain as separate. Many times a guy will have his own business worth $500,000 at the time of the marriage, then divorce with it being worth $3,000,000. He thinks it's his business from before the marriage so he should just get it. Not so. He actively contributed to growing the business during the marriage, so the $2.5mil of active appreciation is half hers. He could try to argue that a portion of it is passive appreciation, and a skillful forensic accountant could present that evaluation, but it certainly won't be all or most of it. By making active valuation increases a part of the prenup, what you're saying is that you get to keep the fruit of your labor as far as the asset itself is concerned, though the income derived from that is otherwise used to benefit both parties both during the marriage and after the divorce (pursuant to the restrictions you put in, per the above, of course).
- NEVER put a total bar to all support. That's a sure way to guarantee the prenup is thrown out. Always say, "support will be provided upon the following conditions ..." then reference the above.

- NEVER try to include custody and parenting responsibilities in a prenup. That's a sure way to get it thrown out as being overreaching.

I'm sure there's more, but I'm running late and that's all I could squeeze out in 8 minutes. Good luck.

FRs: Blue Pill Husbands Make Their Wives Miserable

1 upvotes · 31 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent post. I enjoy the vignette style here.

I'm still single ... just married [MRP Draft]

1 upvotes · 28 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not saying a guy can't adopt certain social norms. They're norms for a reason: because there's often wisdom in certain wide-spread behavior patterns. I'm just saying people shouldn't follow social norms just because they're social norms. People should decide for themselves what's going to work for them and not.

Trimming Down

1 upvotes · 27 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I've hovered in the 15-16% range for a while. I think I'm at 14% right now, after some of this dieting. The difference is huge. A woman can't see how strong you are. My wife doesn't watch me lift weights, so having muscles under my skin doesn't really help much. Now that I'm slimming, she's made comments about my pecs and likes watching them dance; she grabs my biceps and plays with them during sex; she bounces her fist on my thigh while watching shows and feels that there's no jiggle. These are all things that could not be done at 16% BF. The difference between 16% and 14% is quite enormous in my own marriage. It's the difference of me initiating 98% of the time and me initiating about 65% of the time. It's the difference of her needing 20 minutes to work herself up to get off and being able to have a 5 minute quickie for both of us in a short break before we have to pick up the kids.

If that's what 2% did, I imagine the next 2% will be even greater because that's when the 6-pack starts to show, which is usually considered one of the most attractive things on a man's body. In other words, yes, it can make a big difference. But ... I cede there are some outliers and every girl is different. I just wouldn't rely on being "bulky." I spent a lot of time in bear mode (high muscle, medium fat) and didn't really see any benefit to living there. My wife was uninterested in the fact that I could do hand-stand pushups or bench press 285lbs. Again, she's not at the gym watching me lift to get turned on. She wants to be turned on at home when I'm not proving my strength - when my looks are all the proof I have to go by.

Trimming Down

1 upvotes · 27 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

+1

Ready to get engaged (in light of past PMO)

1 upvotes · 26 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Maybe her being in my life has reduced the temptation

Before I was married, I struggled through serious porn use too. When I started dating my wife, I had a solid year+ without any issues. I had a goal to look forward to. Then I got married ... and it all came back. I'm living proof that this is a real paradigm. I'm not saying for sure it's your path too ... but in my observation of other men, you'd be a serious outlier if you didn't end up this way.

new reliance on God

This is certainly possible. That said, in my experience and observation, those who receive genuine freedom in this or any other area have a very clear and vivid understanding of how the Gospel changed them. It's not just a general, "I prayed and God helped me." It's, "The Gospel pierced my heart. I finally understood how Jesus' death 2,000 years ago still affects this particular aspect of my life today." And then they can elaborate on that. This one isn't as rare to be an outlier, though. The previous case is about 1% who don't fit the mold, this one's more like 20% ... because sometimes Jesus does do things in people's lives without them understanding what he did or how he did it. But that's still the rarer position ... just not quite as rare.

what do you mean by trusting Jesus as my cure, beyond what I'm doing already? Suggested reading?

That's what the 400 series is all about. It's a extremely condensed summary of 6-months worth of content that I usually go with guys who want to kick addictive habits and behaviors, whether it's porn, anger issues, gluttony, video game addiction, habitual guilt/shame, depression, etc.

My habit of praying when tempted sounds closer to your Orpheus description

That's great! For me, trying that method back in the day worked, but I didn't have a deep experience of God's fullness in those prayers. It was usually just a re-focusing and distraction that often increased my prospective guilt if I were to turn back to sin at the moment, making guilt my primary motivator for not sinning, rather than God himself. I remember thinking, "I just prayed for 10 minutes. I'd have to be horrible to turn around and masturbate now!" That guilt is what reoriented my desires away from porn and to God, but it wasn't a joyous experience with God in those prayers. I'm glad it's otherwise with you :) That's a blessing I wish I had.

How to people treat u when you're out in public with an attractive girl?

1 upvotes · 25 August 2018 · /r/askTRP

To the other guy who asked about mental maturation in another thread ... this is it.

Response to "were you flirting with me?"

1 upvotes · 25 August 2018 · /r/askTRP

Crap answer. You just told her you're a wimp and she's in charge. The grandma answer works just fine.

Do these count as mental masturbation(MM)?

1 upvotes · 25 August 2018 · /r/askTRP

MM is when you get all giddy thinking about the sex you're going to have someday, then not actually doing anything to get yourself ready to earn it. Is that why you're looking in the mirror or listening to this music?

What is love?

1 upvotes · 25 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's good. I can't say the same of the toyota we were in on the fourth of July ... totaled by a drunk driver. Still working on that settlement.

What is love?

1 upvotes · 25 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Haha

If you knew then what you know now

1 upvotes · 25 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

They're being auto filtered and removed by reddit for some reason. It's not our auto moderator.

If you knew then what you know now

1 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Great question! But don't use it as a cheat to avoid having to read the sidebar ;) Except for #1 these aren't in any particular order.

1. Develop a clearly defined mission that has eternal consequences and incorporates the great commission. Everything else hinges on this. Your mission is your center-point for your frame. It's the basis for how you lead. It gives you a foundation for expressing alpha qualities. It sets your priorities rightly. I cannot understand the importance of your mission above all else.
2. The WISNIFG Bill of Assertive Rights (which is all about developing and staying in your own frame).
3. That being fit would not solve the problem; it was only a necessary prerequisite to solving the problem.
4. That it's not about how you behave; it's about who you are. You can't merely fake your changes; you must become them.
5. Complete and total outcome independence is the backbone of everything. This is a frame issue again (as pretty much all of this is), but if you're only changing to achieve a desired response from external sources, you're doing it for the wrong reasons and it won't last or succeed other than nominal improvements.
6. That I do not have an obligation - either biblically or internally - to respond to my wife's emotional state.
7. 1 Cor. 7 - "Let those with wives live as though they had none" - specifically in the context of pursuing one's mission, as Paul intimates in the same chapter.
8. The application of the Gospel in normative everyday affairs, beyond just its role in salvation.

I'm sure there are many more, but these are off the top of my head ... and there may be bigger ones than these even (exception #1).

If you knew then what you know now

1 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Tag: /u/rocknrollchuck

See ... he didn't delete his account. Reddit is just auto-removing his posts. I have no idea why. As I previously suggested, he may have software that deletes his account history that is mistakenly deleting his posts immediately upon posting rather than 2-3 days later like it normally does.

Married Man With Girl Friends

1 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Fair points. I guess I wasn't trying to read too much into OP's motives.

Trimming Down

1 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

My IF was 22:2 for most of the last year. Basically, I'd eat nothing throughout the day, have dinner with the wife and kids when I got home, put the kids to bed, then have something small to chill with my wife, like a bowl of popcorn while watching a show or doing a puzzle or something. I did experience pangs of hunger, but not so many headaches.

To be clear, with my on/off method, it's not quite the same as ADF or IF because you can eat any time you want - you just have to watch your calories. So, keep a pack of crackers on you and if you feel a headache coming on, pop 120 calories there and save the other 380 for when you get home. Or carry around some veggies and it won't count against the 500 in the first place - like carrot sticks or broccoli. The goal here isn't to have lengthy times without food; it's simply to limit caloric intake in a manageable way. Physiologically, there's probably better benefits to other strategies, but psychologically this is what has been working for me.

It doesn't affect my lifting schedule either. You have to remember that during a cut phase, the purpose of lifting isn't to bulk up; it's to tone. So, if you want to bulk up, then don't do IF/ADF/whatever I'm proposing - just eat whatever you want. But if you're cutting, your lifting should be reoriented toward toning your muscles anyway, and thus your routine will naturally account for the lower caloric intake.

To be clear, most people agree that fat-burning exercise is usually lower intensity for longer durations. So, instead of lifting 90% of your max for 5 reps, lift 50% of your max for 20 reps. For example, my max bench is 285, so when bulking and trying to raise my max, I'd lift 265 as my first set and 245 as my low set over 5 sets for 5 reps each = 25 reps at an average 255lbs (i.e. about 90% of my max). When cutting, however, I do 135 (i.e. a 45lb weight on each side) and do it 20-25 reps per set until I hit a total of 125 reps. I'm not tearing the muscle as well, but I am engaging it in a way that starts the fat-burning process (I can't remember if that's called ketosis or something else).

Trimming Down

1 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I don't drink coffee or carbonated beverages or tea. Pretty much, it's just water. I do every now and then have a beer, but I take that out of my 500 calories on days I do. It's worth it! I only drink dark beers and I find that they often end up being more filling than food.

I limit myself to raw or steamed veggies. So, broccoli is fine with no butter. Stir fry wouldn't work because you have to put oil in it. Yes, you can eat enough veggies to screw it up, but the odds are very low. First, your body usually won't allow you to eat 2,000 calories of pure veggies. I've tried. At about 500 I just start getting disgusted by even the most delicious ones. Second, if you're working out as often as you should be, the veggies are good calories that will be more readily used by your body to help you restore yourself (just make sure to get enough protein too).

Married Man With Girl Friends

1 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a very good point, but one must also remember the value that you can add to their life. If it weren't for my interactions with other women in the church, there would be no women's discipleship ministry happening. This is something my wife comments on often: "If you and the pastor are doing this with the guys, who's going to disciple the women?" Ideally their husbands, but that will be at least a 2 year lag before the women start getting any involvement with the church's new imperative, so there has to be a context for women to learn from men as well.

Married Man With Girl Friends

1 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

While I agree with your conclusion, you do have to account for the value of dread and post-marriage preselection.

Oh, also: my work compensation is based on how much I bill and I get paid more for work that I bring in. With my line of work, I get most of my referrals from women, because women are more chatty and likely to refer a friend than a man. As such, there's a strong business incentive for a man to increase his social network among women even after marriage if it would assist his financial prospects.

Married Man With Girl Friends

1 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Deleted accounts usually show up as "[deleted]" on their posts and comments. I think he's using a history blocker that prevents someone from reading his post and comment history ... usually to avoid getting doxxed or mitigate damage when one is doxxed.

Need Guidance For a Kid in a Jam.

1 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I've heard this theory. On the balance of the possibilities I find it a reasonable interpretation, so I don't fault anyone for believing it ... but I find it to be a less likely option.

Trimming Down

1 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That makes sense. I'll assume a year of intermittent fasting broken up by a couple more hard-core fasting phases is sufficient preparation, as whatever I'm doing is working.

Trimming Down

1 upvotes · 24 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Cool, I'd never heard of that.

Do you mean that you shouldn't fast for the first 6 months of a diet, or that you shouldn't do a fasting diet for longer than 6 months?

Question on priorities.

1 upvotes · 23 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I like this.

Pastor's role

1 upvotes · 23 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You've got a few fair points in there. All in all, it's not worth the argument.

Pastor's role

1 upvotes · 23 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Contraception isn't feminist - it's the man's answer to combat feminist laws that would otherwise obligate men for the care and support of children that they never wanted. But you're really stretching things here in the first place.

Pastor's role

1 upvotes · 23 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Haha ... contraception? In vitro fertilization? Willful sterilization? Ok, you got me there. Hahaha.

Pastor's role

1 upvotes · 23 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

But the overwhelming majority of protestants stand up against those things to ...

Pastor's role

1 upvotes · 23 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Or it's like Jesus said ... the world will hate us because of him. I'm not sure how that indicates a red or blue church. I mean, the world hates murderers more than Catholics, but does that mean they're more red pill than the church? That's a faulty metric in the first place.

Pastor's role

1 upvotes · 23 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I gave those percentages above. There's still a large disparity. You're grasping at straws to cling to your disillusionment. Be better than that. None of this proves doctrine wrong any way, so why does it really matter so much?

Pastor's role

1 upvotes · 23 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That seems intentionally short sighted. The data seems clear enough that for every one reported incident among protestants we should expect to see approximately 12 from Catholics ... if the media holds true to the actual facts. If they're biased against Catholics, I suppose I'd expect more of a 50 to 1 ratio or that the protestant numbers are just low enough that they don't warrant reporting.

Pastor's role

1 upvotes · 22 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Fair enough. We will have to agree to disagree. I'll only note that I don't reject tradition altogether, as most protestants do. I simply believe that it is subordinate to Scripture and that Scripture does, in fact, exist as authoritative separate from tradition. As such, tradition in my view is akin to those Piper or McArthur books ... you'll find lots of valuable stuff, but also a good bit of garbage too. To that end, I urge protestants not to throw out the baby with the bathwater, and instead to be wise and discerning in learning from the past.

Pastor's role

1 upvotes · 22 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's a good answer.

What is love?

1 upvotes · 22 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

ONE

Suppose I learn Spanish and travel to Peru. I'm trying to translate a sermon from a guy named Bob, which I heard in English, for the Peruvians to understand it. Assume Bob knows Spanish, but his primary audience is English people in America. I use a lot of Spanish words in the way I translate Bob's sermon. Which language and culture most accurately expresses Bob's intentions in the sermon: English or my Spanish translation? Or let's go a step further: if there's a peculiar phrase that the Peruvians have questions about based on a Spanish word I used in my translation, would they be better off looking at the cultural terms of art used in the English language that Bob was most likely actually referencing, or at their own cultural terms of art surrounding the Spanish translation I gave them?

That is not to say that the Greek translations aren't inspired. They are. But the Greek culture and the implications that culture would impose on those words aren't inspired. So, when a pastor, for example, looks to the Odyssey and other famous Greek texts to discern what Greek words meant in that culture at that time, it's like the Peruvians looking to their favorite pop culture references to discern what Bob meant by the English words he originally spoke in his sermon.

TWO

Yep, I'm fully versed with the Septuagint.

THREE

Show me a source that says Greek was Jesus' primary language of communication. I know how to speak Spanish, but that doesn't mean that when I'm speaking in English I want people to be using Spanish culture and language to interpret my English statements. I would rather them use my American, English-speaking culture, because my actual word-choices and intentions in communicating ideas are going to coincide more accurately with my target audience rather than some other language and audience that I happen to be familiar with.

FOUR

I agree that the Greek word choice matters. But how do we discern what those words mean?

The go-to answer for most scholars is two-fold: (1) look to other biblical passages for the ways those words are used, and (2) look to extrabiblical references to see how other people in that culture were using those words.

I agree with 1 whole-heartedly. And to the degree that we use Scripture to interpret Scripture, I believe this is perfectly accurate and appropriate. But in virtually all of my studying on the Greek words for love, I find that the predominant view is actually 2 - that most scholars look not to other biblical passages to define those words, but to the Greek culture at the time.

Again, this is fine for the epistles that were addressed to the Greeks. But if Jesus is trying to preach about a Hebrew concept and we're trying to use Greek culture to interpret that Hebrew concept merely because the language we're reading is in Greek, that's where the real danger is.

I will argue with your teaching on the language/authorship of the Bible. It is heretical. it is arrogant. It is born out of a deep misunderstanding of the origin of Scripture and the languages of the Levant in the 1st Century.

I'm pretty well versed. I simply hold a different view than you do. I believe that the Bible itself is inspired. It appears from your argument that you believe the historical cultural understandings of words were also inspired. I don't extend the inspired nature of Scripture that far.

I know many people who take "inspired" to incredible lengths. Some people believe that "inspired" means that there are no grammatical mistakes, no misspellings, no technical errors or misunderstandings, and the like. This has caused a wide theological rift between those who believe that the thoughts and ideas are what was inspired and those who believe that every molecule of ink put on the paper of the original texts (which, for the most part, we don't actually have) was inspired to be in that exact spot.

I tend to fall somewhere in the middle. I believe that God "inspired" someone with a particular thought or idea, and that this is the foundation of inspiration. I further believe that God sovereignly guided the various biblical authors to communicate those thoughts and ideas with specific word choices that in their own context did the best job conveying those thoughts and ideas that could be done - but not necessarily that a perfect translation exists.

To that end, is the Septuagint "inspired"? Most scholars would say no - the original Hebrew texts were inspired. Does that mean it's useless? Of course not. Should we rely on the Septuagint's use of certain Greek words to understand what the New Testament means when it uses those same Greek words? Yes and no. Yes, to the degree that there may not be a better source - and that is certainly better than using Homer's Odyssey, for example ... but no, not to the degree that we are using an uninspired text as a foundation for interpretation of an inspired text.

But maybe you disagree. Maybe you do believe the Septuagint was more inspired than the original Hebrew texts, if there are even degrees of inspiration at all. I really haven't fleshed out your full view on this, so it's hard to comment much further.

Pastor's role

1 upvotes · 22 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Hah, touche.

Pastor's role

1 upvotes · 22 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

To be clear up front, I don't mean to convince you from your view. I believe the Cathodox position is a weak one, but holds enough weight that I don't fault anyone for believing it.

That said, no, the biblical canon is not the only source of divine inspiration. It is merely the only source with near unanimous consent. I'm confident that God has divinely inspired me, for example, in many of the things I have done and said, but there is no consensus worldwide in this, nor am I looking for there to be such a consensus.

Scripture was written by the joint effort of God and the various biblical authors. In my view, humans in a historical council recognized what God had done, but neither I nor most protestants recognize their authority to be the ones to decide what's inspired or not. That's not to say that they got it wrong. At least as to the 66 books, there's sufficient evidence from the Spirit of their authenticity. Rather, it is not the council who decided what is inspired; that is for God to decide.

I have seen the forefathers make enough mistakes to question their decisions. Instead of looking to their wisdom in what they believed were inspired texts, I look to the Spirit Himself and follow the test that Jesus gave for discernment: where is the fruit?

Tag: u/OsmiumZulu, as this conversation seems more up your alley.

What is love?

1 upvotes · 21 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good points. This all goes to affirm the premise that love inherently involves an interconnectedness between two things and does not itself stand in isolation.

What is love?

1 upvotes · 21 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Haha ... not like that's ever happened, right? ;)

The Dangers of Pathologizing Manhood

1 upvotes · 20 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Solid article. It's a little basic, but I like it.

The Dangers of Pathologizing Manhood

1 upvotes · 20 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It actually looks to be working again.

The Dangers of Pathologizing Manhood

1 upvotes · 20 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Weird, this was posted on reddit in a few other places too and the page is down. I think reddit broke it.

Man's Folly

1 upvotes · 20 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Applebees and Chili's have stated plans to do away with all servers. They will have all ordering done on tablets, and they've already converted the payment system to tablets. Instead of servers, there would be "bussers" who merely ship out whatever the queue tells them. They anticipate that the reduced labor cost will be very profitable, as one person could bus what would otherwise take 3 traditional servers to do.

Man's Folly

1 upvotes · 20 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I think u/RedPillWays was trying to take your analogy even further - that feminism has affected mankind not only on a political and family level, but on an economic level as well. Women are literally taking the jobs that men have been fighting over, but leaving men to do the garbage jobs that the women don't really care to do. That is, they want the right to have the top-tier jobs, but don't want the responsibility of the low-tier jobs.

Q&A on Divorce and Remarriage

1 upvotes · 17 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Ah, gotcha.

Q&A on Divorce and Remarriage

1 upvotes · 17 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

What's the project?

Q&A on Divorce and Remarriage

1 upvotes · 17 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for this thorough run down. I think I agree with the thrust of what you're saying. But what still holds me back is that God does seem to recognize and bless second marriages all throughout scripture. Two easy examples are Jacob and Rachel, and David and Bathsheba. So I have to believe there is some legitimacy to them, however sinful they may have been at their inception.

But this ...

For me it is relatively simple. Every one is technically in a state of continual sin, whether in thought or action, due to the fallen nature of mankind.

I couldn't agree more. None of this conversation makes much sense if we don't embrace this.

Q&A on Divorce and Remarriage

1 upvotes · 17 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You should really post more of your stuff on here. I enjoy reading your blog and I think more people could benefit from this kind of insight into both the Bible and culture.

Q&A on Divorce and Remarriage

1 upvotes · 17 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good thoughts. I like this. I still have strong scriptural objections to the catholic method, but I do appreciate the practical wisdom in it.

Can you explain the Erasmus thing? I've heard people mention this but no one could explain how that affects the Greek codex.

Question on priorities.

1 upvotes · 15 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I love your contextual breakdown of these verses!

We can never do this perfectly

Maybe not in our behaviors, but in our minds ... perhaps. Romans 7:25.

That is, we may hit a point where we never intentionally sin, though we may still do wrong without realizing it. 1 Cor. 4:4, "My conscience is clear, but that does not make me innocent. It is the Lord who judges me."

Question on priorities.

1 upvotes · 15 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Just to play devil's advocate for a second ... what if a man goes to work, spends time with his family, hits up the gym, etc. and doesn't once have a conscious thought: "I'm doing this for God's glory!"?

Or in other words, does our motivation to do all these other things for Christ have to be a conscious acknowledgment? And if not, how's that any different from the multi-theory?

Advice for a girl

1 upvotes · 15 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

One would think. I haven't really advertised there at all yet.

Wear a black arm band to church in August 2020

1 upvotes · 14 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'd say if it's between a feminized church and a feminized society, I'd rather the feminized church between the two options.

But I agree with your sentiment. When I referenced the "church" in this case, I had conceptualized in my head what Christ intended, not the hollow shell that it is today.

Sex Addicted v. Sex Starved

1 upvotes · 14 August 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

Personally, I'm not aware of anything a husband and wife can do in the bedroom by mutual consent that would be sinful as long as it just stays the two of them. The two operative conditions there:

- Just the two of them. Go beyond the bounds of marriage and the Bible would condemn it.
- Mutual consent. If you're beating her bloody against her will just because you get off on it, that's sin. If she likes some BDSM stuff and you're not actually causing permanent damage, go for it. Some girls are into that.

But again, the key here is to ask how you're honoring God in this. My simple answer in a lot of the sexual stuff that I do with my wife is that God created husbands and wives to enjoy each other physically. He wouldn't have created marital sex and commanded it to happen if he wasn't glorified when we do it. The fact that he didn't put any explicit bounds on marital sex is pretty telling about the extent to which God can be glorified by it - and I do it out of my faith in faith that God wants me to enjoy my wife, and her me.

[FR] Duty Sex Doesn't Exist

1 upvotes · 14 August 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

It's a waypoint.

Thanks for sharing your story. It sounds like she has undiagnosed vaginismus. My wife has/had that too. It doesn't matter how wet she is, there's still pain on insertion, although vaginismus is almost always psychosomatic. Like you, I used to cater to it and be overly cautious. I stopped caring or catering to her. Guess what ... she stopped complaining about it (including through body language) as soon as I stopped reinforcing it. Today ... I don't know if I cured her by being DNGAF or she's just not letting it affect how we have sex anymore. I don't care. She doesn't either.

But if that doesn't work for you, try looking into vaginismus yourself and see what you get. My wife's was definitely psychological based on the fact that her parents never let her insert anything in herself for her entire life, including tampons. Go figure that my psychological stability seems to have fixed hers. That's the power of frame.

[FR] Duty Sex - Analyzing my mistakes

1 upvotes · 13 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Nice. I must have missed that comment. You need to do more main posts. Feel free to cross from your blog when relevant.

[FR] Duty Sex Doesn't Exist

1 upvotes · 13 August 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

This is an interesting distinction. I'd define starfish sex by the physical disposition of a woman; and duty sex by the man's perception of his wife's interest in the sex they're having.

To that end, I've had it both ways:

- Duty without starfish is when my wife engages in various positions and tries to get me off but I get the distinct impression she'd rather be doing one of a million other things instead of screwing me - she's doing it just to appease me, which ruined it despite the skill she employed in the act.
- Starfish without duty is when she was totally into it, but like a good beta I just kept edging her and trying to make it better and better for her while she just laid there, covertly hoping she'd return the favor afterward, but she never did.

Of course, you can also have both or neither.

[FR] Duty Sex - Analyzing my mistakes

1 upvotes · 13 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a solid field report. Thanks for posting!

nothing uniquely Christian about this post per se

That's fine. One of the main reasons this sub exists is to give pragmatic advice to guys from a Christian perspective. Although your situation may not directly reference the Bible, the answers you're looking for should align with the Bible, and that's why we're here.

I thought seriously about stopping, but I cut out porn/fapping two weeks ago and she just wrapped up shark week so I told myself that I needed the release.

So you're living in her frame still. You needed sex from her and decided to let her give it to you her way, on her terms (which was lame duty sex) rather than operate on your own terms.

What would happen if you literally picked her up in the middle of sex plopped her in doggy position and just started pounding? "Oh, I could never do that, she'd go crazy" = her frame. Or what if in the middle of sex you lay on your back, grab her hips, and slide her on top of you?

Here's the thing ... I'm becoming more and more convinced that duty sex doesn't exist. Tag: /u/OsmiumZulu and /u/rocknrollchuck and /u/Deep_Strength as other married men for insights on this, as it's only a working theory. But what I've found out is that "duty sex" only exists in a woman's frame. But I can have fairly exciting sex whenever I want. It only requires two things: (1) that I have the physical strength to move my wife's body in a way that pleases me, and (2) that I have the tenacity of will to keep going despite my internalized thoughts about what she must be thinking. Let me add in a bonus that really isn't necessary, but helps a lot: (3) that I can get my wife on the verge of an orgasm before starting all of this.

I've found that with the first two alone, my wife never actually objects. Even if she has in her mind that it's duty sex, she still goes along with it and any perception that she would disapprove of whatever the next thing is that I'd try to do with her, that is really just all in my head and I need to break out of her frame. If she tells me to stop, I stop - no getting any marital rape charges or anything. But that's never once actually happened for me. More often than not, somewhere along the way my wife starts getting into it - ESPECIALLY if I can hit that third point, because then she's trying to get me to cum faster so I'll let her finish - and that starts a fun little game where we're both trying to keep the other person revved up.

Covert Contract - I realize

I'm glad you realize this. This was a huge red flag in your post, and when I got to the bottom I took a sigh of relief that you spotted it already.

Kill Ego, Build Frame

See above. Good spot.

No more bad sex ... willing to say no to bad sex, rather than using any opportunity to get a release

That's the crux of the frame issue. But, if my theory pans out (I've only been testing it for a month, so I don't have a hard conclusion yet), then you don't have to say no to bad sex - you just turn bad sex into good sex.

When you say it's "bad sex" this goes back to your point on killing your ego. You assume that sex is only good if she's into it. I used to have the same problem. It drove my wife up the wall with fury because until recently she was just never into it. It turns out that when I get into it, she gets into it. So, if I go in with the mentality, "This is duty sex" and I just try to fake being excited about it to try to get her into it, (1) first off, that's another covert contract, and (2) women can see through faked emotions from a mile away. But if women are emotional empaths, like I often suggest, then my genuine excitement at using her like a sex toy, despite her initially not being into it, gets picked up by her empathic powers and suddenly she's hot and horny and I don't have to screw around to put her in positions anymore because now she's into it.

Seriously, only a year ago I would have said, "Not my good church girl. She'd never be that way." AWALT - even your good church girl.

Lift, bro

Go do it.

What has the church done to women?

1 upvotes · 13 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is important.

What has the church done to women?

1 upvotes · 13 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

She either found more alpha guys in Denomination B (unlikely) or she now prefers Denomination B because they do not judge her for pursuing alpha men outside the church entirely.

Or because Denomination B doesn't condemn the men for dating her, who is outside the church. So, a Denomination A guy might never give her the time of day in the first place because she's outside the church, skewing the statistics to explain why she only ever hears from Denomination B guys.

Fully agreed with your comment, though. I was just throwing out this one other option.

For Singles: Finding the Girl You Can't Keep Yourself From Banging - PART 2!

1 upvotes · 11 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, as u/redpillwonder said, FAT is an acronym for Faithful, Available, and Teachable.

Tag: u/zeldafan1023

Sex Addicted v. Sex Starved

1 upvotes · 10 August 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I think your view of glorifying God is probably too simplistic, which is at the core of the confusion. For example, Jesus and the apostles were well versed on their cultural trends in the places they ministered. This gave them a stark advantage whenever they could function as insiders or utilize that cultural knowledge for God's glory.

To that end, yeah I saw deadpool and watched a few seasons of game of thrones too - and I enjoyed them greatly. Neither of them violated my conscience - but that alone is not enough (1 Cor. 4:4). Our motive also matters. Are you doing it solely for your own amusement, or because being culturally versed gives you a foothold within that culture to reach others for Christ?

We now have RPC Chat!

1 upvotes · 10 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Sadly, I don't know much about the chat feature. It doesn't exist on the Reddit Is Fun app. It does on the main app with the bubble that has three dots in it at the bottom. When I click it, it shows a list of rooms that I'm already in as well as recommended rooms. It might be a connectivity problem for you. It could also be that you need to join on a desktop before it'll show up on the app.

Kicking Porn For Good

1 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I do apologize if I come off as arrogant and offensive. I do have some very strong feelings against seminaries, as I have seen many men whose spiritual lives were ruined by them, who were then thrust into leadership positions in the church, preaching from a very ungodly place. My dad was one of them.

Apart from those whose lives are a case-in-point, much of my view is also affirmed by 3 very specific and different seminary-trained pastors who have played a big role in my life, one who told me just last week in one of our one-on-one meetings that seminaries are, in essence, the Church's way of doing what Israel did in 1 Samuel 9 - they looked at the rest of the world and said, "We want our leadership to be just like the rest of the world," so Israel got a king and the church got its schools - but that Jesus never left a model of schooling and degrees; he left a model of discipleship. And although many seminary professors do disciple students here and there, the training methodology of seminaries is not modeled after the example Jesus set. I do believe that this is substantially responsible for many of the problems in the church today. I do not say this lightly, but after considerable research, many conversations with wiser people than myself, and through prayer to God about my prior desires to attend seminary. To that end, the same pastor who pointed out the above also said, "But it is a necessary evil because those of us who do want to do what Jesus did can't get a job doing that without the degree to qualify us," which he then went on a mini-lecture about how Jesus would have found the whole notion of having an academic degree in spirituality somewhat absurd and missing the point. And yet here it is as a virtually unanimous prerequisite to any position of ultimate authority in a church.

I don't write this to add to the offense, but hopefully to add to the conversation in the hope that maybe you can understand a little better my concern for the seminary trained.

We now have RPC Chat!

1 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yes, I think it shows up on the sidebar. I'm not sure the normal way to switch to the redesign, but in the upper-left hand corner of my screen, sometimes (not always) there's a red banner that switches for you when you click it. Sometimes that banner only appears for a split second, so I literally just a few minutes ago kept refreshing the page and trying to click it before it went away. After 5 tries I finally got it to work.

Kicking Porn For Good

1 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That Brother Lawrence book that you reference is tilted towards spiritual mysticism

I've read it over 20 times and have no idea what you're talking about here.

You tried to distinguish between guilt and conviction but they are technically the same thing.

I just made another post about this. Guilt and conviction are most certainly not the same thing in the Bible.

should feel worse and worse everytime you sin

I would appreciate a biblical reference on this point.

no where in the Bible that states that physical reproduction is a parallel to spiritual reproduction

I disagree. I believe the clear language and connotation given in Scripture makes this somewhat obvious. Christ is our groom, we are his bride. It constantly talks about spiritual offspring in both the old and new testament. The apostles refer to themselves as spiritual "fathers" and to those who were saved through them as their spiritual "children." Jesus references saved people to Nicodemus as those who are "born again." The parallels between physical and spiritual reproduction and family processes are present all over - especially in the new testament. It is not limited to marriage alone, but to the parent-child relationship that is established through that marriage.

Spiritual sex ... is not the cure for physical sex ... There are many individuals who evangelize "effectively" and still commit sexual sins.

I didn't say it was the cure. I said it's part of the cure. Notice the two sections before it, laying the Gospel as the foundation. I get that "spiritual sex" is not a phrase used in the Bible - at best I'm just using attention-grabbing terminology that I do believe flows with concepts that are found in the Bible. But evangelism/discipleship alone do not solve the problem - that's merely the result of filling your house with God. You still have to empty the house in the first place, and then you have to fill it with God in the second place, and then evangelism/discipleship flows from there. I wrote this up in far greater detail to someone else who made a similar objection here.

I would think that a pastor that is involved in pornography (or was involved in it while a pastor) should be disqualified from being a pastor/elder since he is no longer above reproach

That depends on if he's repentant or not. If he's not repentant, you're absolutely right. Someone who repents and yet still fails from time to time with ongoing repentance is still above reproach. As some author once noted, "The measure of a man's spiritual maturity is not in how little he sins, but in how quickly he turns back to God after he sins." I wouldn't take that statement as dogmatic by any means (there are other measures of maturity given in the Bible), but I do find the sentiment to be far more Scriptural to measure a person's qualifications by the orientation of their heart toward God over their measure against the law, which is no longer over us.

You sound like a legalist. Is that a fair assessment?

Kicking Porn For Good

1 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Ah, but in my experience the reverse is what's true: someone can't legitimately get rid of their sin until Christ takes away their guilt first. That IS what gets rid of their sin.

Of course, I think we're talking past each other with semantics, as I addressed in a conversation with someone else over here, after I literally just went through every single use of the word "guilt" or "guilty" in the Bible to figure out whether there was any basis for qualifying it as a feeling or emotional state. It turns out there is not.

Kicking Porn For Good

1 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Ah yes, as they approach the depraved mind. But is it talking about believers at that point or non-believers?

We're all trying to figure out what to do with our guilt one way or another. The non-believer, as you suggest, does so by convincing them that guilt isn't real in the first place. The believer accepts that it's real and places it on Jesus and has nothing to do with it ever again.

Kicking Porn For Good

1 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I can appreciate some of the differences in our viewpoint here. That said, I do strongly believe that God does not utilize guilt on the Christian, as that severely undermines the Gospel (unless one takes a view that a person hops in and out of salvation repeatedly based on his present sin - which I do not).

I wrote more on that in response to /u/Rifleshoot over here. Hopefully that will provide greater clarity on what I see in the Bible as a distinction between guilt and conviction.

Kicking Porn For Good

1 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Amen to that!

Another thing he does, to use similar wording: The Prince of Darkness sometimes wins, not by convincing us to do something we believe is wrong, but by distracting us away from that which we know is right.

I imagine it like a circle with a singular line pointed upward (kind of like this illustration). Moving in the direction of that line is God's will. Moving in any other direction at all is not God's will, and is therefore sin. If one sin is causing a person to shoot straight over to the right, turning left won't cure him of his sin because he still won't be heading in the right direction. There is 1 direction that will save a person and 359 other directional degrees that are sin. If the Prince of Darkness can agree with you that walking in a 258 degree angle is bad and get you to walk at a 93 degree angle instead, he still wins.

Kicking Porn For Good

1 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I can see where you're coming from. Romans 1 gives a similar process of God letting people walk away from him. But I think this is very different from God actively giving people a sense of guilt. As humans walk away from God, abandoning the sacrifice of Christ in their lives, their guilt naturally returns because they have rejected Christ as their savior from that guilt. This isn't the Holy Spirit causing them to feel guilty; rather, the Holy Spirit is the one telling them they don't have to be guilty anymore if they'd only turn back to God.

Sex Addicted v. Sex Starved

1 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

I don't see anything in the bible that would condemn it. So, I'd chalk that up to a disputable issue under Romans 14, where as long as it doesn't violate your conscience and you're not causing your wife to sin by violating her conscience, and per Romans 14:23 and 1 Cor. 10:31 you can glorify God through it... go for it. But don't just do it willy nilly just because you like it. Really contemplate how it is the product of your faith and glorifies God. It would be sin for me because I could not pass that test, but I can imagine scenarios where some men could.

Sex Addicted v. Sex Starved [MRP Draft]

1 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, I really need to crank out that post on women being emotional empaths ... I just keep getting too distracted with other stuff that comes up and seems more pressing in the moment.

Anyone here feel bad for being too hard on themselves re: chastity?

1 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It's only frustrating to set aside worldly satisfactions when you don't have any genuine spiritual satisfaction in Christ.

Prager U video of a female discussing the downside of demasculinizing men. Presents what I feel to be a positive statement about the negative effects of demasculinization/feminization. Would like to know what the community thinks.

1 upvotes · 9 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah ... the video in that dalrock post is disgusting.

Introduction/Accountability

1 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Fair enough. The red pill works a little different with parenting anyway.

Sex Addicted v. Sex Starved [MRP Draft]

1 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Great question. It comes down to frame.

When a man is blue pill, as we all often begin, we develop certain ideologies and fantasies about what sex will be like once we've swallowed the red pill, made our improvements, etc. For the Christian man, this includes fantasies about what sex will be like once he's married. This prospective look toward future sexuality is often at the root of their starvation, not anything in the present or (although this one is more common) their past.

As a result, even a man who puts on the external appearance of someone who has been red pill - through his bulging muscles, confident demeanor, DNGAF attitude, etc. - is still living on blue pill fantasies if his motivation is to gratify those ideologies he crafted in his blue pill days. Such a man is still controlled by his sexuality rather than being controlled by it, whether he has arrived or not.

By embracing that he is not actually addicted in the first place, and instead that he is merely starved of a good thing, the single man can regain control over his sexuality and sexual ideologies - most notably by casting aside his blue pill fantasies about what sex will be like one day and instead adopting a frame that presents himself as a man in control over his fantasies.

One way or another, a man's fantasies will control his behaviors to fulfill those fantasies, or the man will dominate his fantasies and ideologies with his own internal sense of self, which for the Christian is found in our identity through Christ. To that end, I ask single men: which is it going to be? Because most of them correlate their fantasies with their addiction and believe they have no control over their own desires, making us little more than mere animals.

How do you learn to truly let go of someone?

1 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

How is this post in any way different from this original post?

It sounds to me like he didn't like the feedback he got last time and is going for round 2 hoping we'll change our minds. You hear me OP? All I can do is ditto what I said last time.

Sex Addicted v. Sex Starved

1 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

There are hints of a couple of these in my motives, but my primary intention in posting this here is otherwise off the list. I'll simply leave it at that. But I do appreciate the clear reminder of the need to balance frame and value-add as well as peering into the way you look "beyond the obvious."

Few questions for this subreddit

1 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/ExRedPill

I get downvoted (1) because I'm a Christian and this sub is unfriendly to that, and I've had many people specifically say to me in my other comments that Christianity has no place here; and (2) because despite my rejection of many of the childish and harmful attitudes espoused on TRP, I still do retain an underlying acceptance of "red pill" philosophy without compromising a moral high ground, and this sub takes an all-or-nothing approach that any retention of the red pill must be evil and that there is no compromise. As you note, this sub is equally cult-like as TRP.

MRP is a little better because it drops all the misogyny and anti-marriage sentiment (after all, it's "married red pill") and sticks more to the core, underlying philosophies, but even that falters from a moralistic standpoint. That is, they rightly acknowledge that RP is amoral - that the morality of it is decided by how a person wants to apply it, not by the truths revealed by the red pill itself ... but then they turn around from that descriptive truth by giving prescriptive advice and berate men who do not follow that advice based on moral principles. It's one thing to say that a fact is immoral. But to argue that prescriptive advice has no bearing on morality is nonsensical.

Again, I created RPC to be a means of opening the door to that type of moral conversation, returning "the red pill" to a sense of the core underlying truths of the matters at hand and not viewing it as a certain pattern of behaviors as the secular subs have turned it into.

To that end, even though we're a Christian sub and u/rocknrollchuck will probably preach the Gospel to you at some point, atheists are welcome if you want to discuss some of these things without feeling a pressure to abandon the idea of marriage.

Prager video about the harm in demasculinizing men. Thought some would enjoy the fact that it is out there.

1 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks, brother. I'm glad I could help. As for the video, I still say you post it. The post really only needs a 1-2 sentence introduction explaining what it is, then a simple question: "What do you all think about this?" or "Does this resonate with you?"

Prager video about the harm in demasculinizing men. Thought some would enjoy the fact that it is out there.

1 upvotes · 8 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

For reference: I asked for a brief description of the content and a discussion prompt/question in the post to give readers something to talk about. This isn't just for the sub's sake, but for the viability of the post itself. Most people don't watch links. As such, most people won't give feedback on them. Tell them what to expect when they click the link and they're more likely actually to do so and engage in conversation - especially if you ask them a question about it or give them a starting point for conversation.

I'm removing this until you comply with my original request to add these two things.

Sex Addicted v. Sex Starved [MRP Draft]

1 upvotes · 7 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I disagree. But I do appreciate the attempted insight. If you're right, I'm sure God will convict me one day - hopefully sooner rather than later.

My testimony and RP-imony

1 upvotes · 7 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Fair point.

Few questions for this subreddit

1 upvotes · 7 August 2018 · /r/ExRedPill

Why I never went into TRP

I like women

Me too :)

AWALT

Yeah, TRP grossly misunderstands this concept, which is explained better on MRP and r/RPChristians - that all women have certain underlying tendencies, but every woman expresses these differently, and some can even overcome those tendencies entirely. As a Christian, for example, I embrace that God created men and women uniquely and differently, and that as a result of the fall, there are certain patterns of sinful behavior that we both fall into (not just women). So, it's helpful to know what those patterns are so that we can appropriately account for them in our relationships. But that doesn't mean that every man will act exactly like Adam or that every woman will act exactly like Eve.

Alpha/Beta

You're spot on. The dynamic isn't defined by caricatures, but by someone's internal point of origin. To that end, intelligent men can still be beta and idiots can still be alpha. It's more about whether or not you're able to make decisions for yourself and follow through (alpha), or if your lifestyle is one of supplicating to those around you (beta). Where it gets really murky is when you're dealing with subconscious influences, so a man might think he's making his own decision when in reality he has been played by someone else. I must do this frequently with my job, for example. As an attorney, it's one thing to argue a point to persuade something, but it's even better if I can cause the judge to believe he/she came up with the point on his/her own, in which case the point is far more likely to stand and result in a favorable conclusion. To that end, the "alpha" is the person less susceptible to manipulation and the "beta" is the one who is ignorant of the ways he is being manipulated.

MGTOW

I empathize with this group, but the whole notion is somewhat disgusting.

Who is average TRP?

I've been curious about this myself. You'll never find the average user, but for some of the moderators, you can look on youtube at places like the 21 Convention, where they post pics and speeches from some of the popular men in the red pill circles.

Ying-Yang

Although I don't subscribe to this philosophy in general, I completely agree with your conclusion about masculinity and femininity being complementary to each other.

N-Count

As you say, the raw number isn't the important thing. What's relevant is what it shows about a person's character and degree of trustworthiness as a raw matter of statistical probability. A woman who has had dozens of partners and been married 3 times before, statistically, is not likely to remain in a committed monogamous relationship - and the same thing can be said about men in the reverse.

On r/RPChristians we take a different stance than the secular view, as we account for things like "repentance," where a person recognizes the inappropriateness of their past behaviors and commits to living their life a different way going forward. To that end, a woman who has a high n-count who has genuinely repented may still very well be a reliable partner. The trick is evaluating the genuineness of the repentance.

Dropping standards

This is a real phenomenon, as you note. The reason you notice this as particularly true in the 30+ crowd is that at some point in life people start getting desperate, believing, "If I can't find someone soon, I'll never find someone."

As a matter of course, there is a real social stigma that people in certain age ranges who have never been married have stayed single for a reason. This is a very rational caution to be mindful of, regardless of the way anyone else may want to normalize it.

Marriage laws

I'm a divorce attorney. I can affirm that the marriage laws are pretty awful - but not for the men. They're awful for the primary breadwinner. The laws are internally contradictory. In my state, for example, we have two weird laws:

- Both spouses are deemed to have contributed equally toward the marriage.
- The higher-earning spouse must contribute financially toward the lower/non-earning spouse.

What makes this weird is that the non-earning spouse does not have to contribute anything back from her otherwise "equal contribution." So, during the marriage, suppose you have a husband who earns $100,000/yr and a wife who stays home to watch the kids, clean the house, do the laundry, tend the garden, etc. After a divorce, the husband must contribute $50,000 to the wife, who then gets this money without expending the time to get it, and then utilizes her time to clean her own house, watch the kids on her days, do her own laundry, tend her own garden, etc. The husband lives on the same amount, but must suddenly pay a nanny to watch the kids, hire a house-cleaner, gardener, etc., which means he's living on substantially less than his ex-wife.

Now, as a matter of statute, the same situation could theoretically play out in reverse, where the woman is the higher earner and gets screwed. However, deviating from the statutes, we still have a host of "older" judges and magistrates who have been on the bench since before the laws started reverting back to a more "equal" position and still make rulings based on the old way of doing things, which was that women always win. So, even though the statutes have gotten better at avoiding gender discrimination and now only discriminate against high-earners, the judges themselves still employ significant gender discrimination, except the ones who are under the age of 40.

Women's v. Men's Rights

I'm with you on this one. Even in the court system, the judges just don't want to hear it. Their usual deferral is, "Petition your legislature," as if even a horde of individuals petitioning their congressmen could stand a chance against the mass-funding put in by lobbyists who generally profit off of the issues that are more appealing to the media.

There was a post on r/writing a few months back about a female author who was starting a competition with a publication offer for the best crime novel that did not involve a female victim. She commented that she's sick of the way society cares more about female deaths than male deaths, but also that it's degrading to women to treat them like they're defenseless. Her whole rationale was really an interesting read and exposed a lot of the issues working against both the men's rights and feminist movements that really need to look toward better alternatives than the hate that gets spewed both ways.

Pareto distribution

There are general trends that follow the pareto rule, but it's somewhat fallacious to assume that because one thing does, another must - especially when you're crossing sample lines. For example, I can appropriately say, "I sampled 100 hurricanes and found that 10% of them did 90% of the total damage among the sample selection. I reasonably believe that if I sampled another 100 hurricanes, based on my dad and the confidence intervals laid out, the second set would provide similar results." But if we say, "Because of that result in hurricanes, it must also be true that 10% of the men are having 90% of the sex with women," now we're crossing an inappropriate line. New data needs to be drawn with its own conclusions that matches what the data points reveal.

Anyway, this has been fun. As I'm sure you see in this comment, I am not a big fan of most people on TRP and a lot of the stuff you read on there is going to be utter trash, but there are certain truths within the red pill which are worth retaining - and my personal belief is that those truths came from the Bible first, hence my starting r/RPChristians as a way of sifting out all the garbage.

Should I inform wife of job hunting?

1 upvotes · 7 August 2018 · /r/askMRP

So much of this stuff never pans out. When you mentioned that you were getting offers, but without an actual offer in-hand yet, she interpreted that as, "He's a hopeful dreamer with nothing practical to offer from keeping his head in the clouds." That wasn't a test. That was her pointing out how you screwed up. Oh well, keep lifting and move on.

Is my wife pregnant by another man (I need some advice)

1 upvotes · 6 August 2018 · /r/askMRP

What advice did you want that isn't plain obvious?

Insecure? Check.

Loser? Check.

More attractive men than you? Check.

Smarter men than you? Check.

Men with better futures? Check.

Ok ... what are you going to do about that?

Conditionally loving a unicorn

1 upvotes · 6 August 2018 · /r/askMRP

This sub often says, "We don't fix the marriage; we fix the man." This is slightly misleading, and your case explains why. You assume you were mostly fine, but had some issues that needed fixing. This is wrong.

RP makes a whole new man entirely. It sounds like you wanted to keep your foundation as a person intact and merely improve the structure atop that foundation. But if the foundation is weak, it doesn't matter how strong the structure above it is. It will topple.

Uproot your whole self and start again.

RPC approved books and podcasts?

1 upvotes · 6 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

What we are all waiting on is for u/Red-Curious to figure out he could make more money writing than representing.

Hah! Not this type of content. Feminism sells to a feminist world. Masculinity is shamed and only has a really small niche audience. After I finish going through /u/Deep_Strength's book, I'll start working on my own again.

Introduction

1 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

In my non-Christian days I imagined that one day I would be a great evangelist and preacher - even greater than Billy Graham, for example. I thought I was a Christian at the time, but wasn't. Even after being saved, many of these expectations still lingered, as I assumed this was what God used my upbringing to prepare me for.

At one point in the first month of meeting with my discipler he asked what I wanted to learn about and grow in. I said, "I want to learn about common attributes of the great men of the faith, like Abraham, Moses, Elijah, etc." He said, "That's a really good topic. But why do you want to know about them?" I said, "Because God gave them to us as an example and I want to be like them." He said, "I think your real motive is to be great like them." He was right.

He then asked me, "If you were sent out into the middle of the desert by God and he said, 'I want you to live here for the rest of your days - another 70 years - and you will never speak to or preach to another soul. And this will bring me more glory than anything else you could do with your life.' How would you feel?"

I said I'd go. He said, "That's not what I asked. I asked how you'd feel about it." I said I'd be lonely, bored, and likely feel worthless and unfulfilled.

He pointed out that this meant that my source of feeling "fulfilled" was not in God himself or his glory, but in my own ambitions and that God often chooses to do the biggest things through those who were first content to be made nothing. He then asked me to set aside my spiritual ambitions - even if I had in my head that I was doing it for God - and instead focus on what God can do through me right now and today.

We then talked through the parable of the minas/talents and how God only gives little bits to some and greater things to others and that we each have a role and it's not for us to decide or fantasize about how important we will be to God's Kingdom. But at the end of the day, if we are faithful with little now, he will give us more authority later, even though the servants in those stories didn't have any expectation of the reward of greater authority that followed their faithfulness. They only knew of the punishment for not being faithful (which even the last guy actually failed to understand) and what would give their master good pleasure in the moment.

I recognize that if I wanted to, I could probably quit my job, plant a church, get it to be mega, and be the pop Christian rock star. I 100% believe that I could do that if I tried. The growth of this sub is evidence of that - even with how little effort I have put into it, relative to other things. But that's no longer my ambition. I don't want to be a spiritual great. I want to do what God designed me to do, however big or small that role may end up being.

[FR] Fixing your SMV

1 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I addressed this in a previous comment

Sorry if I missed it. I'm still not finding it - can you cite it to me? All I saw was the bit about gluttony, not about fitness.

This was my response:

Yep, that's one of the parts I looked at. I agree with everything you said there.

- We shouldn't use our bodies as instruments of unrighteousness.
- We should not use our body to sin
- We shouldn't use our bodies for drunkenness and gluttony

Okay, you still haven't mentioned a single thing about God's position on fitness. You're avoiding answering question A by trying to make up another question B that isn't what I asked, then answering that instead.

What is God's position on whether or not men should improve their physical fitness? Is he for it, against it, or does he not care?

My point was that the Bible does not address the status of one's physical fitness. The Bible tells us to not use the body as an instrument of sin.

What I read in this is that your conclusion is simply: "God doesn't care whether we're physically fit or not. That's why he didn't put it in the Bible." I disagree and think that he did put it in there and gave us distinct biblical figures to model our lives after for a reason. I have given citations to support this conclusion. You have avoided and avoided addressing the question or the citations I referenced. So be it.

Life advice and direction needed.

1 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I believe Matthew 28:19-20 is given to the church corporately

Where's the support for this in the passage? Or is there another verse you rely on to reach this conclusion? My guess is, as has been true for everyone else I've known who has made this argument, that there is only a philosophical premise for arguing this point and not a theological one. That is, there's no biblical support, only DEERING.

There are countless passages, however, that allude to the individuality of this mission, even if none of them explicitly states: "The great commission is for individuals, not the church corporately."

It would require every single believe without distinction to "go".

It does. The operation of the "going" isn't to go into the nations - it's to "go and make disciples of all nations." One must "go" do something to effectuate that result, such as going to the gym, or going to work, or going to church, or going to the mall, etc. to meet people to disciple. The cumulative effect is that the whole world will be reached, even if the extent of someone's going is little more than outside their own home.

It would require and empower all Christians to baptize believers, but this is (usually) the duty of the corporate church and administered by the elders

Phew, philosophy has certainly corrupted your theology. There is no biblical mandate that only an ordained minister can baptize someone.

It would require and empower all Christians to be teachers, but we know that not all are called to teach and some are prohibited.

There's a difference between leadership and teaching. You seem to have a very "informational" approach to discipleship. It's true that Jesus incorporated information into his approach, but his core was on modeling.

Even at that, we're all called to teach, even though not all of us are uniquely gifted at teaching. What you're referencing is someone who sits in a corporately authoritative capacity as a teacher.

Consider my wife. She is not spiritually gifted at teaching. Does that mean she is prohibited from teaching our children anything? Obviously not. Or are you arguing that as soon as someone becomes a parent God immediately bestows on them the gift of teaching?

This mentality also ignores the teaching of 1 Cor 12. We are not all evangelists, not all teachers of others.

Where is the "spiritual gift of discipleship" listed? If it's a spiritual gift, then I would agree - some people would have it, some wouldn't.

Discipleship isn't a gift. It's a mission. Your spiritual gifts are the context in which you carry it out. So, some people will use their gift of hospitality to raise up younger believers by inviting them into their home. Others might use the gift of teaching to provide clear instruction to the people they're discipling. Others might use the gift of service to build relationships with the people who they'll disciple. But one way or another, we're all to be leading others toward Christ in an intentional capacity in some way. If God judges our hearts, I don't see him being pleased on Judgment Day when someone says, "Jesus, on reviewing my life I now see that I didn't make any intentional effort to advance your Kingdom with the people whose lives you placed in my path. That said, I did notice that I accidentally influenced some people for the better, so does that count?" If God judges our behaviors, he'd be pleased. If he judges our hearts, what do you think?

the hand is not greater than the foot, nor the eye greater than the ear.

Of course, which is why the context for each is different. But the hand, foot, eye, ear, mouth, leg, etc. all follow the same mission determined by the head, who is Christ. So, while the head may tell the nose to smell, but won't give the same command to the eye, he does certainly use all parts of the body to further his mission.

I don't see the head saying, "I want to do this today, but the eyes don't have to participate in that, so I'm going to gouge them out and leave them behind and pick them back up again when I'm ready to pursue another mission that actually involves them."

I would also note that (1) only the eleven apostles, not the entire church, received the "great commission"

I'm not sure where you're getting that from. Matthew 28:19 is the great commission. Matthew 28:16 specifically says that the "eleven disciples" were there.

there is absolutely no command given, other than to ministers

I really have no idea what you mean by this. There are lots and lots and lots of commands given in the Bible. Matthew 28:19 is among them.

Certainly some of us must do the work of an evangelist, and be pastors and teachers. But it does not therefore follow that all of us must do that.

If the command is to make disciples of "all nations" and we are instructed to teach every disciple ("all nations") to obey all the commands Jesus gave us, this includes the "make disciples of all nations" part. I'm not sure how much clearer that can get. Jesus didn't say, "Make disciples of all nations and teach them to obey everything I commanded, except that some people can ignore the all nations part ... that's only for a few of you."

The church is definitely an institution and not simply a fellowship. It has structure, authority, and a diversity of gifts and callings.

This may be a semantics issue. The way I'm using this term is described in more detail in this post. To that end, I agree it is an "institution" in the modern sense, but it was not intended by God to be this way. For further reading, check out Bridging the Great Divide by Rob McCorkle.

pretty much everyone is commanded to at least disciple their own kids, and husbands to lead their wives, so that is a form of discipleship, although I don't think it's the one you have in mind

I agree, but very few parenting models actually emulate biblical discipleship. So, not every Christian parent can be said to be "discipling" their children just by virtue of parenting them. And I know many people who distinctly fail at it. Either way, that's an argument, not a place in the Bible that says discipleship isn't a spiritual gift or that it's only limited to some.

"making disciples" is just shorthand for evangelizing them and teaching them

And there's the misunderstanding. Now your arguments make a lot of sense to me. If this were what Jesus meant when he said to "make disciples," then you'd be right about most things you've said here.

But Jesus gives the great commission after having spent 3 years with these guys. It's not just the way he evangelized or taught them - it's the totality of how he related with and engaged with them. He's saying, "You're my disciples. What I just did with you for the last 3 years, go and do that for others and teach them how to do that for others too until you've reached every nation." This is vastly different and beyond mere evangelism and teaching.

Sorry if this conversation has been cockeyed because of this misunderstanding. I probably should have addressed that much sooner, as most people have this mistaken understanding of what disciple-making actually is.

You're asking me to prove a negative.

Of course - and your cited 1 Cor. 12 is a great example where the Bible actually does prove a negative where it wants to. But "disciple-maker" isn't on that list.

Mental Point of Origin and Philippians 2

1 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Glad to help :)

[FR] Fixing your SMV

1 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I have no idea who Martin Lawrence is. Obviously I'm referencing the age-old classic, Practice the Presence of God.

However, your original post did not provide that context or foundation. That's why I responded the way I did.

That's because you're viewing my one post in isolation without the context of everything else I say and write here. That's the same thing as picking out one single teaching of Jesus's and saying he missed the point because you ignore everything else he said.

I stated my position and even provided Scripture to support it

All I saw was you evasively avoiding taking a position. Let me just pick out one point and see if you can answer this one directly: Do you believe that God wants us to be physically fit?

- If your answer is yes, then we agree and you've wasted all of this time arguing against me encouraging men to be physically fit.
- If your answer is no, please provide Scriptural support for the conclusion that God does not want us to be physically fit.
- If your answer is that God doesn't care if we're physically fit or not, then provide a passage that says God doesn't care.

What I've heard you say is, "God doesn't want us to be gluttons," for example. That's fine. We obviously both agree with that. But that's not what I'm asking about. We both already know that God is against us being "unfit" - but what's his position on us improving our physical fitness?

Life advice and direction needed.

1 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I understand what you're saying - and I think we agree, but you're reaching the conclusion from an unusual angle.

A man may have a further mission, but it can never be at the neglect of raising a godly family.

What about single man called into celibacy? Are you suggesting that he must still find a way to have a family and raise them to be godly? Obviously not.

If a man is married, he certainly does have an obligation to raise his family in a godly manner. But God's mission over us transcends this. The mission of discipleship is broken down into many sub-categories of contexts in which we disciple others. Husband-wife is one context, parent-child is another, neighbor-neighbor is another, coworker-coworker is another, etc.

It is certainly possible that the only person God ever calls someone to disciple is their own children. But it would be against Scripture to teach this as a sufficient mission in itself, as in the long-term it would inherently preclude our ability to "make disciples of all nations" if we took the position that our only obligation in disciple-making is to our own families. The only exception would be if God had some bizarre plan for population control whereby he had all non-Christians die out so that the world was only populated by the descendants of Christians, in which case all nations could be reached exclusively through discipleship in one's own family.

To that end, I fully agree with you that making disciples of our families is the first place we must start - and our highest priority. But this is only a subset of the mission of discipleship, not a greater mission than the one Jesus gave: "make disciples of all nations." It could be that a man's strategy to reach all nations is to disciple his children to be missionaries outside of the home - or to disciple his children to disciple their children to become missionaries outside the home. But somewhere along the way we have to embrace that we are called to reach outside of our own homes. And if discipleship as Jesus showed us is a relationship founded on modeling (which also flows with Paul's teachings on modeling), then how can we ever teach a next generation the importance of discipleship outside the home if we are not first modeling it for them? Otherwise, we are not discipling them into this mission; we are merely philosophizing to them about it.

A man's mission to disciple his family into godliness is one context in which he employs the mission of disciple-making. But it is not the only one, nor should it be the only one, lest we violate the "of all nations" part of the great commission.

Discipleship is the duty of the church corporately, not of us individually.

On this point we certainly disagree.

I've heard this objection many times, and I simply cannot agree. The language of Matthew 28:19-20 seems to clear. It was given to individuals and all of those individuals who were present lived it out. They did not take it as a corporation who assigns to one the role of discipleship and the other the role of marketing and another the role of raising financial support. They all adopted that role individually. And the command to do so was that they also share that command and responsibility with everyone else.

- Command 1: "Make disciples of all nations"
- Command 2: "Teach them to obey everything I have commanded you."

Command 2 includes command 1 ... and also command 2. If the apostles received the command to make disciples individually, and applied it individually, and were instructed to teach others to adopt and obey everything they were commanded to do, it is no longer a corporate mission, but an individual one. By making it a corporate mission, we are merely giving people an excuse to be passive. If they don't want to do something, they'll simply argue, "That's my pastor's job, not mine." And this is exactly what has happened and why the church functions today more like a corporation than a fellowship. We rally behind an institution we call the church rather than a body of people who are organized around a man who gave us a mission - all because of the "that's not my job, it's his" excuse.

Find me one place where the Bible identifies "discipleship" as a unique spiritual gift only given to some, or one place where it instructs that not everyone is called to make disciples. Do that and I may change my mind. But in my many years of searching I have yet to find that passage. As such, any conclusion along those lines is merely a philosophy of Scripture that runs contrary to the direct implications of Jesus' words and the writings of the apostles.

I should also note, when you cite Malachi 2:15 and say that producing godly offspring is sufficient for a man, or when you quote Genesis 1:28 and say that fulfilling this is a "fantastic and thoroughly Biblical mission" - what would you say about the other commands?

Could I quote Jesus' command to "pray for your enemies" and say that my mission is to pray for my enemies, and then ignore all the other commands in the Bible because I have found a passage, built my mission around it, and decided that this alone is enough?

"Of course not, it would still be sin to lie, steal, lust, etc. You still have to avoid all of those other sins." Sure, but what about the other affirmative commands? A man might have a specific calling of praying for his enemies, but that must still fall into the greater framework of disciple-making. If his prayer for his enemies is not contributing to his ability to make disciples of those enemies, or of those who hear him praying for his enemies, or anyone somehow somewhere ... then what good has he done?

Mental Point of Origin and Philipians 2

1 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

If you mean the one about your book, I'll PM you about it separately.

The Proverbs 31 Woman In The Modern Era

1 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

As /u/Deep_Strength said (tagging because I'm butting in on a conversation), women communicate covertly, not overtly. Don't expect them to be men. If they were, you wouldn't want to date them in the first place.

But what's more relevant here is the distinction between SMV and RMV. You're almost certainly evaluating your behaviors as "off putting" or "on putting" in terms of what would increase your SMV in her eyes. You may be right.

But what DS is talking about is the fact that women have a completely different and separate scale that affects her perception of a man's Relationship Market Value.

MMSLP is probably the best book for understanding this dichotomy. It explains what Athol Kay defines as "alpha" traits that affect a man's sexual attraction, and "beta" traits (misusing that word) which affect a woman's perception of him as a long-term relational prospect. On the AFBB spectrum, AF affects SMV and BB affects RMV. This is why the "oak" concept was developed - to help a man find a balance between the traits necessary to both attract her sexually and keep her invested relationally. As cholomite once said, "Tingles without fuzzies won't last. Fuzzies without tingles are worthless."

So, if you think your SMV is real high, what can you do to enhance your RMV?

[FR] Fixing your SMV

1 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I got the pun, but I thought it was important to explain anyway.

I agree that all of these things are futile if they are an end in themselves. But the fact that we have a higher purpose does not mean we can be negligent in these areas.

My investment in those things is not for their own sake. It is to create a context for Christ's sake. Where do you think I meet many of the non-Christians I share the Gospel with? At the gym. How do you think I developed the confidence to approach them and overcome my timidity in starting those conversations and fear or rejection? By developing an alpha attitude. How do you think I got them to listen to me? By being charming and charismatic. Know where else I've found people to evangelize and ultimately disciple? Through my job, as my law clerk once noticed my work ethic and saw my successes and wanted to learn from me, giving me an opportunity to share Christ with him. Want to know where else? By having lots of friends and acquaintances who are drawn to what God is doing through me. I say this not to brag, but simply to say that there is value in being good stewards of what God gave us and I find that men who tend to neglect these things often tend to have fruitless ministries. As Jesus suggests in Matthew 7, we are evaluated by our fruit. I know what has helped increase my capacity to bear fruit. These things are not the only 5 things I do, but they are a starting point for many men who otherwise lack the ability to influence others for Christ. To that end, I do believe God's Kingdom does greatly value men who are diligent in these areas - and I have yet for you to provide a verse that supports the claim that "His kingdom ... does not value any of those worldly goals." You're making a philosophical point here, not a theological one, unless you can show me a verse where God says, "I do not want you to be in shape" or "I do not want you to be confident" or "I do not want you to have good jobs" or "I do not want you to have appealing personalities" or "I do not want you to have many friends."

You're missing the point and still refusing to answer the questions I presented. As Brother Lawrence once said, "The true work of sanctification is not in changing what we do, but in doing for Christ that which we have otherwise done for ourselves."

I get that you pursued all of these things in your past. From the way you talk about it, you did it for yourself. You did these things based on your own sake and your own motives. But if we were to redeem and reconcile these pursuits to God's purposes, there is immense value in that.

What it comes down to is that you're trying to box away and isolate everything. You're trying to say, "This matters, but not that," while failing to realize the way that this and that are interconnected. A basic example is home life and work life. Many suggest we should make our home lives a priority, others prefer to prioritize their careers. In reality, our performance in our career affects our home life, just as what we experience in our home life affects our careers. In the same way, even though you have yet to say what you think is an actual biblical pursuit, my guess is that whatever it is, you're trying to isolate it and assume that it is not at all in any way influenced by anything else other than its own little box. In reality, I'm fairly confident that improvements in the character traits I've mentioned above will likely have a significant affect on one's capacity to live out whatever hypothetical purpose you're probably dreaming of.

If I have been made complete in Christ, why do I need to find my "completeness" outside of Him?

When did I ever say to find our completeness in these things I'm asking men to improve?

Once again - your entire strategy is to pick apart what someone else is saying rather than presenting a position of your own. This is weak and shallow. It's luke-warm. Figure out what your own position is first and then pursue it.

Don't just live by picking apart other people's positions. I know my views aren't perfect and I'll embrace that. But until a better way is presented, I can only go with the best way I know, no matter how imperfect it may be.

[FR] Fixing your SMV

1 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Why, are you Curious?

It helps me figure out how well you're familiar with places like MRP and TRP. Because you stick mostly to the blogs, you probably have a rosier color in your eyes about what the manosphere looks like, which can explain why we have a difference of opinion on how to reach these guys.

The way to biblically take care of your body is not to sin (including drunkenness and gluttony)

In other words, there are situations where the condition of one's body in the negative is de facto evidence of sin - gluttony, sloth, poor health from self-inflicted substance abuse, etc. But in the reverse, there is no such de facto evidence of sin for having a well-built body. Or are you suggesting we be luke-warm and live in mediocrity with our bodies?

I am in support of men not being timid or lack boldness when it comes to sharing the gospel and/or publicly standing up for the Truth. Acts of worldly manliness for the sake of being manly is not supported by the Bible.

How do you think men will learn to develop boldness in sharing their faith? If we isolate the trait to one specific aspect of life (evangelism, for example), it will never be ingrained in us as a character issue.

The Bible encourages us to be gentle, meek, humble, not paying back evil with evil but with good, patient, suffering wrong, etc.

Of course, none of which are in conflict with being confident, assertive, bold, etc. - which were all modeled by Jesus also.

the love of money is the root of all sorts of evil. Thus earning a living should be a means to an end and not the end itself.

Right. Which is why I am giving men a starter-motive for making money that isn't related to wealth for its own sake. This trains men to recognize that money is a means to an end, as you've noted. But until men have a practical example, they often can't comprehend the spiritual truth ... which is why God gave us the Old Testament for 4,000 years before giving us the New Testament - so that we'd have practical examples to help us understand the Gospel when the time came.

No one can have more of an ideal personality and character than Jesus had. Did he gain the respect of outsiders or did they try to kill him?

Both. This is the parable of the great banquet. Jesus was both a charismatic and offensive man. People were drawn to his charisma, often commenting on the way he communicated - "as one with authority, unlike the Pharisees and teachers of the law." But they were also off-put by the way that he stepped on the toes of the people he knew were hardened against him already anyway.

For us, we will certainly face rejection, but not by everyone. As we develop a personality that earns respect, we advance our ability to make a difference in the world for Christ, hopefully decreasing those who would reject us and increasing those who would accept Christ because of us.

Quite frankly I'm not into building personal relationships with the world (for the reasons stated above) so there really is no time to build those relationships.

This is the biggest and most fundamental difference in our philosophies of ministry. I believe Jesus' method of ministry and discipleship, including evangelism, was incredibly personal and relational. If you're more of a proclamational evangelist over a relational/balanced, then we'll have to agree to disagree on the importance of the points referenced in the rest of this conversation, as that explains fully why we're not seeing eye to eye.

My point is that suggesting improvement in the areas that you detailed in your post is not addressing the true need that the Bible says is inherent in fallen man. It's a heart issue.

Again, if you take this one post out of the context of everything else I've written, I can see how you'd come to this conclusion ... just as I could easily rag on Jesus for missing the "true need" of men when he preached about hell. But look at those passages in the context of everything he said and we realize that every word Christ spoke was useful, even though not every single word was specifically talking about the "heart issue" you reference.

not content with the gift of eternal life?

I don't think that's what men should be content with in the first place. Our contentment is in Christ himself, not the eternal life he gives us. Christ is our groom. Marriage is a parallel for the Christ/church relationship. Helping men improve their marriages gives them a better parallel to look at when trying to understand what God expects from them in his marriage to the church.

As a rule of thumb, RP says, "Women don't love you; they love what you can offer her." Your conclusion is the same: that Christ's bride should be satisfied with what Christ offers her. In my view, this is wrong.

I know God cares

And yet you haven't explained how he cares about any of these aspects of our lives. You're keeping your conclusions very nebulous, doing what I often see in courtrooms - people who would rather pick apart someone else's argument rather than figuring out what their own actual position is in the first place.

I had a lady do this to me recently. I sent a settlement proposal. She rejected it with a million explanations why it was wrong. I said, "Okay, if this isn't acceptable to you, tell me what is." A year went by of my pressing this issue and even her own attorney couldn't get her to say what her actual position was. She only wanted to explain why my client's position was wrong - never take a stance herself.

To that end:

Body - Do you think God wants us to be physically fit or do you think he doesn't care about our bodies as long as we're not committing gluttony, sloth, etc.?

Alphanness - Do you think God wants us to be purposeful people who set goals, pursue them, take initiative, etc., or that he doesn't care about our internal drive?

Money - Do you think that God wants us to work hard and earn a good wage, or do you think he doesn't care whether people have a good work ethic?

Charm, Character, Etc. - Do you think God wants us to be improving our ability to interact with others both inside and outside his kingdom, or that God doesn't care about our social skills?

Social Status - Do you think God wants us building relationships with his other children as well, or that God doesn't care about whether his people improve the scope of their fellowship?

Morality and Ethics - I'll assume your agreement means you do have a stance on this issue and it's the same as mine.

I'm just not sure how you could argue that God does care about these things, but then also be arguing that men shouldn't be taught to improve themselves in these areas. It's just mind-boggling to me.

Introduction

1 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

So better to stay single.

That's the right starting point there. Bravo. And if a girl comes along the way, so be it.

Low hanging fruit includes being alpha and passing tests. And dropping body fat.

So you mentioned that you've been working out for a while now. What are you going to do to adjust your workout and diet regimen beyond what you've done in the past?

What practical measures can you take this week to start practicing alpha traits and developing your confidence?

And yeah, i am gonna be picky as much as possible

Good for you! My point was simply to say that you're not likely to find better girls until your SMV is up, so the girls you would otherwise pick will be later on down the road.

this is not an attack

I didn't take it that way at all :)

evangelism and discipleship, encourage others, intercessor for those who are weak Beautiful!

I won't go into details, but its something big for the kingdom.

I'd love to hear more. I used to have this ideology as well, with clear visions about what it would be like ... until I realized that it was really a message from the enemy manipulating my pride. I had to abandon that vision before God would finally allow my life to start bearing fruit. Hopefully yours isn't the same thing :)

Theory: Why The Average Christian Woman Is Unattractive

1 upvotes · 3 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks. This is good, although still a few stories up in the air and not quite as down to earth :p I like the idea of helping my wife model this for the girls. It really prompted me to think:

Christ is our groom. Generally, in biblical times the wife was at home and the groom was away to work most of the day, just as Christ is away at work in the world, leaving his bride to tend to his children - his Spirit and instruction still with us, guiding how we should raise them.

I don't really like this conclusion because it takes a lot of power out of my hands and forces me to trust my wife to pick up from my lead to lead them. But I do see that as a direct parallel to the way that God empowers his bride and trusts her rather than doing all the work himself. So, then I have to ask: am I properly leading my bride to be trustworthy? Then when the time comes do I actually trust her?

Theory: Why The Average Christian Woman Is Unattractive

1 upvotes · 2 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's a good point. Thanks.

[FR] Fixing your SMV

1 upvotes · 1 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

2/2

As for these qualities themselves, I'm hopeful that you do not disagree as to the biblical foundation for them, but let me share it anyway:

Looks

Although the context is sexual purity, 1 Cor. 6:19-20 does give an important principle: "You are not your own; you were bought at a price. Therefore honor God with your bodies." Our bodies are not ours to let fall into dilapidation. They are on loan to us and it is our obligation to care for our bodies. 1 Timothy 4:8 also acknowledges that physical exercise has value for believers, while still rightly prioritizing our spiritual maturity as a higher concern in the long-term.

If you want to be more direct on passages, Paul says in 1 Cor. 9:27, "But I discipline my body and keep it under control." Proverbs 31:17 encourages women to "dress herself with strength and make her arms strong." Proverbs 24:5 says, "A wise man is full of strength, and a man of knowledge enhances his might." Romans 12:1 says that we will present our bodies to God and that this is our spiritual act of worship. Hebrews 12:11-12 also says that there is value in being disciplined and in training, "Therefore lift your drooping hands and strengthen your weak knees." There are also numerous verses that condemn sloth, laziness, and not being a good steward of that which God has given us, which includes our bodies.

If you want to get in on fashion, although there's a deeper meaning, Jesus uses the tangible example for a reason in Matthew 22. In the parable of the wedding feast, the Father throws out a man who didn't come dressed in proper attire. There was no, "But inwardly I'm in a good place" argument to be made.

As a practical matter, go on YouTube or Google and search for the top preachers of our day. Look at how many of them are morbidly obese or have bad hygiene or are in slob-clothes. Joel Osteen comes to mind. He's one of the most influential pastors in the world today. I can't stand the guy and virtually anything he preaches. But he has earned the influence of the world, in great part due to his appearance, which is plastered on the cover of most of his books. To that end, 1 Thess. 4:12 encourages us all to live in such a way that earns the respect of outsiders.

I could go on, but I think you get the point.

Confidence

"God gave us a spirit not of fear but of power and love and self control" (1 Timothy 1:7). Hebrews 10:35 says, "Therefore do not throw away your confidence, which has a great reward." Hebrews 13:6 talks about the alpha mindset of not worrying about what others think or do to us - "So we can confidently say, 'The Lord is my helper; I will not fear; what can man do to me?'" In Joshua 1:9 God refrains, "Have I not commanded you? Be strong and courageous."

Acts 28:31 suggests that we should be "proclaiming the kingdom of God and teaching about the Lord Jesus Christ with all boldness and without hindrance." Proverbs 28:1 says, "The wicked flee when no one pursues, but the righteous are bold as a lion." Ephesians 3:12 talks about the boldness that we have because of our access to God and Christ's strength. 2 Cor. 3:12 says, "Since we have such a hope, we are very bold." In acts 4 we see Peter and John setting an example of boldness in how they preach the Gospel.

With regard to not being swayed by what others think of us, maintaining the DNGAF attitude, Proverbs 29:25 says, "It is dangerous to be concerned with what others think of you." In 2 Cor. 5:13 Paul says he's fine with the rest of the world thinking the apostles are "out of our mind," as people were accusing them of being. Isaiah 26:3 says, "You will keep in perfect peace those whose minds are steadfast, because they trust in you," demonstrating that we should not be swayed by human opinions or what others think of us.

Perhaps most significantly: Galatians 1:10 says, "Am I saying this now to win the approval of people or God? Am I trying to please people? If I were still trying to please people, I would not be Christ's servant."

Financially Established

The Bible has much to say about being financially established as well. Proverbs 22:7 notes that "the rich rules over the poor, and the borrower is the slave of the lender." Likewise, Romans 13:7-8 compels us to pay what we owe and not to be indebted to anyone, also noting that revenue should be given to whom it is due. 2 Thess. 3:10 says, "If anyone is not willing to work, let him not eat," suggesting that a person should be encouraged to earn a living to meet their own provision and for the family they would like to establish. To that end, 1 Timothy 5:8 says, "But if anyone does not provide for his relatives, and especially for the members of his household, he has denied the faith and is worse than an unbeliever." That's pretty harsh.

Sure, we could also cite that "money is a root of all kinds of evil," but note that I'm not encouraging people to love money. I'm encouraging people to utilize money as a resource, which I do believe these and other verses encourages as well.

Charm, Charisma, Personality, etc.

Colossians 4:6 says, "Let your speech always be gracious, seasoned with salt, so that you may know how you ought to answer each person." Ephesians 4:29 says, "Let no corrupt talk come out of your mouth, but only such as is good for building up, as fits the occasion, that it may give grace to those who hear." Learning how to be a good conversationist and make people enjoy conversations with you is a positive life skill that is essential in ministry.

Social Network

Ecc. 4:9-12 says, "Two are better than one because they have a good reward for their toil ... but woe to him who is alone when he falls and has not another to lift him up ... a threefold cord is not quickly broken." Proverbs 27:17 says, "Iron sharpens iron, and one man sharpens another." Hebrews 10:24-25 says, "And let us consider how to stir up one another to love and good works, not neglecting to meet together, as is the habit of some, but encouraging one another, and all the more as you see the Day drawing near." In John 17 Jesus prays over his apostles that they would be sent into the world. In the epistles we see the apostles setting the example of building many relationships, addressing many such people by name. In short, if we are to have an effective ministry for God's Kingdom, like Jesus we must build a following of people who are drawn to us - especially if it is because of Christ in us.

Morality, Ethics

I assume I don't need to explain the biblical basis for this.

My point in going through the above is simply to note that I have given guys a tangible motive for developing in biblical attributes that will be immensely helpful when they start to take heed of the majority of everything else I say on this sub: get a mission that involves making disciples and start living it out.

So, when you ask, "Where in God's kingdom is that relevant?" That's how it's all relevant.

[FR] Fixing your SMV

1 upvotes · 1 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

1/2

This is a valid point to raise, and I appreciate that you did so. It's also one that I addressed in a couple other comments. The middle section of this one that I just wrote is a good example.

To break it down, a man (1) improving his appearance, (2) developing his confidence, (3) becoming financially established, (4) cultivating an appealing personality, (5) improving one's social network, and (6) developing a moral/ethical character - these are all biblical concepts.

As I've said before - even openly and unashamedly - my purpose in making this sub is not merely about improving masculinity and sexuality among Christian men. I created this sub to make disciples of guys who would otherwise be led astray by secular RP due to their desperation from failed intergender relational dynamics in their lives.

Sex and finding a wife are the main areas where most men here are hurting. That's what speaks to them. Those are the answers they're looking for. But what they don't realize is that the solution to their problems is not for their human relationships to be fixed, but for their spiritual relationship with God to be fixed - and that they live for his purposes and not making the pursuit of a wife/sex their purpose. I've made this abundantly clear on this sub many times.

But if I were just to hop into a post about how being a (1) good looking (2) confident alpha (3) financially established (4) charming guy with (5) a strong social network (6) and solid moral compass will help them reach the world for Christ ... nobody would care. So, I have to start with something that does actually matter to a man. It's by God's design that the things that cultivate a desire for physical reproduction among humans is parallel to the things that will cultivate a desire for spiritual reproduction with our groom.

To that end, if a guy wants to use a shallow motive as a foundation for developing godly qualities in his life, whereas a biblical motive wouldn't trigger something in him - then I'll let him start with the shallow motive and work his way up.

As I recently wrote to /u/Uncommon_Sense_12345, in this post: "in order to get men on an appropriate mission, they need a practical motivator." I also commented there that this is just like "turn or burn" or "hellfire and brimstone" evangelists. They're preaching a wrong motive for getting people to turn to Christ. But I also see that Jesus preached about hell a lot too - and used this as a specific motivator to get people to repent. Likewise, Paul even says in Philippians 1 when people were preaching from false motives, "But what does it matter? The important thing is that in every way, whether from false motives or true, Christ is preached. And because of this I rejoice." To that end, if a guy needs a practical motivator to start him on his journey that will help him find a right motivation for developing godly attributes in his life, then I'm happy to follow in the example of Jesus by giving them that practical first step. The important thing to me is that, at least for now, I'm encouraging Christian men to develop in qualities that will increase their social influence for Christ. Showing them how to utilize that social influence will be part of the ongoing 300 series, which I admittedly haven't written much in for a very long time.

Theory: Why The Average Christian Woman Is Unattractive

1 upvotes · 1 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent thoughts here. I really enjoyed this read.

the reality in most churches is that women do not feel the need to compete for men

I think a more basic reason is that most women don't feel a compulsive need to marry within the church. I can't count the number of women who have posted on reddit, been in small groups I've led, or talk about it on women's forums - that they're with a non-Christian guy and they're struggling because they loooooove him, but he's not willing to follow basic biblical principles for living or leading the relationship. We literally just had a post on this here on this sub just the other day. Most of these women end up back together with these non-Christian men.

Why does this happen? Because the church fails to teach biblical headship. She thinks that she can keep her obligation to God separate from her obligation to her husband. If the women in the church were appropriately instructed on not being yoked together with non-believers and the fact that their obligation to their husbands is something of actual substance and not the feminist version of marriage, then (assuming these women actually follow their pastor's advice) we would see a stark change almost immediately in the number of women who become more competitive to snag those godly single men.

Shopping for a wife from outside the church (aka: importing) is generally frowned upon.

For men, yes. I have not yet seen this imperative directed toward women, or the women simply aren't getting it. There are multiples more women willing to date outside the church than men. I think this has something to do with the whole "men follow God, women follow men" thing in 1 Cor. 11:3, but I don't want to speculate too much on that.

Thus, Christian women, do not feel the need to compete with "foreign brands" in the market.

Indeed. But the men do. Yet they're also told not to step up to the plate and improve themselves; they're told to become more like women.

A highly attractive single Christian woman will be sexually pursued by men outside the church, increasing her abundance, while Christian men are largely limited to the bounds of the church in their sexual pursuits, decreasing their relative abundance.

Ah ha! And now I see that I was writing my response too early before finishing the post :p

While it seems counter-intuitive to elevate the competition, this could be a case where a rising tide lifts every boat.

My reaction to this is less about getting hotter women in the church and more toward the fact that higher SMV guys will simply have a greater influence on society for Christ. So, as a whole, regardless of whether or not it's wise to increase competition within a niche SMP, there are other reasons why this should be engaged in anyway. The fact that it also improves the quality of women we're around is an added bonus, if it actually works.

But again, as you've already noted, I'm skeptical of this potential solution because those women will still be told by the church leaders and the rest of the world that they're fine just as they are and that men should want to marry them for what's inside and shouldn't care if they're 50-100lbs overweight.

Now let me shoot one back. I have 3 daughters. Two of them are old enough to talk and even at the ages of 3 and 4 I can already tell they're going to be boy crazy someday - and they will be HOT. I don't mean to be too Donald Trump-ish in saying that, but when I look at my daughters and what they prospectively stand to be someday, they're going to be gorgeous.

They're also incredibly emotional - far worse than I ever thought possible. When hormones start kicking in to worsen this issue, if I'm raising my daughters to cultivate their beauty, what do you recommend in the way of also training them to honor and revere their purity without causing psychological damage about sexuality that my wife experienced?

My primary plan right now is simply that I be the one to satisfy their need for validation, just like our spiritual Father places himself in the place of fulfilling our need for validation instead of us looking to the world. To that end, I have already started the process of giving them that validation in small ways and training them to rely on me so that one day they will trust my judgment when I decide whether or not to give their hearts to other specific men who come in their lives. But I'd love to hear your thoughts on this too.

[FR] Fixing your SMV

1 upvotes · 1 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Hah ... I debated even putting that in there at all. That criterion is less about how good a guy is and more about whether he's an inconsistent fraud.

[FR] Fixing your SMV

1 upvotes · 1 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's certainly an interesting thought process. But a lot of that depends on how one defines a marriage. The going definition around here seems to be sex + covenant. A covenant is still valid and binding, even if one person doesn't know what they're getting themselves into when they sign up for it. But I do see your point, and it's interesting to ponder.

I'd be less inclined to assume that lots of genuine Christians are getting into sham marriages and more toward the view that lots of sham Christians are getting into genuine marriages. I'm more skeptical about their faith than I am in the validity of their vows. But I do believe the Catholic church's position is that non-Christian marriage is no marriage at all, so that may still lead to the same conclusion under your line of thinking.

[FR] Fixing your SMV

1 upvotes · 1 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

These are some fair thoughts. Here's my perspective:

are you really enjoying it if sex is contingent upon you keeping up your SMV for your wife

Yes, it's still enjoyable.

Does the sex stop if you gain ten pounds?

That depends on (1) whether or not the husband has room to drop in his SMV while still demonstrating a substantial enough value to be attractive, or (2) whether or not the wife has a biblical attitude about the marriage bedroom.

What happens if you become unemployed?

Then the man must return to work in some capacity. He still has a biblical obligation to his family independent of sex.

This focus is nothing but another form of a covert contract

I can see how it would appear that way. But that really only applies to married couples, whereas in a Christian setting married men aren't necessarily on the "market" in the first place.

Nevertheless, the underlying principles hold true. As I wrote in (I think) 106, in my experience and observation, what attracted a woman before marriage is still going to be what attracts her after marriage. As /u/OsmiumZulu once wrote, saying "I do" to a man or "the prayer" to God doesn't magically make a woman's biology change or cause her vagina to suddenly function differently from every other woman.

Accordingly, there is still value for married men to understand basic concepts of SMV, as it's an easier frame of reference than the otherwise broad notions of "be a godly man and she'll be all over you," which can mean a million different things. Even at that, most Christians today don't understand that physical fitness is part of being godly or that being confident and assertive is an important aspect of our ability to live out our mission to God.

As I have said repeatedly on this sub, our mission to God is the most important thing. Once a man is living that out the way God intended, all other things tend to fall naturally into place. The problem is that we often want to cut corners and think, "It's okay if I've got a chubby belly. That won't affect how people view me and whether or not they'll respect me enough to pay attention to the Gospel when I preach it." But this is wrong thinking, on the whole, with only a few exceptional cases.

More to the point: in order to get men on an appropriate mission, they need a practical motivator. God designed the physical things of this world to be a starting point to get us oriented toward the spiritual things. I don't see a problem with a man using his motivation to have a healthy sex life with his wife as a foundation for improving in godliness. His motives should reorient in time as his spiritual maturity grows.

This is the same deal with hellfire and brimstone evangelists. I really can't stand them, most of the time. They often don't come off as genuine or authentic and they're preaching a "wrong" motive for coming to faith: simply to avoid hell, as opposed to wanting Jesus. But then I look at Jesus's preaching, and you know what I found? He has several passages where he preaches hellfire and brimstone. He also used fear of hell as a motivator to get people oriented toward God, even though he knew that wasn't the ultimate motive he wanted them to end up with.

Anyway, I'm probably off topic at this point. I'm simply trying to say that I think it's okay to give men a tangible motive as a starting point to orient them toward a bigger and better purpose down the road - and once they have the mission, confidence to carry it out, the physique that earns the respect of outsiders, and a frame that won't let them be tempted astray, they're well on their way to being incredible influences for God's Kingdom.

[FR] Fixing your SMV

1 upvotes · 1 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

There can, of course, be multiple contributing factors to someone who is generally sexually averse. It's not just one thing.

When do you or any other Christian man get to enjoy a truly Christian marriage?

In my life, that's right now.

With all the talk of SMV in a Christian marriage such as yours, what happens if you become disabled or suffer from ED not fixed by medical intervention?

As I've noted before, our personal happiness and fulfillment is not the point of marriage. Reproduction is. The physically reproductive aspect of marriage (i.e. sex) is merely a road. The destination is spiritual reproduction. Marriages that suffer from irreparable sexual issues can still be fulfilling by looking to the spiritual satisfaction of evangelism and discipleship as the reproductive aspects of our relationship with God, even in the absence of being able to taste this on a physical level.

There's a new guy at my church who I've met with who has been dealing with this for a long time. He has/had a sexual addiction and his wife has a physical condition that, despite surgical efforts to solve the problem, make any sexual activity painful for her. So, they've simply resolved to remain celibate for the past 10 years. I'm sure that was challenging - especially in the beginning. But I also see that they're doing wonders for God's Kingdom, sharing the Gospel and making disciples wherever they go, unlike many others I've seen.

To that end, the "SexMV" turns into the "E/DMV" (Evangelism/Discipleship).

[FR] Fixing your SMV

1 upvotes · 1 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The usual kind, sure ;)

Recent breakup - emotional aftermath and conflict

1 upvotes · 1 August 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well said

Recent breakup - emotional aftermath and conflict

1 upvotes · 31 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed. He has done that for me too :) But I also don't believe that the apostles desired to be martyred, or Steven stoned, or Joseph kidnapped by his brothers and sold into slavery, or Moses wandering through the desert for 40 years.

I guess I just struggle against the view that "trust Jesus" can be used as a catch-all to assume that God will just give us whatever we want if we have enough faith.

Recent breakup - emotional aftermath and conflict

1 upvotes · 31 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm very sorry to hear about the pain you're experiencing. I know it's not easy. Something you said does intrigue me, though:

and how trusting in the Lord will give it fruit

I hear a lot of people use the phrase, "trust in Jesus!" or "have faith in God!" But what does that actually mean to you?

I know what it means to me, but most people I talk to interpret those phrases as merely having a higher degree of confidence that God's plan is aligned with their own desired outcomes. But isn't that conflating God's will with our own?

For example, what if God's will was for you to remain single? Or what if it's His will for you to get cancer and die? Or what if it's his will for you to vacation in another country where you're kidnapped by terrorists and martyred for your faith? Does "trust in the Lord" still apply in those situations? How do we correlate our trust in God and our own intended and desired outcomes?

I'd love to hear more on how you interpret and apply the phrase: "trust in the Lord."

Recent breakup - emotional aftermath and conflict

1 upvotes · 31 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I believe I love him

The way you say this makes me think that you're evaluating something inside of yourself to make this determination. But love is an expressive external thing, not internal. When we say, "I love you" to someone, it can have many meanings. The pop-culture definition merely means, "I have fuzzy emotional feelings toward you." If we say it in a biblical sense, it means, "I behave toward you in a way that is patient, kind, without envy or boasting, not rude, etc." To that end, even if I never had any emotional interest in my wife, I could still appropriately love her in a biblical sense by behaving toward her in a loving way. That is biblical love. Likewise, there have been many times (especially when we were dating) where my wife had warm, fuzzy feelings toward me, but she did not behave in a way that was consistent with a biblical depiction of love. As such, she did not actually love me, even though her feelings may have caused her to believe she did - because she confused biblical love (what we do) with worldly love (how we feel).

Was it natural for me to be hurt by that - because I'd always thought that it was something to be respected for?

Yes, you are perfectly within your rights to be hurt by this. He's taking something that you value and that God values and undermining the significance of this. This once again shows his poor character and that he is not a good choice for a prospective spouse.

So...why is sexual relations wrong? (I have an answer but I would like to compare).

The easiest answer is simply: "Because God says so." But to understand why he said so, it's important to remember that what God establishes in physical, tangible ways on earth he means to parallel to a spiritual truth that only makes sense in light of the Gospel. That is, the way we conduct ourselves physically is a reflection on the spiritual truths about God and we are meant to reflect the truth of God to the world, not a lie.

Marriage is no exception to this. In both the old and new testament God calls himself (or Jesus) our groom and us his bride. Likewise, there are substantial parallels with the pre-marriage relationship. At its core, sex is a reproductive act. Malachi 2:15 says, "And why did the Lord God make them one with a portion of his Spirit in their union? To produce godly offspring." That physical reproduction was meant to highlight the type of spiritual reproduction that Christ wants to engage in with his bride - the Church - in a post-Gospel world. The command to "be fruitful and multiply" was a physical command to Adam and Eve, but today we understand it by virtue of Matthew 13 and a variety of other passages and parables, to be a spiritual imperative to multiply our lives through discipleship the way Jesus modeled it.

That reproductive act is always with the groom indwelling his bride. In a physical sense, a man puts his penis inside a woman and leaves some of his essence inside of her through the act of sex. In the process of spiritual reproduction, Christ gives us his Holy Spirit to indwell within us (or in some verses, he also indwells within us), and this is meant to cause spiritual procreation - that people would be "born again" as the fruit of our oneness bond with Christ.

Now, when we look at premarital sex, we're dealing with people who are not married. If a man indwells his penis inside of a woman before marriage, this communicates to the world that God will also indwell within non-Christians who are not actually married to him - that is, they aren't part of his bride, the Church. But God does not engage in reproductive acts with non-Christians. Matthew 7 is clear on this: "No bad tree produces good fruit." There are also a host of passages about Jesus' rejection of those who will not follow him.

So, when we engage in premarital sex we are reflecting a false image of God to the world. We are designed to bear God's image, but we're misleading people instead. When we portray through our physical behaviors that God is less than or different from what he actually is, this steals from God's glory and is sin.

Sure, there are lots of other practical reasons why premarital sex is sinful, like risk of unplanned pregnancy, STDs, etc. that God wanted to protect us from, but at the end of the day this is all about Him, not us. We must evaluate sinfulness from a perspective that accounts for God's glory, not just what benefits us and this world.

If I had approached the idea of marriage from that perspective, I believe we would probably have matured spiritually and emotionally together.

But here's the thing: you're assuming that if you started moving in one direction, he would have followed, ergo you and him moving in this right path "together." But that would be an unbiblical relationship. Your duty before God is also to your husband - to follow his lead, not to have him follow your lead toward God. If you were to be the one leading the relationship toward godliness, it would be a self-defeating endeavor because you would actually be defying God's intended design for relationships. So, are you to displease God by defying his design for you in order to try to please him in some other way? It puts you in a weird catch-22.

The only rational conclusion here is that a man, as God's appointed leader in a relationship, has the ability to lead the woman he chooses into godliness, but the woman does not have the same right when selecting a prospective spouse. Of course, you can do this with men generally, for the sake of the Gospel. But if you're in a "moving toward marriage" context, your man is to be your leader, not the reverse. In that sense, women are intended by God to be somewhat hypergamous with regard to the spiritual maturity of the men they choose to pursue relationships with. A woman should never date or marry a man who is less spiritually mature than she is because that would almost always create a conflict between who she is following.

Consider this continuum: Coming from ---> Him ---> You ---> God.

In that order of things, if you pursue God, you're walking away from your man. Even if your man is pursuing God too and moving in the same direction, he's following behind you. So, if you were to follow your husband, you would have to abandon your pursuit of God for a time to do it, in order to let him get ahead. This is obviously not biblical or appropriate. So, no woman should put herself in the position where her man is less spiritually mature than she is.

But consider this continuum: Coming from ---> You ---> Him ---> God

In this flow, your man is ahead of you in his walk toward god. He is more spiritually mature. So, as you walk toward God, you're following behind him. It doesn't matter if you say, "I follow God" or "I follow my husband" because they are one and the same, as opposed to the previous model where you are torn between making your husband follow you so that you can follow God, or abandoning your pursuit of God in order to follow your husband.

Tag: /u/Deep_Strength, /u/RedPillWonder, /u/rocknrollchuck - because I'm interested in your thoughts on any of this.

Church Discipline

1 upvotes · 31 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed. But it never happens.

Church Discipline

1 upvotes · 31 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well said. Let me add something to this. Most women I've ever met are emotional empaths. I tried the route of self sacrifice. I put my happiness aside to give her what she wanted. She emphatically sensed my unhappiness and harbored resentment toward me as a projection of the resentment I had for her. No matter how hard I tried to please her, she was not happy, so my resentment grew and her empathic senses caused her resentment of me to grow proportionately.

When I stopped trying to please her and started leading along my own path, she started hearing the word no a lot. She didn't get her way often, but for some reason she was happy. She empathically sensed my happiness and it rubbed off on her so that she began to experience my happiness alongside me, even though she didn't get her way.

Authority and leadership, when employed within biblical boundaries, are better for the wife than all the freedom that feminism has to offer. Feminism really only benefits the woman who intends to remain single all her life.

Church Discipline

1 upvotes · 31 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well said. Let me add something to this. Most women I've ever met are emotional empaths. I tried the route of self sacrifice. I put my happiness aside to give her what she wanted. She emphatically sensed my unhappiness and harbored resentment toward me as a projection of the resentment I had for her. No matter how hard I tried to please her, she was not happy, so my resentment grew and her empathic senses caused her resentment of me to grow proportionately.

When I stopped trying to please her and started leading along my own path, she started hearing the word no a lot. She didn't get her way often, but for some reason she was happy. She empathically sensed my happiness and it rubbed off on her so that she began to experience my happiness alongside me, even though she didn't get her way.

Authority and leadership, when employed within biblical boundaries, are better for the wife than all the freedom that feminism has to offer. Feminism really only benefits the woman who intends to remain single all her life.

Paradox of Marriage

1 upvotes · 30 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Sorry for the late reply. I've been on vacation.

Yes, sex is the primary core of marriage. I already gave three different passages in my previous comment to support that position and I stand by it. A man can lead a woman without being married to her. But the same cannot be said of having sex, at least in a biblical context. If a guy was merely looking to have a woman follow him, he would never have to marry her, and many women would be just fine with a platonic relationship like that. But once the two are tempted to have sex, then they're to get married, right?

Where does Eph 3:22-30 come into play?

I think you mean Ephesians 5, but I still don't understand the question. It's always in play. I could say the point of football is to score more points than the other side. You could then ask, "Well, what about the out of bounds line? Where do they come into play?" They're always in play. That doesn't mean that football is all about keeping the ball in bounds. Ephesians 5:22 et seq. is a boundary line that should not be crossed. It's not what marriage is all about in itself.

Malachi 2:15 actually specifically asks this question and then answers it: "And why did the Lord God make them one with a portion of his Spirit in their union? To produce godly offspring." The "why" behind marriage is reproduction, which is sex.

These verses teach us that marriage is an illustration of Christ's love for His church.

Absolutely they do - but in what way? I think you mistakenly interpret Jesus' love as some butterfly feeling he gets in his stomach when he thinks of us. But the Bible makes it clear what the foundation of God's love is for us. In his final ascent Jesus didn't tell his bride, the apostles who would be founding the church, "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me, therefore let's have good feelings toward one another." He said, "Go and make disciples of all nations." This process of spiritual reproduction is the parallel of physical reproduction in marriage. That's why God established physical marriage in the first place - so that when Jesus came to enter into a spiritual marriage with us, we would know what he would expect in that relationship and what the purpose would be. To that end, why do you think God made physical reproduction the epitome experience of the physical world? To show that spiritual reproduction should also be the epitome experience of our spiritual lives. And just as raising kids is considered the most joyful thing a person can do in the physical world, giving meaning to their lives, so also is discipleship - spiritual child-rearing - the most joyful thing we can do in our spiritual lives.

Let me tackle this from another angle too. Marriage is defined by two people becoming one flesh. The husband enters his wife and physically indwells within her, and this prompts reproduction, right?

Now look at what the Bible says should spiritually indwell us. There are only three things that I could ever find in Scripture to answer that:

- God's Word: In Matthew 13 Jesus tells the parable of the sower, where the seed is planted inside of the ground. He explains the parable saying that the seed is God's Word.
- Jesus: In John 17 Jesus is praying over his disciples and notes, "I in them and you in me" - that he indwells within us. Colossians 1:27 also calls it, "this mystery, which is Christ in you."
- Holy Spirit: Acts 1:8 says that God would send the Holy Spirit to "come on" us, and we see other passages describing ourselves as His temple.

Now consider the outcome of what happens when any of these three (Father's Word, Son, Spirit - the trinity) indwells us:

- God's Word: That same Matthew 13 passage says that if we are good soil (i.e. saved), when God's Word is planted in us, it yields a harvest 30, 60 or even 100 times what was sown (verse 8). That's reproduction.
- Jesus: The John 17 passage is all about Jesus commissioning his disciples to carry on the work of discipleship that he started - spiritual reproduction. That very verse I quoted above (17:23) ends, "Then the world will know that you sent me and have loved them." Also, to give context to the Colossians 1:27 quote: "To them God has chosen to make known among the Gentiles the glorious riches of this mystery, which is Christ in you, the hope of glory" - that is, it's about them spiritually reproducing among the Gentiles.
- Holy Spirit: What does Acts 1:8 say will happen when the Holy Spirit comes on us? We will be God's witnesses.

No matter how we look at it, our marriage to God - no matter what context, Father, Son, or Spirit - is created by an indwelling of God in us, which is always oriented toward spiritual reproduction ... just as physical marriage is defined by two becoming "one flesh" - a husband entering his wife in physical reproduction.

This is also "interesting" advice and would sort of go against your point #2 above.

I'm not sure how that would go against point #2 at all. Point #2 is actually the very reason I give this advice: because all throughout 1 Cor. 7 Paul is advising people not to get married and that it's better to stay single and that the only reason a person should get married is if they're about to have sex with someone else before they're married. In Matthew 19:10-12 Jesus says the same thing - that if anyone is capable of staying single for life, he should. How do we know whether or not we're capable unless we try? And how quickly should we give up in trying to do what Jesus says is best?

I see too many men thinking, "I want to have sex. I struggle with porn. Therefore I'm incapable of remaining single and devoted to God, so I better start looking for a wife." This seems to flow against the grain of what both Jesus and Paul are preaching. I see marriage as a last resort to prevent two people from having sex with each other outside of marriage - just as God doesn't spiritually indwell in or reproduce with non-Christians ("no bad tree can produce good fruit," per Matthew 7, for example). So, people should avoid marriage at all costs to discern whether or not they have the God-given ability to resist temptation to sleep with someone else for the rest of their life; and if they are about to fail, that is when they should marry.

But I do not take "I lust after girls on the street" or "I watch porn" as good excuses. In my view, that's a cop-out, and I see 1 Cor. 7 as referring to a man and a woman together who are mutually about to engage in a sexual act. The words there are always in the plural, telling us that Paul is talking about two people in relation to one another, and not suggesting that any guy who has ever masturbated better find a wife to stop his masturbating. This is furthered by the fact that virtually 100% of men who struggled with lust, porn, and masturbation before marriage continue to struggle with it after marriage as well - the marriage is never a cure. And it was never meant to be a cure. Jesus through the Gospel is the cure to that sin. So, I can't imagine Paul would be telling guys who are masturbating all the time, "Go get a wife so she can cure you of your sinfulness," when we know Paul's answer to that question is Jesus through the Gospel (Galatians 3:3, for example).

Paradox of Marriage

1 upvotes · 26 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Excellent comment. It's easy (especially for someone like me) to stay 50 feet in the air and forget to keep conversions down to earth in ways that are practical and matter. Theory is worthless without pragmatic application.

Unconditional Respect From Your Wife

1 upvotes · 24 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I just did a post on summaries of those books. Check my history. They're secular with strong Christian parallels and influences.

Ditching the "Honey Do" List

1 upvotes · 24 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Always bringing it back to the basics. It's not often that men actually have to go any further, but it's easy to think we can move on to more advanced stuff for faster and better results. No, the basics are best.

Every response he should stay with a checklist: is the a fitness issue? A frame issue? Is he failing tests? Etc. ... then move on to personalized responses.

Ditching the "Honey Do" List

1 upvotes · 24 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Nice. Solid laugh there.

Paradox of Marriage

1 upvotes · 24 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

So many good comments here already ... I'm loving it!

More to the point: everyone here already knows that I encourage all people to avoid marriage as long as possible, but the point of marriage ultimately comes down to sex.

1. Malachi 2:15 says explicitly that producing godly offspring is the point of marriage. How do we do that? Nuff said.
2. Paul says in 1 Cor. 7 that people shouldn't marry unless they're about to engage in sexual sin, at which point he starts to encourage the marriage.
3. Genesis defines a marriage by two people becoming one flesh. What do we call that?

No matter how you slice it, marriage is not about leadership; it's about sex. Leadership is an essential and important component of marriage, but it is merely one (very important) aspect of a functional marriage.

With that in mind, a failure of motivation for leadership or following isn't a critical issue that should be decisive in the "should I get married?" debate. A failure of healthy sexuality does win that argument every time. Leadership obviously plays a big role in sexual attraction, but it is merely a component or subpart.

Wish I didn't say anything at all...

1 upvotes · 21 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Haha. Good point.

Wish I didn't say anything at all...

1 upvotes · 19 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed. And it becomes easier over time. The first time a guy asks out a girl, he's usually nerve-wrecked. After a few dozen approaches, it just becomes second-nature and he doesn't care anymore. The same thing happens with approaching new people and enhancing one's social circle, which also applies to evangelism.

Wish I didn't say anything at all...

1 upvotes · 19 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed :)

Wish I didn't say anything at all...

1 upvotes · 19 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Can you expand on this? You say: "neither of those options are the choice God would have wanted you to make." Then later on you say: "What did God want you to do in this situation? I have no idea."

Most people want to create a false dichotomy: that you have two choices, and one is good and the other is bad. In reality, there are always an infinite number of choices. For example, if my wife asks me if I want chicken or steak for dinner, how many choices do I have? Most people assume: 2. But instead of chicken or steak, I could grab a knife and stab her in the eyes. That's also a choice.. It's a bad one. I could also suggest spaghetti. That's another good choice. I could do anything - there are infinite choices, many of which are good and many are bad; it's not just about deciding between the two that are presented to us. So, we have to break this self-imposed constraint of false dichotomies: "Do I talk to the patient about Jesus or not?" That's a false dichotomy of options.

Now, in every situation we also have half a million solutions that we automatically know are wrong. If OP had thought of finding a scalpel and performing unlicensed impromptu "surgery" on the patient in the elevator when no one was watching ... that would be a bad choice. OP already knows this. Our brains naturally filter out lots of "bad choices," and we tell ourselves that as long as we avoid bad choices, the remaining choices must be good choices. That's a pseudo-false dichotomy of categorization of options.

It's a true dichotomy in the sense that there really are only two choices: good ones and bad ones - there is no neutral. It's false in the sense that we aren't correctly categorizing our options. We assume that a "not bad choice" is the same as a "good choice," which is not true. A "not THAT bad choice" option is still ANOTHER bad choice" option if it's not otherwise a good choice. The Bible says, "Don't murder." It also says, "Take advantage of every opportunity." So, if I have an opportunity to share the Gospel with someone and I choose not to do anything at all, and just pass on by - have I made a "good choice" or a "not bad choice"? I've made a "not bad choice" - at least to the degree that we naturally conceptualize good and bad. I didn't do what would violate my conscience. But James 4 also says, "Anyone who knows the good he ought to do it and does not do it, to him it is sin." So, even though I avoided murdering the person, I have still sinned anyway by failing to make the "good choice." The fact that I thought that walking on by was "not bad" or "less bad" does not make it "good." Our obligation to Christ is to the "good works prepared in advance for you to do." Nowhere do we see a compulsion that our purpose is merely to avoid all the bad things God said not to do.

In OP's situation, he presents a trichotomy: (1) Saying something stupid, which he did; (2) Saying nothing at all; and (3) Witnessing to the patient, even in a small way. After saying something he thought was stupid, OP's solution is: "I shouldn't have said anything." Or to rephrase: "The good/better choice for me would have been to avoid option 1." But if we understand the choice dynamic properly, both 1 and 2 were bad choices, but option 2 didn't register in OP's brain as a "bad choice." Less bad is still bad.

The parable of the Good Samaritan is a great example of this. The thief who robbed and attacked the man made a bad choice. The first two passersby assume that they have done nothing wrong for passing by because they were not the ones who attacked anybody. In reality, the implication of the parable is that they DID DO something wrong. The only one who did nothing wrong was the Samaritan who actually helped the man - who made the good choice rather than attempted to justify non-action as a "not bad choice."

I'd omit this

Iron Rule of Tomassi #9 Never Self-Deprecate under any circumstance.

That's fair. I disagree with the "under any circumstances part." There are certainly times when it is advantageous to convey to others that you are lesser than you are. This is just good strategy. I used to do this all the time in racquetball tournaments when I was in high school. People saw how young I was and assumed I wasn't very good. I'd tell them I had only been playing for a year or two, which was true. I would communicate in a way that downplayed my abilities. Then, when the match started, I would wipe the floor with them because they were caught off-guard thinking from the start that I would be an easy opponent.

Another fair situation would be one where acknowledging the truth of OP's status as "not a doctor" insulates him from liability for anything that might be said which would violate ethical rules that doctors have to deal with, but other hospital staff do not. This creates a buffer so that if the message is not received well, the patient is far less likely to make a grievance, as compared to if he thought this was coming from his doctor, who he rightly holds to a higher standard.

I think I have boiled it down to this. When your life is on the line and it's not a situation of denying Christ. I think the wise choice is to remain silent unless asked to speak, if you can leave then do so.

I think I agree with what you're saying. In this situation, because OP's life was not on the line, then the "good choice" would have been to witness. Perhaps an "even more good" choice would be to do so with appropriate safeguards/buffers in the way he communicates it so he doesn't have to default to the "you can always get another [job]" option ;)

Good thoughts overall, though :)

Obedience to him is not an economy, but...

1 upvotes · 19 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a solid field report, brother. Thanks for sharing this. Keep staying strong. As OZ said, my only real reaction is simply to say that you probably care more about knowing that you can have sex with someone else than actually having sex with someone else. Your desire for sex is not merely about physical pleasure, which does not change greatly from one orgasm to the next; rather, it's the validation that you're seeking from the experience - the emotional power of knowing that someone desires you or that you are enough to satisfy them.

God is enough to satisfy us. When we are "as God to" our wives, it is our job to be enough to satisfy them. This is crucial. This is also why so many men are broken when their wives do not desire sex with them - because they have nothing to satisfy, so the man is left feeling empty, just as our relationship with God is empty when we are not looking to Him for our satisfaction.

Should I keep this girl around to potentially LTR later??

1 upvotes · 18 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's one of them.

Should I keep this girl around to potentially LTR later??

1 upvotes · 17 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It is not. I can't remember when I wrote it, sorry. Thinking back, it could have been a comment in OZ's post on evangedating.

I'm a Christian. I'm a "jerk." Deal with it.

1 upvotes · 16 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed. That was the very first lesson my discipler taught me the very first time we met, which I'll reference when I get around to posting my testimony.

I'm a Christian. I'm a "jerk." Deal with it.

1 upvotes · 16 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

2/2

Cue my current church. My pastor right now is a die-hard feminist. He has said before, "If Jesus were alive today he would be tweeting, 'I support #metoo.'" That's how bad he's gotten. There are a variety of reasons I'm still there that are beside the point. He would not respond well to the same display of strength. What he does respond to is the squeaky wheel.

He's a logistics guy. Everything is about creating a smooth operation. We have over 700 people attending each week that he has to manage and he likes his management to seem flawless. All of this stands in the way of his pursuing a mission of disciple-making. He's more interested in sweeping the road than actually leading anyone down it. He would argue, "No one can walk down a road that's covered in debris," but "debris" to him would include a piece of paper that could easily be trampled over and doesn't need to be cleaned. He's a prime example of when God had to yell at Moses, "Stop praying and go lead my people!" He would reply, "Sorry God, but there's still too much other stuff that needs to be done to prepare them to lead," and just ignore God's calling altogether. It was rather infuriating to me.

With a guy like this I could not call him out in front of other people because that would lose his respect and I'd never get him to change. Instead, I started a covert, friendly competition. I would let him lead his hundreds and I would lead one or two and after 2 years we'd see who made more difference in our city for God's Kingdom. Throughout those two years, I'd push his buttons a bit. I'd ask him about all the great things he's seeing through his ministry - and I would rejoice with him at the good things he was accomplishing.

Then he would ask me about how I was doing and I'd tell him about what God was doing through me, the guys I disciplined, the guys they disciplined, and the guys those guys disciplined ... and he would be floored. I don't think it came off as bragging, but I made it clear that I was trying to show him up - because by the first time we'd had that conversation, I had done more with two guys at the church than he had done with 700 at the church (at least that he knew of).

At first he did lose respect for me. He tried to write me off as one of those jerk all-head Bible-thumper people who does ministry "the wrong way" through pressure and content. Then he started talking privately with the guys I was discipling and realized that I hadn't put on any pressure at all - that I merely built a relationship with them and loved them and modeled a godly lifestyle to them, which empowered them to want to do the same for others, which they did, and they taught those guys how to do the same for others - and we were stretching outside the church into other communities.

I had presented myself to my pastor in a way that forced him to look deeper into what I was doing. At first, it was because he thought what I was doing was unhealthy. That's part of the "squeaky wheel" thing. Pastors don't investigate what's working. They only look into what's broken. So, I had to present myself to him in a way that made him think that what I was doing was broken. Then, when he saw that there was no fault in the way I was discipling these guys, he investigated why I was being more successful at his job than he was - especially when I'm a layperson who has a separate full-time job (which he thinks creates a distinction between him and me; it doesn't).

So, that was phase 1. I had to be a bit of a jerk to get his attention or else he never would have even glanced over at what I was doing (as was evident from my many efforts to get his attention before).

Phase 2 has been getting him to change his ministry strategy altogether. This is once again a "squeaky wheel" thing, but in a different way. I didn't have to present myself as broken because he already knew I was functioning very effectively. His response, though, was to bless what I was doing and take credit for the fact that he's the pastor and it's happening in his church - not to learn anything from what I was doing and adopt it for himself.

So, I started pestering him. I would invite him to lunch; I would ask him hard questions about how his quiet times are going and about how his marriage is; I would ask him to meet with one of the guys I was discipling; I would ask him flat out who he was discipling, and he would fumble around trying to make up an answer before finally admitting it wasn't the same thing as what I was doing. I'm confident he was more than a little annoyed with me. But I was like the man in the parable Jesus tells of the friend asking for bread in the middle of the night. Jesus says something like, "Surely he will not give you the bread because of your friendship; but because of your persistence, he will get out of bed to give you the bread."

Now, looking at that parable (Luke 11:5 et seq.), it's a pretty jerk thing to start pounding on your neighbor's door at midnight asking him to give you things. But this is what Jesus compels us to do. And that's what I did with my pastor. And that's what worked. Because after enough "persistence" - to the point of being a total nuisance that he wished he could be rid of - my pastor finally started listening.

As with my previous pastor, my current pastor also asked me to disciple him - and I did. I taught him how to make disciples, and he's now discipling guys. We're also working on putting together a team of people who can expedite the process to reach more people within the church and in our community. I'm excited to see what can happen when we can pull this off on such a large scale! I've only known one other church of this size that's done it, and it's amazing to watch (unfortunately, it's also over 150 miles away, so not practical for me to go there).

In the midst of all of the above, there were points when I had to lose credibility with some people. Initially that was with my pastor. But after that, I became involved in a little rift in the church. The people I disciplined were fine, but when they started discipling others, they didn't have the same tact yet, so when they were passing on this mission there was a sense of, "Why is our pastor not doing this!?" That caused a lot of people in my spiritual lineage to challenge the pastor and several of them (5 or 6) eventually left the church because of it - because the pastor wasn't listening to me. Three of those people were very close friends with the pastor and "higher-ups" in the church, so that was a very sore issue for a bit.

On the one hand, this is very saddening. I never intended to cause a small schism, especially among the "higher-ups" or to cause the pastor to lose friendships. On the other hand, some of that caused the pastor and advisory team (our version of an "elder board") to pay more attention. They didn't like me at first, but they also could not deny the effectiveness of what I was doing. The pastor has since reconciled with these people on a personal level, but none of them have come back - and he recognizes that his newfound goal of building a disciple-making church is not just to win them back, but because it's what God wants in the first place. It's just sad what we had to go through to get there and that I had to be a vehicle to instigate all of that.

Of course, to be abundantly clear, I did not ever act toward the people I disciplined in any way other than supportive of our pastor. I did everything I could to calm any divisive feelings and notions. But because I was not actually discipling the people who ended up leaving (the guys I was discipling were discipling them), I was too far insulated from relationship with them to fully put out that fire - and part of me now is glad that I didn't.

Anyway, that's the full story on each of my last two churches, if that makes sense. The moral of the story is that I had to compromise how others in the church saw me in order to make an effective change. But as long as the actual integrity of my life and ministry was unphased, it forced a cognitive dissonance between the perception that got attention and the actuality of who I am and what I do. That's part of that balance I talked about in my initial post.

Tag: /u/rocknrollchuck - because you seemed to have some lingering things to ponder and this might help you flesh it out.

I'm a Christian. I'm a "jerk." Deal with it.

1 upvotes · 16 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

1/2

I get what you're saying, but alpha/beta is a different continuum altogether. I'm sure they run parallel, but they're not the same. Alpha/beta is defined by your own internal motivators and reason for doing things.

Doormat/douchebag is defined by how others view you. That's key.

If the reference point is of a guy during a flat-tire-moment and he is late for an appointment, he will probably slide more to the Alpha-Jerk side of the continuum

This is probably a great example of where the two continuums diverge. My guess is that this type of guy is sliding way toward the "douchebag" spectrum, but is still holding a very beta mentality about how he's going to address the problem.

Perhaps a far better example is the guy whose wife just rejected him for the 10th day in a row. He's going to start acting like a douchebag to his wife, but still maintain a very beta attitude about it. Conversely, you can have an alpha guy who functions like a doormat. Prisoners are a great example of this - many of them are true alphas, but they know how to cede to authority and don't think they can just do whatever they want, when they want. It can also play in whenever there's a higher authority that the alpha knows he must respect, either by choice or by force, such as having a strong-willed boss in a job you're not willing to lose.

The alpha/beta dynamic is more about why you do what you do. It represents an internal sense of character that will not allow other people's thoughts and opinions shape the decisions you make.

The doormat/douchebag dynamic is different. It's about how others view you. It represents someone who makes a conscious, intentional effort to present oneself as the kind of guy that others will see as compliant or the kind of guy who will step on people's toes.

In many situations, there is considerable value to giving yourself an image of the guy who steps on other people's toes for a purpose. If you do it just to do it, because you don't care about other people, that's probably sin. But if you're doing it because you need someone to interact with you a certain way or to have a perception of you that gives greater attention to what you say/do, then there can be real value in that.

At this point I'm moving into answering /u/Knightfall21's question, so here goes.

Most of my life, I have been the compliant type. Internally, I'm a challenger, but I always believed I was supposed to go with whatever my church leaders decided, trusting them implicitly. Then I grew up and realized that my church leaders aren't necessarily any more spiritually mature than the next guy. They have a position of responsibility, but that doesn't always mean they're the most qualified people to fill it. More significantly: their gifts aren't always suited to their role. Many people become pastors because it seems like a noble job, not because they've been called into it.

At my last church, my pastor was a fairly alpha guy. He had been in ministry for almost a decade, but it was clear that he wasn't designed to be a pastor. I have the gifts of teaching and possibly prophecy, among other things, so I could see clearly what God had envisioned for the church, including its eventual break-up 5 years before it ever happened. I knew I needed to communicate this vision to the pastor because he had lofty expectations about reaching hundreds within the first couple years of this church plant, whereas we had started with only 25.

Because he was an alpha guy, I knew he would not respond to a weak man. I couldn't be my old doormat self (this was in my pre-RP days), so I had to start changing how I approached him. I had to challenge him, sometimes publicly. In private, there were moments where I had to make comments or ask questions that made him feel a bit like an idiot. I wasn't doing it to be mean - and he knew that. And I certainly was not doing anything to cause him to lose credibility with the congregation. But I was pushing him, and hard. This didn't look cool to a lot of people - my wife especially. I looked like a bit of a bully. I came off as an arrogant know-it-all who wanted to show up the pastor. That was very out of character for me, but it was an intentional and calculated characterization I was building for myself. Most of my comments were directed toward the focus of the church's mission and whether certain decisions were oriented toward fulfilling that mission v. just trying to get numbers in the door.

Well, my alpha pastor responded quite well to that display of strength. He respected me for being the only guy in the church willing to call him out on his crap. He asked me to disciple him and defended me to the church and exhorted other men to be more like me. So, where I once was a jerk to my pastor and everyone else viewed me that way, after earning his respect he recognized the truth in what I was preaching and the people there went from being a crowd of pew-sitters into being trained as active disciple-makers - and that's something I'm very proud of.

How do you respond to threats from your wife?

1 upvotes · 14 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This has been temporarily removed. Please add the information referenced in rule 2, which is also stickied to the front page, and I'll reapprove. Thanks!

Expanding on a question asked in another post.

1 upvotes · 13 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It's not a route ... it's THE route. All marriage is meant to be a discipleship of sorts. I'm simply suggesting that you can widen your pool of candidates by starting that discipleship before the marriage.

I'm a Christian. I'm a "jerk." Deal with it.

1 upvotes · 13 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Sorry to hear about that guy in your church. I would NOT say his heart was in the right place. His head was for sure. But his heart, if oriented in a godly manner, wouldn't cause him to behave that way. I've seen this all too often. They usually fall in the category of all head, no heart Christians. I used to be him.

Expanding on a question asked in another post.

1 upvotes · 13 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

So where does this leave the above average guy or gal that has been saved?

Sidebar, brother. Or maybe it's not on the sidebar, I can't remember. I say it quite often: If you can't find what you're looking for, make it.

In this case, if you can't find a hot, godly woman who's single and in your age range ... then find a hot woman who's single and in your age range and make her godly. Or maybe find a godly woman who's single and in your age range and make her hot. Or find a hot, godly woman who's in your age range and make her single (unless she's actually married). Sorry, can't do much about the age-range thing.

I asked the question to invoke the thought that not everyone sitting in the pews is a genuine believer.

We had that conversation early on in the sub and /u/OsmiumZulu referenced a post by /u/ruizbuje in one of his sidebar posts for singles. That had some stats about how many people in church were likely actually "saved" and the number was around 15% ... and the number of "mature" was more like 2.5% (I'm guessing, can't remember without looking).

That's why I agree: you're probably not going to find a godly woman who meets the standards that will satisfy your sexual impulses. You're far better off mastering another thing I don't ever shut up about:

DISCIPLESHIP!!!

Find the type of girl you want to be with and disciple her. Start with evangelism (the first phase of discipleship), then move onto establishing her in the basics (300 content), then start equipping her with tools to join you in your mission of discipling the rest of the world too (unwritten 300 content), etc.

I'm a Christian. I'm a "jerk." Deal with it.

1 upvotes · 13 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a "duh!" moment for me. Sometimes I get so hung up on discipleship that I forget that guys here also want to hear about how this stuff relates to intergender relational dynamics.

If you like, I could edit my original post, paste this in, you delete this comment, and we'd call it a joint post so more people read this who otherwise might skip the comments - because this is pretty much what needs to be said on that angle of the topic (at least for now).

Biblical textual analysis of why Adam had headship before the fall

1 upvotes · 13 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

How do you respond to the more widespread interpretation: that the man leaves his family to join the woman's family? Proponents of this theory reference figures like Moses and Jacob, who both lived with their wife's parents ... or even David, who joined Saul's household when marrying his daughter.

Textually, is there any indication that the woman is also to leave her family to join her husband?

To bring it back to the Christ-parallel, one could easily argue that we were in the world and rather than calling us to leave the world to be with him, Jesus joined us in the world, and even after our marriage through the Gospel, we are still called to remain in the world and he still dwells with us here in the world.

I ask because this is one of those passages that I've always struggled to oppose. In my heart, I don't feel right saying that the man joins the woman's family, when in reality it should be her joining him and his lineage. But the text does seem to say quite the opposite ... and then it shocked me when you use the passage in the way I want to read it, but I still don't see any exegetical explanation for how the passage itself can be interpreted in a non-feminist way.

Historically, I'm sure there's stuff that can be said about the father giving his daughter away in marriage also ... but I don't recall any passages that make this a theological, God-endorsed practice from which we could give context for interpreting the Genesis 2 line.

Biblical textual analysis of why Adam had headship before the fall

1 upvotes · 13 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Can you elaborate on your point 5?

Small Intro

1 upvotes · 13 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a wonderful post. Thanks for setting a precedent for how things should look in light of the new rule!

How to keep strong faith?

Matthew 7:24-27 makes it clear that the strength of our foundation is in our obedience. Hearing God's Word is not enough - we must actually live it out. So, if you want to keep strong faith, it's not just about learning and loving, but living it out that's the pinnacle. What we know and how we feel about God are merely pillars meant to support our obedience.

To that end, I have often refrained: Christianity isn't about what we're against, but what we're for. It's not about what things in life we avoid, but what things in life we do. Jesus called us to make disciples of all nations. Are you fulfilling your part in doing that? If not, you're missing the point and have weak faith. If you're engaging in the proactive commands it defeats all temptations and adds value and meaning to your life. It refines the path and direction you're walking. That's how you keep your faith strong. Make disciples.

Lots of temptation in college?

Again, I'll refrain another thing I'm known for saying: The best way to avoid sin is not by trying to avoid sin, but by doing the opposite of sinning. The opposite of sinning is doing what God told you to do. "Stop sinning" or "avoid sin" are negative concepts. They exist in a void. You can literally do nothing and comply with what most people mean when they talk about "not sinning." But James 4 also says that if we know what we ought to do and don't do it, that's also sin. So, if you know you ought to be making disciples and you're not doing it, I'd wager that's a far worse sin than whacking it to porn. Why? Because other people's eternal souls are on the line. Jesus's parting words to his followers weren't, "Go and avoid doing sexually inappropriate things." They were, "Go and make disciples of all nations." Which one does that imply is more important to Jesus?

Obedying the proactive commands will always be more important than avoiding the negative commands. This is also the way to avoid temptation because, inherently, as you orient your life in the right direction you won't be oriented in the wrong direction.

Avoiding sin by trying to avoid sin is the same as not thinking about pink elephants by trying not to think about pink elephants. You're going to fail every time. The way you stop thinking about pink elephants is to think about something else. The way you stop sinning is by doing something not sinful. In any given moment, if God wants you doing X, but you're tempted to whack it to porn or screw a hottie you're not married to, it does you no good to say, "I'll resist the sexual temptation and go do Z instead." Even if Z isn't the sexual sin you were tempted with, if it's not X - what God wanted you doing with your time - it's still sin.

Of course, that opens up another can of worms as to how much flexibility God has with "X," but that's a longer conversation.

Steps to become less of a jerk and more of a Christian?

This deserves a post of its own. It'll be up in a few minutes.

TheRedPill is Feminist

1 upvotes · 13 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree.

Biblical textual analysis of why Adam had headship before the fall

1 upvotes · 13 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm in agreement. Romans 9 addresses this. God is responsible for humanity, shaping the clay as he sees fit, but we each still individually bear the consequences for our own actions regardless of God's sovereignty. Likewise, I'm fine with saying a man is responsible for his wife, but that she must still endure consequences for her actions that otherwise step beyond the bounds that the husband responsibly lays out for her and the family.

To that end, Jesus also bore responsibility for our sins through his death, bearing the ultimate consequences that his bride otherwise would have had to suffer. Whether we like it or not, Ephesians 5 calls us to the same level of responsibility over our wives. Sure, some could call that gynocentric. Big whoop. The goal here isn't to fight gynocentrism; it's to be godly men, doing what the bible instructs. That likely aligns with an anti-gynocentric agenda quite often, but let's not let the overlap confuse which master we serve.

TheRedPill is Feminist

1 upvotes · 13 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

By your definition of a "feminist frame" saying a girl is hot would be a feminist frame too. Being too broad is not useful.

TheRedPill is Feminist

1 upvotes · 12 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

With that definition I'm in full agreement. That just seems way oversimplified as compared to the way it would have to be addressed under other more complicated definitions of patriarchy.

And we must remember that even under this definition, a patriarchy only makes sense in the context of those patriarchs being beholden to God.

If patriarchy were imposed on nonchristians whose men would almost certainly in their sin abuse their power, do we dare ask whether God would prefer egalitarianism for those marriages as the only viable alternative to toxic patriarchs or radical feminists?

To be clear, we're on the same page regarding the church. But I'm here to reach those outside the church too, so I must also comprehend their framework for understanding the world and social dynamics.

TheRedPill is Feminist

1 upvotes · 12 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

And when Jesus came he made clear that their expectations of a return to physical power and authority didn't have anything to do with God's actual purposes, which were instead related to a spiritual kingdom instead of an earthly one.

TheRedPill is Feminist

1 upvotes · 12 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Most followers of the redpill are just trying to enjoy the destruction while they can through hedonism.

This is an apt way to put it. I often think of it as a city during a natural disaster. Everyone knows that the right thing to do is to aid in the relief effort. But the secular red pill guys are the ones looting the shops and stealing the abandoned vehicles and robbing people's homes in the midst of the storm because everyone's defenseless and they can get away with it.

True Biblical marriage is via the Patriarchy

Can you help me get a good definition of this? I've seen several where I could say, "Yes, God endorses that," but I've also seen others where I could just as easily say, "No, the Bible makes no comment on that at all."

The Bible clearly indicates a man's temporal mission is his family and taking dominion of the world in the name of Christ

I would argue "disciple-making" is the mission, but I can see how there's some overlap there.

TheRedPill is Feminist

1 upvotes · 12 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Now, I'm not disagreeing here at all - I'm merely asking for more information. Can you flesh out what you mean when you say "Christian world view of Patriarchy, established by God is Truth"?

Suppose a man argues that God doesn't endorse feminism or patriarchy in the Bible - that he merely implemented laws and gave us guidance for living within the culture that the world had already developed on its own at that time. And much like we could say, "Well, God never directly opposed patriarchy, and he says things that seem to suggest he thought it was a perfectly appropriate way of life," we could say the exact same phrase about what the Scriptures say about slavery.

I know many red pill guys get real hung up on this "patriarchy" concept and it's simply something I haven't studied much in the first place. I know men are to lead and women are to help/follow. But when we go much past that, what's the biblical foundation for suggesting that God endorses patriarchy as his intended social structure?

Again, I'm not saying this is a wrong conclusion, and I'm pretty sure I already agree with the conclusion. But it's one of those things where I agree because it makes sense, but I don't have a hard conviction because I haven't seen the evidence for the conclusion for myself yet. To that end, with your response please be patient as I almost assuredly will have to test the integrity of the support of this view with a devil's advocacy position.

TheRedPill is Feminist

1 upvotes · 12 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I don't see that jiving with Romans 13 at all. We're not meant to engage in a political secession. We're meant to have our own culture that trumps the secular governments with regard to our obedience, but we are also meant to infiltrate various cultures for the sake of the Gospel. This doesn't happen if we secede and try to become completely independent of all other cultures. "In the world, but not of the world" comes to mind.

TheRedPill is Feminist

1 upvotes · 12 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The big question though is when you "when it happens" what is the "it" that we are to be anticipating?

I reference Judgment Day. We know that hasn't happened yet - all theological camps agree on that. What leads up to judgment day - whether it has already happened or not - is not for me to figure out. There's some value in the process of studying it and attempting to ascertain, but if Jesus himself said he would not know the day or hour, then I can't pretend I'm going to be any better off.

More to the point, it's all moot anyway. I can't stop it from happening. I can't change how it happens by believing in pre-trib or post-trib or pre-millennial, amillennial, or post-millennial views, etc. God's going to do what he's going to do and whatever happens, I'm going to respond consistently with biblical principles as anyone in Christ should. So, my behaviors won't change much at all, other than the fact that I may subtly know whether I was right or wrong about the order of things - and that's all assuming any of this precursor stuff happens in my lifetime at all. If preterism is right, it's already happened and there's nothing left for me to have to worry about anyway - I just keep on living my life the way I always intended. If other views are right, but the precursor stuff is yet to come after my lifetime, then that still doesn't change how I live today. So, it's all academic.

What's even more funny is that if there is some pretribulational rapture yet to come, then what's the point in even adopting a theology of what will happen to the world after the rapture at all? I certainly won't be in the world or care what happens after that point. I'll have Jesus! I'm pretty sure I'll be more than preoccupied with greater and more important things at that point.

whereas I think there is a strong biblical case to be made that much of the end times prophecy was fulfilled in AD70

I'm inclined to agree with you on this.

trajectory of the unfolding of the great commission since then has been one of world conquest, spiritually, demographically, and politically

I don't see that part in Scripture, though. Even if we're in the millennial period or a post-millennial period, that just means that Jesus reigns over the world instead of Satan. It doesn't mean that sin will be gone from the world or everyone will become Christian someday before the planet fades away. I certainly don't see any biblical basis to believe in a political change based on spiritual dynamics. The world could (and very likely will) become more and more sinful until God brings about judgment day, even on a full preterist view.

With regard to 1 Cor. 15, I read all of that as happening on Judgment Day, not on earth pre-JD.

To be clear, when you say:

the end doesn't come until after Jesus destroys all of his enemies

Paul in that verse defines "the end" as "when he delivers the kingdom to God the Father." That is, when the Church (universal and across time) is commissioned to God and raised to the New Jerusalem. All this means is that God will judge the nonbelievers first, which is consistent with I think another part of Revelation that talks about us watching him judge from his throne (don't quote me on that, though - I'm going on memory).

To that end, abortion, human trafficking, feminism, etc. will all be defeated on Judgment Day. I'm not saying it can't happen earlier than that, only that I know for sure it will happen by then and that I don't see any Scriptural basis for the view that it MUST happen before then. And if it's not a Scripturally mandated view, then it's not one that I can accept in any dogmatic way. As for the Great Commission, I've heard arguments that it is already fulfilled.

Interestingly, the Joshua Project defines a "people group" as everyone in a contiguous region who have no unique hindrances to the sharing of information and who do, in fact, share information. Such hindrances would include geographical boundaries, language and dialect changes, etc. They consider such a group "reached" when that people group has a church established and run by people of their own locality and that such a church is accessible to all persons within that people group (accounting for things like transportation, geography, etc.).

With this definition in mind, they suggest that the "all tribes, tongues, and nations" prophecy has not yet been fulfilled. However, they do suggest that if every church gave $0.32 per year (or every American church gave $1.15/yr - or something close to these numbers) and 1 out of every 1,000 churches in America sent a missionary to an unreached people group, then the great commission could be fulfilled in less than 5 years. That's exciting! It's also off topic ... but exciting! I have been working on my church to do their part and try to make up for a few hundred other churches that aren't.

TheRedPill is Feminist

1 upvotes · 12 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Looked into these? Yes. But I don't take a strong stance on any eschatological views. My eschatology is: We'll figure it out when it happens, but need to be ready as if it's going to happen today. I'm pretty sure that's what Jesus preached.

Nevertheless, when I've researched it in the past, partial preterism seems to make the most sense to me, but even then I still have some disagreements.

NEW RULE - READ BEFORE POSTING

1 upvotes · 11 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Nice. I look forward to it.

RP Christians Sidebar "Handbook" (Download Links)

1 upvotes · 10 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I have no idea if/how that could be done.

RP Christians Sidebar "Handbook" (Download Links)

1 upvotes · 10 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Makes sense. I wasn't planning on sidebarring the IOI post unless enough people thought it was useful to include. You're welcome to do as you wish with the compendium though.

Understanding The Outliers?

1 upvotes · 10 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Huh ... I didn't know this was a thing. Usually I delete and ban bots, but is this one useful to keep around?

Book Summaries

1 upvotes · 10 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's fair. Then again, some publishers do like edgy content that challenges mainstream thinking - especially if it can be backed by appropriate sources, whether that's reliable surveys and statistical data or, in this case, the Bible. Books on marriage advice for Christians are a hot commodity on the market - especially if you already have a blog/platform for selling it ;)

I feel like girls might see me as a player?

1 upvotes · 10 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is wise.

I feel like girls might see me as a player?

1 upvotes · 10 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I discussed this with chuck early on, although at the time it was more about when to start an r/askRPC. We said we'd figure that out when the numbers warranted revisiting the conversation. I hadn't contemplated this sub getting as big as it did as fast as it did. I also didn't expect there to be so much interest from singles, given that sexual strategy to a Christian can mostly only be applied after marriage.

I'll have this conversation with the other mods. Perhaps we have been doing too much to accommodate the large wave of our single brethren who have found this place recently.

If we started an r/marriedRPC right now, my guess is it would be relatively inactive for several months, given the spacing of posts prior to last month's subscription boom. Do you have any other ideas on how we can work to keep both sides of the coin healthy and have their questions and needs addressed?

Book Summaries

1 upvotes · 10 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Traditional publishing or self publishing?

Book Summaries

1 upvotes · 9 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is wonderful! I'll read it shortly and if it checks out, I'll probably add it to the sidebar.

Sex god method... RPC Perspective?

1 upvotes · 9 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

If it's all "Bible" or even "some from the Bible," what part of the Bible is she referencing? That's going to answer the issue real fast.

Was this girl interested or not?

1 upvotes · 9 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This.

For I am....

1 upvotes · 9 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Jealousy is an emotion. Mate-guarding is an action. A person can mate-guard without actually being jealous, or be jealous without actually mate-guarding.

God's jealousy is defined by a high standard against our prioritization of anyone else over him. But he does not mate-guard because his solution to his jealousy is simply to let us walk away (Romans 1:18 et seq.). He's there to take us back, but (soteriology aside) he will not entertain a relationship with us while we prioritize anyone else over him.

This is the ultimate example of RP's traditional advice: If she's being a harpy, defiant, or giving frequent denials, go do something else; you have better things to do with your time. Likewise, although God is jealous for us, he has better things to do than try to prove himself yet again as being better than our idols. That's why when the Pharisees asked for a sign Jesus basically said, "Screw you. You've had enough signs. You get no more. Either follow me or don't."

There's also a difference between God's affection for those who aren't yet his and those who are his, but are wandering away.

Also note the story of Hosea. As I seem to recall, he was very jealous over his wife - and rightfully so. He was so jealous that when she went back to her pimp and lovers, he paid a high price to buy her back to free her from her past life of prostitution that she had returned to. But even in the midst of this, we don't see him trying to ward off the other guys. He simply opens the way for her return - no mate guarding.

Sex god method... RPC Perspective?

1 upvotes · 9 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well, if you don't want to do it, don't do it. It's that easy.

Sex god method... RPC Perspective?

1 upvotes · 9 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Good point on the perspective issue. Perhaps a better word would be nympho.

Sex god method... RPC Perspective?

1 upvotes · 9 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Perhaps. I usually think of the word in terms of what a woman will do, not necessarily who she's done it with.

A woman who looks "slutty," for example, gives the appearance of one who would do more sexually than someone who looks like a prude, em though the price may have actually had more sexual partners.

Sex god method... RPC Perspective?

1 upvotes · 9 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Does she still have multiple partners? If not, then she's yours now.

Reworking the Sidebar

1 upvotes · 7 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Absolutely.

Happy Belated 4th, men. Here's my bi-monthly example of what NOT to do. Link in comments.

1 upvotes · 5 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

My pleasure.

Dealing with ONEitis

1 upvotes · 4 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for the tip :)

Dealing with ONEitis

1 upvotes · 4 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Interesting. I'll have to contemplate this some more. I agree that men must fulfill a dual role as both God to our wives and a bride to Christ. Not sure what to think beyond that.

I'm fairly new to redpill, but with my Christian beliefs I don't fully trust redpill.

1 upvotes · 4 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed.

I'm fairly new to redpill, but with my Christian beliefs I don't fully trust redpill.

1 upvotes · 4 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Our definitions of "game" aside, this is the answer. But it's not just having the foundation - a guy does still need to know how to initiate with a woman and have a big enough social circle to be in contact with the types of women who meet his standard in the first place. To that end, there is still value in the approach and learning how to talk to new people.

There are no women watching

1 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Sure. Deceit and weakness go hand in hand in this case. I'd posit that it started with weakness that turned into deception.

I'm fairly new to redpill, but with my Christian beliefs I don't fully trust redpill.

1 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Usually someone who is Red Pill under goes a divorce or something traumatic

To be clear, are you saying being "red pill" causes people to get divorced or experience trauma? Or are you saying divorce/trauma is what causes men to seek and become red pill?

There are no women watching

1 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Are you referring to the male/complementarian pastors, or the average man?

Both. The pastors simply have a higher obligation than the average man (James 3:1, among other passages).

Was the feminist rebellion a result of men "chugging their rum"?

No, it was the result of women looking for an opportunity to take control, and when the men let their guard down the women seized that opportunity. If the men never screwed up it never would have happened. If the women weren't rebellious, it never would have happened. There's mutuality. That's all I'm saying. You're acting like feminism would have dominated the world even if the men had been doing their jobs rightly all along - that the women would have been too strong for us to deal with no matter how hard we fought against feminism. I simply don't agree with that conclusion.

There are no women watching

1 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I think I agree with most of what you're saying. The sin with these men, though, is male passivity. It's the same deal with Adam watching Eve eat the fruit that he knew God commanded her not to eat. He's his leader. He should have stopped her. But he stood by and watched it happen. If God ordered the world that men should lead and men fail to lead, that's sin. The fact that women further sinned by stepping up to fill in that void is their sin. Initially, one could hardly blame them. If a ship is sinking and the captain is chugging his rum and giving up, his first mate is going to have to take over to save the ship. This is actually what a first mate is supposed to do.

The problem is that the captain liked a little too much being able to sit on his butt and let his first mate do all the hard work, and the first mate liked a little too much having the authority and command of the ship. Neither of them were willing to revert back to their proper roles - and that's where we are today, red pill men notwithstanding.

There are no women watching

1 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Indeed :)

There are no women watching

1 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

There's a lot of good in here. But your solution is still to call out women to have them repent. This is fine and right to do, as u/Deep_Strength acknowledged in one of his first posts here on rebuking women. But that solution still relies squarely on the women to respond. It strips the power away from men and puts us at the woman's mercy once again.

Suppose a woman hears the rebuke and decides to continue in her rebellion - even over a decade of being rebuked. At what point do we acknowledge that the man must foster a condition where she has incentive to receive the correction?

I feel like the two of you are arguing calvinism and arminianism. Did God predestine sin into the world or did man create original sin by our choice? What if it's both? What if both men and women are to blame and have a role in the situation and you're each just taking sides and insisting it must be one or the other?

And if I'm right about there being blame on both sides, doesn't it make sense that men should address the issues where they are at fault first given that it's the only issue we can really control - and then, with the conditions on our end fixed we no longer have a plank in our own eye and can rightly call out our sisters in christ.

Dealing with ONEitis

1 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is a wonderful comment - especially the last line. The only thing I'll note is that ONEitis isn't necessarily something we can manufacture, but it is something we can destroy. So, while I agree with the sentiment, developing the same emotional investment in our relationship with Jesus isn't quite so easy :p For many, it's a long process, as with a marriage ... because it is a marriage ;)

There are no women watching

1 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

But as /u/OsmiumZulu pointed out - they will. It's only the weak husbands who they won't obey - the ones who let them get away with it.

Your frustration is understandable. You're seeing church after church influenced by the droves of weak men and failing to recognize that if you're not like them, your wife won't be like their wives either. This comes to one of two conclusions: she'll either follow you or leave you. But you have to leave that decision up to her and make sure you're a man worth following. If that's the case, it's really a no brainer.

But there's no situation where a man must cave to tolerating a rebellious wife. You ask how you lead such a woman? The same way you do anyone else, "I'm going this way. Feel free to join me," and then start going. If she doesn't follow, that's her own business. Either she'll catch up or she'll walk away. Either way lends itself to a biblical conclusion for the man if the direction he's going is biblical in the first place.

There are no women watching

1 upvotes · 3 July 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's not an irony. That's why RPC exists - because God came up with it first. The secular crowd is merely rediscovering what the church abandoned. They picked up the scraps of truth the church left behind and are now doing more with it than the church ever did.

Should I be approaching random girls? If so, where?

1 upvotes · 28 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm not sure if you read the majority of what I post here :p

There is no "Christian version" of anything

1 upvotes · 24 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This post wasn't meant for the secular crowd. It's meant for those who already understand and embrace the truth or are willing to assume it as true.

Desiring God Says Feminism Wants to Silence "Real Men"

1 upvotes · 21 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Why would I ban you? I don't ban for simple differences of opinion, and you're free to disagree with me. I'm just trying to help. If you don't want it, that's your business. No hard feelings.

Desiring God Says Feminism Wants to Silence "Real Men"

1 upvotes · 21 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well said.

Desiring God Says Feminism Wants to Silence "Real Men"

1 upvotes · 20 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I wasn't dismissive of the concept of the DNotS. I acknowledge it as a real thing. In fact, I even said plainly:

I have experienced a DNotS. It happened over a 2 year period.

I know what you're talking about and have done much research on the subject, helping others who have gone through it too. While discipling my pastor, he was for a time in the midst of a DNotS as well, which he had studied in seminary and personally. It had been going on in his life for a period of 3 years before I started meeting with him. My advice to him was the same as to you. He took me up on that advice and within 2 months his full joy had restored and he hasn't looked back.

I don't want to be dismissive and critical of what you're going through. I know it's serious and difficult. I have great empathy because I have lived it and have counseled at least 6 or 7 guys who have been there. But at the end of the day, God does provide a way out, and it breaks my heart when people would rather wallow in the darkness than leap for joy in the light. This is usually rooted in a fear of some sort, like the fear of being wrong, or the fear of being right, but the obligation that comes with it. We can be lazy in the darkness. Our flesh likes it, so we have no physical imperative to get out. It's easier to stifle the yearning of our spirit than to discipline our flesh.

To that end, if you want to ignore wisdom and continue in your self-pity, you're welcome to do so. As is often said in both RP and Christian circles alike: I can show you the door, but ultimately it's your responsibility to walk through it. I can't make you do anything.

In the meantime, please do not spread the lie that God intentionally wants people to be sullen and depressed for extended periods of time. In brief moments, this might be a natural byproduct of God's will, but we always reads that God is the one who lifts up the broken-hearted, not puts them down. As such, as real as the DNotS might be, we should not give it the weight of divine appointment; rather, we should view it for what it is: an inability to receive the good that God is trying to do in and through us, whether prompted by the enemy or our own human limitations in understanding God's will - or a mistaken belief that we need to understand it at all.

Tag: /u/rocknrollchuck

Desiring God Says Feminism Wants to Silence "Real Men"

1 upvotes · 20 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed. Of course, once again, her efforts were not toward the fruit of disciple-making, but of service and generosity. Those are both great things, but they are inadequate in that they are not the ultimate reason for why we're still on this earth.

Paul actually contemplated this very thing, suggesting that he wished he could die and move on to be with Christ, which he said was "better by far," but gave a very specific reason for God keeping him alive: his ministry of discipleship. His exact words: "But it is more necessary for you that I remain in the body. Convinced of this, I know that I will remain, and I will continue with all of you for your progress and joy in the faith" (Philippians

1:24).

As much as I respect much of what Mother Theresa did, and I have watched the documentary and read the blog posts and excerpts from a few books ... it's my clear understanding that she was not in the business of disciple-making. At best, she was an evangelist. I don't say any of this to discredit what she did or defame her, but to offer as an explanation for why she did not experience the fullness in life that God designed her for. To be simple, we can't experience the fullness God designed us for if we're not living the purpose God designed us for.

Tag: /u/not-my-hands

Aaaquad introduction, stats, and brief RP journey 6.18.2018

1 upvotes · 20 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

In short:

- Set high, but realistic goals
- Be intentional about setting and maintaining boundaries; do this now while you don't need them, because you won't be able to keep them if you wait too long
- Don't underestimate the importance of developing social status, and this is something that develops incrementally, so starting small now will make a big difference later
- Check out my immediately previous comment to u/not-my-hands for a bit more on "head to heart transition" and discipleship, but I agree that's worth a direct post and not just dancing around the subject in comments

Desiring God Says Feminism Wants to Silence "Real Men"

1 upvotes · 20 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

More to /u/not-my-hands, I am well familiar with the "dark night of the soul" lore. It isn't found anywhere in Scripture; rather, it is a compilation of experiences that many Christians from the early church through the present have experienced above and beyond what nonchristians in similar circumstances experience. This differentiation causes many to believe that it is a uniquely spiritual phenomenon. I've heard people try to pick out a few select characters, like Elijah and David, and argue that their experiences are the biblical basis for this phenomenon, but their symptoms were fairly different, usually more akin to depression or despair.

I think /u/not-my-hands gave a great description of the DNotS mindset, very akin to my own, which is: "I know, but I can't." It's almost a sort of spiritual paralysis that inhibits one from experiencing joy or passion, especially toward outward ministry.

In my experience, this has never happened to the fruitful. Thomas Carlyle (1800s Christian philosopher) calls it the "center of indifference" in his philosophical fictional pseudo-autobiography, Sartor Resartus. This is the place where people exist between "the everlasting no" (a state of abandonment of God) and "the everlasting yea" (a state of joyous love for God). The closest biblical position I can muster up is Romans 7, where Paul talks about the stark contrast between what he knows is right, but what his flesh has him do anyway. But even that is different because he is speaking from a place of peace and resolve, not as one who is lost in turmoil. He's teaching the Romans about something he had been through and still goes through, not trying to ask them for help for him to figure things out.

I have experienced a DNotS. It happened over a 2 year period. Incidentally, that was also the only 2 year period since I became saved where I wasn't discipling anyone. One of those years I wasn't even being discipled, which was the worst year of my marriage and my life. I assumed I was intelligent, disciplined, and wise enough to be just fine on my own without a spiritual authority directly investing in my life. It makes me sad for the countless people who have never experienced this blessing in the first place and don't even know the misery they're living in.

Ultimately, the solution to the DNotS is, as I suggest is the solution for many things, to begin bearing fruit: discipleship. In 3 John we read, "I have no greater joy than this: to see that my children are walking in the truth." So, first you've got to have some spiritual children (evangelism), and then you've got to start raising them. This is the exact rationale I give for why I have never met a single disciple-maker (and I've known hundreds) who was both fruitful and suffered from spiritual burnout (another concept not mentioned in the Bible, but which many Christians experience in a distinct way from nonchristians).

Or to put it another way: if we're not doing what God put us here to do, it makes sense that one would not feel satisfied with the life he's living. This is ultimately the core of the DNotS.

What makes it so frustrating is that virtually no church has an intentional plan of raising up disciple-makers. I only recently discovered one church about 2.5 hours away from me that has a terrific plan in place for this and actively trains people this way. I'm in the process of training my church to do this. In the meantime, it just kind of sucks for people who do want to bear fruit and make disciples, but who don't have anyone to disciple them or train them in how to do that, so they're just stuck with knowing what to do, but no way of actually following through with it. And without the option of being disciplined available (at least not the way Jesus disciplined people), one can't experience it for themselves, and without that experience the vision and joy behind it cannot penetrate their heart.

Was hit hard with some realizations, need input

1 upvotes · 17 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Agreed.

Was hit hard with some realizations, need input

1 upvotes · 17 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Then why is this even a conversation in the first place? 2 Cor. 6:14 - "Do not be yoked together with unbelievers. For what do righteousness and wickedness have in common? Or what fellowship can light have with darkness?"

You say you're compatible. The bible says you're not. I would trust the bible over your emotions if I were you.

Was hit hard with some realizations, need input

1 upvotes · 17 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Oh, I understand and assumed that. My comment remains unchanged.

Was hit hard with some realizations, need input

1 upvotes · 17 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's the blue pill in you talking. "I'm not like all those other guys. I care about women for who they are deep inside, and I would never use them just for sex." The fact that you think this attitude earns you anything shows you have a fundamental flaw in your thinking, regardless of whether or not you're accurate in your self evaluation.

The Role Of Your Wife (Assuming You're OYS Already)

1 upvotes · 16 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Before Christ, God was trying to establish a physical representation of what he would expect to be true on a spiritual level. Once Christ came, all the physical things faded in their significance (not completely lost) in exchange for the spiritual parallel that those physical things were pointing toward all along. Sure, on a technical level you could argue that Adam and Eve had that in the garden too, but we're not in Eden anymore, and I'm inclined toward the view that God proceeded in Eden pre-fall with full knowledge that the fall was imminent.

But I agree that it's often beneficial to look pre-fall to get a better idea of what God may have originally intended. But it's not nearly as conclusive as looking post-Gospel in light of the parallel that was being established all along.

EC on TRP explains why making sex your god fails

1 upvotes · 15 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

True. I'm not a black pill guy myself. There's just too much evidence to the contrary. But the black pill does get at least part of the story.

[Theory] Evangedating (AKA: Missional Dating)

1 upvotes · 15 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Literally 5 hours before you posted this I had written this in another thread:

To be clear, I DO NOT recommend evangedating. Don't engage in romantic relationships with non-Christians on the hope that they might become saved. But you can evangelize to a non-Christian on the hope that she might one day become date-worthy. The distinction is which comes first. In evangedating, the relationship precedes salvation. In evangelizing-to-dating, the focus is on a woman's salvation, which precedes any actual relationship. This can be quite delicate, but I'll tell you that I know many, many, many truly godly men and women who are only saved because an attractive person invited them to a Christian event. For many of these people, they never even ended up in a relationship with that person, but the invitation alone was enough to get them moving in the right direction. This includes the guy who discipled me.

I stand by that assessment. In short, I agree with a lot of what you've said. There's just no need to put it in a romantic context. You can go out to eat, take long walks on the beach, have a game night, hit up a movie - whatever. But as you say, there's no exclusivity or long-term intentions. Can this potentially lead her on? Sure, but as long as you're clear up-front about your commitment level, that's on her head, not yours.

Bad day at work

1 upvotes · 12 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You are one with your wife in flesh. You are one with Christ in spirit and heart. If your flesh is having an issue, go be one with your wife. If your spirit and heart are having issues, go be one with Christ.

That said, you can tell your wife whatever you want to tell her. Just make sure you're doing it because you want to, not because you need to. If you do something out of an internal sense of compulsion, you're not coming from a place of strength, and thus you cannot maintain your frame in how you communicate. If you communicate things because it's what you want to do, then you're able to do it your way on your own terms and without weakness, so it's fine.

She wants God not you

1 upvotes · 11 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Or ... it's not settling if you can have both.

[FR] Calculate your "cost per fuck"

1 upvotes · 10 June 2018 · /r/MarriedRedPill

The same thing is true of a guy who owns a business. Whether it's a business, an IRA, a 401k, or whatever ... investments all work the same. The difference comes in whose income is invested and whose is flexible and who has access to spend the flexible income at their own discretion.

Body fat % for Visible abs?

1 upvotes · 7 June 2018 · /r/askMRP

When I was cutting I ran a 0 net calorie diet. I could eat whatever I wanted as long as my active exercise for the day burned the same amount. I usually ate 1,200 and had a 60-90 minute workout session.

3,500 calories = 1lb lost. I naturally needed at that time 2,300 to break even. So in a 30 day month I consumed 0 net calories and burned 69,000 just by existing, which is about 20lbs each month. 3 months got me from 30% down to 15% ... then I stagnated ever since, working mostly on bulking muscle which requires a calorie surplus.

I felt healthy and after the first week I was even energetic. My cholesterol and glucose numbers got way better to. I hope that helps.

I need advice, good experienced Christian masculine advice.

1 upvotes · 7 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Nothing about this screams unicorn to me :p There are just some advantages to being with someone who is really bad at lying. That's really what it boils down to. The only issue of contention is whether or not she's lying because she wants to make him happy or if she's lying to placate him and to conceal herself until she finds a better guy.

I need advice, good experienced Christian masculine advice.

1 upvotes · 7 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Let me play devil's advocate and go against the grain here. Are these red flags? That really depends on what you're looking for.

Women, on the whole, are malleable. They are designed to conform to the man they're with. This is particularly dangerous if their man is putty, trying to conform to her because then instead of becoming a well-refined temple, you're just like if a kid clumps two blobs of play-dough together and meshes it around.

Most of what you're describing is this very concept: that she's trying to conform to you and your interests. This is actually a good thing. We're just not used to someone being so overt about it because most women are covert in how they communicate, and they're skilled at hiding what they're really thinking/feeling.

You have someone who wants to hide those things just like all the other women do, but she's insanely bad at it. That could be a good thing. Getting someone to be a good helper/follower is much easier if they (1) already want to mold to you and your expectations at a conscious level and (2) have trouble keeping it a secret when they have natural resistance to the direction you're leading.

Now, all of that aside, if you think she's just outright lying to you because she doesn't have any better options right now, or that she's just trying to placate you until another option is ripe and ready, that's a bigger problem. That's not a follower-in-the-making; it's covert disloyalty in-waiting. You know her better than we do, so I'll let you figure out where on that spectrum she might be.

[NSFW] Sexual Techniques, Strategies, and Games

1 upvotes · 6 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Nice list. Good food for thought.

[NSFW] Sexual Techniques, Strategies, and Games

1 upvotes · 6 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Dang ... maybe one day. I've fantasized about some of these things, but it'll be another year or two before she's ready.

Expressing our Flaws With Strength and Humility

1 upvotes · 5 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

True, true.

Expressing our Flaws With Strength and Humility

1 upvotes · 5 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with all that. The example was just the first one that popped up in my head, but the context should be that you're only having these conversations when you have committed some wrong against her that affects her, as I think I did say in my original post. Understandably, the losing weight thing probably wasn't the best example to fit that context :p

Expressing our Flaws With Strength and Humility

1 upvotes · 5 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Well, it doesn't force her to do anything. If she wants to hold a grudge forever, she's welcome to do so. But with the method I've communicated, what you're really doing is showing her that her unforgiveness is only hurting her, not you. That's the key. And that's also biblical. It maintains the core concept that forgiveness in most contexts is not about releasing the other person, but about making oneself internally right.

Rephrasing with some clarity

1 upvotes · 5 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I feel like you misread something here. I'm certainly not suggesting he fantasize about anyone else. I also said in my comment directly: "I'm not even saying you have to make this attraction intentional. You don't have to try to seduce Susan in front of your wife." I was just explaining the psychology behind the red pill concept for the purpose of reorienting him away from caring so much about what other men look like or from thinking he has to flirt around to convince his wife he's better than the other guys. My final line about "leaving room for the 'unknown'" was an encouragement to create even greater distance rather than increasing interactions with these women.

lol's from women at church

1 upvotes · 5 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Fair points.

Expressing our Flaws With Strength and Humility

1 upvotes · 5 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yeah, the "RP is all about sex" camp seems to be the first one and the second probably goes more toward the MGTOW people who don't care to impress women in the first place. As much as I despise the attitude of the MGTOW people, I probably side with them on this point, although for entirely different purposes. It has nothing to do with proving your strong by not caring what they think or by facing your weaknesses in front of them. It has everything to do with being biblical and godly, confessing our sins to the appropriate people in the appropriate manner. Note that my post does leave plenty of room for not confessing weaknesses that don't need to be confessed for no reason.

lol's from women at church

1 upvotes · 5 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree with what you've wrote, except to the extent that the link you provided says repeatedly that negging is not an insult, which I think aligns a lot better with what I was proposing. The only difference is that I have re-purposed the concept for a marriage concept, whereas the PUAs have to use it in an initial-meeting context, which might explain some of the heavier differences you're seeing from what I describe and what they're doing. You can't manipulate your spouse with a quick neg the same way you can someone you've never met, but the underlying principles of why the neg works with a new person can still be employed with your spouse in a healthy, productive way, as you have described.

What is the problem with porn?

1 upvotes · 4 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

If we assume that God/Solomon's intention for SoS is to titilate

That, sure. But I seriously doubt God intended for boys or girls to be reading it and masturbating to it. Virtually all of the porn industry today has that intentional and express purpose. As for God's actual intention, I still feel pretty confident about my previous response.

lol's from women at church

1 upvotes · 4 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

though anyone who thinks that their charm will always produce the desired results is living in a fantasy world
haha

And that is the whole point of the red pill. Beta men have these false fantasies of there being "one trick that will cause all women to drop their panties when they see you," as Buzz-feed often promises. The red pill acknowledges that there are underlying concepts about women that can be helpful in understanding principles behind attraction, but that no "trick" is going to work every time - and those principles are not things that can be expressed in 5 minutes, rather they take months and years to develop. A guy can't just go get a 6-pack overnight. He can't develop a successful career in 5 minutes at the bar. He can't develop fluent wit and charm. At best, he can strategize a few one-liners that come off as charming, but once he's through his litany of memorized script, he's got nothing left to offer. That's the difference between red pill and blue pill game.

negging would be one way someone believes they have game, and it may often work, but it's not honest or genuine (unless that person is a prick with no filter)

In the Christian realm, "negging" - especially in the context of a marriage - is both essential and healthy. It's a form of playful rebuke. When my wife disrespects me in front of the kids, am I better off standing over her and telling her, "You were wrong! You apologize to me in front of the kids right now and pray that God forgives you!"? Of course not. Instead, I can be light-hearted about it, letting her know that she screwed up, knocking her down a peg, but in a playful way that lets the relationship go on in a light-hearted manner. Of course, if I'm lying about her having done something wrong, that's a bigger problem and would not be consistent with RPC principles (maybe secular principles, but certainly not any you'll find espoused here).

Either way, glad I could help some :)

Rephrasing with some clarity

1 upvotes · 4 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The distinction may be subtle, but it's not trite. Subtleties can often be very significant. My main point in all of this is not that you compete with other men or try to garner the attraction of other women. You can do that if you want. My point is more that your job is to be the best version of you - the guy that God created you to be rather than the sissified pussy the church wants you to be. If you can do that, all the rest will flow naturally. You may not be the hottest or most charming or wealthiest guy at your church, but you'll be the man God intended you to be, and with that comes the fact that your marriage will be more like what God intended it to be, subject to your wife's responsiveness to your godliness. Because women are generally responsive beings, this is highly probable.

But if she fails to respond, her sin is on her head and not yours. Yes, you will have to bear the consequences for her sin in failing to respond to you ... but ultimately her sin is between her and God. Read my most recent post (as a result of our conversation) and in the bit about forgiveness, flip the genders and you'll see what I mean. To be clear, in that scenario which debt is worse: your wife not being sexually interested in you or the totality of your sin against God? Any Christian would understand the latter to be the answer. And if God forgave you of that and never promised you a perfect sex-life in your marriage, then what would the parable of the unmerciful servant have to say about your attitude toward your wife in this worst-case scenario? And I know it's only a worst-case because you already acknowledged that your wife is, in fact sexually attracted to you ;)

Perhaps one of the reasons there is no marriage in heaven ...

If I'm right about much of the content here, it's because our marriage will be to Christ and not to one another. Rather than physical marriages, we will realize the role that our spiritual marriage with Jesus was always meant to have, and this will be perfectly satisfying of any longing we have on earth that foreshadows what Christ will fulfill in heaven.

What is the problem with porn?

1 upvotes · 4 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Because we don't actually know what Solomon would have done or if it would have been God-inspired had he done it. We know almost with great certainty that mainstream pornography today is not the inspired revelation of God. As such, we can't make that connection.

What is the problem with porn?

1 upvotes · 4 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yes to what I'm saying. No to what Solomon would write today. It would probably be a 50 Shades of Grey movie with more nudity (? I haven't seen them) - lots of emphasis on the value of the man to attract the woman, and lots of emphasis on the physical attractiveness and submissiveness of the woman to attract the man.

Rephrasing with some clarity

1 upvotes · 4 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I just made some replies in your other thread and tried to tag you in them, so go there for more detail.

But what I'm seeing here is a fundamental misunderstanding of how you should be viewing the SMP. Go read TRP and MRP for a while and I'm confident you'll find virtually no posts suggesting, "You have to be better than all the other guys at the bar." Instead, they suggest you improve yourself in a variety of ways, which will naturally make you a better option than all the other guys at the bar.

The point here isn't actively to compete with other men as if they're your enemies on the SMP. Your job is to improve yourself, which has a passive effect of causing you to have a higher SMV than those other men anyway. Competition should not be your driving motivation. Being the man God created you to be should be. At that point, there should be no awkwardness with other Christian men because they are not your competition.

Another thing to note here is that preselection is the underlying component of dread, not merely hypergamous comparison. Preselection is not based on how you compare to other men; it's how other women's interest in you compares to your wife's interest. When other women display interest that your wife might otherwise not, it causes her to question her own perception of her man and adopt that of her peers. Even if she does already have an interest in you, it validates that interest, causing her to feel more free in expressing it toward you.

I get that /u/Rollo-Tomassi likes to focus on the biological aspects of hypergamy, basing it off of a woman's biological imperative to reproduce with someone who will produce good offspring. But I'm not convinced this is the controlling aspect of hypergamy today. There are plenty of ways women can satisfy their biological imperatives with a variety of men. So what makes hypergamy choose one man over another? Psychological imperatives.

Psychological imperatives can have biological roots beneath them, but they're mostly born from cultural conditioning and historical inertia. There's a lot of stuff on TRP, MRP, RPW, etc. about the "crabs in a bucket" mentality of women, for example - that they always want to ascend higher, but end up pulling each other down. This isn't something that is prompted by a genetic code, nor is it something explicitly taught. It's inherited through historical inertia (i.e. the way things have always been) mixed with cultural pressures. It's this constant comparison among women that I believe is the driving force behind their hypergamous desires today.

This is why dread works so well. A few thousand years ago I doubt dread would have been a necessity at all. But it becomes significant today because of the psychological concepts that are at its foundation, which is ultimately rooted in preselection. Dread, at its core, is about a man making himself attractive to other women in order that their interest in him will pique his own wife's interest in him.

So, if you were living a few thousand years ago, it would almost certainly be about being a better man than the next guy. Biology dominated back then. Since feminism took root in culture, the impact of biology decreased and that of female psychology increased. So, it's less about being better than all the other guys in church and more about how much other female attention you can draw. This also, implicitly, makes you assumed to be "better" than all the other guys anyway, even if you're objectively not. After all, if Susan is showing you IOIs, then what does that say about how she evaluates your SMV as compared to her husband, Bob? And if your wife previously thought that Bob was more attractive than you and she sees Susan wishing she had you instead of Bob, how does that re-shape how your wife views you as compared with Bob, even if Bob is otherwise objectively the better man? As you should now see, it's not about you compared to other men; it's about how other women view you as compared with how your wife views you.

I'm not even saying you have to make this attraction intentional. You don't have to try to seduce Susan in front of your wife. In fact, this is another important aspect of general relational psychology (not just in women): we always assume the grass is greener on the other side, unless we can blatantly see otherwise.

If I see another woman who is equally good looking as my wife, I'll naturally be more attracted to her than I am to my wife. That shouldn't make sense, but that's how it works. Why? Because I long for something different.

For women it's similar. Instead of just wanting variety, they find value in mystery. Women are predominantly creatures of fantasy. Their perception of you matters more than the actuality of you. The more a woman gets to know every detail of you, the less room there is for her mind to fantasize about you. But your wife has no idea what it's like being married to Bob. Maybe Bob's not as attractive as you, but perhaps he takes Susan out on more dates than you take your wife out to. Maybe Bob buys his wife flowers every Wednesday. Maybe Bob has more interests in common with your wife than you do. Maybe Bob ... whatever. It's highly likely that none of these things are true - but as long as your wife doesn't know that, she's free to assume that, and the unknown leads to assumptions, which formulate perception, which is more powerful than reality.

The key here, which underlies the concept of dread, is that you're creating in your wife the view that what she thinks is "reality" about you is wrong. When Susan starts ogling you in church or putting her hand on your arm, your wife thinks, "What's she think is there? What does she see in my husband that I'm missing?" She doesn't realize that Susan's interest in you is based on fantasy and perception. So, her stability in how she views you is shaken, which uncertainty leads to the breaking of your wife's perceptions about you, opening the way to fantasizing about you once more - the same way she did when you were dating and she didn't know you as well.

Of course, if you're a failure of a man she might instead just huff and say, "If only Susan knew what he was really like!"

But if nothing else, because women must tell themselves they are grounded in reality and will never admit to living in fantasy-perception land, Susan's ogling of you speaks volumes of your wife's view of Bob in comparison to you.

Long story short: you don't have to compromise your relationships with other men in the church by trying to compete with them on the SMP. They are not your enemy. Your job isn't to be more attractive than them; your job is to be more attractive to women whose opinions your wife observes (it doesn't even matter if she respects their opinion - women care about even the opinions of people who they don't respect). The best way to do this is to leave a lot of "unknown," which allows room for fantasy. Incidentally, leaving room for the "unknown" also solves the problem people invoked from your other post about not leading women on.

What is the problem with porn?

1 upvotes · 4 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I wasn't challenging that point in specific. I was simply saying that before people had wide-spread access to visual erotica all people responded to text erotica.

This all stems from an SMV evaluation stand-point. Men evaluate female SMV based almost entirely on their looks. Maybe 8 out of 10 points are assigned based on looks and the other 2 on miscellaneous other factors. But women might only calculate 3 points on looks and 3 on charm/wit and 1 on income and 1 on social status, etc.

When we look at the evaluation measures this way, when there is no actual picture to look at, text can just as well let a man's imagination run wild as a woman's. They're just looking at different things in the text. The young men would be seeing all the descriptors of the "beloved's" boobs and vagina and imagining what they look like, whereas the women would focus on the fact that Solomon was good looking, but also a king, wealthy, highly respected, flirtatious, etc.

The way the book is written makes this dichotomy clear. We have lots of passages talking about Solomon's social status, being followed around by armed guards, being kingly, having plenty of riches ... and a little bit about his body too. But virtually everything said of the beloved is about her looks. This demonstrates that in a pre-visual time-period it was pretty much equally targeted toward men and women, most likely given the fact that Solomon intimately understood the differences between how men and women evaluate attraction. After all, he is the wisest man ever to live and he clearly focused a lot of his wisdom on understanding how to get all those wives and concubines in the first place.

My conclusion is simply that SoS is not "female porn." It is simply "poetic erotica" in general in its own cultural context, equally addressing the attraction triggers of both men and women.

I get your point about the ancient Chinese, but are you really suggesting that those types of things were common in every home at that time? In fact, your own citation says: "Depictions of sexual intercourse were not part of the general repertory of ancient Egyptian formal art." It notes that these types of things predominantly existed in temples and among the privileged elite.

Notice it's always more skin (visual)

True, but when actual visuals are unavailable, text can do the job of painting visuals with words just fine.

Men don't go from looking at thighs to looking up a sex story to finish.

But if they never had thighs to look at to begin with ...

You're not really challenging this, are you?

In modern culture, absolutely not. But that's mostly due to female ASD and SMV calculations. If visual porn went more into the back-story of how much money the guy earns, how socially elite he is, and showed off clear displays of wit and charm rather than jumping straight into crude advances ... I'd suppose you'd see about as much female interest in that kind of stuff as the Twilight movies brought in even in light of the books.

The porn industry just doesn't believe there's enough of a market for it among women - and ASD probably assures they're right.

What is the problem with porn?

1 upvotes · 4 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You certainly raise some interesting points - ones worth considering.

Song of Solomon is female porn.

In ancient times it would have been porn to anyone.

When is the last time we heard any preaching against women lusting after SoS? Never, of course.

That's because I'm skeptical of it ever happening. I've certainly never heard of it happening. I'm also of the impression that women weren't taught to read until during or after the medieval period (i.e. 500s AD), so throughout virtually all of Jewish and early Christian history common women couldn't have read Song of Solomon anyway (upper-class women possibly being an exception). Accordingly, it would be incredibly shocking to see in a historical record an epidemic of women rubbing themselves to Song of Solomon when they simply didn't even have that option available to them in the first place.

Scripture yet also erotic to certain groups of people

I'm not following. It was erotic to boys too. So if by "certain groups of people" you mean "pretty much everyone back then," then sure. Your premise seems to be that text is erotic to women and visuals are erotic to men. But that's based on you being in a world where visual erotica is openly available. In movies and media there's an occasional joke about young Amish boys looking at a picture of a woman's ankles as if it's naughty porn. Take culture back thousands of years before even the Amish and I'm sure you can see how text would have been the epitome of pornography to men in a pre-pictures world.

Even if a Scripture is "useless" (COUGH NUMBERS COF COF) it still serves as history.

Nah, Numbers is a great book. It shows the value God places on generational ministry. It gives us a clear picture of the type of spiritual generations we should be producing today - something that's often forgotten because some people assume that the book of Numbers has no modern value beyond history. Going in with that assumption causes people to miss how the content relates to a post-Gospel world.

So, what use is SoS then? Or rather, what did God intend for SoS to be? Why is SoS Scripture?

These are all great questions. This is what intrigues me most about your comment here. My historical answer has been that physical relationships between men and women are meant to foreshadow and parallel the type of relationship that God wanted to have with his bride. Men are highly sexually spontaneous and women are pretty much only sexually responsive. Similarly, we see the church being fairly uninterested in spiritual reproductive acts until God initiates with us, compelling us toward it, although he is spontaneous and desires spiritual reproduction constantly. Song of Solomon gives a more picturesque idea of what this parallel looks like, spelling it out far more clearly than other types of books do. Without it, the church would be devoid of its ability to appreciate physical sexuality - but even more important, it would fail to understand its imperative toward spiritual reproduction and the balance of God's role as our groom and our role as his bride in that process and the types of feelings and behaviors we should experience on our mission to make disciples.

What if tomorrow, someone is to find a video version of Songs of Solomon? In full 1080p/4k resolution of Solomon banging women?

Well, let's be clear that Song of Songs is mostly the build-up to their sexuality. I don't recall any verses saying, "And then he thrust in, and then out, and then in again, and then he made his O-face." Do they even get naked in the book? It's been a while since I've read it, let alone in the context of looking for specific sex acts happening rather than just being talked about.

What if God made SoS Scripture precisely to titillate?

I do believe he did. I think he wanted to spark people's libidos in a way that leaves them thinking, "I want to find someone to do that with!" I don't think he intended people to utilize it as porn, masturbating to satisfaction so that they never have the compulsion to find anyone else because that book is all they'll ever need. That's not to say people haven't used it that way - only that it's probably very rare and the only reports I've heard of people using it that way have been men, not women.

the OT doesn't condemn the acquiring of multiple wives, or concubines, yet always condemns promiscuous women

This is a fair point, which I've addressed at length in other threads on this sub. I usually run against the grain on biblical conclusions of polygamy, though I certainly see arguments both ways. Perhaps the best arguments I've seen are: (1) that Christ has one bride, the Church, and to allow multiple brides would break the imagery; and (2) that although there is no direct condemnation of polygamy and having concubines, virtually every example of a person doing it in the Old Testament results in some negative repercussion (Jacob being a rare exception, and even he had some life complications because of it). As to that second point, one could easily argue that Scripture wasn't written to appease the women in this regard; rather, it is trying to appease the men who would have revolted against Scripture if God had forbid them from their polygamous ways. Of course, I don't believe God is trying to appease anyone in the way Scripture was written other than himself, so that's more just a point of argument against people who think the Scriptures are only gynocentric.

the "but your wife!" part is added in. The Bible doesn't say "no lust for any woman but your wife!", the Bible says "no lust for any woman" (Matthew 5:28)

That's a pretty shallow look at the passage. Jesus doesn't say "no lust for any woman" either. He says that anyone who looks at a woman lustfully has committed adultery with her in his heart. Many of the early church fathers certainly did take the view that it was sinful even to look lustfully at one's own wife - a ridiculous point which /u/OsmiumZulu has addressed more thoroughly before. But the notion of committing adultery against one's wife with one's wife is ... illogical. The only rational interpretation is that if you're lusting after your own wife, it's not actually adultery.

We have seen the examples of the Jews, their typical gynocentric reaction is to forbid MEN from reading female porn.

Again, in those days it was porn to both genders, not just women. The men were the ones forbidden from reading it explicitly because the women didn't have the ability to read it at all.

Gender roles from an Orthodox perspective

1 upvotes · 2 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is everything I hoped it would be and more. OP, read carefully to gain better insights on how to flesh out blue pill talk from red. Nobody - not even me - is better at this than Whitified.

And the bit about sola scriptura - so true, yet I never noticed it. For centuries - millennia even - the church held and applied clear teaching on authority structures in a marriage, yet somehow this tradition doesn't matter. Only the traditions that don't offend women, like idolizing Mary and praying to her, are preserved.

You should post that bit as a question on r/TrueChristian and see what the Cathodox say in response.

Gender roles from an Orthodox perspective

1 upvotes · 1 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Yes, it's all of that. Husband/wife = Christ/church. A close example would be Jesus with his 12. But even this isn't quite right because they aren't his church yet. They weren't married. He was only preparing them to be his bride - which still gives great insight.

A better example would be to read the book of Acts and discern what God did from what the apostles did, as well as the motives in why certain things happened. For example, did God delegate authority to them in a particular passage? Or were they following the commission Jesus gave them? Or were they responding to the compulsion of the Spirit within them?

When you can rightly divide (without modern assumptions) the role of God from the role of the apostles in the book of Acts, that's when you'll have a complete understanding of what biblical marriage should look like - and that's not a task I have finished myself. I'm only a year into that study. But the apostles are the best representation we have of what Christ intended for the church to look like because the rest of the early church was constantly being rebuked for sin and the apostles had to keep saying, "Look at what we're doing and be like us."

When reading the epistles we have to take a slightly different approach. In that specific context the apostles were then functioning as the Christ figure to the church, much like Moses to Aaron in Exodus 4. Although this can be helpful, it doesn't make sense to look at the apostle/church relationship as a model with the apostles standing in the place of Christ when we already have pragmatic evidence of Jesus's life directly as well as the academic-theological statements of the apostles in the epistles about Jesus and his relationship with the church.

But at this point I feel like I'm now making the conversation more confusing than it is ripe for right now. So, I'll cut myself off there. I'll simply refrain that Acts is the key. It shows the pragmatic relationship between Christ and the people he commissioned to be his Church, which the apostles refer to as the "first fruits" of the church. The Gospels show the dating and engagement structures and the epistles are akin to reading academic papers that reference marriage in passing but are really about something else entirely. Ephesians 5 sounds really cool, for example ... but what does it actually look like in practice? That's what really matters.

Acts is the real deal in action modeled for all to see. It's beautiful and I want nothing more than to be that kind of bride to Christ and that kind of Christ to my bride.

Gender roles from an Orthodox perspective

1 upvotes · 1 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

He still emphasizes the roles within this framework.

Emphasize is a strong word. He mentions it. The underlying tone of the entire article is: "I want to show that the Bible isn't anti-women, but I don't want to contradict what the Bible says either, so I'll try to write a piece that highlights the power, authority, and equality of women as much as possible without compromising the black-and-white stuff in the Bible that I simply can't get out of."

It seems that there is some distinction between the hierarchy and the mutual submission to one another here.

Your question in the original post assumed that husbands should submit to their wives also, and you asked how to do that. The passage says the opposite: that submission in a marriage context is unilateral. It's not saying hierarchical structures should be broken.

I see the complete opposite really.

You're welcome to that :) Black looking at gray sees that it's too white for him. White looking at the same shade of gray sees that it's too black for him. If you're coming from a predominantly blue frame of reference, I can see how this would have the appearance of "red" - because the tid bits about authority structures in marriage are shocking to the deep blue culture we have. But I think if you were standing at a red vantage point in your own mind you'd see what I'm talking about a lot more clearly.

are men to lead in a tyrannical way?

Of course not. In that exact passage Paul explains how husbands should lead their wives.

how are we to lead if mutual submission is not our ideal?

The exact same way Christ leads the church. Mutual submission is not a part of it. Christ does not submit to the church's authority on anything. But he does love us with incredible grace, mercy, justice, discipline, wisdom, etc. all the same.

Would it be as Christ died for the Church, or?

That'd be part of it, yes. But that's only one bit of it. In love, Christ also disciplines us (Hebrews 12:6). God is love, yet he also lets people experience the natural consequences of their rebellion, even if it means leaving him (Romans 1:18 et seq., 2 Timothy 2:12, Matthew 10:33), among many, many other things.

Positive Aspects of Red Pill Compared to Bible

1 upvotes · 1 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This is an overall excellent post and I'm shocked at how few comments there are here. That said, everything you have written about actually is already addressed on the side-bar content of this sub.

- Dread: 107 directly and several other places implicitly
- Lifting: 101, and 203 directly, and numerous other places implicitly
- Tests: 207 directly and it comes up in most askRPC-type threads
- Finances: 204 addresses it directly
- Sex: At least half of the posts on this sub and most of the sidebar addresses it directly

I do like that you're addressing things from more of an imperative perspective than pragmatic (not to say you're not being pragmatic). That is, my post on finances and the abundance mentality is directed at how to develop abundance, not necessarily an imperative on how we should use our abundance once we have it. The Bible has a lot to say on those things, which has been addressed ad nauseam in other Christian sectors, but it is genuinely difficult to filter out the vast numbers of opinions on the matter and which ones are right and wrong and the implications of being red pillled in how we apply those concepts. So, I appreciate the push here very much :)

Positive Aspects of Red Pill Compared to Bible

1 upvotes · 1 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Solid reply. As to your last paragraph, I wrote a post a few months back on the concept that There is no "Christian Version" of anything. The premise is simply that if God is the source material, all secular things - including secular RP - are just rip-offs of what God originally designed and intended. As such, secular RP didn't come up with this stuff. God did. They're just trying to understand what he did on their own while refusing to use the text-book he gave explaining it all.

As such, and more to OP (Tag: /u/capt_cj1), the goal of this sub is not to Christianize the secular RP concepts; it is to de-secularize what MRP and TRP have gleaned from the order of creation that God had set in place from the get-go.

Gender roles from an Orthodox perspective

1 upvotes · 1 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

To run through a few things off the top of my head, what I see is that in each section he's trying to minimize the differences and elevate the status of women in the face of passages that clearly imply the opposite:

- 1 Cor. 11:3-16 he talks about Christ and God being equal in power, therefore women must be equal in power to men, despite whatever technicality of roles there may be.
- 1 Cor. 14:26-40 he starts his explanation, "On first glance, it seems like Paul is forbidding women to speak publicly in church ... " and then plays the "but he didn't really mean what he said" game.
- Ephesians 5:18-33 he mistakenly drops the context of chapter 4 and 5:1-17 and treats the "submit to one another" as a command to husbands and wives also, as if the wife does have some right to demand that her husband submit to her, which only creates confusion and not clarity, as the question in your original post proves.
- 1 Timothy 2:8-15 he tries to create a work-around for the "Let a woman learn quietly with all submissiveness. I do not permit a woman to teach or to exercise authority over a man" part.

Literally all of his explanations except the Galatians section are oriented toward enhancing the authority of women in the church and in marriages from what was expressed when Paul wrote those passages. I'm not sure how you can call that anything other than blue.

You try to argue it's "red" simply because it has a conclusion about the leader/helper dynamic at the end, but even the most blue of all blue pillled complementarian pastors and preachers will say the same thing. That does not make it red, or else you'd have to start arguing that John Piper is red - and I'd love to see you make that assertion to /u/Whitified (yes, I'm intentionally calling you into this conversation).

it still is ambiguous to me how a man and women are to both mutually submit to one another while still keeping the structure in place from your response.

My whole point is that the mutual submission clause does not apply in marriage - that Paul intentionally exempts marriage from the implication of 5:21.

As I noted toward the end of my comment (I did make some edits, so maybe you read it before the final edit), when Paul references the "church" he is usually talking to men. When he's writing his letters, without a specific address, the context is clear that he's talking to the men of the church on the assumption that they will receive the letters directly and communicate to their wives what he said. This is obvious by the way he talks broadly of circumcision, the gender pronouns he uses, when considering the consistency of his theology between his general statements and his statements about gender roles, etc. There is no evidence that the general portions of his letters were intended to be received by women the same way as men - and this is even made clear by the way he sometimes even says, "And tell the women ..." or "Help the women ..."

To that end, chapter 4 and 5:1-21 are not an address for men to submit to their sisters in the faith. It is for the men to submit to one another. You'd be really hard-pressed to find evidence in the passages himself that Paul was trying to include women in the mutual submission descriptor of being "filled with the Spirit."

Moreover, Paul's other writings address this concept quite clearly: that there are times that people must submit to the hierarchical authority of the church. Imagine if a pastor is disciplining one of his congregants and that congregant invokes Ephesians 5:21 and says, "You must mutually submit to me too! So, you command me to repent for what you think I did wrong, but I'm now commanding you to repent for what I think you did wrong." Who submits to who here?

Paul isn't trying to abrogate authority structures. The "submitting to one another" is like saying that an elder submit to a pastor, and a deacon to an elder, and a congregant to a deacon. It also implies that when people are on an equal authority level that we must submit to one another mutually. But nowhere do we see in the text an implication that these authority structures are to be ignored or abolished when Paul himself was partially responsible for setting them up in the first place.

The fact that one inherently assumes that women are included in the mutual submission language without deriving that conclusion from the text itself is a demonstration of the blue-pilled preconditioning inherent in the way we approach Scriptural interpretation. I do it too, so I'm not saying you're at fault. But I often find when I take a closer look that my culturally-conditioned preconceived notions about what I thought were implicit in a passage were actually wrong.

Men with high testosterone, less likely to be in church

1 upvotes · 1 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

My thoughts exactly. The closest we ever got was Driscoll's church - and even that had several problems while in its prime. But you did see a much larger following of machismo type men.

Gender roles from an Orthodox perspective

1 upvotes · 1 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Once again, I am unimpressed by the alleged Orthodox interpretations. This is blueish-purple, at best, with maybe a miniscule dot of red mixed in there. I would love to get /u/Whitified's feedback, as this article pretty much exemplifies everything that complementarians stand for - "Yes, there might be some technical authority structure here, but God really meant to equalize men in women as much as possible. All that stuff about head coverings and not talking in church and what not ... that doesn't really count. Let's focus on the equality part and just pay lip service to the authority stuff."

A lot of what he says is legitimate in the sense that it is possible to reach that conclusion and no one can definitively prove him wrong; but with the evidence available, many of his conclusions are significantly less likely than the alternative, which is that the author actually meant what he said.

It reminds me of a great Simpsons episode where Marge is being wooed by a literary professor. She reads a note from Homer saying, "I love you." The literary professor takes the note and says, "Do you see how offensive this is? 'I' is the subject of the sentence, meaning he thinks of himself as the central actor. 'You' is the object, meaning you are nothing more than an object to him. Do you want to be with someone who thinks only of himself and considers you nothing more than a mere object?" That's obviously an extreme example, but it is certainly a way to interpret a sentence like that and there's no way to definitively prove that the author didn't actually mean what the professor is saying. But context shows us that it is incredibly unlikely that this is the actual conclusion.

All of that aside, to address the Ephesians 5 issue you honed in on (as I don't have time to cover the rest), he references in passing that we must all "submit to one another," but he mistakenly lumps this in with 22-33, as if it's part of the same mesh of thought. It's not.

Ephesians 5 is not in a vacuum by itself. Chapter 4 precedes it, which talks about creating unity among the whole body of believers. 4:32 uses the same "one another" language as 5:21 when it says, "Be kind to one another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another." He then says, "Therefore," in 5:1 to connect the two sections, suggesting he is still talking to the entire body of believers. 5:1-21 is then riddled with conjunctives to show the connectivity in everything he is saying to the previous content.

At no point in 5:1-21 does he reference husbands and wives specifically. The phrase, "submitting to one another out of reverence for Christ" is not its own sentence, as the NIV implies. This is clear from the fact that the Greek upotassomenoi (sometimes hypotassomenoi) is in the participle conjugation and not the verb conjugation. As a verb, "submit" would appear to be a command. As a participle, "submitting" is a descriptor about how one is to be filled with the Spirit - and it follows a series of other descriptors, also in the participle form: "addressing ... singing ... giving ... submitting."

The importance here is not to deny that this is a command. Even as a participle, we can assume that we must live up to the description of how we are to be filled with the Spirit. The point is to demonstrate that it is part of a series of other participles directed toward all believers - that this phrase does not stand on its own. Of course, it would be nice if the Greek actually used periods and capital letters to make our job of discerning all this much easier; but since we don't do that, we MUST use patterns in the text to clarify where thoughts are connected and where they stop. This is as clear a pattern as I've ever seen one.

Immediately after that, without any conjunctive (as was very common in the preceding section), Paul simply changes gears in a grammatically jarring manner. This is to show that he is starting a new thought that was provoked by something he had just said. "addressing ... singing ... giving ... submitting to one another out of reverence for Christ. <Stop, no conjunctive> Wives, submit to your own husbands."

The context here is clearly to prove the opposite of what your article proposes. It is not that wives and husbands must submit to one another. It is more likely Paul is saying, "Submit to one another within the body of Christ ... but let me be clear, I'm not changing the authority structure in marriage that I've already written a lot about elsewhere." The contrast is intentional. "Submit to one another. <Stop> But wives, don't get any crazy ideas here, For the husband is still your head, just as Christ is his head, just like I said to the Corinthians in 1 Cor. 11:3."

To that end, the totality of Paul's writings demonstrates a clear intention and understanding that the Church was referenced by the men who God meant to run it. When he sets up the authority structure in 1 Cor. 11:3, it goes God is the head of Christ is the head of man is the head of woman. Given the rest of 1 Cor. 11:3-16, 1 Cor. 14, 1 Timothy 2, and other such passages, we can assume that "Christ is the head of man" is parallel with "Christ is the head of the church," which is exactly what Ephesians 5:23 says. In fact, 5:23-24 itself makes this obvious by setting that clear contrast: "For the husband is the head of the wife even as Christ is the head of the church [man] ... Now as the church [man] submits to Christ, so also wives should submit in everything to their husbands." This is so parallel to 1 Cor. 11:3 and consistent with all of Paul's writings on church headship that I'm not sure how anyone could miss it.

To read these two phrases in 5:21 and 5:22 as flowing into each other and not as a contrast to one another is boggling to me. It shows a preconditioned blue-pill mentality combined with an ignorance of Greek grammar and a failure to connect Paul's writings to one another, as your article treats each passage separately and not collectively.

Show me where Christ has ever submitted to the authority of the Church and I will be happy to reconsider my interpretation ;)

What is the problem with porn?

1 upvotes · 1 June 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I have no clue why this was down-voted. Per my comment, I'm in agreement with you that pornography is defined by the heart-orientation of the observer, not the object itself. Romans 14:14 makes this abundantly clear.

Phil's May Update

1 upvotes · 29 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

There's a world of difference between "I want nothing to do with her ever again" and "I really wish she'd call me but I know it'll never happen."

#MeToo church edition: Major Evangelical leader, Paige Patterson "removed" as Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary President

1 upvotes · 29 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

True.

Phil's May Update

1 upvotes · 29 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

That's not ghosting. Ghosting = no contact at all.

Phil's May Update

1 upvotes · 29 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I made a comment on this recently in r/TrueChristian, which was received very well. Here it is. The answer of curing ONEitis is not to ghost her and try to move in. That will only leave a lingering fantasy in your head of what "could have been." I had strong ONEitis in high school that I never acted on - and to this day I still can't quash the gooey feeling of how great things might have been if I had gotten together with her. It's obviously something I can easily control now, but my point is that ghosting her isn't the answer.

Phil's May Update

1 upvotes · 29 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Everything becomes dull when you have a new obsession. Kill the obsession and you'll kill the dullness as well. Other things can have meaning again.

Mindset towards those who are not chaste

1 upvotes · 25 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Take your upvote.

Advice. Legal next moves. Etc.

1 upvotes · 23 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

Possible ... extremely unlikely. I've had it happen, but it usually only ends up being a fraction of the bill, unless you can prove malfeasance.

Advice. Legal next moves. Etc.

1 upvotes · 22 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

Pro se litigants always want to do this. You can file anything. You can file the New York telephone directory in California if you want. But filing a statement in advance is a horrible idea and makes you look like an ignorant noob. Don't do that. Plus it tips off the other side about all your arguments without you knowing hers.

Advice. Legal next moves. Etc.

1 upvotes · 22 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

No ... don't appear at all. Let her get a default judgment. /s Seriously? What kind of question is that?

Advice. Legal next moves. Etc.

1 upvotes · 22 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

Among other things. Look up your state statute regarding best interests of a minor child and just hammer the factors one by one. That statue is your cheat sheet. Take advantage of it.

Advice. Legal next moves. Etc.

1 upvotes · 22 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

Rehab is a magic word to a judge. You say that and your past troubles just vanish.

Advice. Legal next moves. Etc.

1 upvotes · 22 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

How do any of her supposed arguments affect the child? They don't. It's that simple. This isn't a case about arguing parental fitness. It's about best interests of the child. So her allegations about you aren't worth the porcelain bowl she's sipping her soup from.

What is the Greek word for “submit” or “submission” in Ephesians 5?

1 upvotes · 22 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Oh, there are countless other options.

What is the Greek word for “submit” or “submission” in Ephesians 5?

1 upvotes · 22 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Some women need that instruction. Of course, to be fair ... some men do too :p

Is RP it's own hermeneutic?

1 upvotes · 20 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

In a perfect world, we would interpret Scripture in a vacuum - considering only rote facts to ascertain what God intended to communicate through an author. Or more specifically, if the author's intentions in his writings were inspired by God, then we would be able to have an objective stance on how to discern the author's intentions by the words he wrote on the page, illuminated by peripheral knowledge about the historical context, culture, archaeology, etc.

This isn't a perfect world, though. I used to fight this assertion tooth-and-nail, but I have finally given up and readily embrace the fact that we all approach the Bible through our own perceptive lenses.

This isn't a bad thing. God has given us different perspectives for a reason. One who is gifted at healing or prophecy or tongues will need to have an eye for the work of the Spirit in Scripture in order to hone his craft. Another who is gifted at teaching, wisdom, and discernment must have the ability to ascertain from an academic standpoint the finer things of word selection, grammar, cross-referencing and history. One who is gifted at hospitality, mercy, and helping must be able to find in Scripture the things that will make them more gracious and receiving of those in their lives who are in need. These are all different lenses through which we read and interpret Scripture. None of them are wrong; they simply focus and filter what we read to help us find that which is most advantageous and beneficial to our immediate calling by God.

What is very dangerous is when we assume that all other people must view Scripture through the same lens that we do, or otherwise that we deny the validity in other lenses. It is true that there are some very bad and harmful lenses. Interpreting Scripture through an atheist lens, for example, would certainly lead to many false conclusions. However, that does not mean there is no value in understanding how an atheist would read a passage.

To that end, I encourage everyone to read Scripture through an RP lens - but that this not be the only lens through which we read, interpret, and apply Scripture. Rather, meditating on God's Word involves a more complete approach in attempting to view it from every angle. Anyone who specifically rejects a particular lens is closing off a potential source of information that could be helpful.

[FR] STFU, just STFU

1 upvotes · 15 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

Feel free. No need to credit.

Help me analyze this situation. Am I being a dick?

1 upvotes · 14 May 2018 · /r/askTRP

Why do you care if you're coming off as a jerk or not?

To Marry or Not To Marry?

1 upvotes · 11 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I'm sorry to hear about your loved one. There's obviously a lot I could say in reply, but even with anything I might otherwise say you've gone a long way in helping me understand this viewpoint, if not actually persuading me a bit. Thanks for that :)

Regulating Sexual Desire

1 upvotes · 9 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

If someone has determined that their sex drive and thus sexual temptation is too strong then they should marry (per v8-9)

See the end portion of my other comment. I'll try to keep things consolidated over there :p

I agree that this is optimal. Real life is not optimal.

But that's also why those in the church are called to be set apart - to do things differently from the way the culture/world would have us do it. What you're saying implies that my model, which we both agree is biblically optimal, won't work - that God will somehow fail to be faithful if people follow the biblically optimal path, and therefore people will end up committing more sexual sin by devoting themselves to God rather than making an active search for a spouse. I'm guessing this isn't what you actually meant, but that's the only way I can see to interpret this comment without further explanation.

The terrible divorce statistics in the Church.

Which is easily attributed to the fact that the church (1) compels people toward marriage and (2) urges them to get married quickly if they're going to start having sex soon. Both of my assumptions are met. And it's made even worse when we consider the large majority of people who self-identify as Christians who can't even articulate the Gospel or any way that Jesus has changed their lives (see this comment for a detailed statistical break-down of what I'm talking about).

Come on. If that's the case, how can we ever know anything with any degree of certainty then?

On the topic of marriage and sex, a couple can know with great certainty whether or not they're going to fornicate before marriage if they don't set a wedding date.

I'm not sure how the church/college/job/etc. line of questions relates at all ... maybe explain that a bit more if I'm missing something.

To Marry or Not To Marry?

1 upvotes · 9 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It was prompted by a conversation I've been having with /u/Deep_Strength as well as a past conversation I had with /u/redpillwonder - both of whom seem to think it's perfectly fine for a Christian to date women with the intention of finding someone to marry.

They are both very well-reasoned and articulate when I have had this conversation, but most of the conversation has been either philosophical or explaining away passages that contradict their philosophical premise. I'm now wanting to see if there is an underlying theological basis to support this view in the first place. And I know there are several others here who share their view, so I want to open the conversation to all.

Regulating Sexual Desire

1 upvotes · 9 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

There's no way it does not refer to the sex drive.

I understand much better what you're saying, but I think "sex drive" is the wrong term. You mean the degree of horniness in a given moment - and if that's what you meant, then I may agree. "Sex drive" generally refers to long-term patterns of a person's sexuality, which the passage is clearly not referencing, as even an LL might in any given moment want sex more than her HL spouse who would then deny her.

The sex drive is the reason for temptation when the other spouse deprives them.

I would re-word this as "short-term horniness." A person with a high sex-drive has short-term horniness frequently. But even people with a low sex drive may have it and be tempted into sin, which is why the long-term patterns of a person's libido don't seem to be present in this passage to me. It applies regardless of whether it's from the HL or the LL.

couples don't have that gift

This is the crux of the whole thing. You seem to be assuming that anyone who struggles with porn or premarital sex must automatically "not have that gift." I suggest that many people struggle with these things not because they lack the gift of celibacy, but because they are psychologically conditioned by a culture to ignore their God-given gifts in exchange for the things culture tells them they should want instead.

each man knowing his own sex drive and sexual temptations needs to determine if he can stay single for God or if he needs to marry

I agree here. But the prerequisite to this position is that a man must first have his own body under control. Otherwise he's letting his sinfulness define what he believes God's will is, which is dangerous.

If he needs to marry, start cultivating the roles and responsibilities of a husband sooner rather than later.

Agreed again. But I'll note that this doesn't mean hopping on dating sites or going to a church singles group to find a spouse. It's a matter of deciding if we should pursue God and accept what he gives us along the way, whether that involves a spouse or not ... or if we should be distracted from our pursuit of God in order to spend time finding someone who will be a life-long distraction of our pursuit of God because we don't believe God would bring us alongside such a person if we just made him our sole focus in the first place. To me that's a no-brainer.

I suppose the only point on your recap where we differ is rooted in your contention that a person can know their own sexual proclivity with a hypothetical spouse. I believe one must know who that hypothetical person is (therefore making it a non-hypothetical) before one can make that determination.

To clarify what I mean, as this is a slight change of gears from what we were discussing before: suppose a man has a very, very strong sex-drive. He can't stop looking at porn. He fantasizes over women he sees on the street. He decides he must be one of the ones to get married. But there are no women who he stands a chance with who make him horny - it's just the porn stars on the computer and the non-Christians who act all slutty walking around. He goes on dates, even with attractive women, but never has that "click" with any of them, even after dozens of dates. He still only gets horny for the porn star and sluts, who he could obviously never marry. Are you suggesting that such a man should marry one of these dozens of other women who don't make him horny, even though he has no temptation to have sex with them? And what kind of marriage would that produce - a fruitful, productive one that alleviates his sin, or a damaging one that makes him resentful and pushes him back to porn to get himself off? Or what if he marries someone who made him horny once, but shortly after the marriage she becomes fat and he loses all attraction and he thinks to himself, "If I'd known marriage would be like this, I would have remained celibate!"?

Or what about the man who has an incredibly low sex drive, has never struggled with porn, and has generally been uninterested in women all his life ... but one particular girl comes along in his late-30s and is just driving him up the wall with how horny he gets for her, and she can barely keep her hands off him too, but they both know it's just New Relationship Excitement and will assuredly fade in time ... what should he do?

Do you see how "sex drive" is a terrible indicator as to whether or not people should get married or start looking for a spouse? There are so many situations where people will mistakenly conclude, "I'm a high-libido, so God must want me to get married" and this mentality leads them into a lot of trouble ... unless they say immediately after, "So I'll just pursue God and hope that he'll either address my libido or bring someone alongside me with whom I can express it."

Regulating Sexual Desire

1 upvotes · 9 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I assume you are talking about Matthew 19

Correct.

Once men gain it, they can decide for themselves if they still want to marry or if it is controllable and the mission is so important that they will stay continent.

Cross-reference this with 1 Cor. 7:37-38 - "But whoever is firmly established in his heart, being under no necessity but having his desire under control, and has determined this in his heart, to keep her as his betrothed, he will do well. So then he who marries his betrothed does well, and he who refrains from marriage will do even better."

A few points from this: (1) this passage is referencing men who are already engaged to be married, leaving the implication in Paul's mind: "If you're not engaged, why would you even be seeking in the first place?" This implication is actually directly stated in v 7, 8, 23-24, 26, 28, 33, 35, 40. (2) It also assumes that a man should make this decision as one who is sober-minded, as the one who is getting married because he cannot control his passion would be in violation of the principles of v23 that we should not enslave ourselves to others (as 25-35 implies is Paul's view of marriage, as it forces people to adopt the concerns of their spouse) and the principle of v32, which implies that we should be free of anxieties that compel certain behaviors. To that end, I refrain that a man should learn to control his passions before getting married, if it is an isolated passion (if it's a mutual passion that's different). (3) It says quite plainly that it's better not to marry. I'm not sure why we should encourage people to be seeking a spouse from scratch rather than encouraging them toward what Scripture says is the better option altogether. As Paul notes in verse 6, his statement about it being okay to marry in order to avoid premarital sex is made as a concession and not a command.

I can't see how we, in good faith, can encourage people to act on their desire because Paul conceded that there is a legitimate loop hole to his otherwise obvious advice against marriage.

marriage doesn't usually 'just happen' for most

You're absolutely right. But you're also describing a cultural imperative and adopting it as if it were God-ordained. It's not. Culture also says we should make lots and lots of money - that money should be a primary pursuit in life. It tells us that "making money doesn't usually 'just happen' for most" - that we must work hard and set goals and etc. etc. in order to fulfill all of our monetary dreams. But we know that this idolatrous attitude is sinful, despite the fact that there's a cultural imperative toward it and that it takes work and effort to get it done.

In the same way, you're saying that people have to work hard to find a spouse, and therefore this must be what God wants. That doesn't make much sense to me.

My model says that people shouldn't look to finding a spouse at all - that they should live in "undivided devotion to the Lord" (v35) until such time as their devotion to God puts them in a situation where marriage is the biblical next step (and if done rightly, one that is passionately desired as well). I simply cannot fathom how anyone could argue that there is any other better option than this.

Those who go into marriage without much preparation the Scripture's roles and responsibilities for tend not to do as well

What is this broad statistic based on? Almost certainly people who were (1) actively looking for a spouse, and (2) rushed into it due to sexuality. This is the exact opposite of what I'm proposing, as I'm suggesting people (1) avoid actively looking for a spouse, and (2) avoid rushing into anything just to have sex. Of the people I have observed who have followed my model (noting that I didn't come up with this model - I learned it from many older, wiser people than myself), 100% are still together and have never divorced. This is at least 8 or 9 couples (not overly common, but not as uncommon as you might think). The reason they attribute to their successful marriage (including their sexual satisfaction) is that their eyes have always been on God and never on their spouse - and that this orientation inherently assumes people are only getting married when they are spiritually and relationally mature enough to do so and naturally precludes most of the conflicts that other married couples (such as those who just rush in to have sex) would otherwise discover after marriage.

if a man knows that permanent celibacy for Christ is not his calling

How is a man ever to know that with any great certainty? How does he know if he's not gifted with celibacy, but that blue pill cultural conditioning has caused him to idolize marriage and sex anyway?

especially after he has become sexually continent

These are the only groups who I might suggest can pass the test above. To that end, if a man has full control over his sexuality I agree that he can make an informed decision about whether or not a lifetime of celibacy is part of God's calling over him. One who is enslaved to his own sinfulness is incapable of making such an informed judgment and will confuse his own sinfulness with the assumption that "because I keep sinning this way, it must be God's will for me to get married." We should not allow sin to define God's will for us in that way.

then it would be wise for him to start preparing for the roles and responsibilities of marriage and start to search for a virtuous wife.

Prepare for the role of being a husband, absolutely. But again ... where does the Bible compel a man to an active search for a wife? I see you explaining away passages with philosophical logic and reasoning, but I'm not seeing any biblical imperative toward your conclusion to replace the passages that you're trying so hard to undermine.

Regulating Sexual Desire

1 upvotes · 9 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You quote the text, but then you don't use it as a reference point for your view. You start leaving the text to make separate assumptions. For example:

why would the husband and wife be depriving each other? Because they had different sex drives

You know just as well as the next guy that there are a million reasons why people deny sex - and different sex drives is only one item on that list. I have the higher sex drive, but there are still times when I've denied my wife's request - not because I don't want it, but because there are other reasons that get in the way. Now, as Paul says, this might have been sinful for me to do if I thought it would lead my wife to be tempted to commit sexual immorality ... but in my particular case I know better.

husband has a higher sex drive about 2/3rds of the time and wife higher about 1/3 of them

That would be truly shocking to me. I'd wager it's more like 95% and 5%, respectively.

If Paul is talking in context, then he's definitely talking about sex drives leading to temptations (as the person with lower sex drive is depriving usually)

First off, you're still referencing married couples, which he addresses in 1-5. Starting with verse 8 he says: "To the unmarried and the widows I say ..." This is a direct, "I'm changing gears" statement. Accordingly, we must interpret his comments to the unmarried in light of his other comments to the unmarried. To that end, your comment doesn't make reference to any of 25-40 (the section directed toward unmarried people) as an interpretive measure on verse 9. Instead, you're trying to interpret what he said to singles (after changing gears) in light of what he said to married couples (before changing gears) - and that just doesn't make any sense to me.

Second, to bring in the matter of "sex drives" as the "definite" reason why Paul tells people not to deprive each other is complete eisegesis. If you want to look to v1-5 for context instead of 25-40, in verse 2 he says plainly that it's "since sexual immorality is occurring" that people should get married. This inherently assumes a mutual sexuality, not a single one. People were having sex outside of marriage. The assumption is that they both wanted it, as there's no mention of rape. I'm not sure how you make that leap from "stop having sex before you're married, you horny kids" to "only one person wants it and the other doesn't." As noted above, there are dozens of reasons people deprive each other that don't involve unequal sex drives. I'll play the eisegesis card on that claim a million times over. I get the impression that you have a particular conclusion that you want to reach in your head, so you do a cursory reading of the passage, pull out a few concepts that you could use to support your conclusion, and then make your case. In reality, we should be seeking what the Bible says for its own sake, looking to the words themselves as their own source of interpretation, not trying to prove any points. If we do that here, the meaning is much clearer.

Although I'm happy to give all of my notes on word-studies, grammatical tie-ins, cross-references and patterns and all that, for the sake of brevity, here's the section-by-section summary of the chapter that my Bible study ultimately reached:

1. v1-6 - You're quoting anti-sex propaganda, so let me clarify. Sex outside of marriage is bad. If you can't control yourself, sex within marriage is good because it stops you from sinning. Since sex is the main reason to get married, it doesn't make much sense to deny sex and let someone be tempted. But I really wish you could all just stay single in the first place, like me.
2. v8-16 - Singles should stay singles unless they're about to have sex outside of marriage, in which case you should just get married. If you do get married, don't think divorce will let you sleep with anyone else. In fact, just take divorce out of your vocabulary altogether, unless you've got an unbelieving spouse, in which case you're free to let them walk.
3. v17-35 - Whatever your status was when you were saved, that's how you should stay. If you're married, stay married. If you're engaged, get married. If you're single, don't go looking to get married. But even if you are married, you should be living in your commitment to God as if you were single anyway. After all, your devotion to God is what matters and marriage is just a distraction. I want you to live in "undivided devotion to the Lord."
4. v36-40 - That said, if you're around a virgin and your passion is strong, like I just said before, get married so you don't sin. But if you can get control of yourself and avoid marriage, you've done even better. Once you're married, you're bound until death, but you'll be much happier if you stay single.

I'm not sure how anything in this passage encourages people toward marriage just because they privately want to have sex on their own. Moreover, I don't see anything in the NT anywhere, and scant few passages in the OT that compel men to get married or to make marriage a goal/priority in life. Any claim that "God thinks it's good for single men to search among women to find a wife" is pure eisegesis. At best, it's as I say: "If you can't hold yourself back from screwing someone, vet her, make sure she's wife-material, then marry her - and this is a good thing."

Look at online dating, for example. Here we have men who just have a general desire to get married and to have sex, but don't have anyone particular in mind. Where is the biblical basis for their doing so? Because RP and general wisdom/philosophy tells us that this is a horrible idea for men under most current marriage laws. So a man either has to adopt blue pill mentalities or find a biblical basis for seeing the pursuit of marriage as a biblically-compelled endeavor. From my reading of the Bible, there are clear biblical passages that instruct people to avoid marriage if at all possible, but there are no biblical passages that instruct people to go looking from scratch.

Regulating Sexual Desire

1 upvotes · 8 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Thanks for sharing that again. I must not have connected the dots.

I do see where you're coming from in a lot of this. I think I just get hung up when I see distinctions between theological facts and philosophical reasoning. Most people I know don't ever pay attention to this distinction, so we see pastors getting away with preaching pop psychology or feel-good messages, finding a verse or two to support it, and then calling it a message from God. This failure to distinguish between theology and philosophy is at the core of how the feminine imperative infiltrated the church in the first place.

So, when I see a guy who claims to have escaped the feminine imperative and wants a return to "biblical masculinity" - I almost feel a sense of obligation to make sure that this is actually biblical and not just taking a philosophical conception of masculinity and using verses to support it.

From there, it should be quite obvious why this notion of "let's all be looking to find a wife" is a hot-button for me. The only direct biblical references to the need to find a wife are in the Old Testament, which was satisfied in Christ. The imperative toward physical marriage and having physical children was a roadmap to point us to the fact that in a post-Gospel world we are to have that same longing for a spiritual marriage to our spiritual groom and to have spiritual children through our union with Him by His Spirit entering and indwelling within us. To that end, the imperative toward marriage died with Jesus and the imperative toward spiritual marriage and child-rearing rose with him.

This is why we see both Jesus and Paul saying that people should avoid marriage if they are capable of doing so. But as a practical matter of biology, they also both accept that it's not sinful if a person does get married. I see this not as an urging: "Go find a wife! Search long and wide for the best one you can!" I see this as a concession, "It's better to avoid it at all costs, but if you must then you must. I won't stop you."

From what I can tell, this is the only view that is produced from Scripture and it takes some shaky theology to drudge up a select few proverbs to reach the point of convincing men that even today, post-Gospel, they should be seeking marriage. That, to me, comes off more as a philosophical position that people take to justify their own desires, then using verses to back it up to make it look like theology. It's philosophy covered in a thin layer of theological wrapping paper.

Sure, it could be easier if a man is older, but a man would also have to struggle through the temptation during that time too.

This may be going more to the other comment, but with 100% accuracy among the 30+ men I've discipled, if a man burned with passion while he was single to the point of pornography and masturbation, marriage was never a cure. Those same men still struggled with pornography and masturbation even after marriage. Sure, they had a legitimate outlet to express this, but it did not solve the problem.

So, I have for a long time now been advising men to figure this out before even contemplating getting married so that they don't bring that mess into the marriage with them. Once they are married, it will become almost impossible for them to find true peace in the situation because at a biological level their bodies cannot distinguish between sex with their wife or masturbation, so the internal addiction remains without any way of knowing if it has been conquered, other than through a long-term dead bedroom, which I would never wish on anyone.

Or to put it another way, it's easy to say, "As long as he's not looking at porn and is only engaging in sexual conduct with his wife, what does it matter?" But we know that sin originates in the heart and not in the actions alone (if at all). So, how do we know whether he's expressing a healthy desire for his wife through his sexuality or if he's feeding his addiction and using her as an object? Some people argue that this is only an academic distinction - that as long as his actions are right, it doesn't matter where his heart may or may not be. I don't find that biblical. But at this point I'm probably derailing the conversation too much.

You know what I mean. A job is also a mission field. Poor wording.

The job for the job's own sake, no. But the fact that our jobs expose us to new people who need to hear the good news of Christ, absolutely :)

The traditional interpretation seems to support the fact that "to burn" is probably "sex drive" that is inspiring the temptation so it is wise to get married to avoid continual temptation.

I would love to see some exegesis that reaches this conclusion. I've studied a lot and have not found one. I see commentaries that say as you do - but again, they're only people who are musing on what the passage makes them think. I have not seen exegetical support for that conclusion from any commentary, blog post, sermon, etc. I've been through on the topic. That is highly concerning to me.

I don't buy what ifs.

Fair enough. But you can't then say, "Look at how my situation is wonderful" when you're not willing to entertain the possibility that something even more wonderful could have been around the corner. Or to put it another way: you can't tell men to use your life as a model of how things should be unless you're willing to rule out alternative models of doing things as lesser than how you did things. If you're not willing to deal with "what ifs," then the best you can say is, "I don't know if my way was the best way or not, but I'm happy with the results." To suggest anymore is to make a definitive statement that the "what if" scenario is ruled out as somehow being lesser than what you did - but if you're not dealing with the what-ifs, you can't rule it out, thus you can't make that claim.

That opens the door for temptation toward divorce/adultery and 'soulmate' theatrics which we see play out throughout the culture

I agree that it can be taken that way, but that wasn't my intent at all.

I hope you see that this is an enjoyable conversation for me and not me arguing just for the sake of arguing. You're one of the few who actually forces me to think more critically about my thoughts, and I may not word myself the best all the time, I have been contemplating your words deeply and seriously since I first read them yesterday (I wanted to sleep on it before responding). Thank you for being diligent in this, even if we ultimately do not see eye to eye.

Regulating Sexual Desire

1 upvotes · 8 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Here's how I see it:

- The verse speaks in the plural
- Nowhere else in the passage is Paul referencing masturbation
- The context is Paul leading people away from treating marriage as an idol, so I can't imagine he's saying, "If you have a really strong desire to be married, then go be married" - it's obviously sexual in nature.
- All his other references to sexuality in this passage are between a man and a woman.
- Most importantly, the entire second half of the chapter (25-40) is him going back and explaining what he meant in 9 by addressing the specific situation of the unmarried people, and everything in this passage is talking about two people in relationship with one another - not isolated people who are struggling with lust.

I feel like any other interpretation involving "solo-passion" is eisegetically imputing this thought while ignoring the context of 25-40. It's possible when Paul wrote 25-40 that he thought to himself, "I'm talking about something different now, this part shouldn't have any bearing on what I just wrote a few sentences back" ... but I seriously doubt it. All of Paul's other writings have a clear flow. So to assume he is abandoning his traditional pattern of writing to put in a one-off verse that should be interpreted outside the context of everything else he's saying ... that just seems off to me.

I'm not saying it's impossible that Paul meant what you're saying ... just that it seems incredibly unlikely. As much as Chrysostom has a few good quotes every now and then, from what I've read of him, he is more of a spiritual philosopher than a theologian. His ideas are often his own, inspired by Scripture and not actually an interpretation of Scripture itself. This is how it was for most of the early fathers that I've read - they get their hands on one passage, but instead of studying they passage they just start writing everything that the verse makes them think about. That's dangerous and it's certainly not theology, although I admit it often leads to some pretty beautiful sounding quotes.

Regulating Sexual Desire

1 upvotes · 8 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I've done a ton of writing here on the importance of having a mission and what it should be. Most of it is on the sidebar. I also heavily advise all people to listen to "Born to Reproduce" - a talk by Dawson Trotman from several decades ago that still rings true today. It can be found here as the top talk on the front page. His talk "The Need of the Hour" is equally potent. Both messages are about having a mission and following through.

What parts of "Game" should a RP Christian utilize? Which ones should we not utilize?

1 upvotes · 7 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I don't see how that theology changes those requirements. It only applies to non virgins, so if you're only looking for a virgin it shouldn't matter.

How does a RPC deal with hookup culture?

1 upvotes · 7 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I agree entirely. And to be clear - what I meant was not that I had the book up, then later did my cross-off thing. I had it up as a joke in the first place. I didn't like that book when I read it 13 years ago, and I like it even less today :p

Regulating Sexual Desire

1 upvotes · 7 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

This makes more sense. As long as we're agreed that your position is a philosophical one, we're on the same page with everything :)

The only thing I would caution, though, is not to present your belief system as a "godly" one. If it is rooted in philosophy or praxeology and only uses theology as a framework within which that philosophy/praxeology must operate, it is not "godly" or "biblical" so to speak - it is merely "not against the Bible." Those are two very different things. One communicates to others, "This is how God wants you to do it" and the other says, "I don't know what God wants; this is my own personal thought, just make sure you're not breaking clear biblical boundaries while you live it out."

To that end, I'd be highly cautious of presenting it the first way if it is not grounded in theological fact (and I don't think that position can be so grounded). I don't like putting words in God's mouth that he never said himself.

Regulating Sexual Desire

1 upvotes · 7 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

small age gaps tend to be the most stable marriages

I would really like to see the source material for this. I get that the vast majority of marriages have small age gaps simply because of social context - we often put people of like ages around each other for school, extracurricular activities, church classes/small groups, employment tiering, etc.

My guess is that the stats you're looking at are general and not specific to Christian culture. Statistics that involve biblical marriages often deviate significantly from the broader cultural numbers.

It's an error to apply male logic to women

I'm not sure what part of that was male logic. It's a common concept of female psychology - and not even from anything I've read on the manosphere. As a friend of mine used to say, "Women hope to change their men and men hope their women always stay the same; in the end, neither gets what they want." This notion that women want to change their men to suit their own expectations of who they think he could be is quite universal - and something that every woman I've ever interviewed (including my own wife) acknowledges as true.

Most women in their early 20s either have a "family priority" or a "career priority"

This is true. But that's only as it relates to their own lives. They assume that whatever man they end up with will supplicate to their imperative. If she's family-minded, she expects her man to be a hard-worker who can provide with a single income, and then often also expects him to do x around the house, y in the hard, and z with the kids, constantly pushing him toward her expectations. Likewise, a career-minded woman will marry a man with certain expectations of how he will be supportive in different ways of her career aspirations, and if she meets a guy who isn't she will expect him to conform to those patterns anyway - always looking to what he could be and never to what he actually is.

Mission is usually done alongside a career anyway, unless it's as a pastor.

And that is one of the deepest regrets I have for the modern church - that God's mission is compartmentalized and not seen as applicable in all ways at all times.

because I want to "rejoice in the wife of my youth" so to speak.

I get that, and I don't fault you for that position. But that was also in a pre-Gospel culture where people were pushed into marriages at a young age. I don't see God endorsing young-age marriage; rather, he is commenting on those who have engaged in it.

Marriage is the norm for most people across most cultures, so it is wise for Christian men to be proactive about finding a wife.

When I read this I see: "Culture says to do this, so as Christians we would be wise to do it too."

I would have never met my wife if I was not very proactive in going out of my way to asking other Christian men and women about Christian women who fit some of the criteria I was looking for in a prospective wife.

With all due respect, how do you know you would not have ended up with someone better and in a better timing of your life if you had waited until God brought someone alongside you naturally?

I'm not saying your model can't work - praxeology tells us it can. But it is not a theologically grounded model. There is no biblical imperative to seek a wife. There is lots of biblical imperative to put yourself out there and let a woman seek you. After all, this is how God is with us. He doesn't hide in a corner and hope we find him. He puts himself out there. But beyond that, when I last studied it, the ratio was approximately 1 passage about God (groom) seeking us for every 25 passages about us (bride) seeking God. I'm not sure how to get around that theological framework, and I certainly don't want to let culture dictate my theology.

How to approach sex in the first weeks of marriage

1 upvotes · 7 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

My first week of marriage was a rough one. My wife came in with a lot of psychological conditioning with a negative attitude about sex. As she recounted on our honeymoon:

- "I was only ever told two things about sex all my life: it's sinful before marriage and it hurts a lot. That's how my parents and my church controlled me. Because I was never married until yesterday, my only context was thinking 'sex = sin.' I know it's not sin anymore, but I've spent the last two decades where it was sin for me."

And yes, it was painful for her too. Her parents never even let her wear tampons because it was "sin" to have anything in her vagina. As such, there was no stretching and it was highly uncomfortable for her to have anything inside of her. We were not able to have sex the first two nights of our honeymoon.

This set a very, very, very bad precedent. It took close to a year before the pain went away, and even today if she ever goes longer than a week without sex (which used to be often) there was an intense pain for her when we did have sex again. I'm pretty confident that she had a form of vaginismus, which is a predominantly psychosomatic condition.

How to deal with it? I have no idea. Most people don't deal with these types of problems, but they do happen and there are no clear biblical guidelines for handling it. I took the extremely cautious route, which was my first real introduction to a beta mentality with my wife. This established a precedent that sex was about making things as comfortable for her as possible and minimizing pain. Later on in our marriage she commented, "I wish we had done things differently - that you had just forced it so that we wouldn't have set such a bad precedent for our whole first year of marriage." I can't say for sure which was better other than to note that the RP Christian (as opposed to secular guy) must be mutually aware of her pain while also leading her down a path that will be fruitful for long-term sexuality, despite the short-term pain. Hopefully you never have to deal with that awful balance.

One might even consider initiating sex in the first weeks more often than one likes, in order to set a high standard when it comes to frequency

That won't work. Most women take the first weeks as a honeymoon period and expect that it will die down. You'd have to make it more like the first 2 years for her to develop an actual expectation that this is how it's going to be long-term.

Even if you do plan on backing down a little, if you play games like this up-front, as long as it's short-term she's always going to set her own expectation as the default and assume you will revert to her expectation.

The better plan is for the man simply to initiate with her as often as he wants and to develop a solid frame if/when she rejects him. This isn't about manipulating your wife into a certain frequency; it's about becoming the type of man who knows what he wants and goes for it.

But is it advisable from a RP perspective to initiate whenever he likes, maybe even regardless of whether his wives feels like it in the particular moment?

Absolutely. I played the "wait for my wife to want it too" game and it's a crap blue pill game that doesn't work. Eventually, over time, the wife will just never want it. Why? Because women have a cyclical sexual pattern and if you teach them that they have control over sexual frequency they will match it to their own pattern, learn to feel comfortable denying you, and then in the 3 or so days that they're ovulating and otherwise would want sex, if they sense anything negative from you at all, they'll end up denying you anyway, pushing you into becoming her BB. In essence, you'd be training her not to be sexually attracted to you so that even on days when she would want it, she'd rather pass it up still. This is the fast track to a dead bedroom.

Women are very in-the-moment people. Whatever their current emotions tell them defines their reality, including when they look to the past and the future. If they're in a crummy mood now, they're going to look back on even their best sexual experiences with you with negative feelings. If they're in a good mood and feeling sexual, then they'll look back at their past sexuality - and prospectively toward future sexuality - very positively and desirously.

Simply put, if you want your wife to enjoy having sex with you, you have to initiate with her frequently. The more often she has sex with you, the more she will learn to enjoy it. The more she enjoys it, the more she has positive associates with those memories. But if you let that lapse for too long, she fades into neutrality and ultimately negativity about her sexuality, including her memories of having sex with you, which then makes it harder to get her sexuality going again.

The solution is obvious: engage regularly and often so that she maintains a positive attitude about sex. This is good for both you and her and is biblical (1 Cor. 7:5).

Regulating Sexual Desire

1 upvotes · 7 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Not that it makes me question her virtuousness, but more so overall spiritual maturity.

Correct. And she acknowledges that she had the qualities of a spiritually mature person, but that she was not actually mature. She had psychological pressures to express those virtues rather than inspiration from the Spirit within her. That's why I caution that the virtues themselves are not enough.

Regulating Sexual Desire

1 upvotes · 7 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

The quality women also tend to get snapped up pretty early, so it's a good idea to try to snap one up yourself.

This assumes that someone is actively looking for a bride. As I've noted many times elsewhere, I don't believe Christians should actively be pursuing marriage; rather, marriage should be a natural byproduct of men and women working alongside one another on a common mission for Christ, which proximity leads them into a mutual "burning passion" for one another.

I do believe most people will end up getting married, even in this model - probably over 99%. And one could certainly be selective about which people they pursue their mission alongside, only selecting those people they believe it would be healthy and safe to develop a burning passion with. For example, I would not want to start a discipleship ministry at my church such that I'd have a lot of alone time with another married woman, even if I were single. That's just spelling trouble. But if I were single, it would make sense to bring other singles alongside me so that I cannot be accused of doing anything inappropriate and I'm allowing a context for God to foster a relationship, even if I might otherwise not be pursuing it intentionally.

The model you're proposing makes it feel like you're saying, "There are only so many good fish in the sea, so you'd better get in there and grab one before all the good ones are gone." I just don't see this as a biblical framework for marriage. It makes a lot of philosophical sense. But our faith has never been rooted in philosophy before, as the foundation has always been theology, and I prefer to keep it that way ;)

Help with dating stuff

1 upvotes · 3 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Oops ... I just assume OPs here are guys. My bad ... should have looked at the username.

I'd love some biblical feedback.

1 upvotes · 3 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

And who does most of the initiating in those novels? Virtually always the guy. She's fantasizing about a real man (whatever that means to her) giving her something to react to.

How do I access the sidebar after the redesign?

1 upvotes · 3 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

It still shows up on the sidebar like always for me.

Help with dating stuff

1 upvotes · 3 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

What makes you so desperate to find a wife in the first place? Let's start there to ensure your motives are oriented correctly before we go to the next step.

I'd love some biblical feedback.

1 upvotes · 3 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

You're right. But it is true in the majority. Some might be more like 80% responsive and others 75% and others 99% and maybe a few who actually tip past the 50% line and are more spontaneous ... but if I had to create a bell curve, I'd wager the peak is right around 90-95%.

On Beards...

1 upvotes · 2 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

I track with you.

On Beards...

1 upvotes · 2 May 2018 · /r/askMRP

The question is how much to tailor my appearance to the tastes of what my wife finds attractive?

This was literally just said on r/RPChristians by u/Deep_Strength:

My wife is noticeably more attracted and turned on when I have longer styled hair than short. Same if I wear more "hipster-ish" type clothing than what I usually wear. She helped me select out the glasses that she liked.

There's nothing wrong with catering to her particular tastes to help her along.

It doesn't quite sit well with me, as I tend to prefer the "do whatever you want" approach. But what if what you want happens to be unattractive? Should the man do what he wants, or should he be attractive?

My guess is the MRP community will tell you that having a beard is attractive to some and not to others, so it doesn't really matter, as long as you're not trying to cater your attractiveness to one specific woman, which demonstrates a lack of abundance and a shift into her frame. But I'd be happy to be proven wrong on that too.

Regardless, how would that analysis change if a guy just wants to lounge around the house in a baggy set of gym shorts and a t-shirt that are objectively unattractive as a fashion style, but he likes them because they're comfy anyway? Do it or not?

Right now I just do whatever the heck I want. I feel like catering to my wife in the hope of "attracting her" implies a covert contract: "If I cut my beard like she wants, maybe she'll have sex with me more." Screw that.

I too would like to see this conversation more generally and not just about beards.

Homily on Ephesians 5:22-33 by St. John Chrysostom (On Marriage and Family Life)

1 upvotes · 2 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

I believe that society should conform to the Church, not the Church to society

That sounds like a cool catch-phrase, but it's not the message I see in 1 Cor. 9.

Have you read the Church Fathers?

Many. Obviously not all ... there's way too much.

Homily on Ephesians 5:22-33 by St. John Chrysostom (On Marriage and Family Life)

1 upvotes · 2 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Christ is also the Head of the Church. Not just the Head of Man.

True. But the church is originally intended to be run by men (that has only changed significantly in recent years). Christ's headship over man comes in the form of his headship over the church, so we're saying and intending the same thing here, I think ... unless you intend women a more prominent role in the running and directing of the church than I'd otherwise take as biblical.

I do believe that the man is to be the leader, but not as a tyrant, but as Christ is the Head of the Church.

Completely agreed.

It only makes sense to me that way.

Fair enough :) I should be clear here: I'm not trying to convince you away from Orthodoxy. Part of me just enjoys these types of conversations. Another part is uniquely interested because I almost went down the EO path at one point too, before ultimately reversing course. There's a lot that the EO church gets right - and it's quite beautiful, and it's a lot of stuff that Protestants miss, and I wish more Protestants could see that.

I'd love some biblical feedback.

1 upvotes · 2 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Get past your mental blocks and assume she's into it until her actions tell you otherwise. You wrote elsewhere that she doesn't starfish you. If you start seeing starfish (for example), that's when her actions are telling you otherwise.

I'd love some biblical feedback.

1 upvotes · 2 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

Ah, that makes a lot more sense. Thanks!

I'd love some biblical feedback.

1 upvotes · 2 May 2018 · /r/RPChristians

his wife didn't love him and wasn't attracted to him at the outset

